At the beginning of this century we did take advantage of immigrants by asking them to do jobs that Anglo-Saxons disliked very much, and very low wages were paid. In the middle of the twentieth century I do not think it is good enough to bring immigrants to the country and ask them to compete with men who belong to unions, at wages which are apparently a great deal less than would be paid to Canadians undertaking that work. I have been told that R. F. Welch Limited makes up to $2 a day out of the labour of as many as 1,200 men at a given time. I do not know whether it is that much, or how much it is.

I realize that the men are under obligations to R. F. Welch Limited as a result of that company making it possible for them to be in Canada, but I think the parliament of Canada has a right to know all the details in connection with the relationships which exist between R. F. Welch Limited and the immigrants who come to Canada, and how much if anything the company is making per year as a result of the use of immigrants on the maintenance of way of the Canadian National Railways. I hope the minister will persuade the Canadian National Railways that these are matters of public concern. All the people of Canada have a right to be told exactly what are the details.

Earlier this afternoon the minister was kind enough to give the house some information regarding the operations of the two dieselized trains which started on Sunday. Earlier in the session I raised the question to find out why the Canadian Pacific had been able to announce the new faster service before the Canadian National Railways. The minister was able to draw my attention to the fact that both railways announced the service on the same date, but in the Gazette on that particular date the Canadian Pacific did announce in detail the saving in time that would be effected across the country, whereas the Canadian National Railways merely announced that they too were going to run a faster train.

The only reason I raise this matter is that throughout the years I have been a great advocate of public ownership. Having travelled on both railways, I think the Canadian National Railways has always given a comparable service. Some of my colleagues are favourable to the Canadian Pacific, but both railways have given service of a very high order.

However, in recent months particularly there is a feeling that the Canadian National Railways are not getting a fair break. While it is true that the Canadian National Railways have a slightly longer run from Montreal to Vancouver, the difference is only 49 miles. Until Sunday the Canadian Pacific led the Canadian National Railways by only 15 minutes in the distance of 2,930 miles. If throughout the years the Canadian Pacific was able to drag along with just that difference, I cannot understand why now it becomes so much more hazardous for the Canadian National Railways to make the run across Canada in the same time or in 15 minutes less time than the Canadian Pacific.

I was a member of the railways and shipping committee some years ago when I believe it was Senator Reid, the member for New Westminster at that time, who expressed the opinion, when Mr. Vaughan was president of the railway, that the Canadian National could easily cut off 12 hours. I think Senator Reid said that coming east they were 12 hours late out of Edmonton but reached Ottawa on time. I believe Mr. Vaughan admitted that the Canadian National Railways could cut their time by 12 hours, but he said that they wanted to arrive at Edmonton, Saskatoon, Winnipeg and other large centres at convenient hours, and there was not much point in going into Saskatoon at three o'clock in the morning or leaving Winnipeg in the middle of the night or reaching Toronto or Montreal at sometime between midnight and four o'clock in the morning. So those schedules were considered satisfactory.

It is hard for me to understand, if the Canadian Pacific is now making the run safely in the time they set out, why the Canadian National should have to take two hours and ten minutes longer. The Canadian Pacific will leave Montreal at one o'clock; business people will be able to have their lunch on the train, and in due course this train will reach Vancouver at 9.10 in the morning. So business people going from Montreal to Vancouver by train will have a half day in Montreal and a full day in Vancouver.

Those who travel via C.N.R. will have to hang around in Montreal until 3.25 in the afternoon and they will reach Vancouver at 1.45 p.m. on the same day the Canadian Pacific train will arrive at 9.10 a.m. So those who are travelling for business reasons will lose all the morning and it will be well on into the afternoon before they arrive in Vancouver. It would seem to me that the Canadian National should be able to make the run across Canada as quickly as the Canadian Pacific, or certainly do better than run two hours and ten minutes slower.

It has always been argued that the Canadian National has a better roadbed. I came back from Winnipeg at Easter on the Canadian Pacific. I have been a C.N.R. man all my life, but I wanted to see what the Canadian Pacific was like. I was able to see the new dome cars, and they are very attractive. Those who have travelled over the C.P.R. will agree that there are a great many sharp curves as you follow the north shore of Lake Superior. Those who have travelled across the Rockies will also agree that the Canadian National has a much better crossing through the mountains. I checked, and I find that the Canadian Pacific has to climb to a height of 5,332 feet at Stephen, as compared with a maximum of 3,717 feet at Yellowhead on the C.N.R. In other words the C.P.R. has to climb 1,615 feet higher to cross the mountains. The Canadian Pacific at Calgary is at a height of 3,438 feet, which is 1,349 feet higher than the Canadian National—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In interrupting the hon. member who has the floor, I realize that I may appear to be exercising some unfairness. May I say that I have been in the chamber during the whole course of this debate except for 15 minutes. I understand that there has been a sort of tacit agreement that what we do today shall not be considered binding, because the matter of what is and what is not relevant is under study at the moment.

I am going to ask the hon. member who has the floor and those who follow him if they will ask themselves whether the matters they are discussing can conceivably be brought within the terms of the resolution which is before us. The hon. member is discussing the respective merits of the timetables. Some of the subjects which have been brought up for discussion—and on this matter I have my own views but I am not going to inflict them upon the committee at the moment—may or may not be regarded as falling within the purview of this resolution. Others definitely cannot be said to do so.

I am not going to rule anybody out of order today on the ground of irrelevancy because of the latitude which has been allowed. However, I am going to ask the members of this committee not to go any further afield than their good sense tells them the resolution would allow.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall conclude this portion of my speech and in fact my whole speech very shortly. I was merely raising this particular problem in order to express the concern felt by many of my friends with regard to the future of the Canadian National Railways.

I am most anxious that parliament should not be placed in the position that we have less information and less supervision of the officials of the Canadian National Railways. As I said, I think there is a tendency to ask parliament to give up some of its responsibilities to the management and to the government. In the resolution it has been proposed to give the Canadian National the right to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority. I am quite concerned about this trend that seems to be developing, and it certainly is giving a great deal of concern to Canadian National Railways employees who feel that the government-owned company is not getting its fair breaks.

I shall conclude by saying this. The Canadian Pacific Railway has taken the lead in introducing this stainless steel train. It is able to boast that it is the only railway in Canada that has dome cars. I agree with Austin Cross who wrote in the Citizen yesterday that the new train is one of the finest anywhere. I think it is a pity that the Canadian National Railways have not been able to get similar equipment and are not able to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway in the run from Montreal to Vancouver and from Vancouver to Montreal.

Miss Bennett: In view of the fact that it is almost five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, when we proceed to the consideration of private members' bills, may I call it five o'clock?

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for the second reading of Bill No. 186, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): While I have not checked the matter, the hon. member for Prince Albert will permit me to say that, if he speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this amendment was introduced on March 18 in order to cover the matter of the pollution of interprovincial streams. Because of the long period that has elapsed since its introduction I should like to refer to it for the purpose of having it on the record. It reads:

> Every owner, lessee, or person operating any industrial plant, oil refinery, chemical works, sawmill or other plant or works, or any other person, who discharges or throws or allows to be discharged or thrown any noxious waste product, raw sewage, oil, sawdust, chemical or other matter or thing into a river, stream or other water any part of which is interprovincial or which flows into any interprovincial water, which has the effect of endangering the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public is guilty of
> (a) an indictable offence and is liable to a fine of ten thousand dollars for a first offence and of twenty thousand dollars for a second offence, or
> (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Such punishment, of course, would be in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Code with relation to summary conviction penalties.

I want to thank all those who have spoken on this amendment. Generally speaking I think there has been agreement that the pollution of our interprovincial streams is a matter of ever-increasing seriousness, and that across Canada in practically every province the waterways are becoming polluted to a degree that will ensure, in a matter of a generation, the almost complete destruction of their usefulness for domestic or manufacturing purposes, unless action is taken.

The Minister of Justice and Attorney General (Mr. Garson), in dealing with the matter, contended that a question such as this could be dealt with on the basis of co-operation as between province and province. In the past few weeks I have had from various parts of this country considerable correspondence indicating that this problem is national in scope and that federal action is necessary to meet it and to punish those who would destroy for the great body of the Canadian people the usefulness of the God-given rivers which supply our manufacturing industries and are also a source of our domestic water supply.

There was a request on the part of various fish and game organizations for legislation such as is embodied in this amendment. A recent example, to which I shall but allude, was the occurrence on the North Saskatchewan river. As a result of the dumping of effluents by Canadian Chemical Company Limited into the North Saskatchewan river at a point east of Edmonton, the waters of the river were rendered unusable for a period of three months by the cities of Battleford and Prince Albert, the town of The Pas, and by people living between Edmonton and The Pas.

To summarize the minister's stand, he said first of all that there was no need for this legislation inasmuch as the amendments to the Criminal Code recently passed by parliament, which became law on April 1, would cover the situation. When the minister referred to that point I asked him a simple question, as is found at page 2504 of Hansard for March 29. The minister was turning to another point, and at that time I said:

> Before the minister goes on with that, will he permit a question?
> Mr. Garson: Yes.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: It has to do with the suggestion he made the other day that the new section is different in import and purport from the old section.

Then I read the old section, which was as follows:

> A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right common to all His Majesty's subjects.

That section had been in the law for many years. That was the section at the time the event took place to which I referred a minute ago, when the North Saskatchewan river was to all intents and purposes but a floating sewer of effluents that had been dumped into it by an industrial concern east of Edmonton. The amendment which became law this year reads as follows:

> (2) For the purposes of this section every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or > (b) obstructs the public in the exercise or enjoyment of any right that is common to all the subjects of Her Majesty in Canada.

Then I asked the minister this question:

> What is different in these two sections?

The minister replied quite frankly and said:

> If I understand my hon. friend's question correctly he is asking me whether I contend that the new section differs in any point of substance from the old section. I agree that there is no substantial difference between them. I did not argue that there was.

However, a reading of his earlier remarks would indicate that one of the reasons he gave for opposing the amendment I suggested was that the new amendment to the Criminal Code now in effect would make it a punishable offence to destroy the waters of any river, so far as use by the public was concerned, in the manner which was in evidence on the North Saskatchewan river.

Then the minister took up another line, as I saw it, and stated that the amendment now before the house did not cover municipalities dumping sewage into rivers. I am not so sure he was right in that regard, because it would make it an offence for any person to dump raw sewage into a river. However, to make assurance doubly sure I asked the minister this question, as is found at the top of page 2507:

> If my amendment were altered to include municipalities which put raw sewage into rivers and thereby contribute to the pollution, would the minister then accept it?

This was his answer:

> I am now expressing my own personal views. I would not accept it because I would think if that were done it would expose a great many municipalities, including perhaps the city of Ottawa, to prosecution in police court, which prosecution would in my judgment contribute very little, if anything at all, to the solution of the problem with which the hon. member is attempting to deal. In other words, I do not think police court prosecutions are a solution for river pollution.

In other words the minister first took two stands, and when faced with an answer to both those stands he finally took the position that he did not believe prosecution was the best means to prevent wrongs such as were committed against the peoples of the cities of Prince Albert and Battleford and the town of The Pas. I think the best summary of the situation was given in an editorial in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 15, 1954. After reviewing the situation prevailing on the North Saskatchewan river the editorial went on to say:

> Hitherto there has been a tendency to take the protests of the people of Prince Albert and Battleford much too lightly; to regard the unpleasantness of their water as little more than annoyance; even, on occasion to treat the efforts of elected representatives to obtain a solution as mere politicking. Why this should have been the case, why the right of human beings to water as pure as nature and normal circumstances offer should have been so disregarded, we don't know. But we suspect the fisheries report—

That was the report issued a few days earlier by the director of fisheries of Saskatchewan.

> —will put a different complexion on the matter; and for that reason above all it is to be welcomed.

Then there is the following:

> To this end it may be necessary to widen the scope of federal law so that it covers a broader range of types and effects of pollution—so that it is more in accord with conditions likely to crop up in our industrializing age. But law is only a deterrent, not a preventative. Something more is needed, something which will meet the difficulties caused by the fact that pollution of waters in one province may, as in the case of the North Saskatchewan, produce harmful results in another. Here we believe the establishment of an agency patterned on the prairie provinces water board or, for a start, an extension of that board's powers, offers the best solution.

Well, a board has been set up. In addition, as the Star-Phoenix editorial points out, teeth should be put in the law. As the law is at the present time, the opinion of the best counsel procurable was to the effect that the section did not permit of any successful prosecution being launched against the wrongdoer. The same situation prevails in other parts of the country.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Garson: Was that opinion of counsel, to which he has just referred, based upon the fact that counsel was not assured that there was sufficient evidence upon which a conviction could be obtained?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, far from it. The question whether there is sufficient evidence is for the court. What was submitted to counsel—and by "counsel" I refer to the legal representatives who were consulted—was based upon the premise that the city of Prince Albert or any of the other municipalities had sufficient evidence upon which to establish the identity of the wrongdoer, and the opinion was that the section in question did not permit of a successful prosecution. I think it is pretty obvious when the section is read. It says:

> A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right common to all Her Majesty's subjects.

My hon. friend says, as I understand his argument, that the unlawful act consists of the breach of a provincial health statute. Once that breach is established it gives rise to a prosecution under the section in question, as amended in the present Criminal Code, because of the fact that the doing of the act in question contrary to the health act of an individual province gives a right of action.

The opinion of counsel was that such was not the fact, and that the unlawful act as comprehended by the section in question must be an unlawful act within the meaning of the Criminal Code itself. Indeed, counsel gave legal precedents to support that viewpoint, and gave us their opinion that there was no right of criminal action to prosecute the wrongdoers who, for a period of three months, flouted the comfort of tens of thousands of people. I mention that not in order to bring forward this amendment as a means of protecting only the people of Saskatchewan along the North Saskatchewan river alone, but the people of several provinces along the course traversed by that river.

I feel that we in Canada face a problem which will have to be met. In the United States it is being met, but in Canada it is being by-passed by both parliament and the legislatures. I am not condemning the government of Alberta in any way when I say this, but according to the representatives of the government of Saskatchewan the government of Alberta did not take a very distinct interest in assuring that the waters, after they left Alberta, would be suitable for consumption in the other provinces the river traversed. After all, a number of great industries have been established in Edmonton, and certainly Alberta will do nothing to assist the other provinces in preserving the waters of the river unless the federal authority joins in and places teeth in the Criminal Code of this country, without which there is no protection to anyone living in a province through which a river passes on in turn to another province.

Mr. Low: Might I ask the hon. member a question? Is he not expressing merely his own personal opinion on that matter, based on some assumptions rather than on evidence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the opinion of the representatives of the government of Saskatchewan, the department of health and the department of engineering, and it is my opinion based on a full examination of the documents. It was not by way of criticizing—

Mr. Low: But is it based on the opinion of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Diefenbaker: After all, when you have two departments of two elements of government, federal and provincial, each trying to avoid responsibility you will not get unity.

Mr. Low: Is my hon. friend insinuating that the province of Alberta was trying to avoid responsibility?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Low: I challenge that very definitely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not insinuate it, I state it as a natural fact.

Mr. Low: I challenge that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would expect that. As a matter of fact, if my hon. friends have any questions to ask I would say that they had every opportunity to participate in this debate, but they maintained a silence which is somewhat unusual. Now that I am summing up the matter—

Mr. Low: My hon. friend did not make such silly statements then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Facts are never silly.

Mr. Low: Bring out the facts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently I have stirred up my hon. friends. It is due, in part, to a realization that what I am stating is a fair and reasonable conclusion based on what actually occurred. If what I said was not borne out by the lengthy returns that have been brought before the house, and if it was not supported by the representations of the department of health in Regina, then there might be some reason for my hon. friends to raise an objection. But the fact remains that there was no prosecution initiated in any way by the government of Alberta to protect us.

They joined with the other provinces to discuss the question of a water board. They set up the machinery, but when it came to acting the attitude of the government of Alberta was that this was not their concern beyond the extent to which they had already co-operated. They refused, according to the representatives of the government of Saskatchewan, to act to support effective action to preserve and protect the water supply of provinces other than Alberta.

Mr. Holowach: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is the hon. member aware that Alberta has introduced measures to make it impossible, or rather to make it illegal, for anyone to pollute rivers? If so, I do believe the hon. member is rather unfair in casting a reflection on Alberta which is quite mindful of its responsibilities, not only to the people—

Mr. Diefenbaker: If that is a question and if the question is whether the province of Alberta has done something to protect and preserve the waters of the North Saskatchewan river so they will be usable in our province, my answer is that anything that has been done has simply been in an attitude of co-operation, but with a definite refusal to accept any responsibility to put teeth in the legislation concerning any water board that might be set up to assure that the people in the other provinces would receive water that was usable. I do not see why my hon. friends should become so aroused over that.

Mr. Blackmore: Because you are misrepresenting the case, that is all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is funny how my hon. friends—

Mr. Blackmore: Nothing funny about it.

Mr. Diefenbaker:—can get in such a state of excitement now, when they had nothing to say when this bill was being debated. They were the essence of silence. Indeed, they were absent, and now they are present.

Mr. Blackmore: There were not such slanderous remarks then.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply point out this, that the very fact they are stirred up indicates there is some reason for the criticism which I am offering.

Mr. Low: I hate to interrupt my hon. friend again, but a moment ago I rose at the point where my hon. friend said, and I cannot quote his words exactly, that although the province of Alberta had joined in setting up the water board it had refused to act. I wanted to ask my hon friend if he had read the letter which the Minister of Justice quoted in this house on March 29, as recorded at page 2505 of Hansard, written by Dr. Cross, the minister of health in Alberta, to Mr. Bentley, the minister of health in Saskatchewan, under date of January 24, and particularly the last paragraph of that letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; I read it, and I heard it read. But Mr. Bentley has since said, through his representatives, that there has been no serious co-operation on the part of the Alberta government and its officials to protect and preserve the waters of this river.

Mr. Low: I would hate to base my case on Mr. Bentley.

Mr. Blackmore: Why not represent the thing accurately?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, my hon. friends keep on interrupting and making these loose statements, but the record stands. My hon. friends are opposed to this amendment because they do not want teeth put in the legislation. They realize that one, and possibly more, of their industries in Alberta would be subject to prosecution. Naturally, with the solicitude that the provincial attitude gives them, they oppose the amendment in this form because it would place teeth in the law and would preserve us under the law from pollution, by making it possible to punish effectively those who deliberately pollute interprovincial streams and thereby deny the use of the waters of those streams to other provinces.

Having said that, and having pointed out the dangers, I would hope to receive support from various hon. members. In particular I would refer to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who on April 2, 1954, indicated in the house that the pollution of rivers is a crime under the present nuisance section of the Criminal Code, and that if it was not a crime, then in his opinion under the law it should be made one.

It is a crime to place in rivers anything that will interfere with the lives of fish. Under the Fisheries Act that is set out as a pseudo-crime; but, as yet, it is no crime to put interprovincial rivers and waterways in a condition whereby they cannot be used by humans. It is because of that, sir, that this amendment was drafted in a form that the law officers of the crown believed would cover the situation, a form which in my opinion places in the hands of those who are wronged the power to launch prosecutions against those interests, however powerful they may be. It provides suitable and heavy penalties against any industries or other bodies anywhere that would flagrantly destroy the water resources of the nation in interprovincial streams.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: The business of the house reserved for this hour having been dealt with, the house will revert to the business which was being considered at five o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSOLIDATION OF LEGISLATION—AUTHORIZATION FOR OPERATION OF TELECOMMUNICATION SYSTEM, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Marler—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate the various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways into one statute, also, to provide that the Canadian National Railway Company may operate a telecommunication system, to authorize officers and employees of the Canadian National Railways to act as directors of partially-owned companies, to authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority and to operate motor vehicles and further to make provisions for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations.

Miss Bennett: Mr. Chairman, I find myself in a somewhat peculiar position, because the hon. member who spoke previously said that he thought any further remarks on this matter might be tempered with common sense. I find that I have to judge my common sense as compared with that of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

I realize that this debate has been very wide. It has covered perhaps the whole gamut of the Canadian National Railways. But there is a matter of very great importance which I should like to bring to the attention of this house at this time, and I hope it will not be completely out of place. As a matter of fact, when I look at the resolution I see that it has to deal with the construction of short lines without specific parliamentary authority, and also authority to operate motor vehicles.

I should like to say only a few words in connection with the commuter systems in this country. First of all I should like to speak generally, and then I should like to come down to the specific situation which I find in my county and the county of Peel.

If I may be permitted to say so, the general principle is perhaps that the Canadian National Railways has arrived at a point in its outlook and in the general business practice of this country when it must decide whether it may have to change its methods of carrying on railroading. It has always been assumed that the long runs were the ones that paid in this country, but I notice that not so long ago before the committee the chairman of the company made the suggestion that it might be considered feasible on the part of the Canadian National Railways to look into the matter of the short inter-urban runs, and to deal with suburban services.

It is exactly that of which I should like to speak. It may well be that we have arrived at that stage of railroading. I should like the minister to note the lack of public support for this railway and the fact that the Canadian National Railways is now showing a deficit. If we are cognizant of the rights of the people of this country we should not be asking for an extension of this service, and I do not want to be placed in the position of asking for that. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, that the time may have arrived for us to consider the carrying on of inter-urban communication, particularly having in mind that many parts of this country are becoming thickly populated. People are coming into large centres for industrial reasons, and they are finding that as the population grows they have to live farther out. They have to come into the great cities or industrial centres to work or carry on business.

In my county of Halton—and may I speak too of the county of Peel, with deference to the hon. member for Peel—we have this situation. We have Toronto itself and metropolitan Toronto. I think I can safely say that thousands of people have gone from the centre of what used to be considered Toronto to live out in the southern part of the county of Peel and the southern part of the county of Halton. They go back daily into Toronto and nearby centres to work in factories or offices, or to carry on their business, whatever it may be.

That area from Oakville to Toronto, a distance of 21 miles, has a population of 700,000 people including outer Toronto proper. A very large number of those people are commuting every day to Toronto and nearby from Oakville, from Clarkson, from Port Credit, from Mimico and all those surrounding centres; and, of course, they are coming home at night. Serving that area we have actually only two great highways, the lake shore highway, which is rather antiquated, and the Queen Elizabeth way. Every morning and every evening you see those highways completely and totally congested. It takes about an hour, an hour and a half, or even two hours at times to get into the city or get home, to say nothing of the danger that is created.

For some time we have been asking for commuter service over the Canadian National Railways, because that is the line that runs through Oakville, Lorne Park, Port Credit and so on. What I am saying applies not only to my area but generally to the areas of many hon. members of this house. We are asking that something be done to increase or better these services.

The service at present is this. In the morning we have two trains—they are not actually commuter trains but merely trains that run from Hamilton and pick up people at these various points—that arrive in Toronto before nine o'clock. We have another that arrives between nine and ten o'clock, but it is not a commuter train at all. In the evening, leaving the city, we have three trains that leave after five and arrive by 7.30, which is a very late hour.

Although I have not made an exact survey of the other services throughout Canada, I think perhaps the most nearly comparable and most outstanding service is that at Montreal. It is an old city and the people there have been given this service for many years. In place of two morning trains I find that they have ten modern trains that arrive in Montreal before nine o'clock. In place of three evening trains they have some twelve trains. Then of course they have trains interspersed during the day and later on into the night.

I am not saying this is absolutely correct, but I am told that the population in my area, in the counties of Halton and Peel, is now almost twice that being served in the same area down near Montreal. In addition, the cars we are using on what might be called our sham commuter service are old. They are not up to date. The service is not speedy. There are great delays.

The fare has been raised by 75 per cent since last September. In other words, where we were paying $10 for 40 rides down to the end of the county, we are now paying $17.50 for 40 rides. There has been no improvement in service, although there has been some improvement in the cars and equipment. By September 1 there will be another 25 per cent raise and we shall then have had a raise of 100 per cent. On the other hand, down in the Montreal area I believe there has been a raise of about 50 per cent.

We are not finding fault with the Canadian National Railways in connection with what they decide to do in the Montreal area as to the number of trains, the price they charge or anything of that kind. What we should like to have is some parity of service, some recognition of the fact that we are a growing area and that we have a great problem which is becoming greater every day.

In all fairness may I say this. Personally I believe that the whole of the people of this country are responsible for this railway. We have been to the commission and we have been to the president. Sometimes I think, as was said this afternoon, that the president owns the railway when he is giving orders but the people own the railway when it comes to paying the bills.

What I should like to suggest to the minister, if he would take it into consideration, is not that extra trains be put on at this time. Perhaps we cannot afford that. Perhaps the Canadian National is being pressed. I suggest that he go into this whole question of the future service of the Canadian National Railways to this country, with particular reference to the conditions in these thickly populated areas.

We would ask that this one thing be considered by the minister. There are several of what we call flyers, to use common terminology. For instance, there is the Chicago flyer, which very often has to stop at Oakville, and very often it is flagged down at Clarkson. Without losing much time or without much loss with regard to service I should think that flyer could stop and pick up these commuters. Going out from Toronto in the evening, between 4.30 and seven o'clock, are two such trains that also could be used for this purpose. That is all we are asking at this time.

This is a pressing problem, and one that is growing greater all the time. Without offering any criticism of what the company or the government does for other centres, we ask that they consider the problem we have with this growing population and growing industrialization. We ask that, if it is at all possible, we be brought to parity with other large centres in this country. We also ask that consideration be given to making some use of the service that is already available there. We suggest that it be opened up to the commuters of my county and, if I may say so with respect, those of the county of Peel, because this matter is a great problem to them as well.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As it is nearly six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, may we call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I would think there is a great deal of material that could either be discussed on this resolution or left to the estimates. Much of what I might have said I shall leave to the estimates. I shall not, for example, discuss at any length the feeling I experienced over the last week end when that magnificent Canadian Pacific transcontinental train, the Canadian, with its dome cars, started on its way across the country with public attention focused on it, everybody thinking about it and reading about it, and press representatives clamouring to get on it, when at the same time the equipment of the new C.N.R. train definitely, and regrettably, had to take second place. In fact, so much did it have to take second place that the C.N.R. had to run a special train on Saturday to give the press people an opportunity to view the new equipment, because they were all going to ride on the new C.P.R. train Sunday night. I think things like that are perhaps much better left to the estimates when we can discuss them in detail.

But, Mr. Chairman, when we look at the Canadian National Railways it does stir our imagination more than a little bit. When you think of the history of these lines, somewhat checkered at times, you cannot help but feel that there is a challenge to Canadians to take this tremendous transportation system and do everything each one of us can to see that it attains and retains the pre-eminent position it should rightly have.

I should like to refer to the people who work for the railway, and I am not talking now about the minister or the president of the railway but of what we sometimes think of as the little people, the men up and down the line, track walkers, engineers, conductors, the people in the offices, all those who are going to be affected directly or indirectly by the legislation presented to the house. When we think of them and realize the life of service they have given to the organization and the tremendous job they have done in working for it, I think we should all feel a sense of gratitude and want to do anything we can to help them.

Actually it was not my intention to intervene in this debate at all until I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Prince Albert this afternoon. They struck a responsive chord in me, because I could not help thinking that if the hon. member for Prince Albert, in addition to all the experience he has had in the house, had had the experience of being present at the sessions of the railways and shipping committee a few weeks ago he would have been even more vehement in his protests and, if it is possible, even more definite in his views.

When I look at the resolution before us it brings to mind the complex problems of the Canadian National Railways, and one cannot help but have a great sense of sympathy for the president of the road in his job of trying to balance the financial dictates of his vast empire with the reasonable demands of the tens of thousands of people working with the railway for job security and a decent living. I imagine that is the sort of thing that must weigh heavily on him at all times, and it is in regard to that aspect of his work that I think those of us in the house must have very great sympathy for him.

But, Mr. Chairman, in considering this legislation, which is to be referred to the standing committee, may I say now that I have no sympathy whatsoever with the attitude of either the president of the company or the minister in their appearances before the committee on railways and shipping and the reactions they displayed there. I bring up this point now because I believe the attitudes they revealed there should not be repeated, particularly in the present instance, when we are going to engage in far-reaching studies of this vast enterprise and with all the resources available to us attempt to benefit it and move it even further ahead.

To point out the sort of thing which I think should not be repeated in the committee may I refer to three cases of arrant disregard, in my estimation, of the purposes of the house and its committees. The first one to which I turn my attention concerns the president of the road himself. Incidentally, all three instances had to do with the consideration of the C.N.R. hotels, although they occurred at widely scattered intervals during the work of the committee. On one occasion we were examining a situation in which, although the book value of certain hotels was some $3,300,000, they had been sold for $915,000. I make no comment at this point as to this particular transaction, except to say it seems to me that $3 million is a good deal of money, $915,000 is a good deal of money, and it is a fit subject for a committee such as this to look into with some care and investigate in some detail.

Mr. Gordon had complained somewhat about the line of questioning we were following, and at one point in our investigation he said:

> I am only talking about the questions by Mr. Hamilton and the type of inquisition that is going on in this committee, which is perfectly new to me. Mr. Hamilton, you seem to have started a new regime in respect of how to treat the president of the C.N.R. in this regard.

Mr. Marler: I should like to raise a point of order. It seems to me what took place during the questioning of Mr. Gordon in the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned by the government is scarcely pertinent to this legislation which, as I understand it, deals with the consolidation of the charter of the Canadian National Railways, plus four or five amendments. I think if the hon. member were speaking about the sale of one of these hotels it might be perfectly reasonable to elaborate on the powers of the company, but I do find it difficult to believe it is in conformity with the rules of the house to be discussing the procedure before a sessional committee which has made its report, in the debate on a resolution which was not before that committee and which is not to be referred to that committee.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Answering the minister's point of order, Mr. Chairman, I can quite see that he might come forward with the alacrity he has against these remarks, particularly because of his subsequent responsibility—

Mr. Marler: The hon. member has no right to reflect on the minister or anybody else in the remarks he is making. I believe the point of order I raised was quite proper, and perhaps the hon. member would reply to that point.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I am in the process of so doing, Mr. Chairman. The reason I think it is necessary to introduce the point at this time is that already this year we have had a committee which has dealt with the affairs of the Canadian National. Certain things of which I disapprove happened during the meetings of that committee. We are going to have another committee now to which this particular bill is to be referred. It has been indicated by the minister that witnesses will be called before that committee, and the committee will have an opportunity of discussing this legislation in its entirety.

I am attempting to place before the house at this point something I think is perhaps even more germane than some of the other points raised; that is, my views on the attitude which should be taken by the minister and those under his control toward this particular committee which is to deal with this legislation. We have a certain rule of relevancy in this house, which I think is what the minister may have had in mind. If I were attempting to go forward from here to discuss in detail or draw conclusions from the proceedings of this previous committee I think perhaps there would be much in what the minister had to say. But my point, Mr. Chairman, and I must stand on it subject to your ruling, is that it is reasonable to look ahead and also to learn something from that which has gone on in the past. As a matter of fact, if we do not learn from what has gone on in the past, if we do not use the past as a guide to the future, I do not know what sort of guide we are going to use.

Because of that, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is quite proper to place before the house the treatment accorded a committee in the past, and to say it is our hope that similar treatment will not be accorded in the future.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should deal with the point of order which has been raised by the minister and to which the hon. member who has the floor has replied. Hon. members will recall that when the committee was sitting this afternoon I expressed some doubt as to whether a resolution of this kind enabled hon. members to debate all phases of policy with regard to Canadian National Railways. I am confirmed in that doubt by the manner in which the debate has continued since. I really feel we are going entirely too far afield. At the same time I do not wish at this time to make a definite ruling that one member is out of order in discussing a certain phase of this matter when other hon. members who have spoken previously, as I said before, have in my interpretation of this particular resolution gone somewhat farther afield than I think might be proper.

Under these circumstances I am not going to say that the hon. member was out of order, except when he attempted to indicate in his reply the purpose of the minister in raising this point of order which, of course, he will realize he cannot do. He cannot attribute motives to another member. I am not going to say at this time that the hon. member is out of order, although I feel that this discussion in committee is very far afield. The hon. member commenced his remarks by suggesting that certain subjects which he might have for discussion on this resolution would be deferred and discussed on the estimates. What I am going to do now is to request the co-operation of the hon. member in deferring this type of discussion until the estimates of the minister are before the house, and that at this time he will relate his remarks more particularly to the resolution which is before us.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps I should just re-emphasize that I have tried to set aside all my points which I think could be held until the transport estimates are considered. I am bringing up this matter now because this committee will begin to sit shortly and there probably will not be an opportunity before the transport estimates are considered to put this information on the record and to ask that some consideration be given to it when this committee meets. I continue this comparatively short quotation. Mr. Gordon said, in that particular outburst of his:

> I am in the hands of the committee, but I do ask some mercy in the amount of detail you are striving to get in connection with the affairs of this hotel operation. No other executive officer that I know of in the country would stand for it or put up with it for a moment.

That is my first quotation. I only remind the house and the minister, Mr. Chairman, at this point that here was a transaction affecting some hotels with a book value of over $3 million, which had been sold by this railroad for $915,000. It was necessary in this particular case to probe and probe, and eventually that probing got too embarrassing. In our attempt to do our work as committee members we got this type of response. Personally I do not feel it was quite appropriate.

Later on the same gentleman made another statement. I think it is even more revealing, because it indicates the attitude toward this past committee and the attitude which, unless it is checked, may well continue toward the next committee. On that point Mr. Gordon said, at page 150 of the committee report:

I am willing to answer any questions that are—

The Chairman: Order. I previously requested the co-operation of the hon. member, and as I said I do not wish to deprive him of the privileges which were accorded to other members. However, I really feel that a reading of statements made before a previous committee in this connotation is certainly getting very far from the point. If the hon. member does not wish to confine himself to the resolution which I will indicate once more mentions a measure to consolidate various enactments relating to Canadian National Railways, and certain other particular matters, then I must call him to order. I feel that the terms of that resolution give the hon. member considerable scope for discussion, but I do not see how the terms of the resolution can give him scope to introduce these particular matters from the other committee.

Mr. Green: May I point out, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member prefaced these particular remarks by pointing out that when this measure receives second reading it will be going to a committee of the house. Then he went on to indicate that he hoped there would be a difference in the attitude of Mr. Gordon before this second committee of the house.

I do suggest that in doing so he is much more in order than other hon. members who wander all over the field, talking about C.N.R. policy. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is dealing specifically with what is to happen when this particular measure goes before the committee, and I do suggest he is quite in order in drawing attention to the attitude taken before the other committee by the president of the railway, and expressing the hope that there will be a different attitude taken before the committee which will consider this measure.

The Chairman: If the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra wishes me to make a definite ruling I would be quite prepared to rule that I cannot accept that concept of this matter. I do not think we are in this committee to consider the attitude of any witnesses before any other committee. We are in this committee authorized or privileged to discuss only the matters embraced within the resolution before us, a resolution that has nothing to do with the attitudes of witnesses before committees. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will agree with me in that respect.

Mr. Green: May I ask Your Honour if an hon. member discussing a resolution of this kind, and being told the bill is to go to a committee, is not in order in discussing what he thinks should be taken up in that committee?

The Chairman: The hon. member is in order when he discusses the resolution before the committee. Surely the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will agree that there is nothing in this resolution which would enable the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace to discuss attitudes adopted before other committees. I would presume that each committee is its own master, and I really think we are treading on ground which has not been covered before when we allow this type of debate on a resolution of the kind before us.

As I have said, I have tried to extend every leniency, in view of the way this debate has proceeded and in view of the doubt I expressed this afternoon as to the matter of relevancy in respect of a consolidating statute. At the same time I do feel that the discussion taking place now is not relevant to this resolution.

Mr. Green: Would the hon. member be out of order in suggesting, in a debate of this kind, that for example Mr. A or Mr. B should be called before the committee to give evidence? I should think that would be quite in order. And if that can be done, then surely it is in order to object to the attitude taken by Mr. A before another committee of the house.

The Chairman: Of course the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra will not expect me to answer hypothetical questions when we are dealing with one specific point of order. I have said that I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member who has the floor, and it would be my wish to extend to him as much courtesy as has been extended to other members who have taken part in the debate. But I do feel that we are now going entirely too far afield, and I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra must agree with me when I say I am sure that a discussion concerning attitudes of witnesses before committees is not relevant to this discussion.

Mr. Trainor: In the matter of relevancy, would Your Honour extend the same latitude as was extended earlier to the hon. member for Temiscouata?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The uncertainty in my mind about the situation in which I now find myself is caused by a statement made in debate last night by the minister, when he said the bill would be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It is conceivable,

Mr. Chairman, that the minister's statement might be grounds for voting against this resolution. It was a point, along with others, entered by the minister in the debate; and it seems to me we should be given reasonable latitude so that we may debate the various points made by those who are not in agreement with us.

The arguments I have attempted to advance are, essentially, arguments dealing with this point raised by the minister, when he says that he plans to refer this bill to a committee. This might lead hon. members to the conclusion that if the bill is to be referred to the committee, and the committee receives the same cavalier treatment which has been shown by certain other people to other committees, there would be no use considering the bill at all.

To this might be added the observation that earlier this afternoon, and without interruption from anyone in the house by way of a point of order, the hon. member for Temiscouata quoted somewhat copiously—indeed, more extensively than I have—from the proceedings of this committee; and he proceeded to build on those quotations a very considerable argument in connection with this resolution.

It seems to me that the two cases are fundamentally similar. However, mine is further buttressed by the fact that I am replying to material entered in the debate yesterday by the minister, whereas today the hon. member for Temiscouata was commencing something entirely new, concerning which he went back over the proceedings of the previous committee, quoted from them and built a case on them, and did the whole thing without any points of order whatsoever being raised.

I know all of us—you, Mr. Chairman, more than any of us—are trying to achieve a reasonable solution; but it does put someone like myself in a most difficult position if, when a minister proposes to refer a bill to a committee, we cannot advance reasons why such reference should be examined with some care, and perhaps should be even reconsidered under certain circumstances. It puts us in the almost untenable position of having answers to certain points ruled out.

Having said that, I would turn for a moment to what from past experience I would judge the minister's attitude to be on legislation such as this. I have not detected any great sympathy on the part of the minister for any suggestion that a sincere attempt be made to examine into the Canadian National Railways, and to obtain from such examination facts upon which the consideration of particular instances might be based.

I think that has a very great bearing on this resolution. If time and again we are going to come up against this wall of secrecy, this unrelenting hot air curtain as I referred to it at one time, on the part of the government, beyond which is hidden information, it will make it extremely difficult for us to go ahead. For example, there was this statement in committee by the minister:

> I think we have come to the point where we are passing judgment on the board and I doubt whether that would be the wish of the committee.

The minister was referring to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. He seemed to think there was something wrong in a committee of this house passing judgment on the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. I think at that point we diametrically part company. It would seem to me that in certain cases committees of this house are formed primarily for that very purpose, to examine the acts of government departments, to examine the acts of subsidiary government bodies, to examine groups to which legislative or executive power has been delegated, and then come to our own conclusions as to whether or not they have properly fulfilled that trust.

I cannot criticize too strongly the attitude of any minister of the crown who may come before a committee and indicate that that committee should not pass judgment or by inference examine actions within the field of study which has been delegated to it.

Were it not for the points of order I would have been through with all this in ten minutes, but there is one last point and I return again to Mr. Gordon who had the following to say in committee:

> Please do not press me to the point where, by adding one indiscretion to another, you get me into the position of having revealed all.

It is my hope that in dealing with this bill perhaps for the first time in the many years since this committee has been operating, witnesses will come before the committee and reveal all. It is my further hope that they will not consider it an indiscretion to reveal all. In the checkered history of this railways and shipping committee has there ever been a more startling statement, a statement which may well be repeated in the next committee unless it is checked right now, than that of the president of the Canadian National Railways indicating that he feels that when he has revealed all he has committed an indiscretion?

The committee is called to inquire into the accounts, into the revenues and into the operations of the railway. We can only again express the hope that when this legislation is passed to the committee which will study it on behalf of this house this authoritarian attitude on the part of the minister and the president of the company will be substantially reversed and information will be forthcoming, that co-operation will be forthcoming without having to question and question in order to receive what we think is a reasonable explanation.

In Montreal on Saturday evening I attended a rather good performance of "The Mikado". As I sat there in the audience I listened particularly to the little girl Yum Yum in the second act. I thought of the minister, I thought of practically every minister and particularly the president of the C.N.R. The first four lines of her song were:

> I mean to rule the earth,
> As he the sky—
> We really know our worth,
> The sun and I!

It is about time some of those people over there came down to earth and were a little more reasonable. As my colleague says, some of the ministers' satellites should consider this. I would remind hon. members of the next four lines of this song, which I think apply to hon. members on this side:

> Ah, pray make no mistake,
> We are not shy;
> We're very wide awake,
> The moon and I.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few brief observations before the minister speaks. I had intended to refer to two or three matters which I hoped might be in the bill. The first was with regard to the directorate. As the hon. member for Temiscouata paid me the compliment this afternoon of quoting some things I had said and differing with them, perhaps I may be allowed just a moment to comment on what he said.

I do not know that the hon. member for Temiscouata and I are quite as far apart as he thinks. He took me to task for saying that I did not think the directors should interfere with the management. He seemed to take from that that I did not think the directors should exercise any control, but I did not mean that at all. What I meant was that as regards the ordinary routine management of the company I did not think the directors should be putting their noses into this or that matter. I think the duty of the directors is to meet at stated intervals in their board meetings and decide there upon questions of policy, which of course is their responsibility, and give what assistance they can to the management by way of advice or otherwise.

As I said a moment ago, I do not think they should check into all kinds of detail. The hon. member for Temiscouata referred jocularly to the possibility of directors in the time of Sir Henry Thornton checking into the curtains on Sir Henry Thornton's windows, which according to the hon. member for Temiscouata were changed after every important visitor. That seems to me to be the kind of thing that directors should not have to do.

Having said that, I come to the point which I wish to raise with the minister. By the way, I note that in the bill there is to be a provision whereby officials of the railway may act as directors, I think of associated or other companies. My question is one that I have raised before in the committee. The Canadian National has a small board of directors, most reputable men, and I have no question to raise about them. My only question is about the size of the board, and I raise that question for two reasons.

First, it is the habit of large corporations, certainly in the case of the Canadian Pacific, to appoint to their board of directors a considerable number, I should think a score or more, of leading businessmen in the community. I suggest for the minister's consideration that this ought to be the case with the Canadian National, and I make this suggestion for two reasons.

First, men with wide experience ought to be able to offer good judgment and good advice. Second, men with wide business backgrounds should be able to help the road get business. After all, the Canadian National Railways are in competition and they need business, and should use the same methods to get business as anybody else. I am not sure as to the present position of the legislation. It may be that the minister will answer that this can already be done, that no legislation will be needed. But in any event I raise that point.

The second point I wish to raise with the minister has reference to the Turgeon report of 1951, which contains a good many things that were recommended to be done. I read the chapter on the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act and there are some recommendations there. I read the chapter on accounting and statistics and there are some recommendations there, and so on through the report.

I am asking the minister this question. Has full cognizance been taken of those recommendations; and if any of them have not been put into effect, would it be proper and appropriate to consider whether, at the time this mopping-up act is being put through, any loose ends of that kind—if there are loose ends—might be taken care of? There are a considerable number of very important recommendations in that report, and I raise that question for consideration.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a brief word, because something has been said which I thought was not complimentary to President Donald Gordon. If I am in order I should like to give a concrete example of his fairness and good judgment. In Fort William an office hand was sent to some position in Winnipeg. It was found that it was a mistake, and he was sent back and his salary was reduced by $40 a month. He tried for over eight years to get that salary back. Then we brought the question to Donald Gordon. The reason he settled the matter, put the man back with his increased salary and give him $3,600 of back pay, was that he wanted to have contented men. I do not care in what capacity I find Donald Gordon, there will be a soft spot in my heart for him because of his consideration of the workers who are under him.

Mr. Lennard: The hon. member for Simcoe North in another debate last Friday made some complaint about a train that met the Cunard liner Scythia several months ago in Halifax. While he did not mention the railway line, it was a boat train that met the Cunard liner Scythia in Halifax, and his complaints were recorded. I might say they prompted me to rise this evening to make some reference to an experience of my own several years ago.

When Mrs. Lennard and I returned from the coronation in late June, 1953, we landed at Quebec from another Cunard liner, the Samaria. We had our reservations on a Canadian National boat train from Quebec to Toronto. There were two trains; one took passengers to Montreal and points north, I believe, and the train on which we were booked by-passed Montreal and proceeded to Toronto. That train was about the filthiest and most outmoded affair on which I had ever travelled. You can imagine my shame when all these people from other countries—England and Scotland in particular—had to travel under such conditions. It did not bother me too much personally because, being a Canadian, I had travelled under all sorts of conditions; but I did feel thoroughly ashamed on that occasion that these people from other countries should be welcomed on such an outfit.

On that train several of the sleepers had the old gas lamps. There was not a uniform diner; there was a club car where meals were served by a crew that was certainly far from perfection. Even after we had entered Ontario and were west of Cornwall, at the evening meal, that crew was still charging Quebec hospital tax, at which I protested, of course. That was after we had been in Ontario for over an hour. That is how little they knew of the proper methods in travelling across the country.

I had forgotten this incident and had passed it off as a mistake, as probably it was a time when they had not the proper cars or accommodation, and I thought it was something that could not be helped. But when the hon. member for Simcoe North brought up his experience of only two months ago on another boat train serving the Cunard line, I thought it was about time something was heard of my experience of several years ago. If that is the pattern the Canadian National railways have adopted in meeting our visitors from abroad and in serving the Cunard line, it is about time that pattern was changed.

Mr. Pouliot: Will you please tell us when it occurred?

Mr. Lennard: About June 29, 1953.

Mr. Pouliot: It was not under the present minister.

Mr. Lennard: I am not blaming the minister. I hold the minister in the highest regard.

Mr. Trainor: In view of the latitude that has been extended in this debate up to the present, I have no apology to offer on the score of relevancy for anything I may have to say. I wish to discuss several points under this resolution, and the one I wish to discuss particularly is the sale of the four C.N.R. hotels, the one in Port Arthur, the one in Brandon, the one in Minaki, and the one in Pictou.

After a great deal of delving and with extreme difficulty the information was pried —and I use the word advisedly—from the management of the C.N.R. that these hotels had been disposed of for the sum of $915,000. Let us examine for a moment the method of sale that was adopted. Do not forget that these hotels were the property of the Canadian people, and as such it was incumbent on those who are supposed to represent the best interests of the Canadian people to get the best possible price.

The method adopted in selling these hotels was to call for tenders. Has anybody ever heard of a commercial concern with a similar merchandising problem on its hands calling for tenders? As a matter of fact these properties, I submit, ought to have been placed in the hands of skilled real estate merchandisers, and they should have examined the market and decided on possible purchasers. In the case of one of these hotels, the one at Port Arthur, an attorney informs me that he had a client who approached him and suggested that he had heard that this hotel was for sale and he wondered how much they might take for it. He intimated he had heard that it might be purchased for approximately $400,000. In regard to the second hotel, the one in Brandon, I have had representations made to me that a number of people would have been prepared to pay a quarter of a million dollars for this hotel.

That makes a total of $650,000. I do not know the appraised value or the price or the cost factor with regard to the hotel at Minaki, but I do know that the golf course alone cost the Canadian people a million dollars. There was information available some years ago that an American person wondered if he could have bought the hotel for $2 million, but he was advised that it was very unlikely that he could have done so. I know nothing about Pictou lodge.

In view of all this it seems only reasonable to think that if competent real estate salesmanship had been exercised a great deal more money could have been obtained for the Canadian people for this asset which was in their possession.

I leave that matter, Mr. Chairman, and proceed to deal with the question of C.N.R. pensions which my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already mentioned with regard to this question of pensions, many of which are on the basis of equal contributions by the employee and the railroad, it seems to me that the employee has paid into the fund in dollars that were worth 100 cents or in excess of 100 cents, and is now being paid off in dollars that are worth approximately 50 cents. This is definitely a responsibility of the government. For this reason I would suggest that the government has a moral responsibility to see to it that these people are paid their pensions in coin the same as that with which they paid for them.

The government may say that this is the fate of everybody who buys pensions. That is true. If one buys a pension from an insurance company one must take the same risk. But I would point out that the insurance company has nothing to do with the value of the Canadian dollar, whereas the government has a great deal to do with it. Consequently I would submit that there is a good case for the government to make adjustments in these pensions so as to compensate people for the depreciation of the dollar, which is a government responsibility.

That is my argument. I would say this is a fundamental question in the Canadian economy which, of course, goes far beyond the question of C.N.R. pensions. But at the same time the C.N.R., as an agency of government, has a definite responsibility to see that justice is done to all classes of the Canadian public; and the C.N.R. pensioners are certainly a part of that public.

Mr. Green: Before the minister closes the discussion on this resolution I should like to place before him three or four questions. The first one has to do with this sentence in the resolution, namely that the bill will "authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority". The minister gave some explanation this afternoon, but I could hear only parts of it and I am not just clear as to what he meant. In the Railway Act, under section 183, there is given to a railway company power to—

> . . . construct, maintain and operate branch lines, not exceeding in any one case six miles in length, from the main line of the railway or, except as hereinafter provided, from any branch thereof.

It is my understanding that this section applies to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Marler: No.

Mr. Green: Many provisions of the Railway Act do apply to the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Marler: Yes, but I understand that provision does not apply to the C.N.R.

Mr. Green: If the minister will explain in what way the C.N.R. is exempted from the provisions of that section I shall be grateful. There are subsequent sections which deal with the manner in which authorization can be obtained for the construction of a branch line, and I think they quite adequately protect all the parties who might be interested. There is also provision under which an industry can force a railway to construct an industrial spur, which would be a branch line something of the type the minister has in mind. I should like to have an explanation as to why the C.N.R. needs some special provision having to do with branch lines, and whether that provision will put them in a different category from the C.P.R. in respect of branch lines.

The second question has to do with the sentence which says that the C.N.R. is to be given power to operate motor vehicles. I understood from the minister last night that the company is already operating motor vehicles through a subsidiary company, but will he give a further explanation as to whether there is to be any change in the C.N.R. policy of operating motor vehicles?

At the same time perhaps he could also indicate whether the government intends at this session to bring in any legislation having to do with agreed charges. As the minister knows, a report by Mr. Turgeon was tabled just a few weeks ago. Both the railways and the motor carriers are vitally interested in what is to be done as a result of that report. Perhaps the minister could tell us this evening whether there is to be any legislation at this session. It would seem to me that matter would be extremely material so far as the railways operating motor vehicles is concerned.

Then the third point has to do with the abandonment of lines. Apparently there have been quite a few instances in which the railways have abandoned lines in recent months, and there is a good deal of uneasiness over this policy. Will the changes that are contemplated in this legislation make it easier for the C.N.R. to abandon lines? At the present time they can do so only with the approval of the board of transport commissioners. That means there is an opportunity for the people affected to protest.

In his explanation the other night the minister pointed out that power was being taken to extinguish the charters of subsidiary companies of the Canadian National Railways. That raises the possibility that in this way the abandoning of lines will be facilitated. I would ask the minister to give us an explanation on that point.

Then finally there is this point. Last night the minister said the new legislation would consolidate, among other things, certain provisions which were found in the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act. That act, of course, has to do with the two railways. I do not quite understand how part of that act can be taken out and put into a Canadian National act without affecting the Canadian Pacific Railway. This act to which I am referring was designed to bring about co-operation between our two great railways. It seems odd that some portion can now be taken from that act and be put in a Canadian National statute without the Canadian Pacific Railway being brought into the Canadian National statute as well. I may be quite wrong in thinking that such could be the case, but I would ask the minister to explain to the committee what the result of the proposed legislation will be in respect of this particular act.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Before this resolution is carried there are one or two comments I should like to make pertaining to it. I notice that provision is made in the resolution "to authorize the company to construct short lines without specific parliamentary authority and to operate motor vehicles, and further to make provision for extinguishing charters of constituent corporations".

I wish to draw the minister's attention to the portion pertaining to the operation of motor vehicles. The minister will recall that when we were discussing Canadian National Railways in the special committee some time ago the president, Mr. Donald Gordon, made extensive reference to the operation of motor vehicles by the C.N.R. That is particularly important to me, because I wonder what significance this provision has with regard to the expansion of the services already in operation by the C.N.R. and the C.P.R.

The C.N.R. and the C.P.R. operate motor vehicles now, and I am wondering whether, if the C.N.R. gets permission through parliament to operate motor vehicles, the railway may be in the position of being able to override the provisions of any province regarding the issuance of licences for motor vehicles. I should like the minister to clear up this matter for me when he replies. As the situation stands today, if the railways want to operate motor vehicles in the city of Calgary, for example, they have to get a licence from the provincial government, and they must show need before any more licences are issued so the industry will not be overcrowded, and in order to satisfy other precautions laid down by the province.

It was pointed out to us by Mr. Gordon, president of the C.N.R., that the railways were now using the operation of motor vehicles to extend, as he put it, competition with the trucking industry of Canada. The railways are operating specially equipped flat cars by which they can carry their trailer trucks by rail for long distances. As a result they are hoping to provide keener opposition to the trucking business of the Dominion of Canada. That is a point about which I think we as members of parliament should be very cautious. The railways are now hauling goods in their trailer trucks on these specially equipped flat cars at ridiculously low rates. In fact it has been suggested to me by some of the large trucking companies that the railways are carrying these goods on these piggy-back cars, as they are called, at less than cost.

I believe the Railway Act specifically states that no railway shall haul goods at less than cost. When I asked the president of Canadian National Railways about that point he said—I forget the exact words he used—that they were making some profit but he was unprepared to say how much it was. There is a great deal of conjecture about whether or not the railways are actually hauling this traffic at less than cost, and there is very great national danger in that operation. We know that the railways are entering into agreed charge arrangements. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra mentioned that a few moments ago and expressed the hope the minister would elaborate on it. I also would like the minister to deal with it.

The railways are now entering into agreed charge contracts. They enter into an agreement with a large manufacturing concern or a large retail store such as Eaton's, Simpson's or Simpsons-Sears, under which they haul large quantities of goods for these large companies either at cost or very close to it. This puts these large retail concerns in the position of more than competing with our small merchants. It should be understood that the small merchants provide far more of the services required by the country than do the large manufacturers or retail merchants such as Eaton's, Simpson's or Simpsons-Sears.

By entering into agreed charge contracts the railways are assisting the large chain stores not only to meet the competition of the small merchants throughout the country but to eliminate them. It is dangerous to allow the railways to operate motor vehicles and enter into these outrageous agreed charge contracts. We might as well face the fact it is not the intention of the railways to meet the competition of trucks but to eliminate the truck as a competitor. We might as well recognize that now. Those of us in western Canada and the maritime provinces are more concerned over this type of so-called competition than those who live in central Canada, where other forms of competition bring about a lowering of railway charges.

I am very much concerned about this matter, and I ask the minister to comment at some length on the statements I have made, particularly pertaining to the operation of motor vehicles by railway companies and the use of agreed charges.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Chairman, I have noted some 21 points that were made during the course of the discussion last night and today, and I think hon. members would not really expect me to reply to each of them. Many of them were raised during the discussion in the special committee on railways and shipping owned by the government.

In order to illustrate the immensity of the task of replying to some of these questions, may I refer to a few examples. One of the subjects of discussion today has been the arrangement made between the C.N.R. and the Hilton Hotels Corporation. I find that subject took up from page 134 to page 158 of the proceedings of the special committee.

Mr. Fulton: We still did not get the answer.

Mr. Marler: The hon. member for Mackenzie referred to the speed of the two transcontinental trains. I see that took up from page 66 to page 69. I am quite sure members of the committee will realize that if I were to do justice to the management of Canadian National Railways I should read from the evidence extracts to show what the president of the railway said in reply to questions on various subjects.

I think that these few examples are sufficient to show how unwise it would be for me to attempt to deal with each of these various questions which I think, strictly speaking, refer to the operation of the railway and the policies of the management but not to the statutes governing the railway itself.

There have been, however, a number of points raised in connection with the legislation itself, and I should like to try to deal with these as summarily and as simply as possible. The first of the important questions raised was that concerning the short branch lines. As I understand the law at present, Canadian National Railways requires parliamentary approval for two aspects of branch line construction. First of all it must have an appropriation or an amount included in its capital budget with the approval of parliament; and secondly, it must have specific legislative approval of the branch line which it proposes to construct. Other railways in Canada which are governed in this respect by the Railway Act are subject only to this disability, that provided the branch line does not exceed six miles in length all they require is the approval of the board of transport commissioners.

In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to which the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra referred a moment ago, the Canadian Pacific enjoys a rather peculiar situation. Under the agreement which I believe was ratified by parliament in 1885 the Canadian Pacific has the power, without either parliamentary approval or the approval of the board of transport commissioners, to construct branch lines from its main line—I understand that refers to the portion of its main line lying to the west of Callander, Ontario. The position of the Canadian National is that it does not enjoy the powers with regard to the construction of short lines that are enjoyed by all the other railways in Canada governed by the Railway Act.

As I said last night and again this afternoon, the proposed legislation is to limit the short line provision to those lines not exceeding six miles in length. The purpose which the management of Canadian National Railways has in mind is the necessity of meeting the demands of industry for lines that do not rate as short spurs but which have a length of up to six miles. The management hope that if this power were given they would be able promptly to build these short lines when required. At the moment the situation is that although there may be funds in the railway's capital budget available for the construction of such a short line, let us say five miles in length intended to serve some industry, if the application to the railway for the construction of the line is made after parliament has adjourned then the railway is in the position of being unable to respond to the demand until it has parliamentary authority to construct the line.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it would be desirable that Canadian National Railways should be freed from this disability, and that it is not unreasonable to give it the power to build these short lines. This is particularly true if members of the committee will bear in mind that the necessary funds must be appropriated by parliament and included in the capital budget, so the freedom of action which Canadian National will obtain under the proposed legislation is less than that enjoyed by other railway companies, and much less than that enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific.

I should like to be fair in my explanations to the committee, Mr. Chairman, on that one point. This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod spoke of the facility with which the Canadian National could expropriate land required for its right of way. I believe I should be fair to the committee by saying that the Canadian National has what I think ought to be regarded as much more effective powers of expropriation than the other railways have. In other words, as I understand it, under the statute the Canadian National can deposit a plan and thereby become immediately the owner of the land affected, whereas as I understand it under the Railway Act there is no provision for obtaining immediate possession. I believe the other railways, in the matter of expropriation, are under some slight disability in comparison with Canadian National Railways.

I do feel that the request of the management to be empowered to construct a line up to six miles in length for industrial purposes is reasonable and removes a disability which ought now to be removed in the interests of the operation of the railway.

The next question which was raised concerning the provisions of the bill was that respecting motor vehicles. As I endeavoured to explain last night the railway now has powers through subsidiary companies to operate motor vehicles. They have been under this disability in the past, that at times when consideration has been given to the abandonment of a short line the railway has been in the rather peculiar position before the board of transport commissioners of being unable to offer, on behalf of the railway company itself, to undertake to provide motor service in lieu of a passenger train. They have had to produce the undertaking of some subsidiary to provide that service. They have no power to operate motor vehicles, so they are unable to give a formal undertaking that they will establish a motor service as an alternative to the train service they propose to abandon.

At all events I should like to assure the members of the committee, and particularly the hon. member for Bow River, that there is no intention on the part of the government, in adding to the powers of the railway that of owning and operating motor vehicles, to make any sinister change of policy. We merely intend to make a change which will enable the railways, in effect, to do through the parent company what they have been doing already through subsidiary companies.

There is no suggestion either that in granting this power the railway shall be free from the necessity of complying with the requirements of provincial governments so far as provincial laws apply to the operation of motor vehicles owned by the company.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I ask the minister this question? Would that not be infringing on provincial rights? Could we legally put something like that in federal legislation, which would be a violation of provincial rights?

Mr. Marler: I do not think it would be an infringement, Mr. Chairman. I believe it is competent for parliament to empower a federal corporation to operate motor vehicles. I do not believe, for instance, that merely because the power is derived from parliament the operator of the motor vehicles could claim he would not be subject to the laws of the province in the operation of those vehicles. I think my hon. friend could find many examples of dominion corporations operating motor vehicles strictly in conformity with provincial requirements.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I ask the minister this. Suppose the province decided that it was not necessary to have another trucking concern within the province or within the city where the company was making its application. Suppose the province said they would refuse to grant a licence on the ground that the operation was not necessary. Would they be able to do that if we granted the company parliamentary authority to carry on this type of operation?

Mr. Marler: There are some constitutional aspects of that question which I would hesitate to try to dispose of summarily. I suppose the question would come up as to whether it was an integral part of the railway operation. All I can say to my hon. friend, and I hope he will be satisfied with it, is that there is no intention in the legislation to relieve the railways of the necessity of complying with the requirements of the province in the operation of these motor vehicles.

Then, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and also the hon. member for Bow River referred to the question of agreed charges as having some connection with the power to operate motor vehicles to be provided for in the bill. I would like to assure both hon. members that there is certainly not in my mind any connection between these two subjects. In relation to legislation concerning agreed charges, and the possibility of its being brought before parliament at this session, at the present time I can merely say the matter is under active consideration, and that as soon as a decision has been reached by the government it will be announced. If it is intended to introduce legislation at this session I take it that due notice will be given of that fact.

I do not think, however, that the question of agreed charges of itself really relates to the management of the railroad, in the sense in which I am using the term at the moment. We are concerned with the legislative provisions which govern the railways, and I think I can assure my hon. friend from Vancouver-Quadra that nothing in the bill which it is proposed to introduce will refer specifically to agreed charges, or deprive the railways of the right to take advantage of the statute as it exists at the present time or as it may exist after amendment, if amendments are thought necessary.

Then the question was also raised as to whether the provisions of the bill would make it easier to effect the abandonment of lines. I think I should answer that by saying that inasmuch as none of the amendments to the various enactments which it is proposed to make deal with the subject of the abandonment of lines, I do not think I should say that the bill would make it either easier or more difficult. I think possibly if it were easier it would merely be in the context upon which I touched briefly a moment ago, in that it might conceivably facilitate abandonment if the railway were itself able to undertake to supply motor vehicle service in lieu of train service, and to do so formally in its own name rather than in the name of a subsidiary. But with that exception I can see nothing in the proposed legislation which makes the abandonment of lines either easier or more difficult.

With regard to the provisions concerning the abandonment or surrender of charters of constituent corporations, I am sure the hon. member will find, when the bill is brought down, that the dispositions are procedural in character, and not intended to affect the rights of any person or community which might be served by the constituent company. I take it that it is the intention, where a company or charter has served its full purpose and has run out its time, so to speak, that there should be a simple method of putting an end to the legal existence of the company concerned. I think the hon. member will find that the provisions of the bill deal merely with the question of procedure rather than with the questions of substance that I think he has in mind.

Another point raised was in connection with the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra raised the point as to whether there could be partial repeal of a statute which appeared to concern both of the great railways. I may assure him that it is not intended that the whole act should be repealed, but there are parts or sections of some of these joint statutes which apply to the Canadian National Railways and which can be repealed without in any way affecting the fabric of the remainder of the statutes. In fact I think if my hon. friend from Vancouver-Quadra will examine what I said last night he will see that I merely mentioned that act as being one of those which have to be consulted when someone wishes to have the complete total of all the enactments which apply to the Canadian National Railways, and there are parts which properly may be consolidated into a bill affecting the powers and rights of the Canadian National Railways.

One other point was raised by the hon. member for Bow River. He spoke of the question of the transporting of goods by the railways at rates which were less than cost. I take it his comment applies to the tariffs which have been set up between Montreal and Toronto particularly, and which are competitive. I am told that these rates do provide a small margin of profit to the railways, and that they are not operating this service at a loss. In any event, that is really outside the scope of this legislation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Would those rates which, as the minister has indicated, provide a small margin of profit be made available to the different trucking concerns?

Mr. Marler: I think if we embark upon the subject of competition between rail and trucking organizations or companies we will certainly be going far afield from this bill. My understanding is that this applies to the transportation of goods, but not to the transportation of trucks. I know the hon. member raised the question during the discussions before the special committee, but that is not the subject of these low rates.

Then I find two other points were raised by the hon. member for Greenwood. The first of these was with regard to the composition of the board of directors of the railway company. I listened to his observations with a good deal of interest. May I point out to him, however, that the resolution contemplates the consolidation of the existing enactments relating to the railway company and that, in consequence, it is the intention in presenting the bill to reproduce the existing provisions of the law with regard to the composition of the directorate. I should like to say to him that I shall be perfectly ready to give consideration to his observations concerning the composition of the board, without giving him any positive assurance that I shall come around to accepting the views he expressed this evening.

Finally, the hon. member for Greenwood raised the question as to whether all the recommendations of the so-called Turgeon report of 1951 had been implemented. My understanding of the matter is that all the recommendations have been implemented, but that is an understanding that I have merely acquired second hand. I have not had the time or opportunity to take the report and see exactly what legislative provisions have since been enacted to fulfil the recommendations which Judge Turgeon made at that time. But I understand, and I have been told on a number of occasions, that all the recommendations Judge Turgeon made in his 1951 report have been implemented.

The hon. member spoke with me yesterday on the subject of the uniformity of accounts, which was one of the recommendations of the Turgeon report. I understand the board of transport commissioners has made a recommendation to the railways on the subject, and it is hoped that a system of uniform accounting will become effective on January 1, 1956. I think perhaps that may be the last of the recommendations. Implementation has taken time, but I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood will understand the complexity of the task and the great difficulties that arise out of the necessity of formulating a plan which will suit both railroads and which at the same time will be workable.

I am sorry I have taken up so much time in dealing with the various matters covered by the resolution, but I do hope I have covered everything. It does seem to me that when the bill is before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines there will be opportunity for hon. members to deal with each of the dispositions of the bill and make such criticism as they may think proper.

Mr. Hahn: Last evening in speaking to the resolution the minister said, as reported on page 3160 of Hansard:

> I should perhaps add that the decision to effect this consolidation does not result from any change in government policy concerning the Canadian National Railways. As I said at the beginning of my remarks the primary purpose of this legislation is to consolidate the various legal provisions relating to the Canadian National Railways.

I read the address of the minister quite thoroughly, and I am wondering whether or not the primary purpose behind the legislation should not have been that of efficient operation in as economical a fashion as possible. Would the minister agree that that is one of the purposes of the consolidation, from the viewpoint of economy? If so, I shall have other remarks to make.

Mr. Marler: I did not follow the hon. member.

Mr. Hahn: Is not the legislation being consolidated with the purpose of trying to run the railroad as economically as possible?

Mr. Marler: I think my answer would be that legislation is not needed for that purpose. If the hon. member will consider the matter I think he will realize that the mere consolidation of the various enactments to be found throughout a whole score of statutes will facilitate, first of all, the task of those who have to work with the charter or the legislation concerning the Canadian National Railways, that is the officers of the railway itself, and also the public who have to deal with the railroad and who want to know what are the legal dispositions that apply to it.

There is no other purpose in mind so far as the consolidation is concerned than to bring these scattered enactments together and consolidate them into one statute. There are five other changes which the resolution indicates and which have been proposed to be incorporated in the bill, but with those exceptions there are no changes that I can think of.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Marler thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 351, respecting Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BENEFIT RATES, ADJUST CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 328, respecting unemployment insurance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that I made quite a long statement at the time the resolution was before us I do not propose at this juncture to say very much more.

At that time I outlined the various changes we had in mind. I think it is fair to say that a reading of the debate which followed will indicate that there was only one point which came under very serious discussion or which received what might be called criticism. This had to do with the proposal, the double-jointed proposal really, that there be an increase in the length of the minimum period during which unemployment insurance benefits might be paid.

There was no criticism on that side of the house; but associated with that was a proposal that there should be a decrease in the maximum period of benefits from 51 to 30 weeks with, of course, as I outlined quite fully, an interim arrangement under which the equity of any presently insured worker need not be affected by that change.

I am going to repeat that we believe most firmly that the new proposals will give better protection to the average unemployed worker by increasing the minimum duration of benefit from the present 6 weeks to 15 weeks. I should like that to be carefully borne in mind, because that is going to affect a great many workers. This can be done without increasing the contributions by transferring some of the unused benefits to the place where they can be taken advantage of. In addition, the proposed changes will make it easier in some respects for claimants to re-qualify for further benefits after being back at work for a short time.

To illustrate my statement that much of the benefit set up is not used, may I give some figures showing the experience over a five-year period which I think will be of interest. The average duration authorized for all claimants during that period has been 26 weeks. The average benefit taken by all claimants has been for 9 weeks. The percentage who drew from 1 to 19 weeks was 90·1 per cent; from 20 to 29 weeks 6·4 per cent; for 30 or more weeks, 3·5 per cent.

We feel it is important that benefit should be made available to those who are genuinely in the labour market, and that there should be a substantial minimum benefit available for young persons and those who have difficulty in obtaining steady employment, both of whom are apt to have no more than the minimum qualifying contributions.

When I made a statement something like that on April 4 I ended up by saying that for these 3·5 per cent who now exceed the 30 weeks of benefits thereafter an alternative social security program would seem to be appropriate. At that time, some hon. members asked me what I meant by "more appropriate". I can say now that one more appropriate way in which those persons might then be taken care of was incorporated in the statement made this morning by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in the railway committee room.

Even after all that is said, the equity of the worker at the present time under the act is not affected in any way at all during the three years given by the interim plan. I again assure the house that during those three years the working of this benefit period will be very carefully watched to see even how it affects this 3·5 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of this debate it is my intention to refer this bill to the standing committee on industrial relations, which is being organized this week.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which remain of this sitting it would not be possible, of course, to deal with the bill which has now been in our hands for some three weeks. The best I can hope to do this evening, I think, is to make a few remarks, and I can continue those remarks when this house sits again.

I might make a few comments on the statement just made by the minister, and I might say in that regard that I had thought the minister would pick up tonight some of the remarks which he rather cut short at the conclusion of the resolution stage. At that time he implied that he would use the next opportunity to answer more fully some of the comments which had been made at the resolution stage. Many of us were glad to welcome that arrangement because we thought that in the meantime we would have the bill in our hands and be prepared to go ahead with discussion.

However, tonight the minister has made one remark with which I feel I must deal immediately, although I make no promise that this is going to be the last the house will hear of it. The minister referred a few moments ago to an interim arrangement which would take care of those persons who have had their benefits drastically curtailed by the reduction which is contemplated, from 51 weeks to 30 weeks. He used a few words in describing these people which brought home to me, even more forcibly than an examination of the bill had done, just how far the thinking of the government and the commission has gone along the lines of a bureaucratic approach to the administration of this act.

The minister said that after all he had to deal with the average. It is not a case any more of those people having a claim on the fund by reason of contributions they have made; no longer a matter of whether or not a worker had built up over the years an investment, let us say, in this fund; no longer a matter of whether his claim was that of a person who can be deemed to be now permanently unemployed by reason of chronological age or whether he is temporarily unemployed because of a shutdown in the plant in which he is generally employed. No; the minister's remark was that the average was 29 weeks, or some such period. Then he went on to quote percentages, and said that those who claim from 1 to 19 weeks were 90·1 per cent of claimants. Since I took these figures down hurriedly perhaps the minister would correct me if I have made an error. Those claiming from 20 to 29 weeks were 6·4 per cent, and those over 30 weeks 3·5 per cent.

He implied that a great many of these people were not what he termed genuinely in the labour market. I am at a loss to know just what the commission might mean by "genuinely in the labour market". If by "genuinely" they mean that a man is physically able to work, anxious to work, and mentally capable, but happens to be over 60 years of age and therefore is not available to the labour market in their interpretation, then I must object most strenuously to that. In my estimation, if a man who has worked to 60 or 65 years of age and who is still strong physically, capable mentally and willing to work, is told by the employer for whom he has worked for many years in steady employment that his services are no longer required by reason of the fact that the laws of the plant in which he is employed state that on a certain date he must retire from this employment—if this man who is able and willing to work makes application at the district office for employment, the employment officer has just as great an obligation to place him in employment as he has to place a 20-year-old man who applies for employment. The need of that man may be just as great, for all that employment officer knows.

There has been some talk about pension plans. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that I recall reading of certain cases where counsel were prohibited by the presiding officer of the court from referring to the fact that people who were engaged in litigation were covered by insurance. In my estimation the same thing applies here. I do not think it is any business of the officer in charge of any divisional employment service whether or not that man who has been laid off from his work by reason of age is covered by a pension. If we are going to admit that kind of thinking, then we are going to place this unemployment insurance on a means test basis. It was not set up in such a way. These people have paid their premiums, many of them for years and years. Many of them have never had occasion to ask for benefits from the fund.

In the same way many of us have paid premiums for years and years for fire insurance on our homes and business premises. We hope we will never have to call on it, but I am sure no one would shout louder than the persons who have drawn up this act if, when the day finally came that they had a fire in their premises, the insurance company were to say to them, "No, you do not really need those premises anyway; therefore we cannot pay your claim despite the fact that you have paid your insurance premiums for many years. You are no longer eligible for benefits from our company; and after all, if our company paid all these claims we would go bankrupt." That is the type of thinking we find in the case of the officers of the commission who drafted this bill and the minister who made this unfortunate remark this evening.

Even more unfortunate than that remark was his follow up, when he referred to his earlier statement on alternative welfare which he had said would be more appropriate. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, it has been a well kept secret in the cabinet that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) intended, at an appropriate time—and no doubt in response to a provocative question—to make the statement which he made yesterday in this house.

Mr. Weir: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am glad to have corroboration from the government benches.

Mr. Hees: That was the only reason he spoke.

Mrs. Fairclough: We were glad to hear that the government had finally decided to take some action.

Mr. Weir: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rowe: You should have said "hear, hear" three months ago.

Mrs. Fairclough: However, this evening the Minister of Labour has referred to the remarks of the Prime Minister yesterday which were, I understand, elaborated upon today in the meetings which are taking place.

Mr. Macdonnell: And in the press.

Mrs. Fairclough: Apparently the alternative welfare which the minister wishes these persons to accept is nothing more nor less than unemployment relief administered by the welfare department of whatever municipality the worker happens to reside in. I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that such relief is also administered on a means test basis. It always has been so administered, and it always will be. It is available only to those persons who are destitute. For that reason it is useless to the man who has been deprived of employment by reason of the fact that he has reached a certain stage in life, namely the stage where his only sin, let us say, Mr. Speaker, is that of having grown older than his employers wish him to be.

An hon. Member: The colour of his hair has something to do with it.

Mrs. Fairclough: You mean if he has any hair left. This man has a right to a proper benefit from a fund which he himself has helped to build up. He has a right to insurance. For this government, through these commission offices, to tell that man that the only relief available to him is the relief afforded through the welfare department of his municipality is, in my estimation, an insult to that man.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no one in this house who is not aware of the stigma which is attached to the application for relief afforded only to the destitute. For a man who has been self-sustaining all his life, who has never been laid off from work, who has maintained his family, who now owns his home, who has at length reached retirement age and who is still capable of work, to be told by the commission that there is available to him some assistance in his old age but that he must get it through the local welfare fund is, in my estimation, an insult to that man.

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mrs. Fairclough: I say to the minister that we are going to fight this clause right straight through until the last vote is called. We have no alternative. I think it is a disgrace and a shame. Because of the lateness of the hour and the fact that I have many more things I should like to say on this bill without interruption, Mr. Speaker, would you please call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend while she was speaking, but in her remarks she referred to workers who were in receipt of pensions and who, she alleged, had been refused unemployment insurance benefits only on account of that fact.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, no, Mr. Speaker; the minister has misunderstood me. I referred to remarks which were made at the resolution stage of this bill in reference to the fact that, after all, a great many of these people who had retired because of age were in receipt of pensions and accordingly, supposedly, would not require unemployment insurance benefits. I did not say the minister said that.

Mr. Gregg: I understood that the hon. member said it was within her knowledge that officials of the unemployment insurance commission had refused benefits because of that fact. I am glad to have her denial.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, I did not imply anything of the sort, and I am glad to have the opportunity of setting the matter right.

On motion of Mrs. Fairclough the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lapointe: Tomorrow we shall continue with the debate on the budget.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 27, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSTON (BOW RIVER)—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL"

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): On a question of personal privilege, in the issue of the Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, April 26, the Canadian Press reported me as having said, and I quote from the newspaper:

Mr. Johnston raised his protests in opposing a bill to extend provisions of Alberta's health plan to residents of national parks in the province.

Of course that is quite contrary to the facts. I shall refer to one part of my speech which is indicative of what I said on many occasions during that speech. I am quoting from page 3131 of Hansard:

As I said when I started my remarks, we are all grateful to the minister for bringing in this legislation—although it is only his job—and making it possible for the people of Banff to have hospital service.

That makes quite clear the stand on which I took on the matter. There are many other references which give the same impression, but I shall not bother to read them.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fourth and fifth reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Hunter.

QUESTIONS

CARIBOU-WOOD ISLAND FERRY

Mr. McCulloch (Pictou):

When is work expected to start on the ferry to be built in Pictou, Nova Scotia, for operation between Caribou and Wood Island?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It is expected that work in the shipyard will commence in July, 1955.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION—TRIP BY MINISTER

Mr. Fulton:

1. Did the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration make a trip to the Pacific coast during the Easter recess of parliament?
2. Was this trip for the purpose of official business? If so, what were the details of the business, and when and where was it transacted?
3. Was the government railway car used by the minister on this trip? If so, who were the occupants of the car?
4. Between what points and by what route was the car moved on this trip, and what was the duration of the trip?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Yes.

2. Partially. The minister inspected offices of the immigration branch in Victoria, Vancouver and Calgary; the Indian affairs branch in Vancouver and Calgary; the citizenship branch in Vancouver; and the national film board offices in Vancouver and Calgary. He received a delegation on Indian affairs at Calgary; inspected a new citizenship reception centre at Calgary and addressed the Women's Canadian Club of Calgary on citizenship. These duties occupied every working day not spent in travel.

3. Yes. The car was occupied by the Minister of Fisheries and two of his children and by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, his wife and four children.

4. From Ottawa to Vancouver by C.N.R. and from Vancouver to Ottawa by C.P.R. From April 6 to April 18, 1955.

CURRIE REPORT—ACCOUNTING IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Fulton:

With respect to the 18 types of accounting irregularities in No. 11 works company R.C.E. found by the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence, as summarized in the Currie report:

1. When was each of these irregularities found and reported on by the auditor?
2. What action, in detail, was taken as a result of his findings in each case, and when?
3. What action, in each case, was taken following the submission of the Currie report, and when?
4. Were any changes in personnel made as a result of these findings and actions, and if so, what changes?
5. After the actions and changes referred to in parts 2, 3 and 4 were taken or made, if any, what further or continuing investigations were made with respect to the administration of this company, and when?
6. What were the results or findings in each case?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Type of irregularity	Date of chief auditor's report
2, 4, 9	28 August 1950
6, 9, 14	13 September 1950

The chronology in connection with the action taken as a result of the chief auditor's reports was as follows:

The chief auditor's observations on each instance of irregularity and the explanations provided by command or army headquarters were as follows:

Works company concerned	Auditor's observations	Report by command or A.H.Q.
No. 11 Victoria 1951	Several authorizations for project, each under $5,000 were approved by the area commander and then a total authorization of $38,837.28 was raised, and submitted for approval of the deputy minister, which was received after commencement of work.	After signing of the series of authorizations within local authority, the works officer realized that this amounted to "splitting", so the local authorizations were cancelled, and a new authorization was raised and submitted for AHQ approval. Meanwhile work was commenced within limits of local authority. The deputy minister's approval of the over-all project was received within three weeks.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Three authorizations for project, each of $5,000 were approved by area commander. AHQ approval of a $44,500 authorization was subsequently received, but work commenced in anticipation against the local authorizations.	Local authorization was raised for maintenance, but authority was received to convert the building to an armoury. Since the maintenance work was required in any event, it was commenced, and charged to one local authorization. No changes were passed under the other two.

No. 11 Victoria 1950	Two local purchase orders were issued in excess of $100.00, the local limit.	For professional services of surveyors. Work authorized by area engineer and accounts subsequently paid on properly authorized LPOs.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Local purchase orders are generally satisfactorily controlled, but three were raised after the purchases. (1) a $300. LPO to pay for blueprints 4 days after purchase. (2) a $16.50 LPO for 5 alwyn lamps the day after purchase. (3) for top soil, raised the same day as delivery was made. No explanation of the delay in issue of LPOs, as required by QMG instruction.	Attention will be paid to this requirement in future.
Type 3:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	Dealt with under irregularity No. 13.
Type 4:
No. 11 Victoria 1950	Unused materials are not always returned to stores	They are always returned, but occasionally some are left on the job until transport is available. Lack of transport is the main factor.

No. 11 Wks Coy, Vancouver 1951.....	At Boundary Bay, approximately 40 electric motors were held in stores but not accounted for.	19 surplus motors had been shipped to Vancouver in Feb 51 and taken on charge. Remaining 15 are in stock at Boundary Bay and all on charge in stock records. JAG commented further investigation required.	It is confirmed that surplus motors reported in 1951 audit report were in fact brought to charge at both Vancouver and Boundary Bay immediately following the inspection. The numerous items of electric stores mentioned in para 6 of appendix 6 to the 1952 report were brought to charge on 1 Apr 52. The pump turbine C/W ¾ H.P. motor (quantity 2) were brought to charge 3 Feb 51. The pump turbine C/W 3 H.P. motor was a piece of installed equipment which had been taken from its sump for overhaul on completion of which it was returned to its sump. The auditors have agreed that the motor should be taken to charge. Under the circumstances it is not possible to ascertain why surplus equipment was allowed to accumulate without being taken to charge after the 1951 report as the area engineer and detachment commander involved had left the area. Assurance can be given however that since the 1952 report, stocktaking is being brought up to date and surpluses have been taken to charge as they were discovered.
No. 11 Wks Coy, Vancouver 1952.....	Numerous electric stores and 3 turbine pumps in stock but not on charge.	Complete stocktaking at Boundary Bay detachment to be undertaken and duplicate record cards brought into agreement with master cards at Vancouver. These items will be taken on charge at completion of stocktaking. Stocktaking now completed. JAG commented further investigation required.

Works company concernec	Auditor's observations	Report by command or A.H.Q.
Type 6:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1950	A check shows one electric range and two refrigerators short. Possibly they were installed, but forms CAB 83 not raised.	Stores are received crated and are not uncrated until required for issue. These three items were in crates in the stores.
No. 11 Vancouver 1951	Blinds common and venetian are not always accounted for as installed equipment. Maybe because they were in some cases installed by supplier rather than by the RCE works company.	It is almost a physical impossibility to account for blinds as an installed store. It would require hiring a civilian for eight weeks to make one check. It is suggested they be accounted for as expendable engineer stores. Advice is requested. Command instructed by AHQ to account for roller blinds as installed stores until notified to contrary. Venetian remain an installed RCE store.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Present records were set up in March 1951. Two discrepancies were noted between these and former records: One cabinet frozen food and one refrigerator were not entered on new card. Blinds common and venetian are not entered on cards but are signed for on married quarter inventory.	Cabinet, frozen food, is entered on a card but serial number quoted by auditor is incorrect, and may account for the observation. Question necessity to account for blinds as installed equipment. Command investigated the refrigerator further on instructions from AHQ and, after investigation, reported that it had been issued between 1946 and 1952 and no trace of it could be found, its value being $80.00. Further investigation was NOT warranted.
Type 7:
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Bonding of individuals with tools on loan as required by CAO 201-13 has not yet been completed. One civilian deceased had 14 tools on charge.	Majority of tools loaned to the deceased civilian were recovered.
Type 8:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	A test check showed 3 items out of 12 incorrect	Inventory is being taken and errors will be rectified.

Works company concerned	Auditor's observations	Report by command or A.H.Q.
Type 9:
No. 11 Victoria 1950	A large number of discrepancies indicates a need for complete stocktaking, which has not been done since the war period.	Stocktaking is to be held in the near future and discrepancies rectified. In December command reported that it was not yet completed because of lack of staff.
No. 11 Chilliwack 1950	Complete stocktaking in July 49 but this year to September only two sections are completed. Schedule in CE letter 14/50 is to be followed.	Removal of stores from Chilliwack to Sardis delayed stocktaking as per CE 14/50 but it has now been done up to and inclusive of Oct 50. (Report dated 27 Oct 50)
Type 11:
No. 11 Vancouver	File copies of requisitions were not approved by a works officer during period April 1 to July 1951 in numerous instances.	The detachment was without a works officer at intervals during this period. Corrective action has been taken.
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	Dealt with under irregularity No. 12.
Type 12:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	Register of requisitions (CAFC 520) was not satisfactorily maintained prior to 15 Dec 51. It omits estimated costs and other details. Some 520's are not registered. This is unsatisfactory control.	Resignation of key civilian personnel plus postings of military clerks in summer of 1951 seriously hampered control. Adequate staff is now available.
No. 11 Vancouver 1951	Work orders are not filled as per instructions, and not completed as to costs of labour and materials actually used.	Orders are now filled and entered daily.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Estimated costs are not entered on some requisitions prior to approval.	This has been corrected.
Type 13:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	Work orders are not reviewed to determine reason for exceeding estimates. Administration building was a case of splitting an authorization to secure major construction without AHQ approval.	The splitting is admitted, but it was not done to avoid seeking AHQ approval. It resulted from authorizing in one year a programme originally planned to cover three, and failure to realize that this change would entail seeking AHQ approval.

No. 11 Vancouver	Actual costs of some work orders exceed estimates by substantial amounts. Records fail to indicate review or approval of higher amounts. e.g. W/O 787 d/27 Jul 51 Estimate $449.07, Actual $1,201.94.	All work orders where estimates are exceeded will now be reviewed, and authority obtained where necessary.
Type 14:
No. 11 Victoria 1951	There is considerable evidence that materials are not being charged to the right work order. "Cross-charging" exists.	At Gordon Head cross-charging was due to an inexperienced NCO. The situation has now been corrected.
No. 11 Chilliwack 1950	Three instances are cited of casual employees' time being charged to jobs other than those they worked on.	Shortage of personnel necessitated shifting of employees. Correct cost code will be used in future.
Type 15:
No. 11 Victoria 1951	Nine authorizations for project (CAFC 2198) each under $5,000.00, were raised to shingle buildings at Gordon Head, total amount $38,837.00, approved by area commander.	It was realized that this amounted to "splitting", and the local CAFCs 2198 were cancelled, and AHQ authority was secured. Action had been initiated pursuant to CEC/L 33/51, calling for buildings to be placed in a reasonable state of preservation, and was originally intended to be done step by step.
Type 16:
No. 11 Victoria 1951	Progress with respect to real property records since last audit is limited due to shortage of competent personnel.	The detachment is gradually completing the property record card system. Without establishment increase this will unavoidably stretch over several years.
No. 11 Vancouver 1951	Structural records are complete for Vancouver Area and Boundary Bay. This leaves only ground records to complete.	Property records for surfaced areas are now 90 per cent complete.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Posting of work orders to property record cards is some 6 months in arrears.	The situation is more acute than at previous audit. The sergeant (draughtsman) was posted to AHQ-Cards cannot be brought up to date till vacancy filled.

Works company concerned	Auditor's observations	Report by command or A.H.Q.
Type 17:
No. 11 Victoria 1951	Cost accounting records are of little value because certain essential data are not included. (a) Distribution of casual labour was not prepared by civilian pay May to Sep due to pressure of work in the section. (b) Indirect costs not charged. (c) Stores not yet priced have not been included in cost accounting records. (d) Quarterly inventory reconciliations are not prepared.	It is difficult to get personnel to do the job as required. A clerk grade one was authorized, but the job requires a clerk grade three. With four incompetents in 1½ years it was impossible to get the job done properly. Recent authority has been received to upgrade this job to 2A.
Type 18:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	No cost accounting has been done since July 1951. It is planned to commence next fiscal year if a finance clerk can be trained in time to set up records.	A clerk has been trained and records set up and difficulties are being overcome. Consolidated report 1 Aug 1951 to 31 Jan 52 was compiled and submitted and report for February was submitted 10 March.
Type 19:
No. 11 Victoria 1951	Unit personnel are of opinion that staff is not sufficient to maintain cost of accounting records.	See irregularity No. 17.
Type 20:
No. 11 Chilliwack 1952	One hourly casual labourer employed as full time storeman and clerk.	Command have been endeavouring to regularize part V establishment of Coy. Pending approval it is proposed to obtain authority to employ this man against a military vacancy.
No. 11 Vancouver 1952	Two casual labourers misemployed, one as draughtsman and one as a clerk.	A sgt draughtsman was posted and there was no trained person to replace him except a civilian. The other employee is only employed part time as clerk when work load becomes too great.

3. Shortly after the submission of the Currie report, the judge advocate general, at the request of the Minister of National Defence, examined each of the instances of irregularity mentioned in appendix B. His report of his investigation is contained in minutes and proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditure No. 11, 5 March 1953, pages 288-297.

With respect to No. 11 works company, there were 32 instances of irregularity, classified under 18 types, reported by the chief auditor. The judge advocate general found that in nine instances there had been no violation of regulations or instructions; in these instances the chief auditor had either commented on errors in accounting or on the manner in which records were kept or had made recommendations. In the remaining 23 instances, the judge advocate general found no evidence of culpable neglect; in these cases it appeared that breaches of regulations arising from improper motives had not been committed and the persons concerned had been reasonably zealous and conscientious. There was, therefore, no ground for taking legal action in any of these instances.

Nearly a third of the instances reported by the chief auditor were, in the judge advocate general's opinion, the result of a shortage of staff. The remainder were very largely understandable errors, honest misinterpretations of regulations, bookkeeping errors and other minor breaches of regulations; in other instances the explanation provided by command or army headquarters was considered reasonable. In only one case had there been any loss (a refrigerator valued at $80) and a full investigation was unable to find the missing article or to establish any responsibility for the loss.

Following the tabling of the Currie report, many improvements were pressed forward in the army works service as a whole, as well as in No. 11 works company. Regulations governing works procedures, financial accounting, stores control and general administrative procedures were reviewed to provide a closer control over the type and quality of work being done, expenditure of funds and the holding of warehouse stocks. Surplus and stockpiled stores were withdrawn from works services units and sent to engineer stores depots for retention. Warehousing facilities at works units were improved.

The Currie report recommended that real property records be brought up to date as quickly as possible. It was calculated that this project would require three years to complete and it has been steadily pressed forward. Shortage of staff had been a major difficulty. A new army works services establishment was approved and the civil service commission made every effort to fill vacancies with qualified personnel. In particular, as recommended by the Currie report, estimators were employed. Special courses have been conducted to train new personnel in their duties. Recruiting and training of personnel has been a lengthy process and the results are only now being felt.

An inspection and audit group has been established within the directorate of works and frequent inspections have been carried out.

4. Yes. Two administrative officers, three works officers, two estimators, three stores officers and twenty-eight clerks, storemen and foremen were added to the company.

5. (a) Since December 1952 the chief auditor has made eight audits of the company on the following dates:

	1953	1954	1955
Vancouver	March	March	January
Victoria	March	February	March
Chilliwack	March	April

(b) The directorate of works inspection team inspected the company on the following dates:
(1) 23 June to 12 July 1953
(2) 7 June to 25 June 1954

(c) The command engineer, western command, makes a tour of inspection quarterly.

(d) The inspectorate of quartermaster services inspected the company in April 1953 and May 1954.

(e) The chief inspector of the Adjutant General's inspectorate inspected the Vancouver detachment in January 1954.

(f) Periodic inspections are also made by the commanding officer of the company.

6. In reports of audits made since October 1952, the chief auditor has made observations through the normal channels, concerning instances of irregularity, all of a minor nature, in No. 11 works company. A third of these observations have dealt with the condition of property records, while recognizing that the task of putting these records in proper order is a long-term project. The March 1955 audit at the Victoria detachment noted that property records there were now in satisfactory condition.

Some instances were noted of scrap not being taken on charge quickly enough following the completion of works projects. Bookkeeping errors, which did not involve any losses, were also reported. One instance of misemployment was observed but it was recognized that suitable employees could not be engaged until a revised establishment had been authorized.

The latest audits by the chief auditor at each detachment revealed that: at Vancouver there had been improvements in the engineer account although the ordnance account was still not acceptable (a determined effort is being made to improve it), at Victoria accounting records were on the whole satisfactory and at Chilliwack accounting records were in good condition although a few phases still required attention.

The new inspections by the directorate of works service inspection team resulted in a number of observations at Chilliwack, Victoria and Vancouver. All these observations were noted and explained and action taken to correct the situation where necessary.

In 1954 the inspection by the inspectorate of quartermaster services resulted in a comment on security arrangements at each detachment. The area commander is studying this matter but the lay-out of the sites makes the cost of complete security prohibitive.

The chief inspector of the adjutant general's inspectorate made five observations after his visit to the Vancouver detachment in January 1954.

A statement concerning the investigation initiated by the commanding officer, which is still in progress, was given to the house by the Minister of National Defence on 21 March 1955 at page 2218 of Hansard.

CUSTOMS ACT APPEALS

Mr. Michener:

1. How many appeals under the Customs Act have been heard and decided upon by the present tariff board since its appointment?
(a) Appeals and/or references by the deputy minister?
(b) Appeals by other parties?
2. How many such appeals have resulted in the reduction of customs duties on imported goods?
3. Concerning the appeals covered by item 1 (b), above:
(a) How many applications for leave to appeal to the exchequer court have been made?
(b) How many granted?
(c) How many have been heard and decided upon by the exchequer court?
(d) Of those in (c), how many have upheld the decision of the tariff board?

Mr. Benidickson:

1 and 3. Questions numbered (1) and (3) can most intelligibly be answered by one tabular statement, as follows:

Total appeals under the Customs Act lodged with the board since its appointment	150
Of this total, references by deputy minister were	7
Appeals withdrawn after filing with board	27
Appeals heard by board and disposed of	109
Appeals awaiting disposal by board	14
Applications to exchequer court for further appeal	14
Of these, on behalf of deputy minister	3
Applications granted by exchequer court	6
Applications dismissed by exchequer court	5
Applications for leave to appeal, pending	3
Appeals heard by exchequer court	6
Appeals disposed of by exchequer court	4
Tariff board decisions upheld by exchequer court	4

2. In hearing appeals under the Customs Act, the tariff board, sitting as a court of record, takes no cognizance of the rates of duty or the amount of duty properly leviable and collectable. It determines, as the premises may require, either the proper tariff classification or the proper value for duty purposes. Accordingly, no record is kept by the board as to whether or not the effect of its finding is an increase or a decrease in the amount of duty-burden properly to be levied and collected by the customs authorities.

Note: The above tabular statement does not cover appeals before the tariff board under the provisions of the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pinard: Subject to the usual reservations.

Mr. Speaker: This motion is carried subject to the usual reservations.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence or the minister or any official of the said department, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said department.

Mr. Campney: In addition to associating myself with a number of the arguments made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) last Monday on the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops and addressed to the Department of National Revenue, I should like to point out that the Auditor General maintains at all times an office within our department and that, through that office, his representative and his officials have access to all the documents, memoranda, reports, and papers pertaining to internal audit which pass within the department. As this motion is worded, I would take it to mean that all these documents should be made available.

First there is the question of the magnitude of the time and effort involved in the preparation for production of such documents. Then above and beyond that consideration, and the ground on which I will have to oppose this motion, there is the fact that it certainly presupposes the production of numerous privileged documents. I would therefore ask that the motion be withdrawn or, failing that, that it be voted down.

Mr. Fulton: If I may do so, I should like to make this explanation. It seems to me that the motion is perfectly clear. It does not ask for the production of any documents prepared in and for the purposes of the Department of National Defence. It asks for the production of correspondence, memoranda, et cetera, exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Department of National Defence. Hence the first ground upon which the minister sought to indicate that the motion should not be accepted is disposed of by the very clear wording of the motion itself. Then the motion does not call for the production of any privileged documents. It does not call for the production of documents prepared within or for the use of the department itself but only for those exchanged between the department and the Auditor General who is, of course, a servant of parliament.

I might just say this, Mr. Speaker. Following the exchange that took place on Monday between the Minister of National Revenue, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and myself, I was in touch with the office of the Auditor General. I am advised by him that there could, of course, be no objection whatsoever so far as he is concerned to the production of the correspondence and memoranda referred to in the two motions, one of which is now before the house. I have checked further and I find that until at least as recently as 1938 it was a matter of course for the correspondence such as that which is referred to here to be incorporated in the Auditor General's report.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is certainly going beyond what he is allowed to do. The motion is not debatable. He therefore should not have been allowed to say anything. But as he has been allowed to make a few remarks with respect to the opposition indicated by the minister, I think we must now settle this matter one way or the other. I take it that the hon. member is not withdrawing his motion?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Speaker: And I take it that he is not allowing it to be dropped?

Mr. Fulton: No.

CANADIAN FLAG

REPORTED INSTRUCTIONS RESPECTING USE OF RED ENSIGN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State based on an article in the Trade Marks Journal of April 13, 1955, to which I have directed his attention. Has the government, as therein recorded, given instructions to the registrar to advise the adoption and use by Canada, as a distinctive Canadian flag, of the red ensign with the shield and coat of arms of Canada on the fly as shown in the said article? If so, has the question of Canada's national flag finally been determined by the government?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have the article to which he refers, in which appear both the Canadian coat of arms and the Canadian red ensign. I wish to inform my hon. friend that this is strictly a matter of routine procedure. It arises out of the proclamation last year of the new Trade Marks Act which replaced the Unfair Competition Act of 1932. The coat of arms was adopted under royal proclamation in 1921. The red ensign, as was recently explained by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in answer to a question by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Girard), was adopted as a distinctive Canadian flag by order in council of September 5, 1945.

Section 14 of the Unfair Competition Act of 1932, which as I said before was replaced by the Trade Marks Act of last year, did not require the publication of any notice as a condition of the existence of the Canadian government's exclusive right to use the coat of arms or the flag. Section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (e) of the Trade Marks Act as proclaimed last year makes such notice necessary for the government to benefit from the exclusive right to the coat of arms and the Canadian red ensign. I might possibly read that section of the act to which I have just referred:

> No person shall adopt in connection with a business, as a trade mark or otherwise, any mark consisting of, or so nearly resembling as to be likely to be mistaken for
> (e) the arms, crest or flag adopted and used at any time by Canada or by any province or municipal corporation in Canada in respect of which the registrar has at the request of the government of Canada or of the province or municipal corporation concerned, given public notice of its adoption and use;

The notice to which the hon. gentleman has referred is simply putting into effect this clause of section 9 to which I have just referred.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FIVE-DAY 40-HOUR WEEK—STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I should like to answer a question that was asked of me yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The question was:

> Can he say when stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government will be put on a five-day 40-hour week along the lines of his announcement of March 30?

The answer, according to the information I have received from the civil service commission, is as follows. The five-day 40-hour week will be extended to stationary engineers and firemen employed by the federal government with effect from June 1, 1955. Implementation of the five-day week will not be applicable to heating staffs in hospitals, convalescent institutions, establishments and services maintained to provide living accommodation or furnish messing facilities, penitentiaries, farms, fish hatcheries and national parks, or in centres where general application of the five-day week has not been authorized.

TRADE

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of a press report in the Ottawa Journal of April 26, 1955, attributing a statement to the Right Hon. C. D. Howe that Canada would buy more New Zealand primary produce—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —and which quotes him in this regard as saying Canada would take "everything but dairy produce".

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Could the minister indicate what quantities of wheat, beef or other primary produce Canada is prepared to buy from New Zealand?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have not read the report in the Journal, but even taking the wording as it has been stated, I do not think there is any reference to wheat or beef in the statement. On the other hand, this is a report of a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the other side of the world. We have sufficient difficulty in properly interpreting reports of statements we make in this country, and I would not therefore attempt to make any comment based on a report from that far away. I would point out as well that I do not believe the question is sufficiently urgent to require an answer before the minister comes back.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, April 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment last Friday I had been dealing with the failure of the budget to provide any measure of tax relief to the great percentage of Canadian people who are earning incomes below that figure at which they would be required to pay income tax, and I had suggested that if this government had been anxious to help those Canadians who are in greatest need of tax reductions it could have done so through a reduction in the sales tax.

Today I wish to continue with a very brief examination of some of the particulars of the budget brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). These details taken alone are important enough; but when combined I think they illustrate quite clearly the inequity and injustice in our present tax structure.

Dealing briefly with a number of these glaring injustices I would first draw the attention of the house to the flat old age security tax of $60. I believe that, as a general principle, taxation should be based upon ability to pay. Yet we have in this instance a tax in which a man earning $3,000 of taxable income is required to pay as much tax as is the millionaire. The maximum figure of $60 destroys completely what I believe to be the only fair concept of taxation, and that is taxation having regard to the ability to pay.

Then of course we have the 3 per cent floor on deductions for medical expenses, in so far as income tax is concerned. I need not refer at great length to that because, over a period of years, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has brought in resolutions urging the removal of this floor. Here is a practical way in which the Minister of Finance could have afforded some tax relief to Canadian citizens who are in sore need of tax relief. Yet the floor remains.

And I notice some other examples. On the T-1 form among the deductions allowed there will be seen a deduction of 20 per cent of net dividends from taxable Canadian corporations. Prior to the budget a married man with no children would have been permitted an income of $9,760, under this provision, without paying a cent of tax. As a result of the budget and as a result of the continuance of this feature in the income tax, today the same married man with no children can earn up to $11,131 in income without having to pay a single cent of tax.

I suggest there is something drastically wrong with an income tax set-up which permits a person who derives his income from clipping coupons to receive over $11,000 by way of income during a year without becoming liable for taxation on that income while, at the same time, those who earn their incomes in the form of wages or salaries or commissions, or from the sale of farm produce, are required to pay income tax on everything over the allowable limit.

Clearly here is an example of the lack of concern of this government for the wage earners who are so sorely pressed by taxes of all kinds. I suggest that before members of the government wax too enthusiastic over this budget they should give serious consideration to the discontinuing of factors of that kind.

[Mr. Ellis.]

Then we find also preferential treatment given with respect to deductions in the corporation income tax. Once again as happened a few years ago when adjustments were made in personal and corporation income tax rates we find that the corporation income tax rates have been made retroactive to January 1, whereas the rates affecting the personal income tax do not become operative until July 1. Here again on the one hand we find those who are going to benefit as a result of deductions in corporation income tax getting the full year's benefit, so far as those reductions are concerned, while those in the personal income tax brackets do not receive benefits until July 1.

There are other items in the budget which were not given too much prominence by the Minister of Finance. For example, the incentive tax concessions for oil, gas and mining companies, which had been effective on a rather indefinite basis, are now made permanent under the provisions of this budget.

Then there are a number of other things concerning which the budget must be scored because of the absence of provisions which would allow a more equitable tax structure in this country. For example, we have no capital gains tax; and I suggest that any equitable tax structure should make provision whereby those deriving income from capital gains would bear their fair share of the tax load. Capital gains are a form of wealth accumulation not generally the result of any useful economic activity or work; and yet they are given preferential tax-free treatment by this government. Capital gains have played a very outstanding role in the creation of large fortunes, to a point where it could be said that such capital gains have been the main source of those fortunes. I suggest capital gains should be taxed, just as any other addition to income should be taxed.

Then we have another notable absence, that of the absence of an excess profits tax. I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that in 1948 the government removed this tax. I think there are some very interesting figures which bear out my contention that there was no need for its removal at that time, and that any tax relief afforded these companies was in turn borne by the taxpapers as a whole.

I have in my hand a report from the Bank of Canada which gives a cross-section survey of 704 companies in Canada having assets of $200,000 or more. This report indicates that in 1947, the last full year before the removal of the excess profits tax, those 704 companies in Canada had net profits, before taxes, of some $742·4 million. In the year following the removal of the excess profits tax those same companies earned $856·4 million; and in 1953 they were earning net incomes, before taxes, of $1,147·6 million.

It is clear from the statistics I have given that there was absolutely no justification for the removal of the excess profits tax at that time, because since the removal of the tax the profits of Canadian corporations have gone up. Here is a perfect example of the willingness of the government to come to the assistance of those who need it least. Because certainly no one could argue that in 1947, when the decision was made to remove the excess profits tax, these companies were in sore need, and that the tax should have been removed.

I have cited some of these instances of injustice in our taxing structure to support my main point. Each example in itself, as I pointed out, is very important; but when they are taken together we see the pattern and realize what is the philosophy of the Minister of Finance and the government, that when it comes to tax reductions or tax concessions they are far more concerned about the business interests than they are about the small taxpayers and the low income groups throughout the country.

I suggested the other evening that in the final analysis the real test of the budget would be with respect to its contribution toward the solution of our major economic problems. I suggested that the budget is an instrument of government policy, and whether we like it or not, in our modern day and age, the budget is of necessity an instrument of social planning. Therefore, it is not merely a question of bringing about adjustments in the tax rates and judging the budget on the basis of whether the tax reductions are as large as we would hope; for the budget must, in the final analysis, be judged upon the effect it will have on the economy of this country and toward the solution of the difficulties facing Canada at the present time.

I do not think any of us need to be reminded of the major economic problem facing this country. I suggest that our major problem is a two-sided one. It consists on the one side of falling farm net income and on the other of mounting unemployment. In spite of all the efforts of the government to minimize the importance of these two factors, the white paper brought in at the time of the budget indicates what we have been arguing for many years, namely, that there has been a steady, precipitous drop in farm income. The white paper revealed a drop of 30 per cent, and it is the third consecutive year in which there has been a serious drop in farm income.

Now, with respect to unemployment, a few weeks ago I had occasion to say something about the unemployment problem, but since that time there have been a number of items on which I should like to comment. In the first instance, in looking to the government for some sort of leadership and to government supporters for some suggestion as to how we are to deal with the unemployment problem, it was quite significant that the only suggestions we heard from the government side of the house were two which were made during the external affairs debate when the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) suggested that we deal with the seasonal unemployment problem by putting the unemployed in the army during the winter months. If he left any doubts as to what he meant, they were removed by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who rose in his place and said it would be a splendid idea and certainly it would take care of these men who are out of work, to put them in the army between November 1 and April 1, or May 1. Apparently, that is the only suggestion that has come from the government side with respect to finding jobs for our unemployed.

I suggest further that the Prime Minister has made a number of statements which I feel are too bluntly indicative of the government's attitude toward unemployment. Since the provincial premiers are in Ottawa at the present time working out an agenda for the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference, I certainly am not going to try to speculate on the result of such deliberations, but I must comment on certain remarks made by the Prime Minister.

We in the C.C.F. have long maintained that the supporters of free enterprise accept a certain amount of unemployment. As a matter of fact, we can go farther and say that big business desires a surplus of workers over jobs, and that they see nothing wrong in a certain percentage of unemployment in this country. The thing that worries us is how many unemployed we must have in Canada before the government considers it has any responsibility in this matter. It will be recalled that earlier in the year when the figures were mounting month by month the government was unwilling to take any action except in the form of relief. These are the only suggestions we have had from the government.

Now, we have made statements to the effect that under free enterprise a certain percentage of unemployment is accepted, and for so doing we have often been abused or ridiculed. I think the Prime Minister's speech the other day is clearly indicative of the fact that the government accepts a certain amount of unemployment; because in his welcoming remarks to the provincial premiers he suggested that the federal government might be prepared to contribute something toward the relief of unemployment beyond a certain minimum figure. In other words, the government was quite prepared to have so many unemployed in the country, and it was only when the number of unemployed went beyond a particular figure—we have not any information as to what the level is—the government considered it had any responsibility toward supplying even relief, much less work and wages. We in this movement maintain that the right to work ought to be the birthright of every Canadian citizen.

During the war years when the late President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill met and formulated the Atlantic charter, one of the provisions which struck a responsive chord throughout the world was "freedom from want". We can interpret that to mean the right of every citizen to earn his own bread. I say that any government which cannot, in the words of the Prime Minister, manage its affairs in such a manner that jobs can be provided is unfit to govern.

We were forewarned in this house as to the attitude the Prime Minister was going to take, because it will be recalled that on Monday last he was asked by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) a question regarding unemployment. In answer to the hon. member the Prime Minister said, as recorded on page 3122 of Hansard:

> I say that it is my intention to suggest that relief for needy persons, whether employable or unemployable, be discussed at this meeting with the provincial premiers.

At that point the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) interjected this remark:

> How about work for them?

Well, I need not remind the house of the answer; I prefer to use inverted commas around the word "answer". The Prime Minister refused bluntly even to consider a work and wages program. He thinks only in terms of direct relief. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we have learned our lessons from the past, the economic imbecility of the thirties when millions of dollars were poured down the drain for direct relief, with nothing to show for them except the disillusionment, the embarrassment, the demoralization of so many of our people. If we have learned from the lessons of the past, we should certainly have learned the lesson that the only way to deal with unemployment is to provide jobs, not relief.

It is rather strange that the Prime Minister, who today has turned his back flatly on a work and wages program, is the same man who just a few months ago made a speech in the city of Quebec in which he stated quite categorically that it was the responsibility of the government to provide employment, and if the government could not so organize its economic activities as to provide jobs for all, then that government should resign. It is the same Prime Minister who heads the government today who is absolutely refusing to consider anything but a paltry contribution to direct relief. Today we find that the suggestions offered to the provincial premiers is that we shall pay between 30 per cent and 50 per cent of the relief costs, and the remainder will be borne by the already over-harassed, over-burdened provinces and municipalities.

Mr. Knowles: Over-Harrised is right.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre certainly deserves a big mark for that interjection. We have reached the stage today when we must accept the fact that relief is not the answer. I shall grant you that relief is a stop-gap. I realize there are people in need in Canada today and their needs have to be met today, not tomorrow, not next week, but today. But that should be a stop-gap only. The government should be taking steps to provide employment, and the amazing thing is that the Prime Minister has accepted this sort of thing. I am going to read another excerpt from the speech made by the Prime Minister at Quebec. He said this:

> We are told that for some time now construction industry activities have been slowing down slightly. We have deliberately held back a great number of construction projects we want to launch. We did not wish to compete with private industry, with Canadian individuals, in the hiring of workers and purchase of materials. But we have a duty to prevent a drop in the construction industry and we are going to prevent it.

