GenDescr	Gardens represent a formal parterre design. These are located at the back of the house, though badly overgrown with bushes, weeds and grass. Descending back steps lead to large semi-circular room at far end. Entrance to garden room leads into flagstone area surrounding a large magnolia tree. Radiating from this terraced area was a series of semi-circular turf areas intersected with pathways bordered by a large circular hedge. Original plans show a parterre on either side of main path symmetrically partitioned into circular and rectangular planting areas. Dividing parterre area from main garden room is a low brick wall with small rectangular garden beds on either side, and flagstone steps at either end.

Condition	excellent
Curr_descr	Walkway leading to the main garden room can be easily seen from back porch. Parterres were located on either side. Garden is grossly overgrown now. Through a considerable amount of digging it may be possible to locate original flagstone. Brick borders are still in place, just extremely overgrown. Buried under the soil are the remains of the garden rooms.

Loutrel Briggs Garden Survey Report The McLeod Plantation

Survey prepared by-	Historic Charleston Foundation Volunteer Briggs Garden Survey Project

Original Owner of garden-	William E. McLeod

Pertinent Information-

The historic McLeod Plantation is located on James Island by the Ashley River. At one point this plantation covered an area of from _____ to _____. It is believed that the property was acquired in the early 1800s but the house was not built until 1850. During the Civil War it was used as a hospital for Confederate soldiers. Loutrel W. Briggs designed the gardens in May of 1932. Some would believe that no true southern plantation is complete without the classic Avenue of the Oaks or "Oak Alley". This long curricular driveway entrance leads up to the front of the house, complete with stone hitching posts. Briggs designed two unusual shaped plant areas by the front steps. They resemble an elongated oval that has been cut in half allowing the guest of the plantation to pass through before mounting the steps.

The gardens of the McLeod Plantation represent a formal, parterres design; a classic example of the beautifully proportioned, symmetric designs of Andre Le Notre. The formal gardens that Loutrel Briggs designed are located at the back of the house, though badly overrun with bushes, weeds and grass. By descending the back steps one walks along a long central axis, stopping midway to descend a set of flagstone steps before continuing into the large semi-curricular room at the far end. The entrance to the garden room leads into a flagstone area surrounding a large magnolia. Radiating out from this terraced area was a series of semi-curricular turf areas intersected with pathways bordered by a large curricular hedge. At one point a "farm" road passed along the outer edge of the hedge framing the garden rather nicely. This road began as another smaller oak alley running along what many believe is the best remaining examples of slave housing left in the Low Country.

