By the way, this weekend, I got an email alert that someone was selling a good image of an old Charleston house. I checked it out, and they were actually selling a set of four different views of 93 Rutledge Ave. Super images. It wasn't an auction but just a flat rate price. I didn't want to let them slip away, so I bought two: the front and side view of the house. The other two were of the garden and a close-up of the piazza steps. I really thought those two would go unsold since they were such generic images, but someone else scooped those two up just about an hour later!

When the originals arrive, I'll drop them off for you. I did, however, download what seem to be pretty high res scans of the other two that someone else bought up. You have a similar front view of the house on-line but I think it might be a little later. The landscaping out front is different at least, and the house seems to have been a little more worn down. The caption on these images all refer to Thomas Mordecai as the owner. I think he owned the house from about 1892 to about 1920, which is a big window, but the best I can do.