How does the Prime Minister tie that statement in with the type of statement he made to the provincial premiers yesterday? The Prime Minister made the categorical statement that the federal government has deliberately held back certain construction projects. I should like to know what those construction projects are. Would the Prime Minister care to name them? Let us know what these projects are and how many there are. Let us know when they are going to proceed with them. We have no information whatsoever. Yet the Prime Minister made the categorical statement that they had been deliberately holding back on construction projects until such time as there was a slackening in industrial activities.

Someone mentioned the South Saskatchewan dam. On that point, the premier of Saskatchewan wrote to the Prime Minister, immediately after reading this wonderful speech the right hon. gentleman made in Quebec city, congratulating him on it and suggesting that, now that the Prime Minister had revealed that the present government had been holding certain projects in reserve, perhaps one of those projects might be the South Saskatchewan dam. The Prime Minister replied to the premier of Saskatchewan, informing him that the government did not consider the South Saskatchewan project as one which was being held in reserve and that that project would be considered on its merits. My suggestion is this. If there was merit in the project before unemployment came along, certainly there is twice the merit in this project now. If the government had any hesitancy in going ahead with that project three or four years ago, much less 15 years ago when the Liberals first promised it, there is certainly plenty of argument today for starting that project immediately.

In connection with that dam, it is very interesting that on March 9 the government tabled sessional paper 106-A, which contained a copy of all correspondence between the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Canada regarding the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation projects. It is exactly one year tomorrow since the premier of Saskatchewan wrote to the Minister of Agriculture in the federal cabinet, reminding Mr. Gardiner that by common admission previous to this the only remaining obstacle to agreement as to whether the federal government was prepared to go ahead with this project was the matter of the contribution the government of Saskatchewan would be called upon to make towards the construction of the dam itself.

In view of the emphasis placed by federal officials on the possibility of subsidization of power by the federal government in making a federal contribution to this dam, Mr. Douglas pointed out in his letter that by a figure agreed between representatives of the federal government and provincial government the value of the power which would be made available to Saskatchewan through the building of this dam would amount to some $17,860,000. The province had previously agreed to pay all the cost of the building of the hydroelectric generating stations. So here definitely was the commitment by the province of Saskatchewan that they were prepared to pay not only the full cost of building the power stations at the dam site but also $17,860,000 towards the construction of the dam itself. Certainly this removed any possible thought in the minds of any hon. gentlemen that in going ahead with this project federal moneys would in any way be used to subsidize the generation of power in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Douglas went on to point out that, as we are well aware, this was initially a federal project. It was promised to the people of Saskatchewan year in and year out by Liberal politicians. The Minister of Agriculture was the foremost of those who promised the dam. They have used that promise to get votes in more elections than one, and this was largely instrumental in their victory in the Rosthern by-election a few years ago. When the people of Saskatchewan finally got around to asking the government of Canada when they were going to proceed with the dam, the reply was, "We are waiting until the provincial government agrees to pay its share." That came as a big shock to the provincial government because they had always understood that it was a purely federal project. There are many people in Saskatchewan who feel that the federal government deliberately put forth that requirement hoping that the provincial government would turn it down and then the Liberals could go up and down Saskatchewan saying, "We were prepared to build this dam, but the C.C.F. provincial government has denied that dam to us." But the provincial government, much as they might have been put out by this sudden change, agreed that they would participate in the building of the dam, though every time they got close to agreement the Minister of Agriculture came forth with new conditions. Each time these new conditions were brought forth, it appears quite obvious that the federal government was doing everything it could to get off the hook and to throw the responsibility on the shoulders of the provincial government.

The situation was simply this, that this started out as a purely federal project. There have been meetings of the technical staffs of the provincial and the federal government, and they have arrived at these figures. They decided that to build the main reservoir and dam would cost $80 million; the irrigation system would cost $35 million; and the power system $20 million; making a total of $135 million. This was at the outset a purely federal matter. The provincial government agreed to pay the cost of the power stations, $20 million. They agreed to pay for the cost of the irrigation work, $35 million. But even that was not enough. After we had gone out of our way to accommodate the federal government, it turned around and said, "That is not enough; we want you to pay a share of the cost of the reservoir itself". It felt certain that the provincial government could not meet these exacting demands. The provincial government have enough faith in the province, and were prepared to undertake a venture of this kind. The provincial government said, "All right, we will decide on a figure which we feel we might pay to bring about some satisfactory conclusion of these negotiations." As a result of meetings between the technical staffs of P.F.R.A. and the provincial government, it was agreed that the province of Saskatchewan would be called upon to pay, in addition to the $55 million to which they had already committed themselves, an additional $17,860,000. One might have thought that certainly they would go ahead with it now because, in a project that originally began as a federal undertaking, the provincial government is committed to spend $73 million and the federal investment is only $62 million. The province, with a population of less than a million, is prepared to pay over half the cost of the project, and the federal government has not yet made up its mind as to whether it will go ahead with the project.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I am just concluding my remarks. I do want to say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Ellis: I can conclude briefly. I want to conclude simply by making these remarks. Up to the present time the situation has been simply this. Representatives of the provincial government have been meeting with representatives of the federal government. They have been sitting down and working out the details of a draft agreement which was brought up for consideration last fall. Yet all during these negotiations the provincial government was in the rather ridiculous situation that even if they acceded to every request made by the federal representatives, there was still no guarantee that the federal government would go ahead and build the dam. In other words, even if the representatives of P.F.R.A. and the representatives of the federal government were to come to complete agreement with the provincial authorities, all it would take is a shake of the head by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to have done with the whole project.

I therefore say that we have now reached the stage where I believe the province of Saskatchewan has indicated its good faith. It has perhaps gone further than many people think we should have gone. But we want this dam built. It will be a great boon, or a great shot in the arm to our economy. It will aid our employment situation in this country. I think here is a practical example of how the government can now get down to business and do something towards the solution of our unemployment problem.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have two reasons for taking part in this debate. The first is that I have something to say and the second is that I represent a constituency that is worth representing. I was one of those who congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris); and notwithstanding anything that has been said, even by the hon. member who has just spoken, I did not change my mind because I believe he was right and that he deserves any encouragement that he gets. I know that the Minister of Finance did not bring down his budget in order to please the opposition. If he had tried to do so, he just could not do it nor could anybody else. The Minister of Finance is just like the other three men I knew who preceded him. He is steady, optimistic and progressive. He is one of those who stand solidly for stable government and he is a credit to Canada.

I agree with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) when he said that this was a popular budget after he had made his statement and his suggestions. It is a popular budget. There are those who would back up the minister, including the fishermen, the automobile companies, and those with lower income taxes and the farmers. I know that each of these classes would like to have more, but that is human nature. We want more and more of the material things.

To me the outstanding thing in the budget was the reference to the royal commission. Of that matter I will speak later. I do not agree with the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. I do not think the government should hand over money to any province without having a say as to how it is to be spent. Just imagine the dominion government handing over money to the province of Ontario which hardly knows what to do with all its money, and which always has a big surplus. Just imagine the dominion government handing over money to the province of Quebec. The premier of Quebec would say, "We are able to handle our own business and we can carry on without you".

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member not support the taxation agreements?

Mr. McIvor: I am not in any big hurry, Mr. Speaker, but I will answer any question afterwards. Let us consider the province of British Columbia. I do not think it is a poor province. Let us look at the province of Alberta with all their millions made out of oil. Do they want a handout from the dominion government? I know that most of the provinces have a little bit of "Scotch" in them, and they will take any given quantity.

I commend the government for its trade policy, especially for the one outstanding act. I think even the opposition commended the government for that act, in view of the farewell that was given to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I think that a wise move was made in sending him to Australia and New Zealand. As somebody said at that time—perhaps it was myself—he is an outstanding salesman for Canada and he will do a good job. We shall look forward to his report when he comes back.

I know that we need good crops. While I bear the name of a prophet, I am not much of a prophet. However, I would say that in the last 60 years in Canada I never knew a year when we had a big fall of snow that we had a poor crop. This year we have snow everywhere and little frost in the ground. I therefore expect that the benefit of this snow that has fallen will result in a good crop.

I should just like to tell the Minister of Finance how he might make a little bit of money or save a little bit. In the city of Fort William we pay $33,000 out in rent. I have advocated a federal building. I would suggest, according to my own figuring, that you can build for $200,000 a building that will house these offices, with a little bit of space to spare. Therefore in about six years that building would be clear. I think that this is absolutely necessary.

I commend the Minister of Finance for the reduction from 4 per cent to 2 per cent in the taxing ability of our cities. That does not come low enough for Fort William. Ours is 1·7. We need another ·3. But I think we shall get this later on when we get our public buildings.

We have four large buildings in Fort William and we think that they should have some help from the dominion government. Let us consider our big post office building. In it are several large offices for the Canadian mounted police. Public works have a great big corner; agriculture have a corner, and immigration have a corner as well as have the post office. That is an important building. Then, with its three storeys, there is the old post office that was renovated in which are the unemployment insurance offices. Then we have a customs building that houses the customs offices and income tax offices. Then we have the armoury and the air field. We think that we should have some consideration and that we should have a public building.

I know there are those who say that we have hard times in Canada. I do not believe that. When I want to get a holiday, I often make a trip around the beer parlours and places that sell the thing that some people think is good. I should be glad to take the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with me some time. I will show him some things. If one goes in after five o'clock, one will find that he will have a hard time to get a seat to get a drink.

Mr. Knowles: Is this the story of Daniel in the lions' den?

Mr. McIvor: I would suggest that in 1953 in Canada $868 million was spent for alcoholic beverages and for tobacco, $465 million. I think anybody would agree with me that anyone who uses those things, even moderately, and on which he spends his loose cash, does not find that they do him much good. Here we have $1,333 million spent for things that do not bring any material result or mental health and do not supply any requirement of the individual. What do the C.C.F. say about that $1,333 million? That is more than is spent on schools in Canada. Yet it is said that the country is going to the bowwows. If it is, it is not because of the dominion government.

As I said, I commend the Minister of Finance for his royal commission. I would suggest to him that all phases of our economic system be thoroughly examined. I would also suggest that local mayors and councillors be considered. I think consideration should be given to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) with reference to the guaranteed annual wage and also to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) to the effect that military training be set up in the fall of each year. But I would say that it absolutely must not be done by way of conscription. It must be on a voluntary basis.

I know that our major problem is unemployment. I think we have no right to be pessimistic at the present time because of the fact of the dominion-provincial conference which is now meeting and tackling this job. Notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I commend the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for making the suggestion of paying 50 per cent of the cost of assisting the unemployed. I am sure those who will be spending this money will not give it as a relief handout but that it will be spent to pay decent wages for work done.

I have said before that Fort William led the parade in Canada in showing how to cure unemployment. Unemployment should have been higher there this year than last year and yet because of the "do it now" campaign there were 800 fewer unemployed in Fort William when I was at home at Easter than there were a year ago. If every city, including Winnipeg, had done the same thing there would be a big hole in the unemployment problem today.

I believe somebody found fault with the United Nations and expressed the view that it was doomed to failure. In my opinion the United Nations is on the right road. When the Great Teacher was asked "who is my neighbour?" He said that it was anyone in need no matter where the individual lived. When the dominion government supports the Colombo plan and sends money to feed hungry people they are getting into the position where, according to the Divine Teacher, they are going to live.

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in making a few remarks in the budget debate I will try not to become too vociferous or rhetorical, but it comes to my mind that it is over three weeks since the budget was presented and I believe it is generally accepted at the present time that it is pretty well forgotten. That does not speak too well for the budget. However, so far as I am concerned, I believe it was as good a budget as we could expect from a Liberal government working under the outmoded set of fiscal and financial policies by which they are trying to govern the country.

An amendment was introduced by the Conservative party and a subamendment by the C.C.F. In his budget speech our leader advised the house that we would support these amendments on general principles. With respect to the subamendment, the matter of provincial and municipal taxation is certainly a problem. We all know that the only source of revenue for municipalities and school districts is direct land taxes. Such funds should not and cannot be used for welfare payments to unemployed employables. It is also regrettable that there was no plan in the budget for remission of excise taxes on purchases of machinery, equipment and other supplies necessary in the maintenance and operation of community projects and for school purposes. However, in the light of the proposed federal-provincial conference I think we should possibly withhold our criticism. I am sure that the fields of taxation will be the big issue at the conference, and I am satisfied that the provinces will be able to set forth their case for a new deal in taxation better than we are able to do here.

I have followed very closely the speeches of our socialist friends in this debate, and here I should like to comment on the speech of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis), who spoke a few minutes ago. He is quite concerned about a program of jobs for all. I am sure we all wish to have the privilege of earning our own living, but I believe that the problem before the government today in the face of mechanized production is rather to devise a plan to distribute the profits earned by the machines and to institute a program to educate our people how to enjoy the life of leisure which will be their lot in the very near future.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) discoursed in his usual clear and decisive manner but I noted the absence of any great emphasis on nationalization of industry or banking which was the cry in former years. Could it be that time has a mellowing effect, or is it that he has come to the conclusion that such policies do not appeal to the great majority of the Canadian people? I have noticed a new phrase creeping into the speeches of the various members of the C.C.F. group—public investment. Just what is meant by this phrase? It could be investment in public buildings, in roads and bridges, in hospitals or it could be in industry. Possibly as the days pass we shall have an explanation of this new phrase, but I venture to predict there will be as many definitions as there will be C.C.F. speakers. I make this prediction on the basis of what has been happening in the discussions of various matters before the house, especially in relation to foreign affairs. I am afraid the C.C.F. is not a very happy family. By the way, Mr. Speaker, do you know what "C.C.F." stands for? It is supposed to mean "Co-operative Commonwealth Federation", but I would say that today these letters stand for confusion, chaos and frustration.

I had expected to learn much from our Conservative friends. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has again proven that he is a master critic. In a very long speech he poured forth criticism after criticism, expressing great alarm over deficit budgeting. We know the hon. member is a great exponent of sound money and sees inflation around every corner. Note these words of his as found on page 2947 of Hansard of April 19:

> Deficits mean higher purchasing power with a tendency toward higher prices.

Again at page 2948 he said:

> Is the government so bankrupt that in the face of difficulties that we all know we are facing now its only expedient is the old-fashioned one of debasing the currency?

That sounds like the talk we heard in the old days of the gold standard, but now when our money is backed only by the production of our people his thinking might be revised. When we have an annual wealth production of $24 billion compared with a gross national income of some $18 billion, there is a wide gap to bridge before we need to worry about inflation or debasing the currency. I should also like to refer to what another Conservative had to say. As found at page 3009 of Hansard of April 20, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) said:

> A temporary deficit in my opinion would be well worth while if, by so doing, trade were stimulated and there was a stimulation of production to the point where in the near future it would be greater than it is at the present time.

I should like to know which is the Conservative viewpoint. I should think the national organizer of the once great Conservative party and the recognized financial critic would get together. I thought the hon. member for Broadview made a very good speech up to a point. I am sorry to say, however, that there are a couple of pages in Hansard containing the worst drivel I have heard since coming to this House of Commons. It is difficult to realize that these words were spoken by the very great national leader who is destined to lead the Conservative party from oblivion.

I cannot let the opportunity pass without referring to the speech of our leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). He gave a very clear outline of the reaction of the Social Credit group to the budget, and where there was criticism there were suggestions concerning remedial measures. In other words there was constructive criticism. We in this group are behind him 100 per cent. I shall endeavour to present a few more of our views. The hon. member for Peace River mentioned that the injection in the arm for industry contained milk, but in so far as the farm industry is concerned I would say it was rather blue milk. Listen to this quotation from page 2738 of Hansard dealing with tariffs:

> A number of the reductions will benefit farmers, directly or indirectly. They include reduction or elimination of tariffs on brooders for farm animals, certain components of feedstuffs, sweet potato seedlings—

That is the part that amuses me.

> —poultry eviscerating equipment, and others.

I wonder how many cents this will save the average Canadian farmer. I doubt if it will offset the increase in the tariff on ethylene glycol now so commonly used. I was glad to hear that the tariff on potatoes is to be referred to the tariff board. I would have liked to see fruits and vegetables included. However, one thing at a time is pretty good for the Liberals.

I should like to say how closely I studied the speech of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) concerning the annual wage, which is a problem that must be faced. Working men will insist on a steady income, and this is their right. The Social Credit group has always advocated a continuity of income. Is the annual wage the answer? We doubt it. We are not saying it is impossible, but many problems exist. In order to satisfy all our people under present conditions there would have to be full employment. Is this going to be possible under normal peacetime conditions and with automation only in its infancy? You may say that manual labour must share in the profits of the machine and to a great extent that is true, but a machine also incurs some expenses in its operation. Then, too, other countries in the world might not have an annual wage plan, so what about price competition?

Some people believe we are now pricing ourselves out of world markets. Could industry pay annual wages to a large percentage of employees and still keep prices competitive? These are questions we must ask ourselves and for which answers must be found. Is one year's severance pay a sufficient guarantee to a worker in the face of total or near total mechanization of industry? I believe the answer must be no. If the annual wage is forced on industry it will wreck our entire economy. In that event we would have to subsidize industry to keep up our production in the face of foreign competition, or build an impassable tariff wall around our nation.

We believe there is a better way. We believe our Canadian people are entitled to the security of a steady income. We believe the Canadian economy, with its high standard of production and with our vast national wealth, can supply each Canadian citizen with sufficient income to enjoy a high standard of living. But we believe it should be done by the national dividend system, bringing up the earnings of labourers to the level our economy can afford. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that this is one of the biggest problems facing industry and the government today. I would suggest that each member of this house carefully study the whole question, free from the bias of political thinking.

In my opinion the most noteworthy item in the whole budget is the notice of a plan to establish a royal commission to study our economy. I do not like that word "royal", it sounds too much like a judicial inquiry. The Social Credit group has advocated a board similar to this ever since our policies were first enunciated. We are not satisfied with the duties of this commission as set forth by the minister on page 2740 of Hansard. He said:

> The government intends, therefore, to appoint a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. The sort of study we have in mind would include probable developments both in our productive capacity and in our external markets. It would include an examination of our population growth in both its regional and age distribution aspects. It would assemble information and speculate thoughtfully about the magnitude and nature of our future requirements for the great varieties of physical amenities which contribute to a steadily rising level of well-being.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that is what is commonly spoken of as the terms of reference. Within the limits of those terms the commission or board would function. In speaking of the results the minister said on page 2741 of Hansard:

> I think the work of this royal commission will do several things. It will focus public attention, here and abroad, in a rather specific and detailed way on our prospects. It will gather together the considerable amount of material already in existence, but scattered in many different places, that throws light on these problems.

The first result mentioned was that it would focus public attention here and abroad. Since the minister placed that result first it must have been the most important one the minister hoped to achieve through the working of this commission. I feel that is a secondary result. The other results are more important. The fourth result the minister mentioned was as follows:

> It will sharpen our understanding of some of the problems we face, and will provide useful guides to governments and businessmen, and to leaders in all walks of life, in making plans and policies for the future.

Of course the terms of reference are indefinite and quite vague, and just what this commission will study is possibly something to be decided in the future. However, I should like to lay before the house what we believe should be included in the terms of reference, or some of the conditions under which this board should be set up.

In the first place, we believe it should be permanent. It should consist of top level economists, scientists, engineers, all versed in industrial development, production and distribution, in international trade, international fiscal policy, finance and agriculture. Of course representatives of labour and management would have to be included. The terms of reference must be limited only by the knowledge required by the government in administering the affairs of the people of Canada in the best interests of each individual.

At the present time it is pretty well admitted that the greatest problems of production, so far as supplying the needs of our own people are concerned, have been solved. We can produce plenty for our own consumption, but our problems in meeting competition in world markets are many. These will be for the board to study so they may report to the interested parties.

It is generally agreed that the main problem today is distribution rather than production. We have so-called surpluses, yet we know there is a potential demand for many of those surpluses right here in Canada. We also know that every dollar's worth of goods piled in our warehouses is sorely needed in many parts of the world. Why do we have unsold goods when the need is so great? That, it seems to me, is a problem that could be considered by such a board.

We Social Crediters believe we have the answer. We believe that whatever we can produce from our natural resources, plus the labour and know-how of our people, can and must be distributed to meet the demands of our people, by maintaining a proper balance between the purchasing power in their hands and the cost of the goods and services they require. We feel there is need for such a board as is recommended to work out the details and mechanics of the problem, and to advise the government accordingly.

The first problem of such a board would be to study the breakdown of our system of distribution. I am sure its findings would be similar to those of the commission set up in the United States in the early thirties. This was known as the Hoover commission, and its purpose was to study the problems of production and consumption. When this study had been completed Mr. Loeb, who was director of the national survey of potential productive capacity, along with his associates Felix Frazer, Graham Montgomery, Walter Polakov, William Smith and Montgomery Schuyler, published a book entitled "The Chart of Plenty". From this book I should like to read what appears at page 78:

> At present, production is curtailed to meet a grossly inadequate buying power.

We have a similar state of affairs in this country right at the present time. Our production is curtailed to meet a grossly inadequate buying power. Factories are being forced to close down or to curtail production, thus causing unemployment and further decreasing our purchasing power.

Then at page 161 we find this statement by these noted economists:

> It apparently takes about two-thirds of our workers, and an even smaller utilization of plant, to provide mere sustenance for our whole people.

By using all our available workers and operating the existing plant efficiently, a comfortable living for everyone would be provided.

I wish the government well in the formation of this commission, and trust they will secure the best brains available, regardless of political affiliation or expediency; and I trust that when the findings are made known every effort will be made to shape our economy to best serve the needs of the Canadian people. If this is done I am sure the finding will be as is set out in this paragraph from the same book:

It would seem that the simple and obvious way out, that of giving a buying power adequate to procure desired goods and services to the limit of our ability to produce them, might well be tried. It is simple in principle but has not been attempted.

Mr. Speaker, that is what those of us in the Social Credit group have been advocating on different occasions both in the house and throughout the country. It is just the old Social Credit philosophy that the buying power in the hands of the people must be sufficient for them to purchase the needed goods and services with which they may enjoy life.

Then there are one or two other points I have noted in the budget, concerning which I should like to give the government credit. There is mention of the huge sums spent on various surveys and studies in government laboratories across the country. Those of us who last year were permitted to visit the laboratories on the Montreal road will agree that science is doing much to help industry promote a better way of life in Canada. Then some were able to visit the laboratory operated by the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I cannot commend too highly the work being undertaken by that department in promoting a better way of life and a healthier life for the people of Canada.

One may talk about unemployment, or about what the government should do, or what must be done; but I am satisfied that if the one plan were instituted, that of making financially possible what is physically possible, many of our problems would disappear.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, one cannot help commenting on the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, who said that others who might be more expert and more learned have had their speeches described as drivel. Then the hon. member proceeded to say, very definitely, that the Social Credit group has the answer to our problems. Well, this would seem to be a clear case of undue modesty. I thought, however, that words he used later, when he referred to that old Social Credit philosophy, were somewhat more appropriate.

It would seem that the theme of the budget offered this year by the Minister of Finance is a gross national product of $25,250 million. Indeed even the more optimistic gauge of $26 billion was given. I for one am in agreement with the optimistic forecast of the business picture for this year. The Minister of Finance referred to our dependence on the United States economy, a condition which I believe is recognized by most hon. members. In fact there are many who hold the view that this dependence has taken on alarming proportions.

However, in signifying my agreement with the optimistic outlook for this year I would refer to the issue of Fortune for January, 1955, where in the first article for the new year this magazine sets out a comprehensive business round-up of the financial picture in the United States. This article was most enlightening, and after reading it one could almost suggest that the minister got his budget suggestions from it. The first sentence of this article which bears the heading "Best Year Ever" states:

The year 1955 will be the best in U.S. history, barring war. By the end of 1954 the business upturn had burgeoned into a full fledged recovery. Roundup's forecast now is that business will continue to improve at least through the second quarter of 1956.

With this quotation from a reliable United States publication, I think my agreement with the gross national product estimate for this year can be readily understood. The question that follows from this gross national product estimate, Mr. Speaker, is naturally how one's particular area will share in this expected increase. In presenting a comprehensive survey of the coal mining industry the other evening, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) suggested he did not feel the maritime areas would share to any great extent in this gross national product increase. I am sorry to say that I cannot go along with his statement, because for once we can report considerable progress in the past year, and an optimistic future is evident with perhaps certain reservations.

In New Brunswick the picture is particularly good for this year. I should like to try and develop the theme that our capital expenditures and other investments for the year have taken a commendable jump, and to my mind this means only that if these optimistic signs and trends can be continued and the mood that is now evident is given some assistance we shall be able, as someone has suggested, to pick ourselves up by our own bootstraps.

The article that is most pleasing to me in this regard is entitled "Supplement to Private and Public Investment in Canada, Outlook 1955, Regional Estimates." This is published by the Department of Trade and Commerce and deals with all the provinces, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, in that order, giving the total capital expenditures and the percentage change.

The percentage change is what I am particularly referring to now. The change from 1953 to 1954 is given in the total, and from 1954 to 1955. The figures which I would like to place on Hansard show that in New Brunswick in the last two years we have had the highest increase in total capital expenditures of any province in Canada.

It is perhaps something new to say that a small province like ours is able to be so forward looking in this regard. The figures for 1953 showed a 7·9 per cent increase, and this year we lead again with a 27·7 per cent increase. The capital expenditures shown for each province represent the value of the construction work carried out in the province and the value of the machinery and equipment acquired for use within it. Such expenditures represent gross additions to the capital stock of the province and are a reflection of economic activity in that area.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, and having particular reference to the economic activity in the area, I should like to refer briefly to the local situation in Saint John. Last year I had occasion to be pessimistic about the situation there; but while I would not wish to go on record as saying that everything is perfect, there are some better signs. Again I attach the reservation to those good signs that certain assistance and encouragement must be given; but to me, Mr. Speaker, they do suggest that there is a mood of growing optimism, a mood that must be taken advantage of immediately.

The port situation is much better. Trade during the past winter season reached a much better level. Grain was moving again, and we felt this general economic increase. The unemployment picture was also somewhat better. It is not good, but some 800 fewer men were unemployed each week during the winter as compared with the corresponding week of the previous year. One worry, though, that I should like to mention concerns the future of some of the war contracts in our area. The local drydock, which is largely dependent on naval contracts, cannot make plans for the future because of this hackneyed, politics-ridden manner of handing out those patronage plums. For example, officials of the drydock, which is mainly engaged in naval construction work, must come to Ottawa every two or three months on their hands and knees, develop the local situation, emphasize the unemployment and general economic chaos that will result if they are not given work; and if they are good, and I suppose if they conform to other standards, they are given another contract that will last for another two or three months. Mr. Speaker, I say here, surely it should be possible to line up for the entire year the necessary plans in the defence production department.

The other day I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) refer to an overseas trip he took during the past winter. He left from the noble port of Saint John, and I was privileged to wish him bon voyage. Whether it was necessary or not he made the mistake of coming back by the port of Halifax. The hon. member for Simcoe North is a very discerning traveller, and while he made note of the good facilities and conditions in Saint John as he passed through that port, he could not help but comment—in fact he felt he was obliged to comment—on conditions in the port of Halifax as regards customs and immigration, which held him up for long hours and caused him to stand in the cold and reach Montreal in a state of sheer exhaustion.

I wish to say one thing on that point, Mr. Speaker. In Saint John we are grateful for the fact that right after the war we built a $1,500,000 immigration shed that is one of the finest in the world. There is no question about it. It was built to handle at least a hundred immigrants a day. It was designed for that, and we were pleased when that new immigration shed was built with plans in mind for the future. But, Mr. Speaker, I take exception to the fact that this shed has not been used at all to the extent that was planned.

The other day I had occasion to ask in this house for the total of all immigrants landed since January 1, 1950, at Saint John, at Halifax and at other ports. I have the figures here, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to read them. Since 1950, 21,582 immigrants have passed through Saint John; through the port of Halifax, with the facilities that the hon. member found thoroughly inadequate and not properly managed, 292,632 immigrants have passed. What is the reason and logic behind that method of doing business in our country?

Having said that the economy in the province of New Brunswick is taking on an optimistic look, and having quoted figures that show we wish to help ourselves and that we are digging down and finding the money—which is hard to come by in the so-called have-not provinces—having said that we are digging down and making that effort, I wish to refer to the fact that in the budget very little consideration is given to the development, both financial and industrial, that is needed in the province.

The Minister of Finance refers on page 2730 of Hansard to the second important ingredient, that is the second important consideration in the budget:

> The second important ingredient of further expansion exists in the program for the construction of new capital facilities.

He goes on to stress this point, but no mention is made of any assistance or any new help to be given to the province. These two ingredients are important in the budget. The picture in the United States is stressed by the Minister of Finance as being of first importance. I agree with him 100 per cent. The second ingredient he mentioned is this expansion program that is needed for new capital facilities. I agree with him 100 per cent in that respect. But from there on I am sorry to say I part company with him because of the fact that the financial status of the provinces and the demands which they have to meet have not even been recognized in the budget.

May I refer to an article in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of February 18, 1955, entitled "Low-Cost Power" by Eric Dennis. I quote:

> In introducing a bill in the House of Commons a few days ago for federal control over the use of international rivers for hydro purposes, the trade and commerce minister, C. D. Howe said: ". . . In fact, our industrial economy is largely built on low-cost electricity."
> This fact, set out by the man who has guided Canada's economic development since the war years, pinpoints the troubles that have beset the maritime provinces over the period of many decades to a steadily increasing degree.

During the past war, when the various defence contracts were handed out to the different areas of Canada for the necessary war effort, we felt that down our way at last we would be given our just due, and that the encouragement that would follow these government-assisted industries would be welcome and noticeable. May I quote from a very interesting article called "The Economic Effects of the War on the Maritime Provinces of Canada" published by the institute of public affairs, Dalhousie University, written by one of our famous native sons, of whom we have many.

To digress a minute, it was interesting to me to put in a brief appearance at the conference yesterday of dominion and provincial ministers. Everyone was a little timid about going in at first and being recognized or seeing people, but one certainly was at ease as far as the maritimers were concerned, because you were falling all over provincial premiers and ministers from the maritimes.

To get back to "The Economic Effects of the War", I quote again, and I think this is the last time I shall be quoting. This was an economic survey made toward the end of the war on the entire maritime economy, with particular reference to defence contracts and the increase in industry that could be expected after the war by the maritimes. This is on page 13:

> Thus, whereas the central provinces have achieved a great expansion in their industrial equipment and capacity as a result of the war, the maritimes have had little expansion of a permanent nature in their industrial equipment. The effects of this on the internal balance of industry will presumably be to increase the concentration of manufacturing industry in Canada and the general location advantages enjoyed by industries in the central provinces. Although no one can complain of this, for it was essential in wartime to develop war industry on the most suitable sites regardless of regional politics, it nevertheless is a probable consequence that the economic and political weight of the maritime provinces will be even less in the post-war than the pre-war period.

Having read reports like that and having realized the situation; having been told when we went after these defence contracts that we could not have them because we did not have the hydroelectric power available, we made long-range plans for the development of hydro in the maritimes and particularly in New Brunswick. I refer again to the minister's statement of the absolute necessity, in this day of quick development in Canada, for the ready availability of cheap hydroelectric power.

We have in New Brunswick a large amount of undeveloped natural power in our rivers. The situation began to take form in 1945 under the Liberal government then in power in the province. They made initial moves to correct this situation, and I wish that credit be given to them in this regard. They did not perhaps carry it through but, when the change of government came in that province in 1952—I remember the red letter day very well, September 22, 1952—our young, energetic, new government tackled this matter of the undeveloped hydro sites in New Brunswick with a businesslike, farsighted approach. They did not play politics with it either. When they introduced the initial motion in the house they appealed to the Liberal party who were then and still are in opposition; and there is a chance here to say that it may be some time before this situation is changed again. The Liberal opposition, in all fairness to them, joined the premier and government of that province in a joint appeal to the federal government for certain assistance to enable us to finance the development of our rivers at a low rate of interest.

This situation developed, and I wish to say that at all points it was handled by the provincial and federal governments in a most businesslike manner. That I personally cannot object to. When it reached here, I am pleased to say that the Minister of Labour called a meeting in his office of all the federal New Brunswick members of both parties. He had maps and experts on hand, and we had a very careful and frank discussion of this future problem. I am pleased to say that all the members and the senators who were there showed acquiescence in this plan in various ways and in various degrees.

The situation developed in the last year in a peculiar manner. While I have some of the correspondence and records that I wish to place before this house, I notice that there is a motion to produce certain papers which probably will disclose a great many of the facts with which I would have to deal. So, Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to bring this situation up to date, to a few days ago when evidently the provincial government were given word, by letter or by some other method, that the federal government had decided, after two years of playing around with it and giving all encouragement, that it would not be possible to financially assist the province of New Brunswick in any manner in this development of our resources that is so greatly needed to finish the program we have so optimistically started down there.

Here is the thing that amuses me about the whole matter. It concerns the federal aspect of it, which is really all I feel responsible for. The Minister of Labour, our representative in the federal government, who seemingly took an interest in this matter and followed it along, instead of making some sort of announcement in the house, took occasion in a radio broadcast over a local station to say that financial help to Beechwood was not possible because of the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, any other reason would have stood up to some extent; but to fall back on that argument and say that the refusal is because of the constitution seems to me amusing. The fact that the announcement was made in a radio broadcast to my mind suggests that the situation was not treated nearly as seriously as it should have been.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, namely the attitude of the federal Liberal members of parliament who represent New Brunswick. They acquiesced in this proposal. They signified their approval of the Beechwood plan. But what have we heard from them in this house in this regard? We have heard absolutely nothing from them, Mr. Speaker, and I challenge them here now.

I see the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) over there on the opposite side. He made one brief reference to it in the debate on the speech from the throne. But I now say to him, to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) and anybody else, that they should take the opportunity in this budget debate to get to their feet and let us know what they think about this plan. I will state this further. If the Minister of Labour does not get to his feet in this house during the budget debate or at some other favourable opportunity and make a statement on this matter, in my opinion he has not treated this serious problem in New Brunswick with the respect and dignity with which it should be treated.

Just to follow this matter up, Mr. Speaker, I should like to dwell on the national aspect of this financial assistance plan that we are after. We have had the gas pipe line up for consideration at various times. It was mentioned only in an insignificant way perhaps this year, but in other years it has been considered. It is of considerable importance to Canada. Nobody at all takes exception to it. We in the maritimes have always appreciated any of these problems that have a national aspect. Being a member of the Conservative party I certainly am aware of the national policy that is necessary for the development of this country. But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we should be given some financial assistance along this same line.

At the time the pipe-line proposal was turned down, perhaps temporarily, it was said that the problem of assistance to New Brunswick for hydroelectric development was one thing that would have caused trouble. Where is the trouble there? We are asking for some financial assistance such as has been given to every other area of this country in some way or other. How about the St. Lawrence seaway? Is that project any different from another natural resource development?

In our province we are not going to benefit one bit from the St. Lawrence seaway, if I can say that in such a narrow way. It is going to take business farther inland. There is no question of the ports of the maritimes being assisted in any way. Yet we do not take any narrow point of view. We see that it is for our national development. The only point of view I take—and I digress a moment in connection with the seaway—is that we be given some information on it.

When this hydroelectric development plan was presented to the legislature in New Brunswick for the first time, a blackboard with the entire story was brought onto the floor of the legislature, all details were carefully gone into and it was explained fully. As this St. Lawrence seaway develops, and as changes are being made, I suggest that some method be devised by means of which all members can be completely informed about the whole business, instead of being given some coloured book on the St. Lawrence seaway authority or being asked to pass in the estimates some amount of $1 million or so and being told to question it. How can you question it? How can you find out anything about it?

There again I am getting away from our problem. I refer to the St. Lawrence seaway. I refer to the pipe line. I refer particularly to one other matter that I put in the same category, namely atomic power development in the country. When plans were lined up and we realized, perhaps a few years ahead of time, that there was some hope for nuclear development of power we in the maritimes—New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—naturally felt that we would be given the first choice. Here was the area in Canada that everybody said he wanted to help. Here was the area that had the labour, that had the initiative and that had everything except the power. We were told that on many occasions. But what happens when atomic energy comes around the corner? What do the central provinces do? By some devious method they either hinder our chance to take part in this development, or they completely exclude us from it.

Again there is an amusing and ironical element about the matter. They had edged us and coached us along. It is discouraging to see the way in which Nova Scotia, in their bid for hydroelectric power, was encouraged along. It had the first application in. It was told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at various times that it was being considered; it was given to understand that its application was first, or No. 1. But what happened? There again it went to industry in central Canada. With those three thoughts I leave this story.

In closing I should simply like to review what I have said today. I first of all pointed out that I am in hearty agreement with the optimistic view of the Minister of Finance in budgeting for a gross national product of $25¼ billion and the further opinion that we may reach $26 billion. I think he deserves considerable credit for taking this optimistic point of view.

I followed along by saying that in New Brunswick things are beginning to move. We definitely have a good optimistic mood down there now. We have a new government. They have tackled our economic problems in a sensible way. We have invested in ourselves, Mr. Speaker. That is something which a great many of the other areas of Canada cannot say. We have led in that investment in ourselves in the last few years, and I put the figures on the record for everyone to see.

While this is good, and while there is a future, I went on to say that we must take advantage of it and that we must roll along, because these things come only once in a lifetime. We were hopeful that the budget would provide some sort of regional financial assistance to the provinces, but there was nothing in it.

We must have power, Mr. Speaker, to develop our industries. We must have power to take advantage of the money we have invested in our province. Power for our new mining industries can only be developed by money lent to us by the federal government at a low rate of interest. The province of New Brunswick could go out tomorrow and borrow money on any market in the world, but we would have to pay around 5 per cent for it. Hydroelectric power developed on that basis is not good enough, in view of the higher costs involved in maintaining industry.

We came to Ottawa in a non-political, non-partisan, businesslike way. We thought we were being treated fairly, but what happened? We were given a complete run-around, in my opinion, and I am sure the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery) will join me when I challenge other members from the province who have not spoken on this matter to get up on their feet and tell us what they think about it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a statement made by the premier of the province when dealing with the motion to proceed with the Beechwood project on our own. In spite of the financial obstacles, our young members in the legislature have a clear, optimistic view of the project. These were the closing words of the premier's speech, delivered on March 25, 1955:

> The construction of Beechwood is a major undertaking and I want to make it clear that it is only being undertaken and able to be undertaken because the credit of the province under this administration is sound enough to allow construction to go ahead. We have offered everyone concerned a chance to share in this great enterprise but the fact remains that the province, under the leadership of this government, must now undertake it upon its own resources. That fact should not be forgotten when the record of this government is considered by future generations.

We are very hopeful about our future. We hope our proposal will still be considered, and that some official formal announcement will yet be made in this house. We all agree that the maritime economic council established a couple of years ago, a dream of the late Angus L. Macdonald, will have far-reaching effects on our economy. This council, which is to consider our industrial and financial development and present proposals in a united way for the first time, has a motto which expresses the hope that the maritimes will be a better part of a better Canada.

Mr. N. A. Matheson (Queens): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have spoken in the house since I was elected in 1953. I understand it is customary for members making their first speech to deal with matters pertaining specifically to their own constituencies. I want to talk about several phases of our economy in Prince Edward Island and tell you something about the excellent standards we have achieved in our primary products. I also want to say to the house that, although we are small in size, we have achieved top rank in the production of some of the very best products of this great country.

Before I go into that, may I make a general observation. I have noted with some concern a tendency toward sectionalism on the part of some in this chamber in their approach to problems that affect all of us as Canadians. I call this a great country, but how can it be great unless we, as elected representatives of the people, are broad-minded enough to have the interests of all the people at heart?

I know that the problems of my province do not directly affect many people in other parts of Canada. You have problems that do not affect my people, but all these problems affect the economy of Canada. Therefore, to that extent at least, I think all of us should have mutual interests. For example, I hear spokesmen for farm groups saying the farmers are not getting a fair deal and their rightful share of the national income. They protest that we do not appreciate the position of the farmer, his value in the national economy and his worth. I use the farm spokesmen merely as an example. I could have referred to any one of a number of other groups.

I am going to tell you something about the farming achievements of Prince Edward Island, but before I do so may I suggest that if some hon. members do not appreciate the farmers' problems it may well be the fault of those members who are the spokesmen for areas where farming is the dominant factor. It may be we have failed to explain the farmers' position and paint a true picture of his worth. We know that Canada needs a strong and growing agricultural economy, but have we made our urban friends aware of that fact?

Nobody is more conscious of some of the agricultural problems than I am. I know that many city folk fail to realize these problems. But I am not going to try to win the support of my urban friends by kicking them in the shins. I am not going to try to win their friendship and understanding by antagonizing them. I do not believe in carrying a chip on my shoulder when I am trying to sell my ideas to others.

May I, therefore, make this observation directed specifically to people in the city areas. Do not forget that you need the farmer. What would you and your families eat if he did not grow the foodstuffs that stock your great supermarkets? Do not forget that he often produces this food at a loss, or at a price that does not give him a working profit. Remember also that in producing the food he has to sell it at the price that somebody else wants to pay. Imagine a lawyer taking what his client wants to pay instead of the set fee which he demands and gets as his right. Imagine a merchant selling groceries, or clothing, or hardware or any other commodity for what the customer wanted to pay.

Before some of my city friends start throwing missiles at me, let me add that the farmer needs the city people just as much as they need him. If it were not for our great metropolitan centres, our smaller cities and towns, where would the farmer sell his products? I am not a farmer. I am a newspaperman, but I do own a small farm and live in the country. In that way I have kept closely in touch with the problems of the farmer.

If I may digress for a moment, I may say that for ten years I sat in the press gallery of our provincial legislature. I would feel much more at home in the press gallery here now than I do making my first speech in this chamber.

I speak of agricultural problems first because agriculture is the dominant factor in our provincial economy. My riding includes Charlottetown, our capital city and our largest centre. Therefore a large portion of my constituents are urban people. I have lived and worked among them for many years. But because we have no industries, as most of you understand the term, we depend for the most part on agriculture. We also have our fishing industry and our tourist business. Both of them are very important. I am not unmindful of the problems of city people because I have lived and worked among them for 20 years. In fact recently at home I have been in closer touch with urban groups than I have been with the farm people, and I have tried to keep in close touch with them throughout the years.

One problem causing concern in our area now is the potato trade between our country and the United States. As many of you probably know, we work on a quota basis. We are allowed to ship into the United States—I say "we" but it is mostly New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island that fill the quota—2·5 million bushels of seed potatoes and 1 million bushels as table stock. There is a rider to the agreement, which is based on the total volume of the United States crop, which sometimes gives us the opportunity of shipping an extra amount of table stock. But even under the quota we pay a duty of 37·5 cents per hundred pounds, and for amounts above the quota we pay 75 cents per hundred pounds.

Some years ago the United States was given permission to ship potatoes into our country duty free. There is one exception which I should mention, and I believe that refers to about one month during the summer when protection is afforded to the growers in the southern Ontario peninsula. With that one exception I do not think United States shippers pay any duty at all on potatoes shipped into this country.

A few months ago potatoes were rolling across the border from Maine in such a volume that both growers and shippers in my province and New Brunswick viewed the problem with grave concern. The matter was brought to the attention of the responsible people here, and I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance say in his budget speech that it will be turned over to the tariff board for their consideration. I know that tariffs are a difficult and complicated problem, but I hope the board can find some solution for our particular difficulty.

The potato situation at home right now is good. Some two or three weeks ago the price soared to $3.20 a bushel, that is the price to the farmer. It is somewhat less now, but it is still good. However, sudden price fluctuations are bad for any industry. The potato industry is no exception. At their peak they cause terrifically high prices to the consumer, and therefore discourage consumption. They are often likely to cause very heavy planting the following year. The results are sometimes chaotic and at times even disastrous.

But potato growing is only one phase of our farming program. I want to tell you something about our Yorkshire hogs. We have developed a special bacon type. The Canadian Press had a story last week concerning a new type of bacon hog that is being developed at the experimental farm at Lacombe, Alberta. The story says, in part, that they aim at faster maturing animals with more vigour. The dams are good mothers, the story says. The young pigs are bigger. It sounds like the sort of thing we have been developing for 30 years in our island Yorkshires. This is a big statement to make, but I am going to make it. We have the best bacon hog in this country. Here is the proof. It is from an official publication, and if anyone wants to check it, it is the Livestock Market Review, published by the marketing information section of the marketing service, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, Canada.

This information appears on page 87 and is given in some detail, but I have summarized it to save time. You will find that in 1953 our island breeders had 51·3 per cent grade A or the top grade it is possible to produce in bacon hogs. Nova Scotia had 43·1 per cent and New Brunswick 38·1 per cent. The others were far behind. Last year Prince Edward Island had 53·6 per cent. Alberta was lowest with 18·2 per cent. The results for the other three years were the same. Our province was well ahead. In 1951 we had 53·1 per cent in the top grade. No other province can touch our record in the production of top grade bacon hogs.

Here is further proof of the excellence of our island Yorkshires and the high value people in other provinces place on them. I am quoting from the Charlottetown newspaper, the Guardian, under date of April 22, 1955. The heading is "Demand exceeds supply for famed island Yorkshires". The article reads in part:

> "In the face of recent shipments of Yorkshire breeding stock from this province and in view of the expected requirements, our island breeders are not going to be able to meet outside demand", said Mr. H. W. Clay, senior livestock field man, production branch, federal Department of Agriculture, yesterday.

Mr. Clay is quoting from a letter written by Mr. Longman, deputy minister of agriculture in Alberta, to Mr. Frank Baker, western director of the Canadian industrial council of meat packers. Mr. Baker was in touch with Mr. Clay and the letter states in part —this is Mr. Longman speaking—

> The question is—how can we bring this about? Why is P.E.I. attaining the reputation it has with respect to hogs? . . . An examination of the P.E.I. situation might be extremely profitable to the farmers of Alberta . . . Alberta hog producers must adopt the principles and practices which have brought about the improvement in P.E.I.

That is the end of the quotation from the letter, but the newspaper article continues:

Within recent weeks breeding stock, mostly boars, has gone to the following destinations throughout Canada:

I have listed a few of them. There are Dorchester penitentiary, Grand Falls, Hartland, Harvey Station, and several other places in New Brunswick. There are Czar and Red Deer and Edmonton in Alberta. There are Dunnville, London, Bath, Chatsworth, Hawkestone and Brunner in Ontario. There is Gaspe in Quebec. Mr. Clay has stated that shipments outside the province over the same period of time have never been equalled. In addition to these, he says he is reasonably sure "that a party from Edmonton, Alberta, is coming back to the island in late May to purchase a carload, and only yesterday he received an inquiry from an Alberta farm organization regarding the possibility of procuring young boars". The demand has been so keen, according to Mr. Clay, that "there are practically no young boars available in the province".

This latter story concerns our registered, purebred swine and the demand that exists for them. The previous story concerns animals produced by our commercial breeders. Correlate the two stories and you have the answer to our hog supremacy in producing the type of bacon the discerning Canadian wants on his breakfast plate. The registered breeder of purebred swine furnishes the foundation stock for our top commercial herds. Our purebred swine are kept on a high level by the continuous testing that is done through the medium of advanced registry, under the careful direction of the Department of Agriculture. This is part of the service for which you and I, as Canadians, pay; but in our province we have made a little better use of it than they have elsewhere.

Let me illustrate. The term "carcass score" will not mean much to you unless you are familiar with it. The better the animal, the higher the score. It measures the prolificacy of the dam. It considers the liveability of the young. It measures the rate at which the litter reaches market weight. It checks the amount of feed required to produce a pound of bacon. It takes into account the type and quality of bacon that the test group produce when they go on the rail. The information is used to assess and evaluate the breeding qualities of the sire and the dam, the ability to pass on desirable qualities to their young. Desirable sires and dams are kept for breeding purposes, while the undesirable are destroyed.

[Mr. Matheson.]

It is as simple as the theory of natural selection, but in this case science and practical knowledge are used to speed up and intensify the selective process. I checked through official figures for 1952 and 1953, and I am quoting from a publication of the production service of the Canadian Department of Agriculture. Anyone who is interested can check what I am saying. I checked through the figures for 1952 and 1953. Last year's figures are not immediately available.

In 1952, for example, I found that in the whole of Canada there were only 22 sires that sired litters with scores of 90 or more. A score of 90 is most unusual. Fifteen of the 22 were bred in my province. There were 18 dams with scores of 90 or more. Twelve of them were bred in Prince Edward Island. Of many hundreds of dams tested, only four in all Canada had a score of 95. All of them were from our province. The figures for 1953 are almost equally significant. One animal sired two test litters that scored 95. Our numbers naturally are much smaller than the combined numbers of the other provinces, but we have by far the most top scoring animals, both sires and dams. Our commercial herds carry the blood lines of those outstanding individuals of proven value. It is easy to understand why our bacon grades are so consistently high.

My constituency of Queens is not usually considered a producer of top grade beef cattle, though we do have some top flight animals. But our fat stock show and sale, held this year, brought an average price of 28·88 cents per pound on the hoof. That was the best in eastern Canada. I do not know whether you can beat that in western Canada. My neighbour, Athol Roberts, of Southport, is the president of the organization. All the championship animals in this outstanding show came from my constituency.

I am happy about a new development in our Atlantic provinces. This was referred to by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell). It is called the Atlantic provinces development council. It has the blessing of the four Atlantic premiers and their governments, but it is being administered, fostered and financed by industry. I spoke a few days ago to Keith MacKinnon in Charlottetown, our island vice-president of the council. Here is part of what he had to say:

The formation of the Atlantic provinces economic council symbolizes "self help" for maritime business, and the prospect of a new deal for the economic life of maritime citizens.

It symbolizes leadership by the businessmen themselves in appraising their own problems. Through the research and technical facilities available, the idea is to work toward improving the production, marketing, and utilization of goods and services of these provinces by the sea.

The Atlantic provinces have played an important part in the building of Canada. Canada grew westward, and with the development of its vast resources and industries—waterpower, manufacturing, transportation, minerals, oil, gas and pipelines, grain, lumber and livestock—the spotlight has turned away from maritime business.

However, our resources are not depleted. Agriculture, fisheries, minerals, lumber and the untapped natural facilities for a profitable tourist and holiday trade, leave us much with which to prosper.

With this new instrument at our disposal we can put our collective minds to work at the task of finding new ways and bettering old, in making the best use of our resources to bring about that new prosperity that is surely our due.

Our government has made a fine start in economic development in my province. Premier A. W. Matheson and his government will be calling an election very soon. Their return is assured. They have the confidence of the people as no other administration has had for some time. They have earned that confidence.

Earlier this year Premier Matheson announced a program of industrial development designed to assist fishing and agriculture. It will also assist the urban people by providing employment. The government set up a fund to assist such development. Already one reasonably large processing plant is being organized. There is a possibility of a very large one coming into the province in the near future. Foods grown on the island will be processed on the island. This sort of thing could make a great difference; it could be a great boon to our economic development. For years they talked about rural electrification in our province. Premier Matheson set the plan in motion. I might say in passing that the premier is no relation of mine.

I have to strike one sour note at this stage. It concerns an important industry that was started two years ago in Charlottetown by two very fine young men. They produce Perfection brand condensed milk. It is a splendid product, which can compete in quality with any similar product produced anywhere. It has been doing that very successfully. Right now, however, the product is faced with a price-cutting campaign by a very large and very powerful company that has been selling condensed milk for many years.

The development of this plant has meant a good deal to our agriculture and to our economy in general. Further development of this local industry could mean even more. I do not know just how serious the threat to the Perfection people may be, but it is another example of how some of the big firms will try to squeeze out competition to maintain the monopoly they invariably seem so anxious to have.

I said that our fishing industry is important. Our lobster fishermen are now preparing for the opening of the 1955 season. Theirs is a difficult task. They are hardy and fearless men, these fishermen who brave the storms and the turbulent seas to wrest their living from the deep. They have come through many adversities. They have persevered in the face of discouragement and disaster. They deserve happier days. I am glad to note that there has been some improvement. New and modern processing plants make for a better product, and an increase in consumption should be the result.

I congratulate the Department of Fisheries upon the splendid advertising job they are doing through their fish kitchen in the west block. I recently attended a dinner there, at which my friend the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Fisheries was host. The meals they serve are attractive and delicious. If we could have fish served in our commercial eating establishments as it is served there we would have no worries about a market. We would eat our fish right here in our own country. Like all islanders I am very modest, but our island lobsters rank with the best anywhere in the world. The fame of our oysters has spread far and wide. We have other fish products that tempt the appetite of the discerning diner.

About a year ago I asked a question of my good friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters). It concerned the calling of tenders for a new federal building in Charlottetown. I remember the shouts of derision from across the way. They were good-natured shouts, but they indicated that nothing would be done. The minister indicated tenders would be called by the 1st of June. Work is progressing favourably, and the builders tell me the steel work will be completed the first week in May. I thank the minister and his departmental officials for their co-operation in several matters relating to this project. A modification of plans meant that work could proceed during the early months of the year, which meant employment for a number of people who otherwise would have been idle.

We talked for some time this session about unemployment. We talk of a "shelf of public works" to provide work. I shall welcome any work that is useful, but major projects do not provide nearly as much work now as they did in the past. Our federal building property covers half a city block. The site had to be cleared, and a huge excavation job was necessary. Before the development of today's power machinery it would have provided work for several hundred men for perhaps six months or more. The job was done in six weeks by a handful of men and some powerful machinery. This is a sample of modern efficiency, but I sometimes wonder just how far this development can go. One cannot make progress by turning back the hands of the clock, but the shimmering glimpses of future trends are sometimes cause for concern.

My thanks are due the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and his officials for their very splendid co-operation in the planning of a new car ferry between Wood Island in my constituency and Caribou, Nova Scotia. I have also received the utmost co-operation and courtesy from the members of the Canadian maritime commission and those associated with them. The target for completion of the new boat is the season of 1956. I await with a great deal of anticipation the day when the new ferry will be able to handle the traffic that develops at both ends of the ferry run.

My thanks are due also to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who interrupted his vacation last summer to speak at the 100th anniversary celebration at St. Dunstan's University, just outside Charlottetown. I am glad the genial minister found restful relaxation and wonderful swimming for a few days on the silvery sands and in the stimulating salt water along the north shore of my riding.

I hope many of you will visit Charlottetown this year to participate in its centennial program. The committee in charge have prepared a splendid program of fun and entertainment. In their name I invite you to visit this year the city where Canada was born. It was there in 1864 that the first discussion on confederation was held. There in the very room where the delegates met more than 90 years ago you can see the table around which they sat. The very chairs have been kept through the years. In the old visitors' book you can see the handwriting of Sir John A. Macdonald, who indicated his occupation as a "cabinet maker". It is an exhilarating experience to stand in the confederation chamber and think that here the fathers of confederation held their first momentous meeting. Here the history of our country was shaped.

I have in my room official invitations from the mayor of Charlottetown asking you to visit our beautiful city this coming summer. I shall have them distributed to you in the near future. They are novel and interesting. I hope you will keep them as souvenirs; but I hope you will accept the invitation and come to see us.

A few weeks ago the Canadian Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters honoured posthumously the late Colonel Keith Rogers. They conferred on him an honour given to pioneers of the radio industry. Colonel Rogers was indeed a pioneer in radio broadcasting in the maritimes and indeed in Canada. In honouring Colonel Rogers the C.A.R.T.B. honoured itself. It is interesting to note that a few days ago the governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation also approved a licence application for a television station in my riding. It will be known as CFCY-TV, and will be owned and operated by the estate of the late Colonel Rogers.

Now may I say a personal word of appreciation to my friends in this chamber who normally speak in French. Many of them have spoken in English this year so that we who are not bilingual could understand what they had to say. I deeply appreciate their courtesy. I hope that some day I may be able to converse with them in their language.

I appealed a while ago for sympathetic consideration and understanding of our mutual problems. I shall be a ready and sympathetic listener to anyone who wishes to discuss his problems. I have tried to learn something about their constituencies, and as time goes on I hope to learn more about them. Thus I shall become better acquainted with the problems of other areas as well as with those that confront my own people in Prince Edward Island, and particularly with those of Queens county.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this discussion I am not going to make any reference whatsoever to those phases of the budget speech by the Minister of Finance that had to do with fiscal policies. A great many members have already spoken on that aspect of his speech, some in condemnation and some in commendation. I want to spend what time I have on only one aspect of the minister's speech, namely his concluding remarks which can be found in Hansard at pages 2740 and 2741. I should like to recall to hon. members what he said on April 5 and what he must have thought of the important matter, because he concluded in this way:

> The government intends, therefore, to appoint a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. The sort of study we have in mind would include probable developments both in our productive capacities and in our external markets. It would include an examination of our population growth in both its regional and age distribution aspects. It would assemble information and speculate thoughtfully about the magnitude and nature of our future requirements for the great varieties of physical amenities which contribute to a steadily rising level of well-being.

He followed that up by saying:

> Wise and practical policies are founded on knowledge, inspiration and courage. The Canadian people have always demonstrated that they have inspiration and courage. I suggest we improve our knowledge that we may not fail to take full and proper advantage of the heritage with which Providence has so richly endowed this nation.

I think the work of this royal commission will do several things. It will focus public attention, here and abroad, in a rather specific and detailed way, on our prospects. It will gather together the considerable amount of material already in existence, but scattered in many different places, that throws light on these prospects. It will also promote and stimulate studies to fill the many gaps in essential factual material. It will sharpen our understanding of some of the problems we face, and will provide useful guides to governments and businessmen, and to leaders in all walks of life, in making plans and policies for the future.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, these concluding remarks of the Minister of Finance were the most important in his entire speech. I am very glad that at long last the government has come to a realization of the correctness of the socialist principle of looking ahead, of research and of planning. And in the words of the minister himself, we must have first of all knowledge, then vision and then the courage to act. I am glad to hear that a royal commission is to be appointed, to look ahead, to do research, to plan and make recommendations to guarantee the future well-being of all the provinces and of Canada itself. I sincerely hope that the report will not be pigeonholed and gather dust.

I can remember, sir, that it was my privilege in 1941 and 1942 to be a member of a royal commission that was called the British Columbia post-war rehabilitation council. We were told at that time by the legislature to examine the province of British Columbia, its economy, its industries, its potentialities, its needs, and to look ahead and try to come up with a plan.

It was a commission on planning appointed on a political basis. By that I mean all phases of politics were represented. As I recall it the chairman was the minister of education of British Columbia, a Liberal; another member became Speaker of the British Columbia legislature, and at the present time she is a senator from the province of British Columbia. Another member was a Conservative. He became an independent; then he became a Socred, and now he is sitting not far from here as the premier of British Columbia. It is worth while recounting that on that planning board of 1941 and 1942 I cannot remember one day or one discussion when politics ever came up as politics. A job was done and a report was made. I think it was a good one. My only regret is that it has never been acted upon. It is gathering dust somewhere in the archives of British Columbia.

I am glad to know that a federal planning commission is to be appointed, and I sincerely hope that when the report comes down it will not gather dust, but that it will be studied and acted upon. I desire to devote my time this afternoon to only one phase of that study. It is a phase which many of you may perhaps be rather amazed to hear discussed by me, but I believe there is a study that has to be made.

I want to make as a contribution just one recommendation. It has long been my thought and my conclusion that we in Canada, and particularly in western Canada, have been missing the opportunity for a multimillion dollar industry that has always been at our doorstep. In these present days of high unemployment—according to the latest figures 640,000 are out of work in the Dominion of Canada—the governments have failed to take advantage of our resources and establish a new industry. That is something of which we should be ashamed. But, though we have failed in the past, that is no reason for failing in the future, and I should like to recommend to the Minister of Finance that in his terms of reference to the royal commission to go into research and plan the economy of Canada for the future he include research and planning to establish what I think can become one of the greatest industries in this dominion. That is the health restoring industry.

It is unfortunate that the majority of us do not appreciate good health as long as we have it, but when we lose it there is not one thing on which we are more prepared to spend money than trying to regain our health. What applies to us as individuals applies to all individuals throughout the world. I have been interested in this matter now for some 15 years. Perhaps I should explain how I became interested, because you may think that, having been an electrician or for 22 years a member of provincial and federal parliaments, I am now entering the medical field. It is for this reason. Some 15 years ago, as an electrician, I was called in to see whether I could repair certain scientific machines which were used by naturopathic physicians. These machines were imported from Europe and were unknown in North America. They used static current and galvanic current and shortwave. As a result of tinkering around and trying to fix these machines I became interested in what they were used for. That led me into a study of natural health resources.

I did not believe all I was told. Two physicians who knew something about the use of natural health measures in combination with orthodox medical restorative health measures said to me, "You bring to our attention cases of which you know personally, and for which you are certain on the advice of medical men that nothing can be done, and let us see if anything can be done for them through the use of nature itself". I accepted that challenge, and since then I have been interested in the natural health resources of Canada. I myself have referred to the doctors people absolutely crippled with rheumatoid arthritis. One woman was under medical care and had to have nursing care 24 hours a day to move and feed her. After two years I saw that same woman getting around and looking after herself, crocheting and knitting.

I know the case of a passenger in an automobile, which skidded on the ice, went over a steep cliff and rolled over several times. One of the passengers badly tore all the ligaments of his chest. The medical advice was that he would have to be strapped for five or six weeks and be in pain most of the time. This was another good case to refer. Under what was known as the hormone peat treatment, instead of being strapped for five or six weeks before he could get up and go back to work, after 10 days he did not know that he had had an accident. I know that is true. I was the passenger in the car.

I could give you instance after instance, but I am just giving you these to illustrate how I became interested in the study. It is acknowledged throughout the world—not as a competitor with medical science but as a collaborator with medical science—that the greatest advances today are being made in the realm of natural medicine, or physical medicine. What does that mean? It means the use of the clinical nature of our hot springs, our cold springs, our radium springs, our saline muds and clays, our hormone peats, and so on. Nowhere in the world is there such an accumulation of natural health-giving resources in the way of hormone peats, saline muds and clays, hot springs, cold springs and radium springs as we have in the Dominion of Canada. Yet we have never used them or developed their full scale of health-giving potentialities.

I know we have the radium hot springs in the national parks; we have our Harrison hot springs. They are used to attract tourists or honeymooners—a place you can go either to get on a drunk or get off a drunk—but not in the main for their health-giving purposes. Banff is closed for the greater part of the year. Our own radium hot springs are closed for the greater part of the year. Yet, when they are open, what do we have there in order to utilize the health-giving resources of the radium hot springs? You do not have to ask me; ask the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott). Unfortunately a cripple, as he is, he goes there every year because of the help he can get there. Yet when it is open there is one physiotherapist and helper. For the majority of the year it is not open at all.

Perhaps you may think I am a visionary when I say that we have a multimillion dollar industry that we are ignoring. Let me say this. If the countries of Europe had the resources we have they would be using them. I should like to give you briefly a résumé of what other people are doing with their limited resources. Mineral springs have been developed in various parts of the North American continent as well as in Europe, based on the use of hydrotherapy, physiotherapy and electrotherapy. The state of New York operates one at Saratoga Springs. It is not only health-giving, it is not only self-supporting, but it returns a revenue to the state. But it is to Europe we must go to find industries based on health.

Before the war Germany was quite frank in stating the financial value of her natural health resources. They spent enormous sums of money on research and development, and the fact that the money was not wasted is shown by this one quotation from a government report. It says this:

> Many an erroneous idea of a philosophy estranged from nature had to be overcome for science and popular sentiment to combine so as to rediscover on a higher plane of knowledge the nature of medicinal springs and their functions. It is that common knowledge that makes the foundation for a sound development of Germany's medicinal springs in the interest of national business as well as in the service of mankind.

Let us go on from there and come back to North America. Just as a comparatively small illustration, on this continent we have Battle Creek which in less than 40 years has grown from a rural village to a great manufacturing centre whose products are almost entirely, directly or indirectly, built around the health centre itself.

Hon. members may be interested in learning that, according to the last figures I have, France has 186 official spas which have developed from villages of a few hundred population to great international health resorts. Germany, according to the latest figures I have—and of course they are slightly out of date now—has 212 official spas of first-class standing and many others that are not listed and, attached to these and to her universities, research institutions that have involved an outlay of millions of dollars.

Just to show the possibility of development around a spa or hot spring that has a curative value, may I say that in France there is a village which just prior to the first great war had a population of 75 to 100 people. Since the development of two small spas, one hot and one cold, it now has a population of over 2,000 with an annual attendance of 60,000 to 80,000 visitors in search of health. There are 14 large hotels and numerous furnished villas. It requires the daily attendance of 32 doctors, with all the technicians who go with them, to take care of those who come there from all parts of the world.

Another famous spa—and I want to mention this one because its name is well known —is at Aix-les-Bains. Less than 30 years ago the population was about 2,500. Now it is 12,000. It has 45,000 visitors each year in search of health. It has four springs, two hot and two cold. They are of the sulphur type. This spa caters in particular to rheumatic and arthritic cases, and it requires 32 physicians to deal with the patients, including nine specialists in various fields. The hotels have a total accommodation of more than 4,000 rooms, in addition to pensions and large numbers of beautiful furnished villas.

I wish to mention just one more, Mr. Speaker, because you also have heard of this one but have not perhaps understood what it means. One of the largest and most fashionable spas in the world is Baden-Baden, 590 to 820 feet above sea level. The therapeutic facilities consist of the salt springs and the grape cure. There are six large sanitaria, more than 50 hotels and a large number of boarding establishments and private villas that are rented by the season. It requires 75 doctors to staff the sanitaria. Of course it must also be remembered that an average of 20 to 30 trained technicians are required for every doctor at the sanitaria in addition to cooks, gardeners and so forth.

When we recognize the fact that all the great medical authorities in the world today are turning more and more to natural health as a corollory of orthodox medicine; when we recognize the fact that a great number of people who travel from Canada, the United States, Australia and New Zealand to Europe are not going there for the sake of tourism but are going there in search of health; when we recognize the fact that we here in Canada have the greatest collection of natural health resources in the world, I wonder why we do not do some research and develop Canada as the land of health.

As far as my own province of British Columbia is concerned, I am convinced that within a very few years that province and western Canada generally could be known as the health mecca of the world. It requires a little bit of vision. Certainly it requires research, which I think must be done on a governmental basis. It also requires proper planning. Surely it is not too much for us to be able to conjure up in our minds what it would mean if we made use of the God-given resources that are right at our door—even outside of health and outside of tourism —in construction, technology, new fields for medicine in this country, in maintenance and in a new market for the produce of the farmers. To me it is a "natural" going to waste.

Here on the Grand Trunk Pacific, a part of the Canadian National Railways, only 15 miles from Terrace which is now the junction point of the railway going down to Kitimat, we have the outstanding hot spring on the North American continent and, I think in the world, because it contains lithia. There are nine springs there. Only one is cribbed, but that one which is cribbed turns out 6,000 gallons of lithia water an hour. You need only go back to the writings of such famous medical men as Dr. Alexis Carrel or Lieutenant Colonel Dr. Samson of the physiotherapy branch of the United States army, to learn the use of lithia water in curing or helping people.

There it is, just 15 miles from a major centre on the Canadian National, pouring out its 6,000 gallons per hour with no use being made by the province and no use being made by the dominion of one of the great God-given, natural, health-giving resources in the entire world. If they had that in Europe—in France, in Germany, in Russia or in Switzerland—they would have a million-dollar concern right around that one spring.

I do not know the story of all Canada, but I know from my own personal knowledge of 30 hot and cold springs in the province of British Columbia. I know that we have millions of tons of what is known as hormone peat. I know of medical clays. I am sure my friend the Minister of National Defence can tell you as well as I of what the Indians can do with those clays and peats. It is almost miraculous.

There is the foundation for a new industry. I do not think people realize what we have. We have springs, hot and cold, in British Columbia. I am going to read off just what they contain, and medical men can tell you their medicinal value far better than can I. We have these right at our doorstep. These springs contain strontium sulphate, aluminum, hydrogen sulphide, calcium carbonate, calcium sulphate, magnesium carbonate, magnesium sulphate, sodium carbonate, sodium sulphate, sodium chloride, potassium chloride, lithium chloride, silica, iron and alumina. These are natural health springs known to science, and we, sir, do nothing about the matter.

I do not want to carry on beyond closing time tonight. I am convinced that we have a great natural industry at our doorstep. I am convinced that we have a multimillion dollar industry at our doorstep. I am convinced that with a little bit of attention and, to use the words of the Minister of Finance himself, research, planning and courage, we can make Canada the health mecca of the world. I am putting this forward as a constructive proposal, asking for the interest and support of hon. members.

They are not obliged to accept what I say. Let us have some research into the matter. Let us do some work on it. But I want to say this. To the best of my knowledge, throughout this country there is a great deal to offer in the realm of health not only to our own people but to the world. Doctors are more and more recognizing the need for changing altitudes and changing climates in matters of health. In our country we certainly have the changing altitudes. We certainly have the changing climates. We certainly have in almost every constituency the minerals, the springs, the fruits, the climates, the pine trees, the muds, the clays, the peats, the bogs, the alkalis and the sunshine that can be tied in, as I say, to build a great new industry.

This is my feeling as the result of years of study, of reading the words of the world's scientists, of having cases attended to when I was faced with a challenge; and as my contribution to this debate I should like to throw out the challenge at this time that we do something about the matter, starting now.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Speaker, I notice it is very close to six o'clock. Perhaps members would be agreeable to calling it six o'clock rather than having me start now and speak for only six minutes.

On motion of Mr. Enfield the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Campney moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 28, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN MONTREAL "GAZETTE"

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. In an editorial in the Montreal Gazette of Wednesday, April 27, 1955 headed "The 'Hearsay' was not 'Irrelevant'", there appears this sentence:

The next day, when Mr. Hamilton—

The reference is to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace.

—again introduced the matter, Mr. Pickersgill was joined by Jean Lesage, minister for northern affairs, Stanley Knowles, C.C.F., and John Dickey, Liberal of Halifax, in objecting to the use of newspaper stories in a debate.

In the interests of accuracy, and since it is well known that I am more in the habit of protecting members' rights to speak than in trying to restrict those rights, may I point out that when I spoke on the point of order on April 6, as recorded at page 2864 of Hansard, I summed up my remarks with this short sentence:

It seems to me that he—

The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace.

—is not out of order.

I am sure the Montreal Gazette would like to be more accurate than it has been in this editorial.

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO CANADIAN PRESS REPORT

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of a Canadian Press article in last night's Citizen headed "Diefenbaker's Charge Denied" and which reads as follows:

Calgary (CP)—A statement in the Commons that the C.N.R. has hired 1,000 immigrants in the Calgary area while bypassing men previously laid off was denied today by railway officials.

The statement was made Tuesday by John Diefenbaker, Progressive Conservative member of parliament for Prince Albert.

A C.N.R. spokesman said: "We have not hired 1,000 immigrants in the Calgary division—not at all."

The Canadian Press dispatch in question read that I had made the statement:

. . . C.N.R. employees are living in fear of lay-offs. In the Calgary area, those laid off were passed over recently when 1,000 immigrants were hired for extra gang work.

My question of privilege is simply this. I never made any such statement at any time. What I did say is reported in Hansard at page 3176:

Strong complaints have been made about R. F. Welch Limited, I think that is the name of the company. Mr. Gordon gave his promise that the things complained of would cease after March 31, but he did not say what year. Since March 31, 1,000 people who have been recently brought into Canada have been placed on two extra gangs out of Calgary, according to my information. What about the men who have been laid off? Why were they not given an opportunity, those who would be fitted for that work, to take this employment? A promise was given by Mr. Gordon that this was going to stop, that the injustices resulting from the hiring agreements of that company would be a thing of the past.

I put the emphasis on the word "that". My reference was to R. F. Welch Limited holding certain contracts with the Canadian National Railways, that this company had recently hired 1,000 men and had not taken into account unemployed section and maintenance men. My point of privilege is that the statement alleged to have been made by me, as reported by the Canadian Press, is not in any way in accordance with the statement I made in the house.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West) presented the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

C.N.R. PASSENGER CARS

Mr. Mitchell (London):

1. How many passenger cars of all types were delivered to Canadian National Railways in the years, 1952, 1953, 1954, which were manufactured by firms outside Canada?

2. By what company or companies were such cars manufactured?

3. Were tenders invited for any or all of such cars before the contracts were let?

Questions

4. Can any or all of these cars be manufactured on a competitive basis by Canadian National Railways car shops? If not, for what reason?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. 1952: 4—for United States lines of the Grand Trunk Western Railroad Company. 1953: 6—5 for United States lines of the Grand Trunk Western Railroad Company and 1 rail diesel car for use in Canada. 1954: 143—2 for United States lines of the Grand Trunk Western Railroad Company; 139 units of passenger equipment of various types for use in Canada; 2 rail diesel cars for use in Canada.

2. The rail diesel cars were manufactured by the Budd Company and the others by the Pullman-Standard Manufacturing Company and A.C.F. Industries Inc.

3. Tenders were invited for all of the above mentioned equipment, excepting the rail diesel cars of which the Budd Company is the patentee and sole manufacturer.

4. No. C.N.R. car shops are not equipped for the manufacture of these units.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Purdy:

1. What is the total number and amount of farm improvement loans made in the province of Nova Scotia from the inception of the act to December 31, 1954?
2. What is the aggregate amount of such loans still unpaid as at December 31, 1954?
3. What amount has been repaid during the above period by (a) original borrowers; (b) government?

Mr. Benidickson:

1. 4,456 loans in an amount of $3,889,110.

2. $1,371,841.

3. (a) $2,517,269 (b) $1,182.44,

P.F.A.A. CHEQUES

Mr. Castleden:

1. How many P.F.A.A. crop failure cheques had yet to be issued to eligible farmers in (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Manitoba, as of April 15 last?
2. How many P.F.A.A. cheques were issued to eligible farmers in each of these provinces, during each week between February 1 and April 9, 1955?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member for Yorkton is in the house at the moment, but I should like to call attention to the fact that it would be impossible to answer the first part of the question, which reads:

How many P.F.A.A. crop failure cheques had yet to be issued to eligible farmers in (a) Alberta; (b) Saskatchewan; (c) Manitoba, as of April 15 last?

[Mr. Mitchell (London).]

It is impossible to indicate how many remain to be issued. Up to the present time all the decisions have not been made as to who are eligible for payment. The second part of the question reads:

How many P.F.A.A. cheques were issued to eligible farmers in each of these provinces, during each week between February 1 and April 9, 1955?

The records are not kept in such a form as to be able to give an answer to that question. I wish the hon. member would drop the question now and reword it.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ESTIMATES—CHANGES IN DETAILS

Mr. Knowles:

1. With respect to how many votes in the estimates of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, were changes made in the details as printed in the book of estimates?
2. What is the number of each such vote the details of which were altered?
3. What was the date of treasury board authorization of each such alteration?

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to this question, I should like the answer to parts 1 and 2 to be considered as answers to an order for return. I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has agreed to drop part 3 until he has examined the answers to parts 1 and 2, which I am now tabling as an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return now tabled.

P.F.A.A. INSPECTORS—QUESTIONS ASKED

Mr. Campbell:

1. What questions are asked of farmers by P.F.A.A. inspectors?
2. Do they relate wholly to grain crops?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEEN ELIZABETH HOTEL—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF POLICY RE MANAGEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the report in various morning newspapers of an antitrust action which is being taken by the United States government against the Hilton hotel chain, will the government ask Canadian National Railways to reconsider the matter of arranging for the Queen Elizabeth hotel to be operated by the Hilton chain?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no. I should like to say that, as reported in today's issue of the Montreal Gazette, a statement was made yesterday on behalf of Canadian National Railways saying that the United States government action against the Hilton Hotels Corporation will not affect the contract between the railway and the hotel company.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the Minister of Transport to direct his reply to my question? I asked if, in view of the action taken, the government would ask the railway to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Marler: My answer to that question was no.

POSTAL SERVICE

BURNABY, B.C.—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF METROPOLITAN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): I should like to address a question to the Acting Postmaster General. Can he make a statement now with respect to the postal situation in East Burnaby, British Columbia?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, early this year representations were made to the effect that the Burnaby area should be treated as a postal entity. At the present time, North Burnaby and South Burnaby are served under the jurisdiction of the postmaster, Vancouver; East Burnaby is served under the jurisdiction of the postmaster, New Westminster. It was understood that it was the desire of the people of East Burnaby that they should be served in a similar manner to the people in the rest of Burnaby, namely from Vancouver. Based on this understanding, the department agreed to the change.

This change in service would affect the postage rates charged. At the present time the local letter rate of 4 cents applies to mail between East Burnaby and New Westminster. Under the rearrangement contemplated the rate would be 5 cents, but on the other hand the rate to Vancouver which previously had been 5 cents would be 4 cents.

No sooner had the decision been made public than representations were received from people in East Burnaby objecting to the change. From a practical post office point of view, I am informed, East Burnaby could be served either under the postmaster at Vancouver or the postmaster at New Westminster.

In view of these representations further consideration was given to the question, including representations heretofore made to the effect that there should be one metropolitan postal area comprising the territory served within the letter carrier delivery boundaries of both Vancouver and New Westminster. This would mean that the local letter rate of 4 cents would apply within this whole area.

It has been decided that the most equitable and efficient arrangement would be to establish a metropolitan postal area covering both the Vancouver and New Westminster postal districts. Vancouver and New Westminster will both continue to have post offices described by those names. There need be no change in the method of addressing or handling mails. It is essential, however, that there should appear in the address a positive indication of the locality in which the address is situated, otherwise delays will undoubtedly ensue. East Burnaby will be designated as "Burnaby 3".

The four-cent rate for the area will be effective from May 1, 1955.

Mr. Regier: Will it be sufficient for letters to be addressed "Burnaby 1", "Burnaby 2", or "Burnaby 3", as the case may be, without the additional identification of "via Vancouver" or "via New Westminster"?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. I understand that is the correct interpretation.

Mr. Hahn: Will the rural routes originating in New Westminster come under the four-cent letter rate as well?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the statement says that it applies to the letter carrier areas in the two places, which, I believe, include rural routes beginning in either.

SHIPPING

REPLACEMENT OF LIGHTSHIP AT HALIFAX BY NEW VESSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Have tenders been called for a new lightship to replace the old C.G.S. Sambro stationed off Halifax harbour? If so, when is work on the new ship expected to start?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Tenders have been called for a new lightship for Halifax. It is expected a contract will be awarded shortly, after which work will commence immediately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING LOSSES, NO. 11 WORKS COMPANY, R.C.E., VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Would the Minister of National Defence give the house a report on the alleged losses in connection with No. 11 works company, either now or in the near future?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I shall be glad to make a report on No. 11 works company as soon as the R.C.M.P. and the provost corps have completed their investigations. I am keeping in close touch with the matter, but they are still investigating a number of cases.

Mr. Fulton: Has it been possible to make any estimate of the total amount involved in the losses?

Mr. Campney: I would not care to quote any figure, but I think I can safely say that reports of the losses appearing in the press are greatly exaggerated.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can inform the house when the P.F.A.A. administration expects to be able to send the farmers the balance of the crop failure bonus cheques?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Just as soon as all of the appeals made have been taken care of the cheques will be issued accordingly.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND RUSSIAN GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the disclosure yesterday that there has been correspondence between President Eisenhower and Marshal Zhukov for the apparent purpose of arranging meetings, is the minister in a position to say whether or not similar correspondence has been taking place between the Canadian government and any representative of the Russian government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not know of any such correspondence.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

WORKS PROJECTS—INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF AWARDING TENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if contracts for works projects under P.F.R.A. are awarded by public tender. If not, will he state how they are awarded?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, contracts are let by public tender. There may be an occasional small job that is done by day labour, but practically all work is done by tender and the tenders are open to the public.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister of Labour explain what he meant by the words "professional unemployed" in a statement attributed to him and to Mr. Barrette in this morning's Montreal Gazette? The minister is reported to have agreed that 20 per cent of the total unemployed are "professional unemployed" and the words are within quotation marks.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I admit my bewilderment at once because I have not read the Montreal Gazette very carefully today and I have not seen the expression quoted by my hon. friend. I can tell him right away that I cannot recall having ever used the words "professional unemployed".

Mr. Knowles: I would hope not.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PETERBOROUGH—DISPOSITION OF OLD CUSTOMS BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the old customs house in Peterborough been turned over to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal as yet? The customs house has no further use.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Not to my knowledge, but I shall find out definitely and let the hon. member know later.

EDUCATION

VOCATIONAL TRAINING—CONTINUED PARTICIPATION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour which is of immediate concern to those in charge of planning education. Can he assure the house and the country that the federal government is not planning to cease giving assistance to vocational training in Canada?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): This matter will be discussed when my estimates are before the house, I am sure, but I can assure hon. members at once that the government and the Department of Labour are at present continuing in the field of vocational training exactly as they have done in recent years. The only change that has occurred during the last 12 months has been that long-term agreements with the provinces have expired, but we are continuing in exactly the same manner while consideration is being given concerning their renewal.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—PEEL COUNTY EXPROPRIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he tell me when I might expect the tabling of the order for return that was passed in my name on March 24?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Concerning what matter?

Mr. Pallett: Concerning the expropriations of lands around Malton airport.

Mr. Marler: I shall have to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

(Translation):

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, agriculture, offshore fishing and lumbering are among the chief means of livelihood of a great many people in the province of Quebec. More particularly in the eastern part, in Gaspe, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, the people are almost entirely dependent upon those three sources of income to live on or, in some cases, to achieve a modicum of comfort.

Indeed very few farmers of that area earn their living through farming alone, and few fishermen engage exclusively in fishing operations. Therefore, lumbering and the sale of pulpwood constitute a necessary if not indispensable adjunct to the family budget. Those three sources of revenue, sea, land and forest, can be said to constitute the very basis of the economy of the eastern part of the province of Quebec.

Last year, because of bad weather and of the heavy damage done to crops by insects, in various parts of the province, many farmers sustained irretrievable losses. In Gaspe, many of them even lack the necessary seed for this spring. I have received numerous and pathetic appeals for assistance from farm organizations and individual farmers of my constituency. But that problem is not a responsibility of the federal government.

However, due to the urgency of the matter and the pressing needs of the farmers of my county, I feel I must call this situation to the attention of the provincial authorities whose responsibility this is. Let me make clear, though, that these words of mine, and the statements I wish to make in the course of my remarks today, are by no means intended to embarrass the Quebec government.

It is a well known fact that, for several months, the farmers of this country, more particularly those from the province of Quebec, have been expressing alarm over the very important matter of the price of butter. Federal members from that province have received numerous representations in this regard, notably from the officers and members of the Catholic farmers' union. Personally, I have received some 1,400 letters on this subject.

The Quebec members in this house have joined hands in placing those pressing demands before federal authorities. Farmers of that province have thus received renewed proof of the fact that they have good friends here, on whom they can rely in emergencies.

The federal government has attempted to protect the Canadian farmer, and more particularly the farmer from Quebec, from the disastrous effects of a drop in dairy prices.

Price support on butter has once more been fixed at 58 cents a pound.

On behalf of the farmers of my riding, I wish to extend my sincere thanks to the government, in particular to the right hon.

Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for this wise decision which will be beneficial not only to farmers but also, indirectly, to everyone in Canada. When agriculture is prosperous, the entire country is also prosperous.

I said that a large part of the population of the province of Quebec earns its living from fishing. I must remind the house, however, that the value of the catch in that province for 1954 was 23 per cent lower than in 1953, and 29 per cent less than in 1952.

For instance, in the province of Quebec 35 million pounds of cod were caught in 1954. This catch, as it came out of the net, was worth $773,000.

In comparison with 1953, the amount of cod caught was 28·5 per cent smaller, the value 15·3 per cent less. A comparison between 1954 and 1952 shows that the amount of cod taken was down 39·5 per cent, and the sums paid to the fishermen, 45·6 per cent.

The herring catch, which had been 28,000 tons in 1952 and 24,000 tons in 1953, was down to 18,000 tons in 1954.

The salmon catch has also been seriously reduced in the last few years. The gradual disappearance of salmon from the Atlantic coast is such as to give rise to the most serious misgivings.

On the other hand, in the Magdalen islands, the total value of the lobster catch was up from $485,000 in 1952 to $703,000 in 1953 and $721,000 in 1954. But that is only one happy exception to the rule, and of no advantage to the other eastern districts of the province of Quebec.

Generally speaking, then, it may be said that in 1954 there was a serious reduction in the revenue of fishermen from the counties of Bonaventure, Gaspe South, Gaspe North, Charlevoix and Saguenay, compared to 1953 and especially to 1952.

Consequently, if on one hand some sections of the eastern part of the province of Quebec met with serious difficulties last year on account of excessive rain and of insects, on the other hand the income from our offshore fishing, especially for the past two years, has been sadly inadequate, and is greatly missed by our people.

The catch and the prices paid to fishermen have dropped so much that the total revenue of our Quebec sea fisheries is but $2,440,473 compared to $2,706,248 in 1953, and $3,088,448 in 1952.

I said just now that in the eastern part of the province, more particularly in Gaspe and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, the lumbering industry constitutes a necessary adjunct to the revenue of the people, more especially when farming and fishing fail.

Now, considering the serious conditions in agriculture and offshore fishing, which I just mentioned, farmers and fishermen of the province of Quebec, especially in the eastern district, who own woodlots had reason to expect from the sale of pulpwood a fair return which would have enabled them to support their families. On the contrary, even in that field, they have been shamefully exploited.

Considering the high cost of living, the cost of newsprint both on the national and international market, and the profits revealed in the financial reports of the pulpwood companies which are taking advantage of our natural resources, the ridiculously low prices paid in recent years, and last year in particular for pulpwood in the constituency of Bonaventure in the Gaspe peninsula, and in many other districts in the province of Quebec, are nothing less than an inducement to lawlessness.

I have here the results of investigations conducted during the winter by officers of the Catholic farmers' union in the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspe, on prices paid to pulpwood producers in the Gaspe peninsula.

Those investigations show that, in February and March 1955, prices as low as $10.50, $9.50, $8.50 and even $7.50 were being paid in the Gaspe peninsula for a cord of pulpwood delivered to the truck roads.

Do you know how much it costs to fell, saw or "bucksaw", as the lumberjacks say, and cart to the truck roads, often miles away, a cord of pulpwood cut on the average farmer's or settler's lot in the Gaspe peninsula?

Two good men, a good horse and ten hours of work a day are required to do the job.

It costs $2 a day to feed two men, and this is no exaggeration; and for a horse at least $1. For a good horse, the value of a day's work is $3, which makes a total of $6.

That means that when pulpwood is paid $10 a cord, delivered alongside the truck roads, there is left only $4 in net revenue to be split between two men. It also means that not only do the pulpwood producers in eastern Quebec have to be content with a measly salary of $2 a day, for ten hours of hard work, but they are practically giving their wood away to the shareholders of pulpwood companies, the majority of whom are quite often foreigners.

And when pulpwood is paid $7.50 a cord, alongside the truck roads, as was the case last winter in certain parts of the Gaspe peninsula—and I have proof of it right here—we find, on the basis of the same figures, that those two men net only 75 cents each a day, which amounts to about 7½ cents an hour, on which to raise a large family.

When I see some printers of the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir, who already get a salary of $4,000, $5,000 and $6,000 a year, go on strike, I really wonder what they would do if their situation was that of the woodcutters and the pulpwood producers in the province of Quebec.

Some will say that, with modern equipment —which our woodcutters are not always able to get—two men can cut more than a cord of wood in a day. Of course they can, if this wood is cut on company limits, right in the middle of a virgin forest and close to the river down which the wood is floated. But not so on the woodlots of the farmers and settlers of the Gaspe peninsula, where the trees are sparse and have to be hauled long distances to the truck road during the winter, or even in the mud during the fall and spring.

From 75 cents to $2 a day for a man who works hard, often from morning till night, to raise a large family and try to make both ends meet! And things have come to such a pass in this twentieth century, in a Christian country which is often held up as an example for other countries of the world, in a democratic country which earmarks billions of dollars for the defence of our way of life, of that way of life, and especially in a province which claims to be in the vanguard of the fight against communism.

I say that our woodcutters and settlers in Quebec are not immunized against the seeds of revolutionary and communistic ideas, and I would add that the wonder drug that would immunize them has not yet been found. Let our industrial leaders take heed and consider seriously their responsibilities before it is too late!

For, by enriching the foreigners who are taking advantage of our natural wealth while making capital out of indigence, the suffering and even the despair of our people, we sow the most fertile seed of revolution and communism to be found in the country.

Thus some capitalists, blinded by greed, avarice, or sheer stupidity, are acting as the best promoters of Moscow in our midst.

Communism! They are the ones who, by their unfair practices, arouse communism in the minds and hearts of our people. And unfortunately, those exploiters are beyond the reach of the padlock law.

Our own Canadian forests, the woods of Quebec, our own province and, in particular, those of the Gaspe peninsula, were not created by the Lord for the sole benefit of Threadneedle street, Wall street, Bay street or St. James street.

The lumber industry is one of the most important in the province of Quebec, if not actually the most important. The pulp industry, in particular, is an essential factor of our economic and social structure. It directly affects the standard of living of a large part of our population.

Lest we take for granted that the province of Quebec has become the colonial empire of a few privileged rich men, the development of our natural resources, of our forests, should first and foremost assure the subsistence and welfare of our population in Quebec.

If there is a field in which Quebec should be autonomous, it is that one, for our provincial government has the sole jurisdiction with regard to our forests, and our lumber industry within the province.

As a matter of fact, lease permits either for settlers' lots or wooded lands are granted or refused by the provincial government.

The only authority entitled to grant timber rights to individuals or companies is the provincial government. It is the provincial government that collects cutting fees. It is also the provincial government that has established the ceiling price to be paid by the owners of provincial newspapers for their newsprint by direct representations to the companies. In view of the uncompromising attitude of some pulp companies in their transactions with the lumber producers, and of the extreme unfairness they show to the farmers and settlers of the province of Quebec, in spite of the solemn warning that was given to them in this very house, by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) and in the very words of the premier of Quebec, I believe it to be the duty of the government of that province to intervene with regard to the establishment of the floor price to be paid the farmers and settlers for their pulpwood.

The provincial government has the power to fix a maximum price for the newsprint sold to the newspaper publishers of the province. By the same token, it should have the right to fix a minimum price to be paid to settlers and farmers.

Because we live in the province of Quebec we should not have to pay more taxes than elsewhere. Because we live in the province of Quebec we should not be paid lower salaries than elsewhere. Because we are from the province of Quebec we should not be forced to sell our products more cheaply than elsewhere, pulpwood in particular.

This situation, Mr. Speaker, has lasted all too long. There is no reason in the world why a cord of pulpwood cut in Gaspe should not fetch as high a price as a cord of pulpwood cut in Ontario or on the Pacific coast.

I might add that a cord of pulpwood, which often costs as much as $25 to $35 delivered at the mill, when it has been cut on company limits and floated or hauled over long distances, should be worth at least $15 when delivered to truck loading points on roads by our farmers or settlers: not $7.50 nor $8, but $15.

Therefore I say that a minimum price of $15 a cord should be set right away throughout the eastern region of the province for pulpwood bought from farmers, settlers or other producers.

I do not mention any figure for the other parts of the province as I am not familiar with conditions there.

But I do know that since 1952, because pulpwood has been paid from $5 to $7 a cord less than should have been paid to our farmers and settlers, at a time when the price of newsprint kept going up and the profits of pulpwood companies kept piling up, the people of the Gaspe peninsula and of eastern Quebec have been cheated out of some $2 million a year. Thus the benefit of family allowances generously distributed to the families in those regions by the federal government has, to a large extent, been cancelled out.

Such a highly unjust situation must be met with an immediate remedy. Here is what I should like to suggest:

1. I propose that the inquiry which the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) has asked the Department of Justice to undertake with respect to the Gatineau valley under the Combines Investigation Act be extended to every region of the province of Quebec and particularly to the Gaspe peninsula.

2. I respectfully urge the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, and the members of his government, to pass an order in council fixing the minimum price to be paid to pulpwood producers in the province of Quebec. Such a minimum price would have to be at least $15 a cord, delivered at a truck loading site, for the eastern part of the province.

3. As a citizen of the province of Quebec, I respectfully urge the Quebec provincial legislature to adopt at its next session a legislative measure which would empower the minister of lands and forests of the province, among other things, to:

(a) investigate prices paid to farmers and settlers for pulpwood cut in the province on wooded lands or licenced lots;

(b) issue regulations governing the establishment of the minimum price to be paid to producers for pulpwood; concerning the measuring of the wood and the quantity of pulpwood to be bought each year from settlers and farmers, taking into account their other sources of supply and their needs;

(c) issue any other regulation to safeguard the interests of wood producers within the province of Quebec.

Before resuming my seat, I repeat that the remarks I have just made must not be interpreted as an attack either against the wood dealers, or the pulp companies or the provincial government.

I attack nobody in particular and I lay no charge whatsoever against anybody.

I am only stating facts that have lasted long enough, conditions I believe it is my duty to reveal and proclaim, and which I shall denounce and proclaim as long as they have not been efficiently remedied.

As a farmer's son, I know from my own experience how strenuously our men must work to support their families.

I also know, from personal experience, that a lumberman, a farmer, a settler or lumber producer, be he from the Gaspe peninsula, from the north shore of the St. Lawrence or the Gatineau, deserves as fair a compensation for a good day's work as any other Canadian, from any other part of our country, in a similar profession.

(Text):

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) on his first budget. I am glad to note that the minister is an optimist, because that is a state of mind that is always good to have in a country like Canada. I hope the gross national product for this year turns out to be as high as his estimate.

As far as the budget is concerned, there have been some tax reductions. While the minister decided to make these reductions in the income tax they really do not amount to very much, as has been pointed out, to the average family. The total saving will be only 40 or 50 cents a week, which I do not think will buy many refrigerators or other appliances.

I suppose we should all be thankful for any reduction in taxation, however small it may be, but the result of this reduction is that those who need a tax reduction most are receiving the least benefit. I refer to those whose incomes are so small that they are not taxable at all. The only way those people can be benefited is by removing the sales tax from essential commodities. I do not suppose that would make any great impression on the mind of the public, at least not as much as a reduction in the income tax even though it is not very large. However, in his next budget the minister may consider removing the sales tax from such commodities, as it will then be a little closer to election time.

There are three aspects of the budget with which I should like to deal briefly. The first is the failure of the minister to remove the sales tax from stationery and other essential supplies used by welfare organizations such as the Red Cross. the cancer society and so on. Representations on behalf of these organizations have been made in this house in other years and on other occasions, and I cannot help but feel that it is perfectly ridiculous for people to donate to these organizations and be able to deduct their donations from their taxable income, then have the government turn around and make these welfare organizations pay the sales tax on necessary supplies, stationery, advertising material and so on.

The second matter with which I should like to deal concerns the druggists of this country. Representations were made to me earlier this year which I passed on to the minister. I understand that other hon. members and various associations have also made representations to the minister in this regard. In this connection I should like to read a letter which was sent to me by the retail pharmacists' association of Woodstock, a small city in my riding, which I think sets out the situation very cogently and concisely.

Dear Sir,

We the retail pharmacists' association of Woodstock wish to present a brief on a subject which has been causing us increasing concern during the last year or so. In recent months the problem has become increasingly acute and shows every indication of becoming a very real point of contention.

During the last year or so this association has expended considerable time, money and energy to make it practical and advantageous to the medical practitioner and his patient for the doctor to write prescriptions to be dispensed by the pharmacist rather than dispense medicine from his own office.

Our endeavours in this respect have met with considerable success but we now find that we are being stymied to a great extent due to the following situation.

The new modern drugs in use by the medical practitioner are quite expensive, prescriptions running from $5 to $15 are no longer uncommon. If these prescriptions are filled by the doctor in his office, they are deductible as a medical expense for income tax purposes. If however the doctor writes a prescription and it is filled by the pharmacist the patient cannot then claim the cost as a deduction on his income tax.

As a result of this inconsistency we are finding that local doctors in sympathy with their patients who are in need of expensive medication are handing out these medicines in their offices. In addition we have also been advised that patients are asking their doctor to supply expensive medication when required, rather than give them a written prescription for the pharmacist to fill.

We believe the situation as it exists at the present time causes definite discrimination against the pharmacist and that it merits the sincere consideration of the income tax department. Why should the same prescription be income tax deductible when the doctor fills it and not be deductible when the pharmacist fills it?

I omit the remainder of this letter, which is not particularly relevant to the point. The letter is signed:

Woodstock retail pharmacists' association
M. A. Bernath, president
Gordon Reinhart, secretary

I do not think it is necessary for me to make any further comment on this matter, as I think it has been expressed neatly in this letter of the association. I hope the Minister of Finance will consider this matter, if not this year then perhaps next year.

The third item with which I should like to deal refers to the present monetary situation in the country, under which prices are decidedly inflated. I want to refer to the effects of these inflated price levels upon older persons who are in receipt of relatively small pensions, or who are living on small fixed incomes. I think all hon. members realize that elderly people, whether they be living on small fixed incomes or on pensions, cannot save very much with the present prices of necessities such as food, clothing and so on.

These high prices also affect young married couples, who quite often find it impossible to save anything. I notice in an article in the paper the other day that instalment buying is at the highest level in the history of the Dominion of Canada. I submit that this practice has been aided and abetted by the government. I do not say that it is necessarily wrong, but the buying of N.H.A. houses, war veterans housing and so on on the instalment plan gets people into the habit. When people buy houses under these plans they find they need furniture, and that is also bought on the instalment plan. Then they need a television set and a car and everything else.

In a country as wealthy as Canada people are entitled to these things. As things are at the present time they have to buy them on the instalment plan or wait perhaps 50 or 60 years before being able to buy a car or some furniture which they would like to have. It may be extravagant, but these young people feel that they should have these things if at all possible. As a result of this instalment buying many young married couples are not able to save any substantial amount of money for a rainy day, and things are still worse should the breadwinner happen to die.

There are a number of hon. members in this house who are in the legal profession. I am quite sure many of those hon. members will have come in contact with that situation as I have myself. Dependents of elderly persons and dependents of young married persons who die are often left destitute, except for the various public welfare schemes which the provincial and federal governments have in force. Very often you have a young married man—it does not occur too often, fortunately, but I have seen such cases—who belongs to a lodge. The lodge may pay funeral expenses; it may be one of these mutual benefit schemes. Then the wife and two or three children are left with the house, and a great many instalments to pay on it and the furniture, the car, and the television set. They are left with instalments to meet every month and no money to do it with except family allowances or, in certain provinces such as the province of Ontario, mothers' allowance.

That is hardly a desirable situation. Not only does it occur with young people but, as I have mentioned before, it occurs with elderly people who have been unable to save too much and who have retired on small fixed incomes and on pensions. To help this situation I suggest for the consideration of the minister that premiums on straight life insurance policies up to $10,000—that is the amount of the policy, not the premium—if these policies are payable directly or indirectly to the dependents as defined under the Income Tax Act, that such premiums be allowed as a deduction from the taxable income.

Statistics are difficult to obtain with regard to the number of life insurance policyholders in Canada, and it is impossible at the present time to obtain statistics with regard to the types of life insurance the policyholders hold, whether it is term insurance, straight insurance, twenty-pay life or some other form. It is also impossible at the present time to find out how many heads of families are policyholders. The department of insurance and the dominion bureau of statistics have no statistics available in this respect.

However, I was able to obtain some figures on this matter. It appears that Mr. A. Bruce Matthews, president of the Canadian Life Insurance Officers Association, in a recent statement set out that there were approximately 5,500,000 life insurance policyholders in Canada at the end of 1954. This is out of a population of 15 million. It must be remembered that by no means all those policyholders are heads of families. They are married women, very often, and very frequently young children have policies put on their lives at an early age in order to get the lower premium, and so on.

I have some further figures that I think are relevant. In 1951—and these figures are in the 1954 Canada Year Book—Canada had a population of approximately 13,600,000. In that total population there were 3,287,384 heads of families. In 1955, with the increase of our population to approximately 15 million, the number of heads of families must have been increased considerably. As a result of these figures the conclusion that must almost necessarily follow—and it is the opinion of various life insurance executives with whom I have talked, both senior and junior—that there must be a great many heads of families in Canada at the present time who do not carry any type of life insurance.

Another point that is interesting in this regard is that in 1951 the median income for the head of the family in Canada was $2,345. As most hon. members know, the median is a type of average. It is not an arithmetical or geometric average, but it is the picking of a figure out of the centre of a group of other figures. It is a type of average. In any event, as I say, in 1951 the median income for the head of a family in Canada was $2,345. This figure again was obtained from the dominion bureau of statistics. If that is the median income of the head of the family in Canada, it hardly allows for much saving with the present high rents, cost of consumer goods, and so on.

The normal cost—and when I say "normal cost" it does not envisage any unusual situation as to health, occupation or anything of that nature—of $10,000 of straight life insurance for a man age 30 is $213 a year in premium; at age 35 it is $250; at age 40 it is $294. For younger people, of course, it would be less and for an older person it would increase proportionately. If this amount were allowed as a deduction from taxable income, I do not think it would make a great deal of difference in the revenue which the government would have, but it would undoubtedly encourage the purchase of life insurance by people who should have it.

If the breadwinner of the family should die, $10,000 would protect the family for a considerable time and would save them immediate financial embarrassment. That is only the immediate effect. It would also give the dependents a much greater measure of security for the future, and it would cut down certain public welfare charges such as mothers' allowances and so on.

In addition to that—and most important of all, in my opinion—if when the breadwinner died the family were to get $10,000 plus family allowance in some cases, or the old age pension at the other end of the scale, this would make the difference between bare subsistence, as is the situation at the present time in many cases, and moderately comfortable living such as the families of our young married people and our old people deserve.

If the government or rather the minister should, as I have suggested, under the conditions I have suggested, allow insurance premiums on policies to $10,000 to be deducted from taxable income, I am not suggesting for a minute that everybody would go out and buy life insurance, but I certainly think it would encourage them to do so. If the minister would consider doing this at some future time, I should like to see it tried. I think it would help to remedy a situation that needs to be remedied.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with hon. members who have congratulated the Minister of Finance on his budget. He has done exceptionally well, and his budget has been received by the press and by the people of Canada as a good budget which gives hope to the businessmen and all the people of this country.

The accomplishments of the government are so numerous and so vast, Mr. Speaker, that it would take a long time to touch on each subject. There is, however, a matter with which I should like to deal today. I refer to the social legislation of the government, which is improved at every session. Few people realize what great sums of money are paid each year by three departments, namely the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the unemployment insurance commission which comes under the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). For instance, the amounts in the estimates for the current year are as follows:

1. National health and welfare ..	$ 849,736,017
2. Veterans affairs	234,477,896
3. Unemployment insurance (benefits paid to claimants)	174,730,279
Total expenditure	$1,258,944,192

These figures mean that each year the government is spending much more than a billion dollars in pensions and their administration. I wish to pay special attention to the welfare division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The national health branch of that department spends $56,229,456. The welfare branch has a much heavier expenditure of $785,241,681, and for civil defence there is an amount of $7,001,024, making a total of $848,472,161. This does not include costs of administration.

With regard to family allowances, the amount in the estimates is $383 million. For old age security payments there is $367,600,000, for old age assistance $22,100,000, for blind persons' allowances $3 million, and for disabled persons' allowances $6 million. The increases in 1955-56 over 1954-55 are $17,600,000 for family allowances, $11,750,000 for old age security payments, $500,000 for old age assistance and $6 million for disabled persons' allowances, making a total increase of $35,850,000 this year over last year. This includes allowances to disabled persons who are very dear to my heart, because I deeply sympathize with those who have suffered so much that they are invalids and cannot live normal lives. I congratulate the minister and the government on reaching an understanding with the provinces to pay pensions to invalids.

The amount of $35,850,000 represents the increase this year over last year. As I said before, the total expenditure of the Department of National Health and Welfare is nearly $850 million this year. It will be more than that with the supplementary estimates which will come before us before the end of the session.

In March, 1954, there were 4,942,044 children receiving family allowances. It is enormous when we think of it. In my county, for instance, the amount paid each year to the mothers for their children is about $2 million. There are 686,127 old age security pensioners in Canada, 93,273 old age assistance recipients and 8,214 people receiving blind persons' allowances. This means that in this country there are 5,729,658 people receiving a pension of some sort out of a total population of some 15 million people, and this figure does not include the disabled persons who have only been receiving allowances for a short time.

The government deserves to be warmly congratulated for having understood that in these years of the progress of human understanding it is necessary for the government to divide the wealth of the country in such a way that the less fortunate may have an opportunity to enjoy the comforts of life. To what extent? The extent is limited by the ability of the taxpayers to pay. And this is not all. This is the share of the federal government in a certain field where the provinces make other expenditures.

For instance, family allowances to mothers for their young children under 16 are paid entirely by the federal government at Ottawa. Old age pensions are paid 50-50 by the federal government and the provinces. Allowances to the blind are paid 75 per cent by Ottawa and 25 per cent by the provinces. Out of each dollar paid to the old people and the blind Ottawa pays more than 91 cents. Pensions to the disabled will be paid 50 per cent by Ottawa and 50 per cent by the provinces. Pensions for people 70 years of age and over are entirely paid by Ottawa, and the allowances paid to those between 65 and 70 are paid half by the provinces and half by Ottawa.

I am very pleased that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has been successful in reaching an agreement with the provinces respecting the payment of allowances to disabled persons or invalids. It is important to note that these pensions are administered and paid by the provinces, who then receive a refund of half the amount of the pension from Ottawa after it is paid. This is a very considerable expenditure.

I am not so very old, but I remember the time when there were no old age pensions or family allowances. There was nothing of that kind. It is not only that the provinces are doing their share. They pay a certain proportion of the old age pension, of the pensions for invalids and for the blind. They pay a pension also to needy mothers, and they pay a lot in workmen's compensation. They have many other social undertakings which are very helpful to the people of Canada. I am very glad that the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces are working hand in hand to improve the social conditions and health of the Canadian people. Naturally it cannot all be done at one time.

Twenty-five years ago, when old age pensions were first introduced in this house, nobody would have believed that needy people between 65 and 70 would receive a pension. They would have raised their shoulders if one had told them that nearly five million children would receive family allowances. They never would have believed it. They would have found it incredible. To the blind we are most sympathetic, but it took some time to get pensions for the blind. Their case was argued in the house and in the press and people were sympathetic to them, but it was done gradually. We have reached a point unequalled in any country in the world. There is no country that has as complete social legislation as Canada has.

I congratulate very warmly my neighbour and friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who has worked so hard to have his point of view accepted by the government and by this house. I am very proud of him and of the officials of the health department of Quebec, especially Dr. Jean Grégoire and Dr. J. C. Beaudet, whom I know very well. Dr. Beaudet was with the health unit at Riviere du Loup before becoming assistant deputy minister in Quebec city. They have done a lot for the people of our province. I am not going to dwell on that because I want to speak particularly about the welfare side of the question. I am not so familiar with the welfare department in Quebec, but it has come to my knowledge that there are many cases in which they have done well for people who were ill.

Now, sir, what I have said is something that is general knowledge. What the government has done has not been done for political purposes, but it has been done in the good Samaritan way, just to give a hand to the needy; to the mothers of large families; to old Canadians who had the benefit of long lives and who needed some support in their old age; to the blind, who deserve every consideration; and to the invalids. Perhaps the invalids should have been looked after earlier, but better late than never. In this case the amount paid in family allowances and old age pensions was so high it was impossible to do it all at once. All this deserves special consideration.

I am greatly surprised when some people who are heartless, who are intriguers, use propaganda to try to double the old age pension. This is a thing I cannot understand. I am in favour of as high an amount as possible being paid to the mothers of large families. Everybody is. But there is a limit that cannot be exceeded, and it is the ability of the taxpayer to meet the expenditures. Very often we have suggestions from gentlemen who want certain large expenditures made but who, at the same time, ask for a reduction in taxes. This is a thing I have never understood.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker? Would he not have said that during the war, when the proposal was first made to introduce family allowances, it might have been argued that Canada was at war and we could not consider introducing family allowances? Would the member comment on that?

Mr. Pouliot: Well, during the war the expenditure was so large that it was unbelievable, and the purpose of the war expenditure was to protect not only Canadian children but all the Canadian people from attacks by the enemy. This was why all the money spent during the war was used for that purpose. Unfortunately the allowance was delayed. I regretted that. But if my hon. friend looks at Hansard he will see that I, along with others, made speeches in favour of this measure. I refer to the hon. members for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Blanchette) and for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand). It was because of the repetition of our requests that finally it was granted. I must remind the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) also that the thing that touched me very deeply was the very kind words of the minister in the house, when he said that I had been among those members who had insisted the most upon pensions for invalids.

All this has been done, and as I have said it comes gradually. Is it possible to increase it? My hon. friend says yes. Perhaps he is right. He is right if he finds expenditures that can be dropped or new taxes that can be imposed on the Canadian people. If he found new taxes that were popular and that would be accepted by the Canadian people, he could increase the family allowances; otherwise he could not. If he thinks about it he will realize the soundness of my argument. The government is well disposed to give assistance to large families. There is no discussion about it. On the other hand the government cannot impose taxation so heavy that it would destroy trade and business in Canada. If we are to have revenue it must come from business in general, and business must prosper if we are to be able to pay taxation.

It is a very difficult problem, and my hon. friends should be careful when they are discussing it. There are some people who make a comparison between the indemnity of $8,000 plus the $2,000 for expenses paid to members of parliament and the amounts paid for family allowances, old age pensions and things of that kind. In the first place the indemnity of $10,000—and this sum includes the expenses—paid to members of parliament represents so small a fraction of the money spent for social welfare purposes that it is quite infinitesimal. But we do not hide it. We accept the $10,000. Are we worth it or not? That is for the people to judge. The amount of salary paid to anyone out of public moneys is not like the ages of women. It can be known; it can be disclosed. I feel no shame when I go tomorrow to get my cheque, because most of it I spend among my constituents. They get the money, and that must be the same with all hon. members.