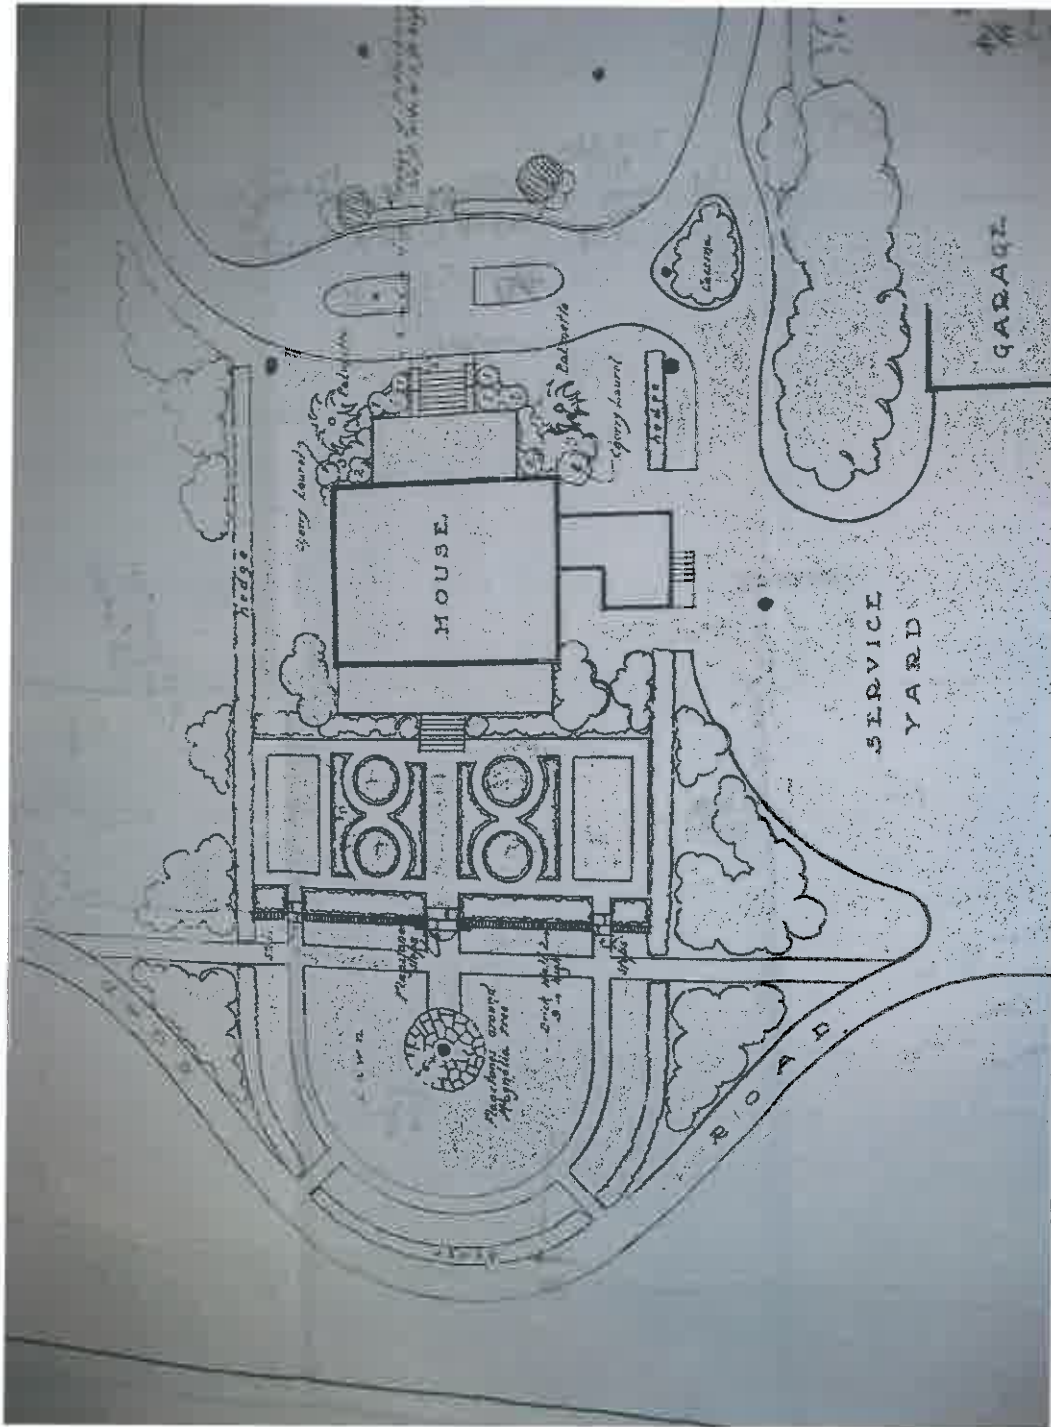

The original plans show a parterre on either side of the main path symmetrically partitioned into circular and rectangular planting areas. The design resembles a perfectly proportioned figure eight with two circular shaped planting areas surrounded by paths and curved rectangular shaped planting area resembling a crown. Large rectangular planting areas are located on the two outer edges.

Dividing the parterre area from the main garden room is a low brick wall with small rectangular garden beds on either side and flagstone steps at each end.

From the back porch you can easily see the walkway that leads to the main garden room. Parterres were located on either side. The main garden room was designed as a semi circular area with a circular flagstone area around a Magnolia tree. Through a considerable amount of digging it may be possible to locate the original flagstone.

Even though it is grossly overgrown with shrubs, weeds etc. you can easily see the splendor that once graced this house and grounds

The McLeod Plantation

Through a bit of digging one could uncover the basic framework or “bones” of the garden rooms. The brick borders are still in place, just extremely overgrown with weeds and grass

Buried under the soil are the remains
