TRADE

OIL—NOTE TO UNITED STATES CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to table the text of a note which the Canadian ambassador in Washington delivered to the United States government on March 8 to protest against measures that have been proposed to restrict the imports of crude oil into the United States. I shall read the text of this note for the information of hon. members. It is as follows:

The Canadian government is greatly concerned about legislation being considered in the United States to restrict imports of crude oil. Legislation of this kind would have unfortunate and damaging effects to which the Canadian government wishes to draw attention. The Canadian government would be equally concerned if the objectives of this proposed legislation were to be carried out by administrative action or if the United States oil industry were to be led to believe that the policy of the administration is to discourage imports from Canada.

Resulting from the development of the oil industry in western Canada in recent years, there has been a development of refinery capacity and marketing plans in the United States to make use of the increasing availability of Canadian crude petroleum. Two refineries have already been constructed in the Pacific northwest to operate on deliveries from the Trans Mountain pipe line. A refinery is now being built in East St. Paul to make use of Saskatchewan medium gravity crudes. There is notable concentration of refinery capacity in the Detroit-Toledo area which can benefit from access to oil carried eastward by the Interprovincial Pipe Line. Reference is made to this refinery capacity already in existence because of the Canadian interest and, as we think, the interest of the United States, in making sure that nothing be done to impair the usefulness of these facilities. Both economic and strategic factors point to the desirability of increasing pipe-line and refinery capacity to enable Canadian crude to find markets in the United States. The Canadian government wishes to emphasize the importance of avoiding restrictive measures in the United States which might frustrate or prevent the continuation of these desirable developments.

Attention should be given also to the efforts in which the United States government has taken a leading part, along with the Canadian government, through the general agreement on tariffs and trade and otherwise, to promote the growth of world-wide multilateral trade on an economic basis and unhampered by restrictions. For the United States to embark upon a restrictive policy with regard to oil would be directly discouraging to these larger efforts.

From the point of view of strategic considerations, it should be borne in mind that western Canadian oil fields are internal to the North American continent. Nothing could be more discouraging to exploration for oil and development of this strategic industry in western Canada than the adoption by the United States of a restrictive import policy. It will be remembered that the United States navy on strategic grounds gave support to the construction of the Trans Mountain pipe line and for the construction of additional refining capacity in the state of Washington. If the United States government should conclude, in its best judgment, that its defence interests require that imports of crude oil from countries overseas should be limited to the proportion they bore in 1954 to domestic production, it might be difficult for anyone outside the United States to question such a conclusion. This thesis based on defence interests would certainly not be valid, however, if applied to imports from Canada. The Pacific northwest is at present served by pipe lines from Canada, the existing alternative being to transport crude to that area by tanker, whether from United States sources or from overseas. Tanker ships and ports are so much more vulnerable in wartime than overland transport that the Canadian government would be unable to understand any decision by the United States to restrict imports from Canada for reasons of defence.

On economic grounds the oil industry itself has established a pattern of development which clearly envisages an increasing use of Canadian crude oil in the north-central and western areas of the United States. The continental marketing pattern would seem to permit Canadian oil to enter these markets without impairing the interests of the United States petroleum industry, because it has been traditionally difficult and costly to move United States oil into those areas which can be supplied most efficiently from Canada. Canadian oil is equally unlikely to affect the interests of the United States coal industry in these areas.

The United States oil industry should regard Canada not merely as a competitor but also as a market as is made clear by the statistics of trade between Canada and the United States in oil and refinery products. In 1954, Canada imported in excess of $130 million worth of crude oil and refinery products from the United States and exported only about $7 million worth of crude oil and products to the United States. With the great growth of the Canadian oil industry, it is apparent that its products will be increasingly utilized in Canada if export markets are to be restricted. As far as the United States oil industry is concerned, therefore, it is very doubtful that any increased markets would be gained on a net basis by implementation of the proposed recommendations in relation to Canada. A great deal would certainly be lost in terms of continental efficiency if both countries were to develop their respective oil industries along purely national lines.

Having referred briefly to the strategic and economic interests of both Canada and the United States in this matter, the Canadian government wishes to draw attention to a related problem based upon the trade agreements of the United States government. If it should be decided to impose restrictions upon crude oil imported into the United States, it might be concluded, as in 1951, that quotas should be allocated to supplying countries. If the recent and projected growth of the Canadian oil industry is taken into account, it is obvious that any allocation of quotas on past trade would be completely inadequate for Canada. This latter consideration leads again to the conclusion, on the part of the Canadian government, that Canada at least should be exempted from any restrictive policy which might be adopted for reason of defence.

I should go on to say that the Canadian government has been following this situation very closely. The current proposals for restrictions on United States imports of crude oil were first launched by the cabinet committee on energy supplies and resources policy, whose report was made public in Washington on Saturday, February 26. The committee suggested that imports should be restricted voluntarily by the United States industry, for patriotic reasons. The legislation which is being considered in congress would give the proposed restrictions a statutory basis. Either method would be damaging to our Canadian interests.

I find it difficult, if not impossible, to believe that the United States will adopt a policy of limiting imports of Canadian crude oil for defence reasons, or any other reasons. In the Pacific northwest region of the United States, for example, the Americans are as aware as we are of the importance and urgency, for economic and defence reasons, of tying on to Canadian sources of supply. This is in their own interests.

After the outbreak of war in Korea, a concerted effort was made by the United States and Canadian governments to maintain a high level of exploration and development in the Canadian west. As recently as two years ago, the United States petroleum administration for defence was still urging the Canadian petroleum industry to strive for new goals in exploratory drilling. It was also recommending priority treatment in the allocation of steel and other scarce materials for the establishment of new transmission and oil refining facilities. The Canadian and United States governments cooperated in the pursuit of these objectives and succeeded in diverting to western Canada large quantities of the drill pipe and other equipment necessary to carry out this program.

Against this background, I was perturbed to hear that the president of the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company had testified before the Senate finance committee in Washington that his company would voluntarily reduce crude oil purchased for its Ferndale refinery from Canada.

I got in touch immediately with Mr. Brewster B. Jennings, president, Socony-Vacuum Oil Company Inc., and just before coming into the house I received the following telegram from him:

Understand my statement before Senate finance committee March 18 has been interpreted as indicating reduction importation Canadian crude oil for our refinery at Ferndale, Washington. Such an interpretation quite erroneous. We plan no change in Ferndale crude supply and shall accomplish all of reduction mentioned east of the Rockies from sources other than Canada. Copy of my statement before committee being mailed you today. Kindest personal regards.

This is signed by B. B. Jennings, president of the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members in the house will recognize this as a very important matter. Any proposal on the part of the United States to impose the type of restrictions contemplated on the importation of Canadian crude oil into the United States is bound to be deeply deplored in Canada, and protests of this kind—vigorous protests—are bound to earn the approval of all hon. members in the house.

Actions of this kind could not be more unhappily timed than at present. Just after agreements have been entered into to extend, perhaps in limited form, the general agreements on tariffs and trade, proposals of this kind from Washington are bound to shake very deeply the confidence this country and others may have in the future of their trading relations with the United States.

I think I might say that this is the type of matter to which hon. members in this house will hope the government will apply continued and vigorous protests. We hope the minister will be able to give some report to the house soon on replies from the Washington government indicating that these protests have been successful in warding off this proposed action on the part of the United States.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question arising out of the statement he has just made, having reference especially to the position which would confront the operations of the Trans Mountain pipe line if the policy under consideration in the United States were implemented. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that I am not quite able to follow the implications of the situation, in the light of the telegram received by the minister from the president of the Socony-Vacuum company. If the policy under consideration there were to be implemented, would there in fact be a substantial reduction of the present volume of oil being put through that line? If so, does the minister have any information available as to approximately what percentage and what the amount would be in dollar value?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The Daw-Jones ticker put out a message yesterday which was copied in the newspaper. The hon. member will find it in this morning's Gazette. It indicated a sharp reduction in the deliveries to the refinery in the state of Washington through the Trans Mountain pipe line. However, the telegram that I have just read from the president of Socony-Vacuum states that he was misquoted; that the voluntary reduction that he was proposing to the Senate committee would take place in countries on the eastern seaboard, and that the take from the Trans Mountain pipe line would not be affected.

Mr. Fulton: If this policy were to be implemented in the United States, would he then be forced to curtail the importations from the Trans Mountain line?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not know that they would pick out a particular pipe line. There is certain legislation before congress, and a certain program has been announced by the executive. Whether either of them would affect the situation of the Trans Mountain pipe line, I would not care to say. Not being a shareholder, I am not very much concerned.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a supplementary question in relation to the subject which has been raised and which is of such vital importance. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce give consideration to the possibility of pointing out to the government of the United States, in addition to the specific subjects already mentioned, the possible effect on confidence in the investment of funds from the United States in Canada if any policy were followed not only in relation to oil but in other products, whereby under voluntary arrangements restrictions were imposed that would be just as effective as if there were actually barriers between the two countries?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has put forward a good suggestion. I thought we had covered almost every reason why the threatened action should not be taken, but I shall be very glad to suggest to our ambassador that he keep this suggestion in mind as well.

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the serious representations which he has made to the United States government, may I ask him whether any representations were made to his department on this subject matter by United States oil companies, Canadian oil companies or the oil workers' union of Canada? If so, which of these three organizations made representations?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): To the best of my knowledge the department has been proceeding entirely on its own initiative. No representations have been made to me personally from any source. I would have to have a search of the department made to know whether representations were made to the department.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Do I understand the minister to say that representations were made on March 16? This is March 23 and I should like to know if he received any word since then as to how those representations were received.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have not the documents before me, as I gave them to the Hansard reporter. I think representations were made somewhat earlier than March 16 but no official reply has been received.

Mr. Fleming: With reference to the question just asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the minister in his statement did say that it was on March 16 that the Canadian ambassador had made these representations or had submitted his note to the United States authorities. In the copy of the aide-mémoire which I have now seen it is indicated that it was presented by the Canadian ambassador to the state department of the United States government on March 8, 1955. Is the minister in a position to say anything further about the response?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think that is correct; I think it was presented on March 8 and my memory perhaps was at fault in giving the later date. There has been no formal reply to the note. My hon. friend will appreciate that the matter is being discussed in a committee of the United States Senate and we would hardly expect to get an early reply under those circumstances.

FREIGHT RATES

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON EFFECTS OF AGREED CHARGES

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copies in English and in French of the report of the royal commission appointed to conduct an inquiry into the application and effects of agreed charges as authorized under part IV of the Transport Act. Copies of this report, which I do not doubt will be of great interest to all who are concerned in railway rates, have been made available for distribution.

I should like to take the opportunity to express the thanks of the government to Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon and to his advisory and secretarial staff. The long experience he had in the field of transportation as chairman of the royal commission on transportation eminently fitted Mr. Turgeon for this further task, and the government feels a particular sense of gratitude to him in that though fully occupied by his important duties as Canadian ambassador to Ireland he consented, at great personal inconvenience, to undertake the inquiry.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Minister of Transport whether it is expected there will be legislation arising out of this report at the present session.

Mr. Marler: I might say that matter is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Were the contents of this report made available to the press before the tabling in the house?

Mr. Marler: Copies were handed to the press this morning at eleven o'clock in order to facilitate their making the report public this afternoon.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES

Mr. Knowles:

1. How are the monthly unemployment figures of the dominion bureau of statistics obtained?
2. How many persons are engaged as canvassers in connection with any surveying or sampling done for the purpose of obtaining such figures?
3. What are the qualifications of the persons doing any such canvassing?
4. In what ways is such canvassing done?
5. How many persons are canvassed or surveyed each month in connection with the obtaining of such dominion bureau of statistics unemployment figures?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The estimates of labour force characteristics which are published by the dominion bureau of statistics are based on information collected from a sample of households in Canada. The samples of areas in each of the ten provinces are designed so that each area has a known chance of selection which is dependent on the size of its population. From this survey an estimate can be prepared, within a known degree of accuracy, of what a complete census of Canada would show.

The design of the labour force sample recognizes a basic division between the very large urban centres and those areas which are predominantly rural.

Within each of the large urban centres, areas, with differing potential for development, are sampled separately. The samples consist of a number of blocks where the chance of selection of any one block is dependent upon the number of dwellings within it.

In the predominantly rural areas of each province, municipalities or groups of contiguous municipalities form the sampling units. The objective in the formation of these units, which contain on an average 15,000 persons, is that in each unit the distribution of farm households, urban households, and the type of industry should be similar to the provincial distributions. The practical impossibility of obtaining such comparability necessitates the grouping of these units into different classes or strata such that all units within a stratum have basic similarities though they may differ from stratum to stratum. The selection of the sample in the rural areas is made in successive stages. From each stratum one unit is selected on the basis of its population size and within each selected unit a sample of census subdistricts is chosen. The next stage is the selection of a sample of groups or clusters of households within the chosen subdistricts while the final stage is the selection of a sample of households within the chosen clusters. At each stage, the relative size of the population provides a measure of the chance of selection.

At present the sample for the labour force survey comprises 76 rural units and 40 large urban centres. In these areas the labour force data for the members of over 30,000 households are collected by a staff of interviewers. These interviewers are trained and supervised by members of the full-time field staff of the dominion bureau of statistics.

The basic principle in estimating totals from the labour force survey is to determine from each provincial sample the proportion of persons, classified by age and sex, who have specific labour force characteristics. These proportions, when applied to independent estimates of the provincial populations, provide estimates of the aggregate numbers in each labour force category.

2. 586 enumerators in February, 1955.

3. The government employment services are asked to submit a list of persons of reasonable education and presentable appearance. They are then interviewed by the field representative, who explains the duties to them. According to their comprehension of the work and their ability to conduct such interviews in accordance with instructions, they are employed.

4. The enumerator interviews a responsible member of each household of the predetermined group of households using a form which specifies the questions to be answered.

5. Approximately 80,000 in February, 1955.

4. What is the ministerial definition as to when machinery and apparatus are considered as used directly in the process of manufacture for sales tax purposes?
5. What is the basis for this definition? Is it under review?

[Mr. Dickey.]

Mr. McCann:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1 above.

3. No. Section 57 of the Excise Tax Act already makes provision for appeals to the tariff board on certain questions.

4. It is thought that the words of the statute are clear, viz., that the machinery or apparatus must be used directly in the process of manufacture or production of goods.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member and my understanding is that he agrees to some changes; first, that the information requested be limited to the calendar year 1954.

In the third part of the question it is agreed that the name "British Columbia" be dropped and the word "area" be substituted therefor.

As the first part of the question relates to information that will have to come from the Department of National Revenue, I would request that this be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Is the question as amended agreed to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS, ONTARIO—USE OF NOVA SCOTIA COAL

Mr. Balcom:

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHAPUT CASE—QUESTION OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I am sorry I have not given him notice. Has the government received notice that the Chaput case will be heard at the next session of the supreme court? If so, does the federal government intend to intervene in this case as it did in the Alberta press act case to defend the basic and fundamental right of Canadian citizenship to enjoy freedom of worship, assembly, speech and person?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are aware that the Chaput case will be heard at the next sitting of the Supreme Court of Canada. But since my hon. friend has given me no notice of his question, and I am under the impression that in the Chaput case we have received a notice from the supreme court itself, I should like to make a statement tomorrow covering this point.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MAIL COURIERS—WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN TRAINS IN NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. B. McCulloch (Pictou): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General or his parliamentary assistant, arising out of the recent withdrawal of certain scheduled trains in Nova Scotia. Will the minister give consideration to the position of mail couriers where contract rates paid are related to the frequency of train service with a view to avoiding reductions in rates during the term of the contract because of the withdrawal of trains?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if I caught the hon. member's question correctly it has to do with the reduction in the schedules of trains carrying mails in certain parts of Nova Scotia. This matter is already being considered by the department, and every endeavour will be made to work out arrangements which will be fair to the rural mail couriers.

DELAY IN DELIVERY OF LETTER TO UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General or, in his absence, to the parliamentary assistant. Should it take 25 days for a letter from Ontario to reach the United Kingdom? I have had complaints from the United Kingdom in regard to this matter, and I wonder why there should be this delay.

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to produce the cover to see whether or not the letter was mailed on the day it was supposed to have been mailed.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): It was mailed on February 8 and delivered there on March 5.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to let me have the cover so that the department can look into the matter.

AIRPORTS

MALTON—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENT OF FIRE DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production if he has any information that he can give to the house today as to the cause and the effect of the fire which took place yesterday at Malton?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a detailed report on the results of the fire. I do not know what was the cause of the fire. We lost four aircraft, a considerable amount of test equipment and a hangar. However I am told that the loss will not delay the new program in hand, although it will delay some adjusting work on planes presently being produced.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production a supplementary question. Were any of the planes that were lost the property of the crown in the right of Canada or had they been secured with funds advanced by the government to A. V. Roe Canada Limited?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I may say that the planes belonged to the crown. Certain of the test equipment was also the property of the crown and other of the test equipment was the property of Avro. The Avro equipment was insured, but the crown property, following the normal practice, was not insured. I had a quick estimate made of whether the department would have been ahead had we made a practice of insuring crown property and I find that that would not have been the case, that we have saved a great deal of money through the policy of government carrying its own insurance on its own property.

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

Mr. Harkness: Did the government adopt any fire protection methods to safeguard that equipment when it was not insured?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We take all reasonable precautions. That fact may be the reason why this is the first serious fire we have had in the history of the department. I suggest that in the end lightning strikes almost everywhere.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Defence Production a supplementary question arising out of the question asked by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett). Can the minister inform the house if the fire damage at Malton will have any effect upon the employment situation at the A. V. Roe plant?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The A. V. Roe company is a privately-owned company which has its own employment program. So far as I am aware the fire should have no serious impact on employment at that plant.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY COMMISSION INTO RELATIONS WITH R. F. WELCH LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the answer he gave today to a question of mine on the order paper? Can he indicate why the request for an inquiry commission to inquire into the relations between the Canadian National Railways and the R. F. Welch company is not being considered?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The reason the request has not been favourably considered is that my department feels the complaints made in that request are not such as could properly be handled under the federal Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister suggested at any time to those who made the request any alternative way of dealing with the matter?