There are some persons who agitate that the indemnities paid to members of parliament are too high. But what do they receive, themselves? I would refer to l'union des électeurs de la province de Québec, the Quebec Social Crediters. I call them crazy; they abuse me, but it makes no difference. Very often when I drive along in my car small dogs bark as the car passes, but they do not follow the dust of the car very long. And I attach no more importance to it than that. But when I see members of municipal councils who are credulous enough to send me resolutions prepared by impostors, asking that we double family allowances without increasing taxation—well, I say this is the time to tell them to stop. It is the time to open the eyes of the people, and I am going to do so.

I say that the editor of the monthly Vers Demain and la cantinière are exploiters of public credulity. They are impostors. Their idea is not at all—and I wish to be well understood when I say this—to have family allowances doubled; it is to double the circulation of their papers, which is something entirely different. And I have some proof of this. One of the conquerors was silly enough to send me the receipt he gives to those who subscribed to Vers Demain. Naturally it is yellow. The ordinary subscription to the paper is $2, or 24 months for $4; and if one wants to become a member of the chamber of Social Credit, it is $10 a year. They get that money.

A highly respected gentleman in the province of Quebec, Mr. Abel Marion, president of the Catholic farmers' union, has authorized me to tell the house that once he held meetings at La Sarre and Abitibi, at which there were some white caps present to make trouble. He canned them, tamed them, by telling them, "We have come here to render our accounts. You never have any accounts rendered to you by the heads of l'union des électeurs de la province de Québec, and there is not only a subscription to the paper but there are also the collections taken after each meeting."

Where do the collections go? I do not know, but it is easy to guess, when we think that some years ago the editor of Vers Demain lost his bank book and there was $41,000 in it to his credit—collections for Vers Demain, collections from the credulity of the naïve people who are silly enough to give them money. It goes to support la cantinière or Vers Demain. That is a fine scheme; it is a racket.

They behave like the witnesses of Jehovah. They have the same tactics, and that is the reason I tell them to get out of my office. They came, just as the witnesses of Jehovah came; so much so that when I saw an old man with his white cap coming to my office I said, "Are you a witness of Jehovah?" He said, "No, I am a Social Crediter from Quebec." I said, "Well, I understand there is no difference between them."

To prove that I am right I shall go one step further. In L'Action Catholique of March 23 last it is stated that the Social Crediters of Quebec, I mean the white caps—who have nothing in common with my hon. friends from Alberta—met together to honour the editor of the monthly, Vers Demain, on the occasion of his 70th birthday anniversary with 500 new subscriptions to that paper. It was a gift. And what was the reason for the gift? The reason was that it is the purpose of l'union des électeurs to have 100,000 subscribers to Vers Demain. But it fell flat. They did not have as many as that. It fell so flat that some of the conquerors have resigned. They told Louis Even and Gilberte Côté that it was a racket, and that they were not going to belong to it any longer, with the result that they have lost rather than increased subscribers. In one of the last editions there is a figure of 4,025 new subscriptions. It is a fake; it is untrue. Did they lose 4,000? Perhaps but they surely did not gain 4,025, because I was credibly informed that subscriptions to the monthly Vers Demain are on the downgrade.

I regret very much that some otherwise intelligent men who happen to be honoured by the confidence of those who have the right to vote in municipal elections have shown their credulity to the point of passing resolutions suggesting to the government that they should double family allowances without increasing taxation. That is beyond me. I told them I presumed that next fall when they come they will not collect any money from the taxpayers of the municipality; they will find some money; they will get a recipe from Vers Demain to pay taxes without collecting anything from the taxpayers of the municipality.

Sir, I have been in politics a long time. As I said the other day, I have been very much abused. Sometimes I was praised, whether I deserved it or not. I have done my duty. I have done my duty to my constituents, and when I thought something was wrong I told them that I thought it was wrong, subject to listening anew to their point of view. The people cannot be fooled indefinitely. They have been fooled to a certain extent by that paper. Those who belong to that party have made fools of themselves by masquerading the whole year round. It did not bring them success. They have realized one thing, namely that the more they abuse the member for Temiscouata the less success they have. They are like a snake that destroyed its teeth by biting a file; and they will not be the better, they will be the worse for it.

In conclusion, sir, I wish to thank hon. members for their attention and to ask them to think about the large amounts of money that are spent by the government for the benefit of all Canadians of every party, of every race, to improve the conditions under which they live. This is the right way to serve the Canadian people.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, before turning to the subject matter of the budget I should like to compliment the government on the preliminary federal-provincial conference which ended yesterday. Notwithstanding the fact that for two or three years we have been pressing for such a conference, I am quite sure that all sections of the community across Canada will be pleased that at long last the first steps toward calling a general conference have been taken. The very fact that top-ranking politicians in this country from five different political parties could sit down together with so much amity and agreement is an indication that we have come a long way since 1945. Some of our provincial governments certainly seem to have outgrown the somewhat childish attitude which they adopted at the conference of 1945, an attitude which said, in effect, "if you do not agree with me I will not play in your back yard."

It is very encouraging to find that in 1955 representatives of all 10 provincial governments can sit down with the representatives of the federal government and reach at least some tentative agreement. I think everyone agrees that the exclusion of the question of unemployment relief from the agenda of the October conference is a move in the right direction. We all certainly hope that before the October conference is called some agreement will have been reached under which the provinces and the federal government between them may take care of the relief of those who are unemployed.

Several features of that conference are commendable. I was particularly happy to read in the Globe and Mail that the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated to the conference that the federal government would be willing to go along with the provinces on a national health insurance scheme, provided that the majority of the provinces—I suppose a majority would mean six—including one of the two large provinces would agree on such a scheme. That certainly is an advance on anything we have heard in this house on the matter of national health insurance. It would appear, Mr. Speaker, that dawn is at last breaking on that long Liberal night which began back in 1919, when national health insurance first became a part of the policy of the Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles: Thirty-six years is a long night.

Mr. Noseworthy: It is true, as the minister has informed us on a number of occasions, that these things cannot all be done overnight, but that long night would seem to be coming to an end.

There will be fairly general approval of the five topics which it has been agreed to place on the agenda of the October conference. The best we can hope is that such agreements as are reached at that conference will not be too narrow and too late to boost the sagging economy of this country.

If I may turn to the budget itself, I wish first of all to say that there are some commendable points in it. I disagree with those speakers from the official opposition who could find nothing whatever to commend in the budget, who insisted that nothing in the budget would do much good. We all welcome the reduction in the income tax, such as it is. I must point out, however, as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that the minister's statement on budget night, as recorded at page 2735 of Hansard, seemed to inspire a little more optimism than was warranted. He told us, for instance, that the new schedule would reduce the tax payable by 12 to 13 per cent for 85 per cent of our taxpayers. That sounds pretty good, that 85 per cent of our taxpayers should get a reduction of from 12 to 13 per cent in their taxes. A little later on, as reported on page 2735 of Hansard he said:

> Every married taxpayer with an income up to about $5,000 will get about a 12 per cent reduction. The rate of reduction beyond this point drops off gradually until it reaches 2·8 per cent at the highest income levels.

That would seem to indicate that the budget was weighted in favour of those in the lower income groups, but if we look at the tables placed on Hansard by the minister, which appear at pages 2736 and 2737, we find that the picture is not too rosy for the taxpayer in the lower income groups. According to those figures, in the year 1955 the single taxpayer earning $2,000 will have a saving of $10; the single taxpayer with an income of $3,000 will have a saving of $20 in his taxes, and the single taxpayer in the $5,000 bracket will have a saving of $40.

The married taxpayers without children with incomes of $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000 will have savings of $10, $20, and $30 respectively in 1955. The married taxpayers with two children in the same categories of $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000 will have savings in 1955 of $7, $17 and $27 respectively. I merely wanted to call attention to that fact in passing. Small as the reduction is, it will be welcomed by the taxpayers across this country.

The 5 per cent reduction in the excise tax on cars will also be welcomed, and I am sure that the reduction of 2 per cent in the corporation tax on profits over $20,000 will be welcomed by the corporations. I gather from the speeches made by representatives of the official opposition that they would have welcomed a much larger reduction in the corporation tax. As far as I am concerned, and as far as members of this group are concerned—I speak now for the present C.C.F. group of 23—we question the necessity for any reduction in corporation taxes at this time, particularly when we note from the balance sheets of the corporations how good 1954 was for most of them.

We in this group approve of budgeting for a deficit. When I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I suggested that the government should follow the policy they had laid down in their white paper in 1945. At that time they indicated that while it was a good policy to budget for a surplus in prosperous years, it would be good business to budget for a deficit when the economy began to slow down.

We approve also of the notice given in the budget speech that a royal commission will be appointed to study the economic position of our country. We have long advocated economic planning, and if this royal commission means anything it means that the government at last has reached the conclusion that there must be some economic planning in our public affairs and government policy.

I was rather intrigued by the number of Conservative speakers who criticized the government because they have no economic plan at the present time, and who indicated that they thought the setting up of this royal commission was an admission on the part of the government that they had no such plan. This is the first time in my public life that I have known or learned that economic planning was part of the Conservative program as well as that of the Liberals. However, we welcome it regardless of from what corner of the house it comes.

I rise on this occasion to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood and the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of this C.C.F. group. It might be well to remind ourselves of the nature of those amendments. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Greenwood will be found on page 2954 of Hansard of April 19. It reads:

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets that in its budget proposals the government has failed:
> (a) to give effective stimulus to Canadian enterprise to create employment and opportunity;
> (b) to reduce taxation affecting those on low income and allowances;
> (c) to curb its own extravagance and inefficiency;
> (d) to recognize the serious position in which the Canadian farmer and other producers now find themselves."

The amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, as reported on page 2958 of Hansard, reads:

> That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:
> "(e) to provide assistance to the provincial governments in order to enable them to plan their financing in such a manner as to relieve the people of this country from the crushing load of heavy municipal taxation."

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

While we support the amendment moved by the official opposition we do so without committing ourselves to the support of the methods suggested by official opposition speakers to implement the policy enunciated in that amendment.

From speeches by the official opposition I tried to find just what they meant by "effective stimulus to Canadian enterprise to create employment and opportunity". I went, of course, to the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). He holds an extremely important position in the Conservative party. I find that the hon. member for Broadview does not think that the income tax reductions will do anything to stimulate purchasing of our surplus goods and that he thinks that the reduction in the corporation tax is not enough to cause companies to embark on a capital expansion program, indicating that he would like to see a much greater corporation tax reduction.

Much to my surprise, he pointed out that the 2 per cent reduction in corporation tax—that is a reduction from 47 per cent to 45 per cent; in reality it amounts to about a 4 per cent total reduction—will not be passed on to consumers in the form of lower prices. That statement was a bit surprising to me. It was surprising to me that the national president of the Conservative association should have lost faith in private enterprise to the extent that he now does not believe that the corporations of this country will pass on the benefit of their tax reduction to the consuming public in the form of lower prices. If that is so, I just do not know on what logic he bases his appeal for a still larger reduction in corporation taxes.

Then on the question of the royal commission, the hon. member for Broadview was critical of the fact that the government has no economic plan. He went on to say that if the government had had its various departments gathering all this information during the past ten years, they would now have an economic plan. As I said before, we welcome the thought that at long last not only the Liberal party but also the Conservative party has come around to the adoption of that plank in the C.C.F. program which has always been a major one, namely that of economic planning in government.

Then apparently another one of the stimuli which governments could give, according to the member for Broadview, is to take some measures to lower the cost of products we manufacture. From a Conservative whose party supports private enterprise, and who is so critical of government interference with business in any form, this is a surprising suggestion. One wonders what the government can do to lower the cost of the products that we manufacture without interfering with or exercising some control over industry, as we in the C.C.F. have long suggested.

Then another Conservative stimulus is to take some measures to ensure that more of our primary products are processed in Canada. I do not know how this stimulus can be provided by a government or a party that does not believe in interfering with private enterprise, that does not believe in the government's participation in industry or business or that does not believe in the exercise of any control by government. I just do not see how such governments or such parties can provide the kind of stimulus that is suggested by Conservative speakers for the improvement of our economic condition.

Most of those who have spoken in the debate have offered the government advice. I suppose a little more advice at this stage of the debate will do no more harm and probably no more good than most of the other advice that has come from this side of the house. I suggest—and on this I think all parties are agreed—that the condition of employment in this country is one that requires study. I say "employment", because I think the provision of employment is our No. 1 problem. I think we must think in terms of employment rather than in terms of unemployment. I think we must take the positive attitude or the positive approach and consider ways and means of providing more jobs for more people for longer periods of time.

This country just cannot afford the luxury of having 600,000 people looking for jobs and unable to find them or 600,000 people registered with our unemployment insurance commission. The waste of that manpower is a luxury that we cannot afford. Certainly it represents a condition that should engage the most serious attention of all of us, regardless of our party affiliations. The workers were told that, if they wanted increased wages, they must increase production. For some years since the war the emphasis has been on increasing production. We have been increasing production. We have increased production to the point where, in many lines, we now have more goods than we can dispose of. We have inventories piling up. We have factories laying off help and men going idle. We have reached the point where we have carried increases in production so far that we now have 600,000 unemployed. There are those who advocate, as did the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), that one of the remedies for that is a reduction in the price of commodities and the cost of production. There are those who blame our having a surplus of commodities which we cannot dispose of on the fact that we have priced ourselves out of the market and who say that lower prices would be the remedy.

I am sure those of us who lived through the thirties must realize that if the thirties taught us anything they taught us that the lowering of prices alone is not enough to remedy the kind of economic situation in which the country then was and which we are in danger of falling into again. If lowering prices was the answer to the problem, we had the answer in the 1930's. Goodness knows, prices were low enough. We must, as I have said, find some way of creating more jobs for more people, and since industry, and the manufacturing industry in particular, employs the majority of our workers we must find some means of making more jobs for more workers in more factories in this country.

There are those of course who believe that this matter should be left entirely to private enterprise, that it is not the business of the government to get into the construction field, for instance, in competition with private enterprise. I would merely point out that when the necessities of war showed that private enterprise was unable to fill the bill required of it the government, with the approval and support of electors all across the country, stepped into the breach and did not hesitate to direct and control those industries whose products were needed for war but with respect to which private enterprise had failed to fill the bill. Whether in the production of war machines, munitions, ships or whatever it was, when private enterprise failed to meet the needs of the times the government, with the approval of the Canadian public, as I said, entered into the particular field and took steps to see that those needs were met.

Today private enterprise has failed to employ all our people, or perhaps I should say that private enterprise and governments combined have failed to employ all our people with the result that we now have 600,000 unemployed. Does that not seem sufficient justification and reason for the government to undertake at this time a large-scale public works program to supplement the efforts of private enterprise, to create more jobs where private enterprise is failing to create them? It is true that some public works contribute very little to employment. I suppose the experience of the Ontario government in the past year has shown that highway construction, for instance, provides more profits for contractors than it does work for the unemployed.

But there are fields the government can enter which will provide many jobs. We need a trans-Canada highway. We have been working on the project now for some years. The federal government has made a very generous offer to the provinces but the provinces are having difficulty with the construction of the trans-Canada highway. Some are finding the cost of construction per mile too high for them to bear under the present arrangement. Some are finding that to put their money into the construction of the trans-Canada highway will result in the neglect of many other highways in the province. I suggest this is a good time for the government to increase its share of the cost of the trans-Canada highway in order to offset the high construction costs that are slowing up the building of the highway in various provinces. That will not only speed up the construction of the highway with resulting improvement throughout the country, but it will also help to take care to some extent of the waste of manpower taking place in the country at the present time.

There are other fields. There is the question of railway grade crossings. While we commend the government for the increased support it is giving to the railway grade crossing fund, we think there is room for a still further increase in the contribution to the fund so that a very sizeable crossing improvement program can be undertaken throughout Canada. There again we would be doing something that would be useful, something that would result in saving lives, that would improve the transportation system of our country and would also be of some assistance in relieving the unemployment situation.

The third proposal, to mention only three, is that introduced in the house by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) and emphasized by numerous speakers on both sides of the house, the initiation of a broad, imaginative plan for the building of low rental houses. If there is any one field in which the government can assist in meeting the unemployment problem, it is in the building of houses.

While Central Mortgage and Housing has done a reasonably good job within the limits of the regulations by which they are governed, the fact is that the houses which are built are beyond the reach of the people who most need houses. Today it is just as difficult for a family with four, five, or six children to find a home in Toronto as it has been at any time within the past 10 years. When a family is ejected in the city of Toronto today, it is just hopeless for that family to try to find a house that they can rent. There is a great need across this country for the kind of housing scheme that will provide houses on a large scale at a price that those in the lower income groups can rent or buy.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

While speaking of a public works program, I trust that when the conference meets in the fall, and when the question of public investment and the development of our natural resources comes before that conference, some arrangement will be made and some agreement reached on the kind of public works that should be undertaken across Canada, the kind of public works in which the federal and provincial governments may unite for the good of the people of Canada. If any of these projects are to be of any use before another winter's unemployment is upon us, then we must take steps now to plan the nature of those projects, and all the preliminary matters that must be settled before the contracts can be let. It is of extreme importance that we waste no time in getting on with a public works program, at both the federal and the provincial levels, with projects of such a nature that the federal and provincial governments may combine their resources.

Another point I think that we should consider—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him his time has just expired.

Mr. Noseworthy: I shall conclude then, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I did not watch the clock. I shall conclude by suggesting that anything we can do to increase the purchasing power of the masses of the people, by an increase in the personal income tax exemption, by an increase in social security benefits, disability pensions, guidance allowances for the blind or anything of that kind, will help us in our present emergency. I trust that the government will not wait until fall to take some forward steps to prevent this country from falling into the condition that harassed us during the thirties.

Mr. Harris: And none more than Harris.

Mr. F. T. Fairey (Victoria, B.C.): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate at this time because traditionally the debate on the budget, like that on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, permits a member to range rather widely and introduce a number of topics in the one speech. Before I address myself to matters relating to the budget, I feel it is necessary to comment upon the extraordinary statement made, first by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Johnson) and later, in similar language, by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis), concerning tax reductions as proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris).

On page 3084 of Hansard for April 22, 1955, in the second column, I find this:

> The minister touted the income tax reductions and pointed out how they ranged from 13·3 per cent for those in the lower income tax brackets to 2·8 per cent for those in the higher brackets,—

This is the statement which caused some of us in this corner a little concern.

> —when actually it was a 2 per cent reduction across the board. The minister placed the mirage at a distance in the hope that by the time the people became aware of the results, the matters would be forgotten.

Then, in the next paragraph I find this:

> Indeed it is nothing but deception to tell the people of Canada they are being given a tax reduction of 13·3 per cent when the tax reduction is 2 per cent and ranges in amount from $5 to $7 to $40.

The same day, a little later, the hon. member for Regina City made a similar statement on page 3113. He said:

> I wonder who the government thought they were fooling with that sort of subterfuge. No matter how you figure it out it means a 2 per cent blanket reduction across the board. The government brought this in in a deceptive manner and tried to convey the impression that there was some fairness and equity in the manner in which these reductions were being made, when all the time there was plain evidence that the income tax reductions amounted to a flat 2 per cent reduction across the board.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I point to the similarity of the statements, and there are two things to which I object. The first is the suggestion of deception and the second is that the arithmetic is quite wrong. I am sure that, at least in recent years, the education of the Canadian people has reached a point where they can do a simple problem in percentages. The example that both gentlemen used was that of a married man with two children, the first having an income of $3,000, and the second man having an income of $20,000. The first will get a reduction of $14 and the second of $354. The point is, a reduction from what? In the first case it is a reduction of $14 from $105, which is the amount to be paid in 1954. This is a reduction of 13.3 per cent because $14 is 13.3 per cent of $105. In the second case it is a reduction of $354 from $5,375, which is 6.6 per cent.

I might suggest that the hon. members have mistaken what the minister said, and I therefore refer to page 2735 of Hansard for April 5. These are the words the minister used:

> The method by which this result will be reached is to reduce the rates of tax payable on each bracket of income by 2 percentage points.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a vast difference between a reduction of two percentage points in each bracket of income and a straight 2 per cent across the board. Had it been a straight 2 per cent reduction across the board, the reduction would be of course $2.08 rather than $14, because 2 per cent of $105 is $2.08. And in the second place the reduction would have been $107.50 instead of $354.

I have no quarrel whatever with the statement of both hon. gentlemen, that the minister might have achieved similar or perhaps better results in another way. That is a matter of opinion. But as an old schoolmaster I could not allow that bad calculation to go without comment; because it is likely that these speeches will receive rather wide circulation, and I thought it necessary to make the correction. As for the rhetorical question, whom the government were fooling—well, I will leave that to the Canadian people. I do not think they were trying to fool anybody, except perhaps the two hon. gentlemen.

Now a few words about the budget itself. In my opinion it is a good budget. The minister has been bold enough to reduce taxes, which will result in a sum of money approaching $200 million being added as extra purchasing power in the hands of the public. That is what hon. members on both sides of the house have been asking for. Naturally it will result in increased spending, chiefly on consumer goods. The boldness on the part of the minister and of the government will I think generate confidence and thus encourage investment and the expansion of industry. And if these results ensue, the resulting expansion in industry must in itself stimulate employment.

It was my hope that the minister would find it possible to reconsider, as a special case, the problem of the retail automobile dealers. In this regard I add my support to the views already expressed by the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck). In my opinion, because of the policy of manufacturers, the retail automobile dealers find themselves in a position which they cannot avoid by any action they themselves may take. Although I know perfectly well that the government is on very dangerous ground when exceptions are suggested, I do feel there is strong justification for the claim of the automobile dealers for a rebate of the excise tax paid on cars which were not sold at the time the reduction was announced. I do think, though, that the remedy lies within the industry itself. They have anticipated this kind of thing for some years past and, in my opinion, they should have worked out some way to avoid this difficulty. Surely the manufacturers and the retail dealers can devise some method by which dealers stand neither to gain nor to lose, owing to changes in excise tax rates. In the meantime I hope the minister will take not a second look—but, perhaps it may be, a twenty-second look.

Then, something about Canada's future: We all have great confidence in Canada, and believe that we are now on the threshold of a great industrial expansion. In all provinces and from all parts of the country we hear of increased business activity, and of the projection of great enterprises. There is a bustling awareness of strong forces at work. To activate these forces the government must, as I think it intends to do, first of all create a situation which encourages the greatest possible degree of free enterprise. I do not use this word in a trite sense. I mean freedom in every possible way for the manufacturer and the individual to take advantage of the growth which is upon us. Secondly, it must reduce government controls of all kinds, including any taxes which have been thought to be crippling, and thus allow the greatest possible choice of freedom of movement both for the businessman and the individual worker.

I think the people in this country want the greatest measure of social security for those not able to look after themselves, but I do not believe they want social services so extensive as to stifle willingness to work or to discourage adventure. They want wages high enough to provide for present needs, and for savings and investment for the future.

It seems to me that industrial growth depends upon several factors, the first of which is a firm, constant and stable government policy to encourage risk capital and investment in a growing country; secondly, a high degree of skill in engineering and in industrial and personnel management—and this I believe we have; third, stable and sound relations between labour and capital; and fourth, a skilled and mobile work force. And it is about this latter that I wish to speak at some length, and to emphasize its importance as strongly as I can.

It is my opinion that our experience in wartime demonstrated, without any doubt whatever, that an industrial economy is impossible without a large body of skilled craftsmen. Whatever skills we may have with respect to finance and management, without skilled workmen we face a hopeless task. We know that for years before the first war, and between the two wars, we were content to extract from the land, sea, forest and streams the raw materials which formed the bulk of our exports. Now we demand the establishment of secondary industries. We have grown tired of purchasing back our own raw materials in the form of manufactured articles and we find ourselves in the competitive markets of the world where sentiment does not exist.

To secure a fair share of these markets for our manufactured goods and, at the same time, maintain a high standard of living as expressed in a high scale of wages, we must produce cheaper, better and more attractive goods than our competitors. This cannot be done unless we reduce the cost of production by producing goods in greater quantities, in shorter time. If we are to prosper industrially, and if we insist on the five day or shorter work week, then we must produce more in those five days than we formerly did in six days, and without any decline in quality or appearance.

At the turn of the century, when Canada emerged from a mainly agricultural economy and began to lay the foundation of a great nation with a balanced economy, it was possible only because we were able to draw upon Europe, and chiefly Great Britain, for the majority of our skilled craftsmen—we trained none of our own, or very few. The United States had done the same. Those days are over. The two wars ended all that. The trained mechanics in the older countries are needed in their own countries. So now we must do one of two things:—first, institute a vigorous campaign for the recruitment of skilled workers from Europe—and I know how far we would get if we suggested that—or, secondly, train our own.

There is no choice here. In the meantime until we can train our own we must approve an immigration policy which is selective and which will bring to this country those immigrants who can best fit into the industrial Canada that is to be. I think the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) is doing just that.

Mr. Speaker, because I have mentioned immigration, I hope I do not offend the rules of the house, if I revert to an incident, or a series of incidents, concerning a supposed statement by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration at a meeting we both attended in Victoria during the Easter recess. Because this matter has been raised in this debate, by others, I think I may have the privilege of adding a word.

I certainly have no desire, nor is it my place, to defend any minister or, for that matter, any member of this house, for something he actually did say. That is his responsibility. But when I know for a fact, having been present at the time, that the statement, or the implication of any such statement, which has been attributed to the minister, definitely was not made, then I think it is my duty to stand up in this house and say so. When I first saw the comments in the press, and statements had been made in this house —there was a good deal of hilarity about it because, Mr. Speaker, we did return to the house on the first day in rather a jovial mood —I thought hon. members were having a joke at the expense of the minister. But, sir, the matter has gone beyond a joke and I am compelled to say that in the interests of us all this unfair and unjustified attack upon the minister, which appeared in the press from many parts of the country, and even in editorial comment, should be answered. May I put it to my colleagues—and I am reading this because I do not want my words to be misinterpreted—this is a matter which affects us all. I know it has been said that we on this side of the house suffer from the occupational disease of being wrongly quoted; but only today we had two hon. members on the other side of the house rise in their places and complain about the same kind of thing. But that is not the case today because in no newspaper article that I have seen has any statement appeared in quotation marks, except one or two words, and then a gap. What is increasingly common, as we all know, is that in newspaper reporting, particularly of the kind of meeting that we were attending, a young reporter, in his desire to shorten his report, puts in his own words what he thinks you say. We have all suffered from that kind of thing at times.

On the whole, the newspapers do exceptionally well, but in this case they slipped. Many papers in Canada jumped on the bandwagon. What happened was simply this. A meeting had been arranged in the Oak Bay high school, at which I, as the representative of the constituency of which Oak Bay is a part, was to be the speaker. I found that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration was to be in Victoria on business, and I persuaded him to speak at the meeting, which he did, and he made a jolly good speech, too. He did speak about immigration and he did mention Canadian babies, but not in the way it has been reported. Let me end this by reading an editorial which appeared in the Victoria Daily Times of Saturday, April 16, written after the adverse publicity in the eastern press, and by a man who was present at the meeting:

What Mr. Pickersgill said:

Mr. Pickersgill's speech in Oak Bay a few nights ago apparently has become something of a cause célèbre in national politics. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has been made the victim of a gross distortion in some newspapers.

He was quoted as saying, in effect, that native-born Canadians are superior to foreign immigrants. He said just the opposite, as the news report in the Times recorded next day.

The Oak Bay audience which heard him will remember that, choosing his words with obvious care, he said that he was an unrepentant believer in "the cradle" as the best method of increasing the nation's population. He immediately added that he did not mean to say for a moment that Canadians were superior to foreign peoples and hoped he would never be so foolish as to suggest such a thing.

He argued only that a child born in Canada could be adjusted to the ways of Canada more rapidly and completely than a foreigner who must learn an entirely new way of life. But as the cradles of Canada could not produce all the people needed in our under-populated country it was necessary to encourage immigration, which he is doing.

Few Canadians will disagree with a statement so obviously sound. Reported as it was delivered it would cause little comment and general approval. But Mr. Pickersgill reaches Ottawa to find himself quoted in the eastern press as announcing a crude racialist theory of Canadian superiority, which was the last thing in his mind.

Even though he denies such a statement in parliament, even though some newspapers have quoted him accurately, many Canadians who do not read the news carefully no doubt will continue to believe the original distortion.

This is the final paragraph, and the most important:

For this some unknown newspaper reporters are solely responsible. Their newspapers should be the first to offer Mr. Pickersgill a public apology and a full, accurate report of what he actually said in Oak Bay.

I led up to a suggestion that we had a choice in preparing for a great Canadian industrial economy by choosing between instituting a vigorous immigration policy for trained mechanics and training our own, but I got sidetracked onto this other thing.

I have given it as my firm opinion on more than one occasion that Canada must look to its own for its skilled workers. It is pathetic to ponder on the meagre efforts now made in this regard. Our universities are crowded with first-class students. The applied science faculties are crowded to capacity. Day and evening classes are offered at most of our universities in business administration, management, salesmanship and so forth. But what are we doing for the basic need, the skilled craftsmen who translate the ideas and the plans of the engineer into tangible goods? We talk very boastfully of projects such as Kitimat, steel mills on the Pacific, pulp mills running into millions of dollars, the Frobisher scheme, the great industries around Edmonton and tremendous factory expansion schemes in the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Where are the skilled men to come from to man all these expanded industries? Please remember that it is the unskilled man who is first unemployed. Moreover, to take advantage of these expansions, the labour force must not only be skilled but it must be mobile.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) breaks his heart over the plight of miners in the province of Nova Scotia, who are facing, as they must, a dying industry there. They cannot be left gazing at a closed mine; they are too valuable. Men used to hard work and anxious to continue at it must either be trained for new jobs and moved where the jobs are, or be trained for jobs in industry which may be induced to locate in their own particular districts. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, surely this is important enough, vital enough and urgent enough to be considered a federal responsibility, as it affects the whole of Canada.

What has been done? Well, I am not going to be too long over this because I talked about it during the last session. Assistance to the provinces has been provided over a period of years. First of all, there was the Technical Education Act of the 1900's, which provided $10 million over the period of 10 years, and that was the end of that. Then the depression forced the establishment of a number of vocational or shop training schemes in improvised shops for the most part, and these, together with the provincial technical vocational shops, formed the backbone of the war emergency training program and later the rehabilitation program for the veterans of the war. But, in 1942, this parliament passed the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act, which is a permissive act. It simply authorizes the minister to conclude agreements with the provinces further to assist vocational training. It tied together a number of agreements which had been in effect and authorized the minister to continue. The main agreement, which is called the vocational schools assistance agreement provided $10 million as capital grants; that is, for buildings and major equipment, and $20 million to be allotted at the rate of $2 million a year for 10 years, to be used for maintenance and operation. That agreement expired in 1953 and has been renewed for one year. That is the thing that is causing us concern at the moment. Why was it renewed for only one year? It was renewed for one year to give the federal government an opportunity to look over the situation and decide what is the best thing to do.

I have spoken this afternoon on the importance of training a skilled labour force and I want to suggest what the federal government ought to do. Some people have interpreted the action of this government in renewing the agreements for one year only as a warning that the end of federal assistance is in sight. I urge the contrary view. Surely the accomplishments of the past and the needs of the future demand, not a curtailment of federal assistance but a considerable increase if a skilled working force of our own people is to be able to man our expanding industry.

Just look around, Mr. Speaker. With the exception of a few schools like the Halifax technical school, the Montreal technical school, the Ryerson Institute in Toronto, a new school in Winnipeg, the Manitoba Technical Institute, the Calgary Polytech and the Vancouver Vocational Institute, we have not adequate training facilities in Canada. The rest of the schools of this type in Canada are simply small industrial arts shops and, as I say, these technical schools are not fully equipped to properly supply the demands which will be made upon them.

We have no school in Canada like the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the California Tech, and dozens of others in the United States. None of the schools we have is big enough or properly equipped for the task which faces it. There are not enough of them.

Here is another point which is rather important. We have a committee on manpower working under the Department of Labour, and there is also an advisory committee on apprenticeship training. During the past session the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) asked our approval for a measure to rehabilitate the physically handicapped, the basis of which was rehabilitation training. Where are those people going to be trained? Unless we stimulate the building and equipping and expansion of our vocational training facilities the provinces will be unable to carry this load alone.

This type of school is the most expensive to equip, to man and to operate; this is entirely beyond the capacities of the cities and the municipalities. I have mentioned the mobile nature of the working force that will be required and because of that I think it is a federal responsibility to assume part of the load in this regard. If there is any justification for federal assistance in any field, I submit that this is that field.

Furthermore, any agreement which the federal government may make with the province must be on a long-term basis. No city, no province can plan for education, certainly in the technical field, on a year to year basis. I was bold enough to go into the conference the other morning when the provincial premiers were making their initial addresses. I heard one say that there must be agreements for at least five years, but in my view five years is too short. I would go further and say that there should be a permanent arrangement.

Furthermore, any funds which are allotted should be adequate. I realize that that is a very loose term. I know we have had $10 million in the last 10 years for capital account, but I submit that $10 million would not do much more than build one school. There will have to be more money for capital account and for equipment and then assistance must be provided for the operation and the continuance of the work of these schools.

Lastly, and I think this is a most important thing, the funds allotted should not be merged into a general subsidy. I was a member of the vocational training advisory council, and I have also been a civil servant. I know that in a desire to simplify administration it is quite easy to suggest that it would be better to lump all this enormous number—it is an enormous number—of federal grants into one grant, and say to the province, "Here, take this and administer it yourself".

My answer is that that should not be done, for the simple reason that unless the federal grant is earmarked for a particular purpose the chances are that once it gets into the provincial treasury it will not come out in the same way and for the purpose for which it was allotted.

Therefore I am pleading that any financial arrangements made between the provinces and the federal government in connection with vocational training and technical assistance should be such that the assistance given by the federal government should form a separate fund and be kept separate from any general subsidy.

Lest I be thought to be one-sided, lest it be thought that a person interested in technical education has no interest whatever in other kinds of education, lest it be thought that one is either intellectual or not—of course I disagree with that entirely—I want to say that it was a matter of great satisfaction to me, and I am sure to all of us, to hear the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Thursday last that it is still the intention of the government to recommend to parliament the establishment of the Canada Council.

While I have stressed the importance of training a skilled work force, and while I urge its vital importance, that is not to say that the more intellectual pursuits are not of equal importance. This council will be concerned with the arts, letters and sciences and it can do much to raise the cultural standards of our people so that both forms of education or training may march side by side, in no way antagonistic the one to the other but each contributing in its own way to the growth and development of a rich and satisfying way of life.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to carry on my part in this debate in the traditional manner by taking up a totally different subject. During the past two or three weeks I have been reading editorials which have appeared in some of our newspapers dealing with the budget, and I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has also. I would think that probably as a result of that reading he may be having a few doubts as to how good the budget is, although he certainly seemed to have no doubts on budget night. I should like to read from these editorial comments briefly. The first is from the Vancouver Sun of April 6 and it reads:

> Economic experts may now speculate about the minister's reasons for bringing down a deficit budget for what he expects to be the most prosperous year in the nation's history. Mr. Harris himself didn't say . . .
> Our own guess is that Mr. Harris kept mum because it would be too hard to supply a rational explanation.

The last thing I pretend to be is an economic expert. However, one does not need to be an economic expert to see some of the irrational aspects of this budget. One of the basic premises from which the minister proceeded to make his calculations and estimates in regard to what the gross national product would be and so forth was that the poor grain crop last year in western Canada was largely responsible for the decline in the gross national product, that it had had a generally depressing effect on the economy of the country and therefore was responsible for the deficit.

To a quite considerable extent that is a demonstrable fallacy. It seems to be government policy to blame the weather last year in the west for any economic difficulties which are being experienced at the present time. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) set the pattern for this when speaking in an earlier debate. He said that the poor western grain crop last year was completely responsible for any difficulties in which the farmers found themselves, for the general economic picture, and so forth. In other words the Minister of Finance was simply picking up that assertion of the Minister of Agriculture and making it one of the basic premises on which he based his budget calculations.

At that time, in the previous debate, I pointed out that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was completely wrong. I pointed out that last year's bad crop had very little effect on the cash position of the farmer for the year just past and that it would make its effect felt in this present year 1955. When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) spoke in this debate I notice that he took up the same point and pointed out that this assumption made by the minister was quite wrong.

As the budget is based, to quite a large extent, on this demonstrable fallacy, one is led to look with the greatest of suspicion on all of the conclusions that are drawn from that basic fallacy. Particularly, one is bound to look with the greatest possible doubt on the estimate of what the gross national product will be for this present year and therefore on the estimate of government revenues which will be produced.

As a matter of fact, the poor crop in 1954 will make itself felt in this coming year, 1955, and will cause the western farmers' income to be greatly reduced both because of the fact that the crop was low in number of bushels and because it was of poor quality and will therefore bring a low price. The result of the combination of these factors is that the farmers in the west are going to have considerably less money in their pockets this year than they had last year, rather than more, and less money to put in the general stream of the economy. Unless a great deal more wheat is sold this year than was sold last year, the western farmers' income just cannot help being greatly reduced, with all of the consequent general depressing effect on the economy which the minister spoke of in his budget address.

In view of all this and in view of the poor prospects at the present time for a large increase in wheat sales this year, I think the minister's estimate of a gross national product of $25¼ billion for this year—rising, as a matter of fact, to a rate of $26 billion by the end of the year—is quite unrealistic. Similarly I think that the estimate of his deficit as being only $194 million is equally unrealistic. It is extremely difficult to see how this deficit will not be much more than $194 million. It seems to me that in his budget the minister would have been much more honest had he taken account of what the actual economic situation is at the present time and what it is bound to be as far as the western wheat farmer is concerned instead of saying: If we have a good crop our gross national product will be up, our revenues will be up and so on, and therefore I am budgeting for a deficit of $194 million. The easiest thing in the world to do is to make yourself look foolish a year from now by making predictions about what the deficit is likely to be or not to be. However, barring a war or something of that sort, I shall be greatly surprised if the minister does not have a much greater deficit than $194 million.

[Mr. Harkness.]

As the amount of grain produced and marketed, together with the price at which it is sold, has such a marked effect on the Canadian economy and therefore on government revenues, I propose to go into the present wheat situation in some detail. At this point I may say that I find that it is hard to get at what the wheat situation is at any particular time. There is a terrific mass of statistics which more or less overwhelm one when one starts trying to wade through them. In addition to that fact, the wheat board will not give out the sales figures for the current year. Hence all you can do is make your own estimate in connection with those figures, on the basis of the disappearance of wheat—figures for which are given out—and things of that sort.

Again, in addition to that, the statements issued by the government and by the wheat board from time to time seem to vary in order to make the situation appear better than it is or to make the situation appear to be what the government wants people to believe it is. An example of this sort of thing has occurred quite recently. I refer to Hansard for Friday, January 21. On that day the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) why it was that Canada's share of the over-all wheat market had dropped while the share of three other countries had increased. As reported at page 403 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied as follows:

> They may be in the records, but my hon. friend is looking at shipments rather than sales . . . It is really the sales that count.

In other words the minister at that point was maintaining that the thing that was important was the sales of wheat and that the fact that exports had dropped was a matter of no importance. He was maintaining that you really must base your calculations on the sales. Last year, when the sales of wheat were quite low, in the committee on agriculture I tried to make that very point, namely that in order to get any idea what the return to the farmers was likely to be or what the general grain situation was likely to be, we must look at the picture of sales. But, Mr. Speaker, if you look at the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the committee on agriculture and colonization for last year at page 139 you will find what was said by Mr. McIvor who was then giving evidence, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce was sitting beside him. After I had tried for a considerable length of time to impress upon him this point that sales were important and so forth, Mr. McIvor said this:

> A. Mr. Harkness does not agree, but I think the figures we should look at are the exports figures. Once you get the sales you get into a variable thing that does not give a true picture.

In other words, last year when exports were better than sales, the only thing that was important really was the exports; sales just gave you a false picture. This year when the minister says that sales are much better than they were at this time last year—but we do not know what the figures are because the wheat board will not give them out—he says that sales are the important thing and that we should not pay any attention to exports. All these things merely serve to confuse the picture and, as I say, make it difficult to find out what the situation actually is.

Subsequent statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by the acting minister, in answer to questions asked by members of the house, were to the effect that the sales this year are expected to be as good as or better than they were last year. It will be necessary for them to be much better. That is, if we get a reasonably good crop this year, it will be necessary for them to be much better. Otherwise our carry-over of unsold wheat will reach a new record and farmers will be able to deliver little, if any, of this year's crop; I refer to the 1955 crop. Sales for the 1953-54 pool period—that is the last pool period, the one from August 1, 1953 to July 31, 1954—were only 271·5 million bushels. The carry-over in 1954 rose at one time to a high of 740·7 million bushels. That was in March a year ago. At March 31 this year, that carry-over had been reduced but it was still 621·5 million bushels or nearly double the average carry-over for the period from 1945 to 1953. In other words, we still have an extremely large amount of unsold wheat. We have a big carry-over. A reasonably good crop in the present year of 1955, a crop of 400 million to 500 million bushels, will mean an increase in the carry-over. At a sales rate of 270 million bushels a year, which is what the minister hopes we will reach, and provided we have a reasonably good crop of 400 million to 500 million bushels, the carry-over will increase to over 900 million bushels. If we get a crop of over 600 million bushels such as we had in 1952 and 1953, it will bring the carry-over up to over a billion bushels.

Every farmer naturally hopes he will have a good crop this year. He dares not hope otherwise, but having in mind the present carry-over, the prospect of what a good crop will do to that carry-over, plus of course the fact of the very large carry-over in the United States, he is very apprehensive as to the price he will receive for the wheat he will grow this year and the wheat he still has on his farm from the crops of last year and the year before. He is also very apprehensive as to how much of this year's crop he will be able to deliver.

Without any question, it is a very serious situation and the government deals with it simply by turning out soothing statements. That is all they do about it. They make statements which really give a wrong impression as to what the situation is. At the same time they talk about anyone who attempts to state what the actual situation is as being unpatriotic. They say he is going to spoil our markets abroad as though the people who are buying our grain do not know the situation far better, I suppose, than anyone in this house. In other words, the government says: Oh, you should not mention our large carry-over; it will discourage foreign buyers from buying. Such talk is completely ridiculous.

What the government should do is to face the situation and make greatly increased efforts to dispose of our wheat. They should also be doing something about increasing storage space, a matter I have mentioned several times during the past three or four years when we were having big crops and there was a storage problem.

I should now like to turn to another aspect of the wheat picture, and the most important one in a way as far as the individual farmer is concerned. I refer to the amount of money the farmer actually gets into his hands, which of course goes from there into the general stream of the economy through payment by him for food, clothing, machinery and so on. The amount of money received by farmers was very materially reduced during the 1953-54 pool period compared with the 1952-53 period. I should like to note what the figures were. In the 1952-53 pool the farmers received, by way of initial, interim and final payments, a total of $940.5 million. In the 1953-54 pool they received by way of initial payments $535.8 million. The only way I can get at what they are going to receive in addition is by making estimates from the wheat board reports, and on the basis of these estimates I think the amount will be approximately $50 million. It will certainly not be very much more or less than $50 million.

When the farmers get the final payment, about which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has promised to make a statement shortly after he returns, they will have received $585·8 million, or a reduction of $364·6 million in one year. It is no wonder that sales of farm machinery, machines, trucks and all sorts of other things are very considerably reduced. The farmers have received that much less money to spend. For the sake of accuracy, I should mention that these prices are basis Fort William. Therefore the farmers' freight costs would have to be deducted from these figures so that instead of the amount being $364 million it would perhaps be $350 million. The farmers have received that much less than they did the year before.

With respect to payment to farmers for wheat delivered, settlement has of course been made for what they delivered in previous years, but for 1953-54 they received an initial payment of $1.40 a bushel, less freight of course, and an interim payment of 10 cents a bushel. The interim payment of 10 cents a bushel means that they received another $39·8 million. Therefore out of the estimated figure of $50 million to complete payment there now remains only a little over $10 million which means, as far as I can see, that the final payment, which has been looked forward to with a great deal of eagerness and anxiety, is likely to be between two and three cents a bushel. Unless I have completely misread the wheat board report—and I am fairly sure I have not—unless some money is to come from the government in the form of an advance or wheat remaining on hand is taken at a price considerably above the current market price, the final payment, as far as I can see, would only amount to between two and three cents a bushel which, rather than being welcomed with open arms, is going to be welcomed with great gnashing of teeth.

To turn to the future, the prospects for the 1954-55 pool period are much worse. That is the period we are in right now. In other words, it is the pool period in which the poor crop grown last year is being marketed plus, of course, wheat from the other crops still unsold. The estimated western wheat crop in 1954 was only 274 million bushels. Most of it was of low quality. As a matter of fact, a good deal of it was No. 5, No. 6 and feed wheat. This wheat would bring the farmer an average of less than 90 cents a bushel as far as the initial payment is concerned. That is all the cash he would actually get in his hands. Some would get quite a bit less than that depending on their distance from the head of the lakes.

Thus it is easy to see that the cash received for wheat in the 1954-55 period will be much less than last year. It just has to be a great deal less because the amount of wheat is small, it is of low quality and the price is down. This of course will have a consequent effect on the general economy.

I should also like to say something about a fairly general misconception which exists that the price of wheat is reasonably good. This is certainly not the case as far as returns to the farmer are concerned, particularly compared with the cost of the things he has to buy. The average price received for wheat sold in the 1953-54 pool year, the one just ended, was $1.75 a bushel, basis Fort William. But what did the farmer get? That is quite a different story. I calculate that the carrying charges on the 1953-54 pool wheat sold were 21 cents a bushel, according to the wheat board report. One can calculate that the charges would be around that figure because most of this wheat was in storage about 18 months. The elevator charges would come to about 15 cents a bushel and as the wheat was bought from the farmers with borrowed money the interest charges would come to another 5, 6, or 7 cents a bushel. Therefore, taking elevator charges and interest charges, you get a cost just for carrying the wheat of something in the neighbourhood of 21 cents a bushel. This will bring the price down immediately to $1.54. From this, of course. has to be deducted the freight which would average probably 17 cents a bushel. In my own case I think the freight from my shipping point is 22 cents a bushel. The freight from some points in Manitoba would be much less than that, but I believe the cost of freight would average about 17 cents a bushel. This brings the price down to $1.37.

Now, in terms of the 1935-39 dollar, this means that a farmer is getting not more than 65 cents a bushel at the most for this wheat. This price was considered so ruinous in the thirties that as a matter of fact the Bennett government, which receives so much abuse from hon. members to your right, put a floor under wheat of 90 cents a bushel in 1935. This would be equal to a price at the present time, basis Fort William, of $2 per bushel. In other words, the price the farmer is getting in terms of real purchasing power is less now than it was in the period so frequently referred to as the dirty thirties. This is a point which I believe most people, particularly in the eastern part of this country, have failed to realize.

The returns per bushel on wheat for the 1954-55 pool, that is for grain grown last year, show an even grimmer picture. The result will not be anything like this price of $1.37 per bushel. For example, I delivered two loads of wheat from my last year's crop which made up the 300 bushels I was allowed to deliver last fall to the elevator. One load was No. 5 and it netted me 85·5 cents per bushel. The other load was No. 6 and I received 83·5 cents per bushel. This was my initial payment. On the basis of the final payment made last year I would say we are going to be very fortunate if it comes to 15 cents a bushel this next year. In other words, I think I will probably be lucky if I get a total return of $1 per bushel for that wheat. A great deal of last year's wheat crop was No. 5, No. 6 and feed—in other words very low priced wheat. The people closer to the head of the lakes, of course, will receive a few cents more.

In any event, I do not think there is any question but that the returns to the farmers on a great deal of last year's low quality crop will not be sufficient to cover expenses. Under these circumstances how much prospect is there of the farmers buying large quantities of new machinery, trucks, automobiles and such things, thus boosting the general economy of the country and improving government revenue for the year 1955? There is just no prospect of that. If we get a good crop this year, and everyone hopes we will, it will not help the cash position of the farmers in 1955 very much. The elevators are filled with grain, and they will be filled when this new crop starts to come off. Thus, the farmers will be able to deliver only an extremely small amount which will not enable them to cover their harvesting expenses. The cash position in 1955, therefore, will not be benefited to an appreciable extent even if we get the best crop we have ever had.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not preaching blue ruin. I am quite certain that western agriculture will come through these difficulties and that the grain farmers of the west will continue, as they have in the past, to be one of the mainstays of the Canadian economy. However, the economic picture for this year is anything but the rosy one which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) painted. I believe he would have been better advised to take this picture into account, rather than base his budget on vague hopes, and base his estimates on those hopes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. B. Weselak (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the speaker who preceded me, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), and particularly when he pyramided figures of wheat board costs of operation per bushel. He stated he was not too sure of some of his figures; but if he had examined the wheat board report for the crop year 1953-54 he would have found that the receipts of the board were 398,031,819 bushels. He would have found that the cost of operation, including carrying charges, terminal storage, interest and bank charges, handling stop-off and diversion charges, drying charges and administrative and general expenses totalled $35,767,299.77. It would have been a simple matter of mathematical calculation to arrive at a figure of less than nine cents a bushel as the total cost chargeable to farmers in that pool.

In entering this debate I propose to restrict my remarks in the main to aspects of the budget which relate to our international position in the matter of trade. Before doing so I should like to comment generally upon the budget as a whole and to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) upon the responsible approach he has taken in preparing his first budget and the capabilities he displayed in presenting it.

The past year has seen a drop in the gross national product of 2 per cent, which has reflected itself in loss of national revenues and a resulting deficit in the past year. This drop, as has been stated, was mainly due to a poor crop in western Canada which has resulted in a slowing down of economic activities by reason of the fact that farmers curtailed purchases last year when they saw their crop deteriorate owing to the weather. To help accelerate recovery from this situation, which in the past few months has shown signs of improvement, the tax reductions in the budget are welcomed; and while their effects may not immediately be obvious they will no doubt have the effect of encouraging economic expansion and stimulating business activity in this country.

I see nothing seriously wrong with limited deficit financing in times when a lift is needed to stimulate activity and relieve unemployment. Every prudent person believes in accumulating for the time when he may be short. From 1945 to 1954 substantial surpluses had accrued, when times were buoyant. Now it is only common sense if necessary within a limited degree to budget for deficits when economic conditions warrant such action. We have heard the criticism that we are borrowing on the future. It can be just as well said that we are cashing in on the past, when surpluses were budgeted for and did accrue to the treasury.

As to the relief given, income tax reductions will provide additional purchasing power. Added stimulus will be given to corporate investment by the slight reductions in corporation taxes. The reduction of the excise tax on automobiles will leave further purchasing power available and assist the automobile industry. Reductions in tariff items on agricultural items will also reduce the cost of farm operations. These concessions were well placed, and all will help the expansion of economic activity in the country and so promote employment.

In the amendment proposed by the official opposition we find the charge that the government has failed to recognize the serious position in which the Canadian farmer and other producers find themselves. I stated at the outset of my remarks that I intended to direct my remarks to our trade situation, which I presume is the item of government activity at which this charge is levelled.

In the course of this debate and others we have heard from opposition benches charges to the effect that Canada has lost her British market, and also to the effect that this government has callously ignored the difficulties of certain industries in which unemployment exists, and that it has failed to provide adequate work for these people and their employees.

The reduction of our sales to Great Britain has been the result of many factors. In the debate in reply to the speech from the throne I drew attention to the fact that the comparative prices of agricultural products laid down in England by other countries were substantially lower than prices existing in Canada for the same products. I expressed the opinion that this competition could only be met by export subsidies or substantial reduction in domestic prices.

There is however another reason for the drop in our exports to England, and this applies not only to England but to all countries with which we have trade relations. And that is the practical problem of balance of trade.

Our goods can only be paid for by buying the goods of others, in the field of international trade. The hard fact is that we either take goods in payment or cease to exist as a trading nation. We cannot eat 400 million bushels of wheat, consume $915 million worth of pulp and newsprint, or our mineral production. Unless we can dispose of this production we cannot pay the producers of these commodities and they in turn cannot pay those employed by them and those who service them and supply them with equipment and materials.

We have repeatedly heard the argument in this house "Let us bar foreign goods and make work for Canadians". This would be all very well if we were a self-sufficient nation and independent of world trade; but we are not and therefore must be realistic in our approach to the problem. And it is my observation that this government, in spite of most pressing demands from the opposition and many industries, has resisted, in the interests of our Canadian economy, these demands for more protection which would have the effect of barring foreign imports and of increasing prices to consumers.

In specific cases and on particular merit, adjustments may be necessary and advisable; but any broad blanket advocation of higher protection is certainly not in the national interest.

Particular reference in this debate has been made to the textile woollen industry and to the unemployment resulting from British competition, and the inference has been left to the effect that the government has given no consideration to this problem.

In all fairness, I believe that the record of this government in this regard should be brought to the attention of the public and in the limited time available I propose to deal with this matter.

On May 12, 1954, as a result of numerous representations from the woollen industry and those dependent upon it, the former minister of finance directed the tariff board to make a study under the Tariff Board Act of item 554b of the customs tariff, which provides for a tariff on woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair n.o.p. a British preferential tariff of 20 per cent, and 12 cents per pound but not to exceed 50 cents per pound.

As a result of this direction, hearings were held in Ottawa and a number of plants were visited by the board and their economists. Appearing before the board were representatives of the Canadian industry, of the British wool industry, boards of trade of communities affected, agricultural associations, manufacturers, consumers and others. In all, 58 associations, companies and organizations submitted evidence or made representations.

The evidence indicates that those appearing before the board realized the seriousness of the woollen textile situation, sympathized with the workers who had lost their jobs, with the communities affected and with those who had invested their savings in the plants which have been closed. Nevertheless, it was the belief of many that the practice of helping a languishing industry by increased tariff protection, when other causes were the main contributing factors, was not sound.

In the direction to the board, in addition to requesting all relevant information concerning the woollen industry, the minister also requested all relevant information concerning as well the implications for the Canadian economy of imports of wool fabrics from the United Kingdom.

In the evidence submitted it was shown that our imports from England in 1952 were roughly $360 million; in 1953 $453 million, and the latest information indicates that in 1954 they had dropped to $392 million. Of these amounts, in 1952 woollen textiles accounted for $29 million; in 1953 for $38 million and in 1954 to a lesser amount averaging in recent years about $33 million a year, or about 12 per cent of the total earnings from sales of British goods in Canada. Our exports to the United Kingdom fell in 1954 to $652 million from $665 million in 1953.

The board therefore had two directives: first, to determine whether tariff item 554b was the cause of the difficulty in the wool cloth industry and, secondly, to inform the government regarding the implications a tariff increase might have on our trade relations with the United Kingdom.

In the hearings before the board, the industry and its supporters including suppliers of material, technicians, labour unions and some municipal authorities, argued that the real cause of the disaster that had overtaken the industry lay in the devastating effect upon prices in Canada of competition from British producers and the increased volume of their shipments to Canada. On the other hand, opposing parties, particularly the national council of clothing manufacturers of Canada, the United Kingdom wool textile delegation, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the interprovincial farm union council contended that although there were other causes, the major cause of the difficulty in the industry was the declining total demand in Canada for wool cloth, and that the import of British wool cloths, as such, was not the main cause of their difficulty.

The board report discloses that since 1948 there has been a drastic decline in the total consumption in Canada of wool fabrics, a drop from 47.5 million linear yards in 1948 to an estimated 31 million in 1954. In the war years and to 1948, demand was strong and the industry thrived, but by 1949 the demand began to decrease. The outbreak of the war in Korea, however, led to increased production and prices and by March, 1951, wool prices had risen three times higher than in June, 1950. This was followed by a drop in price by September of the same year of 64 per cent. Large inventory losses were sustained, weakening the financial position of the industry. In 1952 demand dropped still further, plants were forced to shorter time and employment declined considerably. In 1953, some improvement was noted which carried into 1954.

The report then proceeds to discuss the factors which contributed to the decline in demand, such as changes in type of demand, production of worsteds, cloths, woollens and blends.

In their reference to the 17 closed mills, the board expressed the opinion that their closing was probably due to a combination of factors, stating that there was no doubt that the management of some of the older mills, of which there were 11 closed, were not as alert and efficient as they should have been. Old machinery had not been replaced as it depreciated; often no salesmen were employed to meet competitive markets in recent years and, finally, they had failed to adapt production to changing demand.

The findings of the board regarding wages and employment were to the effect that in the industry labour is a substantial item in the cost of production. They found that despite substantial increases since the end of the war, wages were comparatively lower than those paid in other manufacturing industries, the average wage being 111.7 cents per hour in the industry as compared with 141.7 cents per hour for manufacturing generally. To meet the problem of high labour costs, production must be efficient. Manufacturers must take advantage of latest improvement in equipment to make possible considerable reduction in labour costs. The report indicates that full advantage has not been taken by the industry of technological changes which would have a marked effect in making the industry competitive.

The brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture points out that productivity in Canada per man hour over the past 30 years has increased about 2 per cent per annum compound rate. On this basis, the production per man hour in the woollen industry should have reached an index of 132 in 1953 instead of 111. It is significant to note that while the productivity per man hour in the woollen industry stood at 111 in 1953, the real wage index for the industry stood at 155.

In examining the financial position of the industry, the board found that from 1939 to 1950 the industry had been profitable. In 1951 and 1952 severe losses were evident in the companies examined and it was evident that a substantial portion of the industry was in serious difficulty. The closing months of 1954, however, showed an upswing in activity and it appeared that this trend would continue.

The report discloses that approximately 1,450 workers had lost their jobs as a result of closed mills, and estimates that 2,800 had been laid off in the period 1949 to 1953, many of whom had found other employment.

After examining conditions in the industry, the board report proceeds to cite and examine the causes of its present difficulty and classifies them under the following headings:

1. Decline in the demand for cloth containing wool.

2. Competition from synthetic fabrics.

3. Expansion of production facilities in relation to markets.

4. Merchandising policy of the industry.

5. Competition from British wool-cloth exporters.

The board expressed the opinion that the decline in the demand for cloth containing wool had been the most important single factor contributing to the present state of the wool cloth industry, demand having dropped in 1952 by 42 per cent of the 1948 peak and risen in 1953 to a drop of 36 per cent. They attributed this drop mainly to competition from synthetic fabrics, which in many cases have replaced woollens, generally are less expensive and not subject to wide price fluctuations.

Regarding the third item, "expansion of production facilities in relation to markets", the board found that following the war, plants were in a run-down condition. Demand was still heavy, with the result that surpluses previously accumulated were used up to re-equip and expand plant facilities in order to meet a market starved by war restrictions. When in 1948 demand decreased it was found that production facilities exceeded the market, competition for available markets increased, prices fell and only the most efficient producers could carry on, and some plants were compelled to close their doors, or operate on part time.

As to the styling and merchandising policy, the board report indicates that considerable criticism was levelled at the industry by manufacturers and consumers for their failure to change styles rapidly enough to meet changes in demand. Apparently, there has already been considerable improvement in the quality and style of many lines of Canadian production as a result of this experience, but markets were lost in the meantime.

Regarding merchandising, the criticism was that the industry had failed in their promotional campaign of Canadian-produced woollen goods, particularly in making Canadian consumers aware of the quality and good value of Canadian wool goods and in following up this campaign with a system of labelling to prevent misrepresentation. The report in all fairness indicates that until 1951 this was a minor problem, and that the Canadian manufacturer now realizes that he must ally quality production with an active sales policy if he is to hold his market.

[Mr. Weselak.]

The final important cause of the industry's trouble, "competition from British wool fabrics", was the main reason for the inquiry since, in its final submission to the board, the wool cloth industry had maintained that, owing to price competition from the United Kingdom industry, its continued existence was in jeopardy.

Of the total decline in the market from 1948 to 1954, which is estimated to have been about 16 million yards, Canadian production was decreased by 11·5 million and British imports by 4·6 million. In all sections of the market British imports had gained ground, but not to the extent that had been generally the belief, namely, 7 per cent in blends, 10 per cent in woollens, and 23 per cent in wool worsteds. This bore out and confirmed the board's deduction that much of the present difficulty was not the result of British competition but rather owing to the general shrinkage in demands for woollen cloths.

In examining the effective rate of duty, the board found that in 1954 the percentage of value for duty was three-tenths of 1 per cent lower than 1948, despite reductions in price, which would indicate that the 50 cent maximum tariff had become the governing rate in most cases, resulting in effect in a specific duty on the commodity. In view of these and other considerations, the board arrived at the conclusion that the effective rate of duty, per se, could not be considered as a cause of the industry's present difficulty, but on the other hand they did not deny that the competitive position of the British and Canadian industry had not changed since 1948.

As a matter of fact, the report points out that Canadian labour costs are 50 per cent higher than those in the United Kingdom, putting the Canadian manufacturer at a disadvantage which requires him to reduce labour costs by increased use of labour-saving machines, higher work loads and more efficient planning and operations. The industry is to be commended on recent reports to the effect that cognizance has been taken of this aspect of the problem and that it has been met in many ways.

The report concludes with the observation that rising wage rates and shrinking production have combined to increase the unit costs of Canadian cloth in recent years, with the result that in spite of a corresponding rise in British costs our competitive position has deteriorated.

In summarizing their report, the board had this to say on page 47, which I think is worthy of record, and I quote:

From the board's inquiry into the state of the wool-cloth industry, the following salient facts have emerged:

1. The total demand in Canada for cloth containing wool has fallen drastically since 1948. The effects of this decline in demand, per se, appear to have been more severe on the woollen than on the worsted section of the industry.

Among the factors contributing to this shrinkage of the market have been:

(a) the rise in wool prices, 1950-51, causing later inventory losses to the industry and, by the same token, initiating consumer resistance to increasing prices of wool clothing;

(b) the growing competition of the domestic synthetic industry, which competition seems to be impinging more on woollens than on worsteds;

(c) the competition of consumer durable goods for consumers' dollars, resulting in consumers spending a decreasing proportion of their income on clothes and personal furnishings.

2. As a result of the fall in demand, the Canadian market for cloth containing wool has become increasingly competitive; moreover, in recent years British competition has been exerting a strong influence on the level of prices for wool cloths. This influence appears to be stronger in the worsted section of the market.

3. Rising wage costs and shrinking production have combined to increase the unit cost of Canadian cloth in recent years. In spite of rising British costs this is still considerably higher than that of British exporters.

4. The effective rate of duty on wool cloth has shown little variation since 1948 and, per se, cannot be considered a cause of the wool cloth industry's present malaise.

Three of the four facts above stated—the shrinkage in total demand, the downward trend of prices, and the rising costs of Canadian producers—when taken together constitute the background to the picture that presented itself as the board's inquiry progressed. They help to explain two further and resultant facts: that employment has fallen, and that some sections of the industry have been and still are in financial distress. Equally, however, they suggest at least that some mills which are responding to the challenging situation will continue to hold their own; and that among those which appear unable to do so further mortalities would seem inevitable.

Hon. members will recall that in December of 1953 Bill No. 29 passed through this house to prevent end of line dumping in Canada, particularly of textile goods. It passed against the vocal protest of some members and with considerable concern on the part of others. Many thought that this was a retrograde step in our efforts to increase our international trade upon which we are so dependent. Recognizing the fact, however, that this type of competition was almost impossible to meet and that the industry was in difficulty the bill went through and became law. The industry, however, felt this was not enough and the result was the reference I have referred to and the board's subsequent report which attributed the difficulty to internal competition in the main rather than to imports.

We have heard complaints in this house and in the country of United States nonadherence to the principles of GATT in its establishment of quotas and import restrictions. Usually the United States has good reason for these actions, and a great deal of consideration by their tariff authorities is given to each problem as it arises. The practice in Canada of referring these matters to the tariff board is to be commended and should be continued. Tariffs should not be imposed merely as a result of political pressures to the detriment of the country as a whole and this report is a classic example of the inadvisability of accepting the principle or theory that tariff protection is the only solution to a problem of this nature. This item is also bound by GATT and only the most serious considerations should result in its disturbance.

Hon. members may often wonder why western representatives, be they farmers, business or professional men, are and always have been advocates of low tariffs. The answer lies in the fact that we recognize our dependence on exports. We recognize the fact that this is not only a prairie problem but a national problem. We know that, if we are not able to find remunerative markets for our surplus production, the farmers' and primary producers' purchasing power is cut down. The effect in the cities, towns and villages in these communities is immediately apparent but it does not stop there; it moves to eastern Canada where much of the industry of the country is concentrated, and they too feel the pinch.

It can be said without hesitation that most of the economic difficulties experienced in this country today can be attributed to the decline last year of grain exports to England of almost $300 million and to a loss of crop value this year as a result of weather of a sum similar in amount. Our economy depends upon export of primary products and to a limited extent of raw materials and toward this end this government has done a tremendous job of saving GATT, which has served us so well in restraining other countries from indiscriminately imposing import quotas and prohibitive tariffs against entry of our products. The attitude of the United Kingdom may be gathered from a report in the Winnipeg Tribune of April 13 of this year, which states:

British Labour party leader Clement Attlee said today his party would favour Britain's re-entry into the international wheat agreement but only under certain conditions.

Mr. Attlee hinted that one of the conditions would be for the countries that sell Britain wheat to buy more goods from Britain.

And he is directly quoted as saying:

But we also want to sell goods. It depends on whether the people who want to sell us wheat are prepared to buy our goods.

Here we have one of the answers by a responsible statesman from the United Kingdom giving an indication of what an increase in tariff may do to our British market.

The woollen textile industry has asked the government of Canada to abandon its liberal international trade policy which it has been attempting to establish before and since the inception of GATT in 1948. They have asked that protection against British woollen cloth be increased so that British imports will be reduced, hoping that more Canadian wool cloth would be sold in Canada and less British and that more employment would be created in Canada for workers in woollen goods factories. They have asked for what appears to be a simple solution to a difficult problem.

The problem, however, is not that simple. The granting of protection, while it may have temporarily eased the difficulty, would not have provided the solution, and the report so indicates. The real problem to be faced by the industry is the decreasing demand for the product, resulting mainly from competition with synthetics and the need for increased efficiency to levels higher than those achieved in recent years.

Supposing this government had acceded to the request of the industry for a prohibitive tariff, what would have been the results? In the first place the price to the consumer would have increased with the result that there would have been a further swing to synthetics, a swing which was experienced when woollen fabrics reached their high early in 1951. Any decline in the consumption of woollen goods would affect the Canadian industry to a greater extent than it would affect imports. Earlier in my remarks I pointed out that from 1948 to 1954 the market declined by 16 million yards; of this decline the Canadian industry lost 11·5 million yards and importers 4·6 million yards. It is therefore doubtful whether an increase in tariff would help the industry. On the other hand, it might well have the effect of further reducing consumption to the extent that the industry would be in far more serious trouble.

Secondly, granting higher protection to the woollen industry would lead other industries to consider such action as a strong precedent and pressures would be exerted by many industries experiencing difficulty for further tariff protection. Canada has been a leader in more liberal international trade policies, and any change in our position would strengthen the force in countries which seek to reverse the trend toward greater freedom of international trade.

And, finally, the problem of shortage of dollars which at present limits British purchases in this country is not an academic one, as is well illustrated by the British Labour party leader's remarks which I have just quoted. It is a cold hard fact and something which is well known by the farmers of Canada and other producers who look to the British market to sell their surplus products. A reduction in British exports to Canada as a result of higher tariffs would put into reverse a policy which aims at bringing the day nearer when the pound sterling would be freely convertible and British import restrictions removed. It might be of interest to members to know that the textile industry in England is also in difficulty. I have here a Reuters dispatch which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on April 22, which is headlined:

Lancashire Mills Fight to Survive.

Fewer wheels are spinning in the mill towns of Lancashire, where Britain's industrial revolution was born a century ago.

Unemployment is mounting.

Cause of the trouble is increasingly stiff competition from India and Japan, who learned many of the techniques of mechanized textile production from Lancashire.

Their goods, produced with a lower labour cost, are underselling Lancashire textiles overseas and even on the British home market.

Extended stoppages which began before Easter affected nearly 40,000 textile workers and there are widespread fears the unemployment will increase.

Many workers are leaving the industry fearful that unemployment will be chronic. The cotton board disclosed recently that in two months this year 4,000 textile workers left to find more secure jobs.

Indications are that many more plan a switch, even if it means taking lower wages.

The industry as a whole is critical of the Conservative government for not taking action on proposals by employers and trade unions to counter the effect of foreign competition.

But some relief was afforded this week in the budget which cut purchase tax on household textiles.

Walter Lee, secretary of the Oldham operative spinners' association trade union, said: "Confidence in the trade is lacking. Buyers are holding off placing orders except on a hand-to-mouth basis".

Here we have the type of criticism levelled at a Conservative government which a Conservative opposition in Canada sees fit to level at the Liberal administration.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the house to the closing remarks of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture contained in their brief to the tariff board, which I believe touches the root of the problem and suggests a possible remedy. I quote now from pages 27 and 28 of the brief:

As we said in our opening remarks, we fully realize the seriousness of the present woollen textile situation. We sympathize with the distress of workers who have lost their jobs, of small towns which have felt the loss of business from unemployment and of businessmen who have invested their savings in these plants which have been closed. In spite of this we do not believe it is sound to attempt, by increased tariff protection, to restore the industry to its post-war high volume of activity.

Up to this time the usual way to help a languishing industry has been to increase its tariff protection. However, we believe that it is time a completely new approach is made to problems of this nature. We believe that where it can be shown that due to fundamental and rather rapid changes in economic conditions an important industry is in serious distress, then the government should accept some responsibility to aid the industry, and especially the employees and communities adversely affected, to reorganize on a sound basis to meet the problems of the changed situation.

There are probably a number of ways in which this responsibility can be discharged. We will suggest one possible line of approach here.

It may well be that careful examination will show that some of the plants now closed would be able to re-establish themselves in the same towns by producing products in which they have a greater comparative advantage than in woollen cloth production.

We would point out that there are precedents for government assistance in the reorganization of industries which face fundamental and permanent changes in economic conditions. An example of one is the re-organization of the apple industry of the Annapolis valley of Nova Scotia, which we have cited.

Higher tariffs are a burden on consumers every year. Government financial assistance for reorganization on a sound economic basis need only be provided once. Such a policy we believe would be in the national interest and very directly in the interests of the employees, the employers and the towns which are presently in distress.

We put this suggestion forward for consideration believing it to be a more reasonable and sounder solution to the problem than either the proposal of higher protective tariffs or a policy of allowing the economic law of international comparative advantage to take its full toll of an ailing industry.

A lesson might possibly be taken by industry from a Chicago industrialist who appeared before the ways and means committee of the United States congress, which comment appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on April 8, 1954, as taken from the Globe and Mail. The comment reads:

A Chicago industrialist who has found a stable market for his products against Japanese competitors who pay only one-eighth of his labour costs, Charles H. Percy, laid bare for the ways and means committee of the congress at Washington the story of his company's progress in cost-cutting, product improvement and maintenance of profits, in the face of severe competition from Germany, Japan, England, Switzerland, Austria and Belgium. In one instance his company's competitive bid on tenders open to the world for camera lenses still would have been lowest—and profitable—without the allowance made for tariff protection.

As a manufacturer of photographic equipment, Mr. Percy's firm has had to meet all the post-war hazards to international trade in their most severe form. It has not been content with revolutionary reforms in production techniques at home. It also has engaged in a form of capital export which shares with foreign collaborators the advantages of those reforms. Annual sales of the company are in excess of $40 million—and he still wants congress to go all the way in the Eisenhower freer trade program.

The climax of Mr. Percy's statement was that these results arose directly from the influence of severe competition, and that it is doubtful whether the new techniques of his firm ever would have been developed without that spur. He now frankly welcomes the opening of the United States market to all comers in his field. If he cannot compete in a certain line, he will abandon its production and let the foreign producer have the market. He did just that in one instance, after taking a loss of a million and a quarter dollars. He holds that this course is good for his industry, for the national economy, and for the promotion of profitable foreign trade in general.

Mr. Percy's all-out advocacy of President Eisenhower's program for freer world trade is thus the result of practical experience as a successful world trader in one of the most competitive of all international industries. His story is one of the most impressive documents in the contemporary economic record. It is recommended without reservation to academic and practical economists, government planners of trade and fiscal policies and to industrialists generally. It is a complete answer to the problem of successful competition.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I had prepared a talk on the contents of the budget. However, after hearing what to the people in my area is an announcement of such great importance this afternoon, I am pleased that a little bit of leeway is usually allowed in this debate to enable members to express a few opinions on other matters.

I should like to take this opportunity to express the appreciation of the people of my riding—and I think I also speak for the people of a goodly number of other ridings in the area—when I express our gratitude to the Acting Postmaster General (Mr. Pickersgill) for his statement this afternoon with regard to the four-cent letter rate in the Vancouver metropolitan area and also with regard to the Burnaby postal services. We therefore are now at the beginning of obtaining an equal deal as compared with the people of the metropolitan areas of Toronto and Montreal. We feel that there are other services which these two older metropolitan areas are receiving; and in time I have no doubt that the members of parliament will be asking for those other privileges.

The four-cent rate means a great deal to the people of the immediate lower mainland. I spoke to one official of an organization that does not send out many letters. I refer to the New Westminster local of the International Woodworkers of America. Their office management informed me that the four-cent letter rate would, if implemented, save them in the neighbourhood of $300 to $400 a year. This action means actually hundreds of thousands of dollars in savings to the people and the commercial concerns of the lower mainland. It is therefore no mean announcement that we heard this afternoon.

I realize that the decision was made only very recently, and I believe that the Acting Postmaster General has neglected to include in the area that he designated such smaller points as Port Moody, and Port Coquitlam. I have no doubt that he will see fit to include those points in the four-cent letter zone very shortly.

We have received something that is as important to us in Burnaby as is the four-cent letter rate. We have received recognition of the name of Burnaby. We never found much to complain about with regard to the postal services in our area. We feel that the administration has been good, considering the problems that have had to be met. We have every confidence that the administration will continue to be at least as good as it has been in the years gone by. In fact, the Postmaster General (Mr. Cote) assured us some time ago that no changes would be made that would make any less efficient the postal services that we have been getting. It is now up to the deputy minister and his staff, as responsible civil servants, to see to it that the policy announced this afternoon by the Acting Postmaster General is carried out as efficiently and as speedily as possible.

I have not a doubt in the world that the mayor of New Westminster would have a good deal of advice to offer to the deputy postmaster general on how he is to administer the new set-up. However, in view of the deputy's experience during the past several weeks, I would advise him not to pay too much attention to the head of the city government in New Westminster. He might ask for the advice of the elected municipal officials of Burnaby which, after all, has almost three times the population of New Westminster. When the Acting Postmaster General was answering a question of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn), I think he was not aware of what happened last year when the postage rates were changed. At that time the rates of postage for the rural routes were not raised, and I hope I am safe in saying that the rural routes will also be getting the same four-cent letter rate. If he will look at last year's amendment to the postage rates I think he will agree with me.

I should like at this time to pay a heartfelt tribute to the role played in obtaining what we were after by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). Even though he recently threw a little bit of political mud at me back home, I nonetheless feel that he has rendered unique service as a Liberal member of parliament and I should like to hold him up as an example to a lot of other Liberal members of what a forthright rank and file member of the Liberal party is able to accomplish if he is willing to stand on his own two feet and not obey the dictates of the party machine.

Mr. Goode: May I interrupt my hon. friend to say that is most kind of him and I appreciate it very much.

Mr. Regier: Here was a case where a political machine, whose spokesmen were the mayor of New Westminster and, I regret to say, an hon. member of the other place, was doing its utmost to undo the worthy efforts of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. I know that the people back home are not going to forget easily how the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond finally won out after hewing honestly to the line on this matter. I think a great deal of credit is also due to the South Burnaby board of trade who have worked in very close co-operation with the two members of parliament from Burnaby. I know that the North Burnaby board of trade will also be happy about the institution of the metropolitan postal system. In my view Burnaby, as an entity in Canada, has at last been born. It is a new Canadian baby, if you like, and you will be hearing a lot about it in years to come.

I think I should also thank the hon. member for New Westminster for his co-operation and in return offer him my co-operation in some work he is attempting to do. At least, I hope he is attempting to do it. I refer to the cleaning up of the nest of Liberal corruption that exists in his city and has existed for quite a long while. In my opinion one reason why the Liberal party in British Columbia is rapidly going the way of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan is that the people there are fed-up to the teeth with the old type of pork barrel politics that has been responsible for keeping this government in office for so long. I only hope the day is not too far distant when the people of central Canada will also be thoroughly fed up.

I notice that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) is in his place. I know he is considering an auxiliary airport for the lower mainland of British Columbia. Someone has advocated that my riding might be the site of such an airport. I have the advice of the Coquitlam municipal council when I say that I do not want an auxiliary airport in my riding. I shall be very happy if the Minister of Transport will agree to the demands of the member for New Westminster and see that such an airport is established in the riding of New Westminster.

Discussion so far in the budget debate has largely revolved around the subject of income tax. I believe the income tax was first introduced in Canada as an emergency measure during the first world war. However, after that war was over the income tax was not removed. That was the time I began to hear about such things as income tax, and I still remember the explanation given to me of what an income tax is. I was told that an income tax was a means whereby the federal government took money from those who had more than enough to meet their needs and used it in order to help that section of the population that had less than enough to meet their needs. I always looked upon that as a great thing and a worth-while measure.

When the second world war came we of course used the income tax for various other purposes. We used it to reduce the amount of consumer spending. We lowered the exemptions greatly in order to pay for the war effort as far as possible. However, when a single man earning $1,000 a year has to pay income tax today or a married man earning as little as $2,000 has to pay income tax, the tax has lost its original intent. It is no longer a tax taking money from those who have more than enough in order to help those who have less than enough. When you tax the below average wage earner in Canada you cannot say it is a tax used for the distribution of wealth in the nation. It is taking money out of one pocket of the taxpayer and, minus the cost of administration, placing the net returns in his other pocket. It is robbing Peter to pay Paul. I do not favour that type of income tax, and in levying it I think we should get back to its original intent.

I should like to say a few words about the reductions that have been announced. I fail to see why some people with incomes in the neighbourhood of $7,000 or $8,000 a year should receive a tax reduction of $100 or more whereas other people receive a mere $3, $4 or $5. I think the people who need a tax reduction most, who need the greatest number of dollars in their pockets, are the people in receipt of low incomes. I think the method adopted whereby much help is given to those who do not need help and very little help, if any, to those who need help has done nothing to add to the purchasing power of the Canadian people. If people with incomes of $7,000 or $8,000 pay $100 less in taxes next year they will not use the $100 to add to their purchasing power. If they do anything at all with it, they will add it to their savings. In my opinion raising the basic exemptions would have been much more equitable and would have served a much more useful purpose. All income tax payers would thereby have received an equal tax reduction and the purchasing power of the Canadian people would have been enhanced.

What about the tax reductions that have been given Canadian corporations? I maintain that the tax reduction granted is not going to help any plant or industry facing difficult times to remain open. After all, when corporations make no profit they do not have to pay income tax at all and when you reduce the taxes only for those corporations whose net income is over $20,000 a year, you are not helping one single industrial enterprise to remain in business. You are not supplying a single unemployed man with additional employment. You are not protecting the employment of any of those who are now employed.

These tax reductions to corporations also cause me at this time to protest as vigorously as I can the wholesale robbery that has been occurring on the Canadian scene as a result of what some people fondly call the ploughback method. You look at the financial statements of Canadian corporations, Mr. Speaker, and you will see that time after time corporations making a certain amount of profit will retain a half, or very often over half, of the net earnings. They pay out less than half to the shareholders. I feel that this is outright robbery of the rights of the short-term shareholders in Canadian corporations. The company says it is not paying dividends out as earnings would indicate it is able, but is withholding half the net earnings for the good of the enterprise. However, those who this year own that enterprise will not necessarily be the ones who will reap the fat earnings that may be dished out in later years because of this ploughback.

I feel that if it is not robbery of the short-term shareholder in those companies, it is robbery of the consumer of the products the company has made because it is obvious the consumer has been charged more than he needed to be charged for the goods. If it is not robbery of the consumers of Canada, it is robbery of the workers who have worked in that enterprise and who have really, by the sweat of their brow, earned those profits and who have received wages that were much less than they might have received. I think that money for re-investment in Canadian business should be honestly obtained by anyone planning either expansion of existing business or the opening of a new business.

I should like also to express my opposition to the false belief that some Canadians seem to have that we can expand ourselves into prosperity. For a while many of us in British Columbia had the notion that as long as there was new investment capital coming in, we could expand ourselves into eternal prosperity. It is about as ridiculous a notion as a wheel of perpetual motion. It reminds me of the individual who is living beyond his means, and month after month has to add to the money he owes in order to meet his ever-increasing debts until he finally winds up in bankruptcy.

How could the little man have been helped on April 5 last? I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) said yesterday when he said he would have preferred to see some easing of the onerous sales and excise taxes. I believe the little man would have been more than happy if he had heard an announcement that the sales tax on clothing had been removed. I believe the tax on all forms of material needed for the construction of houses should also have been removed. I think the government might have helped the little man who has a modest home and who finds the real estate tax on his home is climbing year by year. It would have helped if the government had announced a policy of low interest rates to municipalities, thereby removing the need for loading homes with the necessary debentures to cover such social needs as paved roads, water works, sewers and so on.

I was pleased to note that at the meeting of provincial premiers with our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the governments of British Columbia and Saskatchewan both called for federal aid and participation in a public investment program to meet the rising social needs of the Canadian people. Unless this government is prepared to embark on a public investment program in co-operation with the lower levels of government, we shall find our provincial governments having to resort to ever-rising sales taxes. We will find our municipalities and educational authorities having to continue raising the taxes on our homes.

We in this group, Mr. Speaker, are sound money folk. We do not believe that money can be taken out of the hat or out of a printing machine. We are firmly convinced, and we have the highest regard for the rights of ownership. We believe that all the unsold goods in Canada are owned by somebody, and it is wrong to say we will make more money available unless we are fully aware of where we are going to get that money. You cannot add anything to the net purchasing power of the people by simply increasing the amount of currency in circulation. I think that is very simple economics, and has always been endorsed by the Canadian people. However, we do believe the purchasing power of the Canadian people can be vastly extended by having every Canadian who is willing and able to work at work turning out the goods that are necessary. We may think that we can ill afford the necessary $300 million or $500 million that a national health insurance program would cost us. However, having over 600,000 unemployed costs the nation far in excess of the cost of a national health insurance program.

We are also a party that believes in rigid economy and efficiency in government. Because of Liberal propaganda, word seems to have got around that the C.C.F. is a party that does not believe in economy in government. We in the C.C.F., who have such a great social program to offer the Canadian people, are keenly aware that if we are going to meet this obligation to the Canadian people, then the utmost economy and efficiency on the part of those who are handling public funds is necessary.

I should like to mention one other thing that I do not like about our income tax. I do not like this business of some Canadians paying at a different tax rate from other Canadians. Here again I was pleased to note that the premier of British Columbia, when he spoke at the opening of the conference, endorsed a resolution passed last winter by the C.C.F. national council, in so far as it relates to any provincial government that does not want to sign a tax-rental agreement. In that resolution he advocated, as we have done in this house, that the income tax rate should be the same throughout the nation. We feel that the citizens of any province that does not want to sign a tax-rental agreement should be permitted to deduct the full amount of their provincial tax from the federal tax, provided they are willing to admit that such a thing as the national interest exists, and that the over-all control of monetary and fiscal policy at the national level is necessary and that they will not exceed the limits of taxation imposed on other Canadian citizens.

Now, we feel that that is a policy that could have been sold to the people of Quebec. We think the people of that province want to be Canadians, and are just as good Canadians as any of the rest of us. We believe this policy would have been acceptable to them. However, in its wisdom this government chose to announce a unilateral decision whereby it has now created two types of Canadian citizens, one of which is to have one set of income tax figures, and the other to have another set.

When I spoke in the house on January 12 some hon. members shouted the name of Maillardville. May I inform hon. members now that since that time I have held my finest public meeting at Maillardville, British Columbia. There were some 175 persons at the meeting which, I suggest, is an amazingly good turnout for a political meeting at this time. That meeting concluded in a most harmonious fashion, and I told the people there that as long as they were going to send me to Ottawa I was going to continue to fight, to the utmost of my ability, until I saw the day that their four and a half million fellow citizens, relatives and friends in the province of Quebec enjoyed just as high a standard of living as that of other Canadians. And I shall continue to do so, all misrepresentations notwithstanding.

In the few minutes left at my disposal I should like to speak about markets, because markets for our Canadian goods affect vitally our level of prosperity. I have here the daily bulletin released on April 26 by the dominion bureau of statistics, which shows a growing increase in our trading deficit with the United States and a growing increase in our trading surplus with the United Kingdom. I feel that this is a dangerous course, and that action must be taken to reverse the trend.

The United States buys from us only those goods they have to buy. I do not think the problem is any longer the simple one of free trade or high tariffs. I do not think that Canadians any longer can be classified either as high tariff or free trade citizens. However, if I were asked, I would say that so far as the United States is concerned I am a high tariff man; because I believe it is in the best interests of primary producers in Canada that we have a high tariff policy in our dealings with the United States. I am equally convinced that we should remove tariff barriers in our dealings with the rest of the world.

The rest of the world needs those commodities we have in surplus quantities—surpluses which are hampering our prosperity at the moment. I would like to see, if necessary, even an export tax on our shipments of raw resources into the United States. No longer can we afford to ship raw oil into that country to be refined over there and then sold back to us, thereby robbing Canadians of employment. I do not think that practice can long continue. While I am neither a free trade nor a high tariff man, I am a high tariff man when it comes to the United States and, if you like, I am a free trade man when it comes to the rest of the world, which requires these commodities we have in surplus.

I believe I have said about all I need to say on that subject. However, I would repeat my regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has not seen fit to raise the exemption levels for the payment of income tax. In my view the reductions he has given are badly distributed, in respect of both corporations and individuals. I feel he is making the rich richer and the poor poorer. He has made no tax concessions I can see that will help over half the population of Canada who pay no income tax. In my view, reductions in excise taxes on articles such as clothing would give at least some help to these people. I see no help for governments at lower levels, nor do I see anything to meet our growing need for social services in Canada. There is nothing for the unemployed—except relief, and the process of turning back to the miserable, hungry thirties. There is nothing to encourage trade so as to help the farmers of Canada, nor is there anything to encourage greater employment in Canadian factories. There is nothing to prevent growing economic enslavement of our nation to the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, if this is a typical Harris budget, then I would advise the aspirant to the leadership of the Liberal party to apply for leadership in what I like to term the new, and yet so old, Liberal-Conservative party of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, on December 15, 1952 when I spoke in this house I asked the Minister of Finance for a tax reduction and, in the spring of 1953 I was greatly pleased to note that the government had decided to lower certain taxes.

In that same speech, I also stated that we should, in the near future, provide assistance for invalid people. At the last session, the government deemed it advisable to enact legislation to that effect, legislation which must be accepted by the participating provinces.

In the last few months the revenue of the government has diminished somewhat on account of crop failures last year and the loss of foreign markets. If we succeed in selling our products on the markets of the world, and that is the problem at present, everything will be back to normal and our revenue will increase.

In spite of the gigantic works undertaken this year, the government has been able to alleviate the burden of the taxpayer, thus leaving him more money for various purchases and giving him some encouragement.

Increased capital investments for the development of our natural resources will also alleviate unemployment—a problem which has been so often in the limelight during this session—and will endow the nation with new wealth.

In spite of this temporary unemployment situation we have reason to look to the future with confidence. Our confidence will increase with the lowering of taxes—of which I will speak—and the vanishing of gloomy pictures such as those that have been painted concerning the present situation.

The government is not wholly responsible for the present unemployment because it cannot alone remedy completely such a situation; economic forces must be favourable and everyone must be willing to co-operate toward its solution. With the help of Providence, which we should seek, we will succeed, but without it all our efforts will be in vain.

The debate on the annual budget is an important event anxiously awaited by all taxpayers. The budget can bring about an improvement or a lowering of the standard of living, according as to whether taxes are lowered or increased.

During the previous years when inflation was a major consideration in daily life, the government had looked to compulsory savings and even increased taxes as a means of controlling it. In this way inflation was satisfactorily brought under control, while surpluses were accumulated in order to reduce the national debt in such a way as to deserve general admiration throughout the world.

In the last three years this country has had to go to considerable lengths to organize its defence and fulfil its obligations under the North Atlantic treaty.

These efforts must no doubt continue, but at a somewhat reduced pace, due to suspension of hostilities in Korea, which is such as to provide us with reserves out of our war production. The latter must of necessity be limited, as is evidenced in the budget.

At this moment I am showing my interest in the budget by bringing forward a few suggestions based on several years' experience in the preparation of municipal budgets, smaller in size and simpler than that of the government of this country, but large enough, nevertheless, to convey a general impression of its practical application.

I will draw upon my experience in this field to talk about this question and should my humble suggestions appear worthy of implementation, I will feel that I have contributed in some degree to the elaboration of measures which cannot fail to bear fruit.

[Mr. Leduc (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle).]

First, a few words on the preparation, adoption and implementation of budgets.

Estimates are prepared by the officers of the various departments which submit them for approval to their respective ministers who, in turn, bring them to the attention of treasury board. In most cases the ministers involved assume that these estimates are necessary to administration.

It is to be expected that those officials whose duty it is to submit the items make sure that the amounts are sufficient, and in order to avoid any deficit they may submit estimates in excess of actual needs.

The taxation rates, which are based upon the total of the estimates, cannot therefore be reduced or can be reduced but little unless our national production increases. Since the increase will be very slight this year, the only way to lower our taxes was through deficit budgeting and a reduction in expenditures.

A perusal of public accounts for 1953 shows that no appropriation has been exceeded and that expenses in many cases have been far less than the amount provided. That is an indication in itself that appropriations were excessive.

A brief look at some items will support my contention. If we take for instance the Department of Agriculture we find the following:

	Appropriation	Expenses
Operation and Maintenance	$ 456,586.00	$ 450,993.83
Animal pathology	469,246.00	435,065.00
Dairy research Bacteriology	456,586.00	450,993.00
Botany and Plant pathology	1,233,231.00	1,156,959.00
Chemistry	641,705.00	607,690.00
Entomology, Operation and Maintenance	1,814,150.00	1,708,168.00
	$9,734,432.00	$8,628,458.00
Excess of appropriations		$1,105,974.00

To obviate the difficulty created by the fact that no appropriation can be exceeded, only the total amount of the appropriations of a particular service could be taken into account; it would be in order to make transfers from one item to the other provided that the total amount of the estimates for a particular service is not exceeded.

Thus, officials would not be tempted to try to get approval for larger amounts on each item for fear of a possible deficit on any of them, if it were possible to make transfers from one account to another.

Such a policy would reduce the estimates and would have every department control and administer funds on a scale much smaller than the present one.

These suggestions are made in a constructive way and in the light of practical experience gained in another administrative field which has been fruitful and which could not be but fruitful also in this field.

I make them in the hope that they may be used to ease the income tax burden.

On the other hand, if it is not advisable to spend more than the amount of the appropriation, with the difference to be made up through a transfer from another item of the same department which could have the amount provided reduced or from the total appropriation, and if it is deemed advisable to keep the present system, I think that, as far as taxes are concerned, the means of previous surpluses could be used to reduce taxes.

It will be said that these surpluses have been used to cut down our debt. Very well, but we must remember that this generation has been called upon to pay for three wars as well as for the cost of unemployment relief in the years 1933-39.

Therefore, would it not be fitting that the next generation, which will be more numerous and which will know a better standard of living, should look after that debt?

The coming generation and those that will follow will profit more than those of the last two or three decades from the benefits of social welfare available to them. So I think that they could very well look after the gradual reduction of that debt.

I am one of those who believe in the future of this country, and the present generation, which has toiled so hard, should get some respite; we should grant it that respite as far as it is possible to do so.

I expect that the federal-provincial conference will bring about a discussion which may dispel any misunderstanding or erroneous concept of the part to be played by the administration in the best interest of this country.

The Quebec provincial income tax was imposed as a result of a lack of understanding and we must try to find a basis for agreement.

If we are unable, in this country, to reach such an agreement, how can we hope to pacify hostile nations and bring about a world-wide peace?

The leaders of a country must trust each other, and it should be possible to smooth out or even avoid any difficulties that might arise by mutual, fair and reciprocal concessions and providing that the advancement of this country is put above all other considerations of a personal or purely regional nature.

A spirit of conciliation has arisen that should be beneficial to our country; the clouded horizon of yesterday is clearing up and a more enlightened optimism prevails. Let us consider our problems without acrimony and prejudice and we shall get to understand each other better and deserve the title of Canadian citizens who have at heart the progress and the interests of this country which should gain in stature and importance as well as in moral and material greatness.

Considering the 1955-56 budget that has been brought down, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is counting, for this fiscal year, on an increase in business and on a reduction of administration costs.

I congratulate him on this; it made possible a reduction of personal and corporate income taxes and he will probably avoid the expected deficit if conditions get somewhat better.

I am of the opinion that the reduction of certain appropriations would help to impress upon the officials of the various departments concerned the principle of thrift which would enable them to run their respective branches on their estimates, or thereabouts.

The most efficient means at our disposal to manage the country economically would be, I think, to try to reduce all appropriations that could be reduced, and there must be several of them, according to the statement I referred to a moment ago.

(Text):

During the course of the debate on the act to amend the Municipal Grants Act, I listened attentively to the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who stated that 99 per cent of the municipalities were not in a position to meet their expenditures and look after their administration properly owing to lack of funds. I was astonished to hear such a declaration, knowing that it is far from the truth. I desire to remind him that this percentage of 99 per cent comes from his own imagination, and is not borne out by the facts. As I look over the different municipalities in my own county and neighbouring counties, I can state to the hon. gentleman that this year Lachine has reduced its taxes 20 cents on the $100;

Dorval has reduced its taxes by 30 cents again this year. The municipality of Ville St. Pierre closed its financial year last year with a surplus of $20,000. Ste. Anne de Bellevue had a surplus. All the municipalities on the island of Montreal, except one, have had a surplus. The city of Montreal, according to the comptroller of finance of that municipality, had a surplus of over $1 million last year.

Looking at the provincial records for the year 1952, I find that in 1951 the revenues of the municipalities, that is the cities and towns, totalled $112,081,000, and for 1952, $114,902,000. Expenditures for 1951 amounted to $106,601,000, and for 1952, $113,358,000.

We have to take into account that capital expenditures were made amounting to $6,140,000 in 1951 and $5,641,000 in 1952. Had these expenditures not been made the surpluses would have been much higher. I have a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of March 24 which states:

> Quebec's municipal corporations reported an increase in both revenue and expenditures during 1953 and a $35,000,000 increase in debenture debt.
> The 1953 edition of municipal statistics, released today by the Quebec bureau of statistics, lists 1953 revenues at $163,503,000 compared with $146,315,000 in 1952 and expenditures at $157,063,000 compared with $114,896,000 in 1952.

(Translation):

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that in the preparation of the estimates the items be more closely related to the contemplated expenditures.

The various departments would then endeavour to stay within the estimates, because if they ask for 10 per cent more than what is strictly needed, for fear of incurring a deficit, they would be tempted to spend the whole amount, whence the difficulty of avoiding expenses, that might be necessary in certain cases, but are superfluous in many others.

(Text):

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) represents part of the county in which I was born, Bruce, I studied the budget most carefully in the hope that I might be able to find a number of virtues in it. However, I think the only commendable feature that I have been able to discover is the venture into deficit financing which he has made, and before I conclude I hope to have time to say a little more about deficit financing.

I am afraid that I cannot go along with the hon. members who have congratulated the Minister of Finance upon having given some relief in the field of income tax. With the majority of Canadian families being in a position where they do not pay any income tax, this is not the time to consider easing the burden of those who do pay income tax. I realize that members of parliament with their sessional indemnities will have a sizeable reduction, but believe me this reduction is not going to solve the problem that faces many this year.

A married man with two children receiving $2,500 a year will have a reduction amounting to $4 or approximately 8 cents per week. That really is not enough to get excited about. But I have examined four other groups. First, the position of those who receive $50,000 a year is going to be improved by $954 per year. We have not a very large number in this group, but the 1,840 who receive incomes of $50,000 or more receive a sizeable total income of $143 million. The income tax payer receiving $50,000 a year is going to have an additional $954 per year to spend. How sorry should we feel for the poor chap who has to pay $20,145 to the income tax authorities and must get along somehow or other on only $29,855 per year. That means that he is 50 cents short of having $100 per day for 300 days in the year. It seems to me that we should not shed any crocodile tears over a person who has that amount left to spend. Giving that person an additional $954 to spend is not going to help the unemployment problem at all.

Those receiving $100,000 a year are going to be better off to the tune of $1,954. After they have paid their scheduled income tax somehow or other they will have to balance their budgets on $163.60 per day. Those in the $200,000 per year group are getting relief to the tune of $3,904 and will have left after taxes $261.50 per day for 300 days in the year. The last group mentioned in the table, those receiving $400,000 a year, will be helped to the tune of $7,854. After paying their income taxes they will have left $419.38 per day.

I do not think that any member in this chamber can suggest with a straight face that people in these income tax brackets who are getting such substantial assistance are really in need of special legislation. I think this budget is going to be remembered for what it fails to do rather than for these minor changes.

I cannot think of any good reason why relief should have been given to corporations. While they do pay a sizeable amount in corporation taxes, the Bank of Canada in its most recent statistical summary shows in a chart that representative Canadian corporations—manufacturing, mining, finance, insurance and so on—are in a very healthy position.

This chart shows that after paying taxes their profits in the years since 1950 ranged from a high of $455 million to a low of $290 million. At the last of 1954 the profits after taxes were up to $337 million.

I submit that the minister should not bring in a budget without facing the fact that the net farm income in Canada has been declining at an alarming rate since 1951 in particular. I have the details of national accounts, income and expenditure, put out by the dominion bureau of statistics. The 1951 net income received by farmers amounted to $2,108 million; in the next year it was down to $1,860 million; the next year $1,616 million; and in 1954, $1,109 million. I submit that this alarming decrease in farm net income is having a most serious effect on all sectors of our economy and before I conclude I shall make some suggestions on which I feel the minister must act.

Over the week end I spent some time in a study of "Distribution of non-farm incomes in Canada by size 1951". I suggest to hon. members that they study this booklet showing the distribution of non-farm incomes. I have prepared a little table from this and these figures have been confirmed by Miss Podoluk, of the dominion bureau of statistics, who worked on this study.

I have arranged this table, an analysis of the distribution of Canadian family annual non-farm income among 265 representative families of two or more persons, according to the income groups. As to the income group from nothing to $2,499, 34·2 per cent of the families fall in that category. Out of 265, there would be 91. The average for the group would be about $1,500. The exact amount is $1,530. As to the second group, $2,500 to $9,999, 63·8 per cent fall in that category, or 169, with an average yearly income of around $4,200; or, to be exact, $4,176. As to the third group, over $10,000, 2 per cent fall in that category, or 5 out of 265, with an average annual income of $17,907, or nearly $18,000.

Hon. members might be interested in knowing just why I took the figure 265. That happens to be the number of members there should be in the chamber tonight if they were all here. I should like those who are here to forget the indemnity or any other income that members might have. I should like the members to picture themselves as being in the position of the average Canadian family. Here is how we would proceed to distribute that family non-farm income, two or more persons in the family. I might say that if we had the figures for the farm income, the picture would be worse, but this is bad enough. If we could divide the chamber, we would take a block from just this side of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) and of the government members in that row down to this side, 91 in the group, with an average income of $1,500 a year. Then the next group would, of course, comprise the majority. There would be 169 in that group and the average income would be roughly $4,200. That would leave us five down in the section where the independent members are. There are only five in that group getting $10,000 a year or more. The average would be $18,000 per year.

Mr. Speaker, here is one of the fundamental problems confronting the Canadian economy at the moment. If this government cannot find ways and means to get more purchasing power into the pockets of 34·2 per cent of the families in Canada who have an average income of $1,500 a year, I think they have failed to discharge their responsibility. If these figures were broken down to show those who had under $1,000, under $1,500 and under $2,000, you would have a more shocking picture still. But any family in Canada today getting $1,500 is in the position, if they pay rent, of not having enough money left to pay for their groceries, shoes, clothing or health services.

Coupled with these figures that I have just given, I should like to present the figures in connection with the consumer credit outstanding in Canada as recorded in the Bank of Canada's statistical summary. This is the issue of March, 1955; it is the one that has just been released. I think it is fairly obvious that with a third of the families in Canada receiving an average income of $1,500, with so many tempting advertisements urging us to buy radios, televisions, automobiles, fur coats and everything under the sun, there is bound to be difficulty. As a matter of fact, when you go into your grocery store now in Ottawa, you must decide whether you want a Plymouth car or a Pontiac car, trip to Hollywood or what-have-you. Most of the large grocery chains are engaged in a competitive give-away program in order to get people into their stores to get a car along with an order of groceries. In due course somebody will get a car. But while just Pontiacs and Plymouths are being offered now, if other storekeepers are going to keep in the running, they will be obliged to offer a Buick or Cadillac.

These charts at page 81 showing the consumer credit outstanding present what to me is an extremely disturbing picture. Charge accounts have increased from $370 million in March 1951 to $503 million in December, 1954. As to instalment credit, retail dealers have increased their accounts from $166 million to $315 million and finance companies from $216 million to $480 million. Cash personal loans through the banks, the small lending companies and credit unions have increased from $394 million to $665 million. The totals have increased from $1,146 million in March, 1951 to $1,963 million in December, 1954. Taking the two things together, Mr. Speaker—with one-third of the families in Canada in the lower income brackets with an average income of $1,500, with living costs as high as they are, and with this alarming increase in consumer credit outstanding—I believe they suggest that there is trouble just ahead.

Unfortunately the bureau of statistics did not compile this sort of information before the war or prior to the depression in 1929 and 1930. But, as I recall it, one of the danger signals prior to the serious crash in 1929-30 was the large amount of consumer credit that was outstanding. As long as people receiving $1,500 can get storekeepers and small loan companies to extend them credit so that instead of spending at the rate of $1,500 a year they are able to spend at the rate of $2,000 or $2,500, it is fine so long as they can continue to increase their borrowings. But a time will come when those who are trying to live on a $3,000 income when their cheque is only on the basis of $1,500 will find that there is trouble ahead.

I therefore think it is only fair to ask what should be done. I commend the minister for introducing deficit financing. I think it is a subject that should be developed. I am sorry that there will not be enough time to present the sort of development this particular case deserves. However, I want to make it clear that I am not asking this government to adopt a socialist program. I am merely asking them to carry out a program which a capitalist government developed and practised during the war crisis. Let us see what was done in the war period. I have before me "Statistics and Information on Dominion Government Public Borrowing Operations from September, 1939 to December, 1945". I find that our total war requirements in 1939 amounted to $23 million; in 1940 they amounted to $246 million; in 1941 they amounted to $1,413 million; in 1942 they amounted to $2,402 million; in 1943 they amounted to $4,177 million; and in 1944, the all-time high, they amounted to $4,923 million. But hon. members will tell me this: Oh yes, but we were fighting for our lives then; we would do anything to save the world from nazi tyranny. That is quite right.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

But I submit that in peacetime, if given a lead by this government, the Canadian people will put forth in the year 1955 the same sort of effort they were able to put forth in the year 1944.

These two fundamental problems are obvious to every Canadian. It is a tragedy that farm income should be down approximately 50 per cent to what it was four years ago and that 600,000 Canadians should be in the position where they cannot find jobs and are going to be receiving relief from municipalities, provinces or the federal government, or a combination of all three, when we consider the great resources of Canada, the achievements of the Canadian people during the war years, and the hungry people all over the world.

During that same period we managed to keep our non-war expenditures at fairly low levels. However, I was interested in noting that we did find money for unemployment and agricultural relief. We spent $49·9 million in 1939, $57 million the next year, then $34 million, $8·5 million, $5·3 million and $3·9 million. All through the period we were required to put aside some money for unemployment and agricultural relief. It is also interesting to note that the war saved the Canadian National Railways from a continuous record of deficit financing. Before the war the publicly owned railway was running in the red over $1 million a week, but come the war we were able to change the deficit to a very substantial profit.

Therefore I think the job that the minister should undertake now is to face the fact first of all that 600,000 Canadians want work and cannot find it and, second, that the Canadian farmers want to continue to produce maximum amounts of food for our own people and for hungry people all over the world. In a little pamphlet prepared by our national office I note that in 1952 stolen property apparently accounted for losses of something over $6 million, business failures $32 million, automobile accidents $77 million, wages lost through illness $159 million, salaries and wages lost through strikes and lock-outs $15 million, but losses of production through unemployment amounted to $1,235 million.

Here are some of the constructive, desirable things that we in Canada could and should do. If we would do them there would be no unemployment problem and no difficulty at all about getting the people to consume adequate food. I think it is as plain as A, B, C that if one-third of the families of Canada have an average income of $1,500 they cannot possibly consume desirable quantities of milk, butter, eggs, cheese, cereals and other products. We should undertake to build 500,000 new homes. We should speed up construction of the trans-Canada highway. We should build more hospitals, schools, parks and recreational facilities. New industries should be established in depressed areas. Two million furnaces are required and a similar number of refrigerators. We need about 2 million electric vacuum cleaners, 1,500,000 telephones, 1 million washing machines, and about 2 million homes, rural and non-rural, need water and modern conveniences.

I have gone through government budgetary expenditure and have made a note of some of the politically popular and socially desirable increases the minister should include in the budget with a view to alleviating unemployment and winning the battle in which Canadians should be engaged. First of all there are our veterans. We have had previous discussions in the house regarding the position of the veterans of the Boer war, even the Riel rebellion, world war I and world war II. We are proposing to spend $234 million for those who have served this country. I suggest that an extra $200 million be placed in their hands because these people are in the lower income third who are not able to buy the things they would like to have.

The next item I should like to mention is the Colombo plan. I should like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in the position where he will eventually have as much money to spend as his colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). I have been very careful not to suggest any reduction in our national defence expenditures. We have been told that the very large amounts we have spent on national defence have been a major factor in preventing a third world war. No one can prove that is right or wrong, but I am not going to argue about it. I think Canada can continue to have as many people in the armed services as we now have, continue to spend as much money on national defence as we are now spending and do these other things as well. We would still have a budget a good deal less than we had during the war years, and we would be in the position where we would have a million of our youngest and strongest people available to help with the constructive program I have suggested.

Then there is the question of grants to universities. This is one way the federal government can assist education without opposition from any of the provinces. Since we cannot get agreement with respect to general aid for education, I see no reason why we should not spend $100 million a year to aid our universities. Since it costs the Minister of National Defence $65,000 to train a jet pilot, surely $100 million to train university students would not place any strain on us.

With respect to family allowances, I could not agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) when he suggested this afternoon that the Canadian economy will not stand a doubling of family allowances. The argument he advanced today certainly applied when the family allowance legislation was before parliament in the first place, because at that time we were concerned about our war effort, but I submit that the family allowance expenditures of $383 million have been a major factor in making it possible for a great many people in the lower income brackets to have some money every month with which to buy food for their children. Therefore I suggest an increase of $400 million in family allowances.

As to old age assistance, here is a group who really must have additional help, and I suggest another $100 million. The next matter is health. I should like to be most generous to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I think he suggested at one time it would require $600 million to carry out the sort of program he had in mind back in 1945. I think we should have another $600 million to introduce an over-all national health program. This would not be in addition to what we are now spending for health but would merely mean that there would be comprehensive health services for all Canadians and our people would not have to worry about meeting such costs at a time when they are sick and unable to earn.

I have suggested an extra $100 million for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). Some concern was expressed this afternoon about the cutting off of the vocational training program that has been so popular throughout the country. The amount of $100 million would more than cover that. I do not have in mind pouring money into labour, to deal with the unemployment problem, but if the sort of program I have proposed is carried out Canada will not have any unemployment problem.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) needs more money. I notice that the net operating loss of the agricultural prices support board was only $3·5 million in 1950-51 and $1·7 million the next year. In the next two years the foot-and-mouth disease resulted in the amount increasing to $32·5 million and $37·8 million, but in 1954-55 the amount was down again to $3·2 million. There is nothing for the Minister of Agriculture at all in the proposed budget for 1955-56 for his agricultural prices support. The Minister of Agriculture certainly should have $100 million in connection with his program for agricultural prices support. This leaves me with housing, and for the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) I put down $200 million. It must be recognized that in our slums in our cities and on our farms we have a large number of people living in housing conditions which are a disgrace to Canada in this year of 1955. We must not regard expenditure on housing as being money down the drain. Investment in housing is a permanent investment that people will enjoy for 20, 30, 40 or 50 years.

I have not left very much time to discuss the interesting problem of financing this sort of program. The total of these figures which I have run over very quickly is only $2 billion.

An hon. Member: What is a billion?

Mr. Nicholson: What is a billion? That is a very good question. This amount is still less than half of what the Canadian people were able to raise and spend on our war effort alone in the years 1943 and 1944. If I had the figures available of the amounts of money we gave away during those years as mutual aid and assistance to the United Kingdom and our other allies, it would make the money which we are spending now under the Colombo plan and specialized agencies look very insignificant. I do not argue, Mr. Speaker, it would be possible to increase our income tax and our corporation tax to meet this particular type of budget. I believe the policy of deficit financing which the minister has introduced in a very mild way is quite sound. I think we need not worry about the amount of money that we owe to ourselves.

