In The Avro Arrow Affair, author Lee Heide has recreated the destruction of Canada's claim to lead the world in jet interceptors. The story is set against the tense background of the Cold War that demarked the Soviet Bloc countries from the USA and its Allies. It makes vividly real the effects of the cancellation of the multi-million dollar project by the then Prime Minister John Diefenbaker Government. The decision meant throwing thousands of skilled technicians out of work, destroying all craft built to that time and with the aircraft, all the invaluable technical information that was both the essential know-how to build and the inevitable by-product of the evolving project. All this went on upon a world stage dominated by spies, subterfuge and East/West politics. This is a thoroughly researched book made alive by a talented writer of dramatic narrative and will be read, not without sadness, by everybody who recognizes a need in Canada, then and now, for rightful recognition of the country's potential for technological leadership, especially in the field of aviation.