Mr. Gregg: Yes, but it would take me too long to go into it at this particular time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "SCOPE"—REFERENCE TO PRODUCT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he has received any protests over the C.B.C. television program "Scope" on Sunday last which associated the product Habitant pea soup with French Canadians in a most unfortunate manner?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, no protests have been made to me personally, but I shall inquire from the officers of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as to whether any have been made to them.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mrs. Fairclough, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of the debate last night I was dealing with the subject of unemployment. The fact that there is one more point which I wish to cover must be my excuse for continuing the debate a few minutes longer. Before I go on perhaps I might recapitulate the points I had made already.

First, I had said that it was a disgraceful situation that in a country such as this we should have an unemployment situation at all. Second, I had said that the government admitted there was a state of unemployment and assumed some responsibility for it but they had done nothing about it. Third, I said that times of periodic employment were inherent under our present economic system, but I contended that even though one recognizes this the government should do something to provide a solution and should offer a long-term plan of public investment to counteract it.

I warned the government too that the unpopularity of the Conservative party in my own province of Saskatchewan during the last number of years has been due, at least in part, to the bungling of the last Conservative federal regime in regard to unemployment. It seems to me that people of my province have never forgotten or forgiven that, rightly or wrongly. I did wish to make the point that I am warning this government that in the event of similar bungling they might encounter the same political fate.

If this government is dilatory in dealing with the unemployment situation, I point out there are other governments which are not dilatory in that regard. I am thinking of the British people, for whom I have the greatest admiration. They are people who do not appear to be influenced by whether in doing the thing they do they are making concessions to certain "isms" of one sort and another, but who tackle a problem when it arises and do the thing which they ought to do.

Purely by accident I have picked up this little paper called the Ulster Commentary, which is put out by the government of the part of Ireland in which I was born. I would suggest that my Conservative friends to the right might read it with some profit, because while it is a Conservative government it is a government to which the title "Progressive Conservative" might be suitably applied.

Owing to the shortness of my time I shall not quote from it, but I shall tell you one or two of the things that are being done. The government is in the process of building 47 factories. Our problems here are somewhat different, but over there they depend upon their manufactures for export. Further, legislation will be introduced to extend the powers for dealing with slum property and the improvement of housing to provide additional facilities for prospective home owners.

Another thing that government is doing that comes close to my own heart is that it has built 76 new schools, among other things. They have even gone so far in relation to the textile industry about which all of us are concerned and have actually launched an educational program among 12,000 young textile workers. The Ulster Commentary states:

> A good proportion of young men who have had a sound practical education must be attracted to the trade if it is to maintain the essential high degree of skill and efficiency.

That is a statement issued by the committee appointed by the ministers of education and commerce.

I wish this government would take its policies from the needs and necessities of the day and the needs and necessities of the unemployed. One might suspect that sometimes this government takes its policies not from the needs of the day but from the advertisements of United States and Canadian private industry which extol the benefits of free enterprise and deplore taking any measures which might be said to smack of socialism. Indeed, I have been wondering if this government, like some of its friends, does not actually welcome a certain amount of unemployment in this country. I read an interesting statement in a financial paper the other day and although I do not have the paper here it said, and I certainly recall reading it, that a certain amount of unemployment is a good thing in our economy. Well, sir, I do not know what your opinion is, but I cannot conceive of any man in his right mind making a statement of that sort.

In the few minutes left at my disposal I wish to make another point and that is the apparent assertion on the part of this government that the provinces are not too anxious concerning whether or not the subject of unemployment is included in the agenda of any future dominion-provincial conference.

We in this group have pressed upon the government the need for such an inclusion in the agenda. We have been met with that characteristic shrugging of shoulders and the shaking of the head. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has gone so far as to say he has no doubt that someone will raise the point and it will be discussed. But the assumption, as I have gathered it from government statements, is that no province in particular has been very interested in the matter. Rather, we have been told that the provinces and municipalities have a good deal of responsibility in this unemployment. I am certain the provinces and municipalities will do what they can but this is quite a contradiction of the original statement made by the government which led us to believe from away back between 1940 and 1945 the government definitely assumed responsibility in regard to the employment of employable unemployed.

I know that my time is short and I must hurry along. As to the suggestion that it is only a matter of probability that any province would want to have the matter of unemployment discussed, I would like to read from clippings from my home paper, the Star-Phœnix, which I have gathered in the last few days. While I cannot quote at any length I shall read the headlines of articles on this subject.

The first headline reads:

Premier Douglas again—

—and I emphasize "again"—

Premier Douglas again asks St. Laurent to call federal-provincial conference on farm costs, unemployment problems.

The next headline appeared in the March 10, 1955, issue of the paper and it reads:

Douglas urges St. Laurent call meet on unemployment.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have time to quote from this next article:

The Saskatchewan provincial federation of labour, T.L.C., and the Saskatchewan federation of labour, C.C.L., have forwarded to me—

—that is, to Premier Douglas—

—a joint brief urging the calling of a federal-provincial conference to deal with the problems arising out of increasing unemployment.

This request is in keeping with a suggestion which I have made several times that a federal-provincial conference be convened for the purpose of implementing and co-ordinating a public investment program throughout Canada and particularly in those areas adversely affected by unemployment.

[Mr. Knight.]

Now, as to the province's own suggestion that the federal government meet in order that the province might take action, he continues:

This year the government of Saskatchewan will undertake the largest capital expenditure in its history with a view to stimulating construction and providing as much employment as possible. A number of our municipalities are also undertaking heavy capital commitments designed to provide increased employment opportunities.

However, there is a limit to the amount of money which provincial and municipal governments can borrow for the purpose of financing public projects.

Then, to clinch the matter, I have this further article the headline of which reads:

Province has been asking for talks on unemployment since 1949, Douglas avers.

And in a statement which Premier Douglas issued to the press he says:

As far back as July 15, 1949, I wrote Prime Minister St. Laurent requesting a federal-provincial conference to discuss responsibility for able-bodied unemployed. On September 22, 1949, I repeated this request and in August, 1950, I submitted to the Prime Minister a proposed agenda for the federal-provincial conference covering such questions as unemployment and national health insurance.

That is the only point which I shall have time to make. I simply wish to say that any suggestion that the premiers of the provinces are not anxious to have the subject of unemployment raised or included in the agenda of any future dominion-provincial conference is totally and completely false.

In taking my seat I wish to urge once again that this government take some immediate action and at the same time work out some long-term arrangement which, despite the difficulties with which our economic structure is afflicted, might at least stave off unemployment for a period of years and provide the comfort of assurance of work for the working people of this country.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I propose to make my intervention in this debate as brief as possible. Of course, I hope hon. members will not become too optimistic, because brevity to one person might not be brevity to another. However, what I have to say will be in the way of emphasis rather than information because it appears to me that the situation has been covered thoroughly. Figures have been quoted, and even although there is a wide difference in those figures, it has been brought to our attention clearly that there is a serious problem existing with regard to our employment situation. Not only that, but we have been reminded that the number of our employed does not make too much difference; the difficulty lies in the fact that there are some who are unable to find employment and to provide for the needs of their families.

Recriminations have been hurled against past and present governments for failure to take measures that would promote full employment. Various fields have been crossed and crisscrossed in an attempt to discover the factors contributing to the situation existing today. Discussions have tried to establish the nature of our problem, as to whether it is regional, frictional or what-not. It would therefore appear that practically every angle of the problem has been discussed during the debate.

I do not think that the government can say that no solutions have been suggested by the members of the opposition. I think it was implied, at least on one occasion yesterday, that the opposition members have not as yet submitted any proposals designed to meet the situation. Many proposals have been advanced. Some have been perhaps conventional and orthodox while others may appear to be somewhat unorthodox. On March 2, suggestions were made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) with respect to this matter and they were further emphasized by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). On March 15 and 16 the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) outlined monetary reforms or, should I say, methods of financing which in the past have been used to good advantage in times of emergency, and he suggested that those measures that were used to finance war could be used to finance peace.

As all hon. members know, I am a comparative newcomer in the house, and I should like to hear some responsible member of the government give his views with respect to the procedures outlined by the hon. member for Lethbridge, or, in other words, the suggestions that have been made by this group time and time again in the past with regard to financing. I know there have been those across the way who have hurled taunts at this side. There are those who have been critical. But since I have come into the house we have not heard any responsible member of the government give his views with respect to those suggestions and proposals that have been made. We are facing a crisis. I think even the government acknowledges the fact that we are facing a crisis. We must therefore consider every proposal which promises a solution to the problem.

A number of members have referred to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction that was held several years ago. I understand that at that time the dominion government proposed to accept full responsibility for assistance to able-bodied unemployed persons. The suggestion or the charge has been made that, up to the present time, the government has not seen fit to implement that proposal. On the contrary, I think the government have rejected and have refused to fulfil that proposal which they made back at that conference.

The premier of British Columbia made an appeal for assistance for the unemployed employables but we all remember how that request was rejected and how the implication, if not the plain statement, was made that the federal government did not accept responsibility and that the provincial government had not proved that it was unable to solve the problem and to meet the financial responsibilities involved.

On February 25, as reported at page 1501 of Hansard, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) directed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) with respect to the matter. He asked if the premier of British Columbia had made a request that a dominion-provincial conference be called to deal with unemployment. The reply of the Prime Minister on that occasion was that the premier of British Columbia wrote on July 14 with respect to this problem and stated:

> The wisdom of holding a federal-provincial conference may commend itself to you.

The Prime Minister went on to say that he could not construe that letter as being a request. I would suggest that the question was there and the request was involved; it was included. But yet on that occasion, as we know, the request was not acceded to.

As to the unemployed employables, the British Columbia government responded to the challenge presented by the failure of the federal government to assume their responsibilities in this respect and agreed to an 80-20 split with regard to the expenses involved. This was done in spite of the fact that the British Columbia government in the past and up to the present has been receiving rather shabby treatment from the federal government in some respects. We all recognize, of course, the fact that the federal government have the major source of revenue in the various provinces, and we expect them at least to assume the responsibilities that are rightfully theirs.

In this connection I could refer to various matters, but I am not going to do so at any length. However, I feel that these matters are closely allied to the problem of unemployment. May I refer to some of the treatment that has been handed out to the province of British Columbia by the federal government. For instance, may I refer to the percentage of defence contracts awarded to British Columbia firms by the federal government. Of a total exceeding $300 million of defence contracts in the 12-month period ended November 30, 1954, approximately $15,500,000 was awarded to British Columbia. British Columbia contributes more than 9 per cent of the total income taxes paid to Ottawa, yet we are receiving less than 5 per cent of the defence contracts.

Not only is there the matter of defence contracts. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) some time ago asked a question with regard to the prefabricated houses that were being used at Comox in the project that was being erected there. He referred to the fact—or at least it was brought out in the reply—that these houses were being supplied by an outside firm and were being shipped from New Liskeard, I believe the place was. That means they were being shipped right from New Liskeard, Ontario, through to British Columbia and across to Vancouver island for use in the defence project there. I should like to ask why these prefab houses could not be supplied by firms in British Columbia? I want to refer to a statement by the manager of the British Columbia division of Canadian Manufacturers Association:

> We are very appreciative of the care with which the provincial government insists upon local products and local technical assistance in connection with governmental projects.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that just as the provincial government is careful to recognize and acknowledge the claims of local firms in this regard, so I believe the Department of National Defence should give some consideration to this matter and insist that these products be supplied by industries in the provinces concerned, if at all possible.

Now, there are other matters to which I could refer, such as works projects which have been turned down by the federal government. I could refer to the fact that time and time again I have requested assistance in regard to the erosion problems on various parts of the Fraser river, erosion problems which are caused by navigation and not just by the natural process of erosion, as engineers would claim. My request has been turned down very definitely and very clearly. All these things tie into the picture. I would suggest that some of these things, which would at least give some assistance in solving the unemployment problem as well as make British Columbia feel happier about the whole proposition, should be carefully considered.

[Mr. Patterson.]

We have heard a great deal of talk about public works, tax reductions and the necessity for increased trade. I do not believe that those things alone will provide a solution to the unemployment problem. I was interested in hearing the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) last evening refer to the fact that tax relief should be granted even if it meant a $400 million deficit in the budget. In considering his statement, I wondered just how much that would increase our national debt, because we are reminded of the fact that even now the interest on our national debt is approximately $500 million. I do not know just how much more the people of Canada would be willing to accept in that particular respect.

I believe, as I have said, that these other things are good in their place but they will not solve the problem that confronts us at the moment. I feel that Mr. Reuther came very close to the crux of the matter when he was speaking last year, I am not sure of the date, in Vancouver. The title of this article is, "Reuther issues wide challenge". This article is by Herc Munro, the Vancouver Province labour reporter. I should like to quote just briefly from what Mr. Reuther said:

> People all over the world are looking to the people of the United States and Canada for leadership, and they will judge us as we ought to judge ourselves.
> "They will not judge us by the facts that we can turn out millions of tons of steel or millions of automobiles or that we build the highest buildings."

Then he went on to state that they were going to judge us by our ability to translate material wealth into human values, into human progress, into human happiness and into human dignity.

Again, I should like to quote from the article:

> We have always been able to mobilize our productive economy and create full employment making the weapons of war and destruction, and the most basic unsolved problem that we need to find an answer to, is the question:
> Can we find a way to achieve and maintain full employment in peacetime making the good things of life for the people.

Now, one of the problems that he presented was as follows:

> One of the problems is that too many people believe in what they call the trickle down theory of economics, the theory that if you have a banquet table and you load that banquet table with more and more of the good things of life for a few wealthy people on top, they will brush enough crumbs off the table for the people down below.
> That theory is wrong. You can only build prosperity, not from the top down but from the bottom up, by giving the great mass of people enough purchasing power to buy the things we know how to produce in our factories, in our mines, and in our mills, and grow on our farms.

Finally he said:

What we need to do is to find a way to broaden the purchasing power base of our economic systems so that that purchasing power in the hands of people will balance our productive power in terms of these new tools that we are finding and science and technology is giving us every day in the year.

I believe Mr. Reuther was right when he referred to the necessity of placing purchasing power in the hands of the people, because if they have purchasing power they will purchase the things that are produced and industry will be thrown into high gear again to produce more goods. Unemployment will vanish and the needs of our people will be fulfilled. I would therefore, Mr. Speaker, request, as I have before, that some responsible minister explain to us why the government cannot or will not effect the necessary monetary reforms to produce the desired results. Increased purchasing power will create more jobs, and therefore as a member of a group that has offered suggestions and outlined a monetary plan that would solve the problem, I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) to state his views concerning the problem and concerning these proposals that have been advanced by this group.

Mr. J. A. MacLean (Queens): The problem of unemployment from a national point of view has been covered thoroughly in this debate, and it is not my intention to deal with it in general terms but that is not because I do not recognize the importance of the problem. As a matter of fact the unemployment situation in the country is quite serious at the moment. In yesterday's Montreal Gazette I noticed a statement to the effect that 7 per cent of our labour force is now unemployed, which is more than double the normal percentage. This article also points out that even at the depth of the world-wide depression in the thirties there was never more than 12 per cent of our labour force unemployed at any one time.

I, however, do not intend to deal with the problem on a national scale. I should like to direct my remarks for a few moments to the problem of unemployment in the maritime provinces. I know that this is a problem with which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) is specially familiar because he too is a maritimer. Nevertheless I take this opportunity to bring the situation to his attention once again. Unemployment for us in the maritimes is not new. That is probably the reason we have not expressed the degree of alarm expressed by members from other parts of the country, when they find the unemployment figures reaching such high levels.

Over the years in the maritime provinces we have had chronic unemployment. Ever since confederation the maritimes have been unable to supply employment to the natural increase in the labour force. In that time they have not been able to keep employed the numbers who gained their livelihood in that area years ago.

I note that in my own province of Prince Edward Island the total population in 1951 was 5,000 less than it was in 1901, or 50 years before. The result of this depressed economic condition in the maritime provinces is that there has been a continuous exodus of our best people from those provinces during that time. I am not suggesting that it is not a good thing for groups of our people to be employed in other parts of the country, thus adding to the strength and the leadership of the newer sections of Canada. But the unfortunate effect, so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, is that most of this exodus has been, not to other parts of Canada only, but to the United States, and chiefly to the New England states where we find approximately the same basic economic conditions as are found in our maritime provinces, and where, owing to the similarity of natural conditions, the opportunities should be no greater than in our own maritime provinces.

Unemployment figures for the maritimes do not have great significance because they represent only those who are at the moment unemployed in that area and who have not as yet given up hope of eventually being employed there. These are the people who are unemployed but who have not yet left the area to go somewhere else in search of employment.

In this connection I should like to quote from the Labour Research bulletin, the monthly publication of the research department of the Canadian Congress of Labour. In the January-February issue they deal at considerable length with the economic situation in the maritime provinces, and say at page 2:

Taking the three maritime provinces together there car be no question that the increase in employment since the end of the war has been very small, and of course far smaller than for the country as a whole.

Then it goes on to say:

For the three maritime provinces figures are available—

That is unemployment figures.

—for 52 dates, from February 23, 1946 to November 20, 1954. On every one of those dates the percentage of unplaced applicants to total supply in the labour market was higher than the national percentage, usually much higher. For 1946 it averaged over 50 per cent higher; for 1947 over 89 per cent higher; for 1948 over 50 per cent higher; for 1949, when the national percentage was itself much higher than in 1947 or 1948, it was almost 49 per cent higher. For 1950 it was 42 per cent higher, and for 1951 just over 30 per cent; for 1952, 36 per cent; for 1953, almost 51 per cent; for the first eleven months of 1954, when the national figure was the worst on record, it was still 27 per cent higher than the national percentage.

Then it goes on to say:

Using the D.B.S. figure of "persons without jobs and seeking work", and taking this as a percentage of the supply in the labour market, we find that on all but one of the 52 dates the maritime percentage was above the national, usually very far above. On one date, September 18, 1954, the maritime percentage was exactly the same as the national, and on three others it was within 10 per cent of it. But there were ten dates when it was double or more than double the national percentage, and another eight when it was nearly double.

Saying this in another way:

The maritime percentages of unemployment were already so bad in 1953 that it was very nearly impossible for them to get worse in 1954, as fast and as far as the national percentages.