I notice that we have planned this year to spend $474 million for servicing our debt. Fortunately, most of this money is paid back to Canadians. At some time no doubt we will have to consider what we are going to do about the very sizeable national debt that Canada does carry. But so long as the percentage of the spendable money paid to service our national debt does not get out of hand, really we have nothing to worry about. Canada is in a very strong position to undertake a deficit financing program now. Wisely enough, I believe, during the years immediately following the war the government put aside sizeable sums to reduce our national debt. There was some criticism from the Conservative party about maintaining very high tax levels when all the money was not being spent. I feel it was a sound principle to have substantial taxes and make substantial payments on the national debt when money was plentiful and goods were scarce. Now that we have unemployment on our doorstep, we need not have any worry about deficit financing in Canada getting out of control. I believe we could secure more money by imposing higher taxes on the higher income groups. But then again, there is not enough money left in that particular pocket to solve all our problems. By carrying out a policy of orthodox financing, as demonstrated during the years I have mentioned from 1939 to 1945, the Minister of Finance could introduce a budgetary program that would make him the real hero of our particular period. But the budget that he has introduced, with tax reductions for a very small percentage of the Canadian people, very small amounts for the people in the lower income brackets and sizeable amounts for the people in the higher brackets, contains nothing spectacular.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with the two problems which stare us in the face, the problem in our own country of so many of our elderly people, the invalids, the war veterans, our farm people in a position where they just cannot get their hands on sufficient dollars to enable them to meet their reasonable responsibilities and enjoy a reasonable standard of living; when we think of the two-thirds of the people in the world who look at us maintaining 600,000 people in the ranks of the unemployed, I feel that Canada should and must give better leadership in solving our own problems and helping to solve world problems.

On motion of Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall take estimates, beginning with citizenship and immigration; northern affairs; then post office and justice.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, April 29, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Fourth report of special committee on estimates.—Mr. Tucker.

Second report of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

Second report of standing committee on privileges and elections.—Mr. McWilliam.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES BACK TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That items numbered 510 to 535 inclusive, 550 and 551 of the main estimates 1955-56, relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, approved and reported upon this day by the special committee on estimates, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDO-CHINA—REPORTED INABILITY OF TRUCE COMMISSION TO OPERATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his attention been directed to an editorial in the Ensign of April 30 with reference to the international truce commission in Indo-China? Is he in a position to report whether or not, in consequence of communist treachery, the commission is unable to operate? In particular, in view of the fact that the cut-off date is the 18th of May, does the minister consider that anything can be done to extend the date to the end that some two million people in the northern part of Viet Nam will be given the opportunity to leave if they choose to do so?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question which concerns a matter that is causing a good deal of anxiety not only to our representatives on the commission and the government but also to many people in this country. I have seen the report to which he refers and, indeed, other reports, and have had communications concerning this subject. With the hon. member's permission, and in view of the widespread interest in the matter, I will make a short statement about it on Monday when I hope to be in a better position to do so.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO FINAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister received a telegram from the Saskatchewan farmers' union requesting an announcement of the amount of the final payment so that merchants will be in a position to extend credit for spring seeding? What action does the minister propose to take as a result of this request?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not received such a telegram from the Saskatchewan farmers' union and I am informed that none has been received in the office of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There have, of course, been a number of requests both in this house and from others for an early announcement of the final payment on the 1953-54 wheat crop.

A similar question was asked in the house a few days ago, at which time I said that preparations were being made to close out the 1953-54 wheat pool as at the end of April and that payment will begin when the necessary accounting and auditing has been completed, which will be about two or three weeks later. It is, of course, impossible to announce the amount of the final payment until these calculations are completed.

POSTAL SERVICE

REFERENCE TO CONSTITUENCY OF TEMISCOUATA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the Acting Postmaster General comment on any improvement in the postal service as the result of the elimination of Pouliot from its operations in Temiscouata?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to think of a funny reply.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES IN KOREA—CONTINUING COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he is yet in a position to make the statement which he indicated three or four days ago he would soon make, regarding Canada's position with respect to the continuing commitment which we may accept for the stationing of troops in Korea.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to make a statement but I hope to be early next week.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question? I wonder if I might ask the minister if he and the government would not agree with the suggestion that it would be unfortunate if Canada at this time, in the light of the tension which is mounting in that area, were to indicate that she is considering cutting the size of her forces for that area?

Mr. Campney: Any comment I might have, I shall keep until I make a statement.

COAL

REPORTED CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA MINE—REQUEST TO CALL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if he is considering the possibility of calling a meeting with company and provincial government representatives and the miners union in connection with the closing of No. 1-B colliery at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I had a meeting with Premier Hicks the day before yesterday, and we are to have another meeting on Saturday. I asked Premier Hicks to call to the meeting anyone he thought would be interested. I do not know who are coming.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—SUGGESTED DAM AT MEDICINE HAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. D. Wylie (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry that I did not send him notice of the question, but I do not believe he will need it. My question is this: Is the dominion government going ahead with the construction of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river at a place known as The Narrows, 30 miles northeast of Medicine Hat?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I have heard nothing official at all, Mr. Speaker, with regard to a dam at The Narrows north of Medicine Hat. I understand that there has been some discussion in the press in Medicine Hat concerning the possibility of a dam in which it has been suggested that the site has been surveyed by P.F.R.A. That is not correct; P.F.R.A. has had nothing to do with it whatever, and knows nothing about it.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister inform the house regarding negotiations he had with Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan at the conference concerning the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project, and what further proof does the government require before considering the commencement of this work?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): To deal with the last part of the question first, I would say that I do not know that it is proof that is required, but the government has not yet been able to determine whether it would take the responsibility of recommending to parliament the very substantial expenditure for this project as one of national interest to the whole country. It was discussed very frankly with Premier Douglas yesterday and his minister of finance, Mr. Fines, and the result was that it was still a matter that was under consideration; that all parties were, I think, as fully advised as they could be of any accurate information now available bearing on the project; and that there would be nothing to be gained by trying to discuss the details of the apportionment of costs until the prior decision had been made, that it was a project that warranted the heavy expenditure it required and that the time was appropriate to proceed with it. We had a long, frank and interesting discussion. I think we considered, or at least touched upon, the important factors that have a bearing upon it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a supplementary question? Was the Minister of Agriculture present at this conference?

Mr. St. Laurent: He was, as was the federal Minister of Finance.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question, because I am often asked about it in my own constituency? I understand the matter has to rest until the government is satisfied that this work is a work in the interests of all Canada; is that right?

Mr. St. Laurent: Until the government takes the responsibility of coming to parliament and recommending it as a project that will provide for the economy of Canada more than its cost would take out of the economy of Canada.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF BASIS OF PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I would have directed this question to the Prime Minister yesterday had he been here at the opening of the sitting. In view of the fact that the decisions which are made will of necessity be ultimately decisions by parliament, the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference are of great concern to parliament. Can the Prime Minister make any report to the house which would enlighten us beyond the statement given following the closed session succeeding the open session on the first day? I would suggest that review of the basis upon which the government hopes to proceed in certain respects would be helpful to all of us in considering what may be done in connection with this matter and any discussion which should take place.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not like to go beyond the terms of the communiqué which we discussed at considerable length, Mr. Speaker, and about which it was frequently commented that since we had proceeded in camera the discussions should not be reported. It is not that I wish to withhold from parliament any information. The communiqué indicates that there was a discussion of—I will not say "offer" or "proposal" of the federal government because those words were objected to by others attending on the ground that there was nothing complete that could be regarded as an "offer" or as a "proposal"—a suggestion that I put before the meeting on the first day when it was an open public meeting.

It was quite evident, and no one questioned it, that we did not have accurate information that would permit of the establishment of an exact formula. It was decided an endeavour would be made, in the most expeditious manner, to secure that information. It was for that reason a committee was suggested to be made up of the representatives—I do not know that they are all of welfare departments—but on behalf of the welfare department of each of the provinces and representatives of the federal government, to review all the data available and try to get the basis for a formula. It was felt the committee should endeavour to do that with such expedition as would not delay a decision upon it until the October meeting.

The committee would proceed at once, and I understand that they had a preliminary meeting yesterday morning. It was hoped that they might have made sufficient progress to make it practicable to have a meeting of the ministers undertake a study as early as possible—one suggestion had been as early as possible in June and others preferred that the words "in June" be left out. I just mention that as indicating what was meant approximately by "as early as possible". The suggestion was that it might be appropriate to have action taken by legislative bodies, so that if some kind of arrangement were worked out there would be nothing to prevent its being implemented from the early fall onward. I do not know that there is anything more that I can say, without violating the letter, if not the real spirit of the various statements that were made—that we had proceeded in camera, and that our discussions should conserve that character.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Without in any way suggesting that there would be any breach of the confidential character of the discussions, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the fact that the government has withdrawn its position from that which it stated it was prepared to take in 1945 in regard to the unemployed, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if there are any other specific proposals in the 1945 proposals not yet dealt with from which the government has withdrawn its support. I ask this question because I think it would be helpful in avoiding any unnecessary discussion if there are any other similar cases where the government has withdrawn from the position it took at that time.

Mr. St. Laurent: I cannot accept the word "withdrawn". There were proposals made as over-all proposals in 1945. They were not accepted. I stated at the opening meeting of this preliminary conference that we did not consider that the proposals that had been made and were not accepted at that time were a proper basis for an agenda of discussions at this time.

There have been a great many things done, not because they were in the proposals but because they were considered to be the right things to do—things done since 1945. But the government does not consider that it is bound in any way by unaccepted proposals that were made in 1945.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Is it not true that the green book proposals in 1945 were offered to the provinces with the intention and the expression that they would be implemented when the majority of provinces accepted? There was no attempt to limit the provinces at that time.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member has the green book proposals and he can read and interpret them as he considers they should be read and interpreted. But I do not think it would be proper for me to try to put an official interpretation upon them in this house.

[Later:]

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a supplementary question on the same subject matter as that to which we have been referring, and which follows as a result of the question that followed mine. In view of the fact that we have been from time to time referring to these proposals from both sides of the house, I should like to ask the Prime Minister to whom we can look for a correct interpretation of what is described as the green book if we cannot look to him for that interpretation.

Mr. St. Laurent: I think the best place to look is in the green book itself—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Laurent: —in which can be found exactly how those proposals were put forth.

Mr. Drew: Then do I take it that the Prime Minister has withdrawn his earlier statement, and that the green book still stands as the proposals that he could accept?

Mr. St. Laurent: If there were manifested to us a disposition of all the provincial governments to accept—

An hon. Member: All?

Mr. St. Laurent: I think so, because I think they are all concerned—of course there is a varying degree of the importance that has to attach, because of the size of the population, to the views of the people of Ontario and the views of the people of Prince Edward Island, for instance. But it must not be forgotten—

Mr. Fulton: Is that an interpretation of the green book and, if it is not, what is it?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, it is not an interpretation of the green book. It is a statement of facts which are real and which have their bearing upon the fiscal relationship between the federal government and the provincial governments. And I think it should not be overlooked that the federal government has no funds of its own. The federal government has funds that are raised from the people of Canada; and when one speaks of what the federal government should do one is speaking of what should be done on behalf of all of the people of Canada, for one or more parts of the people of Canada; there are not at the present time before the provincial governments, for acceptance or for refusal, the proposals that had been made in 1945.

And I will be perfectly open and frank that, had those proposals been accepted, the federal government, as representing all the people of Canada, would find it at the present time pretty embarrassing to carry out the commitments that would have resulted. Because at that time those proposals were based upon the assumption that $250 million per annum being raised from the people of Canada would be quite sufficient for the defence expenditures of this country. And at the present time the members of this government and, I am sure, a large proportion of the Canadian people, recognize as having the highest priority of all, the expenditures that have to be properly made to do our share of the building up of the defence forces that are apt to be sufficient to deter aggression.

That being the case, I doubt if there are very many in Canada who would feel that it would be proper for the government of Canada to raise more money than is now being raised by increasing taxes.

Now, there may be the suggestion that there could be economies. We are endeavouring to practise economies; but they would be a very small proportion of the total budget that has to be met—not out of the moneys of the government of Canada but out of the moneys raised from the people of Canada generally. And that being the case, there has to be an order of priorities established in respect of the purposes to which the moneys provided annually by the people of Canada can be applied.

It will be suggested that there might be capital investments that could be made without being raised out of the year's current revenues. And that may be possible; but that could only be for such capital investments as would ultimately bring to the Canadian economy more than it would be presently taking out of the Canadian economy.

That is the situation that we have to face, and we might as well be realistic about it. We were perhaps overoptimistic about what could be done in 1945. At the present time—

Mr. Ferguson: That was the year of the election, was it not?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, I am not considering it from the point of view of the results of an election; and I think that it is preferable, in the interests of the people of Canada, that these serious matters be considered in another light than in the light of elections. When the hon. gentleman is sitting in the chair before which I am standing at the present time perhaps he will feel otherwise about the responsibility of those who are responsible to the public.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister? In view of his statement as to the greater weight that attaches to the views of the government of Ontario than attaches to that of some of the smaller provinces of the country, will he say that in view of what happened on Tuesday and Wednesday we are now closer to a nation-wide health insurance program than we were at the beginning of this week?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know how much closer we are to a nation-wide health program than we were before Tuesday and Wednesday, but very close attention is being given to the cost of that kind of a program. The hon. gentleman may say that people in Canada are spending as much without it as would be spent under it.

Mr. Knowles: They are.

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, assuming they are; but will the hon. gentleman tell us that there should be discriminatory taxation put upon those who are making these expenditures at the present time, or would he not consider that the costs, though they might not total very much more, would have to be spread generally by rates of taxation over the whole Canadian public?

Mr. Knowles: Am I permitted to answer questions on the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker? If so, I would be glad to answer the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: May I submit that perhaps on this phase of the discussion we have gone beyond the limits which are usually permitted at this stage, which must consist of only asking questions. That territory has been quite amply covered. There will be other opportunities to discuss these various matters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Prime Minister allow a question arising out of the statement he just made, that in order to bring in—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have just asked the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to refrain from pursuing a discussion on that particular point. Perhaps I can ask the hon. member for Prince Albert to wait until another opportunity is offered in order to pursue the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question without reference to anything that has been said. In connection with the plan for unemployment that was submitted to the dominion-provincial conference as representing the point of view of the government of Canada, will that plan not come into effect unless accepted by all the provinces, or may it be accepted by one or two provinces and not by the others?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, there has been no consideration given to the matter of whether it would be accepted by one or two and not by the others. It is a plan which is put forward in an effort to try not to distinguish between persons in need who might be considered by some as employable and by others as unemployable, and to have the same authorities dealing with all those in need regardless of whether they should be considered as employable or unemployable. It has not reached the point yet where an answer could be given to the hon. gentleman's question. That would depend upon the feeling of those attending the conference and representing all the provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the dominion's attitude?

Mr. St. Laurent: The dominion's attitude is that it would like to see a system established and administered by local authorities which would avoid the situation which has existed of saying this is one's responsibility and that is another's responsibility; to try to remove the inconvenience to the individual resulting from diverging views about the question of responsibility and have a concrete formula that where there was real need help would be extended, and that it would not be the concern of the applicant as to who was going to provide ultimately what was paid to help him or in what proportion.

TRADE

EXPORTS OF LEAD, ZINC AND CRUDE OIL FROM CANADA TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise the house what action may have been taken by the foreign affairs committee of the United States Senate in regard to certain amendments to the reciprocal trade act submitted to that body which, if passed, would have had an adverse effect upon the production and importation of lead, zinc and crude oil from Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think any final action has yet been taken, but I will look into the matter and see if I can make a reply on Monday.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED INCREASE OF PERSONNEL IN LEVIS OFFICE OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. Perhaps he would take it as notice and reply later. Does the minister know that the personnel of the Levis office of the unemployment insurance commission has been considerably increased lately? If so, what was the purpose of such increase?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I will take the question as notice, and try to answer on Monday.

NATURAL GAS

INQUIRY AS TO SUPPLY TO WINNIPEG AND OTHER WESTERN CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce? In view of the fact that Toronto, Montreal and other eastern cities are to have the advantages of natural gas in the near future, would the minister care to state when Winnipeg and other western cities may expect the same advantage?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the question would have to be in much more specific terms before I could give an answer that would be useful.

HARBOURS

CHURCHILL—SUGGESTED PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL ICEBREAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry I did not give him notice of this question. Is the government giving consideration to placing an additional icebreaker in service at the port of Churchill during the coming shipping season?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I may say that we have given some consideration to the matter but so far as I can recall there is no icebreaker that would be available in Hudson bay itself. I have had some discussions with the Hudson bay association, and I am hoping that we shall be able to work out something that will satisfy their needs.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

59. Departmental administration, $493,651.

The Chairman: May I point out to hon. members that this resolution will be found at page 12 of the main estimates, and the details will be found on page 142. Shall this resolution carry?

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I do want to say one or two words, Mr. Chairman. As the members of this committee know, these estimates have all been considered at some length and in some detail in the new committee that was established for the first time this year, namely, the committee on estimates. It was the hope and expectation of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, which he expressed in this house when the committee was set up, that one of the advantages of having the committee would be that a lot of the discussion on detail which had formerly taken place in the house would take place upstairs. Now, I believe that did happen, and the verbatim proceedings have been published and are available to all hon. members. It would be my intention, sir, if it met with the wishes of the committee, where a question was repeated here that had already been asked upstairs, simply to draw attention to the answer in the proceedings, with a view to saving time, and I am sure that would be equally convenient for purposes of reference.

In view of the fact that there has been such detailed consideration of the estimates elsewhere, I had not thought of making any statement about the work of the department.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as the minister has said, the estimates of this department were the first to be referred to the new committee on estimates which was set up during this session. It is my expectation, and it will probably be found, that the very extensive consideration given to the estimates there will result in the saving of time in the committee of supply. However, I would not be prepared to go quite so far as the minister has indicated he would wish to see done in each case; that is, that where a question is raised here which was discussed in that committee, the matter might be left, so far as he is concerned, by merely referring us to the page number at which the discussion in the committee will be found. It is my view rather that while the review of the department's estimates which was carried out in the committee will be productive of a saving of time of this committee of supply with respect to matters of detail, and that is where I personally would expect to see the greatest saving of time here, nevertheless, where for instance in the special committee on estimates some matter of departmental administration of major concern involving the practices and policies of the department with respect to administration was raised and was the subject of considerable attention, I do not consider it is sufficient to deal with it here simply by saying that it was discussed in the estimates committee and hon. members will find it at page so-and-so of the proceedings.

My feeling on the matter, and I express only a personal opinion but I think it is a pattern which logically we might hope to have developed, is that the discussion or repetition, shall I say, of details with respect to expenditures would be avoided but that discussion of important matters of administration might be carried on here in, if I may use the expression, a somewhat more apposite manner as a result of the discussions which we have had upstairs, but not that they would be sidetracked by simply saying that they had been discussed already.

Coming then to the estimates themselves, I am not going to follow what has sometimes been the practice on the part of the opposition of making extended criticisms of departmental administrative practices on the first item for the reason that we have had that already in the committee, but I do feel bound to observe that the report of the special committee contented itself by saying:

> Your committee has considered and approved items numbered 59 to 83 inclusive, listed in the main estimates 1955-56 relating to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, referred to it by the house on February 22, 1955.
> A copy of the proceedings of the committee in respect thereof is appended.

We of the official opposition do not regard that report as being an adequate reflection or summary of the considerations of the committee. We believe that there should have been more detailed findings and recommendations reported by that committee to the house as a result of the evidence which came out in the committee and as a result of the attitude of the minister and his supporters in the committee with respect to our demands for information as to how this department was administered.

I am not going to rehearse, even in general let alone in detail, all the deliberations of the committee and the various controversies which took place there. They are to be found in the proceedings and I think they are pretty well known to the house and the country through the press, through the proceedings and through other media. However, I shall endeavour to summarize what were in our view the main features which were established by the work of that committee.

First, in spite of the minister's apparent readiness to answer questions which were directed to him, and in some cases to have his officials answer questions with respect to details of administration, to a large extent that was camouflage under which the committee, even though it asked really searching questions, was unable to acquire important information as to some aspects of the administration of the department. That denial was achieved in part by the limitation imposed on the committee by its terms of reference and in part by the attitude of the minister himself when suggestions as to the calling of witnesses, the production of documents and so on were made.

The attitude of the minister in those cases was that these requests should not be complied with. After he had had himself made a member of the committee he was in a position to give a very powerful lead to his supporters with the result that on several occasions perfectly proper suggestions for the obtaining of important information as to the affairs of this department were denied, either by a ruling of the chairman which was sustained by the government majority or by a straight vote of the government majority on the motion itself.

I make this statement here that this committee was not in our view granted an opportunity of an effective and unfettered inquiry into the administrative practices of this department which we had hoped would take place after the committee was set up. To that extent the report of the committee which I read a few moments ago is not an accurate reflection of the information which this house should have on the practices and policies of this department.

We are dissatisfied, and I submit that the country is dissatisfied today as it was at the beginning of this session and as it has been over the past several years, with the state of affairs in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. That dissatisfaction found its most immediate and pointed expression in recent years in the resolutions and reports which were passed at the Canadian Bar Association convention in Winnipeg last year. We ourselves expressed our criticism of the policies and the administration of the department and indicated our own views of what should be the policy with respect to immigration in the debate which took place shortly after the beginning of the session. I shall not refer further to that debate except to say that the views we expressed at that time are unchanged by anything we have learned since. Our views are to a large extent confirmed by our inability to obtain information to which we felt we had a right.

This feeling and the facts upon which it was based we attempted to summarize—I am speaking now for the official opposition —in three amendments which we moved in the committee at its last session when it was considering its report to the house. I am going to ask the indulgence of the committee to read these amendments in full because in my view they represent what the committee should have found and reported to the house as the basis upon which the house itself might then expect and require of the government that there be substantial changes in the practices of this department. I shall not read in full the first amendment which we moved to the effect that the terms of reference of the committee should be enlarged. That matter has been discussed fully and the views of ourselves and of the government on that are well known. I merely repeat that we feel the committee should have had the right to summon witnesses and send for papers if it felt at any time that that was desirable and would help its inquiry. At the present time the committee is inhibited from doing so by the limitation of its terms of reference.

The third amendment which we moved and which I intend to read contains perhaps the meat of our criticism of the department in so far as its policies and administration are concerned. The other amendment refers to some savings in expenditure which we thought could be effected. This particular amendment was moved by me and reads:

That the report be amended by adding thereto the following words:

"Your committee has devoted a good deal of attention to the administrative practices of this department, particularly of the immigration branch, with a view to determining whether greater efficiency, and therefore economy, could be effected. Departmental officials laid considerable emphasis on the complicated and time-consuming process involved in, and the very large volume of correspondence necessitated by, the present method of dealing with rejected applications for admission to Canada.

The evidence of these officials appears to establish that the present method necessarily involved great expense not only to the department but to the applicant and his sponsor in Canada. Cases seem to be decided without reference to the decisions in other cases, and no sufficient attempt seems to be made to establish uniformity of decision. The reference here and in succeeding paragraphs is specifically to cases where a prospective immigrant is sponsored by an applicant who is a Canadian citizen.

It occurs to your committee therefore that it would be desirable, and more economical, if in these cases some more simple method could be devised, whereby reviews might be conducted in accordance with well established and generally understood rules, capable of general application to broad classifications of cases, instead of on the basis of individual discretion of junior officials which is frequently exercised to opposite effect in similar cases.

Furthermore, your committee was disturbed by the evidence of a substantial number of irregularities on the part of some immigration officers, involving acceptance of secret commissions or bribes. Evidence was given—

I want to stress that this was evidence that was given before the committee.

—that there were four groups of such cases arising out of applications processed through the Montreal office alone, the fourth group involving a minimum of 75 individual applications. The effect of the bribes was either to secure improper advancement of applications or in some cases the illegal admission of applicants. Your committee appreciates that loyal service is given by the vast majority of immigration officials, but cannot overlook the urgency of ensuring that administrative procedures be reviewed to ensure the elimination of such incidents in future.

In this respect, the secrecy which surrounds the processing of immigration applications, and the lack of opportunities to the applicant, his sponsor, or their solicitor, to inspect files and obtain full information as to the reasons for the disposition of the case, coupled with the enormously wide discretionary power given to immigration officers under the act, do seem to your committee to bring about a set of circumstances where these officers are placed in a position which invites the unscrupulous to take advantage of opportunities for improper personal profit with very little chance of detection.

Your committee desires to emphasize its admiration and respect for the loyalty of all but a small fraction of the officers, but feels that in fairness to the great body of honest officials, as well as from the point of view of increased economy and efficiency, every precaution should be taken to ensure that dishonesty cannot be practised by the few with impunity.

It became apparent also in the course of the committee's study that the present practice results in a refusal of information and reasons to applicants and their sponsors who are Canadian citizens, which is quite contrary to generally accepted concepts of what should be expected from an administrative body, and produces a deep sense of injustice.

All the foregoing considerations have led your committee to conclude that the setting up of a simple and routine review procedure for rejected cases, in which the maximum amount of information consistent with security would be furnished as to the reasons for rejection, would result in a very substantial saving of time and money to the department and to the applicant and his Canadian sponsor, would minimize the chances for corrupt practices, and would bring the administrative practices of the department into conformity with proper standards of justice.

Your committee therefore recommends:

(a) That the department set up a review board along the lines of the immigration appeal board contemplated in the act.

(b) That the maximum information consistent with security be furnished to applicants as to reasons for their rejection, and, with the consent of the applicant, be furnished to their Canadian sponsors.

(c) That the review board give reasons for its decisions and that a body of administrative precedents be thus built up which is available to and known by departmental officials, applicants, sponsors, and their solicitors or counsel.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have to point out that that recommendation which we made was rejected by the government majority, in that matter receiving as usual a lead from the minister, although the recommendation was supported, as I recall, by the combined opposition members present at the committee meeting. Nevertheless, it reflects our feeling with respect to the evidence and the facts we were able to bring before the committee, that the departmental administrative practices should be amended along the lines embodied in that resolution.

Unfortunately it has to be regarded as a fact that the minister's attitude in the committee made it perfectly clear that so far as he was concerned, and so long as he was minister, these and similar serious suggestions made by others would not be taken seriously and that the practices would remain substantially as they are now. This is unfortunate in the extreme, because, just in case anyone may be inclined to think that this represents a criticism advanced by the Conservative party for political purposes and is not one which is widely supported throughout the country, I should like to place before the committee at this stage some extracts from a judgment of the court of appeal of Ontario in a recent case arising out of the practices and procedures of the immigration department. This is particularly apt under the present circumstances and in connection with the present discussion, because we are very much concerned on this side of the house—and I know I state a fact when I say that the people of Canada are very much concerned—with the arbitrary methods followed in the department in dealing with immigration cases, the arbitrary refusal of adequate information to people who are concerned as to the reasons for rejection or the reasons for the order which may be made in deportation cases, and in general the arbitrary attitude which is in fact improper and would be recognized, I submit, by any other department of government under the circumstances as improper.

I shall not say that I was pleased at this —no one can be pleased when evidence of these improper practices comes to light—but I was interested to find that the view we took has been supported in this case, which is entitled "In the Matter of an Application by Shirley Kathleen Brent, formerly Shirley Kathleen Taylor, for the issue of a writ of habeas corpus with certiorari in aid, and in the matter of the statutes of Canada (1866) 29 and 30, Victoria, chapter 45, and in the matter of rule 622."

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Wilson of the Ontario supreme court, who had found in favour of Mrs. Brent and against the department, the appeal being taken by the department to the Ontario court of appeal. The judgment was delivered on April 5, 1955, by Mr. Justice Aylesworth on behalf of the court, the other judges, who are Mr. Justice Roach and Mr. Justice Gibson, concurring in Mr. Justice Aylesworth's reasons for judgment. I pause here to observe that Mr. Justice Gibson, presently of the appeal court of Ontario, is a former distinguished member of this government, a former minister of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: It was not then the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, but he was the minister who formerly was responsible for immigration matters now coming under this department. This case is cause for particular concern in that this judge has indicated his concurrence in these very strong criticisms pronounced by his brother judge with respect to the practices of the department.

I now come to the reading of the reasons for judgment. I do not have a copy of the official report in the form of a law report, but I have here a copy, which I should be glad to make available to the minister or to table in the house if it is desired, and which I am given to understand is a copy of the reasons for judgment as handed down by the court in this case.

I wish to read a passage starting at page 5 of the typewritten copy I have in my hand. First of all, may I explain the context by saying that the case as it was before Mr. Justice Wilson, from whose judgment the appeal was taken, was an appeal by Mrs. Brent against the order for deportation and the hearing under the order which had been granted to her, her contention being she had been supplied with no reasons for the making of the order with the result that she was entirely unable in effect to present any intelligent argument against the order, and that by denying to her and to her counsel a statement of the reasons upon which the order was based she was in effect denied her rights for a hearing.

Mr. Justice Wilson found in no uncertain terms that she was thus denied the rights which are fundamental to all Canadians and to our system of justice, and his reasoning was confirmed by the court of appeal in the following passages:

It will be seen at once that the specific subject matters concerning which his excellency in council is authorized to make regulations under clause (g) of section 61—

The reference is to the Immigration Act.

—are repeated verbatim in regulation 20 (4) except for the omission of the word "climatic". Obviously then, this regulation is designed to "regulate" as to those specific subject matters and those alone—not as to "carrying into effect the purposes and provisions" of the act in some other direction. Its effect, moreover, is not regulation by his excellency in council but regulation individually by any number of special inquiry officers scattered throughout the country, each according to his own "opinion".

If these "opinions" always coincided, that would be nothing short of miraculous; it would be cause for astonishment if they ever coincided, considering the extreme generality of the terms employed, the wide field each term covers and the application of each "temporarily or otherwise" either to conditions in Canada or in some other country. In short, those limited powers of legislation, wide though the limits of the subject matter may be, which parliament has delegated to his excellency in council, have not been exercised by the delegate at all—

The delegate being his excellency in council.

—but, on the contrary, by him have been redelegated bodily, for exercise not merely by some one other individual but, respectively and independently of each other, by every special inquiry officer who sees fit to invoke them and according to "the opinion" of each such subdelegate.

Mr. Justice Aylesworth continues:

I can find nothing in the act expressly (or by inference, if that is permissible) manifesting any intention to permit or authorize any such procedure. On the other hand, it is reasonable to suppose that what parliament had in contemplation was the enactment of such regulations relevant to the named subject matters, or some of them, as in his excellency in council's own opinion were advisable and as, therefore, would be of general application to persons seeking entry into Canada regardless of the particular port of entry involved.

Surely, what was intended was legislation enacted by his excellency in council according to his wisdom and broad experience, prescribing standards for the general guidance of immigration officers and special inquiry officers operating at or near the borders of the country, not a wide divergency of rules and opinions ever changing according to the individual notions of such officers. The regulation is invalid and the order of deportation based upon it is invalid likewise, delegatus non potest delegare—

Then he cites a number of decisions which, for the sake of completion, perhaps I should include.

—Re Chemical Reference, (1943) S.C.R. 1; In Re Behari Lal et al., 13 B.C.R. 415; Geraghty v. Porter (1917), N.Z.L.R. 554; Halsbury 2nd Edition, Vol. 6, p. 527, para. 652 and p. 533, para 662, note (d).

Then the learned judge went on to say that he would quash the deportation order.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Not only did he thus condemn the practice of the department in giving regulation-making power to all these special inquiry officers with the inevitable result, as pointed out by the learned judge, that the regulations and thus, to speak in general terms, the laws regarding immigration in one part of Canada would be entirely different from what they were in another which could only result in a denial of the very elementary principles of justice. The learned judge went on to condemn in the most outspoken terms the methods and practices under which these inquiries or hearings are taking place before these special inquiry officers. I read now from the bottom of page 7 of the typewritten transcript which I have in my possession.

Section 27 stipulates that the inquiry shall be in the presence of the person concerned wherever practicable; that the person concerned may, if desired, be represented by counsel; that the special inquiry officer may receive and base his decision upon evidence considered credible or trustworthy by him and that the burden of proving that he is not prohibited from coming into Canada rests upon the applicant for admission. Unless these provisions, to adopt the language of Duff J., as he then was, in Samejima v. The King (1932) S.C.R. 640 at 642 are to be reduced "to the merest parade of words", a hearing before a special inquiry officer is to be a hearing brought about by an intelligible report of an immigration officer which specifies a provision of the act or of the regulations which will be infringed if entry into Canada is permitted, a disclosure at the inquiry itself to the applicant for admission of the provision which the immigration officer thinks should exclude him or her and an examination by the special inquiry officer into the facts relating to that provision, including the taking of evidence, if necessary, relevant thereto. Otherwise, the whole proceedings are reduced to an absolute farce . . .

How often have we heard those words used in this house and the suggestion made that these are exaggerated statements made by members of the opposition for political purposes. These words are the words of a learned justice of the court of appeal of Ontario, concurred in by Mr. Justice Gibson, a former minister of the government having charge of the same work.

Otherwise, the whole proceedings are reduced to an absolute farce, leaving not only the special inquiry without direction or purpose, but the applicant for entry into Canada in complete ignorance of where lies the burden which he or she is required to discharge, or wherein his or her admission into Canada is alleged to infringe the act or regulations. In case at bar it is established beyond controversy that at the opening of the hearing before the special inquiry officer respondent was in exactly this hopeless position. She did not "understand" this regulation—a lack of understanding which I find no difficulty in comprehending—whereupon the special inquiry officer contented himself with informing the respondent that she could "read English". The decision of the special inquiry officer and the deportation order consequent thereon, states that respondent does not "meet the requirements" of paragraph (b) of subsection 4 of section 20 of the immigration regulations.

That is the extent, I might interpolate, of the reasons given for the finding under which the applicant was to be deported. Continuing with the words of the learned judge:

If those requirements were to be met in their entirety and without any indication of any particular alleged infringement thereof, an endeavour to do so, however earnest, would be absolutely impossible. For these reasons also the order is bad and should be quashed.

So that judgment consists of two main findings which, Mr. Chairman, are unfortunately typical of the situation in which applicants for immigration into Canada find themselves, and in which the sponsors of applicants for immigration into Canada also find themselves. These are as follows: First, that the regulations laying down the circumstances governing admissibility or non-admissibility are not made by the governor in council but are by him delegated—I do not use these words in a derogatory sense because there have to be junior officials—to junior officials all across Canada. The result is that the terms of admissibility or non-admissibility vary from port of entry to port of entry.

Second, and more important I think, when an order adverse to an applicant is made, the applicant, his sponsor and interested persons on his behalf are denied all possibility of finding out what are the reasons for such adverse order. The result is, as the learned judge says, any appeal procedure becomes an absolute farce and any attempt by the applicant to bring himself within the requirements, however earnest, becomes an absolute impossibility.

It was on these two main features of departmental administration that our criticism in the debate earlier in this session, to which I have referred, the findings of the Canadian Bar Association, our criticisms in the special committee on estimates, and our various other criticisms of the department, have all been based. These feelings are, I submit, not only substantially but in the greatest particularity confirmed by the opinion of Mr. Justice Aylesworth, concurred in by his two colleagues of the Ontario court of appeal. It is therefore, to my mind, regrettable in the extreme that the minister continues in his obstinate and obdurate attitude, that there is nothing wrong with the administrative practice of this department; that there is nothing to be changed, and nothing will be changed. Indeed, more than that, inherent in his attitude throughout is the feeling that any criticism of the administrative practices, of the principles upon which they are based, whether they be made by members of the opposition, by members of the bar association who devoted over two years of study to it, or others, are improperly conceived and brought through improper motives. The minister went so far as to suggest, particularly with respect to the bar association, that the criticisms were not worthy of his serious consideration.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, it will be obvious that the view of the official opposition, as has been previously expressed, is that we have no confidence in the policies of the government with respect to immigration; that we have no confidence in the principles upon which their administrative practices are based; and that we will not have confidence nor will the people of the country have confidence in these respects until a fundamental change is made with respect to the administration and policies of this department.

I want now to refer very briefly to another of the shortcomings of the department. Here I refer to a statement made by the minister himself in Victoria during the Easter recess. I shall try, Mr. Chairman, to keep my criticism here on a factual and entirely non-personal basis. I base my criticism on the minister's statement entirely on the fact that he is Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I ask him to understand what I mean when I say that, because I think that that was not only an unfortunate but an entirely improper statement to have been made by one who is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I may tell the hon. gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that I accept his statement in exactly the spirit in which it is made. I am sure the hon. gentleman would help the committee, and I know he would help me, if he would tell us what statement, and to what words he is referring. The only report of what I said at Victoria that I accept as in any way an accurate report of what I said there is the report that appeared in the Victoria Times. The report which appeared in the Victoria Colonist, and which was the basis of reports that were spread all over Canada by Canadian Press, is—though I do not quarrel with the words—entirely misleading and erroneous, as my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Fairey) demonstrated in the house yesterday afternoon.

In this committee, sir, I believe it is a rule, although I do not insist upon it in the least, that any hon. member's word as to what he said must be accepted. I am quite prepared to accept and be criticized for the words that appeared in the Victoria Times, but I am not prepared for one minute to accept the highly erroneous report, as to meaning, that appeared in the Victoria Colonist and was reported all over this country.

Mr. Fulton: I have to say that I have not either the Victoria Times or the Victoria Colonist before me. I am quite prepared to meet the minister on those terms and to criticize a statement which he says was an accurate report of what he said.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I do.

Mr. Fulton: Unfortunately I had to be in another committee yesterday afternoon so I was not in the house when the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., placed, as I understand it, the two conflicting reports on the record. Perhaps if the minister could give me the page reference in Hansard—

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think, sir, I could help the hon. gentleman that way because all that was placed on the record by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., was an editorial which appeared in the Victoria Times. But I happen to have in my possession the news report that appeared in the Victoria Times.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister could shorten this up by telling us what he did say, and then we would be able to criticize him on his own ground.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be delighted if hon. gentlemen did not believe it was an infringement of privilege to read a speech I made in Windsor last Saturday in which I did explain quite carefully what I had said.

Mr. Fulton: I have the text of the hon. gentleman's speech in Windsor, and as I recall it the minister does not quote himself. He attempts to explain himself, but he does not quote himself.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite right. I would not presume to attempt to quote myself because, although I flatter myself I have a rather good memory, I made the speech at Victoria as a politician and as all of us in this house do as politicians, with a few notes on a single piece of paper. I had no text and no transcript was made of my speech. I would not undertake to say precisely, word for word, what I did say. That is why I say I am quite willing to accept the report which appeared in the Victoria Times. As soon as I can dig it out of these other papers, I will send it over to my hon. friend.

In fact, I think if the hon. gentleman would permit me,—

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I could put it on the record so we would all have it. Perhaps the minister would be satisfied if I took, as an accurate report of what he said, his own words which do appear on the record at pages 2892 and 2893 of Hansard for April 18, 1955. These words are contained in a letter which he wrote to the hon. member for Broadview, and in which the minister stated what he did say.

Mr. Pickersgill: In so far as the one sentence is concerned, I accept that unreservedly.

Mr. Fulton: That is the only sentence with which I am concerned. So there may be no doubt about the matter and so there will be no question of taking unfair advantage of the minister, I will read it. In the letter to the hon. member for Broadview the minister says:

It went like this:

Referring to the passage to which criticism was directed.

Mr. Pickersgill: To the sentence.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, to the sentence which has given rise to the criticism.

We all want to increase the population of this country and for that purpose if they are equally good people I don't believe that any immigrant, no matter where he comes from or how good he is, is as good as another Canadian baby, because the immigrant has to learn to be a Canadian and the baby is a Canadian to start with.

That is the end of the minister's quotation. This matter is one which could be treated with a good deal of levity but my criticism, as I said before, is based on the fact that this is an improper statement to have been made by a person who is Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

It may have been a smart thing to say; it may have been a clever thing to say, if it had been said in private, and by a private citizen; but it is neither smart nor clever nor proper, in my submission, when it is said by the person who is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, charged with the administration of the immigration policy of the government, a policy which, as we are told—although I agree that there is considerable confusion as to what it is—is the encouragement of immigration into Canada, on a selective basis, of persons who will make good citizens. That, from the conflicting statements that have been made, is my understanding of the nub of the minister's policy.

This country is in need of such immigrants. If I have stated fairly the policy that I understand the minister is supposed to be following—

Mr. Pickersgill: I take no exception to that at all.

Mr. Fulton: —then I say that is a most improper statement to have been made by the minister.

But I am not going to rely upon my own opinion only in this connection. I am going to rely upon words which are taken from the Winnipeg Free Press in this connection. And I do so because, although I think it would be accurate to say that that paper is not too friendly disposed toward this minister, personally—

Mr. Pickersgill: Apparently not.

Mr. Fulton: —it is, nevertheless, by and large a supporter of this government. And therefore in its criticism of a minister of this government it can be expected to put the case as fairly as the case can be put. And I find that the minister, from the outset, has been in difficulty as a result of this statement which he made in Victoria. He has been explaining it or attempting to explain it in almost every speech he has made since.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the date of that editorial, by the way?

Mr. Fulton: There are two editorials in the Winnipeg Free Press, and there is a press report. There is an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press which, I believe, appeared on April 17. What I have here is a reproduction of it in the Montreal Gazette of April 18. Then there is another editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press, taken from that paper itself, which I have before me, dated April 18. And there is a press report from the Winnipeg Free Press dated April 18.

Mr. Pickersgill: "In every speech he has made since" happens to be one speech.

Mr. Fulton: Well, the minister explained it in Winnipeg.

Mr. Pickersgill: I made no speech in Winnipeg, sir.

Mr. Fulton: Well, every time the minister opens his mouth he tries to make a speech. In Winnipeg, in the article referred to, the minister was interviewed by a press correspondent. The minister knew he was a press man, and he knew he was being interviewed by a press man. He tried to explain it there, he tried to explain it in the house and he tried to explain it in Windsor, in the speech to which he has referred. And each time he tries to explain it he makes it worse.

The Winnipeg Free Press, in an editorial which I believe was in that newspaper on April 17, but which is found in the Montreal Gazette on April 18, has this to say about it:

> The latest remarks of the minister of immigration have incensed unusually many people, from the president of the Canadian Congress of Labor to the Toronto Globe and Mail, from Mr. George Hees to Mr. Solon Low. It is hard to see why he should be taken so much more seriously than he deserves. What Mr. Pickersgill said was, indeed, nonsense—in the exact sense of the word. It does not make sense to a reasonable man. But that is hardly an unprecedented quality in Mr. Pickersgill's pronouncements.

Unless the minister wishes me to include them, I shall leave out the next two or three sentences and proceed further down, where it says:

> No reasonable man really thinks that any Canadian baby, whatever its moral and mental and physical equipment, is more useful to the country than any immigrant; no reasonable man thinks that the services rendered to Canada by a new baby—services that will begin sixteen years or more hence—can be evaluated against the services of an immigrant, beginning now.

Mr. Pickersgill: And I never said so.

Mr. Fulton: It continues:

> Mr. Pickersgill is not really so unreasonable as that; he gets excited and ties himself up.

Well, the minister was interviewed on his way back from Victoria, at Winnipeg, and I have the report in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 18. I would say that the minister was shown the editorial, passages from which I have just read; and the press report of the interview contains these passages:

> A Canadian-born minister of citizenship and immigration stepped off the Dominion of Canada car at the Canadian Pacific station, smiled faintly and said the whole thing was all very silly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, isn't it?

Mr. Fulton: The minister's statement was not only silly; it was irresponsible and reprehensible.

Mr. Pickersgill: The quotation was certainly silly; and no one would agree with that more than I would.

Mr. Fulton: After all, if a speech is silly I do not see how any quotation from it could help being silly. Of course the quotation was silly. Then the minister was shown the editorial, and he asked if he could keep it. Then the report goes on:

> But the minister wanted to explain. What the Canadian Press had quoted him as saying was: "I don't believe any immigrant . . . no matter where he comes from or how good he is . . . is as good as another Canadian baby."
> Now, the minister smiled, if one considered his whole statement, one saw the thing in its proper perspective.
> "What I really said was that we wanted to increase the population of the country. For that purpose, if they were equally good people I didn't believe any immigrant, no matter how good he was or where he came from, was as good as another Canadian baby—

The minister is saying it all over again. That is my interjection.

> —because we brought people to this country to become Canadians—and the babies were Canadians to start with".

And this is the important part:

> But the minister admitted, the birth rate wasn't high enough to increase the population as fast as was desirable. Therefore the government had to encourage the next best thing—the entry of the "best kind" of immigrants.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask what kind of encouragement the minister thinks he is giving to the bringing of immigrants to Canada, when he makes the silly and reprehensible statements he has made? And then, one further passage:

Now, the minister continued, "it's all very silly, really—"

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, isn't it?

Mr. Fulton: Again I quite agree with the minister. I had hardly realized the extent of silliness of which the minister could be guilty. I am glad he agrees.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not write that piece.

Mr. Fulton: This is a quotation.

Mr. Pickersgill: More quotations.

Mr. Fulton: It says:

Now, the minister continued, "it's all very silly, really. I wouldn't have got one-tenth the advertising if it was something sensible".

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, would I?

Mr. Fulton: Well, knowing this minister, there is no opportunity for comparison, because I am not aware of any reasonable statement the minister has made, on the basis of which a comparison could be drawn.

Then, the other editorial to which I wish to refer is the one in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 18 commenting on the interview in which the minister was quoted as I have just read it into the record. It says:

On Saturday Mr. Pickersgill, passing through Winnipeg, was questioned about babies. He explained to our reporter "what I really said" in Victoria: ". . . if they were equally good people, I didn't believe any immigrant, no matter how good he was or where he came from, was as good as another Canadian baby. . . ."

Sometimes, when people (native-born or otherwise) have great trouble with the language, a translation into simple mathematical terms helps to clarify their meaning. Mr. Pickersgill's meaning appears to be: if A and B are equal, he doesn't believe that A, whatever its size, is as big as B. Since Mr. Pickersgill is not, generally speaking, muddle-headed—

Mr. Pickersgill: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Fulton: Well—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would answer my question. Does he agree with that?

Mr. Fulton: Well, there are certain courtesies and proprieties which are expected to be observed between members in debates in this chamber, so I hope the minister will not press me too hard to answer that. It says:

Since Mr. Pickersgill is not, generally speaking, muddle-headed, only one purpose can rationally be assigned to this "explanation": Mr. Pickersgill wanted to confirm that what he said was nonsense. He also appeared to throw some other light on his motives: if, Mr. Pickersgill commented, he had said something sensible at Victoria, "I wouldn't have got one-tenth the advertising".

As I said when I first started to discuss this particular statement of the minister, Mr. Chairman, one could treat this with considerable levity, but I am not going to do so, although it is difficult to avoid the language of levity creeping in because the statement is so absurd. I am not going to do it because, as I have said, I consider the statement reprehensible, coming as it did from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I consider it reprehensible because it is the policy of this government to bring desirable immigrants into Canada. That has been pointed out in one of the press articles which I quoted. It is considered that the native birth rate is not high enough to fill the population needs of Canada. This is official government policy. Therefore, the only effect of what the minister has said is to draw invidious comparisons between native-born Canadians and Canadians who came to this country as immigrants. That, Mr. Chairman, I am sure all members of the committee will agree is a reprehensible thing for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to have undertaken to do.

I am not surprised that the minister has been unable satisfactorily to explain what he said in spite of the many attempts he has made to do so. I have placed on the record here at length the editorials and the extracts of the minister's own words for the purpose of attempting to treat this as fairly as possible, making every effort to ascertain exactly what the minister did say. Then, taking his own words in explanation of what he said, one is unable to come to any other conclusion than that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has exhibited a degree of irresponsibility which confirms us in the opinion I expressed earlier, namely, that there is ample ground for the unfortunate conclusion that the policies of this government with respect to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration do not justify the confidence of the house or the country.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to take much of the time of the committee except on one point, the last point the hon. gentleman dealt with. The speech that I made in Victoria was listened to by a very distinguished and respected member of this house on whose behalf I spoke, a member who was, I believe, 20 years of age when he came to this country as an immigrant. It was listened to by my father in law, who was born in Ireland and who did not come here until he was half grown up; it was listened to by a group of East Indian Canadians who had a most amicable conference with me afterwards. I received the warmest congratulations of a Chinese Canadian citizen. It was listened to by the usual audience in Victoria, where it is impossible to have an adult audience without having a large number of immigrants. Not one person there showed the slightest evidence that anything unusual, remarkable or noteworthy had been said because nothing remarkable or noteworthy had been said. All that was said—

Mr. Fulton: They probably could not believe it.

Mr. Pickersgill: —on that occasion, I feel perfectly certain that the hon. member for Nanaimo, who was kind enough to yield to me, would agree with. I discovered when I went and spent some time in England that it is hard when you are grown up to adapt yourself to the ways of a new country, and that is why I believe that for the purpose of increasing the population of a country, taking one person with another, if they are equally able and equally good, it is perfectly obvious that the person brought up in the country will, other things being equal, be able to make more easily the adaptation we all have to make if we are to live happily with our fellow men.

I said in that speech, and I am reported in the Victoria Times as having said it, that I was not asserting that Canadians were inherently superior to anybody else, or that there was any racial superiority or anything of that sort. I said none of these things. I repudiate them. As the hon. member for Victoria pointed out yesterday by reading the editorial from the Victoria Times, which, it is no secret, was written by someone who was in the audience, I said almost the exact opposite. This silly report, and no one will agree more completely than I do with the hon. member for Kamloops that this report, which was spread across this country by the Canadian Press—and I want to be fair to them, as the hon. member was not—they did not represent it as a quotation; they represented it as part of a quotation and there were dots indicating omissions in every report I saw.

To illustrate how easily this sort of thing can happen, I hold in my hand a clipping from the Victoria Times of October 20, 1954, which deals with a speech made in Victoria by the hon. member for Kamloops. Apparently I am not the only member of this house who speaks in Victoria.

Mr. Fulton: What is the date?

Mr. Pickersgill: October 20, 1954.

Mr. Dufresne: Is this a Liberal paper?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is a Liberal paper.

Mr. Dufresne: No doubt.

Mr. Fulton: It has not yet left the Liberal party, as the Vancouver Sun has done.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, not yet, nor is it likely to. Here is what the hon. member for Kamloops said in Victoria:

> Liberals, he said, paid "lip service" to British connections, but that was all. They had gone "pretty far along the road of whether or not we should remain a British nation."

That is all in quotation marks. Then the article goes on to say—and this is not in quotation marks; I suppose this is the sense of what he said—

> Elements against British ties were largely in Quebec, he said.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Ah, ah!

Mr. Dufresne: Who said that?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kamloops. If the Canadian Press had picked that one sentence up and spread it all across this country, it would probably have been unfair to the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Fulton: You are now doing it.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is just the kind of—

Mr. Fulton: You are now doing it.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is just the kind of thing that happened to me. What I said in Winnipeg about advertising was meant to be taken lightly. It is a very great mistake, apparently, for a politician to make flippant remarks. I recognize it, and every time I do it I am duly contrite. I find that every time I make a flippant remark, in his presence, the hon. member for Kamloops takes the remark seriously, and I shall try hard in the future to be solemn, if I can. Sometimes it is difficult.

I want to say a little more about the less silly parts of the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. gentleman referred to the Brent case. I must say that the judgment in the Brent case has occasioned me and my department very serious concern, and so it should. If the judgment in the Brent case were to stand we would have to give very serious consideration to the whole state of the immigration law. It is for that reason, and that reason alone, not because of the particular person involved, but because of the point of law involved, that it is my intention to recommend that we appeal that case to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is very important; it is absolutely vital to those of us who have to administer it and to this parliament and to everybody else to know for sure what the immigration law of this country really is. Therefore, the only proper course to take is to appeal it and to find out what the body which we in this parliament have set up to be the final arbiter in these matters should say the law is in this regard. Therefore, I do not intend to say anything myself about the judgment in the Brent case.

The hon. gentleman said that, because I found it impossible to accept certain suggestions which he made in the committee upstairs, these and similar serious suggestions would not be taken seriously by the present minister. I think I can treat a statement like that as it deserves to be treated. I think I am pretty well known on both sides of this house and I do not think there are many hon. members who have not found me willing when I have made a mistake to say so at once, who have not found me willing when any sensible and legal and proper suggestion is made to try to carry it out. I hope that I shall continue to act in that way. If I ever become so set in my ways that I will not listen to reason from whatever quarter it comes, I hope the Canadian people will deal with me as I shall deserve to be dealt with.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We shall miss you.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Kamloops talked about the inability of the opposition to obtain information in the committee. I could quote the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, I could quote the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, and I could quote the hon. member for St. Paul's. However, as I said at the beginning, I do not intend to cumber the record with quotations from the proceedings of the committee on estimates.

I believe it is a fair statement to make to say that there was not a single question put to me or to my officials about my department that we did not attempt to answer fully in the committee. It is true that there were one or two questions asked about United States immigration laws and one or two questions about other departments; and I was indiscreet enough to give partial answers to them. I think perhaps that that was a mistake, but so far as my department was concerned I tried to provide every bit of information it was possible to give.

The hon. member talked about his inability to introduce other people into the committee, people who were not members of the committee, people who he evidently thought were superior to the members of the committee in their knowledge and ability. One reason I was not particularly keen to have these strangers introduced was that I have a rather high view of the members of this house, perhaps more so than the hon. member for Kamloops seems to have. It seems to me that the kind of experience which we have collectively in this house, the kind of experience which occasioned our election to this house, is the sort of thing which makes it more likely that hon. members of this house will be able to ask appropriate questions about departmental administration than any outsider, however specialized he may be.

It happened that there was really only one outsider whom the hon. gentleman seemed particularly anxious to bring into the committee, and because of that I intend to say something and I am not going to take any risks. The hon. gentleman referred to the committee and the findings of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Fulton: I will correct that, I should have said the findings of the subcommittee on immigration of the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association, accepted by that section.

Mr. Sinclair: Would the hon. member correct the speech he made on Quebec?

Mr. Fulton: It does not need correction. The minister has stated that he is quite aware that I did not say what was not in quotations.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no, I did not say that. I said no doubt it was taken out of its context, but I did not say that the hon. gentleman did not say that. If the hon. gentleman wants to correct that, I am willing to concede him time in which to correct it.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has stated the true facts and I thank him for doing so. He said he knew I did not say that, and that to say I did would be unfair.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that. I am willing to have the hon. gentleman misrepresent me if he wishes; it does not matter. I do not feel that I need to descend to using little bits and pieces of quotations to misrepresent my opponents. If I cannot do any better than that in public life, I shall leave it.

Mr. Fulton: We are waiting for you to.

Mr. Pickersgill: To come back to this matter of the Canadian Bar Association. A report was made by two out of three members of a subcommittee. So far as I have been able to find out there was not any report accepted or approved by anybody else except possibly the hon. member for Kamloops, and in that regard he can speak for himself.

Since the question of what happened regarding immigration at the Canadian Bar Association has been raised here, I should like to be permitted to read into the record a statement of the facts as they are known to me. The accuracy of a number of things, certainly of some of my statements, was called in question by several newspapers while the committee was going on, and that is my reason for putting this statement on the record. I crave the indulgence of the committee in doing so.

I think generally speaking I have been very patient with interruptions in this house. I have tried never to object; I have always tried to resume my seat at any time that any hon. member wants to ask a question. I have never raised any objection to being interrupted, but I would crave the indulgence of the committee on this occasion to be allowed to make this statement without interruption. I have tried to make it as non-provocative and as factual as possible and in fairness I should like to have it appear as a single piece.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister starts would he indicate where he got the information upon which he bases this statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the sources of the information will be quite apparent from the statement. If they are not, and if the hon. member will make a note of any of them, I shall endeavour to explain afterward. I have gone over this several times and I did try to make it as complete as I could.

I was aware that there was a subcommittee on immigration of the committee on civil liberties of the Canadian Bar Association, but I had no contact whatsoever with its activities before the meeting of the bar association in Winnipeg. I returned to Ottawa from Newfoundland at the time the presentation of the report and the attendant publicity in Winnipeg were at their height.

I learned that a report, dated August 27, 1954, and signed by John H. McDonald,chairman of the subcommittee, had been submitted to the Winnipeg meeting. My deputy minister had a copy of this document and I placed the full text on Hansard on February 17 last; it appears at pages 1241 and 1242. Paragraph 4 of that document contains the following passage:

> In addition a great deal of valuable research work was undertaken by John R. Taylor, a member of the committee. Mr. Taylor has reviewed over two hundred specific cases and has written four comprehensive reports on administrative procedures. These reports have been invaluable to the subcommittee and will form the basis for further study and representations. Copies of these reports are being filed with the chairman of the committee on civil liberties. However, the committee and particularly Mr. Taylor, the author, believe that until such time as the new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has had an opportunity of reviewing the detailed material contained in these reports, they should not be generally distributed.

It is obvious from that passage that these four reports of Mr. Taylor's were not a part of the published report. On September 7, 1954, I received a letter from Mr. J. R. Taylor written from the hotel Palliser in Calgary. I read this letter to the special committee on estimates and it can be found at pages 129 to 131 of the proceedings of that committee for March 2. In that letter Mr. Taylor said:

> I desired that my reports be filed with the association but be not circulated.

Mr. Fulton: "Desired" is in the past tense?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, "desired".

> I understand John McDonald will be giving you a copy of his report—you will notice on page 2 of his report that mention is made that I desired "particularly" that the reports be not circulated.

That is the end of the quotation.

I was assured by my deputy minister that no other documents were made public in Winnipeg and no documents whatever were sent to me by Mr. Taylor or anyone else.

I was greatly surprised, therefore, when on February 17 the hon. member for Prince Albert quoted what he described as the report of the subcommittee. I stated, on a question of privilege reported on page 1259 of Hansard, that I had read the full report that was actually presented in Winnipeg and that the passage the hon. member was reading was not in that document. The hon. member then identified what he was reading as attachments or appendices to the report.

On February 18 I raised a point of order with respect to the documents which had been quoted by the hon. member for Prince Albert. I expressed the view that the house was entitled to have these documents identified and to have them laid on the table. The Speaker ruled that he did not have the power to require the hon. member to table the documents, and the hon. member for Prince Albert did not see fit to table them of his own motion. Indeed, when I ventured to ask him the date of one of the documents he had quoted, his reply was, and this is quoted from Hansard:

> Will the hon. member sit down? I am speaking.

At that time I had never seen the documents which the hon. member for Prince Albert was citing and had no way of identifying them. It is true, as I explained later in the estimates committee, that I had seen certain documents prepared by Mr. Taylor, which he had shown to my deputy minister and left with the department. It was not until March 2, 1955, when the hon. member for Kamloops read in the estimates committee a letter he had received from Mr. Taylor, that I learned for sure that two of the documents in the departmental file were two of the four reports by Mr. Taylor.

In that letter, Mr. Taylor said:

> Copies of two of the reports of these studies, in their final form, were left with the deputy minister of citizenship and immigration in Ottawa on or about the 26th August, 1954, and the other two in original form were read and studied by him at that time. Copies of these last two reports were given to the deputy minister at Winnipeg by the writer. The deputy minister has, therefore, had in his possession copies of all four documents since the beginning of September, 1954.

The dates given in Mr. Taylor's letter to the hon. member for Kamloops made it clear to me for the first time that two of the documents we had in the department were copies of these reports of Mr. Taylor's.

The deputy minister has no recollection of being given the other two reports while he was in Winnipeg or since, and we have not been able to find copies of these documents in the departmental files. To the best of my knowledge and belief I have never seen them. I am not questioning Mr. Taylor's veracity, but it does seem probable that his recollection is not accurate; and that he did not give them to the deputy in Winnipeg. If he had given the documents to my deputy it is surprising that Mr. Taylor did not mention them to me in the letter he wrote to me in September.

Mr. Taylor also said in his letter to Mr. Fulton, and here again I quote:

> None of these reports was ever regarded as a secret or confidential document. They were delivered to the deputy minister in the hope, and with the expectation that he would analyze them and discuss them with the minister.

Needless to say, I did examine the two documents dated July 13 and July 20 when they were first shown to me by the deputy minister last September. One of these documents contains what purport to be summaries of applications for the admission to Canada of immigrants from China and the other contains similar material about applications for the admission of immigrants from India. I have had the documents carefully checked by the officials of my department and I am informed that, with the exception of one single case, every case referred to in these documents is a case which was handled by Mr. Taylor or by Mr. Taylor's law firm for clients of that firm. In other words, all the information contained in these documents is based on information given to Mr. Taylor by his clients or given to Mr. Taylor when acting for his clients by officers of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

When it became clear on March 2 that two documents in the departmental files were copies of two of Mr. Taylor's reports, I would have made them public at once but for one reason. I did not want to take the responsibility for making public documents which had never been communicated officially to my department, which were not part of the records of the department, and which were based almost entirely upon information about the private affairs of individuals which Mr. Taylor as a lawyer had acquired in his professional relationship with his clients.

When, however, the hon. member for Kamloops brought this matter up for the fourth or fifth or sixth time in the special committee on estimates on March 10, last, I made the following statement, and I am quoting from the proceedings of the committee:

> I might save a great deal of the time of the committee and enable the committee to make a much better decision about the motions raised by Mr. Fulton by saying that the last time this subject was brought up in the committee I was asked by one member the question as to who had signed the two documents in my deputy's possession which appeared to be the same as two of the documents referred to in Mr. Taylor's letter to Mr. Fulton. I examined the mimeographed documents which I have. They bear no signature, of course, but typed at the bottoms of both these documents is the name of Mr. Taylor and of Mr. Taylor only.
> Mr. Macnaughton: I think I asked you that question for the purpose of seeing how authentic these documents were.
> Mr. Pickersgill: I cannot vouch for that, but I am willing to say this right now, that Mr. Taylor put these documents into the possession of my deputy minister under certain conditions which both the deputy and I thought we understood, and which Mr. Taylor confirmed in writing to me in a letter which has been placed on the record of this committee. Then Mr. Taylor saw fit to write to Mr. Fulton, without doing me the courtesy of bothering to write to me, saying he was now prepared to have me take a different course. If Mr. Taylor wants to write to me direct and tell me he takes personal responsibility for these documents which bear his name only, I will lay them before the committee just as soon as I get Mr. Taylor's letter, and then the committee will have a chance to say whether the stuff in these documents give Mr. Taylor any particular title to appear as an expert in this matter. And if he wants to send me the two documents which I have not seen and which my deputy minister has not got in his possession I will be prepared to lay them on the table without even looking them over. I do not think, therefore, that we need to detain the committee for long on the subject of Mr. Fulton's motion.

Mr. Chairman, I stand by that offer. But so far I have had no word of any kind from Mr. Taylor about this subject.

Mr. Fulton: You have not written to him, have you?

Mr. Pickersgill: And so far I am still ignorant of the contents of two of his four reports—the one dated August 5 and the one dated August 10, 1954, referred to in Mr. Taylor's letter to the hon. member for Kamloops. I suspect, however, that they, like the other two documents, are confined to Chinese and Indian cases because Chinese and Indian cases are the only ones Mr. Taylor has ever discussed with the department in his many and lengthy discussions with departmental officials.

Since the war, Canada has admitted nearly 1,200,000 immigrants. Of that very large number probably something fewer than 15,000 have been of Chinese or East Indian origin. Mr. Taylor's case against the department is based upon a relatively small number even of the Chinese and Indian cases. I think most members of the committee and most Canadians will regard this as a pretty narrow basis on which to convict the immigration branch of maladministration.

I have made these observations because I think the public is entitled to know the kind of basis there is for these charges. I have said over and over again that the department has not the slightest objection to the publication of these reports by Mr. Taylor, if he wants to publish them on his own responsibility. So far as I am concerned, sir, that is really all I have to say about this subject.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of beating this rather badly battered straw any further. As an immigrant baby I hesitate to deal with the relative merits of immigrant babies and native-born babies. The terrible thought does occur to me that had I been a native-born Canadian baby I might have met the dreadful fate of being a cabinet minister, or the equally dreadful fate of being a member of the official opposition. However, I think perhaps I am saved from this by the circumstances of my birth, deplorable though they may be.

Mr. Fulton: Ambitions as yet unrealized.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Yes, and, of course, forever beyond my reach because of the unfortunate circumstances of my birth.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rather, your party affiliation.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do not think I will waste any more time on that. I believe the minister will agree it was a very silly thing to say. We all say silly things on occasion, but it is not worth all the fuss that has been made about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I could not agree more.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I want to come back to the question of the administration of the department and deal with the case the hon. member for Kamloops brought up a while ago. I would recall to your mind, Mr. Chairman, that in the first discussions we had in the house respecting this department I brought up this particular case. You may recall that the minister questioned the propriety of my bringing it up, because it was then going before the courts.

I dropped the matter and discussed it no further, but I suggested at that time that all available evidence, all previous decisions, would indicate that the appeal court of Ontario would reject the appeal of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in this case, and that it was merely another stubborn and obstinate attempt to get the courts of Canada to adopt a position they have consistently refused to adopt.

The minister tells us that he proposes to take this case to the Supreme Court of Canada. I suggest that this will be a waste of public money, and that before he does so he should examine very carefully the case of Samejima v. The King, referred to in this judgment, which I mentioned in the house earlier in the session, and the statements of the late Sir Lyman Duff in that connection, because it is a case that is completely on all fours with the Brent case.

It was the case that was quoted in every court where the Brent case was dealt with, and it went all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. It became the type case for this sort of thing. There was a definite ruling by the supreme court over 20 years ago. I suggest that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should have very much firmer grounds than appear evident now for taking the Brent case to the Supreme Court of Canada and again asking the supreme judicial body of this country to reverse a decision they made previously and, moreover, to again question decisions that have been made in almost every court in Canada.

The Samejima case went from the supreme court of British Columbia to the appeal court of British Columbia to the Supreme Court of Canada. The Brent case has been dragged through the courts and is now apparently going to the topmost rung of the ladder. I suggest, sir, that this indicates a rather peculiar attitude on the part of the officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I cannot for the life of me see what excuse there is for doing it.

Mr. Pickersgill: In fairness, the decision is mine.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Oh, yes, quite right. I will certainly put all the blame on the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: If you please.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I think he is very ill-advised to do so, and for the life of me I cannot see what excuse he has for doing it. He has case after case, decision after decision, and I think he is merely going to hold up the department again to a certain amount of ridicule in the eyes of those who follow these cases.

There is another matter in connection with this decision that I think bears very serious study. I have no doubt whatever that the Supreme Court of Canada is going to uphold the Aylesworth decision. I see no reason to imagine that they would do otherwise than uphold the supreme and appeal courts of British Columbia, as in the Samejima case. When that is done, and I am sure it is going to be done, it will be necessary for the Department of Citizenship and Immigration not only to refrain from this obstinate and repeated attempt to get the courts to change their mind, but it will also be necessary for the department and the minister to set up new administrative machinery; because Mr. Justice Aylesworth quite bluntly tells them they are breaking the law by their present methods, that they are not holding the inquiries as set forth by the law, and that in order to do so they must establish different procedures. Mr. Justice Aylesworth points out that the governor general in council had no authority under the act to delegate the powers delegated to him as they are being delegated today.

In light of that, it will be necessary for the department to establish completely different methods of procedure in the holding of these deportation hearings. I think myself that is something that is long overdue. It is something which, once established, will go a long way to remove the cloud of suspicion and doubt that now hangs around this department. I would urge the minister most earnestly to consider seriously not wasting any more time or any more public funds in an attempt to get the courts to do something they have repeatedly said they will not do.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member's line of argument at all in so far as the merits of necessary changes in the regulations of the immigration department are concerned, but it appears to me that perhaps I have been somewhat dilatory in not bringing this point to the attention of the committee before. If a case is before the courts I do not think it is competent for any member to express an opinion as to the outcome or merits of that particular case. I realize that the matter was not raised by the Chair before, and that perhaps more latitude has already been allowed than should have been, but I would ask the hon. member who now has the floor and those who follow him to endeavour to so arrange their remarks and arguments that they do not actually discuss the merits of a case which we are now informed is still before the courts.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo).]

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I would point out to you, sir, that I only have official knowledge of the fact that this case has been decided by the appeal court of the province of Ontario. This afternoon the minister suggested that he was considering referring it to a higher court. As far as I know he has not yet done so. He may have done so. He did not raise that point and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that he is the only person in possession of the knowledge that would enable him to raise that point of order against my remarks on this score. I think we have to have that much latitude. We surely cannot be shut out for fear that at some future time a case we are discussing is going to be taken to a higher court.

The Deputy Chairman: I had hoped to make it clear to the hon. member who has the floor that I did not wish to interfere with his argument at all except in so far as he was discussing the merits of a case which we now know is before the courts. I think I should say in passing that I feel it is not my duty to wait until a minister or someone else raises a point of order. If I believe anything is being said that is beyond the limits of order, it is my duty to point that out to the committee. I think the hon. member now realizes the situation we are in, and I am quite sure he can continue to criticize the methods of the department without actually expressing an opinion as to the outcome of a case which we now know is under appeal.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am sorry, but with all due deference to you, sir, I am still quite in doubt and I must repeat this. I submit I am only out of order if you or someone else has definite knowledge that this matter has been formally taken to the supreme court. This committee has not been so informed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir, perhaps I ought to be a little more precise. It is my intention to recommend to the Attorney General of Canada, who does not happen to be in the chamber at the moment, that this case be appealed. It is my firm intention to do that; there is no question about that.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): If that action had been taken it certainly would be out of order for any member to discuss this case, but until that action has been taken I suggest this is as far as it has gone. This court decision has been referred to, and incidentally I may say, sir, I do not presume to discuss that judgment from the point of view of the law, because I am not capable of doing so.

I am merely quoting the judgment of the learned justices of the appeal court of Ontario, and pointing out that their judgment coincides with judgments given repeatedly by other learned justices in other parts of Canada, as well as in the Supreme Court of Canada. I am questioning the wisdom of the minister in deciding to once again try to get the courts to do something they have more than once said they would not do.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member may continue, but I called him to order because he was expressing the one opinion which I have now decided in my own mind he is not entitled to express in his comments, and that is what should be the outcome of the appeal of legal case.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am not discussing what should be the outcome. I am discussing the wisdom of the department in placing this case before another court.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may continue, and I think it is not necessary for us to carry on this discussion. The hon. member knows as well as I do—

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I have finished making my point anyway, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: —that if it is unwise to appeal a certain case it can only be unwise because of the anticipated result of that appeal. I do not think it is necessary for the hon. gentleman and me to carry on the argument. I am ruling that the case is reported to us, so far as the Chair knows, as subject to appeal, and therefore a discussion of the outcome or the merits of the appeal is not in order.

At the same time, as I said when I raised this point, I realized there was considerable discussion of this matter earlier when perhaps we did not realize what the situation was. I feel quite certain that the hon. member's argument which I have interrupted could be continued without transgressing what have been the accepted rules of this committee.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): This puts me in a very difficult position, and will put several members of this committee in a difficult position, because you are not merely ruling out discussion of this case, but you are ruling out any discussion of every case that has come before the courts but has not yet gone to the Supreme Court of Canada. With regard to citizenship and immigration you are ruling that we have to wait until we hear definitely the minister has not decided to appeal before we can discuss the case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I submit that any suggestion on the part of the minister that the case may be appealed—

Mr. Pickersgill: I made no such suggestion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister stated a while ago that there was a possibility this might be appealed. Whether or not he made that statement I am not saying, but that was the inference I took from his remarks.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I just clarify that point? What I said in response to the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo was that the case had not yet been appealed but it was my firm intention to recommend appeal to the Attorney General. As a matter of fact, I want to make it quite clear that I have raised no point about this discussion at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I do not suggest that. We have arrived at the point where you could call a case sub judice simply because of the fact that some day in the future the minister may decide to appeal. This ruling would deny discussion of almost any judgment. I submit with greatest respect to Your Honour than the hon. gentleman who has the floor is entitled to refer to a judgment which, until it is appealed, is the final judgment on this matter. This judgment represents an appeal from the original hearing of an application for habeas corpus and a motion by way of certiorari, and it is the final judgment on the subject until another appeal is made. The matter, therefore, is not sub judice, so I would urge with great respect that the hon. gentleman is entitled to proceed.

Mr. Fulton: My thought on the point of order was simply this. My understanding of the rule is that it is very clear. A case to be sub judice in the sense that it would be improper to discuss it here has to be before the courts, meaning that either a writ has been issued or some proceedings have been taken to commence action or, in the case of an appeal, that notice of the appeal has been filed. I am reasonably satisfied Your Honour will find that to be the rule; and viewed in that light, the mere declaration by a person of an intention to appeal, or a recommendation to the Attorney General that an appeal should be taken, is not, I think, sufficient to bring it within the rule and make the case sub judice.

Mr. Crestohl: With all due deference to the various experts, I am of the opinion that so long as the time for an appeal has not run out, the case is still sub judice. It is not a final judgment if the time for appeal in this case has not run out as yet. An appeal may be launched at any time before the time does run out.

The Deputy Chairman: I think we can—did you want to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I still have something I want to say on this decision. I want to deal again with Mr. Justice Aylesworth's decision.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): No.

The Deputy Chairman: If I may put it this way, a point of order depends not only on a matter of law but on matters of fact as well. I think the committee will agree that a matter is sub judice which is actually before the court, and cannot properly be discussed within this house. The reason for that rule is fairly obvious, that there shall not be pressure of any kind brought from this legislative body upon the judicial branch of the government. So far I think we can agree.

Then, of course, the question we have before us now is, is this case before the courts or not? I am not prepared to go so far as has been suggested and say that as long as the case is capable of being appealed it may not be discussed here. I understood, in the rather rapid debate that has been going on, that a statement had been made that this case is definitely being appealed. I am in the hands of those who know the facts as to the status of this case. If this case is definitely being appealed in my opinion it is not capable of discussion in this house, for exactly the same reason that it would not be capable of discussion if the appeal were actually being argued, namely that knowing the case was going before the courts it would not be right for members of this house to discuss its merits. I think the committee will agree with me on that.

I believe we shall have to accept the word of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who can tell us definitely whether or not this case is being appealed. If it is, I am going to rule that it should not be discussed at the present time. If it may be or may not be, then of course I am not in a position to rule that it should not be discussed, because we do not know that it is going to be appealed. So far as I am concerned the question is one of fact, as to whether or not this case is definitely being appealed. I would presume the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is the only person who could inform us on that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall assist the committee, if I can. I have refrained from discussing this case because, as I said, I intend to recommend to my colleague the Attorney General that the case be appealed. However, I have not yet made that recommendation to him, and I am not going to make his decision for him. Therefore I do not think one can say that the appeal has yet been entered. This is why I took no exception to what was being said about it by the hon. member for Kamloops or the hon. member for Nanaimo.

I think it would be improper for me to discuss the case, because I do intend to recommend appeal and, as I said before, I intend to recommend appeal because I want the final arbiter to say what the law is. But I would certainly say it is quite proper for the hon. member for Nanaimo to give reasons why he thinks it would be a waste of public money, as he has said, to make the appeal. I should think the hon. member could draw analogies between this and other cases, and so on. I felt I could take no exception to that and, therefore, did not raise the point. My only feeling is that I should not discuss it; but I did not feel that that self-denying ordinance should be applied to any other member.

The Deputy Chairman: If I have heard the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration correctly, while it is the intention to make certain recommendations it has not been definitely decided by the law officers of the crown that this appeal will be proceeded with. Under these circumstances I have cost this committee some 15 or 20 minutes which might otherwise have been spent in discussing the affairs of the department before the committee. However, I hope hon. members will agree that perhaps the time has not been wasted. I would hope also that the hon. member for Nanaimo would agree that it is very desirable that in this body we should not at any time discuss the merits of matters which are to be decided by the non-political branch of government, namely the judicial body.

I find myself now in the position that we will have to rely entirely upon the good judgment of the hon. member for Nanaimo as to the language in which he chooses to couch his criticisms of the administration of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Perhaps he would permit me to say, not in any debating sense at all, that in my opinion it would be advisable to be somewhat restrained in any language we might use respecting the merits of a case which we have some reason to believe is due to appear before the final court of appeal in the land.

Further than that I cannot go at the present time, and the hon. member for Nanaimo will be permitted to continue his remarks and, of course, will not be penalized, in time, for the time lost because of this interruption.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I have only one or two comments to make and, in doing so, I shall bear in mind what you have said. I am sorry if you had reason to believe that I have been unrestrained in my comments.

There is one point I do wish to bring to the attention of the minister, and that is the real burden of the criticism contained in this judgment which was, as I said, that the governor general in council had no legislative authority to delegate his powers and that, in order that the legislative powers delegated to the governor general in council be carried out, the minister should draft for the approval of the governor general in council a set of regulations by which officials could render similar decisions in any part of Canada rather than, as at present, leaving it to the responsibility of an individual official in any part of the country to make the decision for himself. That, I feel convinced, no matter what may be the outcome of this case, is something the minister will have to consider very seriously indeed.

After all, I would point out that it is a precedent followed by many other departments in carrying out regulative powers conferred upon them by the house.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief. Let me say at the outset that we in this group attach a great deal of importance to the work of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. In terms of future growth, and of making Canada a major power in terms of filling the vacuum in population—I might say the dangerous vacuum—which now exists, I think we will all agree that the minister has a great responsibility in the department of which he is in charge.

Further evidence that our people in Canada follow with great interest all facets of the activities of the department is clearly shown by the sensational publicity recently given to our minister by reason of his address in Victoria. I do not intend to labour that matter at all. I feel the minister has learned a lesson in that he must now realize that disturbing racial backgrounds and heritage is dangerous and these are sensitive matters with the people of Canada. Perhaps this offers a subject that could be exploited politically, but I do not think any useful purpose can be served by doing so. I personally have every confidence that our minister is anxious to do as good a job as he possibly can, and that he will bring in whatever improvements and corrections are necessary to make his one of the most efficient departments of government.

However, I would appreciate learning from him his views on another matter which is of concern to me, because I do believe that in a sense it reflects gross discrimination. Perhaps the minister will recall that when the initial debate on immigration took place in the house in February I brought the matter up casually. At this time I would appreciate if the minister would express his views. The matter I have in mind involves the status of certain babies.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but, it being five o'clock, the house will proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: There are several private bills to be studied in committee of the whole. Is it agreed that they should all be considered in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Then is it agreed that I do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on certain private bills, namely orders numbers 25 to 153 inclusive?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FREDERICTON & GRAND LAKE COAL & RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 307, respecting the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company—Mr. Murphy (Westmorland)—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Undertaking of the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company vested in Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, would the sponsor of the bill indicate whether all parties concerned, principally the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway, have agreed with the request that this legislation be put through?

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): The company, the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company, is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Further than that, the Canadian Pacific Railway have a 999-year lease on the Fredericton and Grand Lake Coal and Railway Company.

Mr. Knowles: Was that not long enough?

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): Well, this is a procedure that is being followed by the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific to consolidate their holdings and reduce the number of companies, to simplify the organization.

ROYAL ARCHITECTURAL INSTITUTE OF CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 244, to consolidate and amend acts relating to the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada—Mr. Deschatelets—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, in introducing this private bill on March 15 I made an unfortunate statement which I should like to correct. I quote from page 2046 of Hansard as follows:

> Architecture is the only profession, I think, which is not represented in this house. In view of the tremendous contribution of architects to the expansion of this country it is to be hoped that some day an architect will have the privilege of sitting in this house.

Later on my attention was drawn to the fact that one of our colleagues is a member of this profession. I refer to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency. Our colleague is a practising architect in the city of Quebec, a member of the P.Q.A.A. and a fellow of the R.A.I.C. I am therefore taking this opportunity to apologize to my colleague, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, and I wish to add that the profession is not only represented here; it is represented by a learned and fine gentleman.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I have a question I should like to ask the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont who is sponsoring this bill. The title indicates that it does two things: it consolidates, and it amends an act which relates to the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada. It is quite obvious that it is a consolidating statute in that it puts together the various sections that are in chapter 82 of the statutes of 1908, chapter 64 of the statutes of 1912, and chapter 96 of the statutes of 1929. Can the hon. member indicate, either on clause 1, or on the appropriate clauses as we come to them, wherein there are any amendments?

As you, Mr. Chairman, pointed out on a previous occasion, a bill before this house is supposed to have on the righthand pages an indication of the changes that are being made. The righthand pages of this bill are all blank.

[Mr. Murphy (Westmorland).]

Can the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont indicate which clauses involve amendments?

Mr. Deschatelets: I do not know if I get the remarks of my hon. friend aright. Would he like me to indicate to him the changes in the original charter? That would be difficult to do because I have a note here that it is a consolidation, but the numbers of the paragraphs do not follow each other. It is pretty hard to indicate them in order.

Mr. Knowles: Is it more than just a rearranging of the existing statutes? Is that all there is to it, or does it make some changes of substance?

Mr. Deschatelets: No new powers are asked for in this bill. The membership is the same, the name is the same. I shall give some details to my hon. friend which may satisfy him. There are no special details to be given except to say that the bill indicates the importance of the institute. It enumerates the associations which will compose the institute. Since the last charter a few additional provincial associations have been added. It establishes the conditions under which the council of the institute can pass rules and regulations. In the original bill there were some conditions under which the council could pass rules and regulations but I would say that the conditions have been improved in this bill. The conditions are outlined under which the association can own property. The membership is the same; the name is the same. There are no important changes.

Mr. Knowles: That is satisfactory. I take it that in the main it is a consolidating act, although there are a few changes in view of the fact there are a few more associations in the country.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 349, respecting Sharp & Dohme (Canada) Ltd.—Mr. McIlraith.

The Chairman: There are a number of divorce bills before the committee. Is it agreed that they be dealt with as one?

Mr. Knowles: How many are there, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I can give the numbers: 196 to 231; 233 to 241; 246 to 255; 264 to 277; 286 to 302; 308 to 327; 329 to 348, all inclusive.

Mr. Knowles: My arithmetic makes that a total of 126 bills.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that they be taken as one?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WINNIPEG AND ST. BONIFACE HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

CONSOLIDATION OF EXISTING STATUTES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 285, respecting the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is not unlike the purpose of the bill passed a few moments ago, which was presented to the house by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets). This bill merely consolidates three existing statutes so that the legislation respecting the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners may be found all in one place.

As I have had occasion to point out earlier this session, this legislation was passed first back in 1912, the original Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act being chapter 55 of the statutes of that year. That original statute was amended by chapter 17 of the statutes of 1938, the main purpose of that amendment being to make it possible for some of the other municipalities in the Winnipeg area to have representation on this board. The other amendment was made this session by chapter 6 of the statutes of 1955. As hon. members will recall, the effect of that amendment was to provide that the quorum for meetings of the board should be a majority rather than the larger number under the formula as it stood in the original act.

The bill now before the house in my name makes absolutely no change in the legislation; it does not change a jot or a tittle; it simply brings the three enactments together in one piece of legislation.

As all of us know, about every 25 years there is what is known as a revision of the statutes of Canada, but it so happens that every time that chore is undertaken there are quite a number of statutes not revised, not consolidated and not brought forward. In some cases the reason is quite clear, in that the usefulness of the statute has diminished or perhaps a statute is spent. In other cases even though the statute may still be in effect those doing the revising do not bring it forward. That is what happened with respect to the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act.

There have been two revisions of the statutes since 1912, the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927 and the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, but on neither of those occasions was this legislation consolidated. This means that those who are interested in the legislation respecting the harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface have to delve into the statute books of three different years, 1912, 1938 and 1955.

As I have said before, it is not a matter of world-shaking importance that these statutes be put in one place, but it does seem to be a matter of logic and common sense, and certainly it is a matter of convenience for those who have occasion to refer to this basic charter or constitution providing for the operations of this board.

As I have indicated on other occasions, the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission is a body with a good deal of work to which it must attend. The harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface does not compare with some of the other harbours in Canada, but as I indicated by giving figures on March 17 there is a fair amount of shipping at the Alexander avenue wharf in this harbour, which happens to be located in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre.

I might also point out that the members of this board have been quite busy during the past 12 months. There has come before them a number of applications for the laying of pipe lines under both the Red and the Assiniboine rivers. In some cases the pipe lines have been for gas, in some cases for oil, in some cases for telephone trunk lines and in some cases for water distribution.

They have also had to deal with the preparations for the building of the mid-town bridge which crosses the Assiniboine river at the foot of Donald street, connecting the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) with the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor). The board has also had something to do with the borings in connection with the preliminary tests at the site of the proposed Disraeli bridge which is to cross the Red river in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre.

I indicate these activities merely to point out that this legislation is not the dead letter that it seems to be considered when it is left as a statute of 1912, the amendments to which can be found only by searching the statutes of 1938 and 1955. It is for that reason that it seems to me to be a matter of convenience, logic and fairness to those concerned to have this legislation put into the one place.

As hon. members would expect, I have had some advice in connection with the preparation of this bill. The legal advice I have had is that this is the way to put all this legislation in one place and have it as a statute with legal effect. One can do this sort of thing by having the department print what is known as an office consolidation, but as everyone knows an office consolidation does not have the legal standing which is accorded to a statute passed by parliament.

On previous occasions when I have suggested that this be done it has been argued from the government side that it should not be considered for various reasons. It has been suggested that if it is done for this particular legislation it will have to be done for other legislation. I do not see that that is a very strong argument. It was contended also that it would be perfectly satisfactory to leave it the way it was. I admit readily that there would be no substantial loss if the legislation were left in the three places where it now is, but it seems to me that for the sake of tidying up things, for the sake of convenience, and as recognition of a good job which the members of this board do in the Winnipeg area—and they do it on a voluntary basis—the house might consent to the passing of this bill.

In conclusion I emphasize, as I did at the first, that it does not change anything. It just takes the three statutes to which I have referred and puts them together in a consolidated form, so that the legislation respecting the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners might be found all in one place.

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the sponsor of this bill, concerning that part of his remarks dealing with the historical background of the statutory provisions concerning the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission. I wish also to state that his interest and the interest of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau), who also discussed this bill with me, in the activities of this harbour commission are very much appreciated by our department.

However, without going into a detailed study of the various sections of this bill, I wish to point out some of its effects. As hon. members know, the bill creates a new commission, and the existing corporation consequently disappears without providing for maintaining the continuity of the present corporation. On the other hand, the existing act describes the harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface as comprising in part all the waters within the limits of the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface as they existed at the time of the passing of the original act, that is on 1st April, 1912. The present bill describes the harbour as comprising all the waters within the limits of the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface at the time of its passing, and this might have the effect of increasing or decreasing the limits of the present harbour, according to changes which might have taken place in the limits of both these cities since 1912.

Under the original act the harbour includes also such municipalities as were brought within the provisions of the act under section 4 as amended in 1938. These words are repeated in the present bill, but the effect is that the harbour would not indeed include the municipalities that were brought within the provisions of the present act. I wish also to add that the bill provides for the appointment of commissioners and that if the present act is repealed, the question arises whether or not the existing commissioners have ceased to hold office and whether also there must be new appointments. As hon. members know, it is customary in consolidating a statute of this kind to insert a transitional provision to ensure continuity of office but, of course, not beyond the terms of the existing tenures. The same remarks apply with respect to harbourmasters and other staff.

The present act also provides for the payment of the surplus profits to municipalities that have been brought under the provisions of the act as amended in 1938. As I have previously indicated, the present act includes all municipalities brought in under section 4 and, I repeat, as amended in 1938. The effect of repealing section 4 of the present act and replacing it, as the sponsor of this bill does, by an identical wording in the new bill would be to deprive of their share of the profits the municipalities brought in under the old act.

Furthermore, a similar problem arises in connection with clause 16 of the present act, dealing with the inspection of the books of the corporation by the audit departments of the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface and other municipalities brought in under the existing provisions; that is section 4 of the act.

Furthermore, I am informed by the drafting experts of the Department of Justice that the bill does not conform in all respects to the practices, as to language, form, and punctuation, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. I am further advised that if the consolidation is made it would be desirable to make it uniform with the revised statutes. It is to be noted that it is not the intention of the sponsor of this bill, as he admitted a moment ago in speaking on second reading, to make any change in the existing statutory provisions, and therefore this is a private measure promoted as a matter of convenience only. For this reason the bill might be considered to be superfluous.

Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances, though I recognize that a consolidation might be desirable, I regret that I have to oppose the measure.

Mr. Fernand Viau (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of St. Boniface, the city which has been concerned with this matter since 1912, in respect of having two commissioners as members of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission, and also following what I was asked by the commissioners last year and again a few months ago to bring to this house—an amendment affecting the quorum of this corporation—I was surprised indeed to read in full the bill submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asking for the consolidation of the acts respecting the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission.

If one would read the words pronounced in this house in 1912 and in 1938—mostly in 1912—when an application was made to this house for the establishment of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission, one would find that the trade on the Red river was from two points in the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface alone.

Later on, in the amendment which was introduced here in 1938, it was requested that the new municipalities contiguous to both cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface but lying along the Red river could on application elect a representative to this commission. But if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had read carefully the bill asking for the formation of a Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission he would have noticed that the amendment of 1938 would include the municipalities contiguous to the city of Winnipeg or the city of St. Boniface, whose limits were lying along the Red river.

There is a contradiction there between the two sections because, after all, the powers of the commission cover all waters within both cities. That takes in the Assiniboine river, the Seine river and, of course, the Red river which, at the time of the introduction of the bill in 1912, was the main trading route from the United States of America up to lake Winnipeg. The amendment of 1938 refers to all municipalities contiguous to the city of Winnipeg or the city of St. Boniface. They already have the power to elect a representative on the commission, but in view of the wording of the act it would only mean the municipalities of St. Vital, Fort Garry, East Kildonan and West Kildonan, which are the only municipalities contiguous both to the city of Winnipeg and the city of St. Boniface.

On the other hand, if you take all municipalities lying along the Red river it would include St. James and the town of Tuxedo on the west side and North Kildonan and Springfield on the east side. Their powers would cover that portion of the Red river between the northern and the southern boundaries of each respective municipality to the centre point of the Red river. With the act as it stands I do not see how the municipalities of Tuxedo, St. James and North Kildonan could have the area within the northern and southern boundaries of their municipalities running to the centre line of the Red river become part of the territory under the jurisdiction of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is not a consolidation of the acts that should have been requested but a full revision of the statutes as they now stand. For that reason I oppose the bill for the time being.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot quite understand the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. As I read the introductory words of the bill, it is an act to consolidate the acts respecting the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners. I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member who introduced the bill and to the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken. I cannot see where his argument comes into the picture, and I would refer him to clause 4 of the bill which is very definite. It says:

> 4. (1) For the purposes of this act, the harbour of Winnipeg and St. Boniface shall be deemed to include all the waters within the limits of the cities of Winnipeg and St. Boniface at the time of the passing of this act and of such municipalities as may be brought within the provisions of this act under subsection 2 hereof.

Subclause 2 is very definite, and I am afraid my hon. friend ignored it. It reads:

> (2) With the consent of any municipality, expressed by bylaw of the council thereof, the waters within such municipality may be added to the harbour by a bylaw to that effect made by the corporation and confirmed by the governor in council and published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Viau: Would the hon. member look at subclause (g) of section 3?

Mr. Winch: I would say that adds to my argument.

Mr. Viau: Oh, no.

Mr. Winch: I would certainly think so. It reads:

(g) "municipality" means a municipality contiguous to the city of Winnipeg or the city of St. Boniface, and lying along the Red river, and any such municipality shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to include within its limits that portion of the Red river between such municipality and the centre line of the said river and between the productions respectively of the northerly and southerly boundaries of the said municipality from the points of intersection of the said boundaries with the said river to the points of intersection of the productions of the said boundaries with the centre line of the said river.

In my interpretation that is still governed by subclause 2 of clause 4, "with the consent of any municipality". Under subclause (g) of clause 3 you have a certain definition, but under subclause 2 of clause 4 it appears that the consent of the municipality is required, expressed by bylaw of the council thereof, and so on. With those points in mind, quite honestly I cannot see that this bill involves anything more than a consolidation of the acts. There are no new points, no new principles. It is just a consolidation for the sake of efficiency, as the mover said.

Mr. Viau: Would the hon. member answer my question? What are the municipalities contiguous to the city of Winnipeg and the city of St. Boniface whose northern and southern boundaries lie along the Red river?

Mr. Winch: I come back to subclause 2 of clause 4, where it says that consent is required of any municipality with respect to anything affecting waters within the municipality. I would say it is absolute protection. I should like to ask the hon. member to explain what he means if he thinks there is no protection there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether we are in committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As the minister knows, we are not; but the bill seems to be highly technical and the argument that was being put forward by the hon. member was one in which I suppose he had to refer to one or two sections. But I think the hon. member has completed his remarks now. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles: Although the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) naturally could not be as familiar with the geography of the Winnipeg area as is the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Viau) and as I am myself, nevertheless I think he has answered the questions asked by the hon. member for St. Boniface. As I understand the wording of the legislation now on the statute books, the only municipalities that meet the definition and therefore can participate in the activities of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners are municipalities which meet two conditions. They must be contiguous either to the city of Winnipeg or the city of St. Boniface, and they must lie along the Red river. If the hon. member for St. Boniface agrees with me, as I think he does, and if what he means by his argument is that any error in the legislation is not in my bill but is in the legislation already on the statute books, of course he is free to bring in a bill to amend what is already there.

I am interested in these arguments to the effect that one of the things wrong with my bill is that it does not make any changes in the existing legislation. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, or anyone else, to guess what the argument would have been if my bill had changed one jot or one tittle of the existing legislation. I would have been told that as a private member I was trying to change the government's legislation. All I am trying to do is to get the government to vote for its own legislation, but because the bill is brought in with the name of an opposition member on the front of it—

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): That is not the reason.

Mr. Knowles:—it seems to be having a difficult time. My hon. friends on the other side quote legal advice they have obtained. I have obtained legal advice, too, from sources that are open to all of us as members of parliament. The advice given to me is not quite the same as the advice that apparently has been given to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport. I am advised that a consolidating statute of this kind, since it is entitled a consolidating statute, does not, even though it repeals statutes that are already there and replaces them by this one, abolish any body that is now in existence or infringe upon any rights that have been established by legislation as from the date it was first put on the statute books.

However, if the lawyers who give this conflicting advice cannot get together as to the best form in which to write a consolidating act, it would be very simple to let the bill have second reading and send it to one of the committees of this house. In order to cover all objections, a saving clause could be put in the bill.

I will say this for my hon. friend's argument, that in the bill consolidating the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act which is before parliament at the present time, there is such a saving clause which makes sure that the present commission is continued. The same sort of saving clause could be put in this bill. My legal adviser said it was not necessary. My hon. friend's legal adviser said it was necessary. It is not a matter over which to debate. Surely if the basic purpose of this bill, namely convenience, is a desirable objective and is accepted, this point could be met by giving the bill second reading and sending it to a committee where the point could be considered.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport states that some of this 1912 wording is not the kind of wording of which the Department of Transport approves in 1955. I am not so sure that the wording of some of the statutes introduced in 1955 is so very clear, but I will admit the point that since 1912 there has been some change in wording in the matter of drafting legislation. Again I just ask anyone in this house the question, what sort of response would my bill have obtained if I had tried to change the wording to bring it up to date? In fact, if the department feels now that some of the wording should be changed, it would be a very simple matter to agree to the bill in principle—a principle which is very clear, just to consolidate what is there—and then make any changes in wording that might seem desirable when the bill is before the committee.

If these suggestions as to ways of dealing with the matter do not commend themselves to my hon. friends opposite, then of course there is another way they can deal with the matter. They can introduce a bill themselves that would put all this legislation in one place.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be permitted to point out that in my view we in the parliament of Canada do lack something in this respect which they have in the parliament of the United Kingdom. I had occasion to refer to this in connection with a point of order a few days ago, but I am sure Your Honour will agree that it is relevant to this bill which has as its purpose the consolidating of certain statutes.

There is on the statute books of the United Kingdom what is known as the consolidation of enactments (procedure) act, 1949, which is chapter 33 of the statutes of 1949. The purpose of this statute is to meet this very point, to make it possible for acts which get amended from time to time, and which get scattered all through the statute books, to be consolidated and put through parliament expeditiously. I invite those who are interested in procedural matters of this kind to read chapter 33 of the United Kingdom statutes of 1949. It will be noted that the responsibility for agreeing that a bill is just a consolidation, making only minor changes in wording such as have been suggested by my hon. friend, rests with the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker of the House of Commons—in other words, in our terminology, with the two Speakers of the parliament of the United Kingdom.

If those two gentlemen are satisfied that a bill which has been introduced as a consolidating bill does only that, just consolidates and does not make any changes, then there is a streamlined procedure by which the bill, after notice has been posted in the London Gazette for a required length of time, is referred to a committee without debate. It is possible for it to go through parliament without parliament having to debate all the clauses of the bill.

I know that one of the reasons the government does not like to introduce consolidating bills is that it could have, as I think it does have, the effect of opening up all the clauses, at least once you get into committee. As I say, that point has been met in the United Kingdom by this special statute. I think some day the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), whom I see in the house, and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), whose interest in this matter I appreciate, might look at this statute to see if it would not be a good idea to have a similar one here.

I am not arguing anything that could be called partisan in any sense at all. I am just suggesting something that could result in tidying up our bits of legislation so they would be easier to find. I invite the members of the cabinet to study this procedure that is made possible by chapter 33 of the United Kingdom statutes of 1949.

We have not got that here, Mr. Speaker. There are only two ways in which our statutes can be consolidated. One is by the revision that takes place about every 25 years. We all welcome that. It was good to get the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952 and to feel that we had most of the laws of Canada in about five or six volumes instead of in 50 or more. The other way is by introducing a new bill which could go through all the stages of legislation in parliament, but which in the end would have the effect this bill of mine would have, of consolidating the various enactments into one statute.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit a question? In this research he has made into the British practice, did he discover that in relation to their acts which deal with their various harbour commissions they follow the same practice we do in Canada of leaving them out of a general revision, as being separate statutes dealing with local matters? Did he find that, for this reason, they as public local acts were not revised generally in the same manner that the general body of public general acts are? Did he find that was the practice that was followed in Great Britain as well as in Canada?

Mr. Knowles: I found that in some instances they fell into one category and in some into another. In some instances they are regarded as private in nature and in other instances, as I think in this case, as rather public. The point I am making is that in the United Kingdom, in addition to the revision such as takes place here every 25 years, they have this arrangement whereby between revisions acts can be consolidated in what May and Campion refer to as a very expeditious manner. I am sure it must appeal to the government, because it avoids the possibility of extended debate.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit another question? Did my hon. friend find in examining this procedure which has been followed in Great Britain, that it has, in fact, been applied to their harbour commissioners acts?

Mr. Knowles: I cannot say that I found it was applied to legislation exactly comparable to what is now before us.

Mr. Garson: May I ask my hon. friend if he is aware that this practice in Canada has been applied to all the harbour commission acts, and that none of them has been consolidated? There are, as my hon. friend knows, quite a number of them.

Mr. Knowles: I know that. I was hoping that I was doing what I have often called upon the government to do, namely to give a good lead. The fact that those acts respecting Toronto, New Westminster and other places around the country are in the same unconsolidated, all over the place condition is no reason why the job should not be done there, too.

If we had something comparable to the consolidation of enactments (procedure) act, 1949, of the United Kingdom, this matter could be taken care of very easily. I do not know why I should be the person pointing to this practice in the United Kingdom. I am giving the government an idea how to avoid some of the debates that now take place in the House of Commons, when all that is desired is a job of consolidation.

Nevertheless I suggest that what I am proposing is in the interests of tidying things up and making things a little neater and a little easier to find. So far as this immediate bill is concerned, in addition to this general interest in tidiness and convenience I also have the interest that I would like to see recognized the good work that the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commissioners do in our area, which is done on a voluntary basis.

I hope the government will see fit to support the measure.

Mr. Garson: Before the hon. member takes his seat would he permit another question? Would he not think that a relatively short and simple statute, and its amendments, such as the Winnipeg and St. Boniface Harbour Commissioners Act, could, in an office consolidation form, provide all the services that the printed statutes usually provide, without being consolidated in the manner he is now advocating?

Mr. Winch: May I ask why it is that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who tried to stop me, is not trying to stop somebody else who is asking twice as many questions as I did.

Mr. Knowles: May I answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: I think in his opening remarks on the bill the hon. member indicated what would be the answer to the question. If he wishes to have some amplification, he will note that I am showing some leniency, because this is private bills hour.

Mr. Winch: But don't let him get away with it on his side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I do not particularly like the remark the hon. member for Vancouver East has made because, as he knows, hon. members are entitled to ask questions.

Mr. Winch: That is right; and I want to say that you are most fair. It was the minister I was referring to.

Mr. Speaker: Well, that does not make it much better.

I think all hon. members will agree that throughout the debate on the second reading of this bill it has looked, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said, like a debate in committee. Once the hon. member has answered the question I think we should conclude the discussion.

Mr. Knowles: We are now back at the point where the Minister of Justice asked one more question before, as he said, I took my seat. He asked whether for the purpose of legislation of this kind, which he described as being rather short—though I would point out it does have 29 sections and there would be 30 if this bill were put through—it would not be just as satisfactory to have an office consolidation. My reply to him is that an office consolidation would of course be better than having no office consolidation, and certainly better than the present situation where legislation can be found only by reference to the statutes of three different years.

So far as what the minister is saying is concerned, I can tell him that the members of the Winnipeg and St. Boniface harbour commission now have copies of Bill 285, so they have what, in effect, is a printing which shows the various sections put together. If the department would make a departmental office consolidation that would be even better for that purpose. But I believe, as I said when I closed my speech about ten minutes ago, that the work these commissioners do merits the consideration that I suggest should be given to them by the passing of this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): On a question of privilege, a few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said I had stated that the 1912 wording was not clear. That is not what I said. I said that the wording of his bill did not conform with the practices as to language and punctuation as adopted in the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Knowles: No, the wording in this bill conforms to this government legislation as it now stands on the statute books.

Mr. Sinclair: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The debate that took place on second reading of this bill should not, in future, be considered a prototype for discussion that should take place on the second reading of a bill.

Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed will say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Knowles) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The business reserved for this hour having been dealt with, the house at eight o'clock will resume consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

59. Departmental administration, $493,651.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were discussing resolution 59. Shall this resolution carry?

Mr. Holowach: At five o'clock I had commenced to make a few remarks about the treatment which was being given to newly born Canadian children whose parents as immigrants were denied family allowance benefits during their first year of residence in Canada. I know this is a sensitive point with many hundreds of thousands of new immigrants in our country. It must be remembered by the committee that these same people are future Canadian citizens. When we remember that as soon as an immigrant arrives in our country he becomes a taxpayer, and when we consider that during his first months and years in Canada every single cent counts in becoming properly established, I believe it will be agreed that this matter deserves some consideration by the minister and by the committee.

As I understand it, the situation which exists at present is rather unfair and unrealistic. At the present time the legal status of a child born in Canada, irrespective of the citizenship of its parents, is that such a child is a Canadian by birth. However, during the first year of residence of the child's parents in Canada such a Canadian child is denied the benefits which parliament provided in the matter of family allowances. If this interpretation is correct, and if the situation is as I understand it, it is rather paradoxical. On the one hand we have such a child born to newly arrived immigrants looked upon in the eyes of the law as a Canadian by birth; on the other hand that child is denied the benefits provided by the family allowance legislation during the first year of residence.

I was just wondering about the fairness of the situation. I would certainly appreciate it if the minister would explain the problem. I know that if we were able to eliminate that situation it would certainly be conducive to better relations between new arrivals in our country and Canadians. I touch briefly on this subject because I believe it is important. The situation should be remedied and I believe it will help to preserve happy relations among all segments of our Canadian society. I also believe it will show the new arrivals that we are concerned and would like to have them properly established when they arrive in Canada.

In conclusion, I should just like to take this opportunity of thanking the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for the splendid co-operation he has given to me on several occasions, and that statement also applies to the various officials in his department.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would like me to say just a word on that point right now, I shall do so. It is, of course, a question of policy. The present law is so framed that anyone born in Canada receives family allowance just as soon as his parents apply, even though the parents may not have been here, I understand, more than a week. But if he was born a week before he arrived in Canada, his mother would not be able to get the allowance for a year.

In the administration of the Immigration Act we recognize what an anomaly this is in many cases. On the other hand, if my recollection is right—and I know my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare will correct me if it is not—I think the reason it was felt that there must be some time limit was in order to avoid the possibility of people coming here, perhaps for their summer holidays or other brief periods, and collecting family allowances while they were here. There are some complications about the question. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare who has the primary responsibility in this matter has been giving it extremely careful consideration.

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, I would like to avail myself of this debate on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to call the attention of the minister (Mr. Pickersgill) to a matter which worries me greatly at present, namely the matter of education at Pointe Bleue in the constituency I have the honour of representing in this house.

The Indian reserve at Pointe Bleue dates back about a hundred years. Today it has a population of some 1,125 people, making up 200 families, of which 110 are sedentary residents and 90 are nomads. In the reserve there are at present 272 children of school age; 110 attending the local Indian school, 28 the residential school at Fort George, while 5 go to other Indian schools, 55 attend provincial schools and 74 are not going to school at all.

The matter which I would like to bring to the attention of the department, has to do with nomad Indians. As those Indian families leave for the hunt in the fall and return only the following spring, some 100 Indian children of school age cannot attend school and therefore receive no education whatever.

Now the Indians of Pointe Bleue are becoming more and more sedentary. Besides, the majority of them are now in that category. However, children whose parents go out into the woods during the hunting season are deprived of the education to which they are entitled.

It is not a matter of preventing parents from taking their children with them when they go out hunting, but of encouraging them to let their children attend school in the reserve. I see only one way of doing it. As a matter of fact, after investigating the situation on the spot at the beginning of last month, together with the Pointe Bleue authorities, I have come to the conclusion that a residential school large enough to accommodate 120 pupils would be the only adequate solution to this problem, now or in the future. Since our Indians are ever desirous of living normally, they should be given that opportunity and should be provided for that purpose with every possible means of acquiring the education they need to earn a living.

If these children were placed in residential boarding schools while their parents are away hunting during the winter, they would receive a normal education which would enable them to face up successfully to the problem of earning their living. Indians, like all of us, are entitled to a better future.

If I am defending their interests here, it is because I know that these children of school age, being sent in this way to a residential institution would enjoy normal schooling, in every way comparable to that of the children of sedentary families who attend the local day schools. My attention has always been drawn to the fact that the problems affecting the Indians are often the result of deeds done by white people who took advantage of special circumstances to teach them ways of life which are foreign to them.

I urge the minister to consider my request with all the attention it deserves and to try to solve the problem by 1956 at the latest.

Building a residential school or boarding school for the children of wandering Indian families at Pointe Bleue would constitute an adequate solution.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Roberval has already brought the case to my attention and we hope to be able to grant the request in the near future.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is the best thing the minister has said in a month.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with one or two matters, particularly one which was dealt with this afternoon in an exchange between the hon. member for Kamloops and the minister. I refer to the speech the minister made at Victoria some weeks ago, which obtained for him a degree of publicity which, as he said in Winnipeg, could not have been achieved otherwise. I am not going to repeat what was allegedly said on that occasion; I am simply going to take the words of the minister when he rose on a question of privilege on April 18, as reported at page 2893 of Hansard.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent the situation. I rose to reply to a question asked by his leader; I rose on no question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly that is correct, but the exchange is entitled "Privilege". The minister had this to say:

> We all want to increase the population of this country and for that purpose if they are equally good people I don't believe that any immigrant, no matter where he comes from or how good he is, is as good as another Canadian baby, because the immigrant has to learn to be a Canadian and the baby is a Canadian to start with.

The minister made a further enlargement of that when he spoke a few nights ago in Windsor. At that time he gave a revised version applicable to the occasion, and among other things he said:

> And that's all I was trying to say in Victoria when I said that, in order to increase the population of Canada, I didn't believe an immigrant was as good as a Canadian baby, if both of them were equally good people.

That was indeed a repetition of the remarks allegedly made by the minister during his recent visit to the Pacific coast. Immediately prior to having said what I have just quoted the minister said—and I think I should quote this in fairness to him—

> Now if we are going to go on being Canadians and go on preserving our Canadian characteristics, this country cannot be just a half-way house for people coming from other lands, staying for a few years or maybe a generation, and then moving on to the United States.

A little later he made this unusual statement:

> And I am sure all of you who were not born in Canada know how much easier it is for your own children, whether they were born here or whether they were very young when they came here, to learn the ways of the country than it was for those of you who had to learn to be Canadians while you were also trying to earn a living.
> That is why I also said, in a joking way, that the best immigration policy was the cradle.

In large measure that is a repetition of the remarks the minister allegedly made in Victoria, to which editorial writers have been devoting themselves. That is not a statement in keeping with the minister's responsibility as minister of immigration. It is a statement which cannot be laughed off. No matter what the jocularity of the occasion may have been, the statement carries with it a gratuitous if not bumptious insult to millions of good Canadians.

I think the minister should be doing what he ought to have done in view of the feeling that was aroused as a result of the statement made in Victoria; he should have apologized for the remarks he made, rather than follow the course he did of endeavouring to laugh off the serious import inherent in those words. As a matter of fact I think the Prime Minister, as first citizen of our country, in a parliamentary way should have repudiated and disavowed those statements by the minister, in their original form as well as in the restricted or renewed or revised version that we have had since.

It was a statement which divides Canadians into those who were born here and those who came here having chosen this country as the land in which they desire to live, as the land to which freedom beckoned them. I feel that in his position as minister of immigration the hon. gentleman has done irreparable injury to the position he occupies, in view of the fact that his duties in large part consist of encouraging people in other countries, who are desirable and selected, to come to this country.

I am not going to say any more than that. When I read the statement I was surprised, but I was more surprised when the minister gave his explanation in Winnipeg that after all if he had said something reasonable or rational he would not have secured the publicity and advertising which he obtained because this statement had been attributed to him.

