DESCRIPTION

The Hutchinson house is a rectangular, one-and-one-half-story residence featuring a side-gable roof with bargeboards and three gabled dormers with six-over-six lights and batten shutters on the front slope of the roof. The facade has a pedimented porch which dates from a later period and symmetrical fenestration - AABAA (A = a single, six-over-six light window; B = a single-leaf door). This weatherboard-clad house rests on a raised, brick-pier foundation and has shed and gable-roofed additions at the west and north elevations. There is a single window with batten shutters centered in each gable. About one hundred yards west of the house is the site of a cotton gin.

SIGNIFICANCE

AREA OF SIGNIFICANCE: Architecture/Black History

LEVEL OF SIGNIFICANCE: L (FOR OFFICE USE ONLY)

SUMMARY OF SIGNIFICANCE

This house is significant as the oldest identified intact house on Edisto Island associated with the black community after the Civil War. It was the residence of Henry Hutchinson, a mulatto who, according to local tradition, built and operated the first cotton gin owned by a black on the island from ca. 1900 to ca. 1920.(1) Hutchinson was born a slave in 1860, and was the son of James Hutchinson, a mulatto who made notable attempts both as a slave and as a freedman to improve conditions for blacks on Edisto Island.(2) Henry Hutchinson is said to have built this house at the time of his marriage to Rosa Swinton in 1885, and he resided here until his death in ca. 1940.(3)

ACREAGE: 10.2 acres