There is another phase of this problem to which I should like to refer briefly, and that is conditions of employment. It is a basic economic fact that people demand higher wages in areas that are not very desirable as places in which to live. People in the maritimes, therefore, because of their desire to continue living in the maritimes, are willing to accept rates of pay which are lower than those which maritimers might demand if they had to go to almost any other part of Canada to seek employment.

In this connection I would quote again from the Labour Research bulletin, which says at page 2:

For the three maritime provinces, in 1946, personal income per head was $177, or 22·3 per cent below the national average; by 1949, $287, or 30·2 per cent below; by 1953, $406, or 33·2 per cent below. At the end of the war, the gap was already considerable. Last year it was about 50 per cent worse.

Then again:

For the three maritime provinces, in 1946, income per member of the labour force was $307, or 15·0 per cent, below the national average; by 1949, $573, or 23·1 per cent; by 1953, $770, or 22·7 per cent. The percentage gap is much smaller than for income per head, in all three years. For the three maritime provinces, the gap in 1953 was again about 50 per cent worse than in 1946.

The reason there is a greater difference between the per capita income in the maritimes and that of the rest of Canada than there is in the per capita income for the labour force in those respective areas is that in the maritimes the percentage of the labour force to the total population is not as great as it is in the rest of Canada, simply because large numbers of our young people who are members of the labour force have been forced to go to other provinces to seek employment, and those who are left behind are the non-wage-earners, the aged and the young.

Of course, the obvious question to ask is, what is the cause of this situation? One of the causes is the lack of suitable markets for the products of the maritimes. In that connection I should like to refer briefly to the report of the Gallup poll, which was taken last fall and published in the Montreal Star on September 8, 1954. The result of this Gallup poll showed, when compared with previous ones, that in 1950, 15 per cent of the Canadian population felt that unemployment was the most urgent question facing the Canadian people. In 1951, that number had dropped to 3 per cent, but in 1954 it had risen to 32 per cent. In the maritimes it was found that a great percentage of the population felt that the problem of suitable markets was of more importance. More people in the maritimes felt that to be so than in any other area of Canada except the prairie provinces.

One of the basic handicaps in the maritimes of course is the lack of cheap power. We also have the handicap of the failure of this government to spend a fair share of defence expenditures in the maritime provinces. I note with satisfaction that in recent years there has been some slight correction of that problem. The new military camp at Gagetown will create a certain amount of employment in that area, and some of the vast amount of money which is now being spent on defence will be funnelled into that area. Of course, the same could be said of the naval base in Halifax but not too much credit should be given to the present government for making Halifax one of its most important naval bases, because a precedent was set for it by the Royal Navy over 150 years ago.

Considerable satisfaction is felt in various areas of the maritimes over the fact that some R.C.A.F. stations have been reactivated there since the war, and they have a beneficial effect on the immediate communities. That beneficial effect is experienced by such towns as Summerside and Chatham.

Perhaps we should not attempt—I for one would not—to blame all our difficulties on other people or on the rest of Canada. We in the maritimes should bear our fair share of the responsibility for the depressed economic conditions in the maritimes. We in the maritimes have not been proud enough of our part of the country. We are a modest people, and when we hear people from the rest of Canada holding forth on the virtues of their areas, we tend to swallow it holus-bolus.

There are some bright indications for the future of the maritimes, however, and among them are the vast mineral discoveries which have been made in New Brunswick. The new techniques in the marketing of food, such as the quick-freezing of vegetables and farm products, do help, and it is hoped it will develop into a very important industry in the near future. The new process for producing such products as fish sticks is having a beneficial effect on our economy generally.

So far as my constituency is concerned, I note that the employment office there, which services two counties, reported last week that during that week the number of unemployed dropped off by 114, but that is only a local trend, which was caused by the fact that the weather has been favourable in recent weeks in the maritimes and building is picking up. In addition to that, in the city of Charlottetown some relief is given owing to the fact that at last the new federal building there is actually under construction after the item has appeared repeatedly in the estimates for about ten years.

I should like to quote briefly figures relating to the maritimes as compared with the rest of Canada. The maritimes are not progressing economically at the same rate as the rest of Canada has since the war. This trend has been going on ever since confederation. In 1946 the maritime provinces had 9·6 per cent of the Canadian population. By 1953, the figure had dropped to 8·5 per cent. In 1946, the maritimes had 8·8 per cent of the labour force. This figure had dropped to 7·6 per cent by 1953. In 1946, the maritimes had 4·4 per cent of the farm cash income of Canada. This figure had dropped to 4 per cent by 1953. In 1946, the maritime provinces alone had 9·6 per cent of the population, but only 2·9 per cent of the electric power produced in Canada. That figure had risen relatively to 3·3 per cent in 1954, and that is one of the few improvements I see in the general picture.

In 1953, the maritimes had 8·8 per cent of the population but only 4·8 per cent of the new investment. From 1949 to 1954 in manufacturing new investment declined 20 per cent in the maritimes. In my province, our economy depends entirely on agriculture, the tourist industry and fisheries. Among those, agriculture is so important it can be truly said that if the farmers are prosperous everyone is prosperous, and if the farmers are not prosperous nobody is prosperous in that area.

Unemployment

I note with considerable alarm the fact that the cash income of agriculture in my province dropped off seriously two years ago and has stayed at that lower level since. I regret that I have not up-to-date figures on the farm net income, therefore I have to give the figures for cash income. In 1952, the farm cash income in Prince Edward Island was $31,500,000. In 1953, it had dropped to $22,500,000, and in 1954 it stood at $23 million. It was up only $500,000 in that year. This prolonged low-level income reflects unfavourably on the province generally. It results in farmers having to forgo ordinary maintenance expenditures on their buildings, on their equipment and on the proper care of their soil, which is their working capital. In other words, they have to draw on their working capital in order to live. That creates a condition which, if allowed to persist, would make it impossible for the farmer ever to recover his position. His soil becomes eroded, his buildings become dilapidated, and his family goes off somewhere else to seek its livelihood. Then you have the situation which now exists on many farms in Prince Edward Island. You have an old couple living on old age pension on a farm that is no longer worked, and which will go out of production permanently when they die. That I say, Mr. Speaker, is a very serious state of affairs.

It may be fair to say that it is quite easy to point out difficulties, and to say things are not as good as we would like them to be. I would be less than fair if I did not offer at least a few suggestions which I think would go some way toward relieving this situation.

To begin with I would suggest most sincerely to the government that greater consideration be given to tariffs and their effect upon the economy of the maritime provinces. At the present time Prince Edward Island exports potatoes, one of its chief products, to the United States over a tariff barrier of 37½ cents per hundredweight for a quota, which tariff doubles after the quota has been reached. Our exports include a large amount of seed potatoes which the United States are almost forced to obtain from the maritimes because of the cooler climate and the fact that they produce the best seed. The result is that due to this tariff on Canadian potatoes the small economy of Prince Edward Island contributes $2 to $3 million to the United States treasury annually.

What is the situation with regard to United States potatoes coming into Canada? The state of Maine produces more potatoes than the whole of Canada. That state is located in a strategic position close to the largest potential Canadian market, the city of Montreal. At the present time, and for years, United States potatoes come into Canada completely duty free except for six weeks during the summer. During this winter large amounts of Maine potatoes were trucked across the international boundary to New Brunswick, coming in duty free, and were then shipped to the Montreal market under the benefit of the maritime freight rate. They were sold there at an advantage of about $25 per carload compared to Canadian potatoes which were selling for the same price, due to the exchange on the United States dollar. Is it any wonder that we in the maritimes find it hard to compete under those conditions? Therefore I make the obvious suggestion as to how the situation might be improved.

Another thing we need in the maritimes in order to be able to compete as far as manufacturing is concerned is cheap power. There are a number of potential power sites in the maritime provinces, and encouragement should be given by the federal government to their development. In addition to these developments I should like to see an accelerated effort to devise some method of producing electrical power from coal by means of gas turbines or other methods. We have coal in surplus supply in the maritime provinces at the present time, and efforts should be made to bring about the development of electrical power from coal at a cost which would permit it to compete with hydro power.

I think it is fair to suggest that the federal government should see that a fair percentage of defence industries are located in the extremities of our country. I do not mean that industries should be dispersed, that existing plants should be closed down, uprooted and transplanted somewhere else, but I do mean that when new factories are required for the production of strategic war materials especially, serious consideration should be given to locating them in the more sparsely populated areas of the country. This would relieve the congested areas which are already tempting targets for bomber attacks.

In closing I want to say that given even reasonable encouragement we in the maritimes with our great resources, the size of which are only now being fully realized, can work out our own salvation but we must have a suitable economic environment so we can share fully in the fruits of our own endeavours.

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose in this speech to minimize the importance which must be attached to this unemployment problem. On the contrary I am convinced that it is one of the most important of those which face our governments. Therefore I believe it may be of some use in this debate to gauge as precisely as possible the volume of present-day employment by looking back on its incidence in the country over the past 20 years. I have before me some figures provided by the dominion bureau of statistics giving the number of persons without jobs and seeking work in Canada during the period 1931-1954. The figures are for the month of June in each case. I would ask permission to place this table on Hansard in order to relieve me of the necessity of reading it in full.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Breton: The table follows:

1946-1953—Monthly bulletin on "The Labour Force", April 1954;
1954—Monthly bulletin on "The Labour Force", June 1954.

Mr. Blair: What is the source of those figures?

Mr. Breton: I obtained the figures from the dominion bureau of statistics, and I shall table the document I received from that source.

Mr. Speaker, it will be noticed that these figures are for June of each year. They are the only figures covering a period of several years which I have been able to obtain. Account must be taken of the fact that the trend for the period from June to March is generally constant. There is a rapid increase from January to March of each year, through the prevalence of seasonal employment. It will also be noticed that in 1931 the civilian labour force in Canada was 4,105,000 as against 5,345,000 on February 10, 1955.

These figures show that unemployment is nothing new, that we have never managed to do away with it entirely. If we look back to these figures it will be seen that if the situation has become somewhat worse since the end of the war, it is by no means comparable to what it was between 1930 and 1941 inclusive. On the other hand, taking into account legislation put on the statute books by the federal government since 1940 with a view to redistributing the wealth of our country, it must be admitted that a great deal has been done to eradicate poverty and misery.

I would like to put on record in this connection the amounts paid out this year by the federal government in social security and unemployment insurance benefits: $1,200 million in social security benefits and $200 million, approximately, in unemployment insurance, which gives a total of $1,400 million.

Some people seem to think the problem of unemployment is one for the federal government alone to solve. Still, by virtue of constitution and custom, the property, control and responsibility with regard to natural resources in this country are vested in the provincial governments. Therefore it would be abnormal for provinces which claim credit for the industrial development of this country to refuse to accept their share of responsibility for unemployment. It is true that unemployment insurance legislation is a federal responsibility. This has been brought about through the consent of the provinces. But such legislation is only a means of helping the unemployed and does not, by itself, create employment.

To my mind the federal government has the following means to combat unemployment: First, a financial policy directed to increasing credit in this country; second, unemployment insurance legislation; third, social security measures.

No one can deny the great amount of work accomplished by the government since 1940 in those three fields. To state that the federal government has done nothing to deal with unemployment is to deliberately ignore a great part of its legislation of the past several years. As examples of financial measures this government has taken for the relief of unemployment I shall mention the extension of credit for house-building purposes, the effects of which have been felt already in 1954 and will intensify during 1955, as well as the reduction of interest rates. Can the government go any further in allowing credit expansion without risks of inflation? There is a question to which only experts can give an answer.

In the field of unemployment insurance a great deal has been done since 1941, and some new amendments to be adopted at this session will, I hope, bring a greater number of workers within the scope of this legislation and extend the duration of benefits to the unemployed. These questions will no doubt be discussed in detail when the amendments are introduced in the house.

As regards social security measures, I believe the government has made the fullest possible use of the share of the national revenue that it can earmark for this purpose.

In my opinion the federal government has assumed all its responsibilities as regards unemployment, but that does not mean it is the only one in a position to meet this problem. Foreign trade, agricultural prices, daring on the part of the leaders of industry, salaries, provincial initiative in the development of natural resources, are all factors which have a bearing on the level of employment. It is therefore impossible to single out responsibilities in this matter. Consequently it is the duty of all levels of government, of leaders in industry and of labour unions to co-operate toward the solution of this problem.

Many consider that the federal government is already assuming too many responsibilities. If the solution of the unemployment problem were entrusted exclusively to the federal government it would lead to greater economic and political centralization. In fact, one cannot seek to obtain rights and at the same time refuse to accept the obligations that these rights involve.

Unemployment is a chronic ill, the importance of which can only increase in peacetime with the development of automation in industry. Without for a moment exaggerating the seriousness of unemployment, I believe that the establishment of a permanent body to study this problem, which could consult with representatives of all interested groups, would be an efficient way of finding long-term solutions.

In the meantime I endorse the policy of the government.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I want my first words in this debate to be words of sympathy. I have a great deal of sympathy for the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg). There is an old saying which goes something like this: "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown". One has to remember how long the Minister of Labour has been patiently sitting in his place having extra thorns added to his crown every once in a while. It is not my intention to add to his difficulties today.

It is my intention to discuss briefly the two proposals which were set forth in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) on behalf of the C.C.F. party. On the 16th of March the hon. member moved an amendment which called for two specific lines of action by this government. The first part of the amendment called for the government to implement the pledge it made in 1945 in what are commonly known as the green book proposals, that it would take full responsibility for the care of the unemployed.

I shall not devote much time to that part of the proposal because it has already been well covered, except to point out that with regard to those who are not eligible for unemployment insurance there is certainly an urgent need for this government to come to the aid of the municipalities which are obliged to struggle with that problem. Before this debate winds up I hope some member of the government—either the Minister of Labour or someone else speaking for the government—will be able to tell this house what they intend to do with respect to this question. I have no doubt that it will be one of the questions which will be discussed at the dominion-provincial conference to take place in the next few weeks, and I hope that out of it will come something which will assure the municipalities that they will not be left in the position of having to take the responsibility of caring for those who are unemployed by virtue of the policies of the federal government.

I should like to devote a little time to the second proposition in our amendment, calling for a public investment program and for economic development. In order to make my remarks as constructive as possible, I should like to set out first of all that I believe the government is missing the boat by going along with the decision of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, which apparently has decided not to proceed with the construction of the pipe line this year. According to a press dispatch of March 18, as it appears in the Winnipeg Free Press, we are informed as follows:

> Decision by the directors of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to bring the negotiations to an end was announced Thursday afternoon by N. E. Tanner, Calgary, president of the company.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Then it goes on to give the reasons:

> A flat refusal by the world's second largest oil company to sell Alberta gas to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines brought the negotiations with the federal government's industrial development bank to an end. The oil company refused to be a party to supplying oil to a pipe line company,—

It should be "gas" there, I imagine:

> —which under the terms of the I.D.B. proposition could be controlled by the Canadian government.

Then it goes on to say:

> The oil company, Canadian Gulf Oil, a subsidiary of the huge Gulf Oil Corp. of Pittsburgh, refused to sign as a supplier, despite a personal last minute appeal by Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce. Mr. Howe reportedly intervened this week to try to persuade Gulf Oil to agree to supply oil but the appeal was flatly rejected and ended in bitter argument over long-distance telephone.

I have no way of knowing the accuracy of that report. Certainly it has not been denied. It appears that the government has now resigned itself to the position that if the pipe-line company in question will not proceed with building the pipe line, then the matter rests there. Certainly here is a clear case where the federal government could proceed on its own and build the pipe line as a public utility, if not the whole distance into eastern Canada then certainly as far as Winnipeg this year. There may be some doubt as to the readiness of consumers in Montreal, Toronto or other eastern cities to buy the gas that may be available. There may be some doubt as to whether the price can be made competitive with other sources of supply. But certainly as far as the situation east to Winnipeg is concerned, there is no doubt that the supply of gas would be welcomed by both the domestic users and those who are in industry.

I see no reason at all why the Canadian government should sit back and wait for a private corporation to proceed with a project of this nature when, in the first place, I believe the Canadian government should have taken the initiative to construct such a pipe line and use it as a public utility, making it available to private concerns, provincial governments and municipalities.

If we can foresee in the future a network distribution of natural gas, both in western and eastern Canada, in which the provincial governments and the municipalities are to participate—and I believe that is what is going to happen—then certainly it would be a protection to those provincial governments and to the municipalities concerned if the pipe line were a publicly-owned utility under the control of the federal government, free to be used by all those who wished to use it as a common carrier, and subject to the regulations of this parliament.

I believe the government of Canada would be well advised to proceed with this project on its own and build it this year as far as Winnipeg. Certainly I can hardly believe that the Minister of Trade and Commerce of Canada would have to make an appeal by telephone to the president of a privately-owned company in the United States, almost begging on bended knee that we may be able to use some of our own natural resources in western Canada by transmitting them farther east. Things have come to a pretty pass if we cannot do anything to alleviate our unemployment situation because the president of a United States company denies us the use of a resource which rightfully belongs to the people of Canada. Whatever protests this government has been making to the United States government with respect to other matters, I think this is one matter in respect of which a protest would be in order.

That is one of the major projects, but under the general idea of public investment there are many other things that could be done. We have suggested in the past, and I should like to place it on record again, that we believe this government should participate in the construction of a highway system from coast to coast. At the present time this matter is considered to be the responsibility of the provincial governments. The federal government has participated to the extent of assisting in the building of the trans-Canada highway, but at the rate at which highway traffic is increasing in Canada, not only in volume or the number of units but in the weight of the vehicles are using our highways, it can be easily seen that many of the existing highways are a wasting asset and are not going to last very long. It is certainly a legitimate project which would be for the general welfare of Canada, and it is one which would provide employment and bring about a general increase in activity from coast to coast.

Then we have suggested a low rental housing scheme, not only to provide extra housing units but also in order to alleviate the unemployment situation. There was also the question of level grade crossings, about which some discussion has taken place. A small amount is now available to municipalities that wish to participate in the construction of systems which would eliminate the level grade crossings; but certainly that figure of $5 million for a country like Canada, for a project of that nature, is a drop in the bucket. Here again is something which could be usefully done which would facilitate the convenience of traffic and contribute to the safety of vehicles and of life, and it is something the federal government could use to boost employment.