Having said that, I now want to refer to—

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman has finished that, he has a copy—I think the same copy as I have—of the speech I made in Windsor. Perhaps he would not mind reading the next paragraph on page 5, paragraph 3.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Page 5 says—and this is his speech delivered at Windsor on April 22, after several weeks of mental revision—

> And the easier it is for the newcomers to fit into the country, the faster we can all get on with the task of building up the country. I say it is usually more difficult for a newcomer to become a Canadian than it is for a child brought up in this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the next two paragraphs. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent what I said. The next two paragraphs represent what I really did say. Surely the hon. gentleman is doing exactly what the hon. member for Kamloops did this afternoon, picking bits and pieces. I suggest that the hon. gentleman read the next two paragraphs, so they will not be separated in Hansard from what he has already read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not in any way dealing with what the minister said the other evening. I am taking the same words he used in the House of Commons on April 18 when he explained what was unexplainable. This is his version of what he said on that occasion in Victoria:

> We all want to increase the population of this country, and for that purpose if they are equally good people I don't believe that any immigrant, no matter where he comes from or how good he is, is as good as another Canadian baby, because the immigrant has to learn to be a Canadian and the baby is a Canadian to start with.

That is the revised version. That is the version given in the House of Commons. That is the one I am accepting. I simply say that if the hon. gentleman wants to read the entire speech he made the other evening, I have no objection. It is perfectly proper that he should. But I am relying for what I have to say upon the explanation given by the minister under the heading of privilege, which he said was not privilege, on April 18, which in no way removed the criticisms that were levied against him in reference to the remarks he made at Victoria. Having said that, I shall now pass—

Mr. McIlraith: And having not read all the quotation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friend wants to read into the records of the house the revised version of April 22 I have no objection, but I am not relying on that. I am taking what the minister said on April 18. Those are his own words, and they are to all intents and purposes as reprehensible as the words attributed to him at Victoria.

Having said that, I come to the other matters that were being discussed this afternoon, that is the regulations and the application of those regulations by the department.

I think, however much the minister may endeavour to explain them away, the regulations are unjustifiable in their present form. They are interpreted according to the whim and caprice of the individual official. They bring about in consequence a denial of fundamental rights. They constitute in fact arbitrary lawlessness.

What we in the opposition are endeavouring to prove is this, and for some reason the minister stands firm against any such argument, that the regulations should be reasonably interpreted in a straightforward and uniform manner, that the regulations should not be in the custody of the individual officials to interpret in accordance with their whim or prejudice or bias or for any other improper reason; that these are the regulations upon which human rights are determined.

The court of appeal of Ontario has very definitely stated, in the case to which the hon. member for Kamloops made extended reference this afternoon, that these regulations are unfair and unjust in the manner in which they are applied and were applied in the particular case. Why should it be necessary under those circumstances to press the minister for just one admission on his part that where there is wrongdoing—and there is always wrongdoing when the arbitrary will of an individual can place itself above the law—where such a condition of affairs applies, it will be his aim to remove the discrimination that is now inherent in this legislation and ensure that there shall be equality and justice to every individual according to law.

My hon. friend says he is not satisfied with the judgment of a recent appointee of this government, Mr. Justice Wilson; that he is not satisfied when that judgment is unanimously approved by the court of appeal, on which there were two judges already named by my hon. friend the member for Kamloops, and as well a former minister in charge of immigration, who found those regulations unjustly and tyrannically applied in the case in question. Why does the minister, instead of relying on those principles which ordinarily should actuate him in removing injustice, contend that he wants to carry the case forward because he is not satisfied with the unanimous decision on appeal?

Certainly it is a serious situation, it is a shocking situation, when a department of government is found so derelict in the application of the law as it was in the case in question. The minister should have stood up and said, "Well, after all we cannot expect perfection. There was wrongdoing in this case, as found by the courts of the country and we are going to remove anything in the nature of an injustice". That should be the attitude of a department whose purpose should be the equal administration of law, and justice and the fair application of the rules to everybody. But for some reason this department is becoming entangled in administrative red tape, in some cases administered —and I mention this after consideration—by sawdust Caesars who believe they are above the law.

Mr. Fulton: A sawdust Caesar.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some men, when they secure positions, must necessarily grow into those positions. Woodrow Wilson once said, "A man with responsibility either grows or swells." Some of these officials have not been growing, and they have not grown since the judgments of these various courts have been given, judgments that point out unfairness, tyranny and autocratic superiority on the part of officials; judgments that have indicated that the position in the department of immigration is that we have officials making the regulations, policing the regulations, interpreting the regulations and enforcing the regulations.

It is because of that fact, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Kamloops has pressed so often for a restoration of those principles that British justice has shown through the generations are necessary for the preservation of the fundamental freedoms of the individual. After all, there are only two ways in which freedom can be maintained. One is through parliament, the supreme court, the superior court, the highest court of the realm. That is where an appeal is being made now to the man who represents this department, to restore to it those things which it has found throughout the generations must be maintained if the rights of the individual are to be assured. The other is through the courts.

While, in the course of the administration of the department, the courts have been bypassed in many cases, where the courts have spoken the department has not been game enough to accept the decisions of the courts and has endeavoured to carry on and on from court to court. Why not remove the reasons for injustices that were set out by the Hon. Mr. Justice Aylesworth and those associated with him in the Ontario court of appeal? Why not remove those wrongs, those injustices, rather than deny their existence and appeal against the decision? If the Supreme Court of Canada should ever have the opportunity of dealing with that case and confirms the judgment, does the department then intend to pass an order in council to ratify what was illegally done?

Mr. Fulton: They have done it before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was done before in the department of immigration and, Mr. Chairman, nothing better indicates stubborn truculence and autocratic lawlessness than the attitude of some departmental officials who, having lost in the courts, raise their decisions to a level above the courts by the passage of an order in council to legalize the unlawful. I do not say that in the course of administration of a department as large as the department of immigration small injustices will not arise from time to time. Human nature being what it is, they are bound to arise. But, sir, when a department has as its cornerstone the concept that where it is wrong it denies it, and where the courts find it is wrong it places itself above the courts by order in council, then indeed have you enthroned injustice; then indeed parliament has a right to speak.

I do ask the minister to reconsider what he said this afternoon, to decide that certain general principles are going to apply and that justice is going to be done as far as lies within the power of the minister. Fiat justitia. Let justice be done. That is all we ask from the minister. Let him accept such suggestions in the spirit in which they are given. Let him give the assurance that the department will bring into Canada by selective immigration those entitled to come here; and so that those in Canada will not be subject to deportation outside the law by the ipse dixit of some official who is above the law, we ask that the individual should be made acquainted with the charges against him. I do not suggest that he be given the names of the informants, but he should have placed before him the charges upon which the department believes he is not entitled to be considered a good Canadian citizen, in order that he may be able to answer those charges.

If that is not done, are we going back to the days of the star chamber where appointees of the crown sat, made their decisions and placed themselves above the law? That is my main criticism of the department of immigration today. I do not lay the slightest personal wrongdoing at the feet of the minister. But I do say that the minister, having inherited the department and having had seven or eight months to clear away these wrongs—and they are wrongs—we have a right to ask today, "What have you done? Why have you not acted? What is the reason that equity and law have been pushed aside and the arbitrary say-so of an individual in a department has been placed above the law of the land?"

I think, sir, of what Lord Chesterfield said 125 years ago, so applicable to what is happening today in the department of immigration. These are his words:

> Let us consider that arbitary power has seldom or never been introduced into any country at once. It must be introduced by slow degrees, and, as it were, step by step lest the people should see its approach. The barriers and fences of the people's liberty must be plucked one by one, and some plausible pretence must be found for removing or hoodwinking, one after another, those sentries who are posted by the constitution of a free country for warning the people of their danger.

What are the sentries? The sentries are the rule of law, equity under the law, the right of an individual not to be convicted in his absence, the right of a person charged to know the nature of the charge against him. Remove these safeguards, destroy these sentries and, Mr. Chairman, every country's history tells its story. This is as true today as it was 175 years ago when Lord Acton said: "All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely."

Mr. Pickersgill: Lord Acton was not born 175 years ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I bow to my hon. friend. I am glad that is the only thing he has been able to deny in the course of my entire speech. Of course the minister is entirely correct. I overstated it by 50 years and the minister immediately noticed it, which indicates that his historical erudition is not going to be lost to the House of Commons.

Mr. Fulton: I wish it were matched by his sense of justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Nonetheless the principle remains. Today we have in the department of immigration individuals who administer the immigration law of the country, who have absolute power; and when the courts endeavour to control that power they have been known to raise themselves above the power of the courts and, by order in council, to treat with disdain and contempt the decisions of the courts.

That is the kind of thing that should be stopped. That is the kind of thing that members on all sides of the house should stand against, for if we condone it in one department we condone a principle that is dangerous to the survival of the parliamentary and judicial system.

In all sincerity I say that since my hon. friend has been minister he has given wide consideration, very comprehensive consideration to his department. So far as parliament is concerned, when questions have been asked they have been answered by him. I say to the minister that he is an example to some of the other members of this cabinet. If questions are asked involving his department, an order for return is brought down within two, three, or four days; that is all to the good.

I ask the minister to carry the same good principle to the matter of individual rights and assure to the individual the right of appeal to the courts, the right to know what the charge is, and the right to be able to answer those of his accusers who remain invisible incognitos. I think the minister has an opportunity in his department to bring about a change that will assure justice, a change that is overdue in that department.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope hon. members will allow me to make a few observations in reply while the remarks of the hon. member for Prince Albert are still fresh in my mind. I think the hon. gentleman, in a speech to which I otherwise take no exception so far as tone was concerned, did himself a little less than justice in declining to read the three lines of my speech at Windsor which followed the part he did read. I feel it is a little bit unfair to those to whom the remarks were addressed not to have them on the record, so I propose to read them now. I propose to read them with the two paragraphs the hon. gentleman read, so they will all be together.

> And the easier it is for the newcomers to fit into the country, the faster we can all get on with the task of building up the country.
> I say it is usually more difficult for a newcomer to become a Canadian than it is for a child brought up in this country.

The following is the paragraph to which I want to draw attention:

> But I do not believe that anybody is a better Canadian just because he happened to be born in Canada, and I have never said so and I hope I never will.

Now, sir, I want to make a few remarks about the more serious parts of the hon. gentleman's speech. I want to make them very seriously. Before doing that I cannot fail to express my profound admiration of the capacity of the hon. member for Prince Albert to make the same speech serve every conceivable occasion and every debate that arises in this house. I cannot recollect that the hon. gentleman has ever spoken more than two paragraphs in this house without the star chamber appearing, and he has never spoken a dozen paragraphs without King Charles' head popping out from under his arm.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the hon. gentleman reading from now?

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall try to take the points the hon. gentleman raised in opposite order to the order in which he raised them. He said this department had overruled the courts by order in council. I am only a simple layman and the hon. gentleman is a learned member of the bar, but I do not know of any court in this country in which an order in council could override the law or would be regarded for one instant as having any such effect.

What happened in the case to which he has alluded is this. The governor in council made certain regulations which he believed meant something. The Supreme Court of Canada said they meant something else. The governor in council who, in the first place, had the power to make these regulations then amended the regulations to make them mean what he thought they had meant in the first place. There was nothing retroactive about that change at all.

The hon. gentleman said the department by-passed the courts. At the same time he objected to my statement that we were going to appeal to the supreme court. Well, it is an odd kind of by-passing, sir, to appeal to the supreme court. I did not say I was satisfied or dissatisfied with the decision of the court of appeal of Ontario. I said the decision of the court of appeal was so important from the point of view of law that I felt it was essential for the administration of this department to know from the final arbiter, which is the supreme court, what the law really was. That is the reason, and the sole reason, I intend to recommend to my hon. friend the Attorney General of Canada that this case be appealed.

Now, it is of course totally untrue—I am not accusing the hon. gentleman—it is totally inaccurate to say that the Immigration Act is administered according to the whim and caprice of government officials. It is nothing of the kind. The regulations are made just as clearly and precisely as it is possible to make regulations which must apply to the almost infinite variety of human beings with whom the department has to deal. I do not know of any possible way in which regulations could be drafted that would create the kind of sure guide needed for every conceivable situation that might arise when some three or four million applications for admission to this country were being considered. This illustrates the magnitude of the problem with which the immigration branch has had to deal in the last 10 years. In order to get 1,200,000 immigrants it must have meant that at some stage or other there were three or four times that many people making approaches to our offices.

The suggestion that some judicial process should be set up that would make it possible to consider each of those disputed applications to this country is really to suggest something that is completely and utterly impractical. Under such a system we would have nothing but a trickle of immigrants. On the other hand, there is a good deal of confusion in this whole discussion between the question of applications for admission to the country and the question of deportation of people who have been legally landed here.

In the case of an application for admission there is nothing in the Immigration Act, which the hon. member for Prince Albert helped to put on the statute books and with which I had nothing to do because I was not a member of parliament at that time, which gives any person except a citizen of Canada residing outside of Canada the right to enter this country. There are, therefore, no legal rights at issue at all in the question of entry to Canada.

Once a person is landed as an immigrant he is vested with certain rights under the act. There is a process laid down for deportation, and that process provides for informing the person of the grounds upon which he is being deported and for an appeal to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it done?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is always done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the courts hold.

Mr. Fulton: The information is not given.

Mr. Pickersgill: It may be that the information is not given in a form that is satisfactory to many people, and I am not saying it is perfect. I am not saying there might not be improvement in it, but the information is given in the way which is prescribed by law. There is an appeal—and I am talking about deportation orders issued against landed immigrants—in every case to the minister, if the person against whom the order is issued wishes to take that appeal.

I know that my predecessor regarded consideration of these appeals as among the most important of all his duties, and that he spent hours and hours and hours of his time considering them most carefully. And I must say that anything complimentary that is said about me or my administration—and in passing I would thank the hon. member for the rather kind things he did say—should be multiplied many times over in reference to my predecessor. I have said before in the house, and I wish to say again, that if at the end of four years I can believe that I have administered this department anything like as well as my predecessor did, I will be quite satisfied that I have served the Canadian people well.

Now, about the whim and caprice—

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member permit me to make a suggestion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Fulton: My suggestion would be, in making a comparison with his predecessor, that his only mistake is in the matter of giving time for discussion of the affairs of this department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, I know I am rather given to talking too much, and I sometimes have to pay a certain penalty for it. Oh, it is not always amusing; but when something silly happens, then I try to regard it as silly. I think perhaps this country would be better off if more of us did that.

The hon. member for Prince Albert talked about the whim and caprice of individual officials. Since I became minister of the department, even at times when some people seemed to think I was enjoying myself at the expense of the taxpayers, I have made an effort to visit the offices of this department in every place I have ever been; and I say without fear of successful, detailed contradiction that, taken by and large, the officials of this department are hard-working and conscientious and that they try, sometimes I think almost too hard, to adhere literally to the regulations.

I admit there have been a few officials who have not been satisfactory, and that one or two of them have had to be prosecuted in the courts. I hope I shall never lack the courage, if I find there is any wrongdoing anywhere in my department, to deal with it, and to deal with it regardless of what the consequences may be for me or for anybody else. If I do any wrong, then I shall endeavour to the best of my ability to undo it. I know it is impossible to deal with the number of people that this department has to deal with in a year, during which there are 50 million border crossings, and not make mistakes; and of course there are mistakes made. But what surprises me is that there are so few.

I think that is really all I have to say in reply to the hon. member for Prince Albert.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I was pleasantly surprised a moment ago when, for the first time—and that does not mean that he has not done so previously—I heard the minister (Mr. Pickersgill) reply to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) in excellent French, for which I congratulate him. He certainly has the admiration of all those present in the house. I believe we should congratulate him on his magnificent effort.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, convinced as I am that he will readily understand the few remarks I wish to make, I do not hesitate to speak in my mother tongue, thereby confirming the fact that there are two official languages in our country.

Although I have just congratulated the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for his generous gesture, I nonetheless wish to take him to task for certain statements he made recently, although I do not intend to repeat the ones which have been mentioned here in this house. I would like to refer, if you wish, to the same speech he made at Victoria and which contained a remark to which attention has not yet been called.

I find it in Le Soleil of Quebec, a newspaper which is the organ of the party now in power in the country. It is a dispatch from the Canadian Press, dated April 12, 1955, and entitled:

The immigrant who is willing to work will find employment.

This statement is followed by the name (Pickersgill), in brackets, meaning that those remarks were uttered by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. According to that statement—and I am quoting what is between quotation marks, which means, I believe, that those are the exact words of the minister—

It is not difficult to settle in Canada, in spite of growing unemployment, provided an average worker does not hesitate to accept any kind of employment.

Reference was made a moment ago to the irresponsible statements which the minister makes on a great many occasions. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that no statement could have been more irresponsible than those remarks made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in his speech in Victoria. By contending that an immigrant coming to this country who truly wishes to work can find employment, the minister has insulted the 700,000 Canadian workers who are now unemployed, because his statement amounts to denying that 700,000 Canadian workers have decided to find employment. That is perfectly ridiculous and I repeat it is a serious insult to the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, the dispatch goes on to say —hon. members on the other side find that funny, Mr. Chairman, but we on this side respect our opinions and we are not afraid to rise and defend the rights of Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. Dickey: You had better put in for danger pay, Tom.

Mr. Dufresne: Would you repeat the remark, so I may have the pleasure of answering?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was not for you at all. You would not understand it, anyway.

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member for Portneuf never understood anything, because we never see him in his seat.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was not for you at all.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I continue with the article:

> Such was the opinion expressed yesterday by the federal Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in answer to the charges made that he had allowed immigrants into the country in spite of the fact that a large number of Canadians are at present out of work.

Further on in the same article there is a quotation from the minister. I will return to this question later.

For the moment let us say that the minister, in the same speech, admitted that unemployment had reached a very high level in this country. According to the statement made by him this very afternoon, Canada has received, since the end of the last war, 1,200,000 immigrants. Whatever may be said to the contrary, this massive immigration policy implemented by the Canadian government since the last world war is no doubt one of the reasons, if not the only reason, why we are at this time faced with such heavy unemployment. The reason is evident and I do not blame the minister since it is only very recently that he took over the portfolio of that department.

What is the economic contribution of the immigrants? On one hand, a few small industries, bringing with them some capital, have been established here and there in Canada. At the same time, a certain number of craftsmen have brought us new techniques and modern methods. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the large majority of the newcomers for the past ten years have been industrial or unskilled workers. To support that statement I think it is sufficient to bring forward the following statistics: 13 per cent only of the total number of newcomers have established themselves on farms, while 5 per cent only went to work as domestic help, notwithstanding the fact that most of the immigrants claimed to belong to these categories in order to gain admission into Canada. Shortly after they were through with that work, either as farm-hands or as servants, these people made their way to our large centres, and we cannot blame them for being attracted by good salaries and for wanting to be able to meet fellow countrymen.

However, hundreds of thousands of these people have increased our industrial labour force, which means that they had to find some 200,000 homes in our industrial centres where the housing problem was already acute. Most of them work for large corporations which get fabulous government contracts, such as Canadair, in Montreal, Canadian Vickers and a number of crown corporations. But what, to my mind, is outrageous is that the moment there is some unemployment the first ones to be laid off are the native sons of Canada, while the newcomers are kept on the job.

I do not want to cast reflection on people who left their country to take refuge in Canada, where they can at least find peace and freedom. I would be the last one to blame them for trying to become Canadian citizens when they wanted to flee from communism and slavery. But I consider that we have not shown good sense in our immigration policy.

I feel that not enough thought was given to this matter and that, in particular, we did not take economic conditions in Canada into consideration before increasing our population to a considerable extent. Lest I be misunderstood let me say that I am not opposed to immigration. On the contrary, I am in favour of selective well-chosen immigration—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Well, that is what we have now.

Mr. Dufresne: But immigration should only be favoured when this country is prosperous, when everyone has a job. Immigration must be on a selective basis, as I said a moment ago, and provided only that we enjoy here in Canada a certain measure of economic stability.

As for those whom we have welcomed —most are now Canadian citizens perhaps— let us hope that they will find in Canada what they really came here for so that some day they may be Canadians worthy of the name.

Let us rather combine our efforts, so as to keep our own people in this country and prevent thousands of Canadians who are unable to find any work in Canada from emigrating to the United States.

Following these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if Canada is in a position to continue to receive immigrants this year, and in the future, at the same rate as it has since the end of the war.

I would also like to say a word about the racial distribution of our people with regard to immigration. Since the end of the war Anglo-Canadians, representing a little less than 50 per cent of our population, have received reinforcements out of the 1,200,000 odd new Canadians arriving here, to the extent of 30 per cent. French-speaking Canadians, who make up 30 per cent of our people, have only received reinforcements to the extent of 2 per cent.

I will not blame my English-speaking fellow citizens for requiring even more reinforcements, for asking that more English-speaking people be admitted to this country. But, as a French-speaking Canadian, as a citizen of Quebec, I think that because of their contribution to Canada since confederation, French Canadians deserve a greater proportion so as to stabilize our group better within the Canadian nation.

I would therefore ask the hon. minister, first, for a temporary halt on further landings of immigrants in this country, until the day when our economic balance is restored and every Canadian has his own job enabling him to face his obligations, to maintain his family, and to be, at the same time, a true Canadian.

Mr. Chairman, may I very sincerely congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Holowach), who just now touched upon a most important and serious point. I agree with the hon. member who said that it is inconceivable that a child born in Canada, even on the day after the arrival of its parents in this country, should be denied the family allowance to which it is entitled. Being born in Canada, the child is a Canadian citizen and, once a Canadian citizen, comes under Canadian law.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. minister a simple question.

Could he tell me—

(Text):

Can the minister tell me if the D'Ambreville case from Haiti has been settled and if the applicant has passed the necessary medical examination. I know the applicant's wife has been notified that permission will be granted to him to come to Canada provided he can pass the medical examination.

(Translation):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not have here the required information with respect to this case. I shall be pleased however to give him the details on Monday.

Mr. Dufresne: I thank the hon. minister in advance and I shall be grateful for that information.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has mentioned a certain bureaucracy which is enthroned in the department. I would like to call to the attention of the minister the bureaucracy which has established itself in the department of immigration in the very city of Quebec.

I wish to call to the attention of the hon. minister—I am pleased to note also the presence of the deputy minister—the fact that in Quebec city last year a competition, known under No. 54-6749, for the position of immigration officer grade 2, was held in the department of immigration. Many applicants came to the civil service commission office—

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. gentleman will permit me to speak in the official language which I speak more easily. The subject upon which he is now entering does not come within the jurisdiction of this department. It comes within the jurisdiction of the civil service commission. Perhaps the hon. member would reserve his remarks until the appropriate department is before the committee.

Mr. Dufresne: I do not wish to discuss this matter in regard to the civil service commission; I wish to discuss what happened in the immigration department at Quebec when this examination was called by the minister. I am not dealing with the civil service commission at all, I am just dealing with the way some officials acted in connection with this competition.

Mr. Pickersgill: I feel that I ought to insist on my point of order. This whole matter has nothing whatever to do with the officials of my department. I understand that the examination was held on the premises of the department, but it was conducted by the civil service commission.

Mr. Dufresne: On the point of order, the minister seems to know what I am referring to and he seems anxious to get to his feet, but I do not think he is so anxious to have me deal with this case. I suggest respectfully that what I want to talk about has nothing to do with the civil service commission. I want to deal with what happened in the department of immigration in connection with a competition, because most of those who applied for this position as officer, grade 2, were already members of the department.

The Deputy Chairman: I am largely in the hands of the committee because, as is known, I have not been able to follow in detail the arguments which led up to the point of order. If I am correct in assuming that the hon. member for Quebec West wishes to discuss the merits or demerits of the method of holding a competition or of making appointments to this department or to any department, that is those which have largely been taken out of the field of what used to be called politics and have been handed over to the civil service commission, those that have been withdrawn from the active control of the minister in charge of the department, then they would be capable of discussion only when the estimates of the civil service commission are before us. But they are not capable of being discussed when the estimates of a department to which such civil servants hope to be appointed or promoted are before this committee.

I have no desire, and I do not think the committee has any desire, to restrict the freedom of discussion in any way, but it is a fact that the procedure followed and the weight given in a competition under the civil service commission are not matters coming before the minister of immigration; they are not within the competence of the minister. If the hon. member for Quebec West wishes to discuss the actions of an employee of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in his capacity as such, of course he may proceed. If he wishes to discuss the manner in which such employee was hired or promoted as the result of a civil service competition; if he is referring to the method of holding a competition or to what happened in that connection, I shall have to rule that he must hold that criticism until the estimates of the civil service commission are before the committee, at which time of course he would be perfectly free to discuss all the aspects of that type of competition.

Mr. Dufresne: I want to discuss the matter in both ways; first of all, the way some officials of the department have acted and, second, the way the competition was looked after.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Shut up.

Mr. Dufresne: I will shut up when I am through. Nobody will make me shut up until my time is up. Those who cannot say anything but "shut up", Mr. Chairman, have nothing else to say, and I have never seen them on their feet in this house. The only thing they have to do is try to insult others who are here performing their duty.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. Dufresne: I am not allowing the hon. member to make a speech on my time.

The Deputy Chairman: Will both hon. gentlemen please resume their seats? If the hon. member for Portneuf is raising a point of order or a question of privilege—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): A question of privilege. As often as the hon. member for Quebec West can try to insult a member of this house, he does so.

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order—

Mr. Harkness: That is not a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Portneuf has the floor on a question of privilege, and I will hear him; but at the same time the hon. member for Portneuf will please direct his attention to the specific question of privilege that he is raising and to that only.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The hon. member for Quebec West says he does not see the members on this side of the house get up very often, and that they would rather sit and listen, or not listen, to his brilliant speeches. But I am asking the hon. member to understand that he is absolutely out of order, and all the members of this house—

Mr. Dufresne: It is not up to you to decide the rules of this house.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why does he not abide by the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. Harkness: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I stated the question of privilege at the outset of my remarks.

Mr. Harkness: There is no privilege there.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): If I have to speak in Greek, I will.

The Deputy Chairman: I suggest to the hon. member for Quebec West and to the hon. member for Portneuf that it will be easier for us to handle questions of order or privilege if we get them one at a time; and, without wishing to curtail the liberties of the members of the committee, if we get them without too much outside assistance.

I do not think the question raised by the hon. member for Portneuf can be justified as a question of privilege. The hon. member for Quebec West has replied, as a great many members of this house are entitled to reply, in fairly general and not too complimentary terms to interjections from various hon. members of the house. I am not going to rule the type of reply he has just made out of order, but I am going to endeavour to enforce the point of order which I was called upon to decide a short time ago. The hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what I was doing when I was interrupted by the hon. member for Portneuf. That was not the first time in the course of my speeches that I have been interrupted by him and some of his colleagues.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The first time tonight.

Mr. Dufresne: And not always in a very intelligent way, as you have probably noticed.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You are no judge of that.

Mr. Dufresne: As I said, my intention was to discuss the matter in both ways; first of all, the way in which the competition was conducted and, second, the way some of the officials of the department have acted. As you have ruled that I cannot speak on the manner in which the competition has been conducted, I shall now wait until the estimates of the civil service commission come up to continue my remarks on that particular matter.

I shall now conclude by saying that I do think the remarks I made earlier should be taken in good part by the minister of immigration, and that he should do his utmost to see that, first of all, we give our own Canadians the jobs they are entitled to before having more immigrants enter Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I listened quite attentively to the hon. member for Quebec West. I presume, of course, that he was speaking for the Conservative party.

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order—

Mr. Pickersgill: As the position of the government—

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of order—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member for Quebec West is rising on a point of order we must listen to him.

Mr. Dufresne: He probably had a hard time hearing me, as there were so many speaking on the other side. On a point of order, I do not think the minister has the right to attribute to me intentions that I do not have. I was not speaking on behalf of one political party. I was speaking on my own behalf, and we have here on this side of the house the privilege of having different opinions on one matter or another.

An hon. Member: On all matters.

The Deputy Chairman: I understand that the point the hon. member for Quebec West is raising as a point of order is not really such at all but a matter of personal explanation, which he has had an opportunity to make and he was entitled to make.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I might make a suggestion, it seems to me that all the discussion in the committee so far, except for the question asked by my hon. friend the hon. member for Roberval, has related to immigration. Could we pass the first item on departmental administration and then take the rest of the estimates, in order under the various branches, so I could have the appropriate officials here to assist and so there might perhaps be a little more order in the consideration of the estimates?

Mr. Dufresne: They seem to enjoy it.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, before we come to the details of the items, I should like to make one or two general observations arising partly out of what the minister has said. Perhaps it would not be out of place to say something about the proceedings of the special committee on estimates. It seems to me that the committee has accomplished a fair part of the work of this committee of supply in reviewing many of the details of the administration of the department. That is perhaps evidenced by what has been said so far, because our discussion today has not been on the details of administration but on one or two general matters which have occupied the committee up to this time.

I think it proper to say that, as a member of that committee, I find no room for complaint about the conduct of the officials of the department whom we had the privilege of examining, the deputy minister and those who were with him. We were free to ask them questions directly, and we received our answers in many cases directly. Sometimes the minister assumed that a matter of policy was involved and undertook to speak for his officials, but by and large we received the information which we asked for and were not refused information. I think perhaps that, rather than putting it on a negative basis and saying that we have no complaints, I should say that the procedure of the special committee commends itself to me as a distinct improvement over what can be done in this committee of supply.

I will not go as far as that with respect to the minister himself. We complained about his being a member of the committee at the same time as he was a witness appearing before the committee to answer for his department, but that matter was resolved by force majeure. We were not able to carry our point. We had the minister speaking on both sides of the issue and we also had him as a witness. I must say that if you review the transcript you will find that the minister used as much of the time of the committee as almost anyone else.

Mr. Weir: Good.

Mr. Michener: Perhaps he volunteered more information than he was asked at times. I think of one statement he made which perhaps he might have wished unsaid, and with which others might not agree. At page 12 of the transcript the hon. member for Kamloops said:

> I do not want to get into an argument right away, but I do think the minister is being overly cautious.

Then the minister said:

> The minister himself has indicated that he is timid and careful in his utterances, and he stands by that.

He characterized himself in those terms. He was not responding to any question, and possibly expressed an opinion which others may not hold.

Mr. Pickersgill: Merely the truth shining forth.

Mr. Knowles: Just an obiter dictum.

Mr. Michener: That was obiter. I do want to say something about the difficulties we had over Mr. Taylor's evidence, and I say it because I think what the minister said this afternoon gives a wrong impression to the committee. To my mind what was involved was not the production before the committee of some mysterious documents. It seems to me that the discussion of those documents was used as a screen to obscure the fact that here was a witness who might have given information to the committee out of his own experience, but whose evidence was refused by the committee. I say that because Mr. Taylor, as the minister himself said, is a practising lawyer having a good deal of immigration work, who undertook to review some 200 cases which had come before the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make it clear, if I did not this afternoon, that the 200 cases were 200 cases that came to Mr. Taylor in his law practice.

Mr. Michener: I am not denying they were 200 cases that came to him in his law practice. He probably knew them better than if information about them had come to him by hearsay. But whatever they were, whether they were cases of his clients or partly of his clients and partly of clients of other lawyers in any event he reviewed the cases and he had opinions, as a result of that experience, as to the administration of the department. It seems to me that his opinions based on that experience were the sort of evidence that might have been useful to a committee which was reviewing the administration of the department. He had made criticisms and had offered his evidence. If there was nothing to his criticisms, surely it would have been better for the department and the minister to allow the witness to come, say what he had to say, and if his complaints could be met, meet them and dispose of them.

The minister has made quite a play of meeting all issues head-on, and I must say that in his own conduct in respect of other things he appears to do that. He does not balk at any questions, nor does he refuse any issue. However, in this particular case this man offered his evidence and the minister, instead of allowing his evidence to be heard, which could have been done without inconvenience to the committee or to the witness, hid behind the substantial majority of government members on the committee, and on three or four occasions when the question was brought to a head he permitted the vote of the government majority to settle the question of whether this man should appear.

The only consequence is that the suspicion arising out of such criticisms as this man made, and which we have all heard to some extent, lingers instead of being met. If there is any grievance it has not been remedied. If there was no grievance the suspicion continues, to the discredit and discomfort of the minister. Therefore I suggest that in that particular instance, when there was no question of producing documents but simply of allowing a man who had special experience to come and tell his story and be examined before a committee, it was wrong for the government majority to refuse by sheer weight of numbers to hear that evidence, and it was wrong for the minister to countenance that action.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have a general complaint with regard to the arbitrary manner in which a great deal of the immigration work of the department seems to be carried on, and the fact that the department seems to be very stiff-necked about its own errors and extremely difficult to persuade to change any decision that has been made, no matter how wrong it may be shown to have been in the first place. In this connection I should like to cite the case of a woman, Mrs. Jessie Wilson, who came to this country from Australia.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit one very brief interruption? If we are now going to have immigration, can we carry item 59 and go on with immigration, because it would be a great help to me to have the director here?

Mr. Harkness: What I have to say is by way of general criticism of the departmental administration and the way things are carried on. I think this is probably the proper place to bring up the matter, rather than attempt to bring it up in detail at another time when I might be told it was not really properly applicable at that point.

Mr. Pickersgill: Strictly speaking it is not properly applicable on the item of departmental administration. It is properly applicable on the immigration branch item. However, I am not insisting on the point at all.

The Deputy Chairman: I am not going to rule the hon. member for Calgary North out of order. I am not suggesting it is the most efficient method, but it has been the practice to allow almost any discussion relevant to the department on the first item. It will be up to hon. members who wish to raise these points whether they insist on raising them at this stage or whether it would suit their purposes better to do so when the appropriate officials are before the minister.

Mr. Harkness: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think this particular case illustrates quite well the arbitrary methods frequently used, I am afraid, in the immigration department, and the impossibility almost of getting the department, including the minister in charge, to rectify anything, make any change or admit that any error has taken place. I took up this case first of all with the present Minister of Finance when he was minister of citizenship and immigration. I thought I was making some progress on it, but nothing happened. I took it up with the present minister, and still nothing happened.

Briefly, the circumstances in the case were these. This woman, Mrs. Jessie Wilson, had a son living in Calgary. He had been an air trainee during the war, married a Canadian girl, came back and settled there and is living there at the present time. His mother came over to visit him. Before she left Australia she took the usual physical examination. As a matter of fact she bought a return passage. She was not sure whether she wanted to settle here and live in Canada, as her son was urging her to do, or whether she would go back. In any event, she took the usual medical examination and it was discovered by X-ray that she had a tubercular scar of some sort on her lung. The people in Australia told her the scar was of old origin, was not active, and that for all practical purposes she was quite fit and well.

Mrs. Wilson landed in Vancouver and was allowed to remain 24 hours, when she was put on a ship and sent back to Australia. The main points of the story are perhaps best set out in an editorial in the Calgary Herald, which took up this case. I shall read briefly from this editorial which is headed, "What's Happening in Immigration?"

> We do not like the sound of the reports of episodes which keep trickling out of the machinery of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.
> The latest of these concerns Mrs. Jessie Alice Wilson, an Australian woman, who after travelling all the way to Canada to visit her son in Calgary was summarily sent home by the immigration authorities in Vancouver. The authorities denied entry to Mrs. Wilson on the grounds that she was suffering from tuberculosis, and they took this decision despite a recommendation from some Vancouver doctors who examined her that "it would not be advisable to order deportation until conclusive tests had been made."

As a matter of fact, I have here a photostatic copy of a letter which was given to Mrs. Wilson in Vancouver when she was examined there.

Mr. Pickersgill: Examined by whom?

Mr. Harkness: I am just beginning to read it. This letter is headed, "Division of tuberculosis control, department of health and welfare, Willow chest centre, Vancouver, B.C.; January 19, 1954". It is addressed to the department of immigration, Vancouver, B.C.; re Mrs. Jessie Alice Wilson. It reads as follows:

> Chest X-ray of January 18, 1954, reveals fibrotic appearing infiltration in the peripheral portion of the first and second right interspaces. There would appear to be a calcification deposited in these areas. This has the appearance of an arrested area of tuberculosis and it is our opinion that it would not be justifiable to deport this patient on the strength of the present findings.
> Before a dogmatic opinion regarding this area can be given, further followup studies by X-ray and stomach washings would be necessary.
> Yours truly,
> Signed "D. Mowat"
> D. Mowat, M.D.,
> Clinic director,
> Willow chest centre.

What happened was that this woman was examined by an immigration doctor and he said she had pulmonary tuberculosis. She had been told before she left Australia that she did not, that this was just an old scar. She was examined by this man who is head of the provincial tuberculosis centre in British Columbia, and he advised that she should not be deported on the strength of anything he could find. In spite of that she was deported. Complaints were made, and I took the matter up with the present Minister of Finance, who said he would have the case reviewed. He did have it reviewed, but the doctors in the immigration department said, "No; pulmonary tuberculosis. We cannot have the woman in here".

Mr. Pickersgill: I must rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not talking about matters over which I, as minister, or my predecessor, as minister, had any control whatever. The determination of these cases, as I understand it, is carried out for us by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not attempt to substitute my judgment for the official medical advice that I receive from the proper, competent people. I have not the right under the law to substitute myself, nor have any of the officials of this department, for that matter. Therefore if the hon. gentleman wishes to raise these individual cases, and to complain about the checking of another department of government, it does not seem to me quite reasonable—

Mr. Ferguson: Don't try to worm out of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: —that the time allotted for this department should be taken up with it.

Mr. Harkness: The examination of people wishing to enter this country is performed, as the minister has just said, on behalf of the department of immigration by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The doctors who perform that examination technically belong to the Department of National Health and Welfare, but the work is done for the department of immigration. It is the immigration people who act on whatever the findings are.

As I said at the beginning, I brought this case up for the purpose of showing the arbitrary methods that are followed by the department and the subsequent impossibility, when a mistake has been discovered, to get the immigration people to admit it. In view of the medical evidence, some of which I have given here, I do not think there is any doubt that this woman never should have been deported. I have two full sheets containing clinical observations by tuberculosis specialists in Australia, both before she came to this country and after she went back. All the observations are to the effect she has no active tuberculosis. She has an old scar, just as many people have, and to all intents and purposes she is a fit woman.

In spite of this medical evidence, this doctor working for the department of immigration made a mistake. I do not think there is any doubt about it. He diagnosed this woman as having pulmonary tuberculosis, yet all the tuberculosis experts who have examined her claim she does not have pulmonary tuberculosis. On the basis of this diagnosis the woman was allowed to stay in the country only 24 hours. The department paid no attention to the report of the tuberculosis specialists to whom they took the woman during the brief time she was here. She was sent back to Australia, and furthermore she has not been allowed to return here. Subsequent efforts on the part of her son to get her back to this country have all been turned down, still on the basis she has pulmonary tuberculosis.

What it boils down to, and I wrote the minister to this effect, is that it would appear that once a mistake has been made by one of the doctors advising this department, then the department refuses to admit that mistake. They insist he was right, no matter how much medical evidence you bring to show he was wrong. The department acts on that basis. I shall not take the time of the house to read all this medical evidence. I have two full pages of clinical reports from tuberculosis specialists, which are on the letterhead of the anti-tuberculosis association of New South Wales.

This case has dragged on now for a year and a quarter, but no matter what medical evidence you bring in the answer is always the same, that the woman has pulmonary tuberculosis. The department maintains this position in spite of the fact that every tuberculosis specialist, both in Canada and in Australia, who has examined her says she has not and never did have it. The woman was shipped back in this arbitrary manner at great expense which she could ill afford, and she has been refused entry since. If that is not an arbitrary method of carrying on immigration to this country then I do not know what you could call arbitrary treatment.

The son became a Canadian some years ago, and first arrived in this country as a trainee under the air scheme. Both ministers, one after the other, who have handled this department during this period refused to have anything done about the matter. In other words they took the attitude, "Well, our doctor—who I do not suppose for a minute was an expert on tuberculosis—"said she had pulmonary tuberculosis and so far as we are concerned that is it." They do not care what the Australian doctors say. They do not care what the Vancouver specialist says. So far as they are concerned she has pulmonary tuberculosis and they are not going to let her in.

It is this type of case that has caused a great deal of distrust of the department of immigration. It is this type of thing that has caused a large number of people to believe there is something particularly wrong, particularly rotten so far as the department of immigration is concerned. I am not saying that is the case. As a matter of fact I am quite sure that the department—

Mr. Ferguson: I am.

Mr. Harkness: —has many very able officials who do their best to carry on things in a reasonable way. This, however, indicated a stubborn attitude right at the top on the part of the minister who is now in charge, and the minister who was formerly in charge. When you have a minister in charge of a department who adopts an absolutely stubborn attitude of that sort, and refuses to let reason enter into the settlement of any of these cases, then I do not think it is fair to blame the officials. I think the blame should be placed right squarely on the shoulders of the minister; and I think in this particular case the minister should give an undertaking to have a new review made immediately with a view to letting this woman come into this country to visit her son.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall be delighted to review the case. I do not think I have ever refused any member of this house, including the hon. member who has just spoken, a review of any case I have been asked to review.

Mr. Harkness: And I might say in that connection that if the minister is going to review it in the same way he reviewed it before, merely reiterating the statement that the doctor examined her once on behalf of the department, and then say "Our people know best", it will not be enough. Just wait until I get this letter from my file and read what he said in connection with the medical evidence. I find on looking in my file that I do not have the letter I intended to read.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: Well, I have so many of these letters here that it is hard to find them in a minute. But the first letter was to the effect that the medical men in the employ of the department and working for the department knew better than any of the outside doctors what the requirements for immigration purposes would be. Then after I did get a review of the matter the minister wrote saying this:

> A medical report has now been received from the chief of the Department of National Health and Welfare, immigration service, concerning Mrs. Jessie Alice Wilson of Australia.
> Dr. Reid states that Mrs. Wilson is certified under section 5, s.s. (b) of the Immigration Act, and that she will require an over-all period of observation of at least two years, before up-grading can be considered.

In other words, apparently all Dr. Reid did was take the diagnosis of pulmonary tuberculosis and say, "We cannot look at her for two years, until it has a chance to clear up". On the other hand all the experts in this line who examined the woman, who took sputum tests, who X-rayed her, and everything else, insisted that she never did have pulmonary tuberculosis, that all she had was a bit of a scar that had been there for years and did no harm at all.

Mr. Ferguson: I think that was one of the worst exhibitions this House of Commons has ever seen, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, when his estimates were being discussed and when an item of his department was being drawn to the attention of the house, getting to his feet and declaring that because somebody else was trying to help to do the job he cannot do himself, it is not good enough because it is not in his department, that the doctors belong to another department. And in effect he says, "Therefore my time should not be wasted. You should not talk about my department, because my assistants who are trying to enable me to do the semblance of a decent job do not belong to my department." That is a fine attitude to take.

Mr. Knowles: He says they are not his babies.

Mr. Ferguson: No, they are not his babies. The majority of cabinet ministers in the Liberal government take the responsibility for everything that is done in those departments. But here we have a new minister trying to shove it off, on to another department. That is a fine manner in which to do business.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words. I sat on the estimates committee when it dealt with the estimates of this department. It was emphasized on many occasions that the department had not been careful enough in screening immigrants entering this country. We sat through hour after hour listening to that kind of criticism. It was opposition members sitting on that committee who made all the criticism. There was information the minister was unable to give them with respect to screening in Europe, and they were not satisfied with that. They wanted to have all the details.

Mr. Ferguson: That is not—

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You have had your say, Fergie; now I want mine. They wanted all the details about how the screening was done, to find out if the department was being careful enough. I have heard the accusation made on the floor of the house that immigrants who did come to this country were found to be in ill health, and we have been criticized for having to take care of them.

Tonight the shoe is on the other foot. I know Dr. Reid very well, and I have a lot of confidence in his judgment. But they say Dr. Reid knows nothing about this disease, and that the only thing we can do is discard any advice that might be at our disposal and take that of some other doctor who might be in British Columbia or Australia. I feel we have doctors of our own in this country who can take care of this situation. I do believe the screening that is being done for this department should not be condemned, and that we should support it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I should like to end this discussion on a peaceful note by asking you to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I not make a humble appeal to hon. members to let item 59 pass so we can get along with the estimates the next time they come up?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am afraid if that were done I would not have the opportunity to make the remarks I intend to make.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: What is the business for Monday?

Mr. Lapointe: We shall continue with the budget debate on Monday.

CHILLIWACK CAMP—COMMANDANT'S HOUSE

Mr. Harkness:

1. When was the house for the commandant at the Chilliwack army camp built?
2. What was the cost of this house?
3. By whom was it built?
4. Was the contract let on a firm basis or on a cost plus basis?

Questions

5. If it was on a firm cost contract basis, what was the amount of the contract?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Between May 1949 and June 1950.

2. Labour costs do not enter into the cost of the house since its construction was undertaken as a trades training project by Royal Canadian Engineer Corps trainees. The cost of the house is, therefore, the cost of the materials used in its construction, totalling $14,418.84.

3. The house was built by trades trainees of the Royal Canadian School of Military Engineering. Construction began early in May 1949. Much of the initial work was done by pre-course trainees while awaiting the commencement of the next series of courses.

A total of 249 trades trainees worked on the project at various times. The different types of tradesmen employed included foremen of works, draughtsmen, blacksmiths (for steel and metal work), concretors, carpenters, painters, sheet metal tradesmen, plumbers and bricklayers.

Tradesmen worked on the project insofar as their training schedules fitted in with the type of work which needed to be done at any given time. Actual work on the house was accompanied by lectures on the particular phase of construction then being undertaken; a tented classroom was provided on the site. Some materials and installations which would not ordinarily have been used by a contractor were incorporated into the project in order to give a maximum number of trades experience and training.

5. Not applicable.

HEALTH SERVICES, MACKENZIE DISTRICT

Mr. Hardie:

1. What health services does the Department of National Health and Welfare maintain or support for Indians and Eskimos in the Mackenzie district?

2. What X-ray surveys have been carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the Mackenzie district in recent years?

Mr. Martin:

1. Nursing stations with a nurse in charge are operated at Coppermine, Fort McPherson and Fort Norman.

Full-time doctors are stationed at Aklavik, Fort Rae, Fort Resolution, Fort Simpson and Fort Smith. Arrangements are made with doctors in private practice at Yellowknife and with doctors employed by the Imperial Oil company at Norman Wells and Eldorado whereby their services are made available.

Mission hospitals are situated at Aklavik, Fort Rae, Fort Resolution, Fort Simpson and Fort Smith. In these mission hospitals there has been an average of 255 Indians and 65 Eskimos. Cases requiring further treatment than that available in these hospitals are sent to the department's Charles Camsell Indian hospital. There has been an average of 100 Indians and 70 Eskimos from the Mackenzie area over the past year.

A full-time dentist is employed. He travels between the various settlements, and arrangements are made whereby an eye specialist travels throughout the area specializing in the examination of school children.

2. 1951—2,191 Indians were X-rayed.

1952—2,355 Indians, 371 Eskimos, and 1,172 other than natives were X-rayed. 69 cases of active tuberculosis were found.

1953—2,366 Indians, 1,002 Eskimos, and 2,210 non-natives were X-rayed. 76 cases were found, 51 of which were new.

1954—Survey teams operated, by boat and aircraft during the summer months, around Great Slave lake and from there along the Mackenzie river to Aklavik, with side trips for the Liard and Great Bear rivers. Every known settlement and community was visited.

In addition, Eskimo gathering points along the Arctic coast and adjacent islands, from Pelly bay to Herschel island, were surveyed by an X-ray team. The only one missed during the year was Banks island and the Eskimos from this area were X-rayed at Tuk-tuk or Aklavik during their summer visits to these points.

5,938 people were examined by the mass survey method and 66 cases of active tuberculosis were discovered.

1,306 Indians of the Yellowknife agency around Great Slave lake yielded 30 lesions for an active incidence of 2·29 per cent. 23 of these cases were unknown previously.

1,370 Indians of the Fort Norman agency, along the Mackenzie, Liard and Great Bear rivers, had 19 lesions for an active incidence of 1·4 per cent. 10 of the lesions were not previously known.

In the 1,318 Eskimos who were examined along the Arctic coast 13 showed tuberculosis for an active incidence of ·98 per cent. 11 of the lesions were new cases.

There were 1,944 non-natives examined by mass survey in the territories and only 4 found with active tuberculosis for an incidence of ·2 per cent. Two of the cases were new.

There was an improvement in the coverage of Northwest Territories schools during 1954. Pupils were examined at Fort Simpson, Fort Providence and Fort Resolution after the beginning of the fall term. Those at the three Aklavik schools were X-rayed both spring and fall.

A total of 873 students were examined. 391 were Indians and no active disease was interpreted. 272 were Eskimos in whom 1 previously known lesion had become reactivated. 210 were non-native pupils and amongst these 1 new active moderately advanced case was picked up at Fort Simpson.

3,969 films from the Mackenzie-Western Arctic zone were referred to the Charles Camsell Indian hospital for reading during the year. Approximately 1,700 of these were quarterly plates taken on patients under treatment for tuberculosis. The remainder were referred for diagnostic purposes.

2,194 films were taken on Indians, 818 on Eskimos and 957 on persons of non-native status. 81 active tuberculosis lesions were picked up from these films of which 49 were new disease. Of the 81 cases, 53 were Indians, 12 Eskimos and 16 people of non-native status.

SCHIZOPHRENIA RESEARCH

Mr. Goode:

What action is the Department of National Health and Welfare taking to further research on schizophrenia?

Mr. Martin:

Saskatchewan	$ 193,030
Ontario	138,565
Quebec	133,170
Total	$ 464,765

SAINT JOHN RIVER, N.B., POWER DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Brooks:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government or any department thereof, and the government of the province of New Brunswick, since January 1, 1952 until the present time, with reference to the proposals regarding federal assistance to the government of New Brunswick in financing the development of hydroelectric power on the Saint John river.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope this motion can be adopted, subject to the usual reservation that we will extend to the government of New Brunswick the courtesy of communicating with them before the papers are brought down.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried, subject to the reservation expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

Mr. Bryson:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Trade and Commerce, or any other department of the government, and all farm organizations, and between the Department of Trade and Commerce, or any other department of the government and any person or persons, pertaining to the allocation of box cars among elevator companies since October 1, 1953, to date.

Mr. Winters: I wonder if the hon. member would be good enough to allow this motion to stand? I should like an opportunity of speaking to him about it.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will stand.

ASSINIBOINE AND RED RIVERS—FLOODING

Mr. Dinsdale:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any department thereof and the government of Manitoba and/or other interested parties in Manitoba, relating to the problem of flooding on the Assiniboine and Red rivers, for the period 1949 to the present.

Mr. McCann: The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is unavoidably absent, and as acting minister I should like the hon. gentleman to allow this motion to stand for today.

Mr. Speaker: The motion will stand.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

MEASURE TO REPEAL EXISTING LEGISLATION AND SUBSTITUTE NEW ACT

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to repeal the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, chapter 301 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and to make provision by means of a new act for all substantive rights relating to quartz mining in the Yukon, including the rights to stake and acquire mineral claims and leases, and to provide for certain modifications in the administration of the law.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED INCREASE OF PERSONNEL IN LEVIS OFFICE OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I should like to reply to a question asked last Friday by the hon. member for Quebec West, Mr. Speaker, concerning the number of employees in the office of the unemployment insurance commission at Levis. The establishment for permanent employees at this office was reduced from 30 to 28, effective November 1, 1954. Our list for casual employees provides for 23. In January, February and March, 23 were employed. In April, I believe, 22 were employed and at the moment we have 16 casual employees there. This is in accordance with the commission's policy of employing casual workers in local offices to help take care of the extra work load during the wintertime.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SITUATION IN VIET NAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are a number of Canadians in Viet Nam, some in an official capacity and some not, I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question regarding the present situation there. In view of the rapidly changing events, and the reports which have been coming over the radio and through the press, is the minister in a position to give us any clearer interpretation of the picture, without in any way violating the ordinary protection that would be accorded secret communications?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is not very much I can say about the situation in Saigon, except that it seems to be quieting down somewhat. The information we have been able to secure indicates that the Canadians who are in Saigon on official business with the international commission are all safe and well, and that we have had no report of any mishap with regard to other Canadians in Indo-China. Most of them are outside Saigon, and would not be affected by the disturbances there.

Tomorrow—I had hoped to be able to do it today—I shall be replying to the question asked me last Friday by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who is not in his seat today; and at that time I might be able to say something additional about the situation in Saigon and Indo-China generally.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED DENIAL OF RIGHT TO TRANSFER CONTROL OF STATION CKNW, NEW WESTMINSTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on April 20 the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) asked the following question:

Will the minister tell the house why such a well known and respected firm as Southam Press company was denied the right to the transfer of the application for control of radio station CKNW New Westminster, by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation board of governors, as announced in this morning's Montreal Gazette?

The answer is that pursuant to section 31A of the regulations under the Radio Act made by the Minister of Transport reference was made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for a recommendation on the application for transfer of control of the International Broadcasting Company Limited operating station CKNW New Westminster from William Rea, Jr., to the Southam Company Limited. The board of governors recommended that the application be denied since the control of the station would be held by interests already controlling broadcasting stations in Calgary and Edmonton, which would constitute extension of multiple ownership or control of stations contrary to the principle of subsection 31A (1)(d) of the regulations under the Radio Act. The recommendation has been forwarded to the Minister of Transport.

BATTLE RIVER-CAMROSE

BY-ELECTION—REQUEST FOR CONFIRMATION OF DATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister in a position to confirm a radio report of earlier today to the effect that the Battle River-Camrose by-election has been set for June 20?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the radio broadcast. The recommendation was made on Friday and, since it is out, I would assume that it has received the approval of His Excellency. The date recommended for that by-election was June 20.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

PETERBOROUGH—DISPOSITION OF OLD CUSTOMS BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) asked if the old customs house at Peterborough had been turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The answer is that it has not yet been, but that it will be turned over in the course of the next few days.

TRADE

EXPORTS OF LEAD, ZINC AND CRUDE OIL FROM CANADA TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) asked a question regarding certain amendments that had been proposed to a bill now before the United States congress to extend the Trade Agreements Act. These included certain specific commodity amendments, which would have affected the importation of crude oil, lead and zinc into the United States. They have now been rejected by the United States Senate finance committee, when it was considering the bill.

However, the same committee has approved several other amendments of a general character which might have a bearing on commodity trade. At this stage, however, I would not wish to speculate on the effect of those amendments, if passed, since the bill to extend the Trade Agreements Act has yet to be considered by the Senate as a whole and by a joint conference of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know that there will be some qualified measure of satisfaction in the information which has been given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As he has pointed out, the effect of some of the amendments will not be appreciated fully until they can be more carefully considered.

There is a certain aspect of the problem however in regard to which I think it might be well if there were some clarification, and that is the question of arranging control over the movement of oil as a result of the relationship between companies formed in Canada and parent companies in the United States.

I have no desire to press any question which in any way unnecessarily would present difficulties in the extremely friendly dealings that we have with the United States government. Nevertheless, I think we must recognize the possible consequences of an accepted plan under which restrictions, not covered by legislative provision, would be covered by some general arrangement such as has been discussed quite openly in Washington, and to which I have referred on earlier occasions in the house.

Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs would like to take this as notice and, if so, I would be pleased to have it on that basis. But I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he will consider specially a request before the government of the United States that there be clarification of the intention of that government with respect to a system which is quite openly being discussed as a system of control outside the field of legislation which has government approval.

Mr. Pearson: I might say at once that we are very much aware of the difficulties that might arise for us in Canada out of the kind of agreed arrangement the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned; and I can add that our preoccupations on that aspect of the matter have already been made quite clear to the United States government.

Mr. Drew: And may I ask if the answer of the United States government will be communicated to the house, when it is received?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, sir.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, April 28, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to be as brief as possible, because I am in favour of the shortening of speeches, and in this instance I shall try to give an example to other members in that regard. I have only two or three points upon which I wish to elaborate, and which I shall place before the house so that hon. members will have something to think about.

At the outset of my remarks may I thank the government for having fixed a floor price for butter, a procedure for which I know the farmers in my constituency are most grateful. May I convey their gratitude to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and to the government in general.

Secondly, may I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) upon having given to the nation the budget to which we had the pleasure of listening a short time ago. I do not think I will be taken to task by anyone, because the larger part of the population of Canada received this budget with great approval.

Now, I must say a few words on a subject which my county holds dear, and for many reasons. Eight parishes of my county of Portneuf border the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. These parishes cover a distance of about 60 miles. Nineteen other parishes complete the total of 26, divided into 34 municipalities. The approximate percentage of industrialization and farming is about 65 to 35. Therefore, you can see, Mr. Speaker, that my county is being industrialized quite rapidly. In the past nine years mines and cement industries have been successfully developed. The limestone and granite industries have been holding their own. The paper mills have been running and producing at full speed. One must not forget the production of timber, plywood and pulpwood, the former for exportation and the latter for local consumption. A survey has been made by the very active chamber of commerce of my county which ascertained the necessity and the urgency of the construction of a deep water wharf at Portneuf village on the St. Lawrence. The result of the inquiry has been conclusive; correspondence has been voluminous between the federal member for Portneuf, the chamber of commerce and the Minister of Public Works here in Ottawa.

The engineers of the department have made the necessary investigations, soundings, borings; blueprints have been prepared. The results of the inquiry made amongst the different companies operating in the county of Portneuf show the necessity and urgency of the construction of a deep water wharf on the St. Lawrence at Portneuf village. More delay would be very harmful to the industry and the economy of our district. Healthy competition is in fact necessary in a sound economy, and my people do not fear competition; they welcome it. Our people have always shown a true spirit and good initiative in business in general. They need encouragement to persist in that direction; and they are entitled to their share of the gigantic development which will follow the St. Lawrence seaway national enterprise.

My people are very anxious to see the initial works of that construction. They need that improvement; they need it badly. Industry and agriculture will greatly profit by it. I must say that the Minister of Public Works and his officials, not forgetting the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget), the parliamentary assistant to the minister, have listened with benevolent ears, and have looked into the matter with care and keen interest. The taxpayers of the county are waiting patiently for the green light to give the signal. The wharf is necessary and urgent. I ask the minister to give it the necessary impetus in asking the House of Commons to vote the amount to be spent for the realization of the project, and the federal member will keep on praying.

My next point is this, Mr. Speaker. I have witnessed in this house for the past three or four years representations and remarks, more or less serious, and criticisms against the subsidy paid to farmers, especially in my province, who at the same time are maple sugar producers. We usually get this criticism from the loyal opposition, but this year the C.C.F. have been united with them in their criticism.

Mr. Knowles: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Oh, yes, I was in the house when the criticism was made.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the first time that the C.C.F. has been united this session.

Mr. Knowles: Name the member.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Look in Hansard.

Mr. Brooks: Quote from Hansard.

Mr. Knowles: Is he a C.C.F. member? You know he is not.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I agree that the number of maple sugar producers is rather small in other provinces compared with the very large number in my province, but my impression is that if their provincial governments had come to the rescue of the maple sugar producers in other provinces they would have enjoyed the same privileges as we enjoy in Quebec. The subsidy paid by the federal government is not due either to an outburst of temper or to political advantages, but to protect at the same time maple sugar producers in Canada and outside of Canada.

There is a provision embodied in the Food and Drugs Act of Canada to ban lead in any kind of food. To obtain that, regulations have been adopted to do away with welded tins as containers of all kinds of canned food; hooked tins are now being used. For the same reason, tea, chocolate and cigarettes are wrapped in waxed or aluminum foil; no more lead paper is used to wrap them.

The history of this subsidy to maple sugar producers is that lead was found in maple sugar products and all shipments were stopped at once, not only shipments to the United States, but all exports outside the province of Quebec. The maple sap itself does not contain lead but the oxide of lead found in maple sugar came from the buckets made with tin plate.

Intensive work has been done for months and months to find a process to eliminate the lead in maple products. The problem has been discussed with technicians at Washington, Ottawa and Quebec. Only one way was found which could prevent lead found in maple sugar products, namely, to change the sap buckets. That is what they have done with the subsidy paid by the federal government. After an extensive survey it was found that the cheapest way to counteract the lead found in maple sugar products was to use aluminum buckets. That is what they did and they asked the provincial government to pay a subsidy equal to the subsidy paid by the federal government to help my maple sugar producers to replace their sap buckets with aluminum ones. If this protection had not been given to maple sugar producers, the industry would have disappeared. I am not trying to be unreasonable in my contention, because I am being truthful in saying that out of 21 million buckets in circulation, 17,500,000 have been changed. From the information I have received from some of my friends who are deeply interested in the industry, I am positive that a subsidy of about $200,000 from the federal government and $200,000 from the provincial government of Quebec would settle the matter and all the sap buckets would be changed for aluminum buckets and the maple sugar industry producers would be satisfied and grateful to the two governments for helping them to counteract this very dangerous finding of lead in their products.

I have heard criticisms from year to year against that subsidy. After all, only $3,886,728.24 has been voted. Out of that, only $800,000 still remains to be spent. I think we are entitled to the whole subsidy, and I ask the government and the Minister of Finance to pay the subsidy for another year so that my producers in the province of Quebec will be helped to the extent they deserve. I can put tables on the record from the province of Quebec to show every hon. member that we need that subsidy. Am I permitted to place the tables on the record?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member consent to place these tables on Hansard? He has said they are very small.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): The tables follow:

I said that I would be quite brief, but I should like to deal now with a subject that has proved to be quite touchy in past years to some hon. members. I refer to the income tax paid by the farmers of Quebec. I ask those who are saying that the farmers of Quebec pay such a small amount of income taxes to realize that we have what are called family farms in Quebec whereas in Saskatchewan they have what the people of the United States used to call industrial farms. I should like to give some figures to indicate acreages of farms in the two provinces in order that hon. members may get a proper picture.

In the case of farms containing 51 to 100 acres there are in Quebec 60,452, whereas in Saskatchewan there are only 1,767. In the case of farms of 101 to 200 acres, in Quebec there are 53,067, and in Saskatchewan, 39,366. It will be noted that as the acreage increases the number of farms increases in Saskatchewan while the number decreases in the case of Quebec. In the case of farms running 201 to 299 acres, in Quebec there are 11,000, whereas in Saskatchewan there are only 3,000. In the case of farms of 300 to 479 acres, in Saskatchewan there are 43,000, whereas in Quebec there are only 5,000. In the case of farms of 480 to 639 acres, in Quebec there are only 714, whereas in Saskatchewan there are 20,165. The larger the acreage the greater the revenue and the more income tax to be paid. We have family farms in Quebec and you have industrial farms in the west.

I have one last point to raise and I am quite sure I will be criticized for doing this and told that it is none of my business. But I do intend to say a few words on a question which I believe interests every hon. member of this house, especially the medical men, as well as the general public. I refer to the use of human capital in our national game of hockey. I feel that I am entitled to speak on this matter in this budget debate because the budget refers to health.

As I said, I most likely will be told that this is none of my business, but I think this thing has gone too far. The national league schedule calls for 70 games in the season, with three, four or five games in the playoff series, which means that at the most the players do not play more than 80 games. The season starts in October and runs to about the last day of April.

However, the professional hockey league of Canada—not the N.H.L.—is still in the playoffs and there are four or five games yet to be played even though they have played already more than 70 games. I think this is too much to ask of the hearts of our athletes. I am afraid that in the long run hockey will be killed because it is too apparent that the almighty dollar has taken first position while the health of our young athletes is being ignored. I would like to get the public reaction to this situation.

I suggest that the managers and the big men of professional hockey look into this carefully. They should not ask the athletes of our country to do too much. I know there are fat cheques involved and large amounts of money; I know that with possibly few exceptions we all like to have lots of money on which to live. But when a player is exhausted, to the extent that some of these players are, the inevitable result is that he will lose control and not be responsible for what happens. I am quite sure that if these players were not so completely exhausted many of the incidents that have occurred during the hockey season would not have occurred.

I would propose that our national game be handled in the way baseball is handled in the United States. A commissioner or judge should be appointed by the federal government or the provincial governments working in unison in order that our national game may be protected.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am happy that my first words after taking this particular seat in the chamber will be to disagree with what has been said by a Liberal member, the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). I should like to refer for a moment to what he said regarding maple syrup pails. The hon. member said that he hoped the government would continue this subsidy. I must disagree with his point of view because I contend the subsidy is unwarranted; I think it is a waste of money. After all, a line has to be drawn somewhere. If we are going to supply maple syrup pails to maple sugar producers, it would be just as sensible to supply water pails to farmers, and dairy pails to milk producers. This is one instance where I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will refuse his co-operation.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): May I ask the hon. member if he has ever heard a member from Quebec say one word against subsidies paid in any of the other nine provinces of Canada? We are always willing to help the economy of any part of Canada because we realize that if the economy of any part of the country is disturbed, the economy of the whole country is disturbed. Criticism has been levelled against this subsidy for years and I submit that that is not quite fair.

Mr. Thatcher: I do not want the hon. member to think that I am against this subsidy because it is being paid primarily in the province of Quebec. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I do not agree with subsidies of such a nature, no matter to what province they are directed.

Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the house, I should like to take advantage of this budget speech debate, to discuss briefly the reasons why I found it necessary a week ago to leave the C.C.F. party. May I say initially that I took that step with deep regret and only after long and intensive reflection. Over the years I have enjoyed working with C.C.F. members, and I have many personal friends in that group. I hope I shall still have them.

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

However, as I stated a week ago, recently I have found my views on major public policy differing materially from those of my former colleagues. These differences were of such a basic nature that, in fairness to my former party as well as to myself, I felt that I had no alternative but to resign.

I came to Ottawa in 1945. I believed then, as I believe today, that my constituents did not expect me to vote contrary to my personal judgment or common sense. I do not think any party in this house, whether it be Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. or Social Credit has all the wisdom. I do not think that any leader in this house, no matter how wise a man he may be, can avoid all error. I simply cannot see why a member should not support a sound proposal, no matter from what quarter of the chamber it may originate. This I have tried to do in the past; this I hope to do in the future, for so long as I may remain. I regret that my views in this connection frequently caused irritation and friction among my former colleagues. I suppose, however, it was inevitable.

I stated a week or so ago that my differences with the C.C.F. are fundamental. What are those differences?

In the first place I have been fearful of, and in disagreement with, what appeared to me to be a growing left wing tendency within the party. The leader of the C.C.F. and most of his colleagues, I know, have no more use for communism and its vicious methods than I have. They have publicly emphasized this fact on many occasions. Nevertheless, despite the good intentions and sincerity of most C.C.F. adherents, I personally feel that left wing elements have gained a dangerous and unwarranted recognition within the councils of the party. Here in parliament with increasing frequency, the C.C.F. party has taken a line on foreign affairs that in my opinion, no matter how honestly taken, can only give comfort to communist nations.

I cite only two examples: the recent vote in the house on the question of German rearmament, and constant C.C.F. attacks on United States foreign policy. Personally I disagree with those views. I think they fail to recognize the necessity for survival. I think they are fraught with danger for all Canadians.

In the second place, I come to the field of social welfare. I have said before—and I repeat today—that much credit for what we have achieved in the Canadian welfare field is due to the efforts and the presence of the C.C.F. party in Canadian politics. I supported those welfare measures in the past, because I thought they were desirable, necessary, and within the economic capacity of this country to provide and finance. But if I am honest I cannot support the C.C.F. policy of demanding higher and higher benefits immediately without delay, regardless of the nation's ability to pay. As an example of such a motion, I cite the resolution which was proposed earlier this session by my former party, calling for a very substantial increase in family allowances, an increase which would have cost several hundred millions of dollars at a time when our budget already had a fairly substantial deficit.

Personally I believe that, as the productive capacity of Canada increases, or as our war expenditures decrease, it is the duty of the government to improve social welfare measures. But it seems to me that any such measure must bear a relationship to economic facts and realities. Irresponsible motions regarding social welfare measures which overlook such facts, no matter where they come from, usually tend only to arouse false hopes and bitterness. There is real danger to the nation when any political party, using the taxpayers' own money, recklessly endeavours to buy political favour by outbidding the other parties in the social benefits it will pay.

In my opinion the business of parliament is too important to be conducted like an auction sale. As I see the problem, premature welfare legislation, not founded on a sound economic basis, could actually endanger many of the reforms which we have already achieved, if a recession should set in.

Before leaving the field of social welfare, I should like to take only a moment to clarify my own position regarding old age pensions. It has been suggested that in the past I have opposed increases in the old age pensions. That is not a fact. On April 24, 1952, at page 1573 of Hansard, I made this statement, and I quote:

> I cannot help doubting the wisdom of paying old age pensions to Canadians who are wealthy and have no need of them.
> . . . I wonder whether it is sensible to pay old age pensions or family allowances to those with an income of $5,000 a year or more.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I thought then, and I still think today, that the large sums of money which are presently being used to pay pensions to people who have no earthly need for them, could be better used to increase the amount which is being paid to those in very dire financial circumstances. In this view, of course, I differ again with the C.C.F., and I know I differ with most other hon. members in this house.

In the third place, I have viewed with concern the C.C.F. attitude towards economy in government expenditure. I may say that at times, too, I have viewed with concern the attitude of the government itself. Since coming to parliament I have consistently advocated lower tax levels, particularly for those in the lower income groups. In order to bring about those tax reductions, I have urged the government to try to eliminate unnecessary expenditures, especially those which appeared to me to be wasteful or extravagant. In a similar manner I have criticized certain subsidies as being ill-advised. A good example is the one mentioned by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) a few moments ago. As I see it, a dollar saved by the government means a dollar less which must be collected from the taxpayer. To most of my efforts in that field I felt, rightly or wrongly, most of my colleagues were not only apathetic but in many cases actually hostile.

In the fourth place, I believe that the C.C.F. attitude toward corporation taxation is unrealistic. I oppose their views that such taxes should be increased materially at this time. I certainly believe that corporations in Canada should bear their fair share of the nation's tax burden, but there is a point of diminishing returns. As I see it, no Canadian is helped when the taxation level on Canadian business and industry is increased to a point where modernization and expansion is retarded or discouraged. Such a policy could jeopardize the ability of our factories to compete in domestic and international markets. But what is even more important, it could endanger the creation of new jobs at a time when our population is increasing rapidly. I am absolutely convinced that excessive taxation in normal times on Canadian business and industry, as advocated by my former colleagues, will cause lost markets, fewer jobs, and in the end threaten the very purpose for which it is advocated, the social welfare of our people.

In the fifth place, I must admit that in recent years I have come to doubt whether the socialization of key industries is the answer to Canadian problems. That does not mean to say that I am opposed to all social enterprise. However, Britain's experience in socializing the coal mines and railways was discouraging. Moreover, the socialized industries recently established in the province of Saskatchewan have been, to say the least, not very satisfactory. For one reason or another it looks as though every time the government runs a business it has additional difficulty in doing so efficiently.

To further illustrate this point, I ask hon. members to look at agriculture. The contrast between the productivity of Canadian agriculture and that of the Soviet union is surely startling. We in Canada have had our farm difficulties, but those difficulties have been induced primarily because we have produced too much, as compared to what we could sell. But in Russia the collective farm system, after a quarter of a century, is still failing to supply sufficient food and raw material for the country, and the recent political crisis in Russia was engendered by that fact. From that fact I can only conclude that dogmatic socialism, with its co-partner bureaucracy, hinders rather than helps in improving the standard of living of the farmers.

As I have also stated previously in this house, I cannot agree with the C.C.F. proposal to nationalize the banks. Control, in the national interest, over the banking institutions of the nation can be adequately exercised under existing authority vested in the Bank of Canada. I would remind C.C.F. supporters that even the British Labour party many years ago discarded this plank as impractical.

I think hon. members, including even my former colleagues, would agree that our differences then are fundamental. There is a saying that men's opinions change with experience. I admit quite frankly that my views have altered substantially as I have studied the Canadian economy. Under these circumstances I would rather leave public life than have to pretend agreement or to hide frustration. For the remainder of the present parliament, as I stated a week ago, I propose to sit as an independent member. I shall not apply for membership in any other political party. I shall, however, continue to support those measures and proposals which I think are in the interests of my constituents, no matter from what quarter they are advanced. In the next election I shall be a candidate again only if there is a genuine and widespread belief among my constituents that I am needed to serve their interests.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the subject that I wish to discuss today, I should like to say to our colleague the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) that, like others in this house, I have listened with a great deal of interest to his statement today. I want to say to him that I have great admiration for the course he has followed, for the firm beliefs he holds, for the way he expresses them and for his willingness to make sacrifices in order to further his firm beliefs.

Mr. Speaker, my subject today is primarily the features of the new budget as they affect one of western Canada's important industries, namely the oil and gas industry. At the outset I might say that I have been disturbed in recent years, and particularly in recent months, by two trends which I think should also be disturbing Canada as a whole. The first trend that has been noticeable is the decline in Canadian participation in the development of western Canada's oil and gas, a decline that has been offset by an increasing participation by foreign capital in the development of this Canadian resource. A second trend which has become noticeable is the increase of Canadian investment in oil and gas development in the United States. As a Canadian I believe that to the greatest extent possible Canadian capital and Canadian investors should take part in the development of their own resources and that to the greatest extent possible those resources should be under Canadian control. These trends of a decline in our Canadian investment in Canadian resource development and an increase in Canadian investment in resource development outside of Canada are disturbing trends indeed.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of reasons why those two trends should exist. They have to do with various factors which go into making the word "incentive", including the problem of marketing, the problem of price and so forth. But among these various factors which make up incentive is one that might be called Canada's taxation policy. I should therefore like to say that my main comments today will be by way of suggestions for modifying Canadian tax laws in order to raise Canadian capital sources to an equal competitive level with United States capital for exploration and development of western Canadian oil and gas resources. The things I have to say I think will apply equally to other types of natural resource development throughout our country.

It is a sad fact that Canadian oil companies and investors in them are still, under Canadian tax policy, required to compete on unequal terms with United States companies for the acquisition and the development of our western Canadian oil and gas resources. This is not the fault of the United States government nor of the United States companies which are investing in western Canada, unless we are prepared to condemn our southern neighbour government for allowing United States firms, on their foreign programs, the same depletion allowance and other taxation features developed over many years to stimulate and to maintain a high level of exploration and development within the United States, and also unless we are prepared to condemn United States firms for accepting the depletion and other tax features authorized by their government as applying to their foreign operations. But before doing any damning of the United States government or the oil companies, we might remember that United States policy has had and still has a great deal to do with the large flow of United States capital that has contributed so much to the western Canadian development of the past eight years. I do not think that any sound-thinking Canadian would want to curb that capital flow from the United States.

The best way in which to put Canadians on an equal competitive basis with Americans in Canadian oil development is to amend Canadian taxation policy, particularly as to depletion allowance, in order to bring it more in line with what has been established as sound business in our southern neighbour nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to be politically partisan in this matter because I happen to sit in parliament as a member of the opposition party. I am well aware of the fact that oil and gas is a comparatively new "big industry" in Canada and that this government in many ways has been sympathetic to and has encouraged growth of the industry. Some of its policies on oil and gas, just like some of the views expressed by those on opposition benches, reflect a perhaps natural unawareness of all the aspects of a new great industry. Tax policy, for example, has been developing through the years by "trial and error" methods, gradually being modified as the government's knowledge of the industry's problems increases. My objective now is simply to try to speed up the modification process.

Let us now briefly look at the modifications to oil industry taxation policy set out on April 5 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). Then we shall consider the even more vital modifications which are still in the "hoped-for" stage.

The most important modification in the new budget is elimination of the time limit—which was the end of 1957—in the allowable deductions from income for expenses of exploring or drilling for oil or gas in Canada, or for searching for other minerals in Canada. The write-off of exploration and development costs, within the limits defined in the Income Tax Act, will thus become what might be termed a permanent feature of the tax laws, eliminating the annual review and yearly extension of the item by parliament, something which has been the policy for several years. As the Minister of Finance said in his budget message, the past procedure "carried with it some uncertainty for the future", and since the "special tax provisions have clearly established their value in promoting expansion", he proposes to make them a permanent part of our law. With that course I fully agree.

By no stretch of the imagination is the right to deduct as an expense exploration and development costs a subsidy or a tax concession, in the sense that this right has occasionally been described. This expense quite properly should be regarded in the same way in which we all regard the normal operating expenses of normal businesses. Costs of exploring and development are as much a normal expense of an oil company, if it wants to get into or to stay in business, as are the costs of advertising to a merchant, the costs of a plant to a manufacturer, the costs of seeding and harvesting to a farmer, and all the other costs which must be taken into account by anyone in any kind of business if he hopes to make a success of it.

What the Canadian government is now accepting on a permanent rather than temporary basis is what the United States government has long accepted, namely that exploration and development costs are normal expenses undertaken by the companies concerned in an effort to find and to develop new revenues, in which the government tax collector will share as soon as costs have been recovered.

Of course, there is no assurance that exploration spendings will bring discoveries and profit making production. If they do not the losers are the companies who have footed the bill. This fact, of course, is evident to a great many thousands of Canadians who have taken a gamble in oil, gas or mining and found their investment loss as a result of lack of success accompanying their operations. Many of the companies, both Canadian and foreign, who are carrying out Canadian exploration have yet to make discoveries adequate to pull them out of the red. Many others have made discoveries that will assure an ultimate profit, both for themselves and for the government. Many, many more discoveries will undoubtedly be made in Canada if the economic climate is favourable. In fact, however, the Canadian government has already been assured by the discoveries to date of many hundreds of millions of dollars of additional tax revenue in the years ahead as discoveries advance from the return of capital stage to the stage of paying profit. The Canadian government, and this is important, will draw some share of the profits whether the discovering and producing companies are Canadian or foreign.

Since American companies play such a major role in Canadian resources development, Mr. Speaker, it might be well to look briefly at how United States and Canadian tax policies function in relation to them. Some United States companies operate here as a division of the United States parent; others operate through Canadian subsidiary companies. A United States company doing business in Canada may include its Canadian exploration and development expenditures in its parent company's consolidated United States tax return, deducting these expenditures from its United States income. When and if it develops Canadian income, that income will go into its consolidated tax returns. For Canadian tax purposes the expenditures may be carried forward and charged off against future income in Canada, when and if it is obtained. In order to invoice international double taxation in profit years, tax payments made in Canada may be used as a credit against the United States tax liability. In effect, the United States income foots the bills for United States companies' explorations and pays any losses if adequate Canadian income is not obtained. If sufficient Canadian income to leave a profit after recovering of exploration costs is obtained, the profit is shared with the Canadian government.

Now, the second method of operation of United States companies in Canada is through Canadian incorporations as subsidiaries to the parents. In the case of Canadian subsidiary companies, of course, they pay taxes in Canada after the write-off of prior years' expenditures, the same as for a United States subsidiary. The United States taxes at current rates would be paid on dividends transferred to the United States parent company.

In his new budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) announced the end of the deep-test well special deduction. This will terminate next December 31. This measure was adopted several years ago specifically to encourage drilling of deep exploratory wells, that is wells over 7,000 feet deep and costing at least $150,000 each, in areas where the dominion geological survey believed significant and valuable geological data could be gained. Only individual wells specifically approved in advance by government authorities qualified for this concession. In fact, only about 1 per cent of the exploratory wells have been approved for this concession, and the cost to the Canadian treasury has amounted to only about one-third of 1 per cent of the total amounts invested by the oil industry in exploration in western Canada during the years this special deep-test deduction has been in effect. The deep-test well provision permitted deduction from income tax payable of 35 per cent of the drilling costs of exploratory wells qualified in advance by the government. It applied only if the wells were failures, that is dry holes.

If production were found, the tax concession no longer applied. The concession, Mr. Speaker, has been useful to Canada in encouraging drilling and obtaining of valuable geological knowledge in the deeper areas of our west. Because of its very limited application, however, in the over-all western oil development the ending of the concessions will not have very much material effect. The passing of it, therefore, is not too much regretted by those who are providing for the development of our west.

A new amendment to the Income Tax Act proposed by the Minister of Finance will permit oil or mining companies to deduct expenditures on either oil or mining exploration in cases where the expenditures were incurred otherwise than on the company's own account, in consideration for shares or an option or right to purchase shares of a corporation on whose account the expenditures were incurred. This would have application where a company participates in the exploration of mining or oil properties with others, through the medium of a corporation set up specifically to hold those properties and to explore them.

This amendment does not apply to oil company mergers and amalgamations, of which there has been a number in recent years. There still does not appear to be any provision made or contemplated in the statutes whereby such mergers can be carried out without the successor company losing the benefits of the expenditures for drilling and exploration costs to which its predecessor or predecessors would have been entitled.

This problem is a serious one, especially for shareholders of the smaller Canadian oil companies and mining companies which have, in recent years, been merged with others or which may have to be consolidated in the future in order to survive. The reasons for mergers are usually the conventional ones such as economy in operation, reduction in overhead, consolidation of properties, provision of additional finances, and of course the major one, the fight for survival. Practically all such companies have incurred expenditures for exploration in excess of their income in the expectation of the application of such expenditures against future taxable income. The right to charge off those accumulated losses against hoped for future income is not extended, under present tax policy, to a successor company. If for no other reason than that the policy discriminates against the thousands of small Canadian investors in smaller Canadian oil and mining companies, I trust that the government will not delay too much longer in amending the Income Tax Act to permit carrying over into company consolidations and mergers the right to write off qualified exploration expenditures.

Let us consider now depletion allowances which, as now constituted in Canada, place the Canadian company at a competitive disadvantage with the United States companies in the acquisition of and development of Canadian oil and gas resources. While it is vitally important that we have a continued large inflow of foreign capital, particularly United States investment, it is at least equally important that the maximum possible Canadian investment and equity be maintained in our own resources. Revision of present depletion allowance policy would go a long way towards increasing the Canadian stake in our western resources, by offering Canadians greater encouragement to invest in competition with people from the United States in this resource development.

There is another very serious aspect of the present depletion allowance policy. It encourages Canadian companies to rest on their laurels, draw production from current wells, and curtail exploration. This is so simply because depletion allowance for the Canadian company does not apply until after all the exploration and development costs have been recovered, and the company is in a profit position. In contrast, under United States tax law, the United States company is permitted deductions of depletion from gross income prior to the recovery of exploration and development costs, whether the costs were incurred in the United States, Canada or elsewhere.

Depletion allowances are basically a recognition that a well or mine producing oil, gas, coal or any other mineral is a wasting asset strictly limited as to the ultimate production it can yield. The owner, in order to stay permanently in business, must continuously explore to replace with new wells or mines the reserves that are produced. In principle, depletion allowances provide natural resource production industries with a lower rate of taxation than applies to industries which do not have the same problem of replacing by exploration the products they produce. Depletion, of course, does not apply to what might be termed the normal business phases of such an industry as oil. In other words, profits from refining and marketing are taxed at the full corporate tax rate without benefit of depletion allowance.

Under present Canadian policy, operators of oil and gas wells are entitled to depletion allowance of 33⅓ per cent of the net profits, if any, remaining after all costs of exploration and development have been recovered. Because the huge expenditures in recent years have far exceeded gross production income, only about one-tenth of the Canadian companies engaged in exploration are in the position of having net production income against which to apply depletion allowance. The actual benefit of depletion allowance to date has been only about 1 per cent of the spendings made to replace and increase proved reserves. The purpose of the depletion provisions therefore has been largely defeated.

Under present regulations, a Canadian company could discover an oil or gas pool and, if it were carrying on an active exploration program, could produce all the oil or gas from that pool and receive very little, if any, depletion allowance. On the other hand, if the company reduced or halted exploration, it could derive a very substantial depletion allowance and ultimate profit from the operation of the pool. Thus there is a penalty on the company willing to continue large-scale exploration, and that is certainly an undesirable state in a nation whose future depends in no small measure upon the continued risking of large amounts of capital on natural resource exploration and development.

In contrast to the limited application of depletion to the Canadian companies who pay out a large part of exploration and development costs in our west, there is under present tax policy a depletion allowance of 25 per cent of gross income extended to recipients of gross and net royalty interests in Canadian oil and gas wells; in other words to those who do not bear the major burden of exploration and development costs.

Might I say, in passing, that I own a small company which, for some years, has been engaged in the development of oil and gas—unsuccessfully, I might say, until a couple of years ago. My company acquired gross royalties in a certain area of Alberta which became productive. That little company is no longer carrying out any exploration—at least, not at the moment. It is drawing a fair amount of revenue, and is enjoying 25 per cent gross depletion allowance because its producing assets are gross royalties. On the other hand, many other companies which are doing far more than my little company toward exploring and developing new resources in Canada find themselves in a position where they are not enjoying the benefits of the gross depletion allowance which, as owner, I enjoy.

I have previously urged, and will continue to urge, in the House of Commons that the government amend its present depletion allowance regulations to provide that the present allowance of 25 per cent of gross production income now permitted royalty owners be extended also to those who provide the costs of exploration and development, in place of the current allowance of 33⅓ per cent of any ultimate net profits.

Such a step would go a long way towards providing the continuing incentive for Canadian capital to maintain a large-scale exploration program in Canada, and would in addition put the Canadian in a nearer-to-equal position with his friendly and essential competitor, the American, in the drive to develop Canadian resources to the full. Under American law, United States companies have a depletion choice of the more beneficial to them of two methods: (1) 27½ per cent of gross production income; or (2) 50 per cent of net income.

Scores of thousands of Canadians who, as investors in Canadian oils, gas and mining, are helping develop our western resources, could help themselves and the nation by adding their voices to those of the Canadian Petroleum Association and the numerous independent Canadian oil companies who have been urging the government for some time to bring its depletion policy closer in line with that of the United States, in order that the development of Canadian natural resources may be, to a greater extent than it is today, the development of Canadian resources, largely by Canadians for the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in entering this debate I do so with the idea in mind that our budget is something more than merely the accounts of our public housekeeping. Sometimes one does see some rather shaky analogies drawn between the public accounts of Canada and the account books of private concerns. This very often misleads those who seek to find their way through the mazes of the budget.

I think we have to remember that one of the most important features of the budget is that it contains the government's proposals, not merely for the collecting of revenues and the disbursement of funds in the public administration, but also the government's proposals in the way of leading our economy in the direction in which, in the public interest, it considers it should go. And it is on that basis I wish to discuss the budget this afternoon.

First of all, I think we have to decide in what direction it has been going of late; and to that end I think we should direct our attention to its effect on the Canadian citizen. Because, after all, like the Sabbath, our economy was made for man, not man for the economy. And the only yardstick by which really we can measure its effectiveness and the effectiveness of the policies of those who conduct it, is to establish in our minds quite clearly the effect on the members of our society. To that end I wish for a few moments to deal with some figures produced quite recently by the dominion bureau of statistics in its labour force survey. One particular figure interested me very much, and that was the figure showing the number of people who, at March 31 this year, had been looking for work unsuccessfully for seven months or more. The figure given was 45,000. We may ask, in a work force of 4,500,000, what is 45,000? But those 45,000 are human beings, men and women who have been looking for work for seven months or more.

I wonder how many members in this chamber have any conception of what it would be like to look unsuccessfully for work for seven months or more—to have started last year in the heat of August, to have carried on through the fall and winter and into the spring, and to have remained unsuccessful. I wonder how many members realize the terrible process of deterioration that takes place in a man's morale under those circumstances, the dreadful doubts which begin to arise as to whether or not he has the capacity to find a job, or to hold it if he does find it, and finally the relapse into despair and indifference, and resignation to being maintained on a reluctant charity, either public or private?

Among those 45,000 I wonder how many could have been found a year earlier among the 22,000 who, at the end of March, 1954, had been looking for work unsuccessfully for seven months or more. And were any of them, do you suppose, to be found among the 11,000 who, at the end of March, 1953, had been looking unsuccessfully for work for seven months or more?

Those are the figures that interested me in the D.B.S. figures of the labour force survey just issued, and which is revealed in reference paper No. 58 which was produced not long ago, being a recapitulation and revision of all the statistics relating to our labour force from the year 1945 to 1955.

You find that in those years the number of those who have been looking for work for seven months or more has doubled each year since 1953, and as it has advanced by geometrical progression has had a very disturbing and frightening effect, perhaps more significant of economic malaise than the total figures of unemployment. Who are they? Who are those people who have been thrown out? One can only guess, of course, but my guess would be that we shall find among them those who are a little too old, a little too unskilled and a little too unintelligent.

Those are the ones who are thrown out whenever the necessities of industry force cutting of costs. I think there has been evidence, in this doubling each year of this number, that industry is raising its sights in this regard and is demanding higher and higher standards of vigour, of skill and of intelligence. That economic necessity, of course, is to be found in the market situation to which the minister referred in his budget speech at page 2729 of Hansard, when he had this to say:

> No appraisal of the economic situation could avoid some reference to the revival of international competition. So far as the basic industries are concerned, most of our producers have proved quite capable of maintaining and even increasing their markets at home and abroad. However, some of the secondary manufacturing industries have lost ground in export and domestic markets to their competitors. I mention this to illustrate the point that the difficulties which some industries are facing today are not the result of any general decline of demand, but of a new situation applicable to the industries concerned and in large measure capable of correction by those industries. Clearly these are situations which cannot be corrected by government. What is needed is resourceful efforts by management and labour to meet that competition by reduction in real costs and the improvement of quality and efficiency, all of which I firmly believe Canadian management and labour can provide.

What does that mean? Just what does the minister imply? Presumably, these 45,000, twice as many as last year, which was again twice as many as the year before, who are more or less—I think we can say this fairly safely—permanently unemployed, is the first step in that process that the minister is advocating for industry so that it can meet the rising tide of international competition.

Does his suggestion imply that we have to lower wages, perhaps, or have less workers or increased productivity per man, or all three? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not good enough merely to say that industry has to rationalize its efforts in order to capture and recapture lost markets. We also must have some consideration for the effect of such policies on our economy and society as a whole. While I quite agree that the efficiency of industry must be maintained and increased, we must at the same time all bear in mind just what is happening to those who are the victims of that process. We have been told time and again ad nauseam that our present type of economy, our present method of producing and distributing goods, is the best one and it will work. I have always taken that to mean that an economy that works provides continuously for the needs and necessities of all the members of society in that economic unit. And here we have a group that our economy is not doing that for. And therefore it seems to me that those who are the advocates of things being unchanged, of leaving its economic foundation as it always has been, have now to think of how it can be made to work.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not good enough merely to call for economics in public administration, economy and rationalization of industrial production and distribution. It is also necessary to embark on some new thinking in regard to the needs of our people. I remember that during the earlier part of the debate one of the hon. members of the official opposition suggested that the time had now arrived when the government should consider the adoption of a policy of deficit financing. I myself am not always prepared to support the idea that Keynesian economics is the solution to our problems. I do think, however, at this juncture that perhaps the late Lord Keynes had something which could be at least of stop-gap value to us. And in order that we may judge of the possible efficacy of Keynesian economics with consequent deficit financing, it might be well to rehearse here the debt reduction that has taken place since the end of the war, up until 1953, because there is one thing that we should bear in mind, namely, that deficit financing, per se, is neither good nor bad, neither dangerous nor safe. It depends entirely on the relationship which the resulting national debt plays in ratio to our national income. I have those figures. I would like to put on the record the reduction of the national debt which has taken place since the end of the war owing to surplus budgeting that was engaged in by the government during those years.

Up to the end of the year ended March, 1947, the national debt was reduced by $373,600,000; the following year, the year ended March, 1948, it was reduced by $676,119,000; the following year, 1949, by $595,502,000; 1950, by $131,520,000; 1951, by $211,294,000; 1952, by $248,033,000; and by March, 1953, by some $23,500,000. The total reduction during that period, Mr. Speaker, was $2,259,000,000. These figures are taken from the Canada Year Book, our dominion bureau of statistics figures. At the same time that our national debt was being reduced in this fairly substantial way, our national income was steadily increasing. But during the same period that the net debt declined by $2,500,000,000 the national income increased by some $9,225,000,000. Interest rates have also been falling since that time, since September, 1953, as a matter of fact, and the minister reported in his speech a week or so ago that there had been a similar decline since 1954.

The question that is always raised when one suggests the possibility of deficit financing is the possible danger of inflation. Admittedly, at a period and in a situation where all our productive factors are engaged, where we have no unemployment and where industrial plant is producing at full or nearly full capacity, then of course any measure of deficit financing will result in inflation; but when we are in a position, as we are today, where a considerable body of our labour force is unemployed, when much of industry is producing either at a curtailed rate of production or closed down altogether, then the problem of inflation does not arise. I think we may take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that we can at least engage in deficit financing to the degree necessary to engage again all the working population and to engage again all our productive plants.

Again I want to put on the record suggestions for the employment of the funds raised by deficit financing.

One is the obvious one of the growing need of public works throughout Canada. We have had repeated demands from various quarters in this house for such projects as the South Saskatchewan river dam which apparently cannot be gone on with because we cannot afford it. There is a great need for the fruits of deficit financing, but perhaps more important than the field of public works as such is the field of the production of capital goods for those parts of the world which are now repeatedly demanding them. In this group we have repeatedly urged that our contribution in this field should be stepped up immensely, and in the light of our present and dangerous situation in this country I think the time is certainly ripe for a rapid increase in our contributions to southeast Asia in the way of capital goods, to be accomplished by the placing of substantial orders for agricultural machinery and machinery of all sorts required by those countries.

This could be done either by way of gift or by way of loan contracts with these nations. I suggest that we would be on sounder ground if we stayed fairly well within the confines of making gifts such as we can afford to these countries. The history of loans under these circumstances has not been too happy and possibly the result of lending capital goods instead of giving them might be merely to cause irritation in international relationships.

At the present time the government is pursuing a policy opposite to the one I have suggested. It has been following a policy, which has been intensified this year by the present minister, of attempting to leave in the hands of Canadian citizens incomes large enough to encourage them to invest in Canadian production. One can hear the argument every day; one hears it repeatedly in this house that the people are being taxed so heavily they are not able to purchase enough goods to keep up consumer production and that on the other hand they have no surplus left over for investment in the expansion of production.

I would point out that we have no guarantee whatever that the funds left in the hands of Canadian citizens will in actual fact be invested in the expansion of our productive enterprises. The history of recent years indicates that that is rather a vain hope. It is a vain hope because of the failure of Canadian investors to invest on a large scale in new enterprises in Canada and also because of the fact that so much of our development process in Canada is now in the hands of subsidiaries of foreign companies which do not afford an opportunity for Canadian investment.

Many of the companies operating in Canada as subsidiaries of United States companies do not call for Canadian funds and Canadian investment. The opportunity is not there. In addition we have seen a growing tendency in recent years to invest in investment trusts where the goal has been a modest return with absolute safety. The old days of the pioneer investor with risk capital seem to have vanished; we do not seem to have any of that any more.

I feel that unless the government is going to plan for deficit financing we shall have no practical realizable results from it. We shall wind up with serious budgetary deficits for which we have nothing to show. We have the first one this year, the $194 million which is predicted by the minister as a deficit and for which there will be little if anything to show.

We shall go on doing what governments did during the thirties when they had continuous deficit financing with nothing to show for it. I suggest that if we are going to follow the policy outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in this house, a policy confined solely to the relief of the unemployed, we shall incur all the ills of deficit financing and have none of the offsetting benefits which could be obtained by the conscious adoption of Keynesian economics for the time being.

As it is, we have the minister's statement that he expects a deficit of $194 million this year, and this can be nothing more than a morose prediction that we are not going to have enough money coming in with which to pay our bills. There has been no deliberate and conscious planning for the sort of deficit financing which might well be calculated to pull us out of our present and growing condition of economic decline.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I think enough has been said in this debate already to indicate to the minister that his first budget has failed to meet with the full approval of the Canadian people.

Mr. Harris: Enough has been said, period.

Mr. Patterson: I would not quite agree with that.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did not say enough.

Mr. Patterson: Of course the minister may argue that no matter what kind of budget he brought down, the members of the opposition would still be dissatisfied or perhaps unsatisfied, and perhaps that is true. However, I venture the suggestion that, with a little more imagination and optimism, the minister could have done a great deal toward eliminating many of the features which are so unsatisfactory and which present themselves as splendid targets for the opposition guns.

Although wide latitude is permitted in the budget debate, my observations will be limited to the consideration of several matters of vital concern to the people of Canada. I have been trying to figure out in my own mind just why the budget is so interesting to a great many people. I suppose it is that they live in hope, and they say that hope springs eternal in the human breast. They are looking forward to the possibility of the minister's finding some way to reduce taxes without altogether upsetting the economy of the nation. As we consider the budget before us we find that little has happened to bring much relief to the individuals in our nation who need some help at this time.

Shortly after the present minister assumed the portfolio he expressed the view that taxes in Canada were pretty high. I have a newspaper clipping which reads:

> Finance Minister Harris said Tuesday night he has made an initial examination of Canada's tax rates and has found them "pretty high". He described the personal income tax as "severe".

Then a little later:

> But what amazed him most was that Canadians allow the federal and other governments to "take away" from them nearly one-third of their incomes.

I suppose looking at it from the broad point of view they can do something about it, and I venture to suggest that perhaps in the near future they will. However, be that as it may, as we consider the budget before us we find that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has not done anything to suggest that he was too much in earnest when he made that assertion, or if he was in earnest at that time he apparently ran up against obstacles which he did not anticipate, and had to be satisfied with less than what he was considering initially.

One matter to which the minister referred in the budget was the 5 per cent reduction in excise tax on automobiles. On page 2739 of Hansard we find these words:

> In the case of automobiles, however, I think the rate should now be brought down to 10 per cent. Effective tomorrow, therefore, the rate of excise tax on automobiles will be reduced by 5 percentage points.

Now that is very acceptable, but it certainly is far from being satisfactory. An article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of March 5, 1954, had this to say with respect to the high excise tax on automobiles:

> Who paid most of this tax—$161 million?

That was in 1953.

> Not the buyers of Cadillacs and Lincolns; the luxury buyers. More than 60 per cent of all automobiles in Canada last year were owned by people earning less than $3,000. And of the other 40 per cent or less, many of their owners were earning only slightly more than $3,000.
> In no sense are Canadian taxes on automobiles luxury taxes, such as Britain's purchase taxes.
> And these hidden taxes, bearing down most heavily on people of moderate means, are not merely on automobiles; they are on a whole line of necessities.

We notice as we consider the budget that, as I have already said, there is a 5 per cent reduction, but that is not sufficient in this day when automobiles occupy the place they do in our economy, transporting workers to their places of employment and providing services in so many necessary ways. We would suggest that the minister continue to look upon taxes as being pretty high, and certainly taxes on automobiles, and that before he brings down his next budget we hope he will see his way clear, not only to reduce that tax but to eliminate it altogether on these necessary vehicles for our present economy.

As I have said, the minister's pronouncement is welcome but it is certainly not in actuality an indication of a very magnanimous spirit. This failure to ease the tax burden in the lower income bracket is more or less evident throughout the entire budget. While on the subject of automobile tax, let me say that I support the views that have been expressed very clearly by my leader, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), and the views of all those who have referred to the failure of the minister to provide for refund of taxes on automobiles presently in stock. The dealers' position, I think, should be recognized and some consideration given to this particular matter.

There is another subject to which I should like to refer at this time, one that does not find its place anywhere in the budget, nor did it last year. I am not sure when it last found its way in. But it has to do with donations to charitable, religious and educational organizations. At the present time 10 per cent of the income is deductible for contributions to charitable, religious and educational organizations. I think there are specific reasons why this percentage should be raised. I have an article from the Pasadena Star-News of Saturday, December 6, 1952, which has this to say:

> Washington, D.C. Taxpayers are being reminded by the U.S. bureau of internal revenue that they can give up to 20 per cent of their 1952 gross income to religious, charitable, or educational institutions and deduct it from their income in computing the federal tax due on March 15.
> The bureau's 1952 edition of instructions to income taxpayers calls attention to the fact that congress has raised the previous limitation on charitable contributions from 15 per cent to 20 per cent.

In this connection I should like to say also that I understand the United States has made a further increase and is now allowing taxpayers a deduction of 30 per cent on contributions to religious, educational and charitable organizations.

Mr. Harris: Is there not a ceiling on that?

Mr. Patterson: Not according to the account that I saw, Mr. Minister, but I would not be positive. I think that some consideration should be given to this matter. Certainly, if that reduction is allowed in the nation to the south, I think the minister could give some consideration to it and possibly bring in something along the same line.

There is another reason why I believe some consideration should be given to this particular subject. Considerable pressure is being exerted for wider regulations respecting raffles and lotteries. I am not going to go into a discussion of raffles and lotteries, as I imagine we will have that at some time in the future. However, I think I can say that I am opposed to the principle of lotteries and raffles being used to finance charitable, religious and educational institutions. I think it is a method that tends to undermine that admirable quality of open-hearted giving and reacts unfavourably upon our social conscience.

I would suggest that an increase in the amount of deductions allowed in this particular regard would encourage voluntary contributions for these purposes. I think this matter should be given careful consideration. We would appreciate it if the minister would take it to heart and mind and bring in something along those lines in the very near future.

I would just like to make reference to the subject of succession duties. In the budget that was brought down in 1954, the last budget of the present minister's predecessor, he referred to the succession duties. He said, and I quote from page 3734 of Hansard of April 6, 1954:

> The Excise Tax Act has been streamlined, simplified and made more systematic. Up until now I have not been able to devote enough time to a similar improvement in succession duties. However, I have recently asked officials of the three departments concerned—finance, national revenue and justice—to commence work on rewriting the law.
> In the next few months, while the redrafting is proceeding, the views of informed and interested persons or groups of persons, would be welcomed on any provision in the law which deserves reconsideration. In the meantime no change will be made in the present law.

As we turn to the budget speech which was given on April 5, 1955, on page 2738, we find our present Minister of Finance has this to say:

> Now just a word about succession duties. The budget speech of last year indicated the intention of the government to undertake a complete revision of the act and invited representations regarding it. Useful briefs and comments have been received and the work of drafting and shaping a new structure is under way. The task has proved to be somewhat more difficult and time-consuming than was anticipated. The new bill will not be ready for introduction at the present session, but I hope it will be ready next year. In the meantime the present law will stand unchanged.

I think the minister was very frank in making that statement. At least he intimated that studies were progressing and he still had this under advisement. We certainly hope, as he says he hopes, that at least by the next session something will be brought in along these lines.

One request that has been advanced—and I think it is justified—is that a $50,000 deduction be allowed in the computation of succession duties. If I understand aright the law as it stands, an estate of $50,000 is tax free but if it is $51,000 that fact brings it into the realm where the entire estate is taxable. I believe that is right. I believe the minister indicated that to be the situation. I would venture to suggest that $1, $100 or $1,000 should not make that much difference. It would seem to me that the request that has been made by certain organizations is a fair one, namely that a $50,000 true deduction be allowed on all estates. As the minister gives this matter consideration, I trust that he will take that suggestion and incorporate it in any legislation that is introduced in the future.

There is one other matter I wish to call to the attention of the house at this time. It has to do with old age pensions. Although this subject received considerable attention last session, comparatively little has been said about it during the present session. However, I think it remains as one of the matters of urgent concern to a group of citizens who are certainly deserving of our consideration. It has been pointed out on other occasions that the pensions our senior citizens are receiving are just about equal to 50 per cent of their dollar value in 1939. Certainly the time has come, in my opinion, when something definite should be done to bring further assistance to these people who are in dire need.

According to the last annual report of the Department of National Health and Welfare, under the caption of old age assistance, we find that there are 93,273 recipients of old age assistance. The federal share for the fiscal year was in the neighbourhood of $20 million. We in British Columbia are much concerned about this matter because we have a higher percentage of old age pensioners or senior citizens in our particular province. Hence we are vitally concerned about this particular situation. In this group we have 8,144 who are receiving old age assistance. Then as to old age security, British Columbia stands third with a total of 79,464 recipients.

When we combine those figures, we find that the combined total of recipients under those two categories stands at 808,672. I realize that that number constitutes a considerable proportion of our population. May I again suggest that it is an extremely deserving part of our population. I would suggest that something further be done with respect to giving assistance to these people.

At the present time the allowance is $480 a year except in Newfoundland where it is $360. The permissive ceiling is $720 for a single recipient, $1,200 for a married recipient and $1,320 for a recipient with a blind spouse. We realize that in some of the provinces additional assistance is given to our senior citizens. In British Columbia and in Alberta a supplementary payment of $15 per month is given. In Saskatchewan I understand they have been giving $2.50 but that there has been an upward revision for some of the recipients of old age assistance.

Mr. Castleden: Up to $20 for some.

Mr. Patterson: It is not necessary for me to picture again the circumstances under which many of the recipients of these allowances are living. We are all fully aware of the position in which they find themselves. I believe that public opinion is going to—if I may use the word—force the government to take some action. It is time that action was taken. In fact, it is long overdue. I think public opinion is going to come to the place where it is going to force the government to do something about this matter of raising the allowances of those who are recipients of old age pensions.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer in this connection. I believe that the government should give consideration to lengthening the period of stay permitted outside of Canada. I do not think it is fair to these senior citizens to be obliged to lose their pensions if they reside outside of Canada beyond a period of three months; I believe that is the period at the present time. It would seem to me that it would be only fair and certainly would be justified to raise that length of stay to at least one year. I know that some of their organizations are advocating that it be for an indefinite period.

Mr. Knowles: That is the way the judges have it.

Mr. Patterson: I would not say just what the judges receive, but I will accept the hon. member's interjection in that regard. However, in all fairness, I believe that this matter should be given consideration and that the period should be lengthened to one year for these senior citizens.

Mr. F. A. Enfield (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I have been greatly interested in the debate this afternoon and in the way in which those who have spoken have endeavoured to deal, during the greater part of their discussion, with the general aspects of the economy as reflected in or affected by the budget. I respectfully rise to make my submissions and to endeavour to carry on this trend of discussion.

I was going to say that one feels that the budget has been generally well accepted owing to the note of optimism that is expressed therein this year. I think it has been well accepted in the country. Of course we realize that this feeling is not unanimous here in the house. However, I think the budget presupposes that the development of our economy will continue on a good level. It assumes that we are at present in a period of good economic activity. I think that optimism is justified. However, I think it will depend a great deal on how the level of our development of our natural resources continues throughout the coming few years. I should like to devote my remarks to a few generalizations with regard to our natural resources, to draw some conclusions and, if possible, to relate those conclusions to the taxation policy outlined by the budget.

We are prone to talk rather glibly of our limitless forests, our untold mineral wealth and our vast reserves of oil and gas throughout the country. Perhaps we rather pass over the fact that the country is so large, and that there are such tremendous problems in gaining access to these resources and therefore the question as to whether it is possible economically to develop the resources perhaps has not received the attention it deserves.

In this connection I should like to point out that the following factors or problems are involved: First, there is the matter of easy access to the resources themselves. Second, there is the matter of the distance that they are from the possible market for the resources. Then there is the saleability of the resources, when we do get them, for currency that we can use or for other consideration. Then there is the matter of competition from other countries.

We are inclined to feel that we have a marvellous find, which we have of course, in our iron ore developments in Labrador. We fail to recollect that there is a mountain of iron ore in Venezuela, which is quite close to transportation, thus putting it in competition with ours. Iron ore is, after all, the most abundant mineral on the earth's surface. We must face the proposition of substitution. What is a resource today may be out of fashion tomorrow. We have seen great changes in the steel industry. Plastics are now taking part of what was once an exclusively steel market. The chemical fibre industry, that is the production of synthetic fibre, has dealt a body blow to the textile industry where cotton and wool, what you might call the natural fibres, are used. In fact, I feel that the development of this new synthetic fibre industry has been one of the root causes of the dire straits in which our textile industry found itself during the last winter.

The most important factor in endeavouring to develop our resources is the transportation problem. This is the key, I believe, to the whole situation. There is also our population to consider, both as a market and as a source of labour supply, and that is basic to the further development of our resources.

In so far as transportation is concerned, I may say that the importance of it struck me yesterday on our visit to Churchill. As we flew over that vast country covered with lakes and rivers, I saw this single rail line heading into Churchill on Hudson bay. One is struck by the enormous factor that the transportation problem really is. It must have been a tremendous undertaking to build that railway line, and as you look down from the aircraft it appears as a sort of lifeline. It must have been of great advantage in opening up that country. I cannot put too much stress on the transportation factor.

I should like to make a few general classifications of our resources, and relate them to these factors or problems I have outlined. I feel that our main resource lies in our sources of energy. We do not tend to feel that sources of energy are natural resources. Generally speaking we think of a natural resource as something we can look upon, feel, deal in, buy and sell. Sources of energy are, however, important resources; and the whole prosperity of our country is, I believe, based on the hydroelectric energy, just as it might be said that in the past the economy of Britain was based on coal as a source of energy. The sources of energy include, and I am listing these in what I think is their order of importance, hydroelectric energy, atomic energy, coal, oil and natural gas.

In considering hydro, we have the problem of ease of access and transportation to market. We know for a fact that in Labrador there is a river called the Hamilton river on which the fall is greater than at Niagara falls and on which the flow is just about as great as in the Niagara river. We also know that resource to be incapable of any development at the moment because of difficulty of transportation of electrical energy over long distances. It seems to me this is the role in which the government could assume the greatest importance; that is, to provide research into means of developing transportation so that something like the Hamilton river could be used to advantage. The hydro potential there is about one million kilowatts as compared with our present installed hydroelectric capacity of about 11 million kilowatts across the country.

I turn now to atomic energy. I think the announcement earlier this session of plans to build a new atomic energy plant in conjunction with the Ontario hydro amounted to one of the most momentous announcements we have had in this parliament. The advance of atomic energy could have a tremendous impact in a country like Canada where we have such vast distances to cover, and perhaps at present with so little available energy to cover those distances.

I am particularly interested in the development of atomic power which is, of course, of vast importance. In connection with the development of that energy, you will recall a few days ago seeing an article in the Ottawa Citizen concerning an announcement by President Eisenhower, entitled "Dramatic Gesture for Peace". The article reads in part:

> President Eisenhower today unveiled plans to send a new atomic-powered merchant ship around the globe in a dramatic demonstration of U.S. determination to win "a just and lasting peace".
> The new vessel, the president said, will travel thousands of miles without refueling and "will demonstrate to people everywhere this peacetime use of atomic energy, harnessed for the improvement of human living".

We know also that the United States has been experimenting with a submarine, the Nautilus, in which an atomic power plant is used. Apparently the submarine can travel under water indefinitely without refuelling. Think what it would mean if we in Canada could develop atomic energy to propel vehicles over the land. It is said that one pound of fissionable material is equal to about 1,200 tons of coal. The advantages of extracting energy from fissionable material and applying it to the propulsion of a railway train are self-evident. I believe we should devote more of our energies and more of our budgetary expenditures to the development of atomic energy, not only for use in propelling vehicles on land but we should try to catch up in regard to its use in ships and in the air as well.

