5. Description of physical appearance:

This is a 3½ story brick house with a double-tiered piazza over a brick and stucco gallery on the south facade. The dwelling has three bays on its west front elevation with an original Greek Revival doorway and triple-tiered windows in its 4th story gable end. Most of the building's features, including some of the shutters and slate roof, and the excellent brick work and piazzas, are original. The house was one of the first restored under Historic Charleston Foundation's historic Ansonborough Rehabilitation Project in the early 1960s. The building has a brick addition on the east dating from about 1965 and an original, restored, two-story brick kitchen house. On the interior, the house follows the "side hall, double parlor" scheme of Charleston single houses after 1840, with two major rooms on each floor. The first floor stairhall contains its original scroll-shaped newell and balusters, as well as Greek Revival door surrounds and wainscoting. The second floor retains most of its original detailing, including black marble mantels in the double drawing rooms, original sliding pocket doors and Greek Revival cornices and trim.

6. Statement of significance:

One of the first houses restored by HCF, as part of the Ansonborough Rehabilitation Project in the early 1960s, the building remains an excellent example of the late Greek Revival style used in the construction of so many houses in that district after the time of the fire of 1838. It appears to have been constructed by Eliza Kohne, the widow of a wealthy landowner, Frederick Kohne, of Charleston and Philadelphia, in 1846. Upon Mrs. Kohne's death in 1848, she left an annuity to her freed slave, Emma Harbeaux, who was unable to return to S. C. to claim her property. Emma's case was defended by James Louis Petigru in a famous case before the United States Supreme Court (See Lyon G. Tyler, "James Louis Petigru, Freedom's Champion in a Slave Society," S. C. Historical Magazine, LXXXIII (October 1982, 284). The house was then acquired by Benjamin Simons Neufville, a noted merchant, in 1849, and the building remained in the Neufville family until the early 20th century.

The house, with its spacious side garden, is highly contributory to a block, which on both sides of the street, contains only buildings constructed before 1860, although the two houses to the north were moved from up the street to their present positions during the Ansonborough Rehabilitation.

The Kohne-Neufville house has been rated Category 2, "Excellent" by the Feiss-Wright Survey.