I also believe the government could enter into an over-all national conservation plan which could include such things as irrigation, reclamation, reforestation and development of water power. All these things would be in a sense self-liquidating, in the sense that they would be bringing greater value to the nation, creating greater economic activity and development of our resources, and at the same time providing much-needed employment.

I would suggest also that the government proceed with the construction of storage facilities for farm products. It is true that owing to last year's light crop in the west the congestion in our elevator system has not been as great an issue in recent months as it was a year ago. But we are all hopeful, we are all optimistic in the west. We hope for a huge crop in 1955. If we do get a large crop, by next fall we shall be in exactly the same place we were a year ago. All the elevators will be filled; all the annexes will be filled; the terminal elevators will be filled, and the farmers will be left with grain lying in the field which they will not be able to move. Why not use a little foresight and start constructing storage facilities for this grain, as well as facilities for other farm products of a non-perishable nature which could be stored and used in a period of short supply, when the world demand for those products might be better than it is today?

All these things would add to the gross national product, would add to the value of our assets in Canada, and at the same time would provide useful and sensible employment. Those are some of the immediate things we believe could be done.

This afternoon I should like to devote a little time to the problem of unemployment from a national rather than a regional point of view. I feel it is time we devoted a little attention not only to the solving of the unemployment problem when it is upon us, but also to making long-range plans for preventing its recurrence. Evidently unemployment is not a new situation in Canada. The hon. member who preceded me has already placed figures on the record which show that the unemployment situation has been with us since 1930, and the only time it was temporarily solved was during the war and the years immediately following. According to the economic philosophy of this government, that was an abnormal situation.

Since it is a problem which has been recurring and which shows no tendency to solve itself, there must be a reason for it. At the moment we have something in the neighbourhood of 613,000 persons registered as seeking employment, and I should like this house to consider the increasing helplessness of the unemployed as compared with previous years. Today it seems that the moment the ordinary wage earner in Canada loses his job, because of the high cost of living and the fact that the trend seems to be toward the displacement of labour, he finds himself in an almost hopeless situation where he is no longer master of his own destiny. This is not a trend which is likely to stop of itself, because we are told on good authority that the trend toward the displacement of labour by technological advancement, the development of new machines and new methods, is increasing not only year by year but month by month. I believe there is a new term for it, "automation", the process through which every new invention, every new technical advance has the effect of producing as much or more with less and less labour.

In spite of the fact that our gross national product may be increasing year by year—and certainly it should with the increase in our population—we could have the anomalous situation that in spite of the fact our production is increasing, the number of persons employed in the production of those goods and services is decreasing. As a matter of fact that is the situation now when you take into consideration the fact that our population is increasing and at the same time the numbers of unemployed are becoming greater and greater. It is not only the fact that men are being displaced, but the fact that this has been going on for a long time, that is causing concern. I believe we must trace the problem back to its root, because the whole nature of our economic system has undergone a tremendous change, even in the last half century.

We do not need to go back as far as the industrial revolution. Even going back 50 years we find that, so far as labour is concerned, the whole character and nature of our economic system has changed radically. There was a time when the system we commonly refer to as the free enterprise system had some practical characteristics wherein a man was the producer, the labourer and the owner of his own plant. Let us take, for example, the man who 50 years ago made shoes in his own little shop. He was the owner, employer, producer and salesman for his product. He was the master of his own destiny. If he were located in a certain town or village where business was not good, if fewer customers were coming into his shop or his product was not selling well, it was not too difficult for him to gather his tools together, take his work bench along and move to another location. He was, to a certain extent, the master of his own future.

But what has been happening? I have given that illustration, but the same picture is true if applied to construction or manufacturing in all its ramifications. What has been happening since the industrial revolution is that progressively the labourer has been separated from his tools. Today a man working in a big industrial plant in which things are produced under the mass production system, where the conveyor belt is the rule rather than the exception, is no longer the master of his destiny. If the management of the plant in which he is working decides that new machinery can produce the same amount of goods or more with less labour, he is notified his services are no longer required. What has he to pick up and take to another location? He is not even the owner of the tools with which he works. He has only his own two hands, his labour or his skill to sell. In other words he is not only being separated from his tools by advancement and scientific inventions; he has also been separated from his capital.

The man who used to produce and sell his own goods in his own shop used part of his money for his daily living, and the rest was invested in his own little business. It was used to improve his tools and equipment, or to try to turn out a better product. He used his wages both for living purposes and for creating capital for himself. Today the man who works in a huge industrial concern creates capital, that is the amount over and above his wages and the expense of running the plant, but that capital is no longer available to him. He has no share in it. He has devoted his skill, time and energy and has earned his wages, which have gone into his cost of living. When he is told his services are no longer required, there is nothing he can take away with him. The capital he has earned, that is the amount over and above his wages, and the expenses of the plant, is left in the hands of that particular industry.

I would like to quote a passage that appeared almost exactly a half century ago, in the first volume of Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" where, at page 32, he says:

> Labour is the first price, the original purchase money that was paid for all things. It was not by gold or by silver but by labour that all the wealth of the world was originally purchased; and its value to those who possess it and who want to exchange it for some new production is precisely equal to the quantity of labour which it can enable them to purchase or to command.

These are very important words, because they bring us back to a realization that there is no such thing as relations between capital and labour, in the theoretical sense, because capital is labour; and we cannot say that capital and labour must co-operate, although those words are often used, because as a matter of fact there is no capital apart from labour.

All capital was created by labour and is being created by labour every day. There is no other form of capital. The difference today is that capital which is being produced currently by labour, and which has been produced by labour for the last half century, is no longer in the hands of those who have produced it. They have become separated from the tools of their production and also have become separated from the very capital which they themselves have created. And having done that they are left in a position of helplessness where, once they lose their jobs, they have nothing else to fall back upon. That is the situation which must be faced and recognized.

Let me quote again from the same book, this time from page 35, where it says:

> Labour alone therefore, never varying in its own value, is alone the ultimate and real standard by which the value of all commodities can at all times and places be estimated and compared. It is their real price. Money is their nominal price only.

There again, what is the situation? The real price of a commodity that has been produced or a service performed is the amount of labour which has been put into the production of that commodity or the performance of that service. That is its only real price; there can be no other. But under our present economic system that is not the price tag attached to it. Those who are the owners or the inheritors of that capital which has been created by labour are now in a position to place their own price tag on it, and that tag is padded with what we call surplus profit.

As a result of that combination of circumstances, the separation of the labourer from the tools of his trade and the separation of labour from the capital it has created but no longer controls, and the fact that he who contributes the labour in the production of a commodity or the performance of a service is not the one who puts the price tag on it—all these things have contributed to what we call a lack of purchasing power.

I would like to go behind the scenes on this question of lack of purchasing power, because it is on that question that a great deal of our debate has centred. Hon. members to my left, those who belong to the Social Credit party, have referred to it in every speech they have made, and have pointed to this lack of purchasing power as the root of our difficulties today. As a matter of fact it is not the root of our difficulties; it is the result of the process of the separation of labour from its production.

What are some of the ways in which the lack of purchasing power can be emphasized or made clear? I hold in my hand a report which came to me recently concerning small loans companies and money-lenders. This report is issued by the superintendent of insurance for Canada and covers the period for the year ended December 31, 1953.

Normally if the price charged for goods and services were equal to the amount of labour put into them, then you would expect there would be a balance between the consumption and the production of goods. But we know there is no such balance. We know people are forced to borrow money to make up for that lack of purchasing power that has come about. This is only a small example, because it involves only one company. I am not picking out this company for any particular reason, but I believe it is a good illustration.

The company reported upon in this instance is Household Finance Corporation of Canada, which deals chiefly in small loans. This company was incorporated in 1928 with an authorized capital of $5 million and a subscribed capital of only $3,700,000. Its assets today are valued at $56,687,123. It is pointed out that its earned income on the loans outstanding, which in the last year amounted to $54 million, was $12,615,980.

This points up the fantastic way in which interest can draw away the purchasing power of the people. Here is a company that, on an investment of about $3 million, makes an interest profit in one year of $12,615,980. Even after all expenses, including operation expenses, taxes and the like are deducted, they have left a profit of $6,677,066. That is their net income. It represents a net interest profit of over $6 million in one year on an investment of $3 million and that is only one example by which the disappearance of purchasing power can be brought home. Recently I read an article in Maclean's magazine about one of the Asiatic countries—I believe it was Indonesia—in which it was stated that the money-lenders in that country were charging interest rates as high as 25 per cent. I was astonished, thinking this was surely fantastic and unbelievable, that no one would charge an interest rate of 25 per cent. But if we do some mathematical calculations we find that right here in Canada this company charges an interest rate of 22 per cent on small loans.

This means that every time a borrowed dollar is turned over four and a half times, it disappears in the form of interest. One might multiply this example by the millions —perhaps the billions—involved, because the example I have taken is one of the smaller companies. For example, General Motors Acceptance Corporation is a much larger company doing the same kind of business. Traders Finance Corporation Limited and Trans Canada Credit Corporation Limited are two others. Multiply the borrowed dollar by two billion, and realize that every time it turns over four and a half times it exhausts itself by way of interest, and you can see how the present economic system contributes to the disappearance of the purchasing power of the Canadian people.

That is only one thing. We have in addition ordinary industrial profit making. Let me say here at once that I am not complaining about the making of profits by industry, nor do I complain about what is described as free enterprise, so long as it is free. But there is actual profiteering going on. These figures bear it out; and we know that every year, particularly since 1946 when price controls in Canada were lifted, there has been an increasingly greater rate of disappearance in the purchasing power of the Canadian people. That shows how our economic system works, and some of the disabilities under which the ordinary person in Canada has to live.

What are some of the ways in which that situation can be remedied? It has already been suggested by various hon. members that we should increase our social welfare payments as one of the methods of restoring purchasing power to the ordinary people of Canada. I am all for that. To the extent that we can increase such things as old age pensions, family allowances, war veterans allowances and other forms of welfare payments, to that extent we are helping to solve the problem by placing more purchasing power in the hands of the people. I note that in their submission to the government last fall the railway brotherhood suggested that family allowances should be increased a flat $2 in each category to make them $7, $8, $9 and $10, instead of $5, $6, $7 and $8, as they are now.

These things are all to the good, but I do not think it is the whole solution. Something will have to be done to restore to the hands of those who have lost it the management of and participation in the way the capital they created is to be used. There are two main ways in which that can be done. One of them, of course, is through public ownership. I have no hesitation in saying that any time we want to deal effectively with our monopolies and combines in Canada it will not be through the present Combines Investigation Act. It will be through public ownership of such monopolies.

The other method is the co-operative method. That is one of the finest ways in which we can restore to the hands of the people who create the capital, the management and control of that capital. I understand that in Nova Scotia some progress has already been made in that field. I would hope that whatever this government can do, whatever this parliament can do, to encourage and assist people to use the co-operative method of production and distribution, to that extent we shall be helping to bring back into the hands of the people who create the wealth the management and control of that wealth.

I realize that this would require a departure from the economic philosophy of the present government. It has always been a matter of regret to me personally that in the ranks of the Liberal party, among whom are many men I admire a great deal, there has been a tendency toward greater and greater conformity with the official position of the government. There was a time within my memory—and I have been a constant reader of Hansard for over 20 years—when there were a few rebels or left-wingers in the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: All progressives.

Mr. Zaplitny: I can remember the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he was a private member back in the early days. He used to rise quite often in his place in this house and agree with many of the things that were said by the former leader of the C.C.F. party, the late J. S. Woodsworth. I can remember the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) when he was a new member of this house, before he fell to the temptation of leading a political safari from Saskatchewan, when he was a great reformer in various respects. In some ways he was a bit of a monetary reformer in those days. For example, I can remember the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), before he came into this house. He played the roll of a Simon Bolivar at Queen's Park when he broke with Hepburn on the labour question. As a matter of fact he is one of the few left-wing Liberals in this house who came to scoff and remained to scoff. It seems to me that the others have submitted to the dead hand of conformity and are no longer willing to challenge the status quo.

Mr. Martin: That is not what the Montreal Gazette says about the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Zaplitny: Of course I would not want to get my opinion of the hon. member from the Montreal Gazette. But it must be admitted that if the Liberal party is to live up to its early tradition of being a radical party in some respects, then it is necessary that there should be a left-wing group in that party. Instead of having a left-wing group we have a group of people who are not willing to challenge the status quo; they are not willing to challenge the profiteering of monopolies in our midst. We find that that mentality is no longer in evidence. We find the dead hand of conformity has been placed upon the genial Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) who, when he was in the rarefied atmosphere of Selkirk, where we are all very forward looking, even stated that so far as he was concerned the Liberal party was a party of human welfare.

Mr. Pickersgill: So it is.

Mr. Zaplitny: The minister will have to do some convincing today right in his own government and in his own ranks.

Mr. Martin: Surely not.

Mr. Zaplitny: I say this deliberately, because we have been told in reply to all suggestions and proposals that we have made in this house, after all the verbiage has been stripped away, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to a lesser degree by the Minister of Labour himself, that after all this is a free enterprise economy and it is not up to the government to do these things that are suggested; it is up to private industry to do them. Is that the kind of human welfare the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had in mind when he suggested that private enterprise was the trade-mark of the Tory party and the Liberals should never use it? I am afraid he is guilty of speaking out of both sides of his mouth at the same time. The stock reply is, this is a free enterprise economy and the people of Canada voted for it. They elected this government on that basis, and that is what we are going to have.

We are told that competition is the key to the whole thing. That is a point on which I want to take issue. I say that competition is not the key to the solution of our problems and never has been. I believe that co-operation is the key, and just to illustrate how quickly the people of this country can lose faith in competition when the crisis is on, I hold in my hand a Christmas card which was sent to 40,000 retailers of Canada. This folder has on its face a little cartoon. It is made up of five panels. These panels will be familiar to any western member who used to read it. It used to appear in the "Scoop Shovel" and later in the Country Guide, a co-operative newspaper. It has often been used to teach the philosophy of co-operation.

I shall describe it briefly. Originally the cartoon consisted of two donkeys, but in this cartoon it is two reindeer to bring it in line with the Christmas season. The first panel shows two reindeer tied together with a rope. They are standing back to back, each one facing a bale of hay and each one wondering how to get at it. The next panel shows them struggling, each in his own direction toward the bale of hay, neither one being able to get a mouthful of it. Each is pulling the other back. The third panel shows them sitting face to face with a question mark between them, trying to figure out what to do about the competition. The fourth panel shows them standing together at one bale of hay, eating to their hearts' content, and then over at the other bale of hay eating together with a satisfied look on their faces.

In other words the 40,000 retailers of Canada are advocating what? What does this teach? Competition? No, the very opposite; it is teaching co-operation. The very people to whom this government has been trying for years to sell the philosophy of competition are now preaching co-operation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, for several days now the pages of Hansard have been filled with the record of a long debate on the growing seriousness of the unemployment situation in Canada. I am sure we will all agree that if sincere words and concern alone determined the solution to any problem, then this house has been supplied with ample remedies for this problem which is now shameful. Unfortunately we know that mass unemployment is not solved that easily.

I understand there has been some criticism over the prolonging of this debate, but I believe such criticism is not justified. By investigating thoroughly the entire problem of unemployment in Canada we are focusing our attention on the seriousness of that problem. If we are able to establish the basic causes of unemployment and can apply effective remedies, then I do believe that unemployment can be solved. In my humble opinion unemployment, recessions and conditions under which men and women are without work are not beyond the control of parliament. Such conditions are not God-made, nor are they the result of supernatural forces. They are in fact the result of faulty man-made economic policies, with resulting psychological factors.

Frankly I was disappointed to find that a good portion of this debate had been taken up with political charges as to who was responsible for the last depression, and so on. I was disappointed because I feel that the problem of unemployment is too serious for anyone in this house to use it to advance party interests, or as a vehicle for political propaganda. We all know from the lessons of the last depression that unemployment causes human misery. It is a waste of manpower and results in paralysing the growth of a country. We know full well that unemployment inevitably is followed by crime, delinquency and human tragedy. Every civilized person is violently opposed to war and we strive desperately to prevent it, yet there is no other tragedy that falls with such awful impact upon any nation as depression and the conditions caused by unemployment.

Consider for a moment the matter of waste. If we take the figure of 600,000 presently unemployed in Canada—this figure has now risen to some 613,000—as our basic calculation, on the basis of a work shift of eight hours we find the staggering loss of some 4,800,000 man-hours each day, or the incredible figure of some 144,000,000 man-hours lost each 30 days of work. In addition I think it is admitted that the last depression created strains on the minds and bodies of men and women which are perhaps responsible in good measure for many of our public institutions being filled with inmates. These then are some of the effects of unemployment.

I do not intend to re-examine the validity of all the figures which have been given by the able speakers who have taken part in this debate, but I do believe those figures indicate without doubt that unemployment in Canada is neither regional nor seasonal, as has been constantly stated by government spokesmen. Even if it were there is no justification for a country such as Canada, with its immeasurable wealth, having people living in distress. There is no question in my mind but that unemployment is increasing and is creating an alarming situation.

We know that such is the case from the official figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics, which indicate that unemployment is the highest in Canada since the last war and is becoming greater. We know further that the prediction made by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in the December issue of Canadian Business that the unemployment figure for the month of March would be well over 600,000 has been substantiated by fact.

I think the seriousness of the situation is best realized by comparison. In every single month of 1954 the number of unemployed in Great Britain was lower than that in Canada. In the eleven month average for 1954 Great Britain with a working force of 23·6 million had only 287,000 unemployed employables while Canada, with a working force of only 5·4 million, had a monthly average of over 380,000 men and women unemployed. Perhaps the most revealing fact is a recent news release to the effect that government revenues have slackened, taxes are slow in coming in and for the first time since 1946 it is predicted that our finances will show a great deficit. In other words this implies sales and production are decreasing and unemployment rising.

The question will be asked, who is to blame? I know I should not be defending the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister or for that matter any other member on the government side of the house, as they are able and dextrous enough to do that themselves. I am suggesting that by nature I feel rather uncomfortable when I see abuse and criticism pointed at individuals who are just as anxious as anyone else to alleviate unemployment. That blame should fall upon parliament collectively, which even at this late hour takes the stand that the situation is not alarming.