At the present time our budget calls for the expenditure of about $18 million per year under our atomic energy plan. This might easily be used, of course, in the development of our power plant. It would not be out of the way, in my opinion, to set aside a like amount, say $20 million a year, to develop other uses for atomic energy. The advantages would be absolutely tremendous.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to the production of energy we run into particular difficulties concerning its export. The export of energy is a sort of double-edged sword, you might say. When you create an outlet for the export of energy such as hydro power you have the advantage that it provides a steady market and obviously a steady income from that market. On the other hand you also tie yourself up on a permanent basis. I am thinking of the proposed Kaiser dam development, about which we heard a great deal in the early part of the year. Here the proposition was that we produce energy and supply a proportion of it to the United States market. The trouble with such an arrangement is that it is so permanent. It is most important, to my mind, before we go ahead with a project of that type to make certain of two things. One is that we are going to have a true surplus over and above that which our own market will need and, second, that you make the utmost use of the source of energy itself.

In that connection it was to be hoped that the development of the whole Columbia river basin would be accomplished as a unit. I think it would be fair to say that. It was to be hoped that the proposed development would fit in with the total development of the potential that was there. Once you commence the export of energy you create a permanent demand for its use by the communities using it. Those communities become completely dependent on that source of energy, and one cannot simply say, "Conditions have changed, so we would like to keep the energy for our own use." We must, therefore, ascertain that we do have a true surplus before we entertain any plans for the export of hydro.

The second class of natural resource that I would consider would be what might be termed the renewable material resources. This class is represented by all our important forest products and our agricultural products. I believe that on the average our lumber products account for about 31 per cent of our exports. Wheat alone accounts for about 14 per cent of all our exports. In regard to lumber and wood products, conservation is the keynote; and I do think that the pulp and paper companies will have to bestir themselves in their own interests to adopt good, solid conservation practices.

In connection with wheat, we find the particular marketing problem is that of finding a market where we can sell and in return receive a currency we can use. Unfortunately in the last few years, since the war, we have run head-on into restrictions in the sterling area, and it is most difficult to forecast when there will be a removal of those restrictions. We can count on this, however; that when that removal does take place, the sale of our farm products, particularly wheat, will be greatly benefited.

Then wheat is also subject to the vagaries of weather. However, wheat is what one might describe as a basic commodity in respect of which we have natural economic advantages in the matter of production, and it should provide a steady market for the future. I think other foodstuffs must rely chiefly upon the domestic market for their distribution.

Finally, there is a third class of natural resources which I would describe as non-renewable. I refer to the products of the minerals found in the Canadian shield. Of course we do not know to the full extent what the wealth of the pre-Cambrian shield might be; indeed, I doubt frankly if it has ever been fully surveyed, with the result that its vast riches to a great extent are uncharted. We realize that the cost of transportation is the key factor in connection with our mineral resources. Undoubtedly we are going to face bigger and bigger demands for our natural resources in the form of minerals from the pre-Cambrian shield.

The United States set up a materials policy commission in 1952, in an effort to find out upon just what resources they could depend in that country. The report states, briefly:

> The United States has crossed the great industrial divide and from being a nation with a surplus of raw materials has become a deficit nation.

Obviously they are going to look more and more to the north for their sources of mineral supplies, and we must be ready to meet these increased demands. The role of the government, it seems to me, would be to provide services for the area, and transportation through it, if we are to be ready to meet these demands. In this connection I believe we should adopt a courageous policy in the matter of constructing railway branch lines. There is a tendency to look at the deficit under which the Canadian National Railways operate and then adopt a strict policy of economy, perhaps to the detriment of a philosophy of expansion.

I would not like to see that come about. Last year we had plans to carry a branch line into the Chibougamau area, which I thought was most commendable. Perhaps next year we should give similar consideration to the Great Slave lake area, because I understand from my friend the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie), who has a special interest in the area, that there are tremendous advantages which would accrue from the construction of a branch line to Great Slave lake. Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, I am informed, would receive great advantage from the use of a rail line in connection with the operation of their Pine Point property which is very rich indeed in lead and zinc, and of course requires only rail transportation to make it economically possible to take advantage of the deposits.

To sum up, I have endeavoured to outline the types of resources with which we must deal—our agricultural, lumbering and mineral products. I think the only conclusion one can draw is that there must be tremendous investments of capital and tremendous risks taken in order to develop these natural resources. In the past the incentive for such risks has resided, first of all, in the profit system. There have been great profits to be made in such developments, and of course rightly so. Then there is tremendous human satisfaction in the creation of new industry.

The obvious question one must ask is this. What should the role of government be in this situation? What must be the duty of government? To my mind it would be the duty of government to see that the development of our resources continues at a pace sufficient to provide economic prosperity and full employment. To my mind the best way the government can bring this about is to adopt a role under which it stimulates and encourages, and thus assists private industry.

Sometimes, however, we do not stop there, because we find it necessary not only to encourage and stimulate but also to operate. Private enterprise has been the dynamic and moving force in the development of our natural resources, and I believe it is incumbent upon us also to be a dynamic moving force. If we see that it is necessary to operate, as well as stimulate and encourage, then I believe we have a responsibility to operate. This indicates a devotion neither to the extreme principles of socialism on the one hand nor to the extreme principles of conservatism on the other, but rather is an effort to use wisdom, gained through experience, in adopting a policy that will provide the right decision at the right time as to what move should be made.

Pursuing this policy, the government finds itself operating a railway and air transport system, a broadcasting and television system, waterways and canals, a new atomic energy plant, and a large organization known as Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the encouragement of housing. All these are things the government operates, and there are many others. On the other hand we provide encouragement and stimulation by giving support to farm prices. We see the provinces operating hydroelectric plants.

These are just a few of the fields into which governments have entered. To my mind the emphasis should be placed upon stimulation, and only upon operation if necessary. Or, to paraphrase an old remark, operation if necessary, but not necessarily operation.

Of course the taxing structure as presented in the budget has a tremendous bearing upon what private industry will do in these fields. I should like for a moment to look at our budgetary expenditures. Perhaps it might be proper to suggest that our expenditures, as outlined in the budget, fall into two main classes—and perhaps I should add that this is a rather rough division. However, we do see money spent to provide security on the one hand and money spent to provide opportunity or stimulation on the other. If we look at the figures in the budget we find that about $1,200 million is to be spent on social welfare measures. Included in this would be grants for family allowances, old age security, unemployment insurance and others.

On the other hand, what do we find in the matter of direct expenditures by way of provisions to give encouragement and stimulus? Well, without having access to the tremendous amount of statistical material on this subject, the estimate I would make from what appears in the budget would place the figure at not more than about $400 million.

In that figure I have included all the money we spent on the national research council, the research carried out by the Department of National Defence and the Department of National Health and Welfare, the whole of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, the whole of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the coal board, the estimates for fisheries, the estimate for northern affairs and the estimate for Department of Transport, part of the estimate for trade and commerce, and part of that for veterans affairs.

In other words, if we take these figures we find that we put aside for direct spending, or what might be called opportunity spending, the sum of $400 million. This is a liberal estimate, as opposed to $1,200 million spent directly on social welfare measures.

Because of that fact the question is asked, is a good balance indicated? We emphasize social security, and probably that is as it should be. I think any government would be loath to decrease any of the social security payments we now make. In fact most of us on both sides of the house would like to see a gradual—perhaps I am assuming too much—increase in the level of social welfare payments and hence a general betterment of living conditions as our government continues.

But we must not forget the other side of the coin. The only way we can continue expanding our social welfare is of course to keep expanding our economy. We have to increase our opportunity spending along with our security spending. By increasing our opportunity spending we shall increase economic activity and employment. The tax intake will be greater and the ability to pay social security will be enhanced. Of course, it is the old story of the goose and the golden egg.

I mentioned that the stimulus to risk-taking in the economy by private industry depends on reward. I have related this to the budgetary expenditures. On the other hand I should like to relate it to the tax-raising side of the picture. Of course the greatest amount raised in taxes comes from income tax, and that is a tax on the net profit resulting from the investment of labour and effort or money. Of this classification, the largest total sum is received from taxes on corporations. Until recently we had a 49 per cent tax on corporation net profits, which was just about half. We saw a reduction this year to 47 per cent.

I must make a point here. I do not know whether it is generally known—it is generally known in this house but perhaps not in the country—that there is a degree of double taxation in regard to corporation net profit. We all know that the corporation pays 47 per cent on its net profits, as shown by its financial statement; and then, when and if the net profit is distributed as dividend income, the person receiving the dividend pays a further personal income tax on that income. This accounts for the credit of 20 per cent that has been allotted on receipts of dividend income. I refer chiefly to corporation tax. I would ask this question. Does the tax structure encourage risk-taking by industry? To date I do not think we have seen any particular discouragement. Over the last decade we have had an expanding economy, and despite some reports one hears in this house to the contrary, we do have a prosperous economy at this time.

When one looks at the last decade, however, one sees certain conditions to which he must give special regard. Wartime spending provided a terrific impetus to expansion. The post-war shortages continued the heavy demands for consumer goods. The cold war has provided its grim incentive, and we all hope that these types of incentives will not continue. Under such conditions industry can expand and pay the taxes; but as these incentives have a lesser effect we must keep an open mind and we must not—and I repeat "not"—look at the present levels of income tax and corporate tax as normal.

There is a great temptation to do that. We have heard recent statements in the house that the corporation tax is not high enough. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) mentioned that he felt the excess profits tax should again be considered, and a capital gains tax. We often hear it said that in order to meet increasing expenditures, perhaps on social welfare measures, the corporation tax should be increased. This may or may not be true. I submit that such levels of taxation need not necessarily be regarded as normal, that our minds must be kept open and, if necessary, adjustments made between the risk-taking principle on the one hand and the tax policies on the other.

I would say that every time we tax a corporation to the point where the company decides not to expand and take further risks, we push that company farther out of the business that it happens to be in and get ourselves as a government closer to being in that business. I further submit with respect that we must avoid thinking of present taxation policies as normal and traditional. We must keep an open mind, ready to consider new methods of taxation, in order that we might achieve the wisdom that will allow us to keep a proper balance in the budget and hence a prosperous economy. I feel that we have a good balance in our budget this year. We have had a good reduction in personal income tax and a small but important reduction in corporate taxes, and we are enjoying a good level of economic activity.

Perhaps the budget as it stands will produce the desired result. If not, we should not hesitate to examine the balance between opportunity spending, as I have defined it, on the one hand, and security spending on the other, and examine the tax structure from the point of view of encouragement of risk-taking in our resources industries.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity afforded by this budget debate to comment on and protest against the economically unrealistic policy of the government with regard to natural gas. We have the rather remarkable situation existing where areas in Canada which have no gas within several thousand miles, such as Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, and so forth, have the benefit of natural gas; whereas other parts of Canada that have gas, practically speaking, at their back door, are denied the privilege of utilizing this resource.

I say, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is owing to a vacillating and completely unrealistic policy on the part of this government. Why do they do this? Obviously, as I stated at an earlier time, they do it because they believe that in the foreseeable future Canada may run short of gas. Therefore it is desirable to conserve our resources for the benefit of this country. That would be a perfectly logical and sound reason if it were true, but it is not true. There is no danger of this country, with any foreseeable rate of consumption, ever running short of gas.

In addition to gas resources we have fuel resources in this country which are capable of supporting any population this country is likely to have for generations to come. We are incapable of consuming these resources; yet the government seem to have adopted a policy whereby they must be left in the ground; if we cannot dispose of them, obviously they must be left in the ground. When they are left in the ground they are no good to anybody.

I would suggest to the government that they consider changing this policy and not deprive the citizens of Canada, in one particular part at least, of the benefits to be derived from this fuel which, practically speaking, is at their doorstep. Winnipeg is in urgent need of natural gas, to such a degree that the local gas company has threatened, if I may use the expression, to build a pipe line on their own.

An hon. Member: Why don't they?

Mr. Trainor: They have indicated they will do that if lines are not built by companies favoured by the government at the present time. I suggest that the government pay heed to the feeling and demand which exist in western Canada in this regard.

I do not propose making any extended analysis of the budget such as was made by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). He is much better equipped than I to analyse the financial operations of the government. However, I should like to associate myself with his conclusions, which I consider to be valid and based on sound reason.

Some of the speakers to the left seem to have gone to considerable pains to try to demonstrate an alleged failure on the part of the Conservative party to offer anything in the way of constructive criticism of the budget. I am at a loss to understand why the official opposition should be expected to provide an alternative budget for the benefit of the government. However, if by constructive criticism and constructive suggestions the parties to the left mean what they are advocating ad nauseam, crackbrained and discredited economic systems to which only a tiny fraction of the Canadian electorate have given any support, then we shall have to—

Mr. Wylie: Where are you now?

Mr. Trainor: Just a minute; just listen for a while.

Mr. Wylie: You have no monopoly on your part.

Mr. Trainor: Who says anything about monopoly?

Mr. Wylie: What are you reading from?

Mr. Trainor: I am not reading at all.

Mr. Wylie: Yes, you are.

Mr. Trainor: I am consulting my notes.

Mr. Wylie: Yes, sure.

Mr. Trainor: If you do not believe that—I do not have to take anything from you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): May I point out to hon. members that no hon. member who has the floor should be interrupted without his consent, and also that hon. members taking part in the debate should address their remarks to the Chair.

Mr. Trainor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless a more careful analysis or examination of speeches delivered by members of the official opposition will disclose a number of constructive suggestions. For example, the hon. member for Greenwood has been responsible for a few. Among other things he suggested that we should devote more time to promoting higher skills in our population in order that increased competition in world trade might be achieved.

The hon. member suggested the removal of the sales tax on supplies purchased by municipal corporations, and advocated the processing of more of our raw materials at home. The government was urged by the hon. member to take vigorous action to reduce or eliminate discrimination against Canadian products by foreign countries to the end that a greater number of Canadians might be given employment at home. Surely these suggestions should be regarded as constructive.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) made several constructive suggestions. He advocated a reduction in the sales tax to stimulate sales and employment, and indicated that the increased sales resulting from this action might compensate for the possible loss of revenue. He suggested a real effort on the part of the government to improve industrial design and lower manufacturing costs so we may hold or improve our competitive position in world trade. He suggested a careful examination of the position of the Canadian dollar in world markets and pointed out the obvious handicap that Canadian products were under as a result of this premium position. Are those not constructive suggestions?

What do the parties to our left offer? They offer a cacophony of mutually exclusive panaceas; they offer a sterile socialist dogma which is repellent to the great majority of Canadians; they offer a threadbare, discredited economic theory propounded originally by a Scottish engineer and professed by groups of economic innocents which has met with universal derision from reputable economists the world over.

Mr. Wylie: On a question of privilege, I was called to order a minute ago because I said the hon. member for Winnipeg South was reading his speech. I think he is still reading it. I just went around behind the curtains and saw that he was reading it. We are not supposed to read speeches. This afternoon the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) read his speech, and I think this practice should be stopped.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I think the rule in Beauchesne that speeches should not be read is pretty well known to the house. I believe it is equally well known to the house that a succession of Speakers, and I say this with respect, seem to have failed miserably in their efforts to enforce that rule. We in the chair as well as hon. members on the floor are bound to accept the statement of any hon. member as to matters purely within his own personal knowledge, and one such matter certainly is whether he is or is not reading his speech.

On several occasions I have heard Speakers drawing to the attention of an hon. member the fact that he was not supposed to read his speech, but beyond that, so far as I am aware at the moment, the Chair seems to have no power to go. I appeal to the hon. member for Winnipeg South not to continue to read his speech if he is reading it, but beyond that I fail to see what power we have in this chamber at the present time to go any further. We must accept the statement of any hon. member that he is following his notes closely.

I think it is perhaps only fair to the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Wylie) that I should say that many hon. members feel as he does, and that it is certainly entirely within his province to draw to the attention of the house for its consideration the fact that he believes a member is reading his speech. But I feel that, as our practice has grown up, at the present time all I can do is appeal to the hon. member who has the floor and any other hon. members who may follow not to read their speeches, and leave it to their good judgment.

Mr. Trainor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the point of order that has been raised, it seems to me the hon. member objects when something touches him keenly, and apparently something I have said must have touched him.

Mr. Wylie: Nothing you would ever say would touch me.

Mr. Trainor: It must have, judging by your reaction. I think it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who complained of the income tax exemption for the holders of securities of dividend-paying Canadian companies. His remarks would have had more force had he been able to state what proportion of these dividends were subsequently invested in Canadian enterprises that provide employment for his fellow Canadians. The hon. member who spoke just before me has called attention to the pertinency of double taxation in this particular regard, which I think is important. It should not be forgotten that these dividends that were paid were previously subjected to corporation tax, and consequently the government has gotten its tribute. I think remarks of this type betray perhaps a complete lack of appreciation of the principles on which the economy of this country operates.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I should like to direct the attention of the minister and the house to two situations in which the basic principle of equal justice to every class of Canadian citizen is being violated. I have protested against both of these injustices on previous occasions in this house, and do so again in the perhaps vain hope that the government may do something to remedy the situation.

In the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I called attention to the serious effect of the sales and excise tax on the public in so far as the price of automobiles was concerned. At that time I pointed out that if these taxes were removed or reduced to make them comparable to those in the United States, there was no reason why automobiles should not sell in this country at about the same prices as in the United States. For the small measure of recognition which the minister has given to this request I am grateful. It is far short of what I had in mind, but I suppose we should be thankful for small mercies.

However, it is a pity that the minister could not have provided his minuscule measure of relief without wreaking serious injustice on one class of citizen. Apparently, Mr. Speaker, like the Greeks we must fear the minister bearing gifts. Owing to conditions peculiar to the automobile industry, where the excise tax is levied on the manufacturer and passed on to the consumer through the dealer, we find that all dealers across Canada are expected to absorb the tax cut on all the cars they have in stock, because they have already paid the tax in the price paid to the manufacturers, and they are to receive no rebate.

The other day, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of National Revenue stated that the government did not intend to provide any rebate, for the reason that these dealers had already benefited by tax increases that had occurred previously. I suggest that this is a rather specious argument, because when the tax was increased it was at a time of scarcity, when there were very few cars in stock owing to shortages, and also to the fact that dealers had made commitments to preferred customers and fleet accounts to deliver cars at the old price. Moreover, the manufacturers insisted on the dealers rebating when a customer complained. Consequently few if any dealers obtained any particular consideration or any benefit when the tax was increased.

In any event, why should the government allow anybody to collect, on the excuse that they were collecting for the purpose of paying taxes to the government, when the government in fact never collected any taxes? That is perhaps a demonstration of the questionable moral sense that we have become accustomed to associate with this government.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that this cabinet has accepted the principle that all Canadians should not be taxed alike and that the few should be favoured at the expense of the many. Nevertheless, I would join with the hon. member for Prince Albert in urging the minister not to extend this iniquitous principle to the point where the many are favoured at the expense of the few.

I regret that the budget offers no relief to a class of persecuted citizens whose cause I have pleaded on previous occasions. I refer to those on fixed incomes, those living on savings or pensions, who have been crucified by inflation and the decreased purchasing power of the dollar. There does not appear to be any indication in this budget of any relief for these people, or any effort to reverse the trend to which we have been subjected of late years; no effort to arrest or slow down the plunge of our dollar to even lower values. The minister shows a callous disregard of the fate of those elderly citizens who are attempting to eke out a precarious existence on dollars that were barely adequate when they retired, but are now insufficient to maintain life even by the standards of extreme penury. What a fate to inflict on those who have contributed their best efforts to the growth and prosperity of this nation in days gone by. The government are responsible for this situation, for—make no mistake about it—the present depreciated condition of the currency is largely the result of deliberate design on the part of the government.

There are a number of methods the government might adopt to redress this situation of its own making, and for the benefit of my friends to the left I offer them as constructive suggestions. First, it could reverse the inflationary process; but this is probably too much to expect.

Mr. Harris: Does my hon. friend suggest that we have inflation at the moment?

Mr. Trainor: Deflation?

Mr. Harris: I thought the hon. member said "inflation".

Mr. Trainor: Do I suggest that we have inflation at the moment? I certainly suggest that we have.

Mr. Harris: All right.

Mr. Knowles: "Flation" of some kind.

Mr. Trainor: The second suggestion is that it could raise existing government pensions to compensate for the inflationary effect. Third, it could grant exemption from sales tax on the necessities of life to those on fixed income up to a level sufficient to support a decent standard of living. Fourth, it could substantially lower or even abolish the sales tax on the necessities of life. The last suggestion is probably the simplest from the administrative standpoint, but all of them are possible provided the government has a proper regard for, and interest in, the plight of our suffering fellow citizens. In any event, Mr. Speaker, the overriding consideration is that when these people ask for bread, they be not given a stone.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the minister and the government to a figure that I believe may have significance as a goal or guidepost in the future economic growth of Canada. It is reported that the average family income in the United States in 1954 was $5,300. This is a target for Canada to shoot at. It should not be impossible of attainment, although I recognize the considerable difficulties in the way. Both countries were discovered at about the same time and were settled contemporaneously by people of different racial stocks. Immigration has resulted in similar racial patterns. The political development in each country has differed, but in recent years the same independence of political institutions has prevailed in each country. The natural resources of both are similar. If anything, Canada might be said to enjoy an advantage. The population growth in the United States has been enormously greater than that in Canada, owing to differing policies of immigration. Population would seem to be the determining factor in this marked difference in economic development in each country.

The inference is clear. If we desire to emulate the economic progress of the United States, we must seek additional population through immigration. We shall not attain it by adopting the thesis of population growth by natural increase favoured by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill).

It is worthy of note that this remarkable economic prosperity has been achieved in the United States under a system of free enterprise. It could never have happened under a socialist system. It required the stimulus of individual initiative, for which there is no substitute. But behold the result, Mr. Speaker. It is the marvel and envy of the entire world.

I am not suggesting that this result can be duplicated in Canada immediately, but I would suggest that by providing similar incentive and encouragement to private enterprise, it is not too much to hope for eventual economic parity with the United States. In the interests of Canada this is an objective devoutly to be desired.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in the budget debate may I say that I do not think there is a great deal I can add to the financial advice that has been given to the minister. However, perhaps I can offer him a few condolences.

He has certainly assumed the office of budget-maker at an extremely difficult time when we are faced with receding earnings, declining revenues, declining trade, declining activity and increased unemployment. Naturally we find him producing a deficit budget as his first effort. That fact in itself would not be too bad if there were on the horizon any real signs that the budget for next year was going to be any better. We are certainly looking in every direction for some sign indicating that perhaps the trend will change, that economic activity will improve, that the picture abroad will be better and that the trade picture will improve.

Canada is in a rather unfortunate position at this particular time in this respect. Among the leading nations of the world Canada enjoys the unique reputation of being recognized as one nation that is suffering from a severe unemployment problem while other countries in Europe and America are finding their unemployment figures cut quite low. Yet Canada's unemployment figures are increasing. Something is definitely wrong.

The government is facing up to a rather difficult problem. A year ago I said that I did not think they had a solution to the unemployment problem in Canada. I am still of that opinion. We can perhaps take a certain amount of glee in saying, "Well, the minister is in a rather awkward position". He is suffering from decreased income and increased costs, but there is one saving grace about it. He is perhaps in the same position as many people in the country, certainly including the vast majority of those whom I represent. The farmers on the prairies suffered a 70 per cent decline in their net income last year, with substantially increasing costs.

In the saving grace, the one difference, of course, between the minister and the people is this. Whether he makes his budget balance or whether he has a deficit budget, the minister will still get his $25,000 a year and be allowed expenses. On the other hand, the farmer will be in the rather serious position that he will have a deficit, all right, but he will have to try to make up that deficit personally, and probably will have to go into debt a bit. Perhaps the minister now will be in a position to understand what the farmer feels like, as well as the businessman, the retail merchant, and the retail car salesmen in garages who find that, in spite of decreasing income, they are expected to carry an extra burden of some $100 a vehicle.

This budget, by its reduction in the price of cars, caught the retail dealers in a rather awkward position. The protest over that matter has been expressed many times in this house. I will just say this. The vehemence with which the dealers came to me and expressed their rather profound disgust at the way they had been treated indicated their feelings in the matter. It is not right that in 1940, when they were forced to collect the taxes, when it was difficult to get vehicles and they might have made some money, they were not given that opportunity. Now when the tax is reduced they are forced to carry the burden. They are in a very unfortunate position, because the price reduction has affected the very large stock of used cars they have on hand. I should like to assure the minister that if he and the cabinet decide to reverse their decision concerning restitution to these dealers, they would have the support of a great many members in this house.

The revival of our economy is going to be important to the minister if he intends to balance his budget next year. As I sit here I often wonder what his thoughts are concerning the possibility of the Canadian economy being revived to the point where business activity would increase, wages would go up, profits would increase, income taxes would increase, all of which would result in increased revenues. The reason we have looked in vain for it is that in Canada we have never known any great revival from a period of recession except in time of war. As soon as this government spends $5 billion or $6 billion in war contracts industry is stimulated, young men are taken from productive activity and put into the army; then Canada's economy revives and there is prosperity. But at what a terrible price.

In spite of what the hon. gentleman who preceded me said today about the theories other parties in this house may have, I should like to tell him that the status quo, for which he stands, will have to provide something better than it has provided in the past in the way of solving its economic problems in peacetime or it will have to change. One hundred years ago an industrial revolution struck the world and the system had to change. The changes that are taking place today under automation, and advanced scientific application of power to production, are relatively five or six times as great as the changes produced by the industrial revolution. The economic system under which we live must change or it will pass on. It must change peacefully or it will change in some other way. The hope of those people here who are suggesting economic changes is that they will be the kind of changes that can take place peacefully and democratically. The economic system which does not take into consideration the welfare of the human being, and that looks toward some other aim as its ultimate objective, will fail.

The principal approach in this 1955 budget is that the Canadian economy is slowing to a very dangerous position. This economy cannot enjoy what may be called the luxury of the idleness of 613,000 people who are looking for work. The people of this country need food, clothing, shelter, homes, roads, hospitals and universities. When the natural resources of this country are still in an undeveloped state and you have people looking for work, then those who own the machinery of production and those who own the natural resources have an obligation to bring the two together to provide the things the people require. The other commodity that is required is the toil of man. Today there are 613,000 people asking only that they be given the right to work. They must be given that right. They are not to be denied the right to work. The right to work has to be established within an economy or that economy will be changed by the force of public opinion.

During the past two years in this house there has been a lot of bloated optimism on the part of cabinet ministers. They have been saying that everything is all right; the Canadian economy is fine, and this is periodic or seasonal unemployment. Everything will be fine as soon as the ice breaks and summer comes again. Each succeeding year, as the ice goes, there is no solution of the economic problem. It is getting worse. This government must accept responsibility for solving that problem or admit that they cannot do it. We have voiced these sentiments in this chamber before, and we have been called the forecasters of doom.

Last week I listened in the railway committee room while the 10 provincial premiers recited their difficulties and the problems of the various provincial and municipal governments. The Montreal Gazette in reporting the event said here were 10 tales of woe.

The premiers of the various provinces were faced with difficulties which to them seemed insurmountable. There was the problem of taking care of the unemployed; the problems of the increased cost of living, the increased cost of government and the increased cost of construction. An economy which permits the costs of living to rise continually without providing a means whereby those increased costs can be met is fundamentally wrong. It will have to be changed or we will have only great deficit budgets ahead of us in the future.

When I say that everything can be supported, I live in Saskatchewan—

Mr. Studer: You did not learn much.

Mr. Castleden: I lived under an old Liberal political system during the depression that changed the hearts and minds of a great many people. When I see a dominion-provincial conference starting its agenda with the question, how are we going to share the costs of relief, I am reminded that I was one of those who lived in the west during the relief days. I hoped then that Canada would never go through those days again. All we have to do is put our natural resources to work, put the means of production and labour together, to provide the things that Canada can provide.

The economic system must operate in that way. We cannot afford another depression in Canada. A demoralizing depression is too high a price for Canada to pay. When one sees thousands of unemployed riding the box cars from one end of the country to the other looking for work, when one sees soup kitchens back again in this country, one knows that something is wrong and surely it is our job, collectively, to try to find a solution.

I do not know what the status quo is going to do about it. Somebody says, "What do you mean by the status quo"? I think of the definition of the old coloured parson. Somebody asked him what the status quo was and he said, "That is Latin for the mess we's in." We are looking for a way out of it. I would suggest to the minister that municipal governments are only too anxious to employ people when they find unemployment in their ranks, but they are finding themselves up against a stringent and difficult financial problem. I suggest to him that one way he could put a patch on the inner tube, that status quo that has let us down so badly, might be to make large amounts of long-term low interest money available to municipal and provincial governments. If money at a rate of 1 or 2 per cent could be made available to provincial and municipal governments they would be able to put people to work.

Roads are needed desperately in many parts of Canada. From the information I receive about roads in different parts of the country it is clear that we could spend billions of dollars on roads alone, thus raising the economic standard of our country and at the same time providing work. We could do worse than copy the program adopted in the United States for the provision of highway transportation systems. The movement of goods by road is an economical way of moving them. I believe it is better and cheaper for people to live in areas where they have easy access to markets. When we are using trucks and heavy vehicles for the transportation of goods we must have roads that are built to stand that kind of transportation. Municipal governments could use long-term loans at low rates of interest to do the necessary road building in their respective areas.

Then, in addition, school buildings are required, and in many municipalities they have housing problems beyond their ability to handle because of the necessary capital outlay. I believe there are many things that could be done along these lines, and certainly the people would be greatly helped if money were made available to them at these low rates. It would have the effect of stimulating building activity which, in turn, would stimulate other industry. While I do not suggest this is a complete solution for the problem, I believe it would help a lot now.

The farm problem in the rural areas is one which is slightly different, and to offer a solution one must investigate more deeply into the matter. My constituents, who ask me to speak for them in the House of Commons, are noble Canadians who earn their living by toiling on the farms. In this they use machinery and expend their energies to produce foods such as cereals, meat, butter, poultry and the like. Then it becomes necessary to sell the products of their toil to a hungry world.

I find, however, that agriculture in Canada is in a bad way. Figures from the bureau of statistics show that the agriculturist, the man who lives on the farm, is fast becoming the disappearing Canadian. These figures show that in 1931 some 37 per cent of the population in Canada were living on farms, while only 20 years later, in 1951, the figure was down to 20 per cent. Everywhere we see evidence of people leaving the farms and entering the larger centres. Surely this is a sad commentary on our way of life.

Mr. MacDougall: Mechanization.

Mr. Castleden: It is not mechanization alone. In my opinion we cannot afford in this country to lose the family farm. True, mechanization has its place; but it will be a sad day for Canada when it becomes a nation in which can be found only mechanized and factory farming, and when the people living in those rural areas disappear. When people live in the larger centres, only driving out to the farms to conduct a mechanized form of factory farming, it will be a bad day for this country.

This afternoon the hon. member for Portneuf said that we have factory farming in western Canada whereas in the east the family farm predominates. I believe it is true to say that the family farm must be established on such a basis that economic livelihood is possible, whereby people living on those farms by their toil can live in a fashion comparable with that of other Canadians doing the same amount of work and living in other parts of the country. If the government decides that mechanization is to take the place of the family farm, then it must take the responsibility for that decision; and let me say at once that this party would never support it.

I believe one of the firmest foundations of a great nation is its rural homes and the contribution they make to the finer things in the life of the nation—the great men they contribute, the leaders who came from the rural homes, the Abraham Lincolns. In short I do not believe any nation can afford to let the family farm disappear. To my mind it is disappearing in Canada because the security one used to find there is fast disappearing. There are enough hazards sent by nature to try the average farmer, without the addition of any artificial hazards.

One is reminded that out on the western prairies today rains have flooded lands to the point where they are becoming water-soaked and water-logged. Yet no more than 20 years ago those same lands constituted a dust bowl, where production was at a standstill. I have known summers in those days with a rainfall of less than half an inch in some communities, summers when cattle were dying from lack of food and moisture, dying because of dust in their stomachs, dying because they were unable to find enough good food to eat. Only 20 years later we find a new cycle in which rain is falling in flood proportions, to a point where dampness and rust are proving disastrous to the farmer. Another two years with similar amounts of rainfall would put large sections of the western prairies out of production.

These are some of the hazards under which the farmer must operate. But he does not complain about them. I had fewer complaints last year from farmers who lost their crops from one of the most disastrous rust infestations ever known to western Canada than I have had in a great many years. They did not complain about nature sending rust. But they do complain when, after producing their commodities, after being told to raise hogs or to raise something else, they find that prices have fallen to a point where no money can be made from their work. They do feel badly about those things. I heard more complaints about the allocation of box cars, which was handled in a manner whereby they were denied the right to deliver to their own elevators their grain—the little they had—than I had about the rust.

When the rust came they said nothing could be done about it, that it had been sent by nature, and accepted it as an occupational hazard. But when they are denied something they believe to be a basic right, the denial of which means injustice to them, then they are angry, deeply angry. They realize that the matter of pricing confronts them with a man-made hazard, one which should not be permitted to wipe out the family farm.

Surveys made in this country, particularly in Saskatchewan, show constantly increasing production costs on farms, a factor over which the farmers have no control. For a number of years during the war the farmer had a greater measure of prosperity because he enjoyed large crops, and his receipts kept up with his expenses. He was able to pay his debts and make his way. But in recent years his returns have been declining; prices of his commodities have been going down constantly. A startling example is found in the drop in the price of cattle sold by the farmer.

These things hit him hard. That kind of insecurity will drive him off the farm. No person can continue long in business when his costs of production are away beyond his income. This means the deficit financing that the minister understands. There is no security. Until there is some security he will be living in fear. He is not guaranteed any pay. He knows that his living and the living of his family are in jeopardy, and that if continued eventually he will be driven off the farm.

The farmers and the agricultural organizations are asking the government that the cost of production and a support price based on that cost of production be linked together. When costs are going up the farmer has no control over the cost of his machinery; he has no control over the cost of the combine, the tractor or the drill or even the hay machine. The cost of building a barn and the cost of cement are continually going up.

His oil cost and his taxes are going up. His cost of living and his cost of clothing are increasing. He has no control over these. He cannot do much about it except patch up the old machine and make it run a little longer. If no security is given to that industry, then there must be a linking together of his cost of production and the price he receives for the commodity he produces, based on its quality. When he produces a certain commodity of a certain quality, he is certainly entitled to a support price below which his income will not be permitted to go.

I hold in my hand the brief which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture submitted to the cabinet in March of this year, just a few weeks ago. In that brief they outlined the problem facing Canadian agriculture. I quote from the second paragraph on page 1:

> At the present time, farmers are very greatly concerned over the weakening of their position in the Canadian economy. Farm prices have been falling over the past few years, while costs have remained at near record levels, and some have actually risen. The result is a cost-price squeeze that has made serious inroads on the standard of living of Canadian farmers.

They outline what is happening to the dairy industry, and certainly there are grounds for complaint in that regard. They have this to say on price supports:

> The Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944 states that "in prescribing (support or guaranteed) prices . . . the board . . . shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations". With this goal (parity of income for the farmer) we are in agreement since it expresses exactly the objective of organized agriculture in Canada today.

They merely asked that they be given a parity of income, as a result of their toil, with those engaged in other industries in Canada, so the income from the farm shall be related to the cost of operating that farm. I continue:

> The prices support act, and the administration of the programs under it, have provided a large measure of stability for the farming industry,—

I may say it is rather unfortunate it did not have the effect of stabilizing the ultimate prices to the consumer; but at any rate that principle must be established. If agriculture is to continue, and if family farms are to continue as a part of Canada's economy, something along that line must be established, in view of the economic position in which agriculture finds itself today. I use these words advisedly, because I have watched the trends over the years, and the statistics prove that unless this is done the Canadian economy will suffer as a result of people moving away from the farms to some greater security.

The federation had this to say on page 6:

> Since the relationships between farm products which held in the base period are not appropriate today, we are using actual market prices in the immediately preceding ten years as a guide to arrive at the relationship of individual commodity prices. By this method fair relationship prices for farm products can be arrived at which will be in proper balance with one another, but which taken as a whole will represent a level of purchasing power on a par with that which prevailed in the period 1925-29.

They have taken the period 1925-29 as the base. They said that at that particular time a certain amount of farm produce would buy a certain number of commodities which the farmer required. Let us say that two bushels of wheat would have bought a pair of overalls. If that price relationship existed today, or a similar relationship, two bushels of wheat would still buy a pair of overalls. If that price relationship exists we can continue. There will be some hope that we may be able to plan ahead and will not be operating under a deficit budget. A deficit budget in agriculture means that the family farm will disappear from this country.

By establishing parity prices in Canada we can do a great deal of good. We should study what they have done in the United States over a period of some 20 years. The United States has had a system of parity prices and support prices, and in the past 20 years they have learned a great deal. It is my opinion that Canada can learn a great deal from the experience of the United States in this field. Basically, they recognize that if the family farm is to continue it must have some guarantee by way of parity support prices.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Castleden: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was referring to the need in Canada of a parity prices support program for agriculture and the possibilities of our learning something from the experience of the United States, where a support prices program for agriculture has been in operation for some 20 years. Agricultural organizations in Canada are demanding the establishment of such a program, and it is my opinion that they will persist in their demands until they get it. This should have the support of every hon. member from a rural riding in Canada, and it should be part of the program for agriculture everywhere in the country.

The establishment of a parity income for farmers and their families living on economic units in Canada could be the basis of the security so essential to Canada's prosperity.

I am hoping that the members of this house will study the possibilities of this program and learn from the experience of other countries. This type of program is essential, not only because of economic conditions, not only because of the social effects it would have, but because of the effect it would have upon the basic well-being of the whole economy. It has been said by people who have studied the matter that depressions and recessions are frequently farm-bred and farm-fed. When you have an economy in which your agricultural people are prosperous, then you have the foundation for a good national growth and prosperity.

The program followed in the United States has provided security for agriculture there, and the results are to be seen throughout the economic structure of the country. It is true that it has taken the form of a subsidy to agriculture in some cases, but it has provided prosperity which has certainly been lacking in Canada in the last few years. There is less than half the unemployment per thousand of population in the United States than there is in Canada. The subsidy paid to agriculture, an essential industry, is much smaller than the subsidies that have been paid to other industries not only in that country but in Canada as well.

In farming communities and in those provinces where agriculture is the main industry, cities and towns very quickly feel the effect of any recession in agricultural income. People living in these cities and towns very soon find this reflected in their standard of living.

It is a well known fact that as a result of the program in the United States there are hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat tied up in surpluses, but if you study the problem I think it will be found that that is largely due to the fact that they subsidized the wrong kinds of wheat, and encouraged the growing of wheat in uneconomic areas. There is no surplus of hard spring wheat in the United States. If the consumption of wheat in that country could be increased by 4 per cent their surpluses would soon be wiped out. A similar increase in consumption would wipe out other surpluses. That is why it is necessary to make a deep study of the matter before setting up such a program.

The same thing was done with regard to cotton. They have large surpluses of cotton which are costing them a great deal to keep in store. A government storage program is an excellent thing. We could easily have a recession or a cycle in production which would cut down production to a great extent, and then our surpluses would be most valuable. The vast surpluses of cotton which the United States has were due to the fact that they placed a parity price on this commodity without regard to the family farm unit. A parity price program could quite easily oversubsidize the kind of farmer who does not make the same contribution to the economy of the nation as does the family farmer. The program will require regulating to see that the family farm is the one that gets the subsidy, to see that you do not make millionaires out of people who are in mass production, to see that you do not bonus inefficient production on inefficient units.

I think the surpluses in milk and dairy products are good things to have. It is better to have too much of these products than too little. Their program of disposing of surpluses offers an excellent lesson for anybody who wishes to learn. If we recognize our position in the world as a producer of food, and if we recognize that there are almost a billion hungry people in the world today, then it would be wrong to say that we should not produce what we are able to produce, that we should not give all that we are able to give to those who are hungry.

A planned program of production would be a necessary part of that. There would have to be food banks where surpluses could be stored to take care of the leaner years. It might be necessary to zone production. We know from our own experience that a parity price in one particular area is quite different from a parity price in another area, even within the same province, where the cost of producing may be much greater. That kind of thing would have to be taken into consideration.

Many people think it would be costly, but the fact is that it would not be costly when we consider the effect it would have upon our economy. This would be far better for the nation than subsidizing air lines, aerodromes, gold mines and oil lines. The experience of the United States has been that during the period in which they have had this program, agriculture has enjoyed a period of prosperity which has helped tremendously in keeping the United States economy buoyant. A mismanaged program could lead to factory farming, and a properly managed program could prevent that kind of waste.

To sum it up briefly, I would say that the low-price and high-cost cycle that is facing agriculture today is a most serious thing. It will mean only one thing for agriculture, and that is bankruptcy. Canada cannot afford a bankrupt agriculture. The present condition threatens the very life of our most important industry. A support price program geared to the cost of production is an immediate necessity, and the longer it is delayed the more serious the situation will become. Until steps are taken to institute an adequate program this government will be rightly criticized, and the protests from agricultural producers will continue.

If you look over what the countries of the world are doing to feed the world, through FAO, the Colombo plan and the United Nations organizations, you cannot fail to realize that here the democratic countries are given a weapon of the greatest value to help in winning the world for peace and democracy. Food and technical assistance given to the hungry peoples of the world, to the backward nations of the world, can do more to bring peace to the world than billions spent on armaments. This is the real responsibility of those nations who like ourselves have the power to produce something which the world needs and needs badly.

That is the kind of thing which is splitting the world into camps that do not understand one another and are warring against one another. When agriculture prospers, then the Minister of Finance will find it easier to balance his budget. Canada can make a real contribution toward the brotherhood of man and can increase the respect which these people in many of the depressed areas of the world have for democracy. It is a responsibility which Canada cannot afford to neglect.

Mr. H. A. Hosking (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this budget debate I should like to pay my respects to the Minister of Finance for the masterful fashion in which he has accepted his responsibilities, and to bring to his attention the respect he has won from people all across the dominion. The manner in which he has comprehended the burdens which taxation has put on all our citizens, and the methods he has used to distribute tax relief, have been fair to all. He supplied direct relief to the majority of our citizens, and especially those in the lower income tax brackets. To assist those who were unemployed to find jobs, he has given tax relief to industry which will encourage it to expand its economy and thus create jobs.

It is regretted that our defence requirements are still so large that it was impossible for him to cut expenditures further in that field. The spending of over $1½ billion for defence this year prevented further tax reductions to our people.

I would ask him to give every consideration to those who are unable to find work. Until one has experienced being unable to find a job it is impossible really to appreciate the terrible problems of an unemployed person. Most of the hon. members in this house are old enough to have lived through the thirties. It was an exceptional person who, during those years, did not find himself hunting for a job; thus most of the members here understand the difficulties which have confronted too many of our citizens during this past winter. For them every effort must be made.

In Canada today we have another class of citizens requiring consideration; that is, our farmers. The time has come when great consideration must be given to their problems. I was pleased to hear the minister say that he was going to set up a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. I hope the agricultural representatives on this commission will be strong, able men, and sympathetic to our farmers. We have entered a trend in our economy with regard to agriculture which, unless reversed, will be disastrous. It is impossible to imagine that the economy of this country will remain at its present buoyant state if the prices of agricultural products continue to drop year after year, while the cost of every material and service which the farmer has to buy and use continues to increase.

The minister suggests, at page 2739 of Hansard, that he is referring to the tariff board for revision two sections of the tariff act which have become out of date. I realize that he has had a very short time to study tariff problems since he became minister, and I would hope that before another year rolls around he will have found more than two commodities on which existing tariffs have become obsolete. I would suggest to him that in the last nine years the tariffs on automobiles have nearly doubled in comparison with the tariffs on textiles.

May I explain, Mr. Speaker, just what I mean in this regard? Many of the tariffs on textiles are so many cents per pound or so many cents per yard. We all know that the weight of a pound or the length of a yard of textile has not increased, though the cost of production of that pound or yard certainly has. Thus this part of the tariff on textiles is the same today as it was 10 years ago. The tariff on automobiles and trucks, on the other hand, is based on the imported price, and everyone knows that this price has doubled. Therefore, by comparison, the tariff has doubled on automobiles and trucks, and should be cut in half in order to keep a proper balance in our economy. Let us reduce the tariff on automobiles and trucks so that it is the same amount in dollars per car or truck as it was in 1946.

There is another reason why I suggest that the automobile industry no longer requires the tariff which is protecting it. The new factories now built by the big three in Canada were planned to be the proper size to give maximum efficiency, and thus can operate just as cheaply as they can in the United States. To prove this point, let us take a look at the Ford operation at Oakville. All members will remember that Ford has just completed a very large and modern plant there, but it is not large enough to produce all the production it requires in Canada. Why did Ford not build a larger plant at Oakville to meet its production requirements? Because it would have been too large and unwieldy, and not the economical unit it is today. I am confident that the new Ford plant at Oakville can build automobiles cheaper than any plant they have in the United States. This industry is no longer small, and the efficiency of the mass production methods used here is equal to or better than that of any place in the world. This industry has outgrown the reasons for requiring such a high protective tariff.

I agree with the speeches which the hon. member for Halton (Miss Bennett) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) made regarding the automobile being a necessity. They made the argument that because the automobile was a necessity it should not be taxed. I agree with them. The minister has cut the tax; let us cut the tariff too, in order to benefit the citizens who require this form of transportation.

I do not agree with all the details of the speeches made by these two hon. members, but if I were criticizing their speeches I would criticize them for their sins of omission rather than their sins of commission. They pointed to the excise tax on automobiles and, Mr. Speaker, our minister has rightly decided to remove some of that excise tax. A further suggestion I would like to make to these two members is that they ask the government of Ontario—which represents the same party they belong to—to look into the tax which it imposes on automobiles and trucks in our province.

Maybe if I gave a few figures it would be interesting. The total national revenue from federal excise and sales tax on cars and trucks for the fiscal year 1952-53 was $152 million. For the 1952 calendar year it was $139 million. The total revenue taken by the province of Ontario in taxes on motor fuel, oils, and motor licences was $93 million during the year 1951-52, and in 1952-53 it was $104 million. With the reduction the minister has made in excise taxes this year, and with the increased traffic on the highways, no doubt the government of Ontario will collect more from the motorists of this province in taxes on the operation of automobiles and trucks than will our government in the excise and sales tax for the whole dominion. Before further cuts are made in our taxes on this essential industry, it would be nice to see the provinces give assistance in this regard.

While I am discussing the 5 per cent cut in excise taxes on automobiles I would like to ask the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, to confer with his colleague the Minister of National Revenue again and see if it would not be possible to refund the taxes which the dealers have paid on automobiles which they have not sold.

Let me explain the position of an automobile dealer selling new cars. The manufacturer asks the dealer to estimate for three months ahead how many cars he will require. Once this figure is given by the dealer the manufacturer proceeds to build and ship these cars, with no further regard to the dealer. Once the manufactured car is loaded on the transport of the factory it becomes the property of the dealer. At this point, under our present law, the dealer has to accept responsibility to pay all the taxes on it as well as the price of the automobile itself. So you can see that many dealers have hundreds of cars in stock on which the taxes have been paid.

Surely it would be very simple to obtain an inventory of all the automobiles the dealers had on hand on April 5. Every legitimate dealer will have this in his records. Any vehicle he had on his hands on April 5 is one which is not registered under the provincial law in a customer's name. On these vehicles he has paid the tax of $70 to $150, and will not be able to recover it. This will result in the loss of thousands of dollars to these dealers.

This is a serious situation, and I would suggest that as far as the government loss in making this recompense to the dealers is concerned, it would not be more than some three weeks' production of cars. In effect, the minister could just imagine that he had put his tax reduction into effect on March 15. That is all the difference it would make to his revenue. If this is not done it will upset the economy of the automobile business in a way which will cause repercussions for years to come.

Maybe the minister has been informed by the manufacturers that they have made restitution to the dealers. If he has received this information, then I want to tell him that it is not true. They have not made restitution, nor have they promised to make restitution to the hundreds of dealers who are complaining about this unfairness. If no restitution is made to these dealers by the manufacturers or by this government—and I have reasons for suggesting that perhaps the manufacturers should make restitution—it will create a serious situation before the next budget comes down.

You may wonder why I suggest that the manufacturers should make restitution to the dealers. They made increases in prices this year which were more than the amount of the tax reduction. Let us look at the price of an average automobile for just a moment, and I pick one of the low-priced automobiles at random, because the situation is similar in all cases. The standard suggested price for this automobile in December, 1954, was $2,110. In January, 1955, the price of the same model was increased by $84, to $2,194; and after the reduction in tax of $70, this same automobile sells for $2,124. Thus we see that without any increase in wages, material or taxes, the price went up a little bit more than the tax reduction, and the manufacturers could well afford to rebate to their dealers this tax reduction. But, Mr. Speaker, let there be no mistake about it; this has not been done in any broad sense.

I should now like to tell why I consider it is important that something be done to correct this mistake. When the taxes were increased on automobiles in 1940 the dealers had stocks of cars on hand, and government officials went out into the dealers' backyards and checked those automobiles so they could collect this tax. In other years when taxes on automobiles had been juggled this checking was not done. This situation was quite acceptable, because from 1940 until this year the stocks of new cars in dealers' hands were negligible. Taxes could be put on and taken off and it did not make any difference to the dealer, so the total amount of revenue gained or lost by the dealer and the government was negligible.

This year we reverted to the same situation as in 1940. The dealers had very large stocks, and so the total amount involved is important. In 1940 when the stock in the dealers' hands was large and the government wanted to collect—and properly so—the tax on those unsold automobiles, they turned loose in each city all the members of the national revenue department; customs men and everybody searched the dealers' yards, barns and house garages to find these automobiles on which taxes should be collected.

I do not disagree with that procedure. That was right and proper. Should we ever enter another war, it should be done again. If by reason of war we had to put a 25 per cent excise tax on the new cars in stock in the dealers' yards, certainly we should hunt them out and collect this revenue from the automobile dealers. Now, when this situation is reversed, I plead with the government to do the right thing and refund this uncollectable tax to the dealers.

If they do not do so the result will be disastrous. In many cases the loss will be such that it will cause many dealers to go broke. Those who do not go broke and are in business next year will stop ordering new cars before the budget is brought down. We shall have factories shut down and there will be serious unemployment during the winter months, when we should be encouraging industry to create employment. It will not matter whether or not the tax is changed; our government will have created fear in the minds of these dealers, and that fear will force them to have no new cars on hand, and as few used cars as possible, before the budget comes down.

We all agree—including the dealers who have been so badly hurt—that as soon as possible the remaining 10 per cent tax should be dropped. This means that every automobile dealer will lose thousands of dollars, in fact 10 per cent of the value of his stock in both new and used cars. I would ask the minister to discuss the situation with the Minister of National Revenue and reconsider their decision, so that fair play will be given to these dealers.

Since I am dealing with this industry I might offer one further suggestion to the government. This problem is unique to the province of Ontario, because this is the only province in which automobiles are manufactured. More people's lives are influenced by the motor industry here than in any other province. If we correct the wrong of this tax situation, then we should review the whole automobile industry's production.

At the present time we are told that the manufacturers are planning to produce 122 per cent of the country's needs. This is a terrible situation. Obviously by August 1 the manufacturers will realize that they must stop production, and we shall have unemployment in September, October and November. What a time of the year to create unemployment. The government is interested in the welfare of every business in this country because of the taxes we collect. It is necessary to see that nothing happens to our economy.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Finance to study carefully ways and means of preventing this cutthroat rat race of overproduction in the summer months. It is good for no one. At best it could benefit only the company which eventually succeeds in disposing of all its opposition. The resulting monopoly would not benefit the people of Canada.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that instead of having the unemployment which is going to be created by the automobile manufacturers in September, October and November of this year, our Minister of Trade and Commerce could suggest to these manufacturers that they change to their new models in August, a procedure which would create full employment during the winter months. Surely this would be much better than the conditions which will otherwise exist this year.

I wish now to deal for just a moment, Mr. Speaker, with the land assembly proposition in Guelph. This is one of those propositions where the city was supposed to ask the provincial government to assemble property on which houses could be built, one in which the city pays 7½ per cent and the province 17½ per cent, and under those conditions this government would pay 75 per cent. I wish to commend the Minister of Public Works for refusing to pay 75 per cent of the cost of this property known as the Hadati farm in Guelph. My reasons are that the city never asked for this land to be assembled, and were only told about it during a casual visit by Mr. Bunnell to the mayor's and city engineer's offices on February 10, 1955. The province, ignoring the city, had already arranged the purchase of this land the previous year, on December 6, 1954.

I find it necessary to tell why the city was not in favour. The trunk sewer which would normally serve the Hadati farm is already overloaded. To bring sewer and water services to the edge of this farm would cost the taxpayers of the city of Guelph between $150,000 and $200,000. That is the reason this farm was bought for such a low price, namely $17,500, in 1948, and that is the reason it was ridiculous to offer $107,000 for a piece of land which, as far as the city of Guelph is concerned, would cost the taxpayers $300,000 before it could be serviced. This amount does not include the building of roads, sidewalks or any of the services which would be supplied on the farm itself.

We should also remember that on December 6, 1954, when the provincial government contracted for this land, there were 200 lots owned by the government unsold in the Green Acres scheme, which has been available to anyone to buy since 1951, and these are much closer to the business area and the heart of the city.

I wish to thank the minister for saving the taxpayers of Guelph from such treatment by the provincial government. If this is a typical example of the way the money we turn over to the provincial government is used on land assembly projects, I would ask the minister to look at every deal with the greatest of care, because we should not allow the provincial government to squander the dominion government's money and take away the rights of municipalities while doing it.

I have been asked by several Jewish religious organizations to bring to the attention of the people of Canada the information that they resent Hon. Mr. Warrender suggesting that this deal was made with any Jewish religious organization. May I quote from the provincial Hansard of March 17, 1955. Mr. Wren asked these questions of Mr. Warrender:

> Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. minister three or four questions concerning a matter in the city of Guelph? Would the hon. minister say whether the government has purchased 165 acres in or adjacent to that city for a land assembly scheme?
> Hon. Mr. Warrender: No, but I shall give the hon. member some background on that. A few years ago, I believe it was in 1950, a Jewish organization, the name of which I cannot remember, it is religious, the Jewish youth centre organization—perhaps the hon. member from St. Andrew can help me—a Jewish youth centre organization for religious purposes came to us and asked if we were interested—that is, the partnership—in buying this acreage you speak of just outside the city of Guelph. At that time we said, "No", because their price, we thought, was prohibitive.

In connection with Mr. Warrender's remarks about this religious organization—this Jewish youth centre organization for religious purposes—the Jews have asked me to make it perfectly clear that no Jewish religious organization had anything to do with the Hadati farm or this deal, and they resent very much the suggestion by the minister that they had. I am told that the group who owned this farm were a business organization.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have cleared up this point, because I have found the people in Jewish religious organizations to be just as fine and honourable as the people in any other religious organizations. All good citizens can appreciate these fine people resenting their name being coupled with such a deal as this. I sincerely hope this statement will remove the injustice that has been done to these innocent people.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to thank the government and more particularly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), on behalf of the people of the constituency of Roberval, for the tax reduction announced in the last budget. Such a reduction, coming in a year in which no election is in prospect, is proof of the sincerity of the Canadian government towards the Canadian taxpayer, as well as of its desire to stimulate the economy of this country.

It can therefore be expected that the load the taxpayer has to bear will grow lighter and lighter and that the government's policy will continue to be progressive.

Still I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the plight of the dealers in cars and other motor vehicles, who put in large stocks of vehicles to meet the heavy springtime demand and are now incurring heavy losses.

Since dairying is the basic farming industry in my district and constituency, I wish to express to the government, and more particularly to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) my thanks, and those too of my farmer constituents, for heeding our urgent appeals and deciding to extend for a further year the support price of butter at 58 cents a pound. The farming people of my constituency are now going through a period of difficulties and are grateful to the government for maintaining this precious assistance. By looking after the farmers, the government is helping to maintain the economy of our country. The welfare of our farmers greatly affects that of all the other classes of society, because they are its most stable element.

The Catholic farmers' union of the Saguenay region has asked me to thank the government on its behalf for that decision which will be beneficial to them. They are particularly in favour of that price support program. So, as the representative of that county, among the four which constitute our region, where agriculture plays the greatest role, I am glad to convey those thanks to the government, and the right hon. Minister of Agriculture in particular, whose good will towards our farmers is very well known.

As a sequel to the speech I made in this house on March 30, 1954, and in which I urged the government to take the required steps to have Canada join the Pan-American Union, I wish to point out that during the Easter recess, on April 14 to be more exact, all the other countries on the American continent celebrated what has come to be known as the "Day of the Americas".

On that occasion, the parliaments of the 21 nations belonging to that organization take part in those popular festivities and proclaim their faith in the ideals which have made it possible to strengthen continental solidarity.

Since the far distant time when Simon Bolivar called together the Panama congress, in 1826, our continental neighbours have come a long way. After a number of conferences, they first set up the international bureau of American republics in 1890, then the Pan-American Union in 1910, and finally the Organization of American States in 1948, at the time of the historical Bogota conference.

It can be said that more than once those continental conferences and the peaceful work of the Pan-American Union have been used as tests and even as an inspiration for research and work to ensure the fellowship of man and peace among the nations of this continent.

Although Canada so far has held aloof officially from that great Pan-American movement, I think I should point out that she has often taken part in the proceedings of specialized agencies from the first medical conference held in Washington in 1893 up to the economic conference held in Rio de Janeiro in November 1954.

Canadian delegates also took part in the work of continental organizations, like the Pan-American health board, the geographical commission of the Pan-American institute for geography and history and the inter-American institute of statistics, which held its convention in our Canadian capital, here in Ottawa, in the fall of 1952.

For all these reasons and in the name of continental solidarity, I think it is fitting that Canadians join, at least in spirit, in this feeling of pacific co-operation, anticipating a closer association in the near future with the sister nations of the three Americas, when Canada will take amongst them the seat set aside for this country since the birth of the Pan-American movement.

Until now, the federal government has given a good example to the country's employers by generally paying its employees well. Yet, I might bring to the government's attention and more particularly to the attention of the post office authorities an anomaly concerning the salary paid to rural mail carriers and more particularly to those of the Roberval district.

At the present time, rural mail carriers in my country are paid an average of 20 cents a travelled mile. In view of the difficulties pertaining to that service, especially in winter and during the spring thaw, this rate is proving inadequate. Not enough consideration is given to the fact that in various districts in the province of Quebec heavy snowfalls block the roads and increase the difficulties of rural mail delivery to the point where rural mail carriers have to put in four or five hours more on the road than during the summer season. As a result, these men are unable to do other work and, moreover, have to spend more on vehicle repairs and maintenance and, at times, have to rent expensive snowmobiles when winter storms make the use of cars impracticable.

As a result of the present system, tenderers bid prices that are too low. This tends to breed carelessness on the part of many contractors and, sometimes, favours the hiring of incompetent people. Serious dutiful contractors become discouraged and give up their routes, with consequent necessary replacements, mistakes and lack of service. Localities in remote areas, the most poorly provided for, are precisely those with the greatest need for rural mail service; they are also those where contractors have the largest deficits and where service is poorest.

Following an investigation carried out in my constituency, where lumbering is of primary importance, may I be allowed to offer a few suggestions with regard to the government's wish to review unemployment insurance legislation.

To my mind the primary object of the act, at this time, should be to extend unemployment insurance benefits to as large a number of people as possible.

As far as workers in the lumber trade are concerned, it would be better if the slack season were considered to extend from May 1 to September 30 instead of April 1 to September 30. There is very little lumbering activity in April, and very little either on the farm. Driving operations are generally carried out between May 15 and July 15. Should 160 days instead of 180 be required, lumbermen could receive benefits during April, when their needs are particularly great and work very hard to find.

As far as farmers are concerned, I believe that the off-season should be extended from October 1 to April 30, rather than March 31, and that an inquiry should be made to ascertain whether they have worked in an insurable employment during the active season, rather than ask them to make the present declaration in order to find out if their annual income has exceeded $2 net per day, so as to decide if agriculture is their main occupation. The method in use at present makes it too easy to present false claims and calls for penalties of such a nature as to create a great deal of trouble for people from whom a strict and orderly accounting cannot be expected.

These changes would, I am sure, help extend the benefits of unemployment insurance to all classes of citizens, which would be a great boon to farmers and lumbermen in particular over whose welfare I am especially concerned.

Mr. Chairman, as a native of the Lake St. John district, whose inhabitants have been given the nickname "the blueberries"—one that I accept with pride—I deem it appropriate, today, to call the attention of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the acute problem raised by the marketing of that wild fruit which, though found elsewhere in the province of Quebec, on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, in the Abitibi and the Timiskaming regions for instance, seems to thrive particularly in my district and especially in my constituency.

Blueberry picking has given such a return in the past that it has been called "the blue manna". And Roberval county is the greatest producer of blueberries in this country, which is why I must pay special attention to that question.

Besides its economic value, blueberry picking has a sentimental aspect, having even inspired musings of the highest poetical level, such as are found in "Maria Chapdelaine" and in "Menaud—Maître-draveur".

My colleague from Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) having put on the order paper of the house a resolution dealing with the marketing of blueberries, I will only touch on that subject today. Besides the aforementioned districts in the province of Quebec, we see that the provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick and Newfoundland are all interested in blueberry picking, which means that this question is getting more important all the time.

As a rule, blueberries are picked in the woods or on crown lands which are not supposed to be tillable. The people all go out and pick them more or less at random, because blueberry fields vary so much from year to year, and prices fluctuate considerably.

Our farmers' and workers' families, especially the larger ones, derive from blueberry picking a revenue which often brings them security. In some cases a man will travel a hundred miles with his wife and eight children, to pick blueberries. That is an almost unique industry where a child is able to help increase his parents' revenue.

If I rise tonight, it is to urge upon the government the importance of that matter and attempt to arouse its interest in advance of the next picking season, which is likely to be next August and September.

I know this is mainly the responsibility of the provincial government, but I feel that joint legislation is called for.

As about 80 per cent of our blueberries are exported to the United States, I think the federal government, whose jurisdiction extends to interprovincial and international markets, will no doubt want to do its share.

In order to have an idea of the lack of stability on the blueberry market, I think I might well mention that, with regard to the crops of 1953 and 1954 in my district, each averaging about 10 million pounds, the price paid to the pickers was 20 cents a pound in 1953, and 10 cents in 1954. As to the demand, it remained more or less the same. It was good. This shows the lack of security of the pickers. It is due to several factors, some of which can be attributed to the pickers themselves, and others to the trade which is becoming less competitive from year to year, and lastly to the difficulties of marketing.

At Dolbeau, in my constituency, there is a blueberry freezing plant. That is the best method of packing this fruit for the market.

For the present, I shall ask but one thing from the Department of Agriculture: the establishment of a blueberry plant, under the supervision of horticulturists, under the jurisdiction of the federal experimental farm at Normandin, in my constituency. Pickers are taking an increasing interest in the growing of blueberries and as this crop is practically in its first phase, it is important that a special investigation be made on the spot. At Normandin, the soil is suitable for such an enterprise. I know that a similar experiment has been made at Tower hill in Charlotte county, New Brunswick, but since soil conditions and the consistency of the fruit are quite different, a similar experiment in the best Quebec blueberry growing district would be greatly beneficial I am sure to the people of the district who derive from blueberry picking between 2 and 2½ million dollars per year and who are anxious to increase their earnings. I know that such an undertaking would endow our horticulture with a fruit which, until now, has been picked in its wild state. Our people are anxious to see this undertaking carried out as soon as possible.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, those who have taken part in this debate and who have dealt objectively with the budget have proven fairly conclusively that it will not give very much material help to the average citizen of this country. The average Canadian citizen to whom I have reference is the one who provides the goods and services within our economy. I believe that fact will be amply proven to those who have made only a casual perusal of the budget address.

It is not my intention this evening, Mr. Speaker, to place once again on the record the many figures that have been mentioned in respect to the tax reductions. I shall leave these very revealing figures as they are now on the pages of Hansard. I repeat that the effectiveness of any budget must be viewed from the point of view of the contribution it makes to the over-all economy of this country. Now we have the general pattern. Certainly the budget falls far short of giving the stimulus that is needed, and is therefore not going to materially strengthen the general economy of the country.

This evening I should like to say something about the very keen disappointment that was felt by agricultural producers when they found that the budget contained nothing that was going to add to their prosperity in the coming year. They were anxiously waiting, hoping that the budget would contain a measure of recognition of that depressed industry. I say that because during the past five years agriculture has undergone a very difficult period, especially in the last year. The budget contains little or nothing for the agricultural producers, in spite of the fact that the other evening the minister told us there was to be a tariff reduction on the purchase of automatic bird-scaring machines. I am sure many farmers were delirious with joy when they heard that announcement.

Before saying anything further about agriculture I should like to take this opportunity, because of the latitude given hon. members in this debate, to say something about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. At the outset I should like to say categorically that I am certainly not opposed to, nor am I critical of, the act as such, but I believe that the past year's experience in parts of western Canada where the act applies indicates the need for more serious thought in order that the act may be brought up to date.

No legislation can long remain effective unless fundamental changes are made in it during changing times and changing conditions. I believe that no industry has changed more in the last 15 or 20 years than has the agricultural industry. I believe the great change and the great progress we have made over the past few years have come about because of the courage and the determination of the farmers themselves, rather than from any measure of help they have been given in order to permit them to make a decent return on their investment, let alone a profit commensurate with their investment and their labour.

Agriculture is possibly our most vulnerable industry because of the fluctuations in prices and costs with which farmers are confronted. In respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, I have wondered during the past two or three years why no fundamental amendments have been made to it. I have talked to a great many farmers; I have had a great many letters from farmers suggesting that the benefits they receive under the act are limited to the point where they are of little assistance to them. It costs more to produce wheat today than ever before. That, of course, was the thinking that prompted this group during last session to introduce a measure which, had it passed, would have increased the benefits to the farmers.

I suggest that the government give some consideration to the proposal. Before the farmers would entirely agree to pay a greater deduction to the fund as their share, provided, of course, that the government paid a proportional share; before they would condescend to make that increase in the deduction in order to get further benefits, two or three amendments would have to be made to the act.

I suggest to the minister that in calculating the basis of eligibility he should take into consideration the dollar value of wheat rather than the bushel basis, as now is the case. In many areas of western Canada, especially in the northern areas, it is not possible to grow quality wheat. That is not altogether owing to climatic conditions; it is in large part owing to soil conditions. A bushel of No. 1 northern is worth a great deal more than No. 3, 4 or 5, yet in northern areas of the western provinces, owing to soil conditions, farmers are not able to grow No. 1 northern and No. 2 northern wheat. Therefore they get a smaller return per bushel than does the farmer who is able to grow high quality wheat in the so-called prairie wheat belt of western Canada. There is another disparity which could be carried even farther.

In the northern area, in spite of the fact that farmers there cannot grow quality wheat, they are confronted with a much higher cost of production. It is probably true that we grow more bushels per acre because of our more intensive agricultural methods. By the same token, we pay more into the fund; therefore we are confronted with two conditions. We are confronted with a poor quality product. We take lower prices. On the other hand, we are confronted with higher production costs.

These two conditions combined place us in a much poorer position than, for instance, the farmer on the Regina plains, but we both pay the same amount per bushel into the fund. I suggest to the minister that he take that into consideration when he is contemplating amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I am sure if those recommendations were taken into consideration, farmers would be quite willing to make greater contribution to the fund in order to get an increased benefit from it, provided the government increased its contribution proportionally.

I should like to refer to a few other aspects of our agricultural industry. We have heard figures quoted over the past two, three or four years showing that agricultural income has fallen in the gross by 20 per cent and in the net by 30 per cent. We are bombarded on all sides with a great many figures one way and the other, from various sources.

When we consider these figures I think it is significant that we find that last year net farm income in this country fell by $300 million. The latest authoritative estimates we have for the period 1951-54 indicate that during that time net income has fallen by some 50 per cent. In 1951 the net income of Canadian agriculture amounted to $2,154 million, while the latest estimates from the best sources indicate that for 1954 the net farm income will reach only some $1,200 million, down almost a billion dollars.

These figures are alarming, and until our agricultural industry can return to some measure of prosperity we can look in vain for a solution to our unemployment problem and the economic depression which confronts Canada today. I say that without any hesitation whatsoever. Authorities tell us that three-quarters of the drop in the gross national product last year was due largely to the severe losses suffered by agriculture. Those losses were reflected in retail sales across the country. During the six months' period from May to October retail sales fell by $129 million.

This three-quarters of the drop in our gross national product was not due to the poor wheat crop or because of the cut-back in agricultural production; it was due in its entirety to falling prices and lost markets. Is it any wonder that producers are critical and somewhat annoyed when government authorities are telling all and sundry that agriculture in this country is fairly bursting at the seams?

What must be done to stabilize this agricultural industry which is so important to the economy of this country? Possibly that question could be best answered by asking another question. What is it that our agricultural producers want? I should like to answer that question by saying that the agricultural producers of this country want nothing less than that they should be able to enjoy a standard of living equal to that enjoyed by non-agricultural workers.

What is the position? We find that in 1953 the average income of a farmer in Canada was $2,247. In the same period we find that the net income of non-agricultural workers averaged $3,122, almost $1,000 more. When I quote those figures I am not suggesting that non-agricultural workers should get less, but I do suggest that the agricultural producer is getting too little.

In the face of the complexities of markets and prices, what action should this government take in order to grapple realistically with this knotty problem? I believe that a completely new approach is needed. I suggest to the government that representatives of the farm organizations be given an invitation to sit permanently in Ottawa in an advisory capacity to the Department of Agriculture rather than to have, as we now have, an army of economic experts and oak-desk farmers attempting to advise the government. I am certainly not suggesting that all these economic experts should be eliminated, but I do suggest that you must have more than an academic realization of agricultural problems. I think if these two organizations were working together we would have much better results than we are getting at the moment.

Over the past year we have heard a great deal about efficient production from the so-called economic experts in the Department of Agriculture. Farmers are told by these people that they must pattern their operations on the modern, streamlined industrial machine methods, and they are never hesitant in holding up the automotive industry as a paragon of efficiency. They say that every farmer must become an efficiency expert.

In some respects I suppose that is true, but I wonder if it is not overdone. I wonder how efficient the automotive industry would be if someone else set the price for cars. I question seriously whether the millions of dollars spent in fancy advertising and other gadgets add much to the efficiency even of the automobile industry. I believe they are getting much of their so-called efficiency at the expense of the dealer.

I believe that farmers have really tried to achieve efficiency. They have tried all sorts of strategic moves in order to improve their standard of living. But in spite of the fact that they have bought larger farms; in spite of the fact that they have bought bigger and better machinery; in spite of the fact that they have improved their techniques, their economic position is slowly and surely deteriorating. This is due to a simple and elementary fact: the farmer has absolutely no control over prices or costs.

We need a new approach to the problem. I certainly endorse what was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Yorkton. I believe we must get back to what he termed the family-sized farm. Many people in this country fail to realize that to hundreds of thousands of farmers in this country farming is something more than just an economic entity to be exploited in order to make a fast buck. To hundreds of thousands of farmers in this country agriculture is a way of life, and they believe that way of life can best be experienced on the basis of the family farm.

However, under present agricultural policies it is impossible to return to that type of farming, in western Canada in particular. No farmer would consider such a thing, because it would be economically unrealistic. Operating costs coupled with present day living costs would rule it out. Yet if we are to prevent western Canada becoming either a desert of wheat, which is certainly most undesirable, or a series of vast syndicated farming enterprises, which is equally undesirable, we must consider the alternative.

We can return to the sensible, diversified family type of farm if we guarantee to the producer a decent standard of living. Support prices as presently administered are not going to do the job. In spite of the fact that over the years the government has maintained that support prices were underpinning our agricultural industry, I can think of no other single piece of farm legislation that has so completely kicked the pins out from under agriculture than has the Agriculture Prices Support Act.

I am not going to say anything about foot-and-mouth disease, which was a national disaster and would have been taken care of as such, but during the past 10 years only $13,500,000 has been used to support agricultural products at minimum levels, and in most instances that support was not at the producer but rather at the processor level. So I would advocate a parity prices system on major farm commodities.

I would like to support the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on their proposal for parity prices. While I am not in agreement with flexible support prices—because I believe in full production, I could hardly go along with the principle of flexible supports—I think they are to be congratulated on accepting the parity concept as a principle. I can see nothing wrong with the 1925-29 base which they propose as a fair period for calculating parity, with possibly a few adjustments.

While I do not like flexible parity, I would not go so far as to suggest that every major commodity be supported at 100 per cent of parity at all times. I realize that there are some which at times might be above and at other times might be below parity. But I suggest that a diversified agriculture and the soil conservation which inevitably goes hand in hand with such a program can best be accomplished on a family type farm. I suggest, too, that most farmers would gladly diversify if their initial investment were protected by a forward price, based on parity, which would guarantee them an average return for the total number of products grown, which in the aggregate would represent parity.

Earlier I mentioned the loss of markets, both domestic and foreign. I suggest that there is a tremendous market for agricultural products right here in Canada, and I think we should exploit those possibilities. The government admit that they are unable to cope with unemployment. Certainly they are not prepared to enter into any large scale public investment program, but they are suggesting that they are prepared to provide a share of relief for the unemployed.

If the government are going to entertain such an idea as that, if they are going to give no consideration to a public investment program, and if the best they can do is to provide relief, I say that 600,000 unemployed in this country can consume a tremendous amount of the food that is grown in this country, and it should be made available to them. I would suggest also that food be made available at no cost to every Indian reservation in the Dominion of Canada. I would also suggest that food be made available at no cost to every welfare institution in this country, except possibly distribution costs.

What about the proposition of disposing of a tremendous amount of food in a school lunch program throughout this country? I am sure there are tens of thousands of children going to school in this country who are not getting enough milk, who are not getting enough butter, and who are not eating enough eggs. These are things which we now have in surplus. I believe we could use these surpluses, and when the surpluses have gone let us continue to provide that food for those children.

Then I suggest, if there is anything left, that the food be sold to underdeveloped countries of the world, with the stipulation that it be used in a similar school lunch program in those countries. I believe that illiteracy is the greatest stumbling block to progress in these underdeveloped areas of the world. Children attend school only for a very short time, if at all. I am told on the very best of authority that these children marry at the age of 12 or 14.

I also believe that the only people who are going to solve the economic problems confronting them in their own countries, the only people who are going to rebuild the economies of those countries, are the people who live in them. I believe we can help them do it by instituting a school lunch program. Instead of these children marrying when they are 12 and 14 and reproducing in turn the same kind of illiterate people, I believe that the result of a school lunch program would be that they would attend school until they were possibly 16 or 18. They would attend school in order to get food; they could get it no other way. In this way they would obtain the technical skills that are so necessary if they are going to rebuild their economy.

Canada, I believe, could accept for that food the currency of the country in which it was sold. We should not take the currency out of that country, but we should invest it there to build up their economic machine, and certainly we would have to provide the technical people to operate this machine for some time. But as these children came out of school at 18 years of age with the technical skills acquired by virtue of this school lunch program, they then would be able to take over the operation and management of those manufacturing concerns which our reinvested money would have provided by that time.

Such a program, I believe, is sound, and is one that would not only provide a tremendous market at the present time and a greater market for agricultural products in the future, but it is a humanitarian forward step which we should take. It has great possibilities for future trade and greater possibilities, I submit, for the peace of the world.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the presentation of the budget is an event of major importance, and one of intense interest to all Canadians both in and out of parliament, because we are all anxious to have a general picture of the nation's economy during the year under review, and also to get some idea of what it will probably be like in the year that lies ahead.

To help us understand the forces that are at work and their effect on our economy, the budget provides us with a breakdown of receipts and expenditures during the fiscal year just ended and a corresponding statement of the receipts and expenditures that are expected during the year that has just begun. In addition we are all interested in knowing what taxation policy the government intends to follow and what changes in taxes and tariffs are proposed.

As the budget under debate is the first the Minister of Finance has brought down since his assumption of office, I should like to congratulate him on the clear and concise manner in which he presented this information in his budget speech. The fact that his first budget has been so well received throughout the country must be a source of great satisfaction and encouragement to the minister. We are all grateful to him for the reductions in income tax and in corporation taxes, and it is particularly gratifying to me that income tax cuts have been spread in such a way as to benefit practically all Canadian taxpayers.

It is expected that the reductions in sales and excise taxes and tariffs will stimulate trade, and that the reduction in corporation tax will put Canadian manufacturers in a better position to meet foreign competition and enable them to invest more money in improved machinery and methods. It is hoped that the over-all result will be an upswing in the Canadian economy which will increase the number of jobs and help to solve the unemployment problem, which is still of serious proportions.

In my opinion this budget can best be described as an experimental budget, but it is also one that is both courageous and economically sound. The two main criticisms of the budget made by the opposition are, first, that the tax concessions are not big enough to be of much real help to Canadian business and, second, that it does not give enough tax relief to the little man.

The government's answer to the first criticism is that the decrease in corporation taxes is sufficiently large to establish a trend. The government cannot solve the nation's problems all by itself. All the government can do is set up as favourable an economic climate as possible, having regard to all the factors concerned. This is what the present budget is designed to do.

Our national problems cannot be solved unless Canadian business, labour and the general public take advantage of this better economic climate and co-operate with government in an effort to promote the general interests and economic welfare of the nation. The present tax concessions are plenty big enough to discover to what extent such co-operation will be forthcoming, yet still small enough to prevent any serious harm to the nation's economy should it be withheld.

The answer to the second criticism is that the bulk of our revenue from personal income tax is collected from people earning less than $5,000 per year. This group represents 85 per cent of all Canadian taxpayers. There are over 3 million taxpayers in Canada, but only 60,000 of them earn more than $10,000 per year. Hence there are really very few rich people in Canada.

Some people advocate that the government should get its revenue by soaking the rich. This is an extremely foolish idea, because there are not enough rich people to soak. If the government took every cent earned by the 60,000 taxpayers with incomes of over $10,000 per year, they would still get only $1 billion. The other $3½ billion would have to come from those who are not rich, those who are earning less than $10,000 per year.

Opinion on the deficit has been divided. Some feel that the deficit should have been bigger, while others feel that in a time of relative prosperity there should be no deficit at all. All that goes to show is that no matter what you do, you can never hope to please everybody.

As one whose constituents are nearly all fishermen, I should like to thank the minister also for removing the duty on fishing vessels over 100 feet long, and for the reduction of duty on certain equipment used in the manufacture of fish meal and in the precooking of processed fish. This assistance to the fishing industry will be welcomed by fishermen and operators alike. At the same time I regret that the minister could not find it possible to remove the sales tax on fuel oil used by all fishing vessels. The removal of this tax would help considerably to lower the cost of fish production, and I trust the minister will keep it in mind for further consideration when the next budget is being prepared.

I should also like to commend the minister on his proposal to set up a royal commission to study those factors which are likely to exert a major influence on our economy in the next decade or two and to try to determine, as far as possible, what the results of those influences are likely to be. In a young country like Canada, with great untapped natural resources and a vigorously expanding economy, such a periodic study is vitally necessary in order that government policy may be adjusted to permit maximum advantage to be taken of all those influences that are favourable to our economy and to help minimize the effects of those influences that are unfavourable. It seems to me that the present time is most appropriate for such a study, now that our economy has paused to level off and consolidate itself before starting again on its upward trend.

It is all the more appropriate in view of the fact that large-scale use of electronic brains and other forms of automation will soon be introduced into our factories, and the time is not far off when atomic energy will be available to industry on a competitive basis with power from other sources. The effect of these two forms of scientific progress is not easy to foresee but we can be sure that it will be far-reaching.

In the past, improved manufacturing processes, cheaper production methods and greater output have always resulted in creating more jobs than were destroyed. This may very well hold true for the future. Increased use of automation will certainly result in an expansion of all phases of the electronics industry, with an increased demand for highly-trained technicians. Cheaper cars will make them available to more people, and it may well be that the extra jobs created in connection with repairs, maintenance and servicing will more than offset the reduction of jobs in the factories.

On the other hand, some temporary displacement of labour may result, whereby workers no longer required in factories would have to be retrained for jobs created elsewhere. The mobility of labour is already an acute problem, since people out of work in one place have become so immobilized that they are not in a position to accept jobs that are available in another community.

It is also an unfortunate fact that the primary producer has never benefited directly from technological advances to the same extent as those who are engaged in secondary industry. This is mainly because the bulk of scientific invention is related to the secondary industries. The workers employed directly in those industries, being more strongly organized, have by reason of those advantages been in a better position to secure for themselves a larger share of the increased wealth which science has made possible. Since automation and atomic energy are also likely to find a much wider application in the secondary than in the primary industries, the advent of those two new factors may very well increase the disadvantages under which primary producers now suffer.

It should be remembered that without the primary producer there could be no worthwhile secondary industry at all. Furthermore, the factory worker would not be able to work in the large factory and engage in mass production methods unless the farmer and the fisherman worked to provide him with food to keep him alive. The primary producer is, therefore, entitled to a much fairer share than he has hitherto received of the increased wealth which technological progress in the secondary industries makes possible. I hope, therefore, that the commission will examine this problem and try to determine how the position of the primary producer can be improved.

Another question of major importance is the extent of government responsibility in finding a solution to the economic problems of our nation. This is a point upon which there seems to be a great deal of confused thinking. I hope it will therefore be included in the commission's agenda. Since my election to parliament six years ago I have become increasingly alarmed at the extent to which the government is being pressured to accept all responsibility for the political, economic and social welfare of our nation.

A few days ago a conference of provincial premiers was held here in Ottawa. Like most hon. members, whenever I had a spare moment between committees and appointments I sat in on that conference and listened to what the provincial premiers had to say. The fact that struck me most forcibly at that conference was that all the briefs I heard presented were based on the premise that such things as unemployment, housing, health insurance, trade, marketing, industrial income, individual income and general prosperity were primarily the responsibility of government. The main problem to be settled seemed to be how this responsibility should be divided between governments at the provincial and federal level.

I do not share that view at all, Mr. Speaker. I think it is a false premise. We all know that it is impossible for governments alone to provide these things. No matter how earnestly and sincerely they strive or to what degree they co-operate, the fact still remains that the provision of these things lies largely outside the scope and power of governments altogether. I believe the responsibility for these matters belongs primarily to free enterprise and the role of government is a secondary one, namely to provide the kind of economic climate necessary to enable free enterprise to discharge its responsibilities to the nation. I am a firm believer in free enterprise which, according to my definition, includes labour as well as management.

In my opinion the economic problems of the nation should first be studied by a conference of leading industrialists, top management and the representatives of labour. After their proposals have been drawn up, then they should be studied by a conference of the federal and provincial governments to determine how they can best co-operate to provide the maximum assistance to enable free enterprise to carry out its responsibilities.

I know this will sound very naïve to my socialist friends, because socialism is based on the assumption that human nature cannot change. They therefore contend that capitalists are greedy and selfish; that they are motivated by self-interest; that they will never accept their responsibilities to the nation, and for that reason capitalism should be replaced or at least controlled. On the basis of the same assumption the communists go a step farther and say that capitalists should be destroyed altogether.

I happen to know that human nature can change. In many parts of the world, in Europe, in India, in the United States and here in Canada, there is abundant evidence that even industrialists and capitalists can change and accept responsibility for the needs of their employees and the needs of the nation. Right here in Ottawa there lives a businessman who is one of the pioneers in this new dimension of thinking for business and labour. He is a baker, and he accepts responsibility for providing the nation with good, nourishing bread at the lowest possible price commensurate with high quality. As an employer he accepts the responsibility of caring for the needs of his employees. In co-operation with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation by giving his employees the benefits of the purchasing power of his firm and the services of his accounting department, he thus enabled them to become owners of high quality houses at a greatly reduced cost. As a result of this experiment the city of Ottawa has enlisted his services to provide low-rental housing for citizens in the low income brackets.

This businessman has also instituted a plan of health insurance which includes not only his employees but their whole families. Thus he has removed the two greatest fears that haunt the ordinary worker, namely the fear of inadequate shelter and the fear of sickness. As a manager his business is run on a democratic basis by a management committee. Before any new policy is initiated it is hammered out with the heads of each department on the basis of what is right, and not who is right.

The businessman to whom I have been referring is Mr. Cecil Morrison of the Morrison-Lamothe Bakery, Ottawa. If any hon. members are interested, I am sure Mr. Morrison would be only too glad to have them visit his bakery and get firsthand information about the things I have just mentioned. Speaking to a group of friends in Los Angeles a few days ago Mr. Morrison had this to say:

> Marian Anderson at Palm Springs said, "It is now becoming normal for artists of the theatre no longer to glamorize the problem but to dramatize the answer and live it."
> It is the same with business and industry. We must get a whole new conception of our function and basic motives where it becomes normal for business to emphasize its ideology and live it by putting the service to the public, the care of the workers and the best interests of the nation first, with profits only the by-product. With this conception business and industry would soon become the greatest ideological force in the nation—the very hope for the future. Because where governments deal in millions industry deals in billions.
> The philosophy of Moral Rearmament is that the wealth and the work of the world are available for all and the exploitation of none. Dr. Frank Buchman says, "There is enough in the world for everyone's need but not for everyone's greed and if everyone cares enough and everyone shares enough everyone will have enough."

Mr. Morrison went on to say:

> We plan for expansion and new prosperity but we live in fear of depression and unemployment. We try to meet the united plan and passion of alien ideologies with talk and lip service to high ideals but with a last resort to strikes, lockouts and force. Then we hope to live as we always did, selfishly, comfortably and undisturbed.
> The great hope for industry lies in this great principle of changing and uniting on the level of an answering ideology as found in Moral Rearmament.
>
> Technology, manufacturing efficiency and organization are of little lasting value unless they are used for the good of humanity and not for the benefit of the few. Our leaders in industry and labour must be prepared to make industry strong morally and spiritually and to take our rightful place in the responsibility for the solution of national and world problems.

He goes on to say:

> If we could bring the guidance of God's holy spirit and the four absolute standards as the normal for industry we would learn how to work to live instead of only living to work and the busy, busy, busy businessman would become the statesman of the future and the architect of the atomic age instead of a slave to his own selfishness.
> With this spirit instead of being the enemy and the target of attack for communism or socialism, industrialists will become a challenge and an inspiration. We businessmen can become the heralds of the new world order, inspiring and encouraging cabinets and parliaments to make government of the people by the people a reality first in our own nation, then in every nation in the world.

This, then, is the pattern of the free enterprise of the future, because freedom of enterprise is bound up with the freedom of the individual, and neither can remain free unless each accepts the full measure of responsibility.

Speaking at the federal-provincial conference a few days ago Hon. J. R. Smallwood, premier of Newfoundland, posed the problem of the development of Canada's extremities, with particular reference to the underdevelopment of the Atlantic provinces. He admitted that he did not know the answer, but whatever it was it would have to be something big, something far bigger than anything ever yet experienced in our nation's history.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the answer is free and responsible enterprise working out the vision described by Mr. Morrison to his friends in Los Angeles; and I have sufficient faith in human nature to believe that Canadian enterprise will rise to the challenge.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate because it affords me the opportunity of bringing to the attention of the house once again the desirability of the construction of the Chignecto canal. To present the arguments for the Chignecto canal I must go back into the history and economic development of New Brunswick.

My province has not progressed since confederation to the same extent as other provinces in Canada. This central government at Ottawa has had about 80 years of experience in administering the affairs of the nation, and has done remarkably well. But a comparison of figures showing population, industrial development and wealth indicates that the central provinces have gained most by the institution of the central government.

Some 80 years before this central government was established the legislature of New Brunswick was meeting in Saint John, New Brunswick; and it appears from the records that we in New Brunswick from that time—1784—until confederation administered the affairs of New Brunswick very well. It is a fact that at the time of confederation New Brunswick stood second from the top in terms of employment in industry and opportunities for labour, and that the wages paid were high.

When New Brunswick was convinced that confederation was best for all of Canada, it became part of the dominion. About the same time that the legislature of New Brunswick first met in Saint John, the boundaries of that province were being drawn over in Europe. I do not believe it was intentional; I believe it was because of ignorance of the geography of the eastern part of Canada that the boundaries of New Brunswick were drawn so that we had a corridor thrust between the maritime provinces and the rest of Canada, which makes it appear that either geographically we are in the wrong country, or that the state of Maine should belong to Canada.

It is also a fact that previous to confederation most of the trade in the maritimes, and especially in New Brunswick, was with the New England states. After confederation the industries of New Brunswick suffered a decline. Recently in this house there was a discussion on seasonal or cyclical unemployment, but a comparison of figures shows that in New Brunswick we can talk of century unemployment. In 1875 one out of every five industrial workers in Canada was employed in the province of New Brunswick. In 1946 this figure had dropped to one out of 17. In 1871 the industrial wages paid in that province were the highest of any province. By 1946 industrial wages in New Brunswick were the second lowest of any province of Canada. For example, in 1871 the industrial wages paid in Ontario were less than those paid in New Brunswick. By 1946 Ontario's wages were three times as high as ours.

In bringing a project to the attention of parliament it is somewhat difficult for us from New Brunswick to exert the influence in this house that we exerted at that time. At one time we had 15 members of parliament from New Brunswick, and the representation from all the country was much smaller than it is today. Now we have only 10 members in a much larger house. It has been said in this house that the maritime provinces have been exporting people and brains. Perhaps that is why we have not such good representation as we had at the time of confederation. Of course, this could be an accident of settlement. Canada was settled in the east. The University of New Brunswick was established in 1800. In New Brunswick we were turning out scholars before most of the western provinces had legislatures.

An hon. Member: Many of them have come west.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I understand they have done well there.

The Chignecto canal would afford a sheltered route from the great cities of Canada to the seaboard states of the United States. In time of war this would be valuable as a defence measure. I feel that if the Chignecto canal had been constructed before the second world war the saving in costs of assembling convoys would have paid for its construction in less than a month. It has been pointed out to me that all parts of the maritimes might not want the canal. That is understandable. I could not expect the great winter port of Halifax to be enthusiastic about the project, but the canal should be viewed as a national project. There was a time when it was a maritime project, but now it should be viewed as a continuation of the St. Lawrence seaway and as a national project. The majority of the people in the maritimes, and especially in New Brunswick, are very much in favour of the construction of the Chignecto canal.

At this point I might say that one of the greatest supporters of the Chignecto canal has been the city of Saint John, New Brunswick. A member of the legislature from Albert has spoken in support of it at Fredericton. Just the other day in this house the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) called upon other hon. members from New Brunswick to support a project that he was supporting. I feel that this is also a time for him to speak up in support of the Chignecto canal. I do not mean that I am debunking the value of the Beechwood project in New Brunswick. When the hon. member for Saint John-Albert challenges me to speak on something that will be of benefit to New Brunswick it is like challenging me to eat my dinner. I do not have to be asked to do that. I am in favour of anything that is of benefit to the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is now ten o'clock.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Murphy (Westmorland) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, when we tried to decide on the most expeditious manner of disposing of this debate, hon. members opposite suggested we might continue it throughout this week if necessary. I made it known, sir, that it was not possible for me to be here tomorrow. Nevertheless it was decided that the debate might go forward, and should there be a vote on it tomorrow in any form this is to notify you that I shall not be able to participate in it.

Mr. Knowles: How would you vote?

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 3, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FREIGHT RATES

INTERIM REPORT OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION ON EQUALIZATION

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies in English and in French of the interim report of the board of transport commissioners on the equalization of freight rates.

This report is a summary account of what the board has done up to the present in the matter of the equalization of freight rates. Technical details of the class rate equalization have been omitted from this report, but will be found in the board's judgment and order dated March 1, 1954, and the subsequent notes and reasons for judgment dated February 28, 1955.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED FREE DISTRIBUTION OF LITERATURE BY SOVIET REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Is he aware that literature is being distributed, free, by Soviet representatives to members of parliament bringing very forcibly to the attention of the members the Soviet side of the story—which is incorrect—on matters pertaining to world affairs? If he is aware, has the Prime Minister read the document in question?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am not even aware that the document has been received in my office, and I am not aware that it has been received by others, so I cannot give the hon. member any information about it.

Mr. Ferguson: I will be very glad to see that the Prime Minister receives the document, which is marked, very distinctly, "free".

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED THEFT FROM OFFICE IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Acting Postmaster General. Is he in a position to give a statement to the house regarding the theft of around $7,000 from a downtown post office of Quebec city during the last week end?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): The office has reported just recently that their officials and the city police have full details of the robbery. City police and officers of the department are making an investigation.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PULPWOOD—QUESTION AS TO SCOPE OF INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Could the minister tell us whether the inquiry by the combines investigation branch into the buying of pulpwood and into prices paid for pulpwood, to farmers and settlers, will be extended beyond the Gatineau district of the province of Quebec, in respect of which district the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) originally raised his complaint?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask the question he has just asked. In fairness to the parties involved in an inquiry, and also in the interests of the inquiry itself, it is not the general practice to make statements about an inquiry unless and until a report is made and published. On March 4, therefore, I said in reply to a question by the member for Charlevoix (Mr. Maltais) that it would be impossible to anticipate the districts throughout which the inquiry would extend; and indeed might be detrimental to the inquiry to try to do so.

For these reasons, I can only reply now to the member for Bonaventure that the inquiry will be extended as widely as the information received by the combines branch justifies.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISTANT EARLY WARNING SCREEN—SOVIET BOMBING TECHNIQUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister comment on this morning's radio report that the Soviet air force has developed a new bombing technique that will render the proposed distant early warning line ineffective. In view of this report, is the government reconsidering its participation in the construction of the D.E.W. line?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of his question, but since I did not hear the radio report to which he has alluded I cannot make any comment.

INDUSTRIAL STATUS OF WOMEN

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AT PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister inform the house whether the policy of the government has changed to conform with the support given by the director of the women's bureau to the principle of equal pay for equal work, as reported in the local press last week end? If so, does the minister propose to bring down appropriate legislation during this session?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the press report to which my hon. friend refers.

[Later:]

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up my previous questions to the Minister of Labour now that he has had an opportunity of perusing the article to which I referred. Would he answer my former questions: first, is the principle of equal pay for equal work now the policy of the government and, second, when may we expect legislation?

Mr. Gregg: I thank the hon. member for sending me the clipping, which I have now read. The head of the women's bureau was expressing her own opinion in a discussion carried on at a women's convention. If the government changes its position with regard to this matter an announcement will be made if and when a decision is arrived at.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDO-CHINA—REPORTED INABILITY OF TRUCE COMMISSION TO OPERATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Last Friday the hon. member for Prince Albert asked a question concerning freedom of movement in North Viet Nam, a matter which has aroused very considerable interest throughout the country, and I should like to make a statement on it now, Mr. Speaker.

The situation with respect to freedom of movement for refugees from Viet Nam, which was provided for under article 14(d) of the armistice agreement, is not satisfactory, nor does the international supervisory commission regard it as so; certainly the Canadian member on that commission does not.

The commission announced early in February last that it had found that the procedure to ensure this movement by the issue of travel permits was cumbrous and complicated, and that fears current among the population in North Viet Nam had tended to make them reluctant to apply to the authorities for such permits. Action was taken by the commission which it was hoped would facilitate the proper and more effective implementation of this part of the agreement. However, reports to the effect that people in North Viet Nam were still being prevented from exercising their rights of freedom of movement have persisted. Therefore the international commission recently sent three further mobile teams, on each of which of course there was a Canadian, to make a special survey of those areas in North Viet Nam concerning which complaints had been made. On the basis of the reports of this survey, the commission is now determining what further action is necessary.

There are, Mr. Speaker, of course, limitations on the effectiveness of international inspection by the commission in this and in other matters. Some of these limitations are inherent in the cease-fire agreement itself. It reflects the fact that the commission is not a supra-national body, that it does not have any executive responsibilities with respect to the carrying out of the agreement and that its inspection teams do not in any sense constitute international police detachments. The commission can only operate with the effective co-operation of the parties to the agreement and it does not always receive that co-operation, especially in this question of freedom of movement, from the communist government in North Viet Nam, and that is the main reason why in this matter the results have been disappointing, to say the least.

I would not wish anyone to think that our representatives on the international commission for Viet Nam are satisfied with the way the freedom of movement provisions of the armistice agreement are being carried out. They are not satisfied, and the government fully shares that dissatisfaction. Our views have been stated very clearly in the international commission in Viet Nam, and have, I think, had some effect on the decisions of the commission.

If one of the parties to the agreement is evading its clear obligations and responsibilities with respect to the freedom of movement for civilians, it is not going unnoticed by our representative on the commission or by the government. But this is not a situation, I suggest, which will be solved merely by letting off steam. We are convinced that in order to ensure that the provisions of the agreement are carried out to the greatest degree possible in the circumstances, we must continue to work through our representative on the commission in the same manner as we have done over the last eight months, pressing for better performance in every way possible and exposing violations when they can be detected. That still seems to us to be the most likely method of ensuring that the greatest possible number of people who wish to do so can leave North Viet Nam for the south.

There have been suggestions in some quarters that Canada might withdraw from the commission as a gesture of protest about the way the commission has been prevented from correcting the situation with respect to freedom of movement. Such a move would, however, prejudice also the fulfilment of the main military provisions of the agreement, thus creating new tensions and possibly jeopardizing the maintenance of peace, not only in Viet Nam but also in the neighbouring countries of Laos and Cambodia. Nor would our withdrawal be of any assistance whatsoever to those in North Viet Nam who want to leave. Indeed, it might eliminate any remaining hope that their lot might be alleviated. We must, therefore, keep our sense of perspective in this matter, but without condoning or forgetting some of the terrible things that are being done.

A question was asked also by the hon. member for Prince Albert the other day as to the possibility that the time for freedom of movement for refugees might be extended beyond the terminal date, which is May 18, I think. The commission is actively concerned with finding ways and means of ensuring that this provision of the cease-fire agreement is properly implemented, and it will, I am sure, consider the possibility of an extension, if necessary; but any extension of the period would require the concurrence of both parties to the cease-fire agreement, whose full co-operation would be required if an extension were to provide a real solution to the problem.

I tabled today, Mr. Speaker, copies of the first interim reports of the commission for Viet Nam and the second interim report. But I should like to point out now and emphasize that the reports of the commission were in each case prepared by the commission as a whole, including the Polish and Indian members as well as the Canadian representative. It may be that these reports, therefore, do not reflect entirely our dissatisfaction with the freedom of movement position.

I understand that the Viet Nam commission has recently completed a third interim report which is now being forwarded to the Geneva conference powers, as indeed the first two have been. In connection with the submission of this report, steps have been taken by the Canadian representative to ensure that the unsatisfactory situation with respect to the carrying out of the provisions in the agreement for freedom of movement for the civil population will be given special attention.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for delaying until today the making of this report. I should like to ask him one or two specific questions arising out of his statement today, as well as out of the two reports of the commission.

Has he noted in an article by Ainslie Kerr the following matters as examples of flagrant breaches of the agreement, and does he know whether or not these examples are actually correct in fact? The first is, is it a fact that communist Viet Nam guards have made Indian committee members surrender, at bayonet point, documents handed to them by the inhabitants of North Viet Nam who had prepared those documents in pursuance of the Geneva agreement? Is it so that masses of military equipment and red troops are pouring into Viet Nam contrary to the agreements that were entered into at the time of the truce? Is it so that even our Canadian inspection teams are denied the opportunity to inspect without first giving notice, thereby denying anything in the nature of factual inspection? If he has seen that, will he also say what has been the nature of the protest to which he alluded in his statement? To whom are the protests made and approximately when was the last date of such protest?

Mr. Pearson: I am not able to confirm in all its detail the accuracy of the report to which my hon. friend has referred. We are trying to get specific information from Viet Nam on these three points. However, I think I can say that it is probably an exaggeration to indicate that Chinese troops are pouring into Viet Nam across the borders. Reports cannot be entirely conclusive in these matters because of the nature of the situation, but there is nothing in the reports we have received which would warrant that conclusion.

I have said already that there is an unsatisfactory situation with regard to freedom of movement, but that is as far as I can go in regard to details.

So far as the other question is concerned, when any complaint comes to the attention of the commission or to the attention of our representative on the commission he makes his position clear to the other members. Very often as a result of the attitude taken by our member or by some other member of the commission steps are taken to correct a situation, but the government on the spot in North Viet Nam has the responsibility of taking the actual executive remedial action. Of course there is difficulty at times in ensuring that that is done.

I do not know that I can go beyond that. Our member on the commission has to work with the other members. Naturally we hope that the commission will act unanimously in all these matters. While we do make our position known and when a complaint is justified we make a complaint; nevertheless we do try to work with the other two members of the commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would it not be possible for the Canadian member, particularly when he is such an able administrator as Sherwood Lett, to make a minority report so that this situation could be brought to the attention of the world. Secondly, I should like to ask whether it is not a fact that the rate of evacuation at the present time from North Viet Nam is such that there will be several hundred thousand who would like to get out of that country but who will be denied an opportunity to do so unless there is an extension beyond May 18.

Mr. Pearson: As to the first point, I would ask the hon. member to suspend judgment until he sees the third report of the commission, which should be printed shortly and which I think will deal with the point he has mentioned. On the second point, I think it is true that if the date of May 18 is reached without a further extension there will be substantial numbers of people in the north who may not be able to get to the south. It is also true that several hundreds of thousands of North Viet Namese have left that part of Viet Nam for the south in recent months.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In connection with the restriction of movement to which the minister has referred, has he any information that other than North Viet Namese are concerned? In other words, are there any Canadian citizens involved or are there non-Viet Namese who are restricted in their movements?

Mr. Pearson: No, we have no information that any Canadians have been prevented from moving from the north to the south. There are some Canadian missionaries in the north who are doing an heroic and most useful work in that part of Viet Nam at this time, but they are there of their own free will.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Having regard to what the minister said about the hope that the commission would be able to work unanimously, has that in fact been the case or can they act by majority?

Mr. Pearson: In some matters the commission can act by a majority vote but in other matters there has to be unanimity. It has been felt by our representative on the commission that wherever possible he should try to get the support of the other two members in order to make sure that any recommendations which are made would have a better chance of being executed by the government concerned.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Growing out of the question, but not directly part of the discussion, may I ask the minister of external affairs if he can give us any clear picture of the present situation in regard to the government of Viet Nam, which is so closely related to this whole problem?

Mr. Pearson: I promised the hon. member yesterday that I would do that as soon as there was some further information, but we have received nothing since yesterday to permit me to add anything to what I said then, namely, that the members of the commission seem to be safe and in good condition. We have had no reports of any Canadian casualties.

The situation with regard to the civil disturbances is most unfortunate. As I indicated yesterday, the Diem government seems for the time being at least to have established its control over Saigon and the immediate vicinity. There is nothing I could usefully add on that matter to what has appeared in the press.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, May 2, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening I was referring to the Chignecto canal and I should like to complete my remarks on that subject. Before I do so I should like to bring to the attention of the house something I have read since last evening of the third annual report of the Colombo plan. On page 119 the following appears:

> The Canadian parliament voted $25·4 million for use under the Colombo plan in 1954-55, making a total of approximately $102 million which has been made available by Canada for capital and technical assistance in the first four years of the plan.

And then on the following page, under "India":

> 6. Some parts of the 1954-55 program for India are still under discussion. However, to date India has been allocated approximately $49 million in Colombo plan assistance from Canada.
> 8. Another project which is to be assisted by Canada is the Umtru hydro-electric scheme in Assam. Canada will provide electrical equipment to an estimated amount of $1·2 million.
> 10. Other projects in India are being examined by the Canadian authorities, including the possibility of supplying a number of small thermal power units for use in a number of communities spread widely throughout India.

And then under "Pakistan":

> 11. However, to date Pakistan has been allocated a total of approximately $33 million in Colombo plan assistance from Canada.
> 12. As mentioned in the 1953 report Canada has undertaken to participate in the construction of the Warsak dam in northwest Pakistan. Up to the present $5·4 million has been earmarked for the purchase of hydro-electric and related equipment.

Under "Ceylon", on page 122, I find in item 17:

> To assist in the development of the port of Colombo, electrical and other equipment up to a value of $400,000 will be supplied by Canada.

On page 48 of this report I find mention made of several projects. One is the Nangal dam and the Nangal canal. Also mentioned is the Kakrapara canal system.

I thought that this was an opportune time to bring to the attention of this house the Canadian money that is being spent under the Colombo plan for the development in India, Pakistan and Ceylon of canals and dams, similar to what we are asking for in New Brunswick. I feel that we in New Brunswick are as worthy of assistance as anybody outside of Canada, and we should be given the same break as the people of India, Pakistan and Ceylon. At least, we should be regarded as a friendly country.

If you will look at a map of the sea lanes, you will find sea lanes coming out of the St. Lawrence river and going around the maritime provinces to the ports of New York and Boston and the cities farther south. To say that the St. Lawrence seaway will not benefit the province of New Brunswick is in my opinion true, and especially in my own constituency of Westmorland, where the Canadian National Railways shops and offices are located. That may mean a lessening of rail traffic, because in the wintertime and even at other times of the year a considerable volume of goods is shipped from western Canada and the central provinces to Halifax and Saint John by rail. It is in the interests of Canada, and we accept the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway should be built, but I do not think that the applause for building this seaway should be so loud that notice should not be taken or arguments heard for the continuance of the seaway by building the Chignecto canal.

In case there are some hon. members who are not familiar with the geography of the maritime provinces, I want to tell you that the province of Nova Scotia is connected with the province of New Brunswick by the isthmus of Chignecto. This isthmus is 18 miles wide and separates Northumberland strait from the bay of Fundy, so that a ship coming out of the St. Lawrence seaway through Northumberland strait must go around the entire province of Nova Scotia, an additional distance of 500 miles, to reach the ports of the eastern seaboard. Another matter which occurs to me is the part that is to be played by the United States in the construction of this seaway. I have often heard it said, "Let us be fair". Then let us be fair to the Americans. We should complete the seaway by the construction of this canal so that, after they have paid for so much of the cost of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, they will not be cut off from the use of their eastern ports by the isthmus of Chignecto. If this isthmus were pierced by a canal, the ships from Chignecto could go to New York through Chignecto with their loads of grain and continue to South America, discharging or taking on cargoes in passing. It seems to me that, as far as use by the ports of Portland, Boston and New York of the St. Lawrence seaway is concerned, such use will be very limited. The St. Lawrence seaway has been put over on the Americans in that they did not insist on the construction of the Chignecto canal.

This year there will be a ferry running from Yarmouth to Portland, and I understand that this ferry will be able to carry approximately 150 cars. The trip from Yarmouth to Portland is 700 miles by land; by sea, I understand, it is somewhat less than 200 miles. Now, the people of Yarmouth and that part of Nova Scotia near it are going to have the advantages of shipping their produce to the markets of New England by the use of this ferry from Yarmouth to Portland, but the people on the north side of the isthmus, along the northern coast of Nova Scotia, the eastern coast of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, are being denied the use of the sea route to the United States ports by the failure to build the Chignecto canal.

I have spoken in this house every time I have got the chance about the Chignecto canal and, to tell you the truth, I have not got much further ahead than when I started with the process of construction. So I was going to ask that this house institute an investigation, a survey, a commission, or some board, to look into all the aspects of the construction of the Chignecto canal so that we will know once and for all whether or not we can look forward in the near future to the construction of this canal, and by the same token we will know what our economic possibilities are in New Brunswick.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the presentation of the budget provides one of the annual dramas in the House of Commons. We have few of them indeed in a normal session of parliament, and we all look forward to the presentation of the budget. The task that falls to the opposition following the presentation of that budget is not always a dramatic one, but it is a highly important one in relation to the whole purpose of our parliamentary institutions. In no particular of its responsibilities in any normal session does the opposition rise to a higher duty than in relation to the examination of the government's budget.

It is true that in the house, constituted as this one is at present, the government wins the vote. But it is equally true that in relation to the kind of budget we are discussing here today the opposition wins the debate. But what of the people? The Canadian people from this budget will glean but little benefit, but they will glean something of benefit from the debate in which the proposals of the government are examined.

I wish to be fair to the minister. This is his first budget, and one would of course wish to congratulate him upon the opportunity of presenting the budget. He had to face conditions that were not entirely of his responsibility. He has been Minister of Finance for the last nine months only of the fiscal year which closed a month ago. However, as to previous budgets, the Minister of Finance must bear his share of responsibility as a member of the government for some years past in relation to the shortcomings of previous budgets and the effect they have had in creating the type of situation with which the Minister of Finance found himself confronted when preparing his budget proposals introduced in this house a month ago.

May I say that we are looking forward to a vote this afternoon upon the amendment to the amendment. As the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is quite in keeping with the policies that have been set forth in this house on behalf of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, we of the official opposition intend to give our support to that amendment.

In the approach to any budget some fair and proper questions to ask ourselves are these: What is the principle of the budget? What does it seek to accomplish? What are the principal features of the problems that it envisages and what is the general nature of the solutions that are offered? If one submits the present budget to that type of scrutiny, one will find oneself unable to find a clear answer. The fact is that this is not a clear budget. It has no clear view of the problems of the day and consequently it has no clear-headed approach to them.

This is a budget without any pattern. This is a budget that is not founded upon any principle. So far as the minister's comments upon it are concerned, it is a budget that proceeds from one denial to another. His comments upon it were all of a negative nature. It is not dictated by Keynesian economics; it is not intended to meet the problem of unemployment; it is not this and it is not that.

After the closest examination of the budget and of the minister's comments upon it, one can only conclude that this budget is the product of muddled thinking, confusion, indecision and fear on the part of the government to admit the existence of problems with which the taxpayers and the people of this country are all too familiar. It was therefore highly proper that The Economist in its issue of April 19, in a letter from its Ottawa correspondent, should make this observation upon the budget:

> On the assumption that Canada needs some stimulus to get back to its proper rate of expansion after last year's modest setback, this financing of tax cuts out of deficit is easily defensible. The budget speech in fact made it perfectly clear that this was the intention. But the government refuses to say so explicitly. It has never admitted that anything was wrong with the Canadian economy that required artificial stimulus, and it will not do so now. It would rather do good by stealth. The result is to leave it without any logical defence of the plunge into deficit financing.