Of course there are those who perhaps feel sincerely that the blame should be placed upon the doorstep of private enterprise; that if only we had state ownership and state planning the picture would take a rosier hue. They do not tell us in what way switching ownership will resolve the problem. Frankly I do not think such an approach would lead to a solution of this problem. As far as I know the purpose of free enterprise has always been to produce goods and services. Labour along with industry has made a tremendous success of that task. Why then should they be blamed?

If we look about we see that the country is loaded with goods of every kind and variety. Certainly private enterprise has not failed. But the same cannot be said of government fiscal policy. As far as I can understand, the purpose of a fiscal policy is to enable the distribution of the goods and services which industry and labour have produced. In failing to do that, government fiscal policy has failed.

I think one of the great tragedies of the situation in which we find ourselves is that labour blames industry and industry blames labour, whereas in reality neither is to blame.

As I indicated a moment ago, the purpose of industry is to produce goods. The purpose of farming is to produce wheat, meat, butter, eggs and those commodities that are desired by human beings. The purpose of a coal mine is not to supply jobs but rather to produce coal, and the fact that we have employment is a happy consequence of that process. Of course there are those who feel that the profit motive is responsible for much of the unemployment situation. No one in this house is more opposed to unreasonable profits or exploitation than I am. But suppose we did distribute the profits created by industry among the workers and the people generally; would that be the solution to unemployment? Anyone who has studied the economics of our country knows that is not the answer, because all that could happen then would be a very thin distribution of the purchasing power already in the country, whereas what is required is supplementary income in order to enable consumption of the tremendous productive capacity of this nation.

Furthermore, there are those who feel that the answer is to be found in increasing wages. In this respect I think labour has been justified in asking for increased wages. When we consider the tremendous cost of living it is only reasonable that labour should wish to have fair reward for its efforts. I have in my hand an interesting list giving comparative prices of commodities in 1927 and 1955 compiled by the senior citizens' association of British Columbia. It indicates that in the year 1927 a pound of butter cost 42½ cents. The January, 1955 price was 65 cents for a pound of butter. One dozen eggs in 1927 cost 34 cents and in January, 1955, a similar dozen eggs cost 46 cents. A pound of tea cost 49 cents in 1927 and in January, 1955, a pound of tea cost $1.40. Coffee cost 34 cents a pound in 1927 and cost $1.23 in January, 1955.

It is quite obvious that because of the high cost of living labour is justified in asking for some measure of wage increase in order to reward it for its toil, but I do not think increased wages is the answer either. As we know, wages are always incorporated into the cost of production. Therefore if the price of goods is raised by reason of increased wages in what way does the labourer better himself when he has to pay higher prices for the commodities he requires?

Further, there is the charge that if we could somehow improve the relations between industry and labour the solution would be found. Certainly that situation is desirable. I think it is a great mistake for labour to quarrel with industry. The fact is they are both in the same boat and are harassed by the fiscal policies of this government. As a matter of fact there are those who are interested in these two parties quarrelling violently between themselves in order to distract the attention of labour and industry from the real cause of their trouble, namely the vicious taxation policies of the present government which rob purchasing power from the people and encourage government spending.

During this debate we have heard some excellent presentations and suggestions. In my humble estimation the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) gave a scholarly analysis of the situation, and recently the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in a portion of his address came to grips with the subject when he referred to the lack of purchasing power in the hands of the people.

There is no question in my mind but that unemployment is one of the first symptoms of a condition wherein there is a lack of effective consumer demand on the productive capacity of our country. The problem then is for us to devise ways and means of stimulating consumption and restoring purchasing power to the people. Under our present method of operation there is only one way by which this can be accomplished; that is to have a thorough and realistic approach made to the entire Canadian taxation structure, and to remove or reduce those taxes on personal incomes and corporate bodies that restrict and retard investment, consumption and production of the goods required in our country. Such reductions will act as a stimulus.

Further evidence that there is insufficient purchasing power in the hands of the Canadian people is easily found when we examine the high figures of present-day instalment buying. I am not saying that instalment buying is a bad thing entirely. Were it not for instalment buying the pile of surplus goods which our country has produced would be higher still. I refer of course to durable goods such as cars, heavy machinery and homes, which could not be acquired without instalment payments. I wish to stress, however, that the present high level of instalment buying may present itself as a serious problem at some future date, in that purchasing power will be used to eliminate debt rather than to acquire the goods and services which will be coming off the assembly lines in the future. I believe that here also a sensible reduction in the taxes of our country, primarily in some of the hidden taxes on goods, will alleviate the situation and restore some of the purchasing power of the dollar.

We are all aware that our present taxation structure has adversely affected our domestic market as well as our export trade. Taxes go into the cost of production and decrease the amount the dollar can buy, with the result that many of the goods this country has produced are presently beyond the reach of most countries which would ordinarily buy them from us.

During the war and shortly thereafter, because of a depletion of their own resources and damage to their potential, many countries were obliged to buy from us; but that situation does not exist now. The artificial stimuli which spurred our economy shortly after the war no longer exist. Many of the countries who were formerly our customers have rebuilt their industry and are now selling their products at lower prices than ours, by reason of the fact that many of the hidden taxes our fiscal policy demands of production are not incorporated in their products. It seems to me that an intelligent man always benefits by the experience of others. For some reason or another we refuse to do that.

During the course of this debate reference was made to the extraordinary recovery of Germany. I am keenly interested in Germany's recovery because it was my good fortune to have spent many years studying in that country. In thinking of the recovery of Germany we must consider that on May 8, 1945, the country was divided into three areas, each independently occupied. Up until that time the territories were economically dependent upon each other. In order to have a complete picture of the chaos it is also necessary to consider that more than 10 million poverty-stricken refugees from other parts of Europe flooded Western Germany. Then we must also consider the war damage, the dismantling of industry, the general atmosphere of despondency and the lack of hope of a solution, and other conditions and attitudes that existed there.

I believe that an examination of the process of economic recovery there merits consideration, because we all know that today, surprisingly enough, Germany is one of the most prosperous countries in Europe and is, in fact, challenging in world trade the very countries that a few years ago had defeated it in war.

I have in my hand an extremely interesting book called "Germany Reports". It is a calm and objective review of the entire problem. It contains some 84 charts and 84 tables, and is published by the press and information office of the German Federal Republic. First of all I wish to read what I consider to be a succinct passage with respect to the economic and social policies which were adopted in order to make economic recovery possible.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the hon. member give the date?

Mr. Holowach: This publication was printed in 1953. Speaking with respect to the years 1948-52, the following appears:

> Two methods of economic reconstruction presented themselves. Both differed not only in respect of their external form of economic organization but above all in respect of the role of the government in the economy and the position of the citizen within the state and society. They were the planned economy and the free market.
> At first sight the idea of directing economic reconstruction in accordance with a comprehensive plan might appear tempting. Actually, however, a planned economy policy could mean nothing more than the continuation of the previously existing course of directing economic activity by detailed bureaucratic regulation. Past experience, however, had shown that such an economic system stifles initiative, the desire for achievement, and the sense of responsibility, as the most valuable driving forces in economic activity. The individual's freedom of decision is replaced by orders of an almighty state and the subservience of its "subjects". Aside from the political significance of such a decision in favour of the planned economy, regulating man's relation to state and society in terms of dependence and subjugation, there can be no surrender in the purely economic sphere of those spiritual and moral forces which flourish only in an atmosphere of freedom. The poorer the country is in material assets, the less can it renounce these forces. For political and also purely economic reasons the economic council of the combined economic area and later the federal government therefore decided in favour of an economic system in which freedom of decision, initiative, achievement and sense of responsibility could once more become the dominant factors.

Then a little further on in this extremely important report this appears:

> Now that undeniable success has been achieved, few realize the magnitude and gravity of the decision which had to be made in 1949 when West Germany was faced by the alternative of free market economy or planned economy. In view of the extent of economic disorganization, of devastation, dismantling, refugee distress and prevailing poverty, it was very tempting to believe that a state-controlled economy could provide an escape from this chaos. It required an extraordinary measure of confidence in the imagination and initiative of employers, employees and consumers to risk the decisive step of removing the responsibility for future economic development from the state and turning it over to the participants in the economy and to their unrestricted freedom of decision. However, previous experience with planned direction of the economy by the government made this choice considerably easier.

Furthermore, with respect to taxation I should like to read the following:

> Tax policy of economic revival
> True to the principle underlying its social policy that taxation must be bearable from an economic as well as a social viewpoint and must not be allowed to stifle private initiative, the federal government strove to adapt all necessary changes in the rates of taxation to the prevailing economic conditions.

A continuation of the earlier fiscal policy based on allied legislation, in which a bookkeeping viewpoint predominated, would have led to disaster in spite of the Marshall plan and the currency reform. Considering the existing shortage of capital, a continuation of such excessive taxation would have initiated a process of economic contraction resulting in growing social burdens to be met out of shrinking tax revenue and a declining national product . . . It took the only possible way out of this situation it had been forced into, by making tax reductions the first step in its fiscal policy. This applied first and foremost to direct taxation in general and income tax in particular.

There may be those who claim there is no similarity in the conditions which face Canada at present and those existing in Germany at that time, but I believe there is. While their problem was one of having to induce production to quench the thirst of consumer demand, our problem is similar to the extent that at present it is one of having to make possible consumer demand on the productive capacities of this nation. I repeat, I believe that a serious approach should be made, with the thought of reducing some of the sales and hidden taxes on many of the commodities that are required by people.

Hitherto we have heard of most of the cures as being those that involve the government building suitable projects. I believe such a program will do much to brighten the economic picture, but I think that step alone will make only a scratch on the surface of the problem. I say that for one simple reason, namely that under our financial system the government must first extract from the people, by way of taxation, the money for these projects; whereas there is on hand evidence that even now what is lacking is present effective purchasing power in the hands of the people. Giving with one hand and removing with the other is no solution.

But should the government, after careful thought, embark upon such a program I would suggest that priority be given to that type of construction which generates and distributes wealth in our country. In this category I would say are the building of roads, the building of airports, the building of homes, the giving of inducements to the building of the trans-Canada pipe line. These are things that distribute and in themselves generate wealth.

On January 27 when I spoke in this house I drew attention to the need in western Canada for the building of a road from Winnipeg by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton and the Yellowhead route to the west coast. There is also the need for early commencement on the building of a new major airport in the city of Edmonton. I mention Edmonton because at the present time I understand that the unemployment figure there is unreasonably high. There is also the federal building there that should be completed as early as possible. As I said before, these things in themselves are not the solution to the unemployment problem, but they can help to solve some part of it.

No discussion of the unemployment situation in Canada would be complete without some reference to the subject of automation. We know that technological advancement is progressing rapidly and, as is being done now, in the future machines and science will more and more replace the hands and the toil of men and women. This matter calls for careful study. It might be advisable for the Minister of Labour to set up within his own department a special study group with a view to examining this entire question of unemployment, its cause, its effect, the influence of technological advancement on unemployment and what portion of unemployment is due to overproduction of certain goods for which there is no market.

However, to me the word "automation" spells out a new economic era. I believe that once again science is forcing us to the realization that mankind was not destined to perpetual toil, but was meant to have leisure and to enjoy the blessings of life. In the future the ultimate challenge will be for governments to devise policies to make financially possible the distribution of those things which the purr of automatic motors and machines has made physically possible.

Perhaps all this may sound visionary. I think we should at this time entertain such a vision, for to do less might well mean that there will not be many of us around to judge that we would have been right in making that vision a reality.

Above all, Mr. Speaker, unemployment violates what I consider to be the rights of citizens. We know the people of Canada look to parliament for a solution. If we fail to solve this serious question at this time we may disturb the widespread confidence that the people of Canada have in parliament and in our way of life. It might well be a dangerous thing to fail at such a time in history, especially when we consider that there are many who are waiting to exploit uncertainty and fear.

I request that the government give an answer to the unemployed people of Canada. I trust that when the Minister of Finance presents his budget he will bear in mind some of the recommendations I have made and make his answer satisfactory to the people of Canada, who are anxious to see an early solution to this problem.

Unemployment

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I rise to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, mainly because of two recent developments which have had a real or potential major effect upon the level of employment in Canada. One of these developments was the recent collapse of the trans-Canada pipe-line project; the other was today's report concerning possible restrictions on oil imports from Canada by the United States. Both these events have some bearing, real or potential, upon the western Canadian oil and gas industry.

This industry, in eight short years, has gone from an infant to an industry which today in western Canada supports no less than 300,000 men, women and children. This figure includes, of course, not only the direct employees of the oil and gas companies but also those whose jobs have been created because of the activity in western Canada in connection with oil and gas development and exploration. These operations in oil and gas in western Canada involve the employment in all Canada of people in a great range of industries, from the steel industry in the east to many others, affecting a total of probably some half million men, women and children. Obviously it is an industry of very real importance to our country.

Before dealing with the two recent events I want to go back something over five years and quote very briefly from one of a large number of speeches I made from 1947 on in many parts of Canada and the United States, prior to the time I became a member of this house. I am going to refer back to this 1950 speech mainly because it sets out my basic policy, or is a statement of my beliefs, as to how to best serve Canada and Canada's interests through Canada's own oil and gas resources. This speech was made in two places during February, 1950; once before the Canadian Club in Toronto and again before the stockbrokers' associates in the city of Chicago. This is headed, "The Future Unitization of North American Oil and Gas Resources". Remember, this is five years old. It reads as follows:

> The Alberta and western Canadian oil and gas industry now finds itself in the position where its rapid growth requires a broad, international understanding on the part of the petroleum industry of both the United States and Canada, and the citizens and governments of these neighbouring nations.
> It is highly probable that within a few years Canada will become self-sufficient in petroleum, that western wells will be able to turn out enough oil to service the needs of Canada.
> Now, self-sufficiency in oil can be achieved in two ways, either in fact or in balance. By "in fact" is meant the actual delivery of Canadian oil to all parts of the nation. That would be a costly procedure to producer and consumer alike. It would mean a low well-head price for crude, imposition of tariffs to keep out American and other foreign oils from some parts of Canada, and a high price for refined products to Canadian consumers outside of the prairie provinces.
> By "in balance", is meant an exchange of oil between the United States and Canada in order that the producers of each nation might serve the most economic area, regardless of international boundaries. Under this plan, Canadian oil would serve the prairie provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, and serve also part of the mid-western United States market and part of the Pacific northwest states market. American and other foreign oil would continue, as now, to supply a large part of Canada's eastern market.
> So far as natural gas is concerned, Canadians outside of Alberta must recognize that their chances of getting this highly convenient domestic and industrial fuel are dependent in large measure on their willingness to let the equally gas hungry accessible parts of the United States share in Alberta's resource. Albertans must be willing to share their gas resources as well as their oil.
> If Canada and the United States are prepared to accept the premise that the two adjoining nations are a single great economic unit—

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, while I am sure the house will admit that a pipe line for gas or oil may be a means of providing employment, I do not think it is proper during this debate to discuss the ramifications of the industry as the hon. member is doing.

Mr. Nickle: As I stated earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am making a short restatement of a basic policy which I outlined some years ago. I should like, sir, with your permission, to complete that statement and then proceed to relate the real problem of unemployment in Canada to the oil and gas industry.

Mr. Gregg: The hon. member has already done that. He has said, and I agree with him, that this undertaking, if it comes about in the future, will be a direct or indirect means of creating employment. I suggest that having made that point he should not go on to deal with the policies and difficulties surrounding the industry at this time. Those matters are not appropriate.

Mr. Nickle: Any problem related to any industry in Canada, whether that problem is created by industry or by government, that in any way affects the level of employment, creates jobs in Canada or destroys jobs in Canada, I believe is relevant to this debate. I shall continue with the last remaining portion of this 1950 statement:

> If Canada and the United States are prepared to accept the premise that the two adjoining nations are a single great economic unit, at least so far as oil and gas are concerned, the Alberta industry will go on to a future dwarfing its status of today, and broad national and international benefits will accrue.
> Canada and the United States are each other's greatest customer for goods and services. Like most other nations Canada is buying less now from the United States than it desires, primarily because it is short of American dollars. Canada's self-sufficiency in petroleum would eliminate its greatest single drain of United States dollars, an item of some $300 million yearly, and make funds available for purchase of other American products.

Continued growth of Alberta's oil and gas industry will greatly strengthen Canada's economy, particularly in the prairie area which has long depended on a single industry, agriculture.

From the viewpoint of both nations—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understood the hon. member to say that he was going to complete this statement very shortly. I find that in a debate of this kind the question of relevancy is very difficult to determine because, as the hon. member who has the floor rightly pointed out, many factors enter into the subject of unemployment. Nevertheless, I must also find that there is considerable merit in the point of order raised by the Minister of Labour. Hon. members cannot use the vehicle of a debate on unemployment to institute a debate on another particular subject. I must therefore ask the hon. member to confine himself to the subject of oil, if he wishes to do so, but in so far as it relates to the problem of employment or unemployment.

Mr. Nickle: I trust I am doing just that.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nickle: Very obviously, as I said in my opening remarks an industry which has grown from infancy to one supporting half a million Canadians is a vital part of the Canadian economy, and the employment provided by that industry is a matter which logically can be discussed before the house in all its phases at this time.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add the last two paragraphs of this statement. I do this now chiefly because of the development in the house this afternoon concerning the reported restriction by the United States on imports of crude oil from Canada which, may I say, will very obviously affect the employment level in western Canada immediately. This would be the result should there be any reduction by the United States of oil imports from this nation.

This is the balance of the 1950 statement:

From the viewpoint of both nations and the world—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought I had indicated clearly to the hon. member that I was prepared to extend some leniency to him when he quoted from his statement. I hope, however, that he will now relate his remarks to the unemployment situation.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, in addition to discussing past developments of some industries in Canada, in the matter of employment or lack of employment, I think it is also obvious that any suggestion that would create new employment in Canada logically becomes part of this debate.

I now proceed to get on with the main part of this quotation, and read the last two paragraphs of this statement of 1950.