Hence we have an approach to problems based not upon the admission of the existence of problems but upon stealth. So this budget has no pattern and it has no principle; indeed, it is neither flesh nor fowl nor good red herring.

What are to be the effects of this budget? We do not know, Mr. Speaker, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) will not tell us what were the intended effects of it. But we have had some interesting observations upon it. Mr. J. H. Perry, director of the Canadian Tax Foundation, in a speech last week on this budget, made this comment on the deficit financing that has now appeared:

> While some have interpreted it as a shot in the arm for the economy, I would say it is more in the nature of a pink pill.

As I remember the purpose of pink pills, Mr. Speaker, they were for pale people. But the government makes no admission.

It is not unrealistic that we should look for some title for this budget. In the past we have had budgets that have been characterized in history by certain names. We have and many others. I suppose it would not be unfair to label this budget as "the budget of crumbs". That is the true measure of the size of the niggardly reductions which have been made in taxes. These niggardly reductions are the crumbs that have been permitted by this government to fall from its table; I refer to the table of the swollen government treasury. In these trumpeted reductions we see certain facts that bring them into true focus and perspective.

Just what is in these income tax reductions? Here is this great reduction trumpeted as a reduction of 13·3 per cent. The married man, on an income of $3,000 per annum, with two children who receives this maximum reduction gets a total reduction this year of $7 in his income tax, and $14 in a full year. That is a reduction of 2 cents a day to him this year, and 4 cents a day next year.

These reductions, Mr. Speaker, are too small to give any material encouragement to enterprise in this country. Then with resort to a typical government device—that is, typical on the part of this government—these reductions have been postponed to July 1. In referring to that matter, the Minister of Finance spoke about this postponement as being usual. It is usual in the case of this government. They have had resort to this device in the past, making people think they were receiving bigger reductions than the budget actually brought about.

What was needed in relation to the income tax this year was a boost to initiative. What was needed was also a frank look at the present exemptions which, as the minister himself admitted in a speech some months ago, are too low; and at the rates of taxation which, also by his admission, likewise are too high.

Second, what shall we say about this slight reduction in the corporation tax? It has been attacked by the C.C.F. in the course of this debate. They do not realize—or if they do so, it is no part of their wish—that the function of profits in the kind of economy we have, namely a free economy, is to provide the capital with which new plants, new jobs and new opportunities are created. That is the function of profits and capital in our economy. If you go on depriving people of the fruits of their labours and of their risks, you just blunt incentive, and the result is loss of opportunity and contraction in the number of jobs.

In recent years in this country we have seen a system whereby the government has been taking half of all the profits corporations have made. As I heard one government minister say in a speech in Montreal several years ago, the government is a 50 per cent partner in every Canadian corporation. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that it is a partner in the sense that it reaches in its long hand and abstracts from the treasury one-half of all the profits of every corporation in Canada. But in the sense that this is a profit and loss system and having regard to the fact that every one of these corporations that are talked about is capable of earning a loss as well as a profit, the government of course has no part in that aspect of its business.

However, it is interesting to see how the C.C.F. are at variance in this regard with Mr. Mosher, the president of the Canadian Congress of Labour. In a recent speech Mr. Mosher had this to say:

> We have no alternative but to ensure sufficient profits to keep industry in motion, or be faced with unemployment, resulting in lower standards of living for a larger proportion of the workers.

I wish that hon. members of the C.C.F. would take to heart those words of Mr. Mosher. Then he went on to express the hope that "these words of common sense"—and indeed they were words of common sense—"would help to give recognition to the obvious fact that employers and employees are interdependent". That is a common-sense observation by Mr. Mosher, the truth of which has apparently never yet dawned upon those who mould the thinking and speaking of the C.C.F.

There is one thing I wish the minister had done with regard to corporation profits. I wish he had grasped the opportunity he had to encourage smaller businesses by enlarging the total permissible income on the part of those who qualify for the lower rate. Twenty thousand dollars is not enough in the way of permissible net earnings for a corporation to be entitled to the 20 per cent rate instead of the 47 per cent rate of taxation. The minister had there an opportunity to help small businesses in Canada, but he has allowed it to slip through his fingers.

But, sir, after this review of the vaunted reductions that have been made in the budget, let us in fairness realize this, that the minister has given to the people of Canada something that is going to help them so greatly to bear the burdens that he has laid upon them, help that will make them rather bear those ills they have than fly to others that they know not of. What has the minister given to the people of Canada to lighten the load? Sir, he has given them advice, and this is the advice that the minister has contributed to the suffering Canadian taxpayer. On February 21 he suggested that "Canadians accept in good humour the heavy taxes I have to impose". What a contribution to easing the burden of the Canadian taxpayer! The minister recommends that the Canadian taxpayer accept these heavy and excessive burdens with good humour. What a contribution to lightening the burden of the taxpayer!

This is the principal contribution of the budget to that end. I suppose it is in application of this new government panacea that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) has been going about the country making both his humorous and not so humorous observations. However, the Minister of Finance has given a new imposition, a new directive. The new imposition from the government that is dictated to the Canadian people is good humour in the acceptance of these burdens. We of Her Majesty's loyal opposition think on the contrary that a sense of tax consciousness and tax resistance on the part of the Canadian people is a much healthier panacea for this government to face. It is only a strongly aroused sense of tax resistance on the part of the Canadian people that is going to drive the government opposite to measure up to its responsibilities to husband the resources of the Canadian people and not to inflict upon them unwarranted impositions.

As to the deficit, the minister hardly owned the poor thing. It had no part apparently in relation to any policy of the government. I call to mind a remark that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) made on his return from Europe on December 29 when he said: "I wouldn't say a small deficit would be calamitous, but I think it's better to balance the budget." Sir, at least there is a statement of government policy, better to balance the budget, but we have had no explanation from the Minister of Finance as to why on this occasion he felt it wise to depart from the only semblance of a statement of government policy in this regard that has recently come from any minister of the government.

But, sir, this budget is built upon an assumption. The whole basis, the whole foundation upon which the minister has constructed this budgetary edifice has been hope. We of Her Majesty's loyal opposition share the hope that the Canadian economy will be prosperous and strong, that it will expand this year, that there will be more prosperity this year than there was last year, but we do not think the minister should escape criticism for going about the building of his budget upon assumptions that do not seem to have much more relation to present reality than do the comments that have come from the government from time to time during the session in relation to the problem of unemployment. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that this year the Minister of Finance is assuming that the gross national product will be between 5 and 6 per cent more than it was in 1954; in other words, the gross national product will be $25¼ billion or more in 1955 and, as he himself says, "on that figure I shall base my revenue forecasts".

Let it be remembered that corporation profits in 1954 were 6 per cent smaller than they were in 1953. Let us remember that there was a disastrous decline in personal savings in Canada in 1954. At page 2777 of the appendix to Hansard of April 5 we have this statement:

> . . . personal saving, or the amount set aside from current personal income, constituted 6·8 per cent of disposable income in 1954 compared with 9·2 per cent in 1953. In absolute terms personal saving fell from $1,539 million in 1953 to $1,137 million in 1954, a decline of $402 million, of which about half represented a reduction in saving in the form of farm inventories. The growth in personal assets was even more sharply reduced in 1954 than the $402 million reduction in personal saving would indicate; for personal saving takes many forms and involves changes in both assets and liabilities.

The trade outlook has a definite bearing on this question. Last year Canada slipped from third place, the proud position she had held for several years past in world trade, to fourth place, with Germany passing her and entering third place. In our current account on international transactions Canada had an unfavourable net balance of $427 million in 1954 and, notwithstanding a very slight improvement, we still had a trade deficit with the United States of $600 million. I am not going further into the subject of trade now. My leader will be speaking tomorrow and will deal in larger measure with this subject, but I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in the face of these incontestable facts the minister goes blithely ahead and bases all his calculations upon a very optimistic assumption.

Indeed, the minister gave some warning of his approach. Apparently he has been living in very close company with the Minister of Trade and Commerce for he said at Regina, as reported in the press of September 13, that "Canada's economy has nowhere to go but up." Yet at the very time he was making that statement all the figures indicated that the Canadian economy was going down. There was some improvement towards the end of the year but that came later.

We are faced with the unhappy fact with respect to agriculture in Canada today that farm cash income was down in 1954 to $2,378 million, a reduction of 14·3 per cent compared with 1953 and a reduction of 16·5 per cent compared with 1952.

We still have this vast problem of marketing our wheat, and until we do succeed in marketing our wheat in greater quantities it is simply idle for the Minister of Finance to go ahead and base budgetary plans upon optimistic and rosy assumptions of the kind he has made.

I wish to turn now to the subject of the problems that the budget has not touched, and there are many of them. Indeed, one could spend considerable time discussing problems that have been conveniently overlooked by the Minister of Finance and the government in the preparation of the budget.

The first is the problem of the sales and excise taxes. The fact is that this is a problem on which the minister has turned his back. If he was looking for a chance to help all the Canadian people, why did he ignore the sales tax? His predecessor had this to say about taxes on commodities in a speech I found recently which he made in Toronto a year ago. He made it a couple of weeks after presenting his budget, and here is what he said about the reductions he then proposed in the excise tax:

> However, it appeared to me that some tax reduction was both possible and desirable. During the balance of the fiscal year, the tax reductions proposed in the budget will reduce taxes by about $36 million. When I came to consider just where tax cuts should be made, I decided, both for reasons of equity and of economic effects, that the bulk of the possible tax reduction should be in the commodity tax field.

Note these words, sir.

> And that way, the tax cuts would benefit most Canadians.

That was in April, 1954, two weeks after the minister had made his budget speech in the House of Commons. His conception of the way to spread the benefits of tax reduction was to make reductions in excise taxes, these indirect taxes—

Mr. Benidickson: And that has been done this year in the income tax, too.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense; that is nonsense. The sales tax has been completely overlooked. The excise tax has largely been ignored in the minister's approach to the problem.

Here is the sales tax that this government has raised to 10 per cent, this tax that was denounced by the predecessors of hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1935, at the general election in that year. Mr. Mackenzie King went up and down this country and denounced the sales tax as "that iniquitous tax". And what did he do when he came to office? He raised the sales tax to 6 per cent, and later it was raised under the Liberal government to 8 per cent, and then again to 10 per cent.

Yes, that is the way in which the Canadian people are made to enjoy the benefits of tax increases on the part of this government. Now, what about this sales tax? What about the excise taxes that apply to commodities that are in common use? I turn back to an editorial that appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of August 6, 1935, in which that mouthpiece of the Liberal party and of this government referred to the sales tax as imposing—and these are the words the editorial used—"a fine for selling and buying." Yes, a fine for selling and buying; and that was at a time when the sales tax was at less than half its present rate. They have more than doubled it since that time. They have more than doubled the fine on buying and selling.

And those are the taxes that, apparently, they believe in continuing to apply and enforce. These taxes apply to many of the basic necessities of life. How can this government possibly justify continuing the application of a 10 per cent sales tax on clothing, on boots and shoes, on household furniture, and a number of other necessities? How can this government any more justify the imposition of its tax on, for instance, tea and coffee? A deputation waited upon the minister before his budget was brought down and showed him how, if he would remove the tax on tea and coffee, he could save the Canadian consumers $9 million a year. But to that plea the minister turned a deaf ear.

Oh, they made much of the removal of the luxury tax—because that is the guise in which it was introduced a few years ago—on tires for motor vehicles. They have made much of the reduction of the excise tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent on motor vehicles. Well, what they have done, in the way they have gone about it—in leaving the tax at far too high a figure, and giving no benefit at all to those dealers who had a stocked-up inventory of motor cars—has been to bedevil the wholesale and retail motor car business in Canada today. Many dealers have large inventories. In fact, I suppose there is hardly a dealer in Canada today who did not have a swollen inventory of motor cars before this reduction came about. And the government proceeds upon the assumption that, because some dealers may have benefited from the imposition years ago of this luxury tax, this 15 per cent tax—at the time of the Korean budget—therefore they should take a beating now. Now, sir, that was four years ago. And, what is more, the people are not the same today; and they are taking a very serious beating in this respect. The government is not prepared, however, to do anything to meet the inventory situation. On they go, applying these indirect taxes. They like them.

The second problem which has been ignored by the government is the problem of unemployment. This problem has been discussed at length in this session, or I would seek to go into it at greater length today. But let me content myself, in this limited time, with making this limited observation on the subject, that the government throughout this session has observed a conspiracy of silence in regard to unemployment; and it has carried that conspiracy of silence into the budget. It is still running away from the problem of unemployment.

This budget does not meet, in fact it cannot even make the pretence of meeting or even assisting to meet, the problem of unemployment. The government is still running away from that problem; they hope to ignore it. And only last Friday in this House of Commons we heard the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) running away from the promises the government made in 1945. Those promises that were made in 1945, that the federal government would assume the responsibility of providing for the unemployed employables—those promises, those undertakings, were most indecently interred here last Friday. The Prime Minister may think he can bury the proposals of the green book of 1945 in that indecent manner. But there are more recent phrases which will dog his political footsteps as long as time shall last, and they are his own words uttered in Quebec last September when he said this:

> We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody we are incompetent.

And we say to the Prime Minister, "Out of thine own mouth hast thou condemned thyself, and not only thyself, but condemned thy colleagues as well".

This is a problem that is national in scope. It is beyond local responsibility. What we want on the part of this government, and what we still look for, are employment measures, some constructive and some effective approach to meeting the deterioration in the economic condition and the unemployment situation in Canada today.

The third problem this budget ignored is that taxes in Canada are far too high. In 1954 the total taxes imposed upon the Canadian taxpayer, whether dominion, provincial or municipal, aggregated something over $7 billion, a record sum. And, sir, of course the lion's share of this was taken by the federal government. I am thinking at the moment of the over-all problem. In 1929 figures show that 13 per cent of the gross national product of Canada went in taxes. In 1939 the figure was 16 per cent, and in 1955 it was 29 per cent of the gross national product. And of course there is an infinitely larger gross national product today. I say this is an unwarrantably heavy imposition upon the Canadian people, and that it has tended to reduce initiative at a time when the Canadian producer is facing keener competitive forces than have been faced for many, many years.

The fourth problem this budget does not meet is the problem of centralization, a problem created by the deliberate policy of this government to concentrate all tax-gathering here at Ottawa. The dominion's proportion of the total revenue pie in Canada, placed upon the backs of the taxpayer, has doubled, in percentage, since pre-war days. This has got to the point now where it remained for a Liberal premier, Premier Hicks of Nova Scotia, in a speech he made on March 1, referring to the concentration of tax-gathering at Ottawa, to say this:

> It is possible that if the present trends continue we may lose our federal system of government by default, and will have brought about a one-government state without the Canadian people ever having paused to decide if such a result is desirable.

Note the words "one-government state". That is the trend in the taxing policy of this government, so clearly discerned and described by a Liberal provincial premier.

The fifth problem the budget ignores is the problem of waste and inefficiency. Sir, the contempt of hon. gentlemen opposite was heaped upon Progressive Conservatives in the general election campaign of 1953 because we said that expenditures could be reduced without the sacrifice of any essential public interest in Canada, whether in defence or otherwise. Well, after ridiculing us, since those days the government has reduced the expenditures on national defence. They were running then at about $2 billion a year. They are now to run at a rate of $1,700 million a year. What we said could and should be done has been proven to be possible, but what has the government done at the same time? Have they sought to observe economy, to eliminate waste and extravagance in other departments? No, they have not. There is still the same old attitude on the part of the government. They can do no wrong, and it is not the kind of attitude that makes for efficiency on the part of those who serve under them.

There is still far too much water in the estimates that the government brings down before this house, and we shall continue to condemn this government for the deliberate way in which they endeavour to thwart and frustrate our efforts to squeeze some of that water out of those estimates. It is a known fact. The Auditor General has told us in the public accounts committee in previous years that there is a padding in all those estimates that runs to at least 5 per cent and sometimes 10 per cent. But let opposition members, as was done recently in the committee on estimates, in reviewing the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, try to reduce those estimates by 5 per cent, to eliminate that cushion, to squeeze the water out of the estimates, and what happens? The government opposite rallies its forces to defeat such a motion and preserve the water in these estimates.

Mr. Prudham: It is already squeezed out.

Mr. Fleming: Well, I am afraid the minister has not yet gone very deeply into the estimates. This is just a sample. The minister who has made this interruption is as good as any minister of this government. He has just said that he does not know of any water in the estimates. The fact of the matter is that apparently the existence of the water in the estimates is something that has escaped the notice of every minister, has escaped the attention of the government opposite, because they have no measures for squeezing the water out of the estimates, and so the waste goes on.

Although we are supposed to be having some regard for economy, the total numbers in the civil service increased by 10,000 from October, 1953, to October, 1954. Now, there are many civil servants who are not being adequately paid for their services. But, sir, it will take more proof than the government has given that increasing its numbers is the way to meet the problem of the civil service.

The sixth problem ignored by the minister in this budget is the succession duty. The succession duty act is crying for revision. On April 6, 1954, in his budget speech Mr. Abbott said at page 3733 of Hansard: "Our succession duty act is in need of revision." Then he pointed to efforts that had been made to revise other taxation legislation and said that he had asked the officials of the three departments concerned, finance, national revenue and justice, to commence work on rewriting the law and that he would hear representations. We were led to expect that within a year a new bill would be brought down, but now we are told by the present minister that he has not completed this work, and we have to wait another year for any approach whatever, even the simplest revision of this statute which is crying for revision today.

Seventh, this budget ignores the problems of the provinces and the municipalities. I point particularly to the fact that the budget makes no provision for reduction in the sales tax on goods purchased by municipal corporations or boards of education. Whatever, for example, our boards of education across Canada purchase that is subject to sales tax bears a double burden. It is paid for by the municipal and provincial taxpayers but the federal government comes along and loads another burden on them in the form of the sales tax.

Eighth, the government has ignored the problem of the welfare organizations, which have been pleading for remission of the sales tax on purchases made by them of goods for use in their work.

Ninth, the budget ignores the special problems of certain depressed industries, such as textiles, electrical goods and others.

Tenth, it has not faced the problem of providing exemption for pension contributions of recognized groups of self-employed persons.

Eleventh, it has not grappled with the silly way in which the finances of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are handled today by farming out to them the total yield from the indirect taxes on the sales of television sets and tubes and radio receiving sets and tubes.

Twelfth, it has not dealt with the problem arising from the fact that more money is taken from the people of Canada in deductions at the source from wages and salaries than is justified, and more than half of the taxpayers of Canada today are obliged to apply for refunds as a result of overpayment of taxes. It is time that problem was faced.

Thirteenth, the government has not met the problem of seizure of property and attachment permitted under taxing acts, as the government today arrogates to itself procedures that go far beyond the normal legal methods of recovery.

Fourteenth, the minister, while he acknowledged the problem of complicated provisions in our Income Tax Act, in a speech he made some months ago, has so far taken no note of that problem. We shall await with interest in that respect his bill to amend the act.

Fifteenth, the government has not dealt beyond this past year with the problem of the deficit in the old age security fund. We are still going along from hand to mouth, continuing the pretence that it is a contributory scheme. These are fifteen of the shortcomings of the budget.

In conclusion I wish to say that in so far as the proposed royal commission is concerned, a commission, as the minister described it, "to survey the future economic prospects" of our country, while we have no objection whatever to the appointment of a royal commission for this purpose, we do recognize that the selection of the personnel will be made by the government, and the success of this inquiry will largely depend upon the selection of the personnel. In any event, the task that has been assigned to the royal commission will be no substitute for action on the part of the government to meet immediately the pressing problems. There is one kind of inquiry that the commission might well have been asked to make, and that is the inquiry for which we have been asking for years, into the efficiency of government.

And so, sir, we have a budget which can only be described, it seems to me, as a budget of crumbs. It has turned its back upon and ignored pressing Canadian problems. It will be the duty of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to continue to press for remedy and redress for the Canadian people in the face of those burdens that the government continues to load upon them.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in his budget address on Tuesday, April 5, the Minister of Finance made a great deal out of the fact that the income tax reductions which are provided in the budget are very heavy percentagewise for those in the lower income brackets and very light percentagewise for those in the upper income reaches. He pointed out, and it is a fact, that a married man earning $2,500 a year, if he has two children eligible for family allowances, will have the amount of income tax he pays reduced as a result of this budget by 13·3 per cent. In contrast to that, he pointed out that a married man with two children eligible for family allowances, if his income is $400,000 a year, will have the amount of income tax he pays reduced by only 2·8 per cent. My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and other members of this group, have already pointed out that though those percentages are factual, they are, like many percentages, deceiving.

It is my desire, Mr. Speaker, to place on Hansard a table—if there is any objection to it being placed there by unanimous consent I can read it on my own time—which will show, in the case of one category of taxpayer, namely a married man with two children, both eligible for family allowances, what these percentage reductions in income tax amount to in actual dollars, in a full year, or in dollars and cents per week, starting July 1, 1955.

This table corresponds in a sense to the table which the Minister of Finance placed on Hansard of April 5, 1955 at page 2737. At that time the minister placed three tables on Hansard; one for single taxpayers, one for married taxpayers without children and one for married taxpayers with two children eligible for family allowances. What I have done could have been done with respect to all three tables, but for the sake of simplicity I have done it with respect to just the one category, namely the married taxpayer with two children eligible for family allowances. My table is entitled "Table showing two columns missing from table V on page 2737 of Hansard of April 5, 1955. Effect of the proposed personal income tax changes. Married taxpayer—with two children eligible for family allowances."

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: The table is as follows:

Table showing two columns missing from table V on page 2737 of Hansard for April 5, 1955

NOTES:

Columns 1 and 2 in the above table are the same as columns 1 and 5 in the minister's table on page 2737 of Hansard.

Columns 3 and 4 in the above table are the two columns missing from the minister's table.

I am grateful to the house for the leave which has been given me to place this table on Hansard. Hon. members will notice that I have two notes which read:

> Columns 1 and 2 in the above table are the same as columns 1 and 5 in the minister's table on page 2737 of Hansard.
> Columns 3 and 4 in the above table are the two columns missing from the minister's table.

If hon. members will consult this table they will discover that it is a fact that a married man with two children eligible for family allowances, if his income is $2,500 a year, gets a reduction in income tax to the extent of 13·3 per cent, and a married man in the same situation with an income of $400,000 a year gets a reduction in income tax of only 2·8 per cent. It sounds good.

Mr. McCann: Do you know anyone who has an annual income of $400,000?

Mr. Knowles: None of my friends is in that category. These are figures taken from the table placed on Hansard by the Minister of Finance. They are the minister's figures, not figures that I have invented. The fact of the matter is that the 13·3 per cent reduction which the $2,500 man gets is only $4 a year or 7 cents a week, whereas the 2·8 per cent reduction which the $400,000 man gets is $7,954 a year or $152.96 a week. I am ready to accept a question from any hon. member in just a moment. May I point out that my table, as can be seen by reference to Hansard, gives figures for the groups in between.

Mr. Cameron (High Park): When the hon. member is dealing with income, is he taking the taxable income or the real income? A married man with two children would have an exemption of $2,300 a year and if he had a taxable income of $2,500 his real income would be $4,800.

Mr. Knowles: We are not talking about taxable income, we are talking about gross income. These figures correspond line by line to the figures the minister placed on Hansard at page 2737 of April 5. As I say, my table, so far as the first two columns are concerned, is the same as the minister's table, but I have added two columns which obviously he did not include.

The reason we have emphasized the fact that the minister's income tax reductions amount to so little for the taxpayer in the lower brackets and so much for the taxpayer in the upper reaches is that we feel this was the wrong way to do it. It is the minister himself who decides that he can afford a certain amount of money for income tax reduction. He says that the reduction he is going to make so far as personal income taxes are concerned will amount to $128 million in a full year or $85 million in 1955-56. He has said also that the reduction he is making in the corporation tax will amount to $43 million in a full year or $28 million in 1955-56. Those two tax abatements alone—never mind any others which are provided for in the budget—amount to $171 million in a full year or $113 million in 1955-56.

It is our contention that that full amount of $113 million in 1955-56, or $171 million in a full year, should have been made available to those in the lower income brackets. There are various ways in which that could be done, but mainly there are two ways. One way in which it could be done would be to raise the present exemption levels which are now $1,000 single and $2,000 married to figures such as $1,500 single and $3,000 married. At the same time it would be necessary—this is what we advocate—to increase the rates of taxation in the upper brackets. If you merely raised the exemption levels you would be giving more to the wealthy than you would to those in the lower brackets. If one is going to change the exemption levels, which is what we advocate should be done, it would call for a revamping of the rates for the various brackets, particularly those in the upper reaches.

Another way in which some of this $113 million in 1955-56 or $171 million in a full year could have been made available to those in the lower brackets would be by a reduction or elimination of the sales tax. It is our contention that when a government is supposedly concerned over the great masses of the people and has some money that it can throw in as a tax abatement it should arrange its budget so that that money accrues to the benefit of those who need it most and not those in the upper brackets. For example, a person drawing $30,000 a year does not need another $554 a year, as is shown in the table which I have placed on Hansard, but those in the $2,000 and $3,000 brackets do need whatever improvement in their economic position, whatever improvement in their standard of living, it is possible for the minister to provide in his budget.

I know as we all do from our experience here that the chances of getting a change in the budget once it has been announced are next to nil in the session in which such changes are proposed, but statesmen are always looking to the future, and of course all of us are statesmen when budget matters are under discussion. We are speaking to the minister having in mind next year's budget or perhaps the one the year after that. I suppose it is possible that the budget in the year after next may be an election budget, or perhaps next year's budget will be an election budget. Taxpayers generally are always glad to see elections because they do seem to have their effect on budgets.

Whenever that time comes I hope the minister will give the greatest amount of consideration, not to those in the upper income brackets who do not need assistance but to those in the lower income brackets who need far more in the way of improvement in their economic position and in their standard of living than is provided by a weekly tax reduction of 7 cents or 26 cents as provided by the minister in the budget now before parliament. I plead as strongly as I can that the minister in future budgets should think not of those who do not need assistance but rather of those who do.

There is another matter on which I should like to comment for a moment. That is with reference to the announcement made by the minister in his budget speech, as indicated on page 2740 of Hansard for April 5, 1955, when he said:

> The government intends, therefore, to appoint a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects.

Mr. Speaker, I join with those who have welcomed the announcement of this royal commission. I hope it will be set up at an early date and that it will enter upon its work in the confidence that the findings it brings down will be implemented in an attempt to improve the general well-being of the people of this country. I think I might be pardoned for putting on Hansard at this point, in close relationship to the announcement of the minister which I have just read, this notice of motion of mine, which appears on the order paper where it has been since March 17 of this year. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the setting up of a 100th anniversary committee, with provision for participation by representatives of the federal and the provincial governments, for the purpose of planning the economic and social development of this country on a vast scale, including housing, slum clearance, conservation, irrigation and power projects, highway construction, the elimination of grade crossings, the building of hospitals, assistance to municipal projects, other public works and the strengthening of the economy of every section of the country; and that consideration should be given to the advisability of such a program being launched immediately and being pursued vigorously year by year so that on July 1, 1967, the people of Canada will be in a position to celebrate this nation's 100th birthday not only with fireworks and speeches but by the achievement of a land of health and abundance for all our people.

I shall allow those who may read the minister's announcement on the one hand and my proposed resolution on the other to note the interesting similarity. I earnestly hope this royal commission will be given terms of reference that will enable it to do a good job of research and that on the basis of its findings we will pursue vigorously a program of development for the health and well-being of this country and all our people.

I have just mentioned in my statement with regard to the future of Canada the question of health, and I should like to devote the remaining section of my remarks today to that question, arising in particular out of a question and answer, to be found in Hansard of Friday, April 29, 1955, on the orders of the day. The exchange is recorded on page 3289 and is as follows:

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister? In view of his statement as to the greater weight that attaches to the views of the government of Ontario than attaches to that of some of the smaller provinces of the country, will he say that in view of what happened on Tuesday and Wednesday we are now closer to a nation-wide health insurance program than we were at the beginning of this week?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not know how much closer we are to a nation-wide health program than we were before Tuesday and Wednesday, but very close attention is being given to the cost of that kind of a program.

Though I am one who deplores the long delay in connection with this matter of health insurance, I must say that I was glad to get that reply from the Prime Minister and I am glad to know that he is involved in a commitment that close attention is being given to the cost of a program of health insurance.

I call on the government to proceed with this matter now with much greater vigour and expedition than has been the case for the past 36 years, since it was first written into the Liberal platform in 1919. I believe that some progress was made in this building last week. I am speaking now of the cause of health insurance, not of the fortunes of any one political party, my own or any other. Previous to last week it seemed to me that Canada was more or less up against a brick wall so far as health insurance was concerned. My hon. friend, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), some months ago on the radio in the "Farm Forum" program, and more recently on television in a press conference program, had something to say about the possible need of a constitutional amendment—

Mr. Martin: For a certain kind of plan.

Mr. Knowles: —the possible need of a constitutional amendment for a certain kind of plan of health insurance. I think I know the kind of distinction that the minister had in his mind and still has. But I think he also muddied the waters by saying that, if a constitutional amendment were required, that would make necessary the agreement of all ten provinces. He did not say that all ten provinces had to agree before we could arrange to have a plan of health insurance in some of the provinces, but he did say that all ten would have to agree to the constitutional amendment if the plan to be put into effect were of a certain kind. I know the distinction, and I could discuss it at length, but that would simply take up my time. I know the distinction between a national health insurance plan and a nation-wide insurance plan. Some may think it is a distinction without a difference, but it is there and I realize that it is real.

My point is that, with the Minister of National Health and Welfare saying that kind of thing and with this question being kicked about from one election to another and being the subject of political speeches made in various quarters, it looked as though we were up against a brick wall. It seemed to me—and I shall speak quite frankly about it—that the federal government, with these references to unanimity or the fact that more than two or three of the provinces had to agree, was relying on the fact that the two central provinces would not agree and that therefore nothing would be done.

Quite honestly, I was afraid that they had some reason for that sense of reliance. It looked as though neither of the large central provinces of Canada was interested in this question, but last week, when the federal-provincial conference was held in the railway committee room, not far from where we are now in session, we had rather a surprise. The premier of Ontario joined other premiers who have already indicated an interest in health insurance by being actually the first one at that conference to ask that a study of a nation-wide health insurance program be put on the agenda for the meeting which is now to be held on the 3rd of October of this year.

I could make some political comments about the suggestion made by the premier of Ontario. We all know that there is an election campaign now on in Ontario, and maybe there is some connection, but even after the election is over, the fact of the matter is that Ontario has shown a definite interest in this question. Whatever party is elected on the 9th of June in Ontario, whether Conservative, Liberal or C.C.F., they all have health insurance in their platforms; so that whatever provincial government comes from Ontario to the federal-provincial conference here in October, it will be committed to carry through the expressed interest of the government of Ontario in a nation-wide health insurance program.

I might interject at this point that no one is now suggesting that health insurance should be bureaucratically administered at the centre for every nook and hamlet in Canada. Everyone accepts the idea, laid down as a matter of fact in the 1945 green books, that it should be provincially administered. A growing number accept the principle that the responsibility of the government is to take those financial and other steps that will put the provincial governments in a position to carry through a program of health insurance, but the federal government simply has to meet that responsibility.

As I say, what took place last week is a matter that one could discuss at some length. It has many implications. It has many interesting political connotations. No doubt they will be discussed on the hustings in Ontario during the next four or five weeks. However, I think an objective summing up of what transpired last week must include the hopeful view that we made some headway; I refer to those of us who are interested in the cause of health insurance itself.

My main purpose in introducing this subject at this time is to call upon the federal government to be ready to give a lead in this matter in October. I am glad that the minister of health and welfare is paying me the compliment of being here and being interested in what I am saying. I hope that the federal government will be really ready, without any excuse, to lay before that conference on October 3 all the information that is necessary, on the basis of which this country might go ahead with a nation-wide health insurance program. It is my view that the federal government should take the lead, along the lines laid down in the green books of 1945, in making it possible for such provinces as are interested to get such a plan started. We now know that there are at least five provinces that are interested. There are four—British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland—that have hospital insurance of some sort and in some instances they are a bit further ahead. They are interested. Now Ontario has shown its interest. On that basis I think the federal government should take this matter as one of the most serious questions to be dealt with at the conference which will be convened on October 3.

I hope it will not be said at any point that between now and then there is not time to get all the necessary information together. If that is said by anyone, I am sure it will not be by the Minister of National Health and Welfare because I am sure he will remember that quite a while ago, on June 20, 1947, as recorded at page 4423 of Hansard of that year, he said this:

> I can only repeat that we are engaging the full time of at least six persons in the department, with four additional persons who have other duties to perform. When we have the type of conference with the provinces which we envisage we shall be prepared at that conference to submit details in respect to the studies we have been making and are making and to bring about at the earliest possible moment the realization of a health insurance scheme.

I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that if in June, 1947—nearly eight years ago—he could stand in this house during the course of the consideration of his estimates and say that his officials were ready with the details to make it possible to bring about at the earliest possible moment the realization of a health insurance scheme, they have infinitely more information now than they had then. The minister knows how highly we in this house think of the staff he has in his department. He not only is favoured in that he has two deputy ministers; he has two of the topmost civil servants in the federal government, namely Dr. Cameron, the deputy minister of health, and Dr. Davidson, the deputy minister of welfare.

In that department he has many other officials who really are most able and most efficient. He has a research department headed up by Mr. Willard, the staff of which really knows what is going on in the field of health insurance as well as in all the fields in which this department is interested. He has as director of the health grants program and of health insurance studies an outstanding man in the person of Dr. Jackson, who came to the service here from my province of Manitoba. I could go on with other names, and the minister has them in his mind too. He really has a good staff for getting together the information and for working out the details that could fulfil what he promised in 1947, namely that the federal government would be ready when a conference was held. It is going to be held now. It is eight years later. I am sure that the minister is ready.

Perhaps I should not take too long with these references, but on March 19, 1952, as recorded at page 586 of Hansard, there is a lengthy reply to questions that were put on the order paper with regard to progress made by the government since the previous session in health insurance studies and surveys in Canada. It is a lengthy and interesting reply showing the attention then being given to this subject. Likewise, on Friday, January 22, 1954 the minister tabled sessional paper 84-A in reply to certain questions of mine in which I asked if the department had any papers, memoranda, studies, et cetera, regarding health insurance in other countries and any material relating to any possible program of health insurance in Canada. The reply was a long list on more than two sheets of foolscap paper, giving just the titles of many documents and memoranda on this question that had been prepared in the department. I myself have copies of some of them, and I can vouch for their usefulness and the thoroughness with which this work has been done.

My fifth question in the series that brought forth this sessional paper was this one:

> What use is the government now making of this material?

The reply was:

> This material is constantly being studied by senior officers of the department.

Similarly on Wednesday, May 5, 1954, the minister tabled sessional paper No. 84-D in response to certain questions of mine also on health insurance and on discussions with the provinces. This is a lengthy one. I will just read one question and answer. The question was:

> Have there been consultations with the provinces concerning a program of health insurance?

The answer was:

> Yes, at each meeting of the dominion council of health composed of the federal and provincial deputy ministers of health. Advantage has also been taken of frequent meetings of provincial ministers of health and welfare with the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare. In addition there have been consultations with certain provincial premiers.

In other words, across these years which have involved a delay that some of us have deplored, it is nevertheless true—and I will pay my compliment to the minister and his officials for it—that work has been done on this important question.

Mr. Speaker, if this government felt that in 1944 it could have a committee lay on the table of this house a draft bill entitled "The National Health Act", copies of which were printed and of which a certain use was made in 1945 as well, I submit that the government is far more ready today than it was then. Yet 11 years ago there was this draft bill of 43 pages which I hold in my hand, with most of the detail of a national health act, including health insurance grants, all spelled out. My copy is getting a bit yellow. I suppose the government cannot find its copies. But the main thing is not necessarily the resurrecting of this document of 11 years ago but rather the doing of something definite when this conference meets this fall.

My plea to the government is that when the conference meets, Mr. Frost be taken at his word and more. He asked for studies. I say this to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Give him more than studies. Or if Mr. Frost is not back here, and it is somebody else instead—

Mr. Hodgson: He will be back.

Mr. Knowles: —you will find co-operation from the other possible premiers as well, because I believe that the people of Ontario and the people in the country generally are asking for and are anxious to have a real lead in this matter of nation-wide health insurance. I know that one of the tests so far as the great man of the Liberal government is concerned, namely, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), was spelled out according to a report in the Ottawa Citizen of June 24, 1953, when he said this:

> A Liberal government will introduce a sound, workable national health insurance scheme in due course, just as soon as it can be done without placing an undue burden on the Canadian people.

The story goes on to point out, and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) did so as well in the summer of 1953, that this would be done when it was clear that the people of Canada want it.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is quoting the Prime Minister now. He knows that I have placed the statement of the Prime Minister on Hansard, and I think he ought to be very exact in what he attributes to the head of the government.

Mr. Knowles: I confess I am not able at the moment to find that in the Prime Minister's statement, and if I have misinterpreted what the Prime Minister said I shall withdraw it so far as he is concerned.

Mr. Martin: It will be found in Hansard of June 19 last.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, I have it here. It is about half a column. But I am sure the Prime Minister would not disagree with the proposition that if the people of Canada want health insurance the Liberals would be prepared to bring it in. My contention is that the government should be giving a lead in this matter and should not be waiting forever only to come along when it is finally realized that every last person in the country wants it. It is now wanted by a large number of people in a large number of provinces in this country, and I urge that action on this matter be taken in October of this year. So often we rise in the house and, in the very nature of things, say that action should be taken as soon as possible. I am pinning it down to October.

When the conference meets I think the government should go further than just meeting Mr. Frost's suggestion of studies of health insurance. It should have the details ready to carry through with the kind of plan that was so well spelled out in the green book proposals of 1945. I remind the house, the minister and others that although the provinces and the federal government did not get together on the package deal in 1945 nevertheless the idea of health insurance was not dropped from the terminology of the government. As everyone knows, when Mr. King on May 14, 1948, announced the important health grants program he started off by saying:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement to the house on government policy with respect to health services and health insurance.

Later Mr. King said:

> These measures also represent first stages in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan for all Canada.

There comes to my desk many an item which uses that very language. I have here the five-year report on the national health program put out by the Department of National Health and Welfare. On pages 1 and 2 there is a summary statement of the purposes of the program, and point (f) in the summary of the purposes of the program is "to lay sound foundations for health insurance". I received not long ago the report of the annual meeting of the board of evangelism and social service of the United Church of Canada. Beginning on page 13 I find a report of an address made at the annual meeting in Toronto in January of this year by Dr. Gordon E. Wride of the Department of National Health and Welfare. At that time he said:

> . . . these measures represented the first stage in the development of a comprehensive health insurance plan for all Canada.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare will recall that a while ago he let me have, because I complimented him on it, a copy of a very interesting address he made at Carleton Place on Saturday, February 12, 1955. He referred in the text of that address to the announcement made by Mr. King in May, 1948 and concluded an important sentence with these words:

> . . . and the eventual establishment of a nation-wide system of health insurance.

Mr. Martin: Would you mind reading the whole thing so we will get the context? I have just forgotten it.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Would you give me the extra minute or two it takes to read it?

Mr. Martin: Well, it is worth reading, I think.

Mr. Knowles: I agree. The whole speech was good.

Mr. Martin: Well, never mind.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe the minister will enter the debate and read the whole speech. The sentence he wants me to read in full is this:

> Nearly seven years ago, Mr. King announced to parliament a program of national health grants which had as its objective the immediate strengthening of provincial and local health services and the eventual establishment of a nation-wide system of health insurance.

My point is that I want "eventual" to be made synonymous with October, 1955, not any later. Earlier this session I took advantage of the very kind invitation of the minister to visit some of the laboratories in his department. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Trainor) and others went along. We enjoyed our visit and found it very interesting and useful. On the way we were given some literature about the work of the department. One of the items was a mimeographed document entitled "Canada's National Health Services". I find that the first of these services that is spelled out is the national health grants program, and again I read:

> The purposes of the program are—

Then there is a long paragraph which ends with these words:

> . . . to lay the foundation for health insurance.

Mr. Martin: May I ask if the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the hon. member who is now speaking found themselves fully agreed on this subject when they visited our department?

Mr. Knowles: On the subject of health insurance I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South and the Winnipeg Tribune are about the only two in Canada who are still opposed to health insurance.

Mr. Trainor: On a question of privilege, I know the hon. member would not wish to misrepresent me, and the statement he has made now is not correct. He said that I and the Winnipeg Tribune are the only two in Canada not in favour of health insurance. I cannot speak for the Winnipeg Tribune but I can for myself, and I say that statement is not correct. I am in favour of health insurance, but not the type of health insurance the hon. member is in favour of. If he will permit me, I should like to ask him a question while I am on my feet. Does he not realize that Canada is a federal state, and that constitutionally the matter of health and health insurance comes within the purview of the provinces? Would he not think, therefore, that the initiative at the conference in October should come from the provinces rather than from the federal government?

Mr. Knowles: I accept the hon. member's statement of privilege. So far as the Winnipeg Tribune is concerned, I had reference to an editorial a few days ago in which that paper took issue with the very request Mr. Frost had made. So far as my hon. friend is concerned, I am glad to find out that, while he may be interested in a different type of plan than I am, basically he also wants to see health insurance. I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will take note of that. It is now nearly unanimous.

I point out also that during the summer of 1953, when we were in the midst of an election campaign, there was an article on this question written by none other than Mr. J. A. Hume, Citizen parliamentary writer. We all know the accurate prophet Mr. Hume has become. He was able to foretell with uncanny accuracy the outcome of the federal election in 1953. He seemed to know pretty well last December or January what would be in the speech from the throne opening this session of parliament. He had some pretty good ideas as to what might be expected in the budget which was announced on April 5, and just a short while ago he predicted accurately the date of the Ontario election which has now been set for the 9th of June.

In the summer of 1953 this uncanny prophet, whose record for accuracy one must note, had this to say in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen headed "Health Insurance First Liberal Aim":

> Inauguration of a contributory national health insurance scheme during the life of the new 22nd parliament will shortly be announced by Prime Minister St. Laurent as the No. 1 objective of his Liberal administration if re-elected on August 10.

I am sure my hon. friends across the way will not want to disappoint Mr. Hume, let alone some 15 million other Canadians. I am sure they do not want to spoil his record as an accurate prophet, and I hope the point in the life of the twenty-second parliament to which Mr. Hume referred will be in October of this year, and that the government will really take action.

I have shown—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps I could go on for two minutes to make up for the time I spent reading from the speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I had already made what I thought was a generous allowance for the interjection of the minister. But if the hon. member is accorded unanimous consent, then of course he may proceed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question before he takes those two minutes more? He has dealt, in some particularity, with the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare before the 1949 election. It seems to me, however, that he overlooked a very important matter when he did not give us the speech or speeches made by the minister before the 1953 election. I think we can assume that they were made, and it would be important to have them on the record.

Mr. Martin: To save the hon. member's time, because I realize his time is precious, may I say to the adventurous member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that I shall be very glad to supply him with all the material which, obviously, he requires.

Mr. Knowles: That saves me not two minutes but two hours, Mr. Speaker.

Just this in conclusion, let me thank the house for giving me the extra time. I have shown this front page of the Toronto Daily Star of May 15, 1948, to the house on a number of occasions, and I feel that perhaps I should apologize for bringing it down again today. It is almost worn out. However, I did bring it down because it does seem to me that today it is more appropriate than ever. Mr. Mackenzie King made his announcement of the health grants program on May 14, 1948. The next day the Toronto Daily Star ran this headline, "Can't Wait for Ontario—King".

I ask, Mr. Speaker, who is waiting for whom now? Ontario wants studies in the matter. The Minister of National Health and Welfare says he wants health insurance as soon as possible, as soon as we can afford it, as soon as all the difficulties can be ironed out. The people of Canada want it. I call for action, without fail, on this important question at the federal-provincial conference to be held on October 3 of this year.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate some hon. members in the opposition have endeavoured to create the impression that Canadians in the lower income brackets did not get very much consideration by way of personal income tax reductions as compared with those in the substantially higher income brackets.

I think a very good example of that type of thinking has been shown to us this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has just taken his seat. And I might add that if we were to examine the statement made by his leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it would be clear that he follows the same line of thinking. I now quote from Hansard, page 2956, where the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F. party, had this to say:

> When we heard the minister we jumped to the conclusion that the reduction in the tax was more substantial in the lower brackets than in the higher income brackets. What the minister actually did, in spite of any impression to the contrary which was contained in the table which I looked at the night the budget was placed before us, was to reduce the tax rate by two percentage points in all personal income brackets.
> This means that the married taxpayer with two children receiving family allowance and earning $3,000 a year gets a tax reduction of $7 for the whole of 1955.

Then he went on to say this:

> The married man with two children receiving family allowances with an income of $100,000 a year will receive a tax reduction of nearly $1,000, or to be precise, $977. The higher the income the more rebate that is received.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave an example of the reduction for a person who has an income of $400,000 a year, and I believe he gave the reduction as $3,977.

Mr. Knowles: No, $7,954.

Mr. Decore: Perhaps my arithmetic was not correct. I accept the hon. member's figure. In any event, in all fairness to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I would say that the figures they have given are correct. I think, however, that these same figures should be examined from a different angle, so we can get a better perspective and a better picture of the whole situation.

If we were to refer to table V at page 2737 of Hansard, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred, we might see what is stated there concerning the married man with an income of $2,300 and with two children, both of whom are eligible for family allowance. What happens to him? The fact is that this taxpayer does not receive any tax reduction at all. If I were to leave it at that, then of course I would be endeavouring to leave the same impression the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has been trying to leave. But the reason this taxpayer has not received any reduction in personal income tax lies in the fact that he is not taxable at all. At the same time, in addition to his income of $2,300 this same man receives family allowance cheques for his two children which, in the year, amount to something like $150.

Let us now turn to the man with two children and an income of $2,500. What is the tax he would pay in 1955? Of course when using the figures shown in table V one must add the 2 per cent old age security tax. It appears from the table that his tax in 1955 would be $28. Yet, at the same time this man who must pay the tax of $28 receives family allowance cheques from the people of Canada, through the policy initiated by this government, to the extent of about $150. In other words, in addition to his income of $2,500 he receives a bonus of approximately $120.

Let us take another figure that was used by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who referred to the man with an income of $3,000 and with two children eligible for family allowance. His tax for the year 1955 would be $98. At the same time, by way of family allowance cheques he receives $150, which leaves him more than $50 to the good, by way of bonus, if one wishes to put it that way.

Family allowances were enacted to assist people with children in the lower income brackets, so those children may be better fed, better clothed and have better educational facilities; in general, to afford them better opportunities to become good citizens of this country. At the same time, one should take this into account. A young married couple with two children usually have to care for, or they have a moral obligation to assist, their fathers and mothers in their old age, when they reach the age of 65 or 70. Under the policy of the federal government these people in the lower income brackets are receiving indirect benefits from our social security measures in the form of old age security or old age pensions. I would remind this house that the government will spend approximately $1 billion in the coming year on our social security measures, which were intended to assist in particular those who require assistance, and those who are in the lower income brackets.

Let us again refer to table V to see what happens to a person who has an income of $100,000. A person with an income of $100,000 is obliged to pay in taxes the sum of $51,892; a married man with two children whose income is $200,000 is obliged to pay $123,527 in taxes. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave an example of a married man with two children whose income is $400,000. He should have given us not only the reduction this man will receive but also the taxes he will pay in 1955 under this budget. According to this table a married man with two children, whose income is $400,000, is obliged to pay income tax of $278,162.

Mr. Nicholson: How much does that leave him?

Mr. Decore: Well, it still leaves him a substantial amount.

Mr. Knowles: It leaves him $121,838.

Mr. Decore: That is what he will have left, unless you take the whole thing away from him. If that is what you want to do, it is a different matter. The fact is that he will pay over $278,000 out of the $400,000 income that he will receive, if there are such people in Canada.

Mr. Nicholson: And he still has a lot left.

Mr. Decore: It has been the policy of the present government for some years to tax people with high incomes to assist those in the lower income brackets. It is a form of distribution of wealth. The government also follows the policy of encouraging private free enterprise in order to induce people to take risks and to go into various business ventures. Despite our huge expenditures for defence purposes—and as we all know they amount to almost one-half of our total revenue—in this country we have one of the best social security programs of any comparable country in the world. It is also a fact—and if anyone wishes to challenge this I should like to hear him do so—that our rates of income tax are among the lowest in the world, and our personal exemptions for income tax purposes are the best in the world for people in the lower income tax brackets.

Having dealt with some of the criticisms that have been levelled against the government and the budget, I should now like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance and the government certain problems which exist, so the government may take the necessary steps to solve them. I have in mind a problem which is very real and very serious. It has to do with young men who wish to make a start in farming. I have made reference to this matter before, and I wish to do so again. Everybody knows that because of the increased value of farm land generally and the mechanization of farming which involves costly farm machinery, a young man who wishes to start in farming must have at least in the neighbourhood of $15,000.

Nearly all the young men who desire to go into farming in this country find that this amount of money is simply not available to them. It is true we have the farm loan act and the farm improvement act, which were intended to provide credit to farmers, but this credit is extended to farmers who already have land, who already have buildings and machinery. They may be able to borrow money from the farm loan board to buy more land or additional machinery, or to borrow for farming purposes under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, but there is nothing on our statute books to give assistance to young men who wish to start in farming.

It is my contention that those young men who have the experience, who have the know-how and who desire to farm, should remain on the land. They should not go into the industrial centres seeking jobs when they are better qualified to remain on the land, because in so doing they merely add to the problem of unemployment. Therefore I ask the question, could not some scheme or some plan be put into operation to assist these young people and give them a start in farming? I do not pretend to have any formula, but I should like to draw attention to the National Housing Act. Under that act thousands and thousands of Canadians have been able to acquire houses which they otherwise would never have been able to acquire. They have been able to do so because there was a plan or scheme introduced by this government. In enacting that legislation the government did not take any risk, and the lending institutions did not take any risk. Thousands of people have benefited and thousands more will continue to benefit under the National Housing Act. Perhaps a similar scheme could be enacted along those lines for young men and women who wish to go into farming.

I believe that investment in land is the best investment one can make. Furthermore, we already have the machinery set up. The Department of Veterans Affairs offices in the various provinces in Canada have had some experience in this type of work. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, and the cabinet to give this matter some thought. Probably they could appoint a committee or find some other means of solving this problem.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) has stolen a march on me. I thought he was going to continue until five o'clock. Since he has not, I shall have to look over my notes. However, I think I can take up the time of the house for five minutes.

I must confess frankly that I feel a little ashamed coming in at this late date and attempting to find anything new to say. Of course as members of parliament we all like to get something on the record. As I said, it is difficult to find anything new to say when so many have preceded me. I have listened to about 19 budgets brought down by this government, and during that time have listened to the number of speeches which have been delivered this session multiplied by 19. I find it difficult to say much that is new.

The budgets we listen to every year are the same old budgets. There is no difference basically and fundamentally in any of them; they are all the same with respect to basic financial policy. The only shade of difference is that there may be a reshuffling of taxation. Some years some things are taxed higher than others, but the next year those same things may be taxed a little less. It is entirely a matter of running the country one year after another with no change in basic financial policy, but only a reshuffling of the mechanics of the same policy.

I am not going to attempt a detailed analysis of the financial aspects of the budget, as there are other members of the house who are more capable of doing that. Some of them have already tried to give evidence of their capabilities. I am not too much concerned with the analysis of budgets; I am not too concerned with what the financial wizards of the finance department have to say about things; I am not too much concerned about what the big boys of Wall street or of St. James street or of Bay street have to say; I am more concerned about what my friend Joe of Fifth street has to say. I am not too much concerned as to what big business or big industrialists may say about the budget, but I am concerned with one of two things, that is how it affects the rank and file of the people of Canada.

I do not know, but my experience is that these budgets are somewhat glamourized. Budgets come and budgets go, and somehow or other we bow down in humble obeisance to finance and surround it with all the dignity of great potentates and what have you. I always want to laugh when the financial critic of the Conservative party rises in the house and with an air of importance looks over at the finance minister and says, "May I ask the hon. Minister of Finance a question; can he inform us when we may expect the budget?" This happens every year. Then the minister rises; he does not tell him, he simply puts him off. Then perhaps a week or two later some front bencher will rise and ask the minister if he has given any further consideration to the date of the budget.

I do not think my friend Joe of Fifth street cares one bit about the date the budget is brought down. It is brought down eventually, and then another thing happens. Why people should want to crowd into this house on budget night to hear the budget speech is beyond me. As a matter of fact we get telephone calls from our friends and other people wanting to know if they can get tickets to the galleries.

An hon. Member: How about Joe?

Mr. Hansell: The Sergeant-at-Arms informs us that there is a certain precedence in connection with choice seats and the fact is that people line up at the door of the house long before eight o'clock. I do not know why they do that, because frankly the budget speech is one of the driest speeches I have to listen to. I shall try to make mine less dry when I continue at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the words of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the western farmer is fighting mad today, and he is fighting mad for a good reason. A fundamental right which he has enjoyed for over 50 years has been arbitrarily taken away. I refer to the right of the farmer to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice. This is the third successive year in which I have introduced this bill, which sets forth a method by which farmers may have restored to them the right to deliver grain to the elevators of their own choice. Canadians fought in two wars to protect democracy and to prevent the coercion of the few by the many. Thousands of western farmers today are asking that this fundamental right be restored to them.

Under the present system farmers have lost that fundamental right. As hon. members know, in periods of congestion elevators have been plugged. Farmers have been able to deliver grain only to those elevators that obtain the box cars, and they are able to deliver grain to a particular elevator only to the extent that that elevator company may obtain box cars. The railway companies and the government have in their hands the power to decide where and in what proportion farmers may be able to deliver their grain to the various elevator companies. Far too often railway companies going into a town with four or five elevators, ignoring completely the desires of the farmers as to where they wish to deliver their grain, spot one box car to each elevator and therefore determine by that method the proportion of grain that will be handled by the various elevator companies.

Farmers and farm organizations of western Canada have been very patient indeed with this government. They believed that if they came to the minister and the government quietly, without publicity, and explained particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a reasonable manner their important and just demands, the minister would lend to them a sympathetic ear and that between them they would be able to find a method by which that fundamental right could be restored to western farmers. But, instead of getting a sympathetic ear, instead of getting action from the government, they have found that the government has ignored their requests. The government has turned a deaf ear and has said, in effect, "You shall not have restored to you the right to do your business with the elevator firm of your choosing".

I wonder how any cabinet minister or any member opposite would like to be told the business firm from which he must buy his automobile. How would any hon. member like to be told that he would have to take a Volkswagen if he wanted a Cadillac? I am sure he would resent it very much. I wonder if the wife of any hon. member opposite would like to be told that she must shop for her groceries at a certain store on a certain day, and at no other store, if she wants to eat and to feed her family. That in effect is what farmers have been told by this unfair and unjust method of box car distribution, namely that if they are to get any income at all in a given period of time in order to buy food and clothing for their families and for the purchase of farm supplies, they must deliver grain whether they like it or not to the elevator that has the box cars.

So I say that every hon. member opposite should support the measure I am now moving; and every member of parliament from the prairie provinces, if he is to carry out the wishes of his constituents, particularly if he represents a rural constituency, has no choice but to support the proposition that farmers right now shall have restored to them this fundamental right that has been so arbitrarily taken away.

I know that hundreds of letters come to my desk from individual prairie producers asking that this fundamental right be restored, and I know that my colleagues in this group are also receiving many hundreds of letters. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce must have received in his office many thousands of letters from wheat producers, and I would like to have the information as to just how many thousands of letters have come to the minister's office asking that this fundamental right be restored to the farmers. Is it 5,000 letters or 10,000 letters? Is the wheat pool now nearing its objective of getting to the federal government and to members of parliament a total of 30,000 letters asking that this democratic right be restored? I know the campaign has gone on very successfully during the past few weeks, and it is still going on.

I venture to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has received more letters from western farmers on this subject in the last three weeks than any western cabinet minister has received since 1942, when farmers staged a march on Ottawa. In the words of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the farmers are fighting mad; they are out to get justice for themselves; and if the method of requesting the government by letter this time does not work, then they are going to adopt other measures until this right is restored. In that campaign they have the full and complete support of the C.C.F. party.

I am hoping that members of parliament on all sides of this house will vote for the measure that is before the house today. When I first moved this bill in the spring of 1953, Mr. Ross, the then member for Souris, speaking on behalf of the Conservative party, said that it was a step in the right direction. The Minister of Trade and Commerce then moved an amendment that the bill be given the six months' hoist, and the members of the Conservative party voted against that move by the government to kill the bill. Last year, however, the Conservative party in this house reversed its stand. I am going to issue a warning to the Conservative party right now that, if they wish to get any support whatever in rural areas of western Canada, they had better support the proposition that farmers be given the right to deliver grain to the elevator of their own choice. I am asking them to reconsider their stand and when the vote is taken to support this measure.

As I have said, the letters have come in by the thousand to members of parliament and to the government. I am sure I could not explain the desires and the wishes of western grain producers in this regard as well as they are explained in this letter from Mr. Harold E. Voechting, of Tribune, Saskatchewan, dated April 20, 1955, which reads as follows:

Mr. Hazen Argue, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Argue,

As our member of parliament for our riding, I follow with interest your various speeches and debates in the House of Commons.

As a farmer, grain grower, I am vitally interested in any legislation that is for better living and working conditions for the farmer. Grain quotas, box car shortage, and storage space are as you know one of our biggest headaches on the farm, and the unequal distribution of box cars is very annoying. Under the present system, if a farmer wants to sell any grain he must take it to the elevator that the railways see fit to send cars to. Special shipping orders by the wheat board have made the car order book obsolete. I think it is time some legislation was enacted to let the farmer at least have a choice of where he can deliver his grain. We are supposed to be living in the freest country in the world, yet our government will not devise a plan that will enable the grain grower to be able to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice.

I urge you, Mr. Argue, as our very capable M.P., to do your utmost to have the government pass such legislation at this sitting.

That sets forth the wish of western farmers to have restored to them the right to deliver grain to the elevator of their own choice.

Government members may claim that the present situation is merely temporary, that if we should have another poor crop the congestion will not be nearly as great, and that therefore it is unnecessary to amend the Canada Grain Act in this regard. However, I should like to point out to government members that modern methods of harvesting our grain crops make it possible and practical for farmers to harvest all their grain within a few weeks, and haul it out to the elevators. The farmers being very short of cash, as they are particularly when their crop is small, are anxious to haul out as much grain as they can, as quickly as they can, in order to cover their accounts. Hence they naturally attempt to haul their grain out as quickly as possible after harvesting so that even if there is a relatively small crop, as there was in 1954, the congestion continues. The congestion that has continued over the last three years with regard to this box car situation is therefore likely to continue in the future, I suggest, because of our new, modern methods of harvesting and hauling grain.

That being the case, I suggest to the government that the amendment that is required is not one to amend the Canada Grain Act just for this year, to meet a temporary situation, but is an amendment that is necessary to meet a situation that is likely to continue for many years to come.

In this demand all farm organizations in western Canada are united. The western wheat pools are speaking with one voice. The farmers' union, in one brief after another presented to the government, have mentioned the problem of box car distribution and have asked that a fair method of box car distribution be adopted. The measure I am proposing this afternoon is that the Canada Grain Act be amended to read as follows:

If, at any time, no unfilled application for a car appears in the car order book at a marketing point, the railway agent shall then apportion railway cars among the elevator companies in the proportion that the acreage has been divided among the elevator companies.

The bill in the preceding paragraph makes it possible for farmers to list their acreage and to apportion their acreage among the elevator companies at the marketing point. After they do that, as set forth in this bill, before October 1 in each year, then the number of acres allotted to each elevator shall be added up and, on the basis of the farmer's choice as outlined by the allocation of his acreage, the railway companies are accordingly required to apportion the box cars among the elevator companies.

As I have said, this fundamental principle is being supported by all farm organizations today. The Saskatchewan wheat pool has sent to the various members of parliament a brochure setting forth their opinions and their suggestions as to how this problem can be dealt with. They are asking that the farmer himself have the right, by posting his acreage, to elect where he wishes to deliver his grain and by so doing to make provision for box cars to be spotted accordingly.

The only real difference I can see between the bill that is now before the house and the proposition advanced by the western wheat pools is that by my bill the farmers would vote by open ballot, whereas the wheat pools are suggesting that the choice be made by secret ballot. If the government is prepared to adopt the suggestion of the wheat pool organization, I for one shall be pleased to support it. I do not think it makes much difference whether the farmer sets forth in his permit book, as he now does with regard to his seeded acreage, his opinion as to where he wishes to deliver his grain or whether, as the pools suggest, he expresses his opinion on a ballot which is subsequently placed in an envelope and sent to the board of grain commissioners for their guidance.

The thing that is important is the principle, namely that farmers have a right to deliver grain to the elevator of their own choice. Farmers, I believe, should have the same economic freedom as is now enjoyed by every other group in the Canadian economy.

By this bill we are asking that farmers in western Canada have that fundamental freedom restored to them.

I suppose that members from non-prairie provinces may say they do not take any interest in this measure. But I suggest that the principle involved in this measure is far more fundamental than whether a number of box cars should go to one prairie elevator or another. The extremely important principle is that no group of Canadians should be denied something that I suggest every member of parliament must believe is a democratic, basic Canadian right. The right is that any Canadian, when he decides to sell his produce—whether it be agricultural produce or whether it be his labour—has a right to sell that product to the firm of his own choosing. To say that western farmers today have that freedom would be to deny the truth of the statements by thousands of farmers that have been received by members of parliament and by the government.

The wheat pool set out in some detail the type of amendment they are seeking. In addition to this general, broad method of determining the distribution of box cars, they say that if the wheat board must order out of turn box cars, those additional out of turn box cars must also be calculated in the formula. I would suggest one further amendment that might be placed in the statute or might be provided for by regulation. That is if, because of the out of turn box cars, within the full year period the exact apportionment has not taken place according to the farmers' own wishes, whatever extra box cars an elevator may have obtained should be carried forward into the next year and be treated in the next year's formula. If that were done the apportionment could be made absolutely in keeping with the farmers' own wishes.

We have been at this problem now for a number of years. We expected that we would get it solved when the transport controller was appointed. The transport controller had his powers extended in the 1953-54 session. Under that statute the transport controller has power, in my judgment, to do everything that we are now asking be done in the way of the distribution of box cars. However, he has never cared to exercise the authority to allocate box cars that parliament has provided.

As I have said in previous debates, he does not really allocate box cars at all. If a member or someone else gets a complaint that a given point is not getting sufficient box cars, and if the transport controller is asked to do something about the situation, he will bring it to the attention of the railway company in the hope that the railway company will provide additional cars at that marketing point; but at no time does he allocate box cars among the elevator companies on the basis of the farmers' own choice.

To solve this problem we have tried the transport controller, and that has been a complete failure. The minister has said in the past that the car order book, a provision that has been in the Canada Grain Act for a great many years, was sufficient to give farmers the right to deliver grain to the elevator of their own choice. For example, in the debate on December 15, 1953, the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say, as found at page 937 of Hansard:

> I do not think enough attention is being paid to the car order book.

Then he went on to explain the provisions of the car order book. He said the car order book is a method by which the farmers can determine where box cars shall be spotted, and by that method can provide for their use sufficient space in the elevator where they wish to market their grain. Of course the fallacy of that argument is that the car order book has already been tried. The car order book has a lot of merit and can do a job in many instances, but as soon as the farmers at a local marketing point have the car order book in effect, and as soon as other farmers at other marketing points across western Canada have the car order book in effect, what happens? The transport controller steps in, uses his wide powers and suspends the operation of the car order book. Farmers are then back in exactly the same position they were in before they began using the car order book.

In other words, instead of the transport controller and the government assisting the farmers to market their grain at the elevator of their own choice they have taken away in many instances the one provision which was placed on the statute books of the country long ago so the farmers might have that right. Instead of helping the farmers to use this fundamental right the government helped take it away.

We thought we were making some progress last year. We had a long discussion in the standing committee on agriculture. We had witnesses from the various grain companies. We had the minister saying that he was considering the implementation of a car cycle whereby the government, the transport controller, whoever was in charge, would take a period following the war in which there was little congestion, and on the basis of the business done by each elevator company at the marketing point would apportion box cars accordingly. I was never enthusiastic about that procedure. I thought something better should be done. I did not think you could obtain justice for the farmers in 1955 by tying the distribution of box cars to the dead past, to the wishes of farmers in a previous period even though it was a period in which there was little congestion. But I was quite prepared to admit that that kind of car cycle woud be a vast improvement over the present method of allowing the railway companies, in the main, to determine the distribution of box cars at any elevator point.

I have reviewed the lack of action by the government. I have pointed out the fact that the government, instead of helping the farmers to solve this problem whenever by their own volition they have attempted to do so, has permitted the transport controller to step in and block the farmers' action by cancelling the car order book.

I have said many times that the personnel of the board of grain commissioners are not carrying out the wishes of organized agriculture and the farmers generally. We all know that in some instances the board is loaded with straight political appointees, and if it is not a straight political appointment then you can almost be certain it will be somebody who was very closely connected with the Winnipeg grain exchange. Whenever you get this Liberal-grain exchange partnership the farmers of western Canada are bound to suffer. I think that is one of the real reasons why they are in this difficulty today. Apparently there is no one in the board of grain commissioners or in the ranks of the cabinet who wishes to restore to the farmers this fundamental right. They would far rather continue this conspiracy to deprive the farmers of a fundamental Canadian right.

I do not claim that this bill is necessarily the final answer. I do not really care whether or not this particular measure is adopted, as long as I get the assurance from a responsible cabinet minister that legislation will be brought in by the government at this session to fulfil the letter and the spirit of the requests of the three western wheat pools as far as amendments to the law are concerned. I am prepared to go further. I am prepared to support in committee any amendment by the government that they might think would improve the measure in order to carry out its principal objective. As a further alternative, if after the measure has received second reading, the government would like the whole question reviewed once again by the standing committee on agriculture and the bill reported back to the house at this session, I am quite prepared to agree.

But I shall not allow the measure to drop unless and until there is concrete assurance from the government that action will be taken at this session to meet the requests of organized agriculture. If the Liberal members from Saskatchewan wish to stay in tune, which is questionable, with the opinions of the Saskatchewan Liberal party, they will support the principle of this measure. But since Saskatchewan now has two Liberal parties, or a Liberal party that functions in two parts, it is rather difficult to forecast what their position may happen to be.

Mr. Studer: The socialists have none.

Mr. Argue: I should like to remind the hon. member who has interrupted that at a certain Liberal party convention held in the province of Saskatchewan in September, 1954, a motion was moved and adopted with respect to this matter, and in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of September 23, 1954 there is the following:

> Resolutions designed to make life more enjoyable for farmers were passed at the provincial Liberal party convention here Friday.

Wonderful.

> On the question of box car allocation, the convention urged that the Canada Grain Act be amended to provide for placing box cars at country elevators in accordance with the farmers' preference so they could deliver grain to the elevator of their choice. At the same time, the act would retain for the individual growers their right to order cars under the car order book section.

Liberal members of the house from Saskatchewan can demonstrate that they really want to take steps that would make farm life in Saskatchewan more enjoyable, not by supporting a fundamentally C.C.F. measure but by supporting a resolution of their own convention in Saskatchewan last fall, calling for amendments to the Canada Grain Act to restore this fundamental right to western farmers.

To show that at least the provincial section of the Liberal party meant business, may I point out that a resolution was unanimously supported in the Saskatchewan legislature which asked that this right be restored. The resolution, moved by Mr. Wooff and seconded by Mr. Swallow, is listed in the votes and proceedings of the legislative assembly of the province of Saskatchewan for March 24, 1955, and reads as follows:

> That this assembly urge the federal government to implement a box car distribution that insures the farmer the right to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice.
> A debate arising, and the question being put, it was agreed to unanimously.

That was the resolution passed by the Saskatchewan legislature and agreed to unanimously by members of the Liberal party and of the C.C.F. party, asking the federal government to implement a box car distribution system that would ensure to the farmer the right to deliver grain to the elevator of his own choice. It was carried unanimously; all were for it.

I ask Liberal members of parliament from Saskatchewan and from other provinces in western Canada to stand in their places and support the restoration of this fundamental right to western farmers.

Mr. Castleden: And call a vote on it, too.

Mr. Argue: We shall take care of calling the vote in due course.

The three western wheat pools are asking for such an amendment to the Canada Grain Act. The demand is also approved by the farm unions. And I suggest to Liberal members from western Canada that they should look at the state of the Liberal party and ask themselves why their party in three of the western provinces is, for all practical purposes, almost non-existent. It is because it has ceased to be the voice of the common people of those provinces. And if the Liberal party in Manitoba as well is not to continue on the skids, downhill, then Liberal members from that province who sit in the House of Commons should on this occasion, and on future occasions, vote in the interests of their farmer constituents who have sent them to the House of Commons to work on their behalf.

I suggest to members on all sides of the house that, as good Canadians, believing in the democratic right of free choice, they should support this measure that will restore to western farmers a fundamental Canadian right, namely the right to deliver grain to the elevators of their choice.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about Bill No. 22. As the hon. member sponsoring the bill has said, this very same bill was presented to the house last year and the year before. Each year I have had quite a bit to say, and I do not propose this year to repeat what I said previously.

However, in view of statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), not to mention the gratuitous political advice he so profusely handed out to all members in the house, I should like to refer to some of his remarks. One thing that struck me above everything else is that he tried to leave the impression—indeed he so stated specifically and repeatedly—that the government had purposely gone out of its way to deny a long-acquired right of farmers to deliver to the elevator of their choice. Of course nothing could be more ridiculous than such a statement.

Mr. Castleden: Prove it.

Mr. Jutras: I shall. Just hold on. I have 40 minutes to prove it. Everybody knows that no one has denied anyone any right on that score at all. It just so happens that, because of a shortage of box cars, a situation has developed.

The hon. member said the government had ignored the plea and the demand of farm organizations out west. Again, to say the least, this is a very broad exaggeration of the true situation; because I am sure that even the farm organizations, particularly the three wheat pools primarily concerned with this matter, would be the first to deny that statement. On every occasion—and it was repeated recently—the government and the Canadian wheat board have given the matter careful consideration and have tried to meet the wishes of all concerned, including the private line companies, in order to find a solution to this problem.

One of the main difficulties of my hon. friend from Assiniboia is that he associates with this bill the right of a person to deliver to the elevator of his choice. I suggest there is a vast difference between the bill as he has presented it and the right to deliver to the elevators of our choice; because there are grave doubts in the minds of many producers in western Canada that this bill will do what the hon. member says it will do.

Last year, when we sat in the committee on agriculture, this whole matter was gone into at some length. Representatives of the pools were there to testify and the secretary of the line elevators' association, which represents all the line elevators in western Canada, was also present to give his testimony.

In this way we got the story from all angles, including evidence from the board of grain commissioners and the Canadian wheat board. As a matter of fact representatives of the various pools were asked what they thought of the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and each of them replied that he had very grave doubts that the bill could be made workable.

After listening to all the evidence and doing my share of study of this problem, it is my opinion that the bill is not workable and, as I said, I believe the pools agree. As a matter of fact, as the hon. member has said, the pools have offered another method by which they thought this situation might be resolved.

Mr. Castleden: Almost identical.

Mr. Jutras: If it had been the same the pools would not have gone to the trouble of preparing it.

Mr. Castleden: It is the same; I have it.

Mr. Jutras: The mere fact that they went to the trouble of circularizing all members in Saskatchewan, and of sending the resolution to members of the government is proof enough that they thought their system was better than the one offered by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

Now, the hon. member for Assiniboia suggests in one breath that we should adopt this bill today, and in the same breath urges that we should adopt the suggestion of the pools. I do not see how the two views can be reconciled.

Mr. Argue: Which are you for?

Mr. Jutras: If the act is amended as set out in Bill No. 22, then automatically the suggestion by the pools falls by the wayside. Surely the hon. member is not advocating both. The hon. member has tried to excuse himself by saying that, in effect, the suggestion by the pools is the same as his. Obviously this is not so.

Mind you, let me say that I do not think the suggestion of the pools would solve the problem, either. We know that the objective everybody is seeking—and it is not to be found exclusively in the C.C.F. party, the Liberal party or for that matter any other political party—is to devise a way of re-establishing the order of things as it existed before the shortage of box cars occurred, and that is to allow the farmer to sell to the elevator of his choice. Well, the car order book is one part of the Canada Grain Act which attempts to preserve that right.

Last year we had a suggestion from the pools, mainly, that the car order book be reinstated, and the government reinstated it. At the time I did make my position quite clear. I did say that I doubted very much whether you could make the car order book function in a condition of congestion such as we have at the moment. I expressed grave doubts. I thought the transport controller had shown good judgment the year before when he suspended the operation of the car order book.

We have had the experience of another year with the car order book. I think I detected—although he did not say so in so many words—in the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia that he now thinks the car order book is not functioning the way it should. He did not suggest that it be suspended again, but personally I think the time has probably come when it should be suspended, because it cannot be made to work efficiently and equitably in a condition of acute shortage such as we have at the moment.

It will be interesting to hear what the various pools will have to say before the agriculture committee. This whole matter should be left until we have discussed the matter again before that committee. Again I hope that all the pools and all the organizations concerned will make it a point to appear before that committee and present their case and try to find a solution, if one can be found, to the problem. Mind you, the problem today is not what it was last year and the year before. My impression is that the problem has greatly shifted. The problem at the moment is not so much the equitable distribution as between elevators at one point. As I understand it at the moment, the problem is far more the allocation as between companies, and that is a problem which has to be met in another way.

As long as there is an acute shortage of cars, I do not care what scheme anybody tries to devise, there will be a problem and it will be a hard one to solve. Personally I do not think we should clutter up the Canada Grain Act with any elaborate scheme of car distribution. I do not think it should be included in the act as permanent legislation. I admit that the situation is not as acute in Manitoba as it is in Saskatchewan, and my understanding is that it is not as acute in Alberta as it is in Saskatchewan.

A moment ago the hon. member referred to the hundreds of letters he had received from the various pools. I for one have not received any letters except the one master copy that was sent from the Saskatchewan wheat pool organization, and I do not know of any other members from my province who have received any copies. I think that is generally true of members from Alberta. That would tend to indicate that the problem is definitely more acute in Saskatchewan than it is in Manitoba or Alberta. The point is that we do not hear the cry we heard in previous years that the railways were distributing box cars on the basis of one elevator, one car. I notice that the hon. member for Assiniboia, whether deliberately or not, did not refer to it this year, which would again prove my contention that the problem is not exactly the same as it was in previous years.

The evidence in the agriculture committee last year proved that it would be hard to argue that box cars were allocated on the basis of one elevator, one car, because the statistics presented to the committee showed that the various companies, line elevators as against the pools, did not deliver the same amount of grain and consequently could not receive the same number of box cars. The only dispute there could be would be about percentages. Therefore the argument that they delivered on the basis of one elevator, one car, could not be advanced very successfully in view of that evidence. However, as I say, this matter will come before the agriculture committee and I hope that we will all avail ourselves of the opportunity to get all the information necessary on that point. I know we can get it, because the witnesses will all be there. Surely it would be advisable and wise to wait until we have all the latest evidence and the recommendations of the various bodies before we embark on any particular scheme.

In view of the fact that the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which is the major marketing agency in the province and which handles a very large percentage of the crop—as a matter of fact, in 1952-53 they handled 46 per cent of all marketings in that province—has a suggestion of its own, we should at least give it the advantage and privilege of presenting its scheme to us in the agriculture committee, and we should study that scheme before passing this bill. As I say, the one is not the same as the other.

It is all very well to ask the farmer to elect where he wishes to deliver his grain. I say to the hon. member who presented this bill that I never could understand why he chose October 1 for the allocation of cars. After all, by October 1 in Manitoba most of the crop has already been sold. This is just a technical detail. Once the farmer has elected to deliver to an elevator his choice disappears, because he has to deliver to that elevator. In other words, he is at the mercy of that one elevator for that crop year.

My hon. friend shakes his head. I know what he has in mind. He says oh, no, he does not have to; he can elect. How can you allocate cars if the farmer can change his mind and give his grain to one elevator one day and another elevator another day? If you do that you will have more confusion than ever. If a farmer is to elect according to his choice, then he has to make the choice. If he does not have to make a choice, how can you allocate box cars? It is either one or the other. You cannot possibly have it both ways. That is the opinion of a great many people.

Let me tell the hon. member that a great many producers would hesitate before tying themselves up to one elevator for a whole crop year. It may be all right in some places where there is a very staunch supporter of the pool. He may not hesitate too much to sign all his acreage to the pool elevator. But there are many points at which there are no pool elevators, for instance, and there are two or three private concerns. I am sure farmers would hesitate before tying themselves down for the whole crop year to one line elevator or the other.

In spite of the fact that at the moment the farmer may not have a full choice, he still has a choice; and when he gets into a row with elevator A he can cross over to elevator B or elevator C and sell over there. I have done it myself in the last two years, though I am not saying I have gotten into rows with elevator companies. I did it because the line-up was too great. There are a great many factors to be taken into consideration when a farmer has to deliver, and he cannot foresee what may happen five or six months in the future.

As I said, I do not intend to reiterate everything I said last year and the year before. But the fact is that a lot of people are leery of this great rigidity, and I do not think it should be placed in the Canada Grain Act. But that does not mean that the problem cannot be solved to a large degree.

The hon. member made the statement that the railroad companies have the power to deny to a farmer the right to deliver to the elevator of his choice. That statement is outdated, and I challenge the hon. member to give me one case in the last year where the station agent was in position to do that. You can read the statement and think it over. The cars are not sent to the agent for the agent to do what he likes with them. This situation does not exist at the moment. If the hon. member will write to any of his friends who are station agents they will tell him that they have not had that privilege for some time.

Then the hon. member said the matter had been referred to the transport controller, who had done nothing. Again this is an exaggeration of the facts. The transport controller and the board of grain commissioners have no jurisdiction in the matter. I challenge the hon. member to show me any section in the Canada Grain Act which gives them authority to allocate box cars in a given point. To say that the matter was referred to the transport controller who had done nothing is leaving a wrong impression, and I do not think it is fair to the transport controller, who has done an excellent job. There are many producers in the west who are grateful for what he has done. He is still doing a great job as controller. There has never been a case to my knowledge since he was appointed controller where a ship has had to wait for grain because there were no cars to move it. Anyone who will look at the matter objectively must agree that he has done a great job.

The fact remains that the board of grain commissioners never had any authority to allocate box cars. Possibly under section 15 (k) they could allocate cars as between stations, but that is all they could do. Acting unofficially the controller has tried to help because he is in constant contact with the railroads. His efforts have relieved the situation in some places. I do not think anyone has any complaint to make as to the allocation between stations. The hon. member has raised this point consistently every year in these debates but the fact is that these people are not involved, because they have no authority in the matter. Authority has never been given to them.

This bill is not what the wheat pool is asking for. The wheat pool has made its own suggestion, which will be placed before the agriculture committee. I expect that their representatives will be there to defend it, and I expect also that representatives of the line companies will be there to present their case. We will then be in position to appraise the situation and see if anything can be done.

It has been said that this box car shortage will be a continuing condition, and with that I agree to a degree. It is quite likely that there will be congestion at the time of harvesting for perhaps three or four weeks, but apart from that it is quite likely that there will not be the necessity to allocate box cars.

It comes down to this one fundamental, that there are just not enough cars to go around and you cannot split a car in two.

We have tried various methods and they have not worked. According to the experts the method suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia is not workable either. The pool have another one, and there are grave doubts whether that will be workable. However, we do not know the details but we will find out later about it. I suggest that this debate should be postponed until hon. members have had an opportunity to discuss the whole matter in the agriculture committee. They will then be in better position to make recommendations.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business it was considering at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Jutras.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, before five o'clock I had just a few minutes to begin my presentation on the budget, and at that time I stated that I did not quite comprehend why the budget that is brought down from year to year had been so glamourized. I stated that for my own part I considered it one of the driest speeches during the whole parliamentary session, perhaps because a good deal of it was technical. I wondered why it should be surrounded with such glamour for, after all, almost any budget that is brought down is bad news. However, it is glamourized.

I remember many years ago the first budget speech I listened to. Hon. Mr. Dunning, who presented that budget, came dressed for the occasion in his morning coat and striped trousers, and with a flower in his lapel. It certainly added to the dignity of the occasion, but when I attempted to analyse that budget and discover what he had done for the people in those depression days, I wondered why he really needed to don such finery.

Mr. Knowles: The morning coat was appropriate, if it is spelled right.

Mr. Hansell: If it is spelled right. The practice evidently has continued; although the present finance minister did not wear such dignified apparel, he did put on his Sunday clothes and wore a flower in his lapel.

I am not so interested in why he should look his neatest when he presents a budget. The amazing thing to me is that the people crowd into the gallery so much to listen to that speech. If they were only wise they would tune in their radios that night, or go out and buy a newspaper, and they could read in about three minutes the thing they really wanted to find out; that is, whether or not they were going to get any relief from their taxation. But when I see them in the gallery, crowded as they are, I cannot help thinking that they look like several hundred or a thousand prisoners in the dock. There they sit, in reality waiting to hear their economic sentence for the next year.

These citizens have committed no crime. They have not robbed any banks, they have not cheated, and I do not think they have done too much lying—not any more than I have. Yet there they sit, waiting to hear their economic sentence, the sentence for being good citizens. They may not know it, but there they are with a noose around their necks—an imaginary one perhaps, and yet a very real one. It is the noose of taxation and, as they listen to the Minister of Finance, they are actually listening to find out whether that noose is to be tightened a little and choke them a little more, or whether it is to be loosened just a little—not very much, as they cannot afford to loosen it too much. Of course they cannot afford to tighten it too much either, or the patient will die and then, of course, they will not get any taxes at all because dead people pay no taxes. That is how it appears to me.

As I said before five o'clock, these budgets may be of interest to business in the country, but I really wondered what the average person thought about them. I had a request the other day from a friend of mine for a copy of Hansard containing the budget speech. So I sent him a complimentary copy with a covering letter telling him that I was very happy to enclose this budget speech but that I was quite sure he would not understand what it was all about. I said it would take him much longer to read than I thought he perhaps at first had anticipated; and that when he got into some of the tables I was quite certain that he would not be able to understand them, as perhaps 99 per cent of members of parliament are unable to understand them.

What is it that the average person is looking for? What is it that the average person is thinking about? I do not believe he is thinking in terms of all sorts of complicated tables, necessary as they may be, coming from the Minister of Finance of this country. What the average person is looking for is the highest possible standard of living in order that he might enjoy life as a free citizen of Canada.

It seems to me that the great objective of the financial policy of the government should be to give the people of Canada the highest standard of living, and yet allow them to remain free to enjoy life to the utmost of our productive capacity. It seems to me that should be a very simple thing, yet somehow or other the government does not seem to be arriving at that ultimate objective. The people look around and recognize that Canada is capable of producing tremendous quantities of almost everything. They see that Canada's productive capacity is able to give perhaps the highest standard to all citizens in the country. I must be fair in this regard, and I think when times are good we have a reasonably high standard of living. However, it occurs to me that it is a strange state of affairs that times can be good only when the country is going into debt. People want to be free to live and enjoy life in their own way without any interference from dictatorial controls from the top.

We are facing a problem in Canada today. I am not going to take time to speak on the unemployment problem, but there is no question that it exists. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, as well as other officials, have admitted that one of the reasons for our unemployment is that there is overproduction. We in this corner of the house refuse to use that term "overproduction". We claim there is underconsumption. However, ministers have admitted that because there is an abundance of everything—overstocked inventories, I believe, is the phraseology used—therefore we have unemployment and hardship.

To those who sit in this corner of the house the problem is not difficult but, evidently because the government are pursuing a certain financial policy, the problem does appear to them to be difficult. They call their dominion-provincial conferences and make all sorts of plans as to how they are going to deal with this situation, without fundamentally changing their financial policy.

What is the picture? We have a picture here of an abundance of everything that could make life happy and contented and secure. Canada is able to do that, as far as material production is concerned. We have the goods piled up. It does not make any difference what it is. It can be foodstuffs, furniture or clothing. It can be whatever it is that meets the people's needs. There we have it piled up in abundance.

On the other hand what do we find? We find people with incomes that are not adequate to live on. Even those who have fair incomes are obliged to stretch their dollars in order to live. If some of them want to get something that is a little bit beyond their everyday pay envelope, they are obliged to get it on the instalment plan, thus mortgaging their future incomes so they cannot possibly buy future production. Those who are unemployed have no incomes, and those who are employed have not incomes high enough to buy that great volume of goods that Canada is able to produce and does produce.

Between those people and that great pile of production sit the cabinet, the people who govern the business and economic welfare of Canada. There they sit. What is their problem? Their problem should be simple. Their problem is to get that pile of goods distributed to those people. That should be a simple matter. Yet somehow or other it is a tremendous problem for the brains of this country, sitting in the seats of the mighty, to bring those goods to the people to whom they really belong. Why is it that they cannot move those goods? To put the matter in a simpler fashion, here are six loaves of bread and here are six hungry men. Yet the brains of the country cannot say how those six loaves of bread can be moved to those six hungry men.

Mr. Ellis: They believe in private enterprise.

Mr. Hansell: That is a strange situation. You would think there were enough brains in the cabinet to figure out the solution, would you not? There should be. The other day I happened to look in the Parliamentary Guide and did a little bit of figuring. It may be startling, Mr. Speaker, for me to tell you that distributed among the men in the cabinet are no less than 59 doctor's degrees. Some of them, of course, are honorary degrees. There are 7 master's degrees and perhaps a good many more that are not mentioned because of the fact that if their doctor's degrees are earned, their master's degrees are not always mentioned. There are 12 bachelor's degrees. There are one or two of the cabinet who were lecturers in universities, and two of the cabinet were at one time chancellors of universities.

You would think that with all those brains residing within the craniums of those who sit on the treasury benches, Mr. Speaker, they should be able to figure out how to move that vast production over to the people of Canada who have produced it and to whom it rightfully belongs. You would think that, but they cannot do it with all their brains. Yet it is said that those of us in this corner of the house who claim to have the solution to the problem have no brains.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. Hansell: My leader says he is going to quit the party now. I hope I am not left to lead it, because I am afraid I shall have to lead a party without any brains. At least that is what our Liberal friends think.

Mr. Knowles: The blind leading the blind.

Mr. Hansell: We have been labelled the crackpots; we have been labelled the funny money men, but I am going to say this. If all those brains that are now resting on the treasury benches cannot solve this simple problem, perhaps the people will some day see fit to use their brains and put us crackpots over there on the government side to do the job. I am quite satisfied that we could do a job of that kind more efficiently than those who have among them 59 doctor's degrees, 7 master's degrees, 12 bachelor's degrees, university lecturers and university chancellors.

Mr. Winch: The independents are looking for a leader.

Mr. Hansell: The independents may be looking for a leader but if the C.C.F. go on the way they are going, they will be looking for members.

Mr. Knowles: The country is full of them.

Mr. Hansell: I have listened to some of the speeches today and there is no question in the world, Mr. Speaker, that the present Liberal government is not solving the problems that face the Canadian people. Of course, I must go around the house. I have listened to my Conservative friends.

An hon. Member: Friends? What do you mean?

Mr. Hansell: I hope I never cease to have friends. Even those in the Liberal party are my friends, I hope. I sometimes really hate myself. Do you know what my job is? Believe it or not, my job is to go out through this country and depose all you members. That is a dirty thing. I am obliged to go out through this country and help to unseat my friends. Just imagine that.

Mr. Boisvert: You may find yourself unseated some day.

Mr. Hansell: As I say, I hate myself when I think of it. My only compensating thought is the knowledge that my friends are out to unseat me.

I have heard my Conservative friends speak on this budget and I am amazed. There are some bright chaps in the Conservative party today.

Mr. MacDougall: There were until they went over to you.

Mr. Hansell: They rant away at what is wrong with the budget, yet they do not offer any change in fundamental policy.

Mr. Dufresne: We are not through yet.

Mr. Knowles: When are you going to start?

Mr. Hansell: It is a nice thing to know that my friends are not through yet; but I have listened to them for a good many years and I have not heard them suggest any change in fundamental policy. What they are doing may be illustrated in this way. The Liberal party is in an automobile. There is something wrong with the carburetor and something wrong with the fundamental principle of the combustion engine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: My Conservative friends say, "If you will only let us get in the driver's seat we will be able to make that old jalopy go much better than you can. The trouble with you is you have too many bolts on the bumper at the back and not enough bolts on the bumper at the front". They would change the bumpers around and put more bolts in here and more nuts in there.

An hon. Member: You have a monopoly on the nuts.

Mr. Hansell: I call my Conservative friends the bolts and nuts boys. What we need is a different fundamental policy. We are trying to ride in the old jalopy when we are now in a new age with a different type of combustion engine altogether. What we Social Crediters claim is that present financial policy cannot possibly meet the needs of this advanced age. I want to say a word to my socialist friends.

An hon. Member: They want to take the wheels off the car.

Mr. Hansell: They are not concerned with such changes. They are concerned with who owns the car. That is their trouble, but I do not like to say too much about them. They are having their troubles, and I do not want to put myself in the position of kicking a man who is down. I am afraid I will have to be a little more gracious to them. My friends have simply gone all to pieces lately, and I like to be as kind and considerate to them as I can.

Of course the reason they have gone to pieces is that they have been trying to ride two horses at the same time. They have been advocating nationalization when in reality they have at the same time been supporting a good deal of free enterprise. They talk nationalization, yet some of them own their own farms and businesses. When you talk of nationalizing their farms and businesses they turn thumbs down on that. In fact we listened to a speech this afternoon by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I cannot quote from his speech because it was in another debate, but what did he do? He made a speech on the necessity of the farmers of Canada being free to choose—

Mr. Ellis: C.C.F. policy.

Mr. Hansell: —where to deliver their grain. My C.C.F. friends talk continually of a planned economy, but when the government attempts to plan the routing of cars in an emergency they say, oh no, you must not do that. You must not plan, you must give the farmers an absolutely free hand. It does not make sense. All I am saying is that you cannot ride two horses at the same time. If it is to be a planned economy then let them go the limit and have a planned economy.

I hope the day never comes when we have a socialist planned economy in this country. I have asked them before and I ask them again, who is going to do the planning? They are not going to be satisfied to let us do the planning. They are not going to be satisfied to let the government do the planning. They are the ones who want to do the planning, so when they talk of a planned economy you can put it down, and make no mistake about it, that they believe in a socialist planned economy. A socialist planned economy means that the freedom of the people is thrown to the winds. You cannot have a planned economy if the people rise up and say "We do not want to fit into the plan". What is going to happen then? A planned economy means the loss of freedom.

I do not like to say I had a dream the other night, but I am mighty glad it was a dream. I woke up with a nightmare. I saw my C.C.F. friends sitting on the government benches.

An hon. Member: That will be the day.

Mr. Ellis: A vision of the future.

An hon. Member: That certainly was a dream.

Mr. Hansell: It was worse than a dream; it was a nightmare. They had their own boys sitting there and they had changed the names of the portfolios somewhat. Here was Hon. Mr. Coldwell sitting there as prime minister. Beside him was Hon. Mr. MacInnis who was labelled as minister of the public purse and taxation. Beside him was Hon. Mr. Cameron, controller of defence production. Here was Hon. Mr. Stewart, minister of foreign affairs, world government and demobilization of NATO. Then there was Hon. Mr. Nicholson, minister of justice, Hon. Mr. Regier, minister of provincial relations, Hon. Mr. Knight, minister of propaganda and cultural stimuli, and Hon. Mr. Noseworthy was minister of labour. Then Hon. Mr. Knowles—this was the nightmare—was secretary of state for war. Hon. Mr. Herridge was minister of northern affairs and dam sites. Hon. Mr. Ellis was minister of salt mines and technical surveys. Hon. Mr. McCullough was minister of socialization and confiscation, but there was one thing they would not allow him to socialize or confiscate, and that was the very pretentious farm he owns. Then there was Hon. Mr. Argue, minister of agriculture and bull raising.

That did not make up all their cabinet. They wondered where they could get a minister of citizenship, so they drafted Hon. Mr. Pickersgill and made him minister of citizenship, immigration and birth regulation. There was no minister of welfare because there was no welfare to administer. There was no minister of trade and commerce because they had planned and priced themselves out of the market and could not sell anything. One thing they have always said they would do when they got into office was abolish the Senate, but they did not do away with the Senate. I found that they had elevated Hon. Mr. Harold Winch as leader of the Senate.

Mr. Knowles: He would see that it was abolished.

Mr. Hansell: There was another thing I saw and then I shall be through, Mr. Speaker, because I know you must think I am wasting a lot of time. There was one man in their party they thought should be used for something lest they might lose him, as they have lost others in the past. Yet they did not want him in an official position where he could upset the applecart. So they decided to make Hon. Mr. Clarie Gillis speaker of the house, and Hon. Mr. Coldwell came to him and offered him that position. Mr. Gillis said, "Oh, M. J., just a minute, now; I don't know anything about the rules and regulations of this house. I have not studied those." Mr. Coldwell said, "Just a minute now, Clarie, my boy; you won't have to worry about that. You will have our friend Stan sitting beside you all the time, and he will be able to help you. A wink of the right eye will mean to decide Yes, and a wink of the left eye will mean that you are to decide No. The only reason we are putting you in this position is that we have looked around, and we believe you are the only one who can wear those robes with authority and that tricorn hat with any degree of dignity." And so Clarie was put there.

I know I should close on a serious note. I do say this, that it will always be a problem for this government to find a solution to the difficulties confronting the country. They will always have difficulty if they do not alter the basic principles of their financial policy so those principles reflect the physical facts and physical possibilities. That can be done. We are not going into all the technical arguments on the subject, because we have done that on occasions over the years. But if this government does not alter its basic principles in finance, then the people of this country are going to arise and change the government.

I say once again that I believe the only party in this country that has a solution for that problem consists of those of us who believe in the financial reforms the Social Credit party has presented to the house for a good many years.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all enjoyed the speech of the hon. member for Macleod, who has just taken his seat. I might say there was just one disappointment in his description of his nightmare and that was that, in my view, he did not complete it. To complete a nightmare such as he described, the Social Credit party would have to be Her Majesty's loyal opposition, with the hon. member for Macleod the leader of the opposition. I think that would just about complete the sort of nightmare or dream he had.

When the hon. member rose to speak this evening he apologized, and I almost feel I should follow his example, because I know a great many members are getting pretty tired of this debate. I would point out to them, however, that I have sat here a good many hours and listened to some tiresome speeches, and I think perhaps I am justified in speaking for a few moments this evening. Perhaps I should add that I do not intend to speak for any considerable length of time.

However, one subject was touched upon in the debate which appealed to me, as did many others. This one in particular, however, had to do with the recommendation made by the government in connection with the appointment of a royal commission. At page 2740 of Hansard the Minister of Finance said:

> The government intends, therefore, to appoint a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. The sort of study we have in mind would include probable developments both in our productive capacities and in our external markets.

Not only does that appeal to me, but I am sure it will appeal to the people in my province. I would say, before this commission is appointed, that I am sure when they visit New Brunswick, as no doubt they will, they will find there is one thing in particular we require, and one thing to which I hope this government will pay more attention. The commission will find that the great need in New Brunswick is the development of cheap hydroelectric power.

I listened to two hon. members discuss this subject, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) from the government side and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) from the official opposition, each of whom discussed the subject from a different angle. I feel there is not much difference of opinion in the province with respect to the development of hydroelectric power. I believe the hon. member for Saint John-Albert expressed very well the views of the people of New Brunswick when he said that such hydro development should be on the Saint John river.

I have been amused at times when listening to the hon. member for Westmorland discuss the question of the Chignecto canal. I was amused in particular when, at the first session the hon. member attended, after speaking about the Chignecto canal he said to me, "I hope you will back me up in this." Well, as the hon. member knows, there is a long history to the Chignecto canal, but I do not intend to go into that history this evening. I have done it before on a number of occasions.

However, if hon. members will permit I would go back to the year 1949 only to point out that at that time I had this matter very seriously in mind. At page 912 of Hansard for February 25, 1949, during the discussion of the St. Lawrence seaway, I had this to say:

> This afternoon it is not necessary for me to weary the house with the history of the Chignecto canal. It is sufficient to say that by its construction over 400 miles will be eliminated from the water route of ships travelling from the St. Lawrence river to Saint John, Digby and other ports on the bay of Fundy.
> As far as coastal service is concerned, it would help to shorten the distance for ships wishing to trade with Boston, New York, and ports of the New England states. The gypsum that we produce in the region of the bay of Fundy could be shipped through the Chignecto canal to the central part of Canada, and that industry would benefit greatly. The construction of the canal would benefit our lumbering industry, our fishing industry and practically every other industry in our province.

I quote that simply to show that in 1949, six years ago—four years before the hon. member came to the house—this matter was being very seriously discussed by members of the opposition. Then I went on to say, as reported at page 913:

> I hope that, when the question of the St. Lawrence waterway is being discussed, members of the house will bear in mind that, as we will be called upon to help to pay for the development of the St. Lawrence waterway, we should be given some consideration as far as the development of the Chignecto canal is concerned, for it is something that was promised to the people of the maritime provinces many years ago.

I also went on to mention the possibility of hydroelectric power being developed through the building of the Chignecto canal.

But I was not the only one who was discussing the subject at that time. This afternoon the hon. member for Westmorland recommended that a commission be appointed to study the Chignecto canal. I might say that in 1930 a similar request was made. I would point out that in 1949, Mr. Black who represented the constituency of Cumberland for a number of years, recommended the appointment of a commission, but was turned down by Hon. Mr. Chevrier, the then minister of transport. At that time Mr. Black had this to say, as reported at page 2929 of Hansard for December 8, 1949:

> I am going to take a few minutes to refer to canals, to the Chignecto canal. The building of this canal has been before this house ever since confederation. The hon. member for Royal has brought it up recently, as well as the hon. member for Queens and the hon. member for Gloucester. This session it was brought up by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and other hon. members.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has been before the house on a great many occasions. But, as I said before, the development of the Chignecto canal at the present time is not the answer to our hydroelectric requirements in New Brunswick. Mind you, I feel the Chignecto canal should be, and I believe will be, built in time as a continuation of the St. Lawrence seaway.

Many hon. members have recommended measures for the solution of our problem. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) mentioned the Albert shale; the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Michaud) spoke about atomic energy. The hon. member for Westmorland spoke about the Chignecto canal; the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) spoke about the Passamaquoddy project. These are all good, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think anyone in New Brunswick today believes that any of them is the answer to our immediate problem in that province. They may enter into the picture later on.

As far as the Chignecto canal is concerned, it is a matter for the federal government; it is not something the provincial government can undertake. My hon. friend was not here when a delegation came from the maritime provinces. It consisted of boards of trade and mayors of the cities of Saint John, Amherst, Moncton and Fredericton. It was a large delegation and consisted of some of the outstanding businessmen of the maritime provinces, such as Mr. Irving. They came up here and they were given the brush-off. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert spoke about a run-around. Well, these men were given the run-around; they were absolutely turned down. They were given the brush-off in 1949 so far as the Chignecto canal was concerned.

The Passamaquoddy project is something the federal government will have to deal with. It is not something the province can handle. As we see it, the only solution in New Brunswick is the development of the Saint John river. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert complained about all these red herrings. Hon. members know when they suggest these other solutions for the immediate future that they are not practicable, yet not one of them will rise in his place and advocate, as he should, the development of Beechwood on the Saint John river. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery)—

Mr. MacDougall: The hon. member for Temiscouata—

Mr. Brooks: No, not the hon. member for Temiscouata, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton and the hon. member for Saint John-Albert have been advocating this in the house at every opportunity. The New Brunswick government has gone ahead with it. I might say that the previous government of New Brunswick, the McNair government, started the Beechwood project. I give them credit for that. I have been amazed at the attitude of members in the house on the government side. Once there was an election in the province of New Brunswick and the McNair government was defeated, the interest that should have been evinced by those members waned. We heard nothing more about it. For instance, we heard nothing from the minister who represents New Brunswick in this government, as far as the development of Beechwood is concerned.

The government of New Brunswick found that it would cost $45 million to develop Beechwood. As we pointed out, New Brunswick is not a rich province. Today we are paying nearly one-third or more of our revenue in interest on bonds. Cheap electric power can be obtained only if the bonds of the province are backed by the federal government in order to obtain low interest rates. The federal government were not asked to give money to the province of New Brunswick; they were asked under the circumstances, when it was almost impossible for us to look after the matter ourselves, whether they would lend money to the province of New Brunswick so the interest rate would be low enough to enable the province to obtain cheap electric power in order to develop our different industries.

I am not going into the history of that, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to quote from a speech made by the premier of New Brunswick in the provincial legislature on March 25, 1955. Hon. Mr. Flemming, premier of New Brunswick, said:

> In view of misgivings which have been expressed in this house in regard to this particular point—

That was the point of financing.

> —I would like to place special emphasis upon the three endorsements just cited.

Those were endorsements by three engineering concerns in the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Flemming continued:

> The report of the Power Corporation of Canada, among other recommendations, dealt with the cost of financing Beechwood, estimating that money at 5 per cent would produce power at a cost of 5·4 mills per kilowatt hour—

That would be too high.

> —but that money at 2½ per cent would reduce generating costs to 3·1 mills per kilowatt hour.

This would mean the difference between cheap and costly electric power in the province of New Brunswick. Further on in his speech Mr. Flemming had this to say:

> On April 27, 1953, a brief outlining the need for assistance to that province to develop the Beechwood site, was presented by this government to the government of Canada, together with a request that the federal government agree to advance to the province, as the work progressed, sufficient funds to permit the development of Beechwood; that the repayment rate should be 1½ per cent per year, starting one year after the plant went into operation; and that the interest rate should not exceed 2½ per cent.

The government of New Brunswick was not asking the federal government to give the money; they were asked to lend the money so New Brunswick could have a low rate of interest and cheap hydroelectric power to develop the mineral and other resources of the province. Later on the premier quoted a letter from K. W. Taylor, of the finance department, with reference to this matter, as follows:

> I am now directed by my minister to say that he has reviewed this matter with his colleagues, and the conclusion reached is that it would not be right or proper for the federal government to provide funds by loan or otherwise for the development of provincial natural resources along the lines you suggest.

I am sure you can realize, Mr. Speaker, as hon. members realize, just what the disappointment—yes, and the discouragement—was, not only to the government of New Brunswick but to the people of that province when they received that news.

I am not going to enlarge on that further. The provincial government is going ahead. But I should like to point this out, and it hardly seems necessary for me to do so. Other matters which are of benefit to the provinces of this dominion are dealt with in a different way. For instance, we hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), Liberals, Conservatives, C.C.F. and Social Credit members talking about the South Saskatchewan dam. It has been practically promised that the South Saskatchewan dam will be built. It will be built with federal money, not money they are asked to lend but money that will be given by the federal government.

The St. Lawrence seaway will be of no great benefit to the maritime provinces. Money being spent on the St. Lawrence seaway is not being loaned; it is being given to the people of Ontario, Quebec and certain parts of the west to benefit their future. This afternoon the hon. member for Westmorland referred to certain things being done in Nova Scotia. We are pleased that the Canso causeway has been built; we are pleased that there is to be a ferry operating between Bar Harbor and Yarmouth, but the money for these projects is not being loaned to Nova Scotia to assist that province, it is being given to the province by the federal government. I could quote many other instances.

Yesterday I was reading the Financial Times, and I noticed an article that stated that the St. Lawrence seaway was expected to boost rather than reduce the shipping business in Montreal. According to the writer of this article it was expected that the time would come when federal money would be used to keep open the St. Lawrence river, not just for a short additional time in the spring and fall but all year, so that boats might use Montreal and other ports on the St. Lawrence the year round. If that ever happens, and I sincerely hope it will not, it will mean that federal money will be spent for the advantage of Montreal and other parts of central Canada. We in the maritimes not only will be the losers, we will have to pay part of the shot.

On the same page of this publication it states that Toronto harbour facilities are being prepared for seaway traffic and that the day after tomorrow the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) is to be in Toronto to open the marine terminal at pier No. 2. I do not know whether the federal government is paying for that, but I assume that it is.

Mr. Marler: The city of Toronto is paying for it.

Mr. Brooks: I am glad that somebody other than the federal government is paying for something. I could go on and name a long list of things which have been provided by the federal government for the benefit of other provinces. We have here an instance where money could have been loaned and should have been loaned. The problem was not insurmountable. We in New Brunswick feel it is very strange that when money is needed for development in other parts of Canada it can be found and given to those other parts, but when we want to borrow money for a development which would be of tremendous advantage to the people of our province we are told it cannot be done, that the constitution will not permit it.

I do not intend to press this matter further tonight, but I do want to say that it is a serious problem for New Brunswick. I believe if we were to take the opinion of individual members, whether they be Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit or C.C.F., we would find them almost 100 per cent in favour of giving this assistance to the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my support of the subamendment, which I hope will come to a vote shortly. I do this because it deals with a subject close to my heart, the municipality. I do so for another reason also. One of the finest municipalities in Canada, the city of Kelowna, is celebrating its fiftieth anniversary this week.

The history of Kelowna is similar to the history of many other communities in Canada. It was founded at the turn of the century and has had a steady growth since. It was started by men and women of vision who laid the groundwork for a modern city by setting aside ample space for parks, wide roads and lanes. Most western towns are laid out to provide good lanes in which such services as sewers and water mains, garbage collection and so on can be located. I am sure that places like Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto often wish they had had similar foresight many years ago.

When many of these towns were incorporated 50 years or so ago their areas were quite limited. Rapid growth within these limits has brought special problems with which the municipalities find it hard to cope. Because of the limited area the owners of land have had to assume increased burdens to provide schools, roads and the other facilities usual to municipal endeavour. The result is that municipal taxes are very high today in comparison with taxes at the time of incorporation 40, 50 or 60 years ago.

In the meantime the municipalities have had imposed upon them responsibilities which were unheard of 50 years ago. They are the creatures of the province, and they have had to submit to many impositions on the part of provincial governments. I would refer especially to education. When the city of Kelowna was incorporated 50 years ago the cost of education was borne by the government of British Columbia. Eventually this was foisted on the backs of the municipalities, and now it would appear that they are carrying the burden assisted by the provincial government. Many social services are now undertaken by the municipality which really belong to the provincial governments.

I want to say a few words in support of the C.C.F. amendment which deals with this very problem. I want to put this subamendment on the record again because we shall be voting on it very shortly, and some hon. members may have forgotten what it covers. It reads:

> That the amendment be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:
> "(e) to provide assistance to the provincial governments in order to enable them to plan their financing in such a manner as to relieve the people of this country from the crushing load of heavy municipal taxation."

There is no need for me to explain in full this crushing load and what it consists of, as it is well known to all hon. members. For instance, education is taking approximately 50 per cent of municipal taxation. Roads also require a large portion of municipal taxes. Many roads must be widened, repaved and made stronger to carry the traffic of modern commerce, and this creates a heavy cost for municipal bodies.

Another problem is the small area of taxable land to be found in many municipalities. In the average municipality in western Canada anywhere from 25 to 35 per cent of the area is non-taxable, being taken up by parks, schools, churches, public buildings and so on. That problem is increasing. Those areas taken up by federal and provincial buildings, churches and so on go off the tax roll. So the burden falls upon the 70 per cent or less of the taxpayers who must continue paying taxes. Naturally the growth of population demands more services and makes it costly for water, sewage and so on. It is true to say that in the average municipality in the last ten years taxes have more than doubled, with no additional tax resources allowed to the municipalities. All the taxes are still borne by land and home owners.

These municipal taxpayers are the people who support both the provincial and federal governments with their taxes, whether they be excise taxes, sales taxes, income tax or other indirect taxes, so the burden has been added from that point of view as well. The municipal taxpayer must pay his way; failing to do so means the loss of his home or the loss of his land, and he is thrown out.

This subamendment seeks to give relief to that taxpayer on grounds which to my mind are logical. Municipal dwellers contribute most to federal revenues. They have the right to demand the return of part of these revenues to take care of their expenditures in the municipalities. Of the three governing bodies, the municipalities alone are confined to a restricted field of taxation. This field has not been enlarged for several generations and possibly could not be enlarged unless one of the senior governments relinquished a field of its own in favour of the municipalities. I personally am against inventing any new field of taxation for municipal dwellers, who are taxed enough already, but I would suggest one or two ways in which assistance could be given.

First, it could be given by carrying out the suggestion contained in the subamendment, that is by financial assistance provided through the provincial government earmarked for the use of the municipalities and if possible paid on a per capita basis, so that municipalities as they grew would receive more and more.

Second, it could be given by both governments accepting their tax responsibility in full on all properties owned within municipal limits. This principle has been more or less tacitly agreed to in the steps taken by the federal government recently. But I am not satisfied and I will not be satisfied until all taxes on federal buildings are paid by the federal government, thus rendering valuable assistance. These buildings logically should pay for the services rendered by the city, the water, sewers, police protection, fire protection, and everything else for which they now pay nothing. In paying for those services they would assume their rightful liability.

Third, I would suggest to the government the immediate abolition of sales tax and excise taxes on all municipal purchases. It is unfair for the senior government to impose taxes on a junior government, because it cannot come back at the senior government. It cannot even tax the post office in a municipality. Therefore it is helpless and hopeless, and it depends on the senior government to be great enough to realize the plight of the municipality and open its heart as far as sales tax on municipal purchases is concerned.