From the viewpoint of both nations and the world, there is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Surely the hon. member must realize I do not want to go any further in the matter, but I have indicated as clearly as I can that perhaps he should proceed to deal with another part of his subject.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, all I am attempting to do is refer to the problem of oil and gas development and the matter of employment in that and associated industries, and to relate it to the problem of national security in this country. This is an industry which is directly related to the problem of employment. If it is your wish, sir, that I do not read directly from the 1950 statement then I shall try to paraphrase or summarize what I had to say then.

An hon. Member: Who wrote it for you the first time?

Mr. Nickle: I do all my own speech writing.

Mr. Hees: We have not any deputy ministers to write our speeches.

Mr. Nickle: To continue:

From the viewpoint of both nations and the world, there is another vastly important fact which cannot be ignored. Adequate deliveries of oil and gas to points of need, vital as they are in peacetime, can determine victory or defeat, life or death, in time of war. Tremendous amounts of time, money and effort are required to explore for and develop oil and gas reserves, and to provide the means of transporting and processing them to give products of usable form where needed. The task can best be done in peacetime, not when an emergency is at hand.

The security of North America, the ultimate outcome of the world struggle between democracy and communism, will in part be shaped by the attitude of Canadians and Americans towards unitizing of the continent's oil and gas reserves.

I now come to the question brought before the house today, the problem of whether or not the United States is now going to curtail imports of oil from Canada which, of course, will very directly and immediately affect the level of employment in western Canada. Let me say at once that some of the reports which have circulated concerning the statement by Mr. Brewster Jennings, president of Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, may have been misleading. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce today put the statement of Mr. Jennings in correct perspective when he indicated that this was not going to mean a reduction in imports of Canadian oil in the northwestern United States market, served by Mr. Brewster Jennings' company.

However, there is now before the United States congress a proposal by one group of senators to add a rider to the reciprocal trade bill which would have the effect of placing legislative limits upon the importation of foreign oils into the United States from all countries, including Canada. Mr. Jennings, in his statement before the Senate committee considering the reciprocal trade bill, did make a statement last week end, part of which was reported today by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Another part might well be read into the record at this time, because it gives a different picture from that given in some of the press stories this morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member leaves me in considerable difficulty. He will recall that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement earlier this afternoon with respect to the oil industry. Under our rules when a statement of that kind is made we usually allow a short reply from each opposition group. Advantage of that provision of our rules was taken by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The hon. member for Calgary South will realize that I cannot allow him now, in another debate, to do what was done earlier in another connection. Therefore again I must ask him to confine his remarks not to general observations about the oil industry but rather to the oil industry as it relates to unemployment.

Mr. Nickle: I am attempting to do that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, might I recall to Your Honour's attention that in this very debate which, because of adjournments, has taken some time, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to whose remarks reference has been made, did give a review that dealt with various specific aspects of our economic problem. However, he did not deal with it in a way that offered much that was hopeful along the lines we have been suggesting.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if it was appropriate in such a review to discuss the various aspects of the economy of Canada, it should be arguable now that it is correct to deal with a specific aspect of that economy and point out how employment can be increased in relation to it; and that I understand is the argument now being made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his assistance. He will recall that when I first rose to my feet some time ago I pointed out the difficulty of determining relevancy in a debate of this kind. Hon. members will agree that considerable latitude has been allowed by the Chair in order that this very important subject may be fully discussed.

The problem I am faced with at the present time is that the Minister of Labour has raised a point of order with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary South, and I am of course obliged to make a decision. I pointed out to the hon. member for Calgary South that he was perfectly in order to discuss the oil industry in so far as it relates to unemployment, and I certainly have no intention of preventing him from doing so. But I think the Leader of the Opposition will agree that to use the unemployment debate as a vehicle merely for a debate on the oil industry would not be within the scope of this debate. We should try to confine our remarks so far as possible to any specific phase of the economy which we wish to discuss in its application to employment or unemployment.

Mr. Nickle: Mr. Speaker, those who are now engaged in the production of crude oil in western Canada may be a little fearful of their jobs and their security because of the reports emanating from Washington. The statement from Mr. Brewster Jennings, of the Socony-Vacuum Oil Company, will dissipate their fears and set them completely at rest, since they will have available to them the records of this house. In his statement to the Senate committee in Washington last week, Mr. Jennings said that legislative restrictions on oil imports would pose the risk of reversing the progress made in international trade and of imperilling the United States' foreign relations. The Socony-Vacuum president endorsed extension of the reciprocal trade act without crippling amendments, such as imposition of quotas on imports of crude and residual oil. That statement, I am sure, will be welcomed on all sides of this house.

Mr. Jennings then went on to give several reasons why it should not be in the United States' national interest to subject petroleum imports into the United States to any form of restrictive quotas. These are the four reasons he advanced:

(1) The United States consumes 60 per cent of the oil used in the free world and, with only 21 per cent of the proved reserves, is consuming its own supply four times as fast as the rest of the world.

(2) We have relied heavily in the past on oil from Venezuela and Colombia, and the development of reserves in these countries as well as Canada depends on continued access to our market.

(3) As the United States' demand for oil increases, we may some day want more supplies from the Middle East, which now has 62 per cent of the world's reserves.

(4) Import quotas would impair our relations with friendly foreign nations and probably lead to retaliatory action prejudicial to exports of many of our industries and farms.

Mr. Jennings then went on in his statement to refer to Canada, and declared that any quotas imposed by legislation covering oil imports would have to apply to Canada, and this would be a direct repudiation of the United States' joint effort at economic co-operation with Canada.

Fortunately for our country, and fortunately for the western Canadian oil and gas industry, Mr. Speaker, the proposal to restrict oil imports into the United States is still just a proposal submitted by a group of senators. It is, I might say, strongly opposed by the United States administration as well as by the major segments of the United States oil industry. I am hopeful there will be no loss of jobs in western Canada this year, because I am also hopeful there will be no restriction by United States on imports of Canadian oil.

How important that oil market is to the United States is indicated by a few figures showing what we did last year and what we hope to do this year. Last year we first started selling oil in reasonable volume in the United States market. We managed to sell 7,900 barrels a day during the year. By the end of 1954 we were selling 24,000 barrels a day. In March, 1955, the United States actually took 47,700 barrels a day from western Canada. Over 26,000 barrels of that goes to the Socony-Vacuum oil refinery in Ferndale, Washington; the rest goes to the great lakes area of the United States, where it is transported by the international oil pipe line.

Before the end of this year Canada is hopeful of expanding its sales of crude oil to the United States to an amount ranging between 65,000 and 75,000 barrels of oil a day, more than triple all Canada's production of oil just eight years ago. By the end of this year, provided that the doors are not closed to our oil by the United States, we shall be producing something over 360,000 barrels of oil a day in western Canada, which is something over 60 per cent of Canada's needs.

Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Rowe: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Knowles: Is it external affairs?

Mr. McCann: Yes, external affairs.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF DEMONSTRATION POWER REACTOR

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on February 17, 1953, in the course of a brief report which I gave the house on the atomic energy program, I stated that the time had come to undertake the development of atomic power in this country. I stated further that since the production of power is the concern of the various commissions and power companies which distribute power in Canada, it seemed desirable that arrangements should be made whereby the power producers might participate in the future development work.

Shortly after this announcement the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario indicated its interest in participating in the program, and discussions began as to how this might be carried out most effectively. These discussions resulted in a decision to undertake a feasibility study which would have as its objective the determination of an outline specification for a power reactor.

The arrangement, which was announced on November 12, 1953, provided that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited would make available technical information and experimental facilities, and that Ontario hydro would supply the personnel for the study. Ontario hydro also stated its intention to expend on the study up to $100,000 a year over a two-year period. Subsequently several other utilities contributed personnel to the study group.

During the debate on the amendments to the Atomic Energy Control Act last June I advised the house that it had been decided to set up an advisory committee on atomic power, consisting of representatives of all the power commissions and power companies in Canada. The purpose of the committee was to provide a medium whereby power producers in all parts of Canada might be kept fully informed of developments in the atomic power field. The first meeting of the committee was held at Chalk River in July, at which time the power reactor program was described in detail. It was agreed that the committee would meet annually, and more frequently should the members of the committee desire.

Late in 1954 the feasibility study had advanced to the point where it was possible to consider the next step, the design, engineering and construction of a demonstration power reactor. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has now recommended that such a reactor should be built, and the government has accepted this recommendation. The reactor will be designed to produce 20,000 kilowatts electric. Its nuclear specifications will be based, in the main, on the heavy water technology which has been developed at Chalk River in connection with the operation of the NRX reactor. While the reactor is not expected to produce power at costs competitive with hydro plants or large thermal stations, it will provide the kind of operating and cost experience which will make possible a scale-up to a large and economic power reactor.

Bearing in mind that atomic power will be used by the utilities, and that the manufacturing industry will be responsible for producing the equipment and components for power reactors, it seemed desirable that arrangements should be made for the participation in the project of a utility and further, that the detailed design, engineering and construction of the reactor should be contracted to a manufacturer.

Two utilities, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the Nova Scotia Light and Power Company Limited, have made specific proposals for participation in the project; and two utilities, the Nova Scotia power commission and the New Brunswick power commission, have indicated some interest. Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has now recommended that the proposal of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario be accepted, and the government has approved this recommendation.

The arrangement will provide that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited will assume responsibility for the specifications and the cost of the reactor, and that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario will assume responsibility for the specifications and cost of the conventional part of the plant, including the cost of the building to house the entire plant and the cost of its site. Ontario hydro will operate the plant as a part of its power system and for that purpose will purchase steam from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited at a price equivalent to the cost of steam produced in the emergency plant erected at Scarborough, Ontario, some years ago.

The decision to accept the proposal of Ontario hydro is based on several factors. First, as the reactor is to be used for demonstration purposes it is essential that it be operated in a power system which is sufficiently large to cope with interrupted operation or operation at a low load factor. Second, it is considered desirable that the first power reactor should be located within easy access of Chalk River, since Chalk River will be responsible for nuclear performance. Third, the financial arrangements provide that both parties will accept full responsibility for the cost of their respective portions of the project, together with any loss that may be incurred as the result of failure in operation or interrupted operation. This sharing of costs and risk is essential in an experimental project of this kind. Since Ontario hydro has made the major contribution to the feasibility study on which the specifications of the reactor will be based, the continuing partnership will be of great mutual advantage.

While the reactor will be located in Ontario, it will be the policy to provide full information to the members of the advisory committee with regard to its design and operation. In this way we will ensure that all Canadian power producers will be in a position to evaluate its economic significance in terms of their respective systems.

Last December Atomic Energy of Canada Limited invited proposals for the design and construction of the reactor from a number of companies which were considered to have the design, engineering and manufacturing resources needed for an undertaking of this kind. These companies were advised that they would be expected to make some financial contribution to the project. After a careful assessment of these two factors —design, engineering and manufacturing resources and the amount of the financial contribution—Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has recommended that the contract be awarded to the Canadian General Electric Company Limited.

It is intended that detailed design will get under way immediately, with a view to the completion of construction in mid-1958.

Further details with regard to the program will be submitted to the parliamentary committee on research.

Mr. Green: Were power commissions and companies in all the provinces given the opportunity to participate in these developments?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The answer is yes. All the power companies were invited to be represented on the advisory committee, and I think that all but one or two are so represented. A number of power companies, although they are not assuming financial responsibility for this first operation, have been contributing men to the feasibility studies. I might say that the British Columbia Electric Company, in which my hon. friend is interested, has contributed manpower to the study.

Mr. Green: I had in mind, for example, the British Columbia power commission, which is a government commission. Has it also been given the opportunity to participate?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It was given the opportunity, but so far as I know it has not appointed a man to the commission. However, the British Columbia Electric Company has supplied manpower.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention of the government to set up the special committee on atomic energy and research shortly?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, that is the intention of the government. We have simply been waiting until current debates die down a bit and we could get a place in the program of the house.

Mr. Brooks: Has the minister an estimate of the cost which would be paid by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. I think the cost of the project is between $13 and $15 million, and the contribution of the Ontario hydro to the part to be built by them is between $3 and $5 million. There is also a sizeable contribution by the contractor for his part in the program.

Mr. Gillis: What were the factors that militated against the proposal of the Nova Scotia power commission?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The difficulty there was that the unit covered by the proposal was a unit immediately needed for the Nova Scotia system. We could not guarantee the time of completion or the reliability of the project, since this is the first one to be built. We were asked to indemnify the Nova Scotia utility against any lack of efficiency and against damage resulting from delayed completion and also damage resulting from low load factor; whereas in the Ontario project, a proposal similar in character, the Ontario hydro assumes all the risk for the factors I have just mentioned.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Was the Calgary Power Company asked to participate?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I think the Calgary Power Company has been participating. The president of the Calgary Power Company is a member of the executive committee in charge of the study, and I believe that company has supplied manpower.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): What factors entered into the choice of the permanent location of the unit?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I understand that the exact location has not been finally chosen. The decision will be made jointly by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission, which will operate the unit, and Atomic Energy of Canada. The decision will be based on the convenience of both.

Mr. McIvor: Has any other country anything like this, or is it the case of Canada again being first?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The United States has undertaken several developments in this field, none of which is anywhere near completion, and the United Kingdom is also developing in the same field.

Mr. MacLean: Are the results of the experimental work done in the United Kingdom available to the advisory committee in Canada?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The answer is yes.

DISABLED PERSONS ACT—B.C. PROTESTS

Mr. Fairey:

1. Has the minister of health and welfare for British Columbia protested the regulations passed under the provisions of the Disabled Persons Act?

2. If so, to whom has the minister directed such protests?

3. What was the nature of the protests?

Mr. Robertson:

1, 2, and 3. There is no record of any correspondence having been received from the minister of health and welfare or any other member or official of the government of British Columbia, containing any comment, criticism or complaint about the regulations passed under the Disabled Persons Act. There is no record of any letter having been received from the minister of health and welfare containing any reference whatsoever to the said regulations, either before or after they had been approved.

The minister of health and welfare for British Columbia attended a conference of provincial ministers and officials, called by the federal government in January, 1954, to discuss the main outlines of the proposed federal disability allowances legislation. The minutes of this meeting reveal only two comments offered by the minister of health and welfare for British Columbia—neither of them critical of any feature of either the proposed legislation or the regulations.

The minister of health and welfare for British Columbia was invited in September, 1954, to attend a conference called for the purpose of formulating, jointly with the federal and other provincial governments, the regulations under the Disabled Persons Act. The minister did not attend this conference, but was represented by two senior officials of the British Columbia department of health and welfare. The minutes of this meeting contain no reference to any remarks made by the said British Columbia officials which could under any circumstances be interpreted as a protest against the regulations. The only important comment of substance offered by the British Columbia representatives referred to that part of the disability definition which has to do with "permanency". In the opinion of the British Columbia authorities a stated number of years was preferable as the criterion of permanency to the wording contained in the regulation "to which the concept of cure cannot be applied". Apart from this suggestion, not a single critical comment on the regulations has been offered to federal authorities by the British Columbia authorities at any time from January, 1954, when the question was first discussed to the present.

MARITIME COAL—SUBVENTIONS ON WESTERN MOVEMENT

Mr. Buchanan:

1. What assistance, through federal subventions, has been given to the movement of coal from the maritimes westward to other provinces in the following fiscal years: 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954?

2. What is the breakdown of amounts on shipments from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for each of the above years?

3. Has any change in policy or the payment of these subventions taken place during the above years? If so, when and in what form?

4. Are figures available to show coal shipments from the Cape Breton area? If so, what quantities, and what is the amount of subventions in each of the above years?

Mr. Prudham:

1. The following assistance, through federal subventions, has been given to the movement of coal from the maritimes westward to other provinces in the undernoted fiscal years: 1949-50, $2,657,545; 1950-51, $1,399,030; 1951-52, $3,260,050; 1952-53, $4,777,335; 1953-54, $7,214,708.

2. The breakdown of amounts on shipments from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for each of the above years is as follows: Nova Scotia coal: 1949-50, $2,653,604; 1950-51, $1,397,041; 1951-52, $3,257,627; 1952-53, $4,773,616; 1953-54, $7,127,469. New Brunswick coal: 1949-50, $3,941; 1950-51, $1,989; 1951-52, $2,423; 1952-53, $3,719; 1953-54, $87,239.

3. Policy generally has remained that of providing transportation assistance to enable the Canadian coals to meet the competition from imported coals in designated market areas. Consistent with this policy subventions during the years concerned have been increased and extended. The changes in payment have been effected by the relevant orders in council enacted from time to time during the period in question and these changes have been recorded in the annual reports of the dominion coal board.

4. Figures are available showing coal shipments under subvention from Cape Breton, but by calendar year only. These figures are given below for the years concerned.

Tonnages and Costs of Cape Breton Coal Shipped Under Subvention

	Net Tons	Amount
1950	1,093,781	$ 929,625
1952	1,875,339	5,157,003
1953	1,809,247	5,960,764
1954	2,399,673	8,232,932

ST. JAMES, MAN., STORM SEWER

Mr. Churchill:

1. Is a storm sewer to be constructed from the Royal Canadian Air Force airfield in St. James to the Assiniboine river? If so, when and of what type?

2. What route will the proposed storm sewer follow through the municipality of St. James?

3. What is the estimated cost and what is the financial obligation, if any, of the municipality?

4. Has agreement been reached with the municipality as to the type of storm sewer?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. Yes. It is expected that construction will begin in the near future and that the sewer will probably be of the open cut type.

2. The exact route is still under consideration.

3. It is estimated that the cost of constructing the sewer will be epproximately $350,000. The municipality has no financial obligation in connection with this project.

4. An agreement was reached with the municipality for the point construction of a storm sewer to serve both the needs of the municipality and the R.C.A.F. station; however, the municipality has since advised that it wishes to withdraw from the agreement.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED INCREASE IN UNITED STATES TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of recent reports that legislation is being considered in the United States to provide for an increase in tariffs on lead and zinc does the government intend to make a protest in respect to this proposal?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): At the last session of congress somewhat similar proposals were introduced, and at that time the government made representations. I think it probable that the government will make representations on this occasion.