A fourth way would be direct assistance by means of loans. Some years ago, during the war, we had a very good act in operation; it is still on the statute books and has not been rescinded. It was the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, under which self-liquidating projects in municipalities could be financed with money loaned by the government at 2 per cent. This act functioned splendidly and permitted several small towns in British Columbia to build up valuable waterworks and extensions of service in power and lighting. I would point out—the government already know it—that all the loans made, running into millions, were paid back in full and the interest was paid in full; not a dime was defaulted.

I cannot see for the life of me why the government decided to discontinue such a valuable service to municipalities that would bring to them in turn splendid returns on their investment. Not only would this money loaned at 2 per cent help the municipalities in their present plight, but it would allow them to take part in the relief of unemployment. Unemployment relief is also a municipal burden that has been unfairly thrust upon them, and the government could assist them by loaning them money immediately for public works of this nature to take care of the unemployment within their municipal boundaries.

A fifth way would be by federal aid for education. The cost of education is one of the great burdens of our modern municipalities. This could be a most effective method of dealing with this question. As this matter has already been dealt with very fully and in detail by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), I shall not go any further into it, but I would recommend that the cabinet find out to what extent the suggestions made by the hon. member for Saskatoon could be carried out, with a view to relieving the crushing burden on the municipalities.

I pass these suggestions to the minister for his earliest consideration. Municipalities, I feel, must be given a new and fair deal. I trust that members of all parties will see the fairness and the justice of this subamendment, and will give it support. It does not matter to what party you belong when the vote is called. I know that the municipalities of British Columbia—and, I take it, the rest of Canada—all deserve financial support through the medium of this subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the question may I tell hon. members that shortly after the amendment was moved I had some concern as to its regularity. As hon. members know, as soon as an amendment is moved it is in order to move an amendment to the amendment. Recognizing the fact that if the amendment is out of order the amendment to the amendment must fall, I searched the authorities and my soul as well.

Considering the fact that on the budget wide latitude is always given, and that the main reason the amendment could have been declared out of order was the fact that the amendments to the address in reply had covered a variety of subjects, I decided not to intervene. I know hon. members may feel at this moment that it might be a matter of some fancy on my part for me to make these remarks. But I want to tell hon. members that if they look at certain rulings that have been made in the past they will see that the matter of similarity of amendments as between one which is moved on the addres in reply and one which is moved on the motion for the Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means or supply is something that has been considered seriously by my predecessors.

There were some borderline cases, and there is one I have here with which Mr. Speaker Macdonald had to deal. His statement is to be found in the Journals of February 28, 1950, at page 47. I should like hon. members to look also at the ruling made on November 22, 1932, which appears at page 113 of the Journals, by Mr. Speaker Black.

Hon. members will see that because the subject of unemployment had already been dealt with by the house in one amendment and was later again submitted to the judgment of the house in another amendment, Mr. Speaker Black not only considered the matter of the similarity of the two amendments but also looked at the arguments put forward in the debate, and came to the conclusion that the house having refused to condemn the government's policy on unemployment by rejecting the amendment moved to the address by the leader of the opposition, the house could not be called upon to decide the same question again.

Hon. members may refer, for information on this point, to Bourinot at page 328 and citation 357 of Beauchesne's third edition.

As to the other point, which is to the effect that any irregularity in any portion of a motion shall render the whole motion irregular and that therefore the amendment to the amendment should fall, citation 330 of Beauchesne will be found to be specific on the subject.

As I said before, I do not want to create any difficulties at this moment. I had considered the amendment shortly after it was moved and felt that I would perhaps do as my predecessor did in 1950 and say that in future hon. members should be extremely careful in the moving of their amendments on the address in reply because otherwise, the house having given its judgment on the various points brought forward then, if later other amendments are moved which touch these very points which have already been decided upon, any later amendments should be declared out of order.

For the present I know the house will support my generosity, and I shall put the question. My present attitude should not be invoked as a precedent in future.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech delivered before the house on April 5 last has certain interesting points. In fact, we see that reductions have been made on various items. I endorse without hesitation those tax reductions, even though they will entail a deficit during the fiscal year 1955-56.

In the few minutes I spoke during the debate on unemployment, on March 22 last, I stated that an eventual deficit would not be a calamity. I have not changed my mind.

It is with pleasure that I have noted the substantial reduction in the tax on automobiles, tires and tubes. Today for many people the automobile is not the luxury it used to be. It is merely a means of earning more easily their livelihood.

As far as the tax on corporation income is concerned, I am wondering whether a reduction from 49 per cent to 47 per cent will be sufficient to encourage the investment of much more capital in industry and business. Yet such a step should afford one of the best means of stimulating employment and of alleviating, at least partly, unemployment which should remain the constant concern of the federal administration.

In the same line of thought, I must admit that the reduction of the personal income tax rate, has been substantial, although I do not see why it could not have been granted for the whole year 1955, as is the case for corporations.

Moreover, I believe that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has not been realistic when he abstained from revising the basic exemption used to determine the taxable income of individuals. On March 22 last, I had suggested—it was not the first time and it will not be the last time either, and I am not the only one who has done so—that the exemptions be raised from $1,000 to $2,000 for single persons and from $2,000 to $3,000 for married people. In that connection, if we examine the last budget of the British government, it will be noted that the basic exemption has been increased by 16·33 per cent and by 14·3 per cent respectively for single and married taxpayers. Therefore, as a result of the last British budget, through various amendments to the Income Tax Act, 2,400,000 citizens, or 13·7 per cent of the total of those who were paying income tax previously, have now been exempted; those 2,400,000 taxpayers were evidently in the lower income tax brackets and therefore had a modest income.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a budget which really does benefit those in the lower income brackets! Some wit might also add that a British Conservative government has showed itself liberal in its budget, whereas the Canadian Liberal administration has showed itself to be rather conservative in its own.

I am thus brought around to saying that our taxation system does not take into account the needs of our large families, of those good Canadian families, of French or English origin, who provide this country with large numbers of real Canadian babies, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) was pleased to mention recently. I might add, in this connection, that I do share, most enthusiastically indeed, the views expressed by the hon. minister in Victoria when he said—and I am reading the words he himself read into Hansard and which will be found on page 2893:

> —I don't believe that any immigrant, no matter where he comes from or how good he is, is as good as another Canadian baby, because the immigrant has to learn to be a Canadian and the baby is a Canadian to start with."

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I entirely subscribe to that view and that, if I could, I would like to make its importance and soundness understood by everyone in this country, not excluding the minister himself. It so happens that the hesitant way in which he proceeded to explain this statement, along with certain aspects of the policy of his department, are such as to raise some doubts in our mind as to whether he really believes in what he himself has said. Once well understood, such an opinion would enable us to inject a little more practical sense into our immigration policy, and, I hope, would help correct our fiscal policy with respect to the protection which must be assured to the generous families in our country that still accept tremendous sacrifices in order to give to the nation a great many Canadian babies who, generally speaking, constitute its best citizens.

I wish to reiterate what I have often said, that the state, whatever the country or the civilization, has every reason to protect the homes where family life flourishes, to facilitate with all the means at its disposal or at least to abstain from hindering the normal functioning of this basic element of society, from which rise and develop better than anywhere else the sound principles and the virtues which characterize morally strong individuals and powerful nations.

The citizen who has a deep feeling and a filial love for the family and the home where he grew up cannot be disloyal to his country. But the family and the home must be such that life is pleasant in it.

Some will say that all that is far remote from the practical considerations suggested by a matter-of-fact budget speech. Maybe so, but the fact is that moral values, like flowers, often need a prop to support them in order that they may bloom.

That being the case, the government should have raised to $250 or $300 the exemptions granted in the case of each child eligible for family allowances and to $500 or $600 those granted for a child not eligible for these allowances.

The British budget—I apologize for mentioning it again—has been more generous in raising these same exemptions by some 17⅔ per cent.

When the cost of living is as high as it is today, surely an amount of between $210 and $246 in the case of children under 16 and of $400 in the case of those over 16 is insufficient to support a child decently during a whole year.

I may say, from personal experience, that each child costs hundreds of dollars more than the amounts I just mentioned. So that parents who have enough generosity left to face their moral and family obligations, not only have to bear the heavy burden of tremendous sacrifices, very often unknown to the public at large, but it is also their sorry lot to have their generosity taxed, as they have to pay taxes on a more or less considerable part of their income earmarked for the maintenance and education of their children.

There is another class of citizen to whom the last budget will bring no direct relief and who will again remain the forever forgotten ones; I mean the vast category of consumers who do not buy cars, who neither have shares nor stocks in the large corporations, nor even the means to pay a little income tax. They only have the very costly obligation to pay the general sales tax on a number of commodities they need to buy. It is precisely on their behalf that, in my remarks of March 22, I asked for a reduction of the sales tax. I sincerely believe that it would have been the only way for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) to bring them some relief. And I want to stress this negative aspect of the budget. I can easily imagine what the answer to my suggestions and representations will be —if they are deemed worthy of an answer. I will be told that the government would have to face a still greater deficit than the one expected.

Personally, I believe that an increase of $50 million in the deficit would have helped the revival of business, providing, of course, greater relief had been given in this operation to the mass of consumers so as to increase their purchasing power.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to say a word or two on a problem of the utmost importance to the farmers, the settlers and the workers, the lumberjacks of Beauce county in particular and of the whole province of Quebec. And I am referring to the price paid to settlers and farmers for the wood they sell to pulp and paper companies.

I congratulate the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) who laid the problem before this house and the people of Canada. For my part, I have received from the Quebec south shore section of the Catholic farmers' union a recommendation in which I was asked to urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to extend this investigation to the Beauce district. I considered it my duty to comply with the request of that professional organization and I conveyed that recommendation to the proper authority, adding my personal views on the matter. You will understand that it is all that I can say at this stage. It is particularly gratifying for me to bring my humble contribution to the study of that problem, because I may say without bragging that I know it quite well and I could mention the names of hundreds of citizens of my constituency who, especially during certain periods, were the victims of this intolerable situation.

We should be very careful, though, not to attack the small middleman, the dealer who annually buys a few hundred cords of wood to resell at a profit which is often ridiculously small, at the risk of losses which I would not like to assume myself.

Like the producer, he is subjected to the rule according to which might is right. It is not here that the root of the evil must be sought. The scandal will be found higher up.

On the other hand, though, we should be very careful not to confuse the issue, intentionally or otherwise. We should not attempt to assess responsibilities before the investigation is concluded.

One wonders if certain powerful interests, conscious of their guilt and fearful of being caught, are not attempting to confuse public opinion on this issue through dilatory tactics of all kinds so as to make it reticent, nervous, blind, and possibly prejudiced. In this way the work necessary to a comprehensive and objective investigation would be diverted along the wrong channels or, at least, rendered far more difficult.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I have full confidence in the royal commission which the federal government will set up, and I wish to set the minds of the members of the Catholic farmers' union and those of every farmer and settler in my riding at rest. I have every reason to believe that this investigation will be a serious one, will bring justice to all, will show the cause of the evils and let the responsibility in that respect fall where it must. If it failed in its task something else would have to be done.

(Text):

The budget speech presented by the Minister of Finance contains, no doubt, advantageous measures for the Canadian taxpayers as a whole, which is at least a step in the right direction. In my opinion, however, the government has not gone far enough, and that is what I tried to prove in my remarks in French.

In certain fields the minister has totally neglected to attempt to remedy some urgent and serious situations, namely a reduction of the 10 per cent sales tax, an increase in the basic exemption in personal income tax, and an increase in the deductible amount for each child, whether or not he be eligible for family allowances, and particularly in regard to the unemployment situation. I would be inclined to support the amendment of the Conservatives, but they forgot to acknowledge the partial result accomplished in some fields by the present budget. For this reason, and having considered all the budget proposals, I have decided, after long hesitation, to vote for the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance.

May I say that I am entitled to declare that my opinion is also shared by my independent colleagues.

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Prince): Mr. Speaker, before this debate is concluded there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house. Before doing so, however, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance on his first budget which has been so well received by the people of Canada.

At this time I think I should also express the thanks of the people of my province to the government for the announcement that the support policy for butter will be continued. Dairying is one of the important branches of the agricultural economy of Prince Edward Island, and most of our farmers depend upon dairying to some extent for their livelihood. I well remember hearing the late Premier Jones, who was one of the outstanding farmers of Canada, say that if it were not for dairy cattle Prince Edward Island would turn into a sand bank. It was therefore with a great deal of satisfaction that our dairy farmers heard the announcement that the support price would be continued for another year.

The matter about which I rose to speak, however, has to do with the statement in the budget speech that the tariff agreements on potatoes between Canada and the United States would be referred to the tariff board for study. This announcement was well received by potato growers all across Canada. I was further pleased to read in the newspapers over the week end that the Minister of Finance had referred the matter to the tariff board and that the hearing had been set for June 13.

I think at this time it would not be inappropriate to bring to the attention of the house some of the history of the potato tariff agreements between Canada and the United States for the last 35 years. In 1929 the United States duty on potatoes from Canada was 50 cents a hundredweight. On the other hand, Canada had a duty of 35 cents a hundredweight on potatoes from the United States. On June 18, 1930, the United States increased its duty from 50 cents to 75 cents per hundredweight. This increase resulted from the Hawley-Smoot revision of the United States tariffs.

In May of that year Canada introduced what was known as the countervailing duty. This stipulated that if another country imposed a duty on Canadian potatoes an equal duty would be imposed on imports of potatoes into Canada from such country. In September, 1930, the countervailing provision was deleted from the tariff and a rate of 75 cents per hundredweight was substituted. It will be seen, therefore, that for a certain period of the year 1930 the duty on potatoes was the same in both countries.

In 1931 there was no change in the United States tariff. The Canadian government, however, changed its tariff regulations to permit the free entry of seed potatoes. In 1936 the duty on table stock potatoes going from Canada to the United States was still 75 cents per hundredweight. The duty on seed potatoes, however, was reduced substantially. A quota was set whereby 750,000 bushels of seed potatoes would be permitted entry into the United States at reduced rates. During the months of March to November the rate would be 45 cents per hundredweight, and from December to February it would be 60 cents per hundredweight. The reduction resulted from negotiations between the two countries and was bound in the Canada-United States trade agreements of 1936.

These rates continued until the year 1939, when a quota was placed on table stock potatoes going from Canada to the United States. Under this quota 1,000,000 bushels plus any amount by which the United States department of agriculture's estimate of the domestic crop fell below 350,000,000 bushels would be admitted at the reduced rate of 37½ cents per hundredweight from March to November and, if the quota was not completed, at 60 cents per hundredweight from December to February. The ex quota rate on table potatoes remained at 75 cents per hundredweight. The quota rate on seed potatoes was further reduced from 45 and 60 cents a hundredweight to 37½ cents a hundredweight, and the quota was increased from 750,000 bushels to 1,500,000 bushels. The ex quota rate on seed potatoes remained at 75 cents per hundredweight.

In return for these concessions the Canadian government eliminated the duty on table stock potatoes from the United States except for a short period from June 15 to July 31, when the duty was 37½ cents per hundredweight. The rate on seed potatoes continued free.

In 1948, under GATT, Canada negotiated an enlarged quota of 2,500,000 bushels for seed potatoes at the quota rate of 37½ cents per hundredweight. For table stock potatoes the quota rate was reduced to 37½ cents per hundredweight for the entire quota, thus eliminating the 60 cent rate from December to February. There was no change in the Canadian duty on potatoes coming into Canada from the United States.

It will be seen, therefore, that since 1948 Canada could export 2,500,000 bushels of seed potatoes to the United States under a duty of 37½ cents per hundredweight, and 1,500,000 bushels of table stock potatoes at a similar rate of 37½ cents per hundredweight, plus the amount by which the estimate fell below 350,000,000 bushels. The rate on all other potatoes is 75 cents per hundredweight. On potatoes coming from the United States into Canada there was no duty except 37½ cents per hundredweight for the six weeks from June 15 to July 31.

When these arrangements were originally negotiated they were of substantial benefit to the potato growers of Canada, and of the maritime provinces in particular; but since that time conditions in the production and marketing of potatoes have so changed that today the potato producers in Canada no longer enjoy any great advantage over their fellow producers in the United States. The difference in yield per acre, due to new methods of production, has gradually narrowed until today there is a very narrow margin between the yield per acre in Canada and that in the United States. This results from better methods of insect and pest control, better methods of blight control and new and cheaper fertilizers.

In the marketing field also tremendous changes have taken place. With the coming of trucks and the building of super highways, any advantage the farmers of the maritime provinces enjoyed as a result of water transportation have disappeared. The result is that Long Island and other areas adjacent thereto have gone into the production of potatoes in a large way. Long Island produced last year over 18,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Producers can take advantage of the trucking of citrus fruits which takes place between the southern states and the New York areas. Fruit trucks going south for a load of fruit are anxious to have a paying load, and it is thus possible for the farmers in Long Island to have their potatoes shipped to the southern states at low cost.

It must also be remembered that the state of Maine produces as many potatoes as all of Canada. The ten-year average for Maine is 62,000,000 bushels. In 1954 the state of Maine produced 49,000,000 bushels of potatoes. Canada produced something over 50,000,000. Maine is closer to the large Canadian central markets than is any of the maritime provinces. Potato producers in Maine can deliver truckloads of potatoes to the Montreal market cheaper than can producers in any of the maritime provinces. The result is that with no duty on potatoes coming from the United States to Canada, Maine dealers can and often do undersell the maritime producers in the Montreal market.

It is interesting to note also that during the last three years more potatoes have been shipped from the United States into Canada than from Canada to the United States. For the last three years we exported roughly 6,600,000 bushels of potatoes to the United States. For the same period we imported from the United States 8,500,000 bushels of potatoes.

The growing of potatoes is a large part of the agricultural economy of the province of Prince Edward Island. Our potato producers, therefore, were much pleased when it was learned that the problem of potato tariffs would be studied by the tariff board. I certainly hope that the studies of the board will be exhaustive, and that a satisfactory solution of this problem will be reached. If no changes in the tariff arrangements are made, the potato industry in the maritimes could well be ruined.

I want to refer at this time to an editorial which appeared in the April 30 edition of the Ottawa Citizen. This editorial dealt with Canada's tariff record. It referred to the fact that the Minister of Finance in his budget speech mentioned that three matters would be referred to the tariff board for study. The editorial concluded with this sentence:

The potato inquiry is to be launched in June and it should be especially interesting because a section of agriculture—usually associated with anti-protection in this country—will be arguing for tariff aid against the United States.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is hardly a correct statement of the facts. I should not want to be described as a person who is anxious to put any blocks in the way of free interchange of products between countries. That is why I took some time to set out that I thought the tariff arrangement between Canada and the United States was most one-sided. All the people of my province want is some equalization of the tariff, so the American potato growers will enjoy such tremendous advantages in tariff rates.

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

For a copy of all expense accounts and/or any forms of emoluments of J. W. Thompson, district court judge of the Weyburn judicial district, in connection with his duties at Estevan from July 1, 1954 to March 1, 1955.

He said: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand the motion is carried as amended?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, with the usual reservation.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is carried, as amended, with the usual reservation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDO-CHINA—MEASURES TAKEN TO PROTECT CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or, in his absence, to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's statement yesterday regarding the unpleasant situation in Indo-China, and in view of the apparently confused military situation in other parts of that country, are adequate steps being taken to protect Canadian personnel everywhere in Indo-China from personal indignities and outright violence?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friend, who did not give notice of his question—at least it did not reach me—would not expect an immediate reply, certainly not one in terms of precision. I am sure he will appreciate that everything is being done in the matter that can be done. If my hon. friend will permit me to consider his question as notice, I shall bring it to the attention of my colleague at once. He is now engaged on important business outside the house.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

SUGGESTED SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY OTTAWA PLANNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is it still the intention of the government to set up a committee to look into the affairs of the federal district commission? I ask this question with particular reference to the fact that it seems the planning of Ottawa, particularly the green belt, has been endangered. What steps is the government taking to protect the plan?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to take the hon. gentleman's question as notice because, to my knowledge, no recent consideration has been given to the matter, but I shall have it brought up at once.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR FINAL PAYMENT ON 1953-54 POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of representations from various farm organizations in western Canada. In view of the unusually serious climatic conditions that are affecting seeding operations, and the contraction of credit that the farmers are suffering from at this time, will the minister give reconsideration to the question so that the wheat board may proceed at once to start distribution of the final payments on the 1953-54 pool rather than, as reported in the press, awaiting the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for indicating to me a few moments ago that he would ask this question as it gives me an opportunity to clear up the impression that the wheat board is awaiting the return of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to make the final payment in respect to the 1953-54 wheat crop. That is not the case. Actually the closing date was April 29 and computations are being made upon which the final payment can be determined. This is being done expeditiously and cheques will go out at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the minister in a position to make an estimate as to the amount?

Mr. Winters: No.

WATER POLLUTION

BEDFORD BASIN—INQUIRY AS TO CONTAMINATION FROM GARBAGE DISPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. R. Balcom (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport or to his parliamentary assistant. Is the minister aware of the fact that garbage, which might affect the health of residents along Bedford basin, is being dumped along the shores of Halifax? Are steps being taken to prevent further contamination of the waters of the basin and harbour?

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Halifax for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I may say that at the urgent request of the city of Halifax permission was granted by the national harbours board for the dumping of incinerated materials on certain areas along the shore of Bedford basin, and the city has obtained approval under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for this purpose. However, I wish to assure my hon. friend that complaints to the effect that a nuisance is being created thereby have been brought to the attention of the proper authorities.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF ITEMS IN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he is prepared to give an answer to the question I asked on April 21, as reported on page 3023 of Hansard, as to whether the government is prepared to have referred to the special committee on radio broadcasting and television those items in the estimates which pertain to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, such as Nos. 56 and 57.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the items to which the hon. gentleman has referred are usually, and this year will be, before the committee on external affairs as they have to do with the international service. I am informed by the minister of external affairs that these items will be considered in that committee. There would be nothing to be gained by having them considered by two committees. The items will eventually come back to the house for consideration. The answer at this time is that they will not be referred to the committee on radio broadcasting.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if he is aware that items Nos. 56 and 57 in the estimates have not been referred to the standing committee on external affairs, as he will see by the motion passed in this house on April 21.

ATOMIC ENERGY

SUGGESTED STUDY BY COMMITTEE OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. If "Operation Cue" does come off on the Nevada desert, will the government give consideration to having any information about radioactive fall-out which may be obtained by Canada's representatives at this test made available to a committee of this house for study?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Consideration will be given to the possibility of doing that, but one would have to take into account whatever arrangements about publicity may have been made with the United States authorities when it was arranged for Canadian military and scientific personnel to be present. It will be our desire to make public anything that we can make public.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 3, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this debate has covered a wide field and has been extended for some days, but there is one particular subject that I feel I should discuss at this stage of the debate because it has a direct bearing on the whole responsibility of this parliament and the opportunities that Canadians under our federal system are going to have in the years ahead to deal with the problems that they may have to face.

I do not think I would be going too far when I say that history was made in this house last Friday. I might say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) that I am not suggesting that history was rewritten, but to some extent history was made in this house. I am sure that the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in regard to the position of the proposals made in 1945, which have been so long under discussion, must have been easily the most confusing statement ever made by any prime minister of Canada since confederation.

Because it is not possible for those outside the house who read Hansard to refer back to other pages, let me recall some of the things that were said in the exchange last Friday. After having asked certain questions in regard to what had taken place in the conference which had just adjourned, I put these words to the Prime Minister as reported on page 3287 of Hansard:

> In view of the fact that the government has withdrawn its position from that which it stated it was prepared to take in 1945 in regard to the unemployed, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if there are any other specific proposals in the 1945 proposals not yet dealt with from which the government has withdrawn its support. I ask this question because I think it would be helpful in avoiding any unnecessary discussion if there are any other similar cases where the government has withdrawn from the position it took at that time.

Then the Prime Minister is reported as replying as follows:

> I cannot accept the word "withdrawn". There were proposals made as over-all proposals in 1945. They were not accepted. I stated at the opening meeting of this preliminary conference that we did not consider that the proposals that had been made and were not accepted at that time were a proper basis for an agenda of discussions at this time.
> There have been a great many things done, not because they were in the proposals but because they were considered to be the right things to do—things done since 1945. But the government does not consider that it is bound in any way by unaccepted proposals that were made in 1945.

Let there be no suggestion that anyone in this house was prepared for such a statement. I hope that no hon. member opposite will suggest that he or she was prepared for such a statement. The party of which the Prime Minister is the leader had committed itself to the very opposite position on more than one occasion. In 1949 it went to the polls with the following declaration which had been adopted in 1948:

> The Liberal party recommends that the proposals placed before the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and 1946 remain its objective and stands ready to support the implementation of these.

That was definite enough.

Then, in case there is any suggestion that this was something that was departed from later on, may I say that in this very well produced booklet—and it is produced with all the disregard of expense which this government shows in every department—

An hon. Member: It is not a government expenditure.

Mr. Drew: From the point of view of the exterior appearance—

An hon. Member: But it is not a government expenditure.

Mr. Drew: —and also from the point of view of the printing and technical presentation.

An hon. Member: Who pays for it?

An hon. Member: Not the government.

Mr. Drew: I imagine that the minister knows very well where those lavish funds came from that the Liberal party had in the last election.

Mr. Fleming: Slush funds.

Mr. Drew: Let me read from page 200. I would not want any hon. member opposite to be under any misapprehension as to the position taken by the party of which the Prime Minister is the leader, in regard to this subject, which the Prime Minister discussed in this way last Friday. At page 200, in heavy capitals so that it will be duly emphasized, we have the following:

> Dominion-Provincial Relations.
> The Liberal party recommends that the proposals placed before the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and 1946 remain its objective and stands ready to support the implementation of these.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I heard applause on the other side. I hope that applause will indicate that those who expressed applause by thumping their desks may not just for a moment forget they are merely applauding a prepared statement by the Liberal party, but that they actually realize that this was a positive undertaking, emphasized in special heavy type, as a basis upon which an appeal was made to the people of Canada. This statement covers a number of very definite things, as all hon. members know. There were the details of public investment which was to be undertaken so that plans would always be available to deal with possible unemployment. Then also there was the proposal in regard to the social security program, and there was also the proposal to establish a general system that would take care of all the unemployed. These were things which were set out in detail in what has come to be known as the green book. Is this book now a thing of the past? The campaign material says it is not. The Prime Minister in his statement which I have just quoted said that since these proposals were not accepted "we are no longer bound by them". I call his attention to the fact that the party to which he belongs expressed its own conviction that it was bound to them by its declarations in both 1949 and 1953.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend permit a question? Is the hon. gentleman aware that well over two-thirds of the proposals in the field of social welfare proposed in 1945 have since been implemented by this government?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare forgot for a moment that he had not been asked a question, for he always makes a long speech in answer even to a few words. I have not only not forgotten; I know it is not the case; and the minister knows it is not the case. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister the other day, in a rather casual way, said that it might be suggested—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am making a speech and I propose to make it without interruptions.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Leader of the Opposition does not show his acquiescence by resuming his seat, he is not to be interrupted.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. gentleman knows I am not rising to ask him a question.

An hon. Member: Why are you rising? To make a speech?

Mr. Martin: I am rising on a matter of privilege. I pointed out that the hon. gentleman had forgotten that the federal government has implemented most of the social welfare proposals.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: Two-thirds of them. Then the Leader of the Opposition—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: That is a speech.

Mr. Speaker: It is not possible to detect whether the hon. gentleman is now really stating a question of privilege. The preamble perhaps leading to it is lengthy and, as long as there are interruptions, I cannot hear whether the minister is really stating a question of privilege. I should like to tell him now that if the minister wishes to state a question of privilege it is his right to do so.

An hon. Member: Let him state it.

Mr. Speaker: However, if his question of privilege is one which is not really a question of privilege, he is breaking the rule to the effect that a member while he has the floor must not be interrupted.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I said when I rose that I was rising on a question of privilege.

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Martin: My question of privilege is this. My hon. friend states that I knew perfectly well that the statement I had made was not true. Surely as a matter of privilege I have the right to say to this house that the statement I have made is true. Now, in substantiation of what I have said—

An hon. Member: Do not make a speech now.

Mr. Speaker: By stating that which is within his knowledge is true the minister is quite right in stating that view on a point of privilege. I am sure that the hon. the Leader of the Opposition will not wish to say that what the minister has said is something that he knows not to be true.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I said that it was not so, and I repeat that it is not so. I also cannot help thinking of what a wonderful thing it would be if, under any conceivable circumstances, the minister were called upon to prepare a paper for consideration by a committee of this house. If he made a statement of gross mathematical inaccuracy and somebody corrected him, he would immediately rise on a question of privilege and say, "I have been told I am not telling the truth." No, Mr. Speaker; I am not going to ask the minister, because I know that that would start the flood, but I am going to point out to the minister that there is involved here a great question of health measures that were under consideration at this recent meeting and there are many details that are not touched upon. His mathematics are very far out when he gives the figure that he has now given.

But I do want to deal with one aspect. The Prime Minister touched lightly upon the fact that there might be suggestions that savings could be made, but said that the government is doing everything it could along that line. Whatever good things may be done by the Department of National Health and Welfare, may I say that one place where considerable savings could be effected would be in the publicity branch of that department.

There are a great many of the people in Canada today who actually think that the hospitalization program in this country is a result of the beneficence of the very pleasant and smiling Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Mr. Speaker, I only wish it were possible for Hansard to be in the form of a record instead of in cold type, because Hansard will not record the fact that practically every Liberal member opposite loudly applauded that statement. The reason is clear. They think it is true. It merely shows the extent to which they have swallowed the Liberal mythology. They have actually been fooled by their own nonsense. They are applauding, I know—and I say this in more than formal compliance with the rules of the house—believing that they actually have done these things.

But let us see just what happens in the case of hospitalization. Let us suppose that it takes $15,000 for a bed. The dominion government pays $1,000 for that bed, or one-fifteenth. But from the high-pressure publicity turned out, you would think it was the Minister of National Health and Welfare who was responsible for every bed that a patient can get into in Canada. I even see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) applauding that statement, a fact which shows that the arch-architect of some of this propaganda believes his own statement.

Mr. Garson: The Conservatives are all applauding too.

Mr. Rowe: Just laughing at you.

Mr. Drew: I welcome the applause, Mr. Speaker. After all, there is something extremely gratifying about seeing success of any kind; and never was there a greater success than propaganda of the kind that has fooled those who composed the statement themselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Self-hypnotism.

Mr. Drew: Yes; it is a form of self-hypnotism carried to an extremely high degree. In all these statements that are issued to the public by the highly-paid propaganda agents of the Department of National Health and Welfare, where do we see set out the portion that is borne by the provinces, by the municipalities and, above all, by the voluntary efforts of the individuals right in the communities themselves? Oh, no. Santa Claus is pictured in all his glory, and in the propaganda that goes out there is no suggestion that the face is even a false face that Santa Claus wears. But this is more than just simply an aside. I hope I shall not be accused of attacking Santa Claus in making these remarks, in view of some of the difficulties that have been encountered by the Department of National Health and Welfare in that respect on other occasions. But may I say that this matter is of more than passing interest because right down the line there has been an attempt to confuse the record with regard to what has taken place with regard to the whole problem of dominion-provincial relations and the constitution under which this government must conduct its affairs if they are to be conducted at all.

Before I proceed to deal with this matter, may I say that there was, of course, the reverse side of the coin in the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). That is why I say this was a most confusing statement. As recorded on the next page of Hansard, page 3288, I asked this question:

> Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a supplementary question on the same subject matter as that to which we have been referring, and which follows as a result of the question that followed mine. In view of the fact that we have been from time to time referring to these proposals from both sides of the house, I should like to ask the Prime Minister to whom we can look for a correct interpretation of what is described as the green book if we cannot look to him for that interpretation.
> Mr. St. Laurent: I think the best place to look is in the green book itself—
> Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.
> Mr. St. Laurent: —in which can be found exactly how those proposals were put forth.
> Mr. Drew: Then do I take it that the Prime Minister has withdrawn his earlier statement, and that the green book still stands as the proposals that he could accept?
> Mr. St. Laurent: If there were manifested to us a disposition of all the provincial governments to accept—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: That is the other side. I hear "hear, hear" from those who applaud every statement that emanates from the Liberal side of the house. But, nevertheless, which of these statements are we to accept?

Mr. Rowe: They are exactly opposite.

Mr. Drew: Which of them stands as the position of this government today?

An hon. Member: Take your choice, George.

Mr. Drew: I was very much interested in that interpolation, "Take your choice, George", interjected by one of the Liberal members. That is exactly where we are left. Whether it is Tom, Dick, Harry or George, we are all left in the same position. Every hon. member on the other side of the house—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Do not forget us.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no. I would not forget those to my immediate right.

An hon. Member: The rump.

Mr. Drew: Oh, I think we shall describe them as the Liberals to the right. They are to be distinguished from the Liberals to the left. I would not forget them because the remark, "Take your choice, George", did, in fact, come from one of the Liberals to the right. That is exactly the attitude of this government to parliament: Put any statement before the house; never mind whether it is consistent or inconsistent; never mind whether supporting facts have been made available. Then if you try to find out what the facts are, laughingly you are told, with great applause for the wisdom of the statement, "Take your choice".

That is exactly where we have been left in this session and for several preceding sessions. But this is something which calls for a little bit more orderly approach. I should think that there is no subject about which we have more right to know what the facts are than the constitution itself under which we sit here in this House of Commons. We surely cannot have it suggested for a moment that this is a matter of concern only to the Canadian government and the governments of the provinces. This is a matter of concern to every member of parliament. In the face of these statements, every member of parliament is entitled to have an answer to the question: Where do we stand on this subject at this time? When the dominion-provincial conference meets in October, this meeting is not a choice, exclusive club open only to members of this government and the governments of the 10 provinces. The government of Canada will simply be there as the executive of this parliament. The members of this parliament have a right to know what the position is, and we have a duty to say what we think about a situation of this kind where the clearest remark that has yet been made from the other side is, "Take your choice, George".

That is not good enough. By all manner of means, as between any different set of facts that may be legitimately open to question, each one of us may be called upon from time to time to take our choice. But we surely have a right to know exactly what the position is in regard to these proposals to which the Liberal party has committed itself so irrevocably. Surely they are not going to say now that this is something that can be abandoned so lightly because it is not only the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who has dealt with this matter. After the 1945-46 conference had been disposed of, and if the statement of the Prime Minister the other day was intended to be taken as the present position, that is the time to which we must look, and we find that Mr. Abbott had this to say in his budget speech in 1947, as found at page 2548 of Hansard:

> The government of Canada looks forward to the day when the agreement of all or substantially all the provinces will make possible the achievement of the great national purposes which impelled the dominion to make its comprehensive proposals of August, 1945.

Do I hear applause in support of that statement? No. I hope that perhaps some of the hon. members opposite who did not applaud that statement by Mr. Abbott on that occasion are beginning to ask themselves: Well, where do we stand on this matter?

An hon. Member: Where do you?

Mr. Drew: After all, they were elected on that pledge, and it certainly is not too much to say that the government would be sitting on the treasury benches under false pretences if it did not intend to fulfil the undertaking given in 1953 when every member here, with the exception of those elected in by-elections, came into the present parliament. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do think this is something that we certainly have the right—

Mr. Ferguson: Don't mention those election promises now.

An hon. Member: Forty-two points.

Mr. Drew: One of the hon. gentlemen opposite has shouted "42 points".

An hon. Member: Twenty-two.

Mr. Drew: May I suggest to him a rereading of the Liberal handbook of 1953. He will find that 22 was just a fraction of the points put forward in this beautifully bound book put out at that time.

Mr. Hodgson: It was probably 21 skiddoo.

Mr. Drew: This is not an academic or theoretical subject we are discussing. We are discussing the very basis upon which the governments must meet if they are going to tackle the problem of dealing with the unemployed.

Mr. Garson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? If he were premier of Ontario today would he today accept the green book proposals in their entirety?

Mr. Drew: Oh, Mr. Speaker, I welcome that question because the minister is one of those who know perfectly well that I urged acceptance of the proposals when the facts were obtained and he sat there and heard me urge that.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I am continuing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Garson: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Drew: I am continuing.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the minister is now raising a question of privilege.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has said that I sat there and listened to him accept the proposals. I sat there and listened to him, as premier of Ontario, reject them.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sabotage.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): He scuttled that conference.

Mr. Drew: It is difficult within parliamentary rules to give an appropriate answer to the statement that has been made, but may I simply say that it is a most remarkable example of superlative inexactitude. I am compelled now, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this Liberal mythology. There was no rejection of the proposals, and the minister knows it.

An hon. Member: Who walked out?

Mr. Drew: I hear one of the Liberals to my right shouting "who walked out?" This is the most illuminating thing I have seen, the exposure by the Liberals themselves of the extent to which they have swallowed their own guff.

Mr. Rowe: Half of them do not know and the other half will not believe themselves.

Mr. Drew: They are confusing another occasion. The walk-out was in 1941 when the Liberal premier of Ontario walked out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rowe: You have started something.

An hon. Member: Rewriting history.

Mr. Drew: Someone mentions rewriting history. I know the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) does not like that, and for that reason I believe he will welcome the corrections that are being made this afternoon. He wants the history to be straight and I want it to be straight. In answer to the statement made by the Minister of Justice, I am now compelled to take sufficient time to make the record clear.

Mr. Rowe: He laughs best who laughs last.

Mr. Pickersgill: That will take a long time.

Mr. Drew: The dominion-provincial conference of 1945-46 met on August 6, 1945. On that occasion there was a gratifying atmosphere of good will. If some hon. members, including the Minister of Justice, have been misled by this expensive propaganda let them go back and read the report of the proceedings on that occasion. They will find that the conference adjourned in August to meet again in November for the purpose of continuing the discussions. A statement was issued to the press by the then prime minister of Canada expressing great gratification with the results that had flowed from the conference up to that time. Then the conference met again on November 26, 1945, as a co-ordinating committee, and we discussed certain facts. We discussed the very obvious fact that the dominion government did not have the supporting information upon which to proceed with these proposals. In that regard I cannot help recalling something else that was said by the Prime Minister last Friday. As recorded at page 3287 of Hansard of last Friday the Prime Minister, referring to the communiqué issued following the conference of last week, said:

> The communiqué indicates that there was a discussion of—I will not say "offer" or "proposal" of the federal government because those words were objected to by others attending on the ground that there was nothing complete that could be regarded as an "offer" or as a "proposal"—a suggestion that I put before the meeting on the first day when it was an open public meeting.

May I emphasize these words, Mr. Speaker, because they have such a reminiscent sound in relation to that earlier conference. These are the words of the Prime Minister of last Friday:

> It was quite evident, and no one questioned it, that we did not have accurate information that would permit of the establishment of an exact formula.

We have been pressing in this house for more than two years for an examination of the whole problem, for consultation with the provinces, for the taking of steps to deal with unemployment, and yet only last week we were told by the Prime Minister that they do not have the facts. It was not because they did not have plenty of help to get the facts for them. Not only the dominion bureau of statistics but every department has some form of research branch of its own, some more elaborate than others, and these research branches were available to them. But I should like hon. members to recall, and with deference may I say particularly hon. members opposite, that during all these discussions when we have urged action the Prime Minister remained silent in this house in regard to unemployment. The government gave no indication to us it was going to do anything about it. Then, on the very eve of this new dominion-provincial conference, proposals were given to the press with the usual fanfare to indicate that this beneficent government was going to do great things for unemployment. Now we find from the statement of the Prime Minister that those assurances were given without any supporting information. Mr. Speaker, that is reckless and irresponsible.

They withdrew from the proposals put forward in 1945. They put other proposals forward and they did not have the facts. It was just something to catch the eye of the people of Canada through the press and over the radio as this conference met. They did not have anything to put before that conference last week—not a thing. As the Prime Minister has told us, those who were there even objected to these being called proposals, and I should think very wisely in view of what we have now heard. But, Mr. Speaker, these proposals, and they were proposals, were put forward as a basis for discussion. I can only hope that on this occasion the government really intends to try to make this conference reach some positive conclusion. What I have just said has a direct bearing on what occurred in 1945 and in 1946.

In the autumn of 1945, it became quite clear that the government, this same government, did not have the facts. An economic committee, therefore, was set up to examine the facts. The committee was made up of government experts from every one of the governments, including the dominion government. Then, following that we all met again on January 28, 1946. Again, this was a meeting of the co-ordinating committee but it brought together the Prime Minister of Canada, the premiers of the provinces, a number of their ministers and the staff that was needed for that purpose.

Then, on a later occasion we had a plenary conference which met on April 29, 1946. I had no intention of going into this detail about this conference but when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who was there, says that these proposals were refused he is either very forgetful or very careless of his statements. The fact remains that we were discussing these matters right up to the adjournment on May 3, 1946, on the basis that we were going to meet again to consider all the proposals. Let me read from the last page of the Hansard record of this conference, page 624. I am going to start quoting from the statement of Mr. Ilsley, who was then minister of finance. After his opening remarks he had this to say, and I shall continue to read to the end of the Hansard record which is on the same page. I am quoting now from Mr. Ilsley, and I ask hon. members and particularly hon. members opposite who have heard this sort of propaganda, which is the sort of inaccurate misrepresentation to which we have listened today, to listen to the words that were actually used and see whether or not they are susceptible of the suggestion that this meeting was still not a continuing meeting.

Mr. Ilsley said:

It is evident to me that it would be undesirable to indicate any particular date to which this conference should be adjourned. It seems to me that it is the duty of the government—

That is the government of Canada.

—to give consideration to the various proposals and suggestions which have been put forward. The premier of Ontario suggested, as I understand it, that we alter the basis of the proposed agreement; and Mr. Macdonald also made some changes that might possibly be made. Mr. Douglas on the other hand expressed a point of view in many respects opposite to that of Mr. Macdonald; he suggested a splitting of the differences, or compromise, between the Ontario position and the dominion position. He said, rather soundly I think, that he did not expect his suggestion to be accepted, at least this afternoon; but he wanted to place it on record for consideration.

We have on the record what has been said by the various premiers. It is now our duty—

These are Mr. Ilsley's words.

It is now our duty to give consideration to the situation as it has developed, and announce our decision in due course as to the procedure that should be followed to deal with that situation. I do not think we can do anything beyond that at the present time.

As the Prime Minister reminds me, I must proceed at once with the preparation of the budget. It is not possible for me to wait until an agreement is reached, and I will have to prepare the budget in the light of the fact that no agreement has been reached. In the meantime my suggestion is that we should adjourn sine die, and that the government take into consideration the points of view that have been expressed here today, and then arrive at a decision as to the procedure to follow and the position to take.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I take it that Mr. Ilsley is not suggesting that there will not be another conference. The premier of Quebec who is not here said he would come back at any time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: Listen to the laughter of those who swallowed this propaganda. The premier of Quebec was not there at that time, but he had indicated he would be back at any time to discuss these matters. I am continuing Mr. Ilsley's remarks.

An hon. Member: Were you there?

Mr. Drew: That merely indicates the complete ignorance of those who have been applauding the government for its mistakes. One of the hon. members opposite asked if I was there. I was not only there, but I was sitting there right to the very end. If the hon. member wants to read the text he will be able to see that on the page before I had been indicating the urgency of dealing with these problems just as soon as possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I finish quoting that statement which was interrupted.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Gentlemen, it has been moved that the conference adjourn sine die. All those in favour of the motion will please say, "aye".

Some Premiers: Aye.

Mr. Mackenzie King: Those opposed say, "nay". (No replies)

Mr. Mackenzie King: I declare the motion carried unanimously.

The conference adjourned immediately after the statement by the very distinguished premier of Nova Scotia that he assumed this conference was going to meet again. We all had a right to assume that conference was going to meet again, but it did not. When there is any suggestion that the proposals were rejected, I say that simply is not so. There was no chance of rejecting or accepting because the next thing that happened was that this government, with the typical course of action that they have been following right through—a course of action referred to by Premier Campbell of Manitoba last week—acted on their own. Mr. Ilsley, without any further inquiry of the provinces, or consultation, placed before the house a statement as to what the government was going to give in the way of allowances to provinces that were prepared to accept an agreement. There was no basic agreement with the provinces. It was simply a case of "Big brother has decided, and those who are not trying to make things difficult will immediately comply". That is the way this government has been dealing with these problems right along. That conference was not reconvened, and the only reason those agreements were not reached at that time was that this government refused to meet again. Do not let the Minister of Justice continue the kind of statements he has been making outside because in here we can challenge their accuracy in a more formal manner.

As far as those agreements were concerned, not only was there tacit understanding on the part of many provinces as to that, but there was a strong urge that they be carried into effect without any further delay as soon as the facts were obtained; but this government did not have the facts then, and as the minister of finance himself said, they were going to take into consideration the proposals that had been made, and that is the way we were dealt with. No, Mr. Speaker, this government scuttled that conference. That is what happened, and it has remained in that sunken condition ever since.

The conference which met on an earlier occasion was not a continuation of that conference; it was a conference presumably called to discuss the constitution. It is still in the air, too. As far as any of these matters are concerned, this government apparently believes that all it has to do is to call a conference, make a series of statements in regard to which they have not the basic facts, leave the whole thing in the air and then employ their expensive propaganda machine to assert that those on the other side disagreed with what they said. That has been the whole course of these proceedings.

Since this impression has been so assiduously disseminated, Mr. Speaker, and carried forward even today, that in my capacity as premier of Ontario I was an unwilling attendant at those conferences, I am going to place on record something that has not previously been placed there. I trust that the minister is unaware of this because his conduct would be surprising if he were aware of the fact that the initiation of that conference started by a request communicated on behalf of the government of Ontario, over my signature in January, 1944. I am going to place that on the record. Of course the Minister of Justice knows this because he received a copy of the letter afterwards.

Mr. Ferguson: He may still not know it.

Mr. Drew: Well, I am going to remind him. On January 6, 1944, as premier of Ontario, I wrote the following letter:

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
Prime Minister of Canada,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. King:

Since returning to my office, I have had the opportunity to read a number of speeches made by dominion cabinet ministers referring to plans that are being made for post-war employment and reconstruction. I find that in most cases they refer to fields of activity which would ordinarily be under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

An hon. Member: Family allowances.

Mr. Drew: The mythology still persists.

I need not say that we are most anxious to co-operate in every practical measure which will assure effective post-war planning and the prompt rehabilitation of the members of our armed forces. I believe it is extremely important, however, that where it will be necessary to obtain the agreement of the provincial governments in regard to the joint occupation of fields of legislation ordinarily under their exclusive jurisdiction, there should be previous discussion so that any measures introduced will be on a basis agreed upon in advance.

At present, there are agreements in regard to health and education awaiting adjustment between the dominion and provincial governments. I believe that it is very difficult to deal with these or with any other similar agreements until we have reached some understanding in regard to the present and future constitutional relationship of the various governments.

I would therefore urge that a dominion-provincial conference be called at the earliest possible date to consider the broad question of post-war planning and reconstruction. Not only is this necessary for the purpose of determining the basis upon which the dominion and the provincial governments will co-operate, but it is also necessary for the purpose of considering the subject of taxation in relation to these measures.

I believe that it is of the utmost importance that such a conference be held before any measures are introduced either in the dominion parliament or the provincial legislatures, which call for ultimate agreement between the dominion and the provincial governments. We will be prepared to send representatives to a conference of this nature at such time as will be convenient to you, but I do urge that the conference be held at the earliest possible date.

Yours sincerely,

To that, Mr. Speaker, I received the following reply on January 13, 1944, from Mr. King.

Hon. George A. Drew, M.L.A.,
Premier of Ontario,
Toronto, Ontario.

My dear Premier:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of January 6, regarding the calling of a dominion-provincial conference to consider questions of post-war employment, reconstruction and the financial relationships between the dominion and the provinces.

At the close of the dominion-provincial conference on January 15, 1941, I indicated that my colleagues and I would be ready to meet the provincial governments at any time they were generally agreed that a further conference would be in the national interest.

I am pleased to note from your letter that the province of Ontario is prepared to take part in such a conference at the earliest possible date. By direction of the government, the clerk of the privy council is today sending a copy of your communication to the premiers of the other provinces, with a request for an early expression of their views as to the holding of a dominion-provincial conference.

Yours sincerely,
W. L. Mackenzie King.

There was the beginning of the whole exchange of discussion that led up to that conference. Mr. King had no hesitation in saying that he had forwarded the letter I had sent to him as the basis of suggestion to the other premiers, and upon that basis the conclusions of the suggestions were brought together which were then followed up at a later time, and we kept pressing for a conference throughout a great many communications, copies of which I have in my hand, up until the time that the conference was finally called on August 6, 1945. That letter was the basis of the whole agenda, and it will be recalled that the name used for the conference was the conference on reconstruction, which was the name suggested in my letter to Mr. King at that time.

I do think it is about time that we should be able to discuss these things without the suggestion that these proposals were rejected or otherwise. There is the Hansard record. The conference adjourned with a statement on behalf of the dominion government that they were going to be considered, and we never met again, only because the dominion government was not prepared to call a conference, although it was requested over and over again by myself as premier of Ontario and by other premiers right across Canada.

This is something that every member should be prepared to examine objectively. We have another conference under way. Members of parliament are those who must accept responsibility for their willingness, if they indicate that willingness, to let this government leave the whole thing in the position where their attitude is described by words used earlier this afternoon, "take your choice, George." No; surely hon. members opposite, who must claim some success out of this beautifully published book, are the very ones who have the highest degree of obligation to see that these undertakings are planned, and that we do know where we stand. After all, we very frankly indicated doubt that the government had any intention of carrying it out, and we were certainly right on that occasion. We are not dealing with mere questions of agreement or disagreement, we are dealing with the human problem of hundreds of thousands of unemployed people who today are desperately anxious about the future. We are dealing with the problem of what answer is going to be given by the husband who comes home to his family and is asked, "Have you got work?" We are dealing with the problem of the housewife who wants to know where the money for the next meal is coming from. We are dealing with the deepest and most fundamental problem of all, the maintenance of the households of the people of Canada.

It is this human problem which is incorporated in this situation because we have been told by this government through the Prime Minister that the proposals they put forward should not be called proposals because they were not definite enough and in any event that they have not the facts on which to proceed. Let us have the facts. We have been in the position where we have two sets of figures in regard to the unemployed. We have a set of figures given on March 17 in regard to applicants for employment showing a total of 632,913. Those were the figures given to us by an agency of government. Then we are told that those are not the right figures, that the other figure is just over 400,000. If they are over 400,000 they are far too high. Which figure is correct?

In any event the government does not know. The government has not the facts and there are a lot of facts to find out. How is this divided as between married and unmarried people? How is it divided as between the young and the old? How is it divided as between husbands and wives where both are employed? Those are all factors in a problem of this kind. They are all factors in regard to which every single detail should have been obtained long ago by this government under the pressure which has been exerted in this house.

The Prime Minister blandly told us the other day that it was perhaps a good thing that there had not been agreement, that they may have been too optimistic in those 1945 proposals. That is poor solace to the unemployed who have been hoping that out of these meetings would come something to meet their situation. We should have known that long ago if the government thought this had been a fortuitous breakdown, with the resultant refusal to call another conference. Perhaps that was the reason they did not call another conference. I wonder. The Prime Minister now says that it was fortunate they did not reach agreement. Perhaps they made sure that they never reached agreement and that is the reason we were not called back. It is the first reasonable explanation I have heard on the part of this government in this respect.

Then the Prime Minister speaks about the heavy burden of war, or perhaps I should correct that and say heavy expenditure for defence preparations.

An hon. Member: The cold war.

Mr. Drew: I hope no hon. member opposite will object—someone just now objected to the use of the word "war", but to the young men who fought in Korea it was a very real war, whether a hot war or a cold war. The Prime Minister very properly pointed out that large expenditures are being made for defence. That is true, but let us look at the situation as it is.

In 1944, which was the base year upon which these proposals were made, the gross national product was $11,954 million. In 1954, which is the base year upon which the present proposals were based—I should not use the word "proposals" because there were not enough facts to justify that name, according to the government—the gross national product had more than doubled to a total of $23,985 million. If the gross national product is twice as much, why cannot they deal with these proposals on the basis they put forward? How much further do they need to go?

In 1939 the percentage of the tax dollar which the dominion government took was 48 per cent; the provincial governments got 22·3 per cent and the municipal governments 29·7 per cent. Last year the dominion government took 77 cents of every tax dollar, leaving 23 cents to both the provinces and the municipalities, less in percentage than what the municipalties were getting in 1939.

If the dominion government has to have a higher concentration of the tax dollar than they now have, all the authority of the provincial and municipal governments will be gone entirely. That is what this statement is reduced to; that is what it means. I hear an hon. member suggesting that that is what they want. Everything that they have done indicates that step by step they have forced the provinces into the position where they are going to find it most difficult to carry on.

I was interested in the interjection by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I should like to hear the Minister of Justice tell us whether he approves of the present proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), because the Minister of Justice has been going all over the country saying that the agreements and the agreements alone must be preserved, and nothing else. Anything else would be almost disloyalty.

Yet the Prime Minister and also the Minister of Finance have announced that they are going to have a dual system. They are going to have a system of agreements and a system of tax exemption; if some province becomes sufficiently noisy about its position, or should I say sufficiently vigorous in its demands, may we not have another system? Certainly the principle, enunciated by the Minister of Justice, of agreements only and nothing else has gone. As he knows, that has gone in the proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt that the Minister of Justice intends to support them because they are put forward by the Minister of Finance.

If with the concentration of funds now available this government cannot carry out its undertakings, then they never could have carried them out. Therefore we are in the position that the only way in which anything can be done would be by a still greater grasping of provincial and municipal funds and for all practical purposes the extinction of provincial and municipal rights.

I might point out another rather significant fact, referring again to the book I had in my hand earlier this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Read it.

Mr. Drew: I cannot help pausing for a moment to hear the remarks from the other side as hon. members express their approval of this book and its contents and yet repudiate it. I urge them to reread the book, particularly the statement in regard to the implementation of the 1945 proposals. When the Prime Minister tells us that it is rather difficult because of the expenditures on national defence, I need not remind hon. members that in 1953 when the election was under way the expenditures on national defence were far higher. If there was any honesty of purpose behind that declaration in 1953, then they are better able to fulfil that obligation today than they were in 1953.

Mr. Ferguson: Do not remind the Prime Minister of those election promises. It is not fair. Oh, that is mean.

Mr. Drew: I should like to point out one further significant and important fact. The proposals put forward by the government of Canada at the conference last week were proposals to deal with unemployment at an unnamed time and on the basis of unknown facts. But what the people of this country want to know is not only what this government is prepared to do now in regard to those who are actually unemployed, whichever figures of their own they use; we want to know what this government is prepared to do now to stimulate this country so that there can be employment. What we should be talking about is the creation of employment. No country in this world has it within its power to create employment and expand production as we have here in Canada, with sufficient vigour and energy on the part of the government and its people.

We have heard already during the course of this debate that the government has confidence in the country, leaving the implication that others have not. Mr. Speaker, we have confidence in this country, and we have confidence that we have to encourage the development of the limitless resources we possess, and for the production and fabrication of which we have such enormous resources of industrial energy in the form of hydroelectric power, coal, oil, gas, uranium—all these things. We say that, with the development of these, there is full employment for all here and full employment for millions more in the years immediately ahead.

An hon. Member: All we need is a new government.

Mr. Drew: All this calls for action. The Minister of Finance gave a rather schoolmasterly bit of advice to the manufacturers. He told them that they had better pull up their socks and meet the situation. This demands more than action by the manufacturers. It demands action by everyone. It demands action by this government, by the provincial government, by municipalities, by employers and employees, and by all Canadians. The outstanding fact with which we are confronted today is that Canada is no longer selling abroad in a sellers' market. We are up against the keenest competition this country has ever known.

The miracle of recovery in Europe is something of significance to every one of us. Out of the ravages of war 300 million people have rebuilt their economy in a way that has not been equalled in the whole history of mankind. It is only a few years ago that in a patronizing manner we talked about Britain and said that Britain was through, that the British were tired and really did not have the energy. Yet today Britain, with nearly four times the population, has only a fraction of our unemployed. Britain today is more prosperous than it has ever been in its history. France, with all its difficulties, is immensely prosperous. Italy has made a recovery that is beyond the imagination. West Germany has made the most incredible recovery of all. Out of the very ashes of the greatest destruction ever visited upon any nation has developed one of the great production areas of the world and, as we now know, they have moved even within these past few years into the third trading place in the world, although only six years ago we were insisting upon the destruction of many of their plants in the Ruhr and in the Rhineland. This is one of the most unbelievable recoveries. The same is true of Holland—gallant Holland, which Canadians know and admire—Denmark, Norway, the Baltic states, Switzerland; yes, and in Spain and Portugal, right through the whole of Europe, there is a level of production such as has never been known. Let us not forget our debt to the United States, because in very large measure that great recovery has been due to the unparalleled generosity of our friends in the United States and the money they have given for the reconstruction of Europe.

Having said that, then let me say most emphatically that that is not the most important by any manner of means. It is the spirit of the people. It is the spirit of the people of Britain that you see emerging out of all this effort. It is the spirit of the people of the different countries of Europe, and there today among those 300 million people, so closely akin to us in the ideas of society and of the good and decent things of life, we see production, we see skill, we see a mounting prosperity which is of importance to every one of us. Let us thank God that they have been able to recover in this way from the destruction which had taken place. But let us also remember that we should be very thankful that that great area stands prosperous and firm in the defence of the same freedom for which we are struggling at this time. Moreover, it presents a great market into which we can sell, if only we vigorously recognize the demands that are before us. Therefore, let us do everything we can to stimulate this activity. But the first place for this sort of action to come from is the government itself. The government has put forward a proposal that there be a commission to inquire into the broad economic future of this country. That is a fine thing; but, if it is a good thing to appoint a royal commission for that purpose, then that knocks into a cocked hat all the nonsense we have heard about royal commissions destroying the authority and responsibility of government. Every time we have put forward a proposal that there be a royal commission to inquire into waste and extravagance in the government, which incidentally has been found every time there has been an inquiry—

Mr. Rowe: It is getting worse.

Mr. Drew: —we have been told that it is contrary to our constitutional system and it would be a denial of the rights and responsibilities of parliament. But these people now put before us a royal commission to inquire into our economic system. We want something to be done right away to deal with this problem of unemployment. We want something done now to deal with the unemployed; and we want the government itself to do something that will stimulate the sense of economy and efficiency in this country.

Therefore, as we approve of the setting up of this commission, I repeat our request that a royal commission be set up to inquire into the operation and organization of all government departments and all agencies of government. We have heard these pious assurances about efficiency and the things they are doing. I shall close these remarks by saying to the Minister of Finance, in the ancient biblical words, "Physician, heal thyself".

An hon. Member: A great speech, George.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we will all agree with the observation of the amiable gentleman who just intervened and say that, from the point of view of delivery and the renewal of old-time vigour, "That was quite a speech, George." I may say to the Leader of the Opposition, before I cross swords with him this afternoon, that I am very glad, as everyone in the house is, that during the past month or so, he has shown increasingly if not his old-time form of exactitude, his old-time form of vigour.

Sir, I rise primarily today to answer the observation made by the Leader of the Opposition in the early part of his speech, when he took issue with the implication of my question that the 1945 proposals of the federal government have in the field of health and welfare been implemented to the extent of over two-thirds. The Leader of the Opposition contradicted that statement and said it was not true. I now propose among other things to deal with that particular aspect of the question and show that my statement is fully substantiated by the evidence I am now going to offer.

It will be understood and remembered that the 1945 proposals were a series of integrated proposals the implementation of which depended upon the finding of agreement with the provinces on fiscal measures. It was clear at all times that the several and individual proposals could not stand by themselves. The federal government offered to bring in certain measures in consideration of particular agreements, mainly in fiscal matters, with the provincial governments. My hon. friend has said it was this government that scuttled the conference of 1945. I do not know whether he meant or hoped to indicate by that statement a suggestion that we had done the same last week or were proposing to do so next fall. But I want to say—

Mr. Drew: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in my remarks there was no suggestion, so far as last week's preliminary meeting was concerned, of any such thought or any such indication. The fact is that so little was done that it would not have been possible anyway.

Mr. Martin: I thank my hon. friend for saying that his reference was to the 1945 conference and not to the conference of last week. As one of those who participated in last week's conference, one of the sessions of which—and I think it was the most important one—was a secret session by agreement, I may say that there was a disposition on the part of everyone, from the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) down to every premier and delegate, to deal in a spirit of understanding and co-operation and by means of constructive effort, with the difficult problems that face Canada. I am sure that spirit will prevail under the Prime Minister of Canada, who we all know is capable of nothing but understanding and co-operative effort.

The premier of Ontario—and he disagrees with the Leader of the Opposition—in commenting on the conference of last week said it was a most helpful one on the part of all parties to the conference. I believe the way to bring about good government in Canada is by so conducting oneself as to make it possible for all those taking part in a dominion-provincial conference to say that what we have done has been done in a co-operative and understanding spirit.

I shall not say to the Leader of the Opposition that he did not approach the problems in 1945 as sincerely as did anyone else. The hon. gentleman is a sincere-minded gentleman. While we may differ on issues, I shall never be found accusing him of want of sincerity. However, I say to him in all earnestness, that my reading of the record of the 1945 conference suggests that, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. gentleman may have been acting, as possibly he thought he was, in the interests of his province—and for that I give him credit—his attitude was one of the main factors why that conference did not succeed.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in 1945 no agreement was reached on fiscal affairs. So the federal government has never at any time since that date been committed or obligated to carry out the 1945 proposals, since the conditions on which they were based have never been fulfilled. Despite this fact, the federal government has actually gone ahead on a unilateral basis with such portions of the 1945 program as it seemed possible from time to time to implement. The result is that 10 years later, in 1955, we find that most of the proposals have, in fact, been implemented to a degree far in excess of the levels suggested at the 1945 conference.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, might I ask what the minister is reading from, in order that I may know the source of the information he is giving to us?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is asking a perfectly correct question. When he was reading some of his notes I wondered the same thing.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that the hon. member for Eglinton is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fleming: I am rising on a question of privilege. The minister has said that the Leader of the Opposition was reading from his notes. That, if true, would have been a breach of the rules of the house. The Leader of the Opposition was not reading from his notes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Eglinton rises on a question of privilege to state that the Leader of the Opposition has been improperly accused of reading from his notes. Does the hon. member not think that a question of privilege in that sense is one which does not belong to him but rather to the Leader of the Opposition? May I point this out to hon. members generally. We have listened to an interesting speech by the Leader of the Opposition. We are now listening to one which promises to be equally interesting by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Knowles: He is always promising.

Mr. Speaker: Naturally some interruptions are in order, provided they are not disorderly. An hon. member must not be interrupted while he is speaking unless he gives his consent. I would not want too many questions of privilege to be raised when, in fact, they are not questions of privilege and are raised only for the purpose of interrupting the hon. member who has the floor. A moment ago I did all that I could to protect the Leader of the Opposition, who had the floor. I intend to do likewise with regard to the minister who is now speaking and with regard to any other hon. member who may take part in this debate. I should like hon. members to co-operate. If they do not agree with some of the remarks being made by the member who has the floor, I would ask them not to interrupt on a question of privilege when the question, in fact, is not one of privilege.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—and I know in this case the minister will welcome the interruption—I wish to make it clear that I read nothing except quotations, and they were clearly indicated as quotations. I assure the minister that I was not implying that he is reading his speech. I confess that at the time I thought he was reading from something, and I asked the question actually wanting to know the source of the information. If the answer is that he is reading from notes, then that is the complete answer to what I asked.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I assure you and the house that I shall not be reading for very long from what I have in front of me, because I think I am usually able to collect my thoughts without too much trouble. However, over the week end, after the exchange between the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, I did some homework. I find that homework is extremely interesting. I have tabulated a number of facts, and that tabulation is what I have been referring to and reading from. I think my hon. friend will find that, notwithstanding the heavy preoccupations which he, I and others had on Saturday, I did a fairly good job of homework.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The 1945 proposals had to do with fiscal agreements, social security and public investment. Under the heading of fiscal agreements we now have tax agreements with 9 of the 10 provinces. It is interesting to note, from the table I have before me, the payments which we were prepared to make in 1945 and 1948, compared with the payments to be made in 1956, and the extent to which, in the fiscal field, we have more than implemented what was proposed in 1945.

In 1945 we proposed to the provinces a formula which would have resulted, had it been in effect in 1944, in total payments to the provinces of $206,800,000. In 1948 the payments to the provinces would have amounted to $215,400,000 on the basis of the 1945 formula. The estimated payments in 1956 are $320,350,000. Hence in the matter of fiscal agreements alone the government and the Minister of Finance have been able to provide to the provinces payments substantially greater than those proposed at the famous conference in 1945 to which our attention has been directed this afternoon.

Mr. Knowles: Have you those figures in constant dollars?

Mr. Martin: I have those figures in constant dollars, and if I had unlimited time I would go through the whole table. It is very interesting. But I shall take Ontario as an example. For 1944 the proposed payments to Ontario would have been $68,600,000. In 1948 the proposed payments would have amounted to $70,300,000, and in 1955-56 the premier of Ontario will have $139,500,000 at his disposal for the services he wishes to perform. These figures make it clear that the federal government has in fact implemented the fiscal portion of the 1945 proposals for any province desiring to participate, and has done so at a level twice as generous as the most optimistic estimates of financial revenue accruing to the provinces as set out in the 1945 proposals.

Further, in return for these tax rental payments the federal government has not insisted on the exclusive occupancy of all the tax fields on which it insisted in 1945. While still insisting on the occupancy of the personal income and corporation tax fields, it now agrees to share other fields such as succession duties with the provinces.

Mr. Drew: It vacated the fields we suggested should be vacated.

Mr. Martin: I am sure I would welcome a question, but I would appreciate it if I could deal with this matter without interruption. In addition, the federal government has also vacated the gasoline tax and amusement tax fields, leaving exclusive occupancy of those fields to the provinces. That was not the situation in 1945. That is the situation today, and points out in fiscal matters the extent to which the federal government has implemented the proposals which it made in 1945.

Mr. Drew: That was what we urged and what was refused.

Mr. Martin: I now come to the matters for which I am responsible ministerially. My hon. friend—and I think what he said was justifiable debate—said that I perhaps took greater credit for myself and for the government than I should in respect of certain acts of the government in the fields of health and welfare. I am not going to say that perhaps my hon. friend is not sometimes justified in this criticism. But I will tell him and the house that the national health program brought in by the government in 1948, welcomed as it was by every province at that time and again approved unanimously at our meetings last week, is a program which I believe to be of such great significance that perhaps I do sometimes overestimate because of enthusiasm the part that I or the department or the government play in it.

Mr. Fleming: By way of self-advertisement.

Mr. Brooks: By way of political propaganda.

Mr. Martin: But I will say to my hon. friends that in the hospital construction grants we have, according to the premier of the province of Ontario, a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, spearheaded a program that has resulted in the provision of over 68,000 hospital beds in the last six and a half years—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: You did not spearhead it. Ontario is away ahead of you.

Mr. Martin: —in co-operation with the provinces and, as my hon. friend has said, with the mightier contribution of the citizens generally in the various communities.

Mr. Drew: And after it had been started by the province of Ontario.

Mr. Martin: I am not going to say that Ontario was not building hospital beds. Of course they were. But I refer my hon. friend to the report made by the minister of health of Ontario a year ago last May. He can verify there whether the statement I have made about our contribution is an overstatement.

In 1945 there was no proposal by the federal government to make grants for hospital construction. In 1945 the federal government made certain proposals in the field of health. In the field of hospital construction it proposed that it would be prepared to lend the money at a low interest rate. That was the proposal in 1945. Since that time we have gone further in implementing this particular proposal, and instead of making loans we are making outright grants to the provinces and local hospitals. Therefore in that particular no one can say that I am not justified in saying we have more than implemented that part of the 1945 proposals.

But let us look at all the grants and see the extent to which we have carried out unilaterally the things we thought in 1945 should be done in this particular field. The total in dollars and cents of the health grants we offered in 1945 was $14,200,000. That included a general public health grant and grants for mental health treatment, for tuberculosis treatment, for professional training and the like. Since that time we have not committed ourselves to an annual grant of $14,200,000; we have committed ourselves to health grants to the provinces in the amount of $48,300,000. There again we have justified my statement that we have more than implemented our proposal to the provinces in the field of health grants.

In 1945 there was no cancer control grant proposed to the provinces. We are now making available to the provinces $3½ million in the field of cancer control. In the matter of radiological and laboratory services we are now making available $6,078,000. No such proposal was offered in 1945. We are now making an annual grant to the provinces of $1 million in the field of medical rehabilitation. That was not proposed in 1945. We are now making a grant of $2 million in the field of child and maternal health. That was not proposed in 1945. Not only have we increased the amounts we proposed to the provinces in 1945 but we have actually, as I have just indicated, offered further grants in the amounts I have mentioned.

With regard to the proposals for grants made in 1945, the amount proposed for general public health was $4 million. We have made and are making annually a grant of $7 million to the provinces in the field of general public health. In 1945 the tuberculosis grant was placed at $3 million. It is now $4,240,000. In 1945, when my hon. friend was at the conference, the proposed mental health grant was $4 million. The federal government now makes a grant to the provinces on a per capita basis in the amount of $7,235,000.

So, Mr. Speaker, I stand before you able to say—and no one can contradict me in the face of these figures—that the proposals we made in the field of health, with the exception of health insurance—

Mr. Fleming: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: —have been implemented to levels greater than those proposed to the provinces in 1945. In fact the health grants are now two or three times more generous than those proposed in 1945. I can say as the premier of Saskatchewan said last week, although he was not fully satisfied from the point of view of the future direction of the plan envisaged by him, that the health grants which were proposed in 1945 and which have been implemented and increased as I have just indicated have more than justified their existence and are providing for a measure of uniformity in health services throughout the country such as to make every Canadian proud of what we are doing at the present time.

My hon. friend will recall that in 1945 a planning grant was proposed. This planning grant would enable every province to select its own personnel for the purpose of making a complete survey of its health services. This was one of the proposals made in 1945. Have we unilaterally implemented that proposal, Mr. Speaker? The answer is yes. On my desk in my department are 10 huge volumes representing the 10 provincial surveys that have been made under the planning grant, as a result of which today every province is in a first-rate position to assess the extent of its health assets and liabilities and needs. Again, in this particular aspect we have unilaterally implemented a proposal made to the provinces in 1945.

One of the things we have not done has been to carry out the full development of our physical fitness program. I must accept some of the responsibility for that. We have abandoned this program. The house will remember that we abandoned it as the result of a suggestion made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), vigorously supported by the Leader of the Opposition. The whole house agreed with the decision that it should be abandoned.

Then we come to the field of social security, and perhaps here we have even stronger evidence of the fact that the government has, almost to the fullest extent, implemented the proposals made in 1945. At that time the government proposed a universal old age pension system under which the federal government was prepared to assume full responsibility for administration and for the raising of the necessary taxes to provide pensions to everyone, without a means test, at 70. This was in 1945, before Korea, and at a time when our defence budget was expected to be stabilized at approximately $250 million. Since that time war came to Korea, and with Korea increasing obligations in various parts of the world including our contribution to NATO. The result has been that the Minister of Finance is now budgeting for almost $2 billion for national defence alone.

In spite of that, we unilaterally implemented our proposals for old age security made in 1945, and today every citizen in this country who is an applicant and who is aged 70 is given a non-means-test old age security cheque at a total cost to the Canadian taxpayers this year of $367 million. Again this was done on the recommendation of this government and parliament. Does the Leader of the Opposition say that does not represent the implementation of a very important proposal made by the federal government in 1945?

We will not stop there. In 1945 old age assistance was proposed as well. A scheme of old age assistance was proposed to the provinces, including Ontario, the premier of which at that time was my hon. friend, to care for those between the ages of 65 and 69, on an equal basis with the provinces. Surely it is not news to the Leader of the Opposition that that proposal has been implemented, that it is now the law of the land and is on the statute books of this country. The result is that we are providing old age assistance on a 50-50 basis with the provinces. In 1945 the proposals set the amount at $30 per month. We have gone one better, because we are paying old age assistance now in the amount of $40 per month.

Mr. Fleming: You mean 50 per cent, do you not?

Mr. Martin: In 1945 we proposed—

Mr. Fleming: Surely the minister is not suggesting that the federal government is paying all that.

Mr. Martin: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Fleming: You said, "We are paying".

Mr. Martin: I said the federal government had recommended a policy, as a result of which the Canadian taxpayer was making contributions for the maintenance of those classes in our communities which we, as a government and as a parliament, believed desirable. That is what I said.

Mr. Fleming: You said, "We are paying".

Mr. Pickersgill: "We" is plural.

Mr. Martin: Now let us go to the question of blindness allowances. There was a proposal for blindness allowances in 1945. Not only has that proposal been implemented, it has been increased. Not only have the allowances been increased, but important amendments have been introduced. First of all we lowered the qualifying age for blindness allowance from 40 to 21, and this very session there stands in my name a bill to reduce the age from 21 to 18 and to increase the income ceilings for the blind. In that particular, we have implemented a proposal which was part of a package deal made in 1945 and which, for the reasons I have mentioned, was not carried out.

A disability pension was suggested in 1945, and we now have on the statute books of our country, notwithstanding our failure to get full agreement from all the provinces in 1945, a scheme to provide for disability allowances in co-operation with the provinces. There again we have implemented a proposal made in 1945.

Mr. Fleming: Ontario had it before you did.

Mr. Martin: Unemployment insurance was not one of the proposals made because of the fact that it had come into being in the early days of the war. The fact is, however, Mr. Speaker, that there was much discussion about unemployment insurance and health and welfare, at the 1945 conference There are the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act that were introduced two and a half years ago, and the amendments now being introduced by my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). These accomplishments support the stand taken by Mr. Claxton, then minister of national health and welfare, at the 1945 conference that the federal government proposed to make certain refinements in and additions to that particular kind of legislation.

I find that in addition, grants have been made for water conservation projects that were proposed in 1945. There have been agreements for assistance in forestry programs, and for a joint project to counter the infestation of spruce budworm in New Brunswick forests. These are grants that were proposed in 1945, and which it is suggested in this debate today have been abandoned or are not being implemented.

So, Mr. Speaker, beyond any doubt I was justified when I rose in my place during the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and asked him whether it was not a fact that in the field of health and welfare over two-thirds of the proposals made by the federal government had been implemented. I say, therefore, that this government deserves at the hands of the country, as it has received at the hands of the country, commendation for its determination to bring forward and implement these very difficult proposals, in spite of the fact that the government was not able to get simultaneously the kind of arrangements with certain provinces which would have made these things financially possible. It is to the credit of this government's responsible concept of social reform that it has been able to bring in these measures, in the way it did, in the face of our existing difficulties, in the face of the fact that we were then spending over $250 million on family allowances and will spend close to $360 million this year.

I stand fearlessly before the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, and ask this question. Will he not admit that no other government, no other political party in our country, except the C.C.F., in the face of the obligations of the government during the last decade, has demonstrated by its program that it would be willing to inaugurate those bold undertakings? I have excluded the C.C.F.—

Mr. Drew: I assume, Mr. Speaker, that I have been asked a question. I say most definitely that this government is not the only government that would have done it, and that they have been simply following the progress of social development that has been supported by all parties. Any suggestion that we opposed any of those measures is false, and has nothing to do with the statement I made.

Mr. Martin: I would certainly be lacking in natural understanding if I did not anticipate the kind of answer the Leader of the Opposition has made. But I do not want to take the time this afternoon, when our feelings are at their best, to remind him that there are certain great social measures now on the statute books which not only his party but he himself vigorously opposed.

Mr. Drew: That statement is not true.

Mr. McIlraith: It is true.

Mr. Martin: I have excluded the C.C.F., Mr. Speaker. I have done so deliberately because I believe that the C.C.F., having no expectancy of ever sitting on this side, have decided that the wise thing for them to do is to put forward all sorts of proposals, no matter how cockeyed.

Mr. Knowles: But you like them; you have stolen some of them.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the verbatim report of the plenary discussions of the 1945 conference. I am now looking at page 569, and I am going to quote the words of the Leader of the Opposition. I quote them because of his last observation. I think they indicate clearly that the Leader of the Opposition, notwithstanding what may be his feelings now, in 1945 was not too enthusiastic about the proposals in the field of health and welfare, particularly welfare, put forward by the federal government. Here is what my hon. friend said. I have no doubt that when he speaks on some other occasion he will be able to offer an explanation, but in the absence of that explanation I can only take his words to mean what they clearly imply. Here is what he said:

> But since we are now discussing this point may I urge, with the utmost earnestness and the utmost vigour, that no commitments be made, and that no further promises be given to the public such as we have had, even in these past few months—commitments which dazzle new visions in front of the public, and create new appetites which are extremely costly to satisfy; and particularly that no new promises be made lightly by any dominion cabinet minister in regard to those fields which are in fact fields of provincial jurisdiction.

Of course that would cover old age security, old age assistance, blindness allowances, health grants, and so on.

Mr. Sinclair: Health, cancer.

Mr. Martin: May I finish the quotation? This took place in the plenary discussions of the conference of 1945, when my hon. friend was not honouring this house with attendance here because he was a member of another house. He went on to say:

> I refer particularly to the field of social services which, at the instance of the Prime Minister of Canada himself, was declared by the privy council to be the field of jurisdiction of the provincial governments. It may be possible that the hundreds of millions of dollars to which the dominion government has already committed itself in these fields must stand as commitments. But certainly future conferences, as well as this one, would be greatly aided if the advisability of consultation in advance before new commitments are made, either in joint dominion-provincial activities, and particularly in the provincial field, was carefully considered.
> I think right now we would proceed very much more quickly to agreement if some of these very general and still undefined proposals which are to be financed by a separate method of financing were to be kept on another basis of discussion until we had settled the basic agreement. I refer to that because of the suggestion made more than once that all these things must be considered as an integrated whole.

That was our very point; they must all be considered as an integrated whole. The Leader of the Opposition concluded in this way:

> By all means let us consider every subject which has now been discussed; and as I said yesterday, in considering those other subjects not included in the matters we are now discussing, let us always be sure that the public knows that they are to be financed by an additional income tax and poll tax.

These words clearly imply that at that time my hon. friend did not like the proposals which I now say have to such a great extent already been implemented and placed upon the statute books of this country, thanks to the initiative of this government.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege what has been read is in the record and is not open to the interpretation placed on it by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The words speak for themselves, and they clearly indicate my support of the principle of the proposals and an attempt to reach agreement, which the dominion government made impossible.

Mr. Sinclair: Black is white and white is black.

Mr. Martin: This is only one of the rare occasions, then, when the Leader of the Opposition and I disagree.

In conclusion I want to say simply this. In 1945, faced with the situation that attended the conclusion of the war, with no knowledge of the increasing burdens that international commitments would impose on the government of Canada, we did make, as the Prime Minister suggested last Friday, certain proposals to the provinces, some of which, in the light of changed conditions, may require another look. But in spite of that, my effort today has been to show that notwithstanding modifications which any responsible man will find it necessary to apply to some proposals, viewed in their entire context, the fact is that with the exception of the development of the physical fitness and the health insurance program, and the timing feature of the public investment grants to the provinces, they have been implemented. Therefore no one, including the hon. member for Eglinton, whose speech I missed yesterday—and I am sure I missed something—and the Leader of the Opposition, will in the future be justified in saying they have not been implemented, because the record is clear.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, oh!

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend may laugh, but there is one thing he cannot laugh at and that is the facts.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the minister a question? When is the minister coming to that portion of the 1945 proposals relating to health insurance, which was repeated in 1953, and was part of the proposals which were buried by the Prime Minister last Friday?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the Prime Minister—sometimes it is an asset and sometimes I think it is a liability—has the quality of not wanting to bury anything. He does not refrain from disclosing everything. So when the hon. member says he was trying to bury something last Friday, the only thing I know that he was trying to bury was the Tory party. There are some people who suggest that the Prime Minister is not aware of the fact that the Tory party has been buried already.

Mr. Drew: Do I take it from what the minister has said that the speech of the Prime Minister was entirely a political speech and not intended to be taken seriously?

Mr. Martin: Was the Prime Minister's speech political? I hope it was. Have we reached the stage where it is a wrong thing in this House of Commons to make a political speech?

Mr. Fleming: Evidently not at this moment.

Mr. Martin: Then as to the question my hon. friend has asked, my hon. friend knows that question is of another order. My hon. friend knows that the answer to that question depends upon authorities outside of this house. I refer my hon. friend to what the Prime Minister of Canada said on that subject, and which represented the policy of the government of Canada, on July 9, 1953. I read this into the record of this house on June 19 last, but as it is such a good statement my colleague the Minister of Finance suggests that it would bear repetition. The Prime Minister said:

> The ninth subject I wish to refer to is health insurance and social security generally. The Liberal party is committed to support a policy of contributory health insurance to be administered by the provinces.

Mr. Knowles: And has been since 1919.

Mr. Martin: There is the voice from Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: Wrong again.

Mr. Knowles: It is a good riding, but it does not happen to be mine.

Mr. Martin: I continue with what the Prime Minister said:

> But, under our federal system, to get health insurance started the people and the government of the various provinces have to take the initiative in working out plans adapted to local conditions.
> We are ready to assist in a sensible and practical nation-wide scheme, but that depends on satisfactory agreements with the provincial governments.
> I am more convinced than ever that this is a field which should, as far as practicable, be left to provincial administration. Conditions differ vastly from one province to another, and services which are suitable for one region are quite unsuitable to another. We now have had a great deal of experience with health schemes of all kinds in this country, including full-fledged hospital insurance in two of our provinces.
> But I do not think it would be fair to the taxpayers of Canada in all the provinces to make federal contributions to provincial schemes in only one or two provinces. Federal contributions should be regarded as a supplement and an evener-out when most of the provinces are prepared to undertake satisfactory schemes.
>
> And it is Liberal policy to go on improving federal health grants which have done so much to place all the provinces in a better position to discharge their primary responsibility in this important field.
> Health insurance is one aspect of the over-all social security program which the Liberal party set out to realize after the war. From time to time improvements will be needed in it and in our veterans' charter. And under a Liberal government they will be improved when circumstances warrant and the resources are available.

I verily believe that only under a Liberal government can we look for further and responsible measures of reform.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister to answer the question I put to him, which apparently he has overlooked. Are the 1945 proposals of the federal government in relation to health insurance among those which were—whichever way you wish to put it—withdrawn or buried or scuttled by the Prime Minister last Friday?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend and I were classmates, and I have a high appreciation of his intelligence. I know perfectly well that his question is not intended to elicit information which he already possesses, but rather to embarrass me; and that he cannot do. In any event, our policy on health insurance is contained in the Prime Minister's statement which I have just read.

Mr. Fleming: Whatever may be the effect on the minister, will he answer the question?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, after the masterly refutation to which we have just listened it would be certainly an act of supererogation on my part if I should attempt to further pulverize the remnants of the argument of the Leader of the Opposition. But one point was raised by the hon. gentleman to which I must reply as a matter of personal privilege, because as he developed it, it was almost a reflection upon my veracity. I refer to the statements which he has imputed to me concerning the responsibility for the breakdown of the dominion-provincial conference of 1945, and those parts of the Hansard of this 1945 conference which he placed on the record in support of his argument on this point today.

I do not like doing this, because it is the first occasion upon which I have had to take issue with my hon. friend since he returned to the house. Like all other hon. members I am as delighted as I can be to see him back again, not lacking in all his former vehemence and vigour. But as was said by one hon. member of the house, the public may take their choice. The Leader of the Opposition placed some material on the record, and

I should like also to place some on the record and then leave the members of this house and the public of Canada to judge which is the more satisfactory account of the breakdown of that conference.

What I have said is this. I have said that the conference broke up because after nine months of negotiation Quebec would set no rental whatever to the tax fields, and Ontario demanded rentals which were $50 million more than the total of all the prewar provincial revenues from all sources.

Mr. Rowe: When did you say that?

Mr. Drew: The minister did not say that today.

Mr. Garson: I said that in this house.

Mr. Pouliot: Mortuus adhuc loquitur.

Mr. Drew: I just want to have the record quite clear. The minister made no such reference to any such statement in the remarks to which my remarks referred.

Mr. Garson: In order to understand the material which my hon. friend has placed on the record and that which I shall now place on the record in reply it is necessary to recall that the conference was convened in August, 1945. On the very day it opened it was presented with what has been referred to as the green book proposals, which were a very complete statement of the program the federal government was submitting to the provinces as one entire, integrated proposal.

It was debated on that occasion for five days, and then arrangements were made for the technical officers of the provincial and dominion governments to confer in the interval, and the plenary conference again met in January, 1946. As might be expected, several of the provinces took at least bargaining exceptions to the first case which had been presented by the federal government, and made demands for a number of further concessions.

The dominion government made two major concessions to the provinces which they took under consideration in the interval between January, 1946, and the reconvening of the plenary conference in April, 1946. It was apparent when we met again in April that at least seven of the provinces would accept these concessions which had been made by the federal government and that, so far as they were concerned, agreements would be possible. It was at that stage that the province of Ontario presented for the first time, in all these discussions extending over all this period of some eight or nine months, a new proposal or formula and I think I should put this proposal on the record.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a question of privilege. That is not correct. Ontario had put forward very comprehensive proposals which were on record in January of 1946. The minister has referred to the January meeting as a plenary meeting. That is not so. It was a meeting of the coordinating committee which at that time brought together the proposals which had been made by all the provinces. These extensive proposals, which became the subject matter of considerable discussion then and to which he is now referring, are a further development of one aspect of those proposals.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right in what he has said, but I thought I had clearly indicated that as a result of the proposals which had been put forward by the provinces including, as he correctly states, Ontario, the dominion government had made further concessions. He will not say, I am sure, because it is not a fact, that this new proposal or formula that he presented for the first time in the home stretch of these negotiations in April had been previously put forward at any time.

I welcome his interruption, because it makes clear that the province of Ontario had plenty of opportunity to consider the matter. I think in fairness to the other governments, both provincial and federal, it might be that this formula might more properly have been put forward in January, along with the other material which the Leader of the Opposition states they filed in January, 1946. But they did not put it forward then; they put it forward on April 29 in the closing days of the conference. This was the proposal:

> In presenting this formula the Ontario government submits that until the balancing factors are determined by way of principle the basic figure cannot be settled with any arithmetical accuracy.
> There would be a determined minimum per capita payment which, for convenience, can now be described as "X". The total annual rental to be paid by the dominion government to each province will be "X" dollars multiplied by the gross national production per capita for the year before the payment, divided by the gross national production per capita for the year 1941, multiplied by the population of the province for the year preceding the rental payment, or the minimum actual payment of "X" dollars multiplied by the population of the year preceding payment or of 1941 whichever is the greater. This may be set out in the following algebraic form with the preceding year being referred to as 194*y*:

$$\frac{\text{G.N.P. per capita } 194y}{\text{"X" } \times \text{ G.N.P. per capita 1941}} \times 194y \text{ population}$$ subject to a minimum payment.

"X" × 194*y* population or "X" × 1941 population } whichever shall be greater

One can understand that when a proposition with some degree of algebraic obscurity, such as this, was submitted to the conference in its closing days, it was necessary at that late stage to make a calculation of the additional amount actually involved in dollars over and above all previous claims of the province of Ontario, to be paid by the federal government to that province. When the assistants of the Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley, then minister of finance, made an estimate, they figured that at a very minimum this would represent an additional expenditure of $134 million, that it would likely rise to a much larger figure and that, as I said before, it would amount to $50 million more than all the pre-war provincial revenues from all sources, including all dominion subsidies.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Ilsley had no difficulty in working out the formula?

Mr. Garson: No. My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition at that time challenged the accuracy of the figures I have quoted and said they were nonsense. But if I remember rightly—he can correct me if I am wrong in my recollection—I do not believe he at any time ever submitted any actual figures of his own.

Mr. Drew: The minister has asked me to correct him. The minister is well aware that in the discussion that took place at that time the dominion government did not have the facts, as it did not have them last week. We are still trying to get the facts, and that was the reason for the algebraic formula.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend has made his interjection. I shall deal with it in about three minutes when I come to that point of my argument. I shall deal with it not in terms of one who may have a Liberal bias, as my hon. friend has a Conservative bias, but in terms of competent persons who had no bias in this matter whatsoever. At that time the hon. Leader of the Opposition, as the then premier of Ontario, made this statement concerning this new formula of his. He said:

> The government of Ontario has gone the very limit in making agreement possible, and when I say that it has gone the very limit I mean that it is prepared to make adjustments in detail, but not adjustments in principle or adjustments in regard to the net overriding amount which it receives.

I said in this house in February 1949, on other occasions, and I repeat now, that in my opinion the conference broke up after nine months of negotiation because at that stage Quebec would set no rental whatsoever and because Ontario was demanding rentals which were $50 million more than the entire amount of all pre-war provincial revenues from all sources.

Mr. Drew: Might I ask the minister, for my information, from what he is reading?

Mr. Garson: I am reading from my own speech of February, 1949, which my hon. friend was attempting to quote and which he quoted inaccurately.

Mr. Drew: I made no reference to that. Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I made no reference to the contents of any speech at all, and the minister knows it full well.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend was imputing arguments to me today which I have not made. I am citing this last argument which I made then and which I have made at intervening times, and which I make today and still stand by.

Now, I know that no great purpose is served by post mortems of this sort in regard to a conference which is now some 10 years old. What we should be concerned with, and what we in this government are certainly concerned with, is what we are going to do about reaching a new agreement with the provinces now to meet the needs of 1955. But I think, when a leader of the opposition gets up and in fairly clear language challenges my good faith and my veracity in making this interpretation, that perhaps it might serve the truth if I were to cite, not the views of any Canadian politician nor those of a Canadian, nor those of an amateur or person inexperienced in this field of dominion-provincial relations, but rather the views of two men of wide reputation. One of these men was sent here by his government in Australia, where they have the same kind of problem as we have—the problem of the relations between the federal government and the state governments—to study these proposals which were made by the federal government to the provinces of this country at this 1945 conference, in order to see if he could find in them any material which would be of service in Australia in arriving at wise decisions there in relation to the same kind of problems which they have. This man had no conceivable prejudice whatsoever concerning these Canadian matters. What did he say of them in writing? He said this:

> The premiers' conference resumed on April 29, 1946, but owing to the uncompromising attitude of the premier of Ontario, Hon. G. A. Drew, and the impossible attitude of the premier of Quebec, Hon. M. L. Duplessis, who did no more than reiterate time and again that the British North America Act, 1867, was sacrosanct, the conference broke up.

Mr. Drew: He must have obtained his information from the minister.

Mr. Fleming: That statement read by the minister is completely untrue on the face of it. It did not break up. It adjourned sine die.

Mr. Rowe: That shows that he did not know any more about it than the minister.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friends do not like these statements.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister not find a supporting Canadian statement?

Mr. Garson: But my hon. friends cannot challenge them. They endeavour to laugh them off, but these are statements made by the best experts in these fields, who have no prejudice or bias.

Mr. Fleming: Can the minister not find any supporting Canadian statement?

Mr. Drew: May I ask this question—

Mr. Pickersgill: Are you in favour of Canadian babies?

Mr. Fleming: I think the minister has just made another babyish remark.

Mr. Drew: For my own information, may I ask the minister, first, what is the date of his own speech from which he is reading, and second, whether the person whom he is quoting got all this reliable information from the minister's department?

Mr. Sinclair: That is a weak defence.

Mr. Garson: I thought my hon. friend's memory was better than he has just demonstrated. My own department at that time was in the government of the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Drew: That is what I mean.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what I mean; because the minister was making some extremely inaccurate speeches then.

Mr. Garson: Oh, no. This is an expression of opinion by an expert sent here by the Australian government.

Mr. Drew: This is the man from Australia, is it?

Mr. Rowe: The man from Missouri.

Mr. Garson: My hon. friend refers to having spoken to him. He spoke to me.

Mr. Drew: Who is the man from Australia?

Mr. Garson: The man from Australia is Mr. K. J. Binns. He said, but not in writing, that the generosity of the federal government's offer was only exceeded by the stupidity of those who turned it down.

There is another authority in this field, the mere mention of whose name will at once identify him as a competent expert. I refer to Professor J. A. Maxwell of Clark University in the United States, who is an outstanding authority on dominion-provincial relations. At page 15 of his paper entitled "Recent Developments in Dominion-Provincial Fiscal Relations in Canada", he says this:

> On April 29, 1946, the conference reassembled at Ottawa to consider revised proposals. After reviewing the two major concessions which the dominion government had made up to that time, it was then apparent that the key to agreement was in the hands of Ontario and Quebec. Except for minor qualifications, the seven other provinces would accept the revised proposals. The attitude of Quebec was enigmatic although the generalizations of Premier Duplessis were such as to connote the impossibility of agreement . . . Premier Drew was more specific in his demands for Ontario . . . A rough reckoning indicated that acceptance of the Ontario proposals would add at least $134 million a year, possibly $234 million, beyond what the federal government had set as its maximum concession.

And listen to this:

> On this rock the conference foundered on May 3. So large a difference, after negotiations extending over nine months, seemed impossible to bridge.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my answer to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Drew: It is a poor one.

Mr. Fleming: Those two men were certainly taken in when they came here.

Mr. Rowe: Are there any more cabinet ministers to speak today?

Mr. Sinclair: Independent authority; that is what you want.

Mr. Fleming: What about some Canadian opinion?

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, our nation is in the midst of an extremely severe economic recession. Interesting as it may be to the members of this house, I suggest that this threshing of old straw this afternoon is making little contribution toward solving the main important problems that face our Canadian nation. I am sure the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, and the Leader of the Opposition were all in fine debating form this afternoon. I am sure we all greatly enjoyed the exchanges which took place.

I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare made an interesting and informative contribution. I was pleased to have placed on record the amounts of the various grants for health purposes that this government is now making. But if the government takes this much pleasure in making the grants that are now being made—they are something in the neighbourhood of $30 million or $31 million—how much happier would the government be, as well as the members of the C.C.F., if the government implemented its full health proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference in 1945, and provided health insurance now?

I remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference in 1945 were of the order of $150 million annually from the federal treasury. The relatively small amounts now paid in health grants generally show how far short the federal government has fallen of fulfilment of the commitment it made in 1945 with regard to the field of health insurance. The Minister of National Health and Welfare and the government, I suggest, would be making a much more important contribution to this debate if the federal government were prepared to implement national health insurance immediately. A review of things that have happened in the past is all very interesting, but the people of Canada would like health insurance, and they would like it now.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare pointed out that at the dominion-provincial conference the federal government proposed that an old age pension of $30 a month be paid to all persons over the age of 70 without a means test, and to persons between the ages of 65 and 69 on the basis of a means test. He went on to say that this proposal had been implemented and that the amount now, instead of being $30, was $40. On the basis of the purchasing power of the $30 when the proposal was made in 1945, I suggest that the government should double that amount immediately by bringing the old age pension up to $60 a month. While the $40 a month figure is nominally more than the $30 a month proposed in 1945, it is still far less in actual purchasing power.

Interesting as were the speeches delivered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice, I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself should enter this debate and tell parliament and the people of Canada how the government intends to deal with the problem of unemployment. What does the government intend to do about the 600,000 Canadians who are unemployed? We had a debate on unemployment that went on day after day. The Prime Minister sat it out, and he is sitting out this debate too. He sat out the dominion-provincial conference, so far as making concrete proposals to put the unemployed to work was concerned. Instead of a full employment policy the government proposes relief. I suggest relief is not what the unemployed want. It is surely a reflection on Canada that a nation with all the opportunities we have is faced at this time with a situation where 600,000 are unemployed.

I say that in the field of full employment no other government anywhere in the free world today has such a dismal record of failure as has the present government of this nation. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that the recent conference with the provinces took place in a spirit of co-operation and constructive effort, but I am afraid that to the people of Canada the conference, in the words of the Saskatchewan provincial treasurer, was a grand flop. It was a failure. It was barren. Nothing came from the conference to deal with the tremendous problem of the unemployed. I suggest that one of the main things that should be done is for the government to undertake immediately, in addition to a public works program, a program of farm support prices, and legislation that will stop the continuing drop in farm income. I believe the agricultural industry is of great importance to our nation, and that a prosperous agriculture would go far toward solving the present unemployment situation.

This is the budget debate. Many comments have been made on the budget. It was pointed out very effectively yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just how little was in the budget by way of tax reduction for the average Canadian, the ordinary farmer or workingman. He placed a table on the record indicating what a large sum of money was provided by way of tax reduction for the higher income groups. The hon. member pointed out that for a man earning $3,000 there is a tax reduction of $14 in a full year, but for the man with a taxable income of $50,000 there is a tax reduction of $954 in a full year. A married workingman with an income of $2,000 paid an initial income tax rate of 15 per cent in 1954, apart from the old age security tax of 2 per cent. Even with the reductions in the budget, even apart from the social security tax, the starting point will be 13 per cent for a married man who earns $2,000 a year or over.

I believe I can prove that an extremely wealthy person who receives a tremendous income annually from investments in Canadian corporations pays income tax at a lower rate than is paid by the ordinary married man on income earned over $2,000. Let us assume this person is a millionaire, that he has $1 million invested in the shares of Canadian companies. Let us assume the dividend rate is 5 per cent. Therefore his annual income from his $1 million by way of dividends is $50,000. Let us assume that the capital appreciation of his investment is also 5 per cent and that his income, if he wishes to turn his capital appreciation into income, is increased by another $50,000.

I suggest that over the years since the end of the war capital appreciation on most investments in corporations has been the order of the day. The income of $50,000 from capital appreciation is tax free; there is no tax whatever. The amount of tax on the $50,000 dividend income is $20,720. To this must be added a surtax of 4 per cent on investment income over $2,400, which brings the total tax to $22,624. But this man has a tax credit of 20 per cent of his total dividend income, or $10,000. Consequently he pays a tax of only $12,624 or, in other words, a rate of tax under 13 per cent.

Let us also assume further that this man's investments are in Canadian mining companies. He then is given a further tax credit. If the companies in which he has his investments receive 75 per cent or more of their profits from mining he has an additional tax credit through the exemption of 20 per cent of his income. I will not go through the arithmetic, but in that case the total tax the millionaire will pay on an income of $50,000 by way of capital appreciation and $50,000 by way of dividends from investments in mining companies will amount to the small sum of $8,974, or a rate of about 9 per cent. But the man who works, sweats and does the producing in the mines far below the surface of the earth pays on his first portion of taxable income, apart from the social security tax, a rate of 13 per cent after all deductions. That proves conclusively that this is a millionaire's budget.

One hears it suggested in this house that our corporations are faced with a heavy burden of federal taxes, and that this tax burden is a crushing load. I should like to refer to a statement made by Mr. H. DeWitt Smith, national president of the American institute of metallurgical engineers, as reported in the Globe and Mail of April 19, 1955. The statement reads in part as follows:

> . . . Canada "offers inducements in its taxation policy on profits of mining companies and on dividends paid resident shareholders more liberal than any other great mineral producers in the world. Its new corporation income tax rate of 47 per cent on net taxable profits is reduced 33⅓ per cent in the case of metal mines and industrial metal deposits" . . .

He goes on to point out that new mines pay no tax at all in the first three and a half years of operation. He points out that allowances to Canadian residents on dividends and royalties paid by mineral properties may run as high as 20 per cent. He points out further that there is no capital gains tax in Canada. He concludes by saying:

> It is hard to conceive how the Canadian government could be more helpful to the mining industry . . .

In other words, if you are a millionaire receiving large sums of money from investments, you pay a very small tax. But if you are a farmer, industrial worker, an ordinary Canadian, you pay a very high rate of tax on the income you have had to earn by manual labour. The C.C.F. believe that the government should get more of its revenue through a larger tax on corporations, a larger tax on unearned income, and should accordingly reduce its taxes on the ordinary people of this country.

All businesses are not faring so well as the mining industry under this budget. I refer to automobile dealers. I believe they are fully justified in asking that they be not penalized by the tax reduction on any new automobiles they may have had on hand when the budget was introduced. An answer given to me the other day, on the basis of a question placed on the order paper, suggests that dealers should not have to pay the tax in that the tax is collectable when the automobile is sold to the purchaser. I hope the government will clear this matter up, and will lift this great and unfair burden from our automobile dealers.

I have said that one of the main things the government should do as part of a program to get Canada out of the current deep recession is to adopt a far-reaching agricultural program. I believe the main and first clause in such a farmers' bill of rights must be full parity prices for the products of family farms of this nation. The C.C.F. believe that the farmers of Canada are entitled to parity prices. This is not a new program that we have adopted. We have passed resolutions at every national convention our party has held, advocating and supporting the concept of parity prices.

I want to point out to the members of this house that today the organized farmers of Canada are giving more and more support to parity prices. But I think I can prove that the C.C.F. is the only group in this house, and the only political party in Canada, that supports full parity prices for agriculture. The record of the Liberal government on parity prices is quite clear. The government has very few support prices of any kind, and they are ridiculously low. They have resulted in near bankruptcy for many farmers. The floor price of 38 cents a dozen on eggs, for example, is inoperative and too low. The floor price for hogs does not give the farmer an adequate support price. Even the price for grains—and this is not the fault of the wheat board—is too low and should be supported at higher levels.

From time to time the C.C.F. has supported parity in this house by motions asking that parity prices be implemented. The Conservative party does not believe in parity prices. Last year the C.C.F. moved a motion asking for parity prices for hogs and cattle. It was moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) and is recorded on page 4797 of Hansard for May 17, 1954. When the vote was taken the members of the Conservative party voted against the motion. In his opening speech this session the leader of the Social Credit party had some remarks to make about parity prices. He said that his party was in favour of flexible parity prices, in other words prices that were only a percentage of parity and which did not give the farmer the full equitable treatment he deserves.

In case the hon. member may think I am misrepresenting what he said, I shall quote his exact words as reported on page 47 of Hansard for January 10, 1955:

> There is a very good case that can be made in favour of the adoption of such a flexible system here in Canada, the percentage of parity that is used of course to depend upon the amount of incentive which ought to be provided to achieve the amount of production that is required to meet the need.

The C.C.F. party does not agree with that stand. We think agriculture is entitled to full parity prices.

Mr. Quelch: Parity with what?

Mr. Argue: I shall explain that. I would suggest the basis of parity, 1925-1929, as advanced by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, as the most suitable base. In the past when C.C.F. members have advanced the concept of parity prices, such large western newspapers as the Winnipeg Free Press and the Regina Leader-Post have come out with cartoons and editorials criticizing this concept of parity prices. These newspapers, which go into the main agricultural areas surrounding the two cities in which they are published, do not believe in, and in fact oppose adequate support prices. They believe in low stop-loss support prices, if indeed they believe in support prices at all. I believe those newspapers would be doing a service to the provinces in which they are located if they changed their policy and began supporting the agricultural industry on which their circulation depends.

I hope they will not continue to suggest that parity prices themselves cause huge surpluses of food. We read in the press that parity prices in the United States or some other country are causing huge surpluses of food. I suggest that the huge surpluses of food that may exist are not brought about by high support prices but because steps have not been taken to see that these food surpluses are made available to people who could consume them. In other words the difficulty should be corrected by improvement in the demand rather than by lowering prices in the belief that farm production may be reduced.

The history of agriculture shows that any time the prices of agricultural products generally are reduced, production goes up. If the government reduced what is a good support price, in my opinion, on butter, the production of butter in all probability would go up. Farmers endeavouring to protect their income would milk more cows and ship more cream. By increasing production they would hope to maintain the same monthly or yearly income.

It will be no service to any nation for its government to reduce prices of agricultural products in the hope of reducing production, if by so doing it cripples agriculture and causes widespread difficulty in the economy generally. The C.C.F. therefore at this time is stating its support for parity prices for products produced on the Canadian family farm. I repeat, that is the first clause that should be placed in a bill of rights for Canadian agriculture.

The second clause, I suggest, should be one that calls for national marketing boards to provide, at the producers' request, stability in the assembly, processing and marketing of the main agricultural products.

Clause 3 would establish a board of livestock commissioners to provide scientific grading standards to protect the farmers' interests in the market.

Clause 4 would be support of international commodity agreements and the continuation of the international wheat agreement. We in the C.C.F. have always supported international commodity agreements. We hope they can be extended in the future.

Clause 5 would be support for an international food pool. Instead of each nation attempting to get rid of its surplus on a unilateral basis, we believe it is preferable for nations with exportable surpluses to co-operate in establishing an international food pool, and from that food pool distribute the surplus food to needy nations. The Canadian government record on this issue at the United Nations is very dismal. The government has failed to support—as a matter of fact, has criticized and opposed—attempts to establish such an international food pool.

Clause 6. As a method to get rid of at least part of any surplus agricultural products which might arise, such as a surplus of butter, I suggest that Canadian food consumption should be increased by a free school lunch program and free food for institutions. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, in a very excellent brief presented to the cabinet this year, strongly supported the idea of a free school lunch program in Canada, and pointed out that Canadian children do not drink sufficient milk. Nutrition standards for Canadian children would be improved by a free school lunch program.

Clause 7 would be the provision of surplus food to underdeveloped countries without charge or in exchange for local currency, for famine prevention and for a free school lunch program. I suggest that in such a program democracy has a powerful weapon to meet the threat of communism in many backward nations. I believe that as a democratic nation we should adopt a generous program of making food available to underdeveloped countries in order to prevent widespread famine, and also as part of a school lunch program that will of itself assist in improving educational standards.

Clause 8. Increased payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and extension of the act, which provides a measure of income protection in time of crop failure, to all provinces of Canada, and the provision of a crop insurance scheme in areas where such a scheme could be suitably provided. I suggest that such an area might be a fruit-growing area, a tobacco-growing area, or some other area where concentration is largely on a single commodity or a single group of commodities.

Clause 9. Extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to all parts of Canada, making it a comprehensive program of soil and water conservation. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) almost every year now for a number of years has moved a motion asking for a soil and water conservation program for all Canada. I suggest that by a wide extension of the area of application of the benefits of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, this very laudable objective might be achieved.

Clause 10 in the suggested farmers' bill of rights would be accelerated agricultural research. The benefits that could be derived from that are obvious. As one example only, I mention the benefits that will be derived this year from the use of the new rust-resistant variety of Selkirk wheat.

Clause 11. Assistance to the co-operative movement. This government at best takes a neutral attitude toward co-operatives, or in fact hinders the growth of co-operatives through taxation. We in the C.C.F. believe the government should take an active part in the promotion and the extension of co-operatives.

Clause 12. Low-cost credit should be provided for farm and home improvements. I suggest the interest rate charged under the present Farm Improvement Loans Act is too high and should be reduced.

Clause 13. Restoration of the farmer's right to deliver grain to the elevator of his choice; in other words, a fair and equitable distribution of box cars based on the farmer's choice.

Clause 14. Voluntary revocable check-off of farm union dues. We of the C.C.F. think it is a reasonable request; we think the government should grant it as a method of supporting our important farm organizations. I might point out that the labour unions have such a check-off, and what the check-off has done to benefit the labour unions I am sure it would do to benefit the farm unions.

Clause 15. Restoration of freight assistance on feed grain. We do not like the government's gradual removal of freight assistance on feed grain. We should like to see it restored immediately.

Clause 16. Continuation of the Crowsnest pass rates on grain. The Crowsnest pass rates are of extreme importance to western agriculture. The C.C.F. stands unalterably opposed to any tampering with the Crowsnest pass rates.

Clause 17. The immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan dam. The attitude of the Prime Minister toward the South Saskatchewan dam is almost incomprehensible. It took months of negotiation by the premier of Saskatchewan to get so much as a meeting with the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister's answer continues to be no. I think this answer of "no" means discrimination by this government against the prairie farmers and western agriculture.

Clause 18 of the bill of rights would be the marketing of all grain through the Canadian wheat board. We should like to see the Canadian Wheat Board Act extended so that all grain, including flax and rye, shall be marketed through the Canadian wheat board.

Clause 19. Extension of the Canada Grain Act to all parts of Canada so that Canadian feeders may obtain full advantage of western grades on feed grain. I think it is a disgrace that eastern farmers have to put up with the grades that are placed by the handling companies on the feed grains they buy, and I believe an extension of the provisions of the Canada Grain Act would be of real service to agriculture outside the prairie area.

Clause 20. Comprehensive investigation of the tremendous spread between prices paid by the consumer and those paid to the producer. If food prices in Canada at any time are high, I suggest they are not high because the farmer gets too much; they are high because the costs of distribution and of packing are sometimes 10 or 20 times as great as the actual cost of the food contained in the package.

Clause 21. Full investigation into the high prices of farm machinery. I believe the federal government should have granted the request made by the Saskatchewan government that a royal commission inquire into the farm implement industry in an endeavour to bring down the price of farm machinery.

Clause 22. Action to reduce the outrageous prices charged for fertilizer. The fertilizer monopoly has cost agriculture tremendous sums of money, and I believe the government, through assisting co-operatives, could help farmers get into the fertilizer production field so the cost of fertilizer could be reduced.

Clause 23. We believe payment should be made on approved storage whenever there are large surpluses of products that must be held on the farms.

Clause 24. Federal financial assistance for education to our municipalities so that current high taxes on farm and urban real estate may be reduced or at least be prevented from going higher.

Finally, clause 25 of this farmers' bill of rights calls for federal financial assistance for a comprehensive road and highway program including farm to market roads.

In conclusion I suggest that the following are fundamental to any farm bill of rights: Farmers of Canada should be given immediate full parity prices for the production of family farms; there should be a national livestock marketing board and a board of livestock commissioners; there should be support for international commodity agreements and the continuation of the international wheat agreement; there should be support by the Canadian government of an international food pool and increased food consumption in Canada through a free school lunch program and free food for institutions; surplus food should be provided to underdeveloped countries, without charge or in exchange for local currencies, to be used for famine prevention and for free school lunch programs.

The C.C.F. believe that such a bill of rights for agriculture is necessary, not only for the welfare of agriculture itself but as part of a Canadian program to solve present widespread unemployment.

On motion of Mr. Hamilton (York West) the debate was adjourned.