BRIDGES

ALLUMETTE ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Proudfoot (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works if the governments of Ontario and Quebec have signed the final agreements to build the Allumette bridge and, if so, when is work likely to start?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The answer to the first part of his question is yes, the governments of Ontario and Quebec have now joined with us in signing an agreement for the construction and subsequent maintenance of the proposed interprovincial bridge across the Ottawa river at Allumette island. Under the arrangement the federal Department of Public Works is preparing the plans for all the bridges involved and each government is to build its appropriate share. The federal government will build the centre span.

The plans for the Ontario portion were forwarded to the government of Ontario on March 11, 1955. They are being reviewed preliminary to tender call which should be ready early in April. The plans for the Quebec portion were forwarded to the government of Quebec on March 15, 1955, and it is anticipated that tenders will be called in the near future.

The federal Department of Public Works anticipates having the plans and specifications for the centre span completed and tenders invited by the latter part of May of this year.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO RECHECKS ON APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of complaints made with respect to Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments, can the minister give assurance that a farmer wishing a recheck may have the same on application to the P.F.A.A. office?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Yes. The general practice is that a municipality makes application for payments in townships within the municipality. A check is then made from the office at Regina and a decision rendered as to whether payment is to be made. After that announcement comes out appeals may be made, and are sometimes made on behalf of a whole township or on behalf of individuals. The practice is to check these from Regina. Anyone may apply to the Regina office, and unless there have been rechecks made before—and every complaint is already fairly well covered—further checks will be made.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHAPUT CASE—QUESTION OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) asked me the following question:

> Has the government received notice that the Chaput case will be heard at the next session of the supreme court? If so, does the federal government intend to intervene in this case as it did in the Alberta press act case to defend the basic and fundamental right of Canadian citizenship to enjoy freedom of worship, assembly, speech and person?

I replied yesterday as follows:

> We are aware that the Chaput case will be heard at the next sitting of the Supreme Court of Canada. But since my hon. friend has given me no notice of his question, and I am under the impression that in the Chaput case we have received a notice from the supreme court itself, I should like to make a statement tomorrow covering this point.

Unlike the Alberta press case to which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar referred in the question he asked me yesterday, the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of the Quebec court of queen's bench in the case of Chaput v. Romain, et al. arises out of private litigation in which the appellant sued the respondents for damages.

In this Supreme Court of Canada appeal the Attorney General of Canada has been served with a notice, given to the attorneys general of Canada and the provinces pursuant to a direction of the court, that the appellant will contend before the Supreme Court of Canada:

> —that the Constables Appointment Act (RSQ 1941 c. 48) and the Provincial Police Act (RSQ 1941 c. 47) and all statutes of the province of Quebec that purport to authorize this action on the part of the respondent police officers are illegal, ultra vires, and unconstitutional, both on their face and as construed and applied as being outside the powers vested in the province by the British North America Act and contrary to "An Act Respecting Rectories" (S.C. 1852 c. 175). That the said police powers, on their face and as construed and applied, are an unconstitutional invasion of freedom of worship, freedom of assembly and freedom of speech.

The Attorney General of Canada, pursuant to this notice, intends to be represented by counsel upon the argument of the appeal and to present such submissions as counsel may advise.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

> That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion gives us an opportunity each year to review some of the important international developments which have taken place, and more particularly Canada's relationship to those developments.

Altough I may be required to speak at some length, I doubt whether I shall be able to cover all the points which will be in the minds of hon. members; but if matters arise during the course of the discussion on which I have not touched in my review I shall of course be glad to do my best to deal with them when I wind up the debate. Even a partial summary of these developments will indicate—this will be no surprise to the house—that Canada's international responsibilities have increased, are increasing, and with international conditions as they are, are not likely to diminish in the foreseeable future.

There are a number of reasons for this trend. One of them, of course, is the growing interdependence of all peoples and this, among other things, is the direct result of modern technical and scientific developments, especially in communications, which show no sign of slowing down. These developments certainly increase man's mastery over nature, and could make possible greater material welfare than he has ever dreamed of; but they also increase and make even more complicated relationships between nations.

Another factor, of course, bearing on our increased responsibility has been the striking growth of our country in strength and in authority. This has made possible an increase in the influence which Canada can exert on the course of international affairs. That influence in this day of super powers is not, or is very rarely, decisive. It may not always be very important; but a country like Canada with a special and close relationship to London and to Washington has unique opportunities through normal diplomatic and governmental contacts and in other ways to exert on occasion a special influence on those capitals and thereby influence the course of events, and I hope in the right direction.

Our effectiveness in this regard, however, will depend not only on the way we accept and discharge our own international responsibilities but also on the reputation that we acquire and maintain for sound and objective judgment and action. In this respect we are, I think, very fortunate in having a good deal of credit on which to draw for use with both the United States and the United Kingdom governments and we should, of course, try not to dissipate it. A quick way to do that would be to issue bad cheques on that credit; and that applies to other countries, of course, in their relations with us.

These long term trends are continuing to emphasize the growing responsibility of Canada and other governments in the field of international relations, and in particular the responsibilities within our own governmental framework of the Department of External Affairs. In conditions of tension and cold war a country's foreign service is unquestionably a part of its first line of defence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something about the international situation within which the government's external policy has to operate. A few weeks ago, in connection with the debate on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany to NATO, the house had a full discussion of the situation in Europe, which I take it need not be repeated on this occasion. I might say, however, that since that time the process of ratification of the Paris agreements has gone ahead and at the present time parliamentary action has been completed in respect of that ratification by the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Norway, Iceland, Portugal, Greece, Turkey, Italy and Canada.

The final stage—I devoutly hope it will be the final stage—in parliamentary consideration of this matter in Paris is taking place today and tomorrow. I think that action will be taken within the next day or so by the French government, with similar action to be taken by a few other governments, which would then make possible the restoration of freedom and sovereignty for the Federal Republic of Germany and the accession of that government to the Atlantic community.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that on this particular occasion hon. members would wish me to concentrate on the Far East, where after all the majority of mankind live and which at this moment provides more than one area of tension.

I believe it is advisable to examine these tensions against the proper background of political and economic movement. I suppose from the long term point of view the most significant of all political developments of the past decade, or indeed possibly the past quarter century, has been the national awakening of the hundreds of millions in those nations and their insistent demand for economic, social and political progress for a better life.

The emergence of Asian independent states in India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Burma, Japan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Korea, Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia may well have the greatest possible significance to the future of humanity. So, too, but in a different way, may the development of a strong, centralized, despotic, communistic regime on the mainland of China. Canada has welcomed the growth of national freedom and democracy among the peoples of Asia, but the spread of communism in China and indeed in other parts of Asia and the actions of the communist rulers of the Peking regime that has now secured effective control of the Chinese mainland have caused deep and understandable anxiety in our own country and indeed in the whole of the non-communist world. At three points on the periphery of China there has been armed conflict in recent years, and in each case this has threatened the peace of the world. These three points are, of course, Indo-China, Korea and Formosa. I shall have something to say about each of these areas in a few minutes, but first I think it is important to put all of this in the framework of the growth of communism in Asia; which has ambitions to control and exploit the Asian peoples through a strong and autocratic communistic government in Peking. This problem of communism in Asia is certainly not a simple one, and there are no simple solutions for it. It will not be solved by merely denouncing it, and certainly not by ignoring it. It is more important to try and understand its origins and purposes and to discover the sources of its support.

The communist movement in Asia is not simply a conspiracy of evil and alien forces seeking power and domination; unfortunately it is more than that. It has secured too many followers who see in it, at least until they have acquired some experience of its workings in government, a means of improving the welfare and happiness of their own people and ensuring their freedom from western pressure and control. Therefore I feel we shall not make much appeal to the peoples of Asia unless we make clear to them that while we denounce communistic doctrines and methods we wholeheartedly support the ideals of these people for liberation from hunger, misery and outside domination.

To understand the people of Asia and to live in terms of friendship with them requires, of course, on our part and on the part of western peoples both patience and tolerance. It requires also an effort of imagination. We have to try to see ourselves as the Asians see us. It is difficult for us, for example, to understand the intense preoccupation of the people and the new leaders of free Asia with the question of colonialism and imperialism, because we know that the former imperial powers have already withdrawn or are not in a position to dominate, even if they would. The governments and peoples of those same erstwhile imperial powers are among our closest friends in the world and we see in them people who, far from being enemies of freedom, nourish it in Asia itself as elsewhere, and are now able and willing to assist new and unsteady regimes to master their political and economic problems.

From the facts of their own history Canadians should understand, however, the viewpoint of Asians that self-government is more important even than good government. We should understand also the mistrust and suspicions of those who for years have felt themselves—possibly not at all times justifiably—to be the victims of prejudice and at times of racial arrogance. If we remember these things now, we may be able better to understand why so many Asians fail to see as clearly as we do the gulf which divides communism from democracy, and why they are so reluctant to join our side without reservations.

Along with this feeling of nationalism and anti-colonialism which has contributed to the strength of communism in Asia, increasing attention is being paid now to the social and economic sources of communism. We have talked about this matter more than once in this house. It is, of course, an important aspect of the problem. No one would deny that hunger entices men to communism. The false promises of plenty are always an appealing argument to the destitute. We in the west have shown our awareness of this argument by various programs of economic and technical assistance. This assistance should help to reduce the impulse toward communism by raising the standard of living, and by proving that it is possible to do it without the loss of political freedom and within a democratic system.

But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we should not forget that these social and economic aspects are only one element of this complex problem. I think there is a danger of oversimplifying the issues in Asia in these terms. Confronted by the appalling defence and political problems involved in the emergence of a free Asia, it is easy to lapse into the comfortable belief that we can save Asia—and that is how it is often put—with economic aid alone; that we can buy off communism and purchase peace for ourselves merely by stepping up our economic assistance.

That, as I see it, is unhappily nothing but a comforting illusion; and in saying that I do not minimize the importance of such economic assistance. What we are seeking to do, of course, in the western world is help the Asian people to help themselves. That continent, I make bold to say, will not be saved or even, in the long run, helped by aimless assistance or by making political support a condition for such assistance, or by westerners attempting to assume the direction of political and economic forces in these Asian states, however benevolent their intentions. The danger to Asia comes from weaknesses which will not be removed merely by dumping in millions and millions of dollar or sterling aid for projects not carefully enough planned.

The west can help in this way, of course; but the west can help even more by cooperating in a partnership of mutual understanding, respect and support with genuine leaders of the Asian peoples. Democracy—and it does not necessarily need to be our type of parliamentary democracy—can be established in those areas only by the efforts of the people themselves. Therefore, as I see it, the main problem at this time for Asians is to organize, as some Asian states have done, governments and administrations which are strong enough, free enough and incorruptible enough to make use of western assistance and support in helping to establish the conditions of law and order, freedom and prosperity which alone can counter the appeal of communism.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any place where a more significant effort is being made to work out these problems with all their ramifications along all the sectors of this front than in Indo-China. I should therefore like to say a few words about the situation there, more particularly because of our participation, with India and Poland, in the supervision of the cease-fire settlements in Indo-China.

The settlement reached at Geneva last July comprised cease-fire agreements for Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia. These provided for the establishment of three separate international supervisory commissions, each made up of representatives of India, Poland and Canada, and each charged with the task of supervising the carrying out of the cease-fire agreement for the particular country to which it was assigned. In each case, however—and this point is sometimes forgotten—the execution of the terms of the cease-fire agreement is the responsibility of the two sides directly concerned. The international commissions have no enforcement powers and their functions are purely mediatory, judicial and supervisory.

In Viet Nam the main provisions of the cease-fire agreement for withdrawal and redeployment of French forces from north Viet Nam and Viet Minh forces from the south have so far been carried out reasonably well. This regroupment process which is to be completed, I believe, by May 18 has taken place without serious incident and is now well advanced. That is no mean achievement. I think we can take some satisfaction from the knowledge that the international commission, with Canadian membership, in its supervisory role and through mediation has helped to bring about this situation.

In relation to those clauses of the cease-fire agreement designed to maintain the military status quo and forbidding the introduction into Viet Nam of fresh troops, arms or munitions except on a restricted replacement basis, the international commission through its inspection teams, fixed and mobile, has tried to maintain a check on men and materials entering the country. It has taken some time to establish the inspection machinery which is required for this purpose, and I certainly am not yet in a position to say how effective it will prove to be.

In other parts of the world we have already had some experience with the difficulties encountered by international commissions with communist representation in an effort to police activities of this kind. Hence in Viet Nam, if one of the parties to the agreement is determined to circumvent these provisions of the agreement the international commission is not likely to be able to prevent it, though the inspection activities which are possible and which are being undertaken will certainly make, and indeed are making, violations more difficult.

With respect to those provisions of the cease-fire agreement relating to the right of democratic freedom and the movement of refugees, the record is not satisfactory. This has been a matter of great concern to us in view of our responsibility on this commission, because it has involved the fate of many thousands of Christians who have suddenly found themselves under the hard and intolerant rule of a communist administration. Our own representative on the Viet Nam commission has spared no effort to see to it that the commission does all within its power to facilitate the movement of persons from one zone to the other as is provided in the armistice agreement itself. In this the commission has had some success; but it has also encountered difficulties, particularly, it is fair to add, because of the obstructive tactics of the communist government in northern Viet Nam. But here again it must be remembered that the responsibility for carrying out the terms of the agreement rests solely with the parties, who must co-operate with at least a minimum of good faith if the provisions of the armistice are to be properly implemented. All the commission can do is mediate, supervise and conciliate; it cannot enforce.

Notwithstanding these limitations on its powers and certain delays and obstructions that it has encountered—and they all have not been in the north—it is true to say that thousands of refugees from the north are now free in southern Viet Nam because of the international commission. As a matter of fact I think there has been a movement southward of something near half a million refugees. Most of them of course went south before the commission was established.

Our responsibilities on the supervisory commission in Viet Nam do not at the present time extend beyond the supervision of the implementation of the cease-fire agreement. The governments represented on that commission have not received any invitation or directive from the Geneva conference powers with respect to the supervision of elections that are to take place in due course in Viet Nam, as envisaged in the final declaration of the Geneva conference. It is expected, however, that we will be asked to do this along with the other two governments represented on the commission. So far as we are concerned, the responsibilities and procedures regarding the holding of elections would have to be defined satisfactorily and clearly by agreement between the parties concerned before we would be willing to undertake specific tasks in that connection as members of an international commission.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word about Laos, the second of these three countries. The main problem facing the commission in Laos has to do with the two northern provinces of Phongsaly and Samneua where the fighting forces of the so-called Pathet Lao, which have communist support, were concentrated pending a political settlement and their subsequent reintegration into the national community of Laos. So far as these northern areas of Laos are concerned, all you have to do is look at a map of that part of the world to realize their strategic importance, standing as they do between northern Viet Nam and Thailand. These northern areas have been the scene of numerous incidents involving both the communist Pathet Lao forces on the one hand and the royal Laotian forces on the other, and for which the former must bear the main share of responsibility.

Unfortunately, the commission's teams have not always been able to investigate these incidents as promptly or as thoroughly as was desirable. There is always a lack of communication facilities in that part of the country, and I am bound to say there has been no lack of communist obstruction. It is to be hoped that this state of affairs, which has caused us real anxiety on the commission, will be remedied. On the whole, however, the military provisions of the Laotian agreement have been fairly satisfactorily carried out, and I think the presence in that country at this time of an international commission has done a great deal to prevent a recurrence of open and possibly serious hostilities.

The third country in which we are involved is Cambodia. Perhaps the most important problem there is reintegrating into the national community the indigenous resistance forces, which again have received communist support. It is our hope that Canada, as a member of that commission, will be able to help pave the way to a prosperous and peaceful future in that country. It was reported a few days ago in the press that the king of Cambodia abdicated because of the unjustified interference of the commission in domestic concerns of that country, more particularly in his desire to have the people vote on a new constitution. There is no ground for that charge, nor has there been any unwarranted interference of any kind by the commission in the domestic affairs of that country. Some intervention has been necessary under the terms of the armistice. The commission has not gone beyond those terms.

Before going on to other matters I should like to pay tribute, and I know the house will agree with me in this, to the very fine and unselfish work which is being done by our people in Indo-China, not only by the chief commissioner, a very distinguished Canadian who has served his country well both in peace and war, Mr. Sherwood Lett, and the other Canadian commissioners who are members of the external affairs department, but by all the members of our armed services and our foreign service, numbering now something over 160, who are in these three countries. Many of them have to work and live under conditions of discomfort, hardship and even danger. They are, however, carrying out their difficult assignments with resourcefulness, with devotion, with patience and skill. Theirs is an important contribution to the maintenance of peace in Indo-China, and they are making a fine impression wherever they work as representatives of Canada.

I should like particularly to pay my deep respect to the memory of Mr. Jack Thurrott, one of our department's foreign service officers, who had his promising career cut short in Indo-China when he met with a tragic accident while serving as political adviser to the Canadian commissioner in Laos.

To the question as to how long Canadians are committed to serve with these commissions in these far-off countries, the very names of which were unfamiliar to most of our people only a short time ago, there is no simple answer. The agreements themselves are not specific on the point. We intend to keep our representatives there as long, but only as long, as they can make a useful contribution to the implementation of the armistice agreement reached at Geneva, and therefore to peace in that part of the world.

The second sector of the three I have mentioned is Korea. The last time I reported to the house on Korea was on June 11 last. I said then, referring to the Geneva conference which was then meeting, that if some satisfactory answers were not soon forthcoming from the communist side of that conference on the matter of free elections and all that implied, and if the communist powers at Geneva were not prepared to agree to international supervision of an election by a workable commission acceptable to the United Nations and composed of genuine neutrals, the United Nations side might shortly have to consider whether it was worth while continuing the effort at Geneva to reach agreement for the peaceful unification of Korea.

Shortly after I made that statement the communist representatives at Geneva made it crystal clear that they would neither agree to a Korea united through genuinely free elections nor accept the mandate of the United Nations mission in the divided peninsula. So the conference ended on June 15, as there was no useful purpose to be served in continuing it.

Subsequently the participating member states on our side informed the United Nations in a joint report of the failure of the conference. When the last session of the general assembly reached the Korean item on its agenda the communists had not at that time given any indication of a change in their position, so the assembly could make no move last autumn in New York toward the achievement of peace and unification on any satisfactory basis. All that could be done was to pass a resolution, and that was done by a vote of 50 to 5, approving the report reaffirming the United Nations objective in Korea, and expressing the hope that progress toward this might soon be made. Should the communist position on these matters change we would favour resumption of negotiations.

How could such negotiations best be conducted if the circumstances were propitious for them? The Korean question remains before the United Nations; yet it is clear now, of course, that it cannot be peacefully resolved without the concurrence of the North Korean and Chinese communist governments, governments which are not members of the United Nations and which have defied its charter.

At Geneva negotiations were conducted outside of the United Nations but in conformity with its principles. If further efforts to unify Korea peacefully are to be made then the United Nations will have to face the problem of finding an acceptable procedure for sponsoring negotiations which, to have any chance of success, will have to include these two non-members, North Korea and communist China.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I should say something about Formosa, the third sector of what I might call this Far Eastern front. I should like to try to explain as briefly as possible why the situation which has arisen in the Formosa strait is so worrying, and indeed so potentially explosive; particularly our own concern with and relationship to that situation. On the substance of the matter I have not very much to add to what I said in the house in January and last month, because the policy I stated then has not been altered. But there have been certain new developments.

It is reassuring, for instance, that the evacuation of thousands of civilians and soldiers from the Tachen and Nankishen islands has taken place without any serious incident. The decision to evacuate these islands was, if not an easy one, certainly a wise one for the Chinese nationalist government to make. The Chinese communists wisely did not attempt to interfere with these operations. Their completion without warlike incident does show at least that hostilities can be avoided in operations of this kind if restraint is exercised on both sides.

There is naturally much concern in all our minds—and that concern has been voiced in the house—as to what the Chinese communists have in mind regarding Formosa and those few coastal islands which still remain in the hands of the Chinese nationalists. It is devoutly to be hoped that the Chinese communists do not, by the use of force, renew the war over those islands, the consequences of which might spread further. Yet their words do not give us much comfort in this regard, if we are to judge their future actions by their past words.

It has been argued, especially by some of our Asian friends, that the leaders of the Peking government are inspired more by Chinese than by communist aspirations; more by the desire to work out a national revolution than to precipitate an international one by interference in the affairs of their neighbours. True, they have embarked—that is the Peking government—upon an enormous program of industrial and agricultural development, and it would seem foolhardy for them to risk all this in military adventures. Unfortunately, however, it is not possible to count upon the wisdom or restraint of a regime of this kind. The combination of national revolutionary fervour with the messianic delusions of communist ideology have in the past and can in the future prove dangerous. The Chinese communists may not be intent upon a career of Asian aggression and expansion, but their determination to pursue what they claim to be their legitimate interests has already led them to ignore the legitimate interests and security of other peoples, and may do so again. And that possibility certainly contains a serious threat to peace.

And so we cannot ignore in this connection the communist intention, loudly and frequently proclaimed, to attack and occupy Formosa and the islands. We can, however, having regard to declared United States policy to help in the defence of Formosa, retain strong doubts about their capacity to achieve this objective in the near future by any direct assault. To maintain an amphibious or airborne attack 100 miles across the Formosa strait would be a hazardous operation for a land power like communist China and would certainly strain its as yet limited resources, much more than did the operations in Korea.

The chairman of the United States joint chiefs of staff, Admiral Radford, was asked in an interview a few weeks ago what he thought of the Chinese communists' ability to carry out their threat to, as they put it, liberate Formosa. Admiral Radford's reply was:

> They cannot do it at this time. They just do not have the military capability to carry out an amphibious operation of the scale required, particularly in view of the announced United States position and the immediate availability of United States naval and air forces to counter such an operation.

That was Admiral Radford's conclusion, and that same conclusion has led many to doubt that the communists have in mind an invasion of the coastal islands of Quemoy and Matsu as a prelude to or part of an attack on Formosa. In any event, it would be tragic if widespread hostilities, or indeed hostilities of any kind, were to develop over the possession of these two islands which are, in effect, part of the Chinese mainland, and the strategic role of which would seem to be more important in the defence of that mainland against attack than in offensive action against Formosa and the Pescadores.

This problem of Formosa and the coastal islands is one of the most difficult which the free world at this moment has to face. It is one on which it is possible for friends and allies to honestly hold different opinions. Although the basic issues between the free world and the communist world are clear enough, we have here a dispute in which that clarity is not, to say the least, obvious. On the one hand, I think we have to recognize that in dangerous times like these positions which are demonstrably of tactical or strategic advantage in the struggle with communist aggression or imperialism cannot lightly be abandoned in the face of communist threats by those who hold them. Formosa is considered by many to be one such important position. There is also—and this has been particularly emphasized in Washington—the political problem arising out of the bad effect on morale in Formosa and in neighbouring free Asian states, if further losses or retreats take place in the face of Chinese communist attack or pressure, or both.

Then, finally, the people of Formosa, about whom we do not hear very much, unfortunately, in connection with these matters, and those Chinese from the mainland who have fled there from communism, have a claim to consideration, both in respect of proposals to hand them over to a communist regime against their will, and in respect of proposals to involve them in a Chinese civil war without any regard to their own wishes.

So, in a situation as complex as that, it is not surprising that there are doubts and divisions among the governments and the peoples of the non-communist world. But it would be a sorry development if these were allowed to split or seriously weaken our peace coalition. It is true that some members of that coalition, including Canada, cannot subscribe to all aspects of United States policy in this Asian area, especially in regard to the coastal islands. But we are certain, I am sure, that that policy is not intended to lead to conflict. Personally I am satisfied that those who are directing it in Washington feel that it will help to avoid rather than provoke conflict.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, it is United States policy determined by the United States and embodied in a bilateral security treaty which she has signed with the Chinese nationalist government. Canada, of course, is not a party to or not committed by that treaty or that policy. We certainly have the right to comment on that policy but we should be careful, I suggest, that our comments on it are constructive and responsible, and not merely negative and divisive. Carping and unbalanced criticism is, to say the least, unhelpful at this time, or indeed at any time.

What is the United States position? In regard to Formosa itself, as I have said, the United States is firmly committed to its defence by treaty, even though the legal and political status of that island may be uncertain. But—and this is often forgotten—that same treaty gives the United States the right to restrain aggressive Chinese nationalist action from Formosa.

What about the coastal islands of Quemoy and Matsu, the immediate point of armed conflict between the two Chinas, and therefore the point of most immediate danger? United States policy here is based on acceptance of the responsibility to make secure and protect "positions and territories" which, in the judgment of the President, "are necessary to, or related to the defence of Formosa." That does not involve a commitment or a purpose, as Mr. Dulles put it in New York on February 17, to "defend the coastal islands, as such"; but, he added, the Chinese communists themselves have "linked the coastal positions to the defence of Formosa". Therefore, in his own words, the United States "will be alert to Chinese communist actions, rejecting for ourselves any initiative of warlike deeds".

As I understand it, this is a warning to the Peking government not to use force against these islands, preparatory to attack or as a build-up for an attack on Formosa. The President alone has the power to decide at the time whether such an attack is local against the islands or a stage in an assault on Formosa itself. Mr. Dulles restated that position on March 8, and he added something to his earlier statement when, in discussing the responsibility of the President in this matter, he said:

> How to implement this flexible defence of Formosa the President will decide in the light of his judgment as to the over-all value of certain coastal positions to the defence of Formosa and the cost of holding these positions.

Well, that is not going to be an easy decision for the President to make if unfortunately the time ever arises that he has to make it. If it has to be made, I am glad the decision is in the hands of a man like President Eisenhower, a man of character and integrity, with a passion for peace.

On their part, the Chinese communists insist that these islands are part of the mainland of their own country and that if Chiang Kai-shek's troops do not evacuate them they will be driven out.

The possibility of serious trouble arising out of these conflicting positions is obvious and creates understandable and real anxiety, because the consequences might involve more than the two Chinese governments.

The Canadian position on this matter has been stated in the house, Mr. Speaker. We have accepted no commitment to share in the defence of either Formosa or the coastal islands, or to intervene in any struggle between the two Chinese governments for possession of these offshore islands. Our obligations in this matter arise only out of our responsibilities as a member of the United Nations, and I have stated in this house what those are. We also think that a distinction, politically and strategically, can be made between Formosa and the coastal islands; also indeed between Formosa and Korea. Nevertheless, the fact that we have no commitments certainly does not mean that we have no concern. We have a deep and abiding concern because of considerations which make isolation from these questions wellnigh impossible.

There is first our general concern with peace and anything that might threaten it. Then there is our special concern with United States policy from the consequences of which Canada, a North American country, cannot escape. Finally there is our close concern with anything that weakens—as this question may—that coalition the strength and unity of which, under the leadership of the United States, is at present the strongest deterrent against communist aggression and war.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, only recently, as many others have said before me, that it would be impossible, in my view, for either the United States or Canada to be neutral if the people of the other country were engaged in a major war in which their very existence as a people was at stake, and that in working out our foreign and our defence policies we can never forget that fact. By "we" I mean the United States as well as Canada. I think that is self-evident. It is one of the facts of international life which we, and indeed other countries, have accepted. We in Canada have already recognized that fact by our membership in NATO. We have recognized it also in our North American continental defence arrangements which are and must be, to be effective, on a joint basis and closely co-operative.

Canadians, and I believe Americans also, understand and accept the inescapable interdependence of Canada and the United States in the policies required for our joint security and for the preservation of peace. We cannot, therefore, isolate ourselves from the implications of that interdependence, if either country were ever attacked by an aggressor. If these implications at times cause anxiety on our part, as they do, we certainly would have far greater cause for anxiety if there were no recognition across the border of any such mutual security and defence relationship, or no recognition of our right to make our views known on matters which may be primarily the responsibility of Washington.

There are two main reasons, I think, why the people of Canada do understand and accept this situation. The first is that any war in which we were jointly engaged would be a defensive one. It is inconceivable to Canadians, it is inconceivable certainly to me, that the United States would ever initiate an aggressive war. It is also inconceivable that Canada would ever take part in such a war.

The second reason, as I see it, is that the only aggressive force that threatens us today, or that could commit a major aggression, is communist imperialism. Does anybody believe that we could or should keep out of an all-out struggle precipitated by communist aggressive power which, if victorious, would end everything that makes for free and decent existence?

That, then, Mr. Speaker, is the meaning of the proposition I have advanced, of the inevitability of close, co-operative arrangements with the United States in maintaining the peace and in joint defence against a major attack. This means, as the United Nations and NATO meant, that our right to be neutral has been limited by our desire to strengthen the security of our country and protect the peace. It does not mean, although I have heard it misstated in these terms, that whenever the United States is engaged in any kind of war, we are at war.

Only the other day I was reading an editorial in a Canadian paper which analysed very correctly what I was trying to say in Toronto the other day. After reading that editorial I went on to read a news story about the same subject and over that news story in large red type were these words: "U.S. Wars are ours". Nothing I have said today, or nothing I have said before, means that.

It certainly does not mean that we must participate in limited or peripheral wars, although because of the danger of such wars spreading it gives us the right and the duty to express our concern, not only in Washington but also in London or in the United Nations or in NATO, over situations or policies that might lead to conflict. It also makes it imperative on all of us to prevent local conflicts, not only because they are war —war is war whether local or general—but also because they can spread and cover the world. In that case there would be no future for any of us, because a war that covered the world would be a nuclear war.

This view that we could not be neutral in a major war when the very existence of the people of the United States was at stake, far from representing an abdication of responsibility for our foreign policy, extends and deepens that responsibility. It underlines our right and our obligation to concern ourselves with and make our views known on the policies of others, especially of the United States, when questions of peace and war are involved. Its possession of the greatest power in the world gives us, I think, the right to be especially preoccupied with the policies of the United States. It makes consultation and a continuous exchange of views imperative. It emphasizes our obligation to do everything possible to avoid every kind of war, big or little.

That is one reason why we were so glad to welcome to Ottawa in recent days the secretary of state of the United States, and to discuss with him very frankly and very fully United States policy and our own policy on these matters. It has been argued—I commend this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—that if the Americans know we accept the proposition that in the circumstances I have mentioned Canada and the United States must stand together, Washington will no longer pay much if any attention to anything we say; they will, if I may use a colloquialism, feel that they have us in the bag. Of course the exact contrary is the case, as is shown by the reply Mr. Dulles made to a question asked at his press conference in this city last Friday. I should like to put this question and answer on the record, and I quote:

Q. Mr. Pearson said that in the event of a major war it would be impossible for Canada to stand aloof if the United States was at war. Some people interpreted that to mean the United States can now count on Canada in an emergency and therefore you will not pay as much attention to any protest against American foreign policy you get from Ottawa.

A. It is decidedly not true. The extent to which our countries can count upon each other depends primarily upon whether or not we each conduct ourselves in a way which wins the moral approval and support of the other.

Then he went on:

Now there are, to be sure, explicit engagements which are expressed in the North Atlantic treaty. Aside from that, the question of whether we support each other depends on the judgment that each country has of the other. I would not expect that Canada would blindly support the United States and I suppose the Canadian people would not expect to count on the support of the United States if they should engage in a venture which alienated public opinion in the United States.

It is highly unlikely that those contingencies will occur, because we do have the same ideals, and because we do keep in touch with each other. Common action depends, for its mainspring, upon what our declaration of independence calls "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind". That relationship makes it sure that each of our countries will seek and pay heed to the views of the other.

Mr. Dulles also had something interesting to say in reply to one other question at the same conference, and I quote:

Q. Mr. Secretary, in the present situation around Formosa and the offshore islands, if something should arise does the United States count on the support of Canada?

A. That is entirely a matter for the Canadians to decide for themselves. There are no treaty engagements of any kind other than perhaps the United Nations charter which create any obligations on the part of Canada in relation to that part of the world. Therefore, we do not count on them in the sense that there is any obligation or undertaking. Naturally, we always hope and believe that our conduct will be such as to win the moral support and approval of other free nations, and particularly of the Canadian people.

While believing strongly in the view that the destinies of our two countries are intertwined in the way I have already indicated and as Mr. Dulles has indicated, as well as many others, I want to reaffirm my view that we could not stand aloof from a major war which threatened the very existence of the people of the United States; but I must add in all frankness that I do not consider a conflict between two Chinese governments for possession of these Chinese coastal islands, Quemoy or the Matsus, to be such a situation, or one requiring any Canadian intervention in support of the Chinese nationalist regime. That view has already been made known more than once to our friends in Washington.

What I fear most in this matter is that even limited intervention, defensive in purpose, by the United States might have a chain reaction with unforeseen consequences which would cause the conflict to spread far beyond the locality where it began, and even across the ocean. If a little war were to spread like this it could become literally the little war before the last. That is why, may I repeat, we in Canada are definitely and deeply concerned in this particular issue, as we would be in any other peripheral conflict involving the United States, even though we might have no commitments in regard to it which would put us under any obligation for participation, except that which would flow out of our United Nations membership.

That is also one of the reasons we have to keep in the closest possible touch with Washington, as well as with London and New Delhi and other friendly capitals, on all these matters, and more particularly on these Formosan matters. I have personally more than once made known our views, our serious doubts and anxieties to the secretary of state on this matter and have received from him a full statement of the United States position and the reason it has been adopted. He has confirmed the view, which I have already expressed, that there is no aggressive purpose of any kind behind that United States position.

It seems to me that the first requirement at the moment for the avoidance of conflict is for both Chinese sides to refrain from using force, particularly—this is the immediate danger point—against or from the coastal islands, but also against or from Formosa. We can certainly agree, I think, with Mr. Dulles when he said in New York in that speech which I have already mentioned:

> We do not expect the Chinese communists to renounce their ambitions. However, might they not renounce their efforts to realize their goals by force?

If the Chinese communists have a case in this matter, then there are ways and means by which civilized countries can attempt peacefully to settle these disputes, both inside and outside the United Nations. An effort has already been launched in the security council to bring about a cease-fire as a preliminary to a political settlement based on reason and justice. The response to this initiative by the Peking regime was a summary refusal, but the council has shown great restraint in order to keep the door open for a peaceful solution whenever this can be obtained.

For the moment, however, I think there is a greater chance of finding a solution by direct diplomatic negotiation, which is presently going on, than by the use of the security council or even by calling a conference outside the United Nations. The main difficulty in the first case, a meeting of the security council, arises over the fact that the Chinese communist government is not a member of the United Nations and now refuses to participate in a United Nations meeting at which China is represented by the Chinese nationalist government. The main difficulty in the second case, a conference outside the United Nations, is, I think, that it would be premature at this juncture, even if it were possible to get the two Chinese governments into the same room.

Although efforts that have been made have not yet resulted in any solution, we do not need to despair or abandon these efforts, which as I have said are taking place through diplomatic channels. What has been accomplished has revealed indications on the communist side of at least a desire to avoid all-out war.

In the age of the hydrogen bomb a readiness to negotiate may be inspired not by love but by fear. Whatever may be the cause, there is some reason to hope that all the parties concerned may at least be looking for a solution which they could dare to accept. If this is the case, then it would be great folly to miss any opportunity for negotiation which might present itself; even worse folly to destroy all such peaceful possibility by falling back again on the use of force. If a settlement could be reached over this most acute of all recent disputes, the free world might conceivably find itself in a position from which it could proceed, even if slowly, laboriously and fitfully, to establish a framework of peace and political stability in the Far East. The search for that peace and stability may require strong defences, but no solution will be found merely by putting a sterile reliance exclusively on those defences. That is one reason why I should say a few words, Mr. Speaker, about the disarmament discussion which is taking place in London at the present time, and concerning which some questions have been asked in this house.

As hon. members know, there is a subcommittee of five powers, and Canada is one of them, now meeting in London to discuss the limitation of armaments that are now ironically called both conventional and atomic weapons. That subcommission of five is meeting again after having met last spring as a result of a United Nations assembly resolution last fall with which my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) had a great deal to do. That meeting in London is taking place in the awful shadow of the hydrogen bomb, which should be incentive enough for achievement. Hon. members will recall that last spring four-power proposals were put forward for limitation of armaments, atomic and conventional, by stages, with effective and complete control and inspection at every stage.

I cannot say much about what is going on in London because those meetings are being held in confidence; and although Pravda in Moscow, the organ of the Soviet government, has today given a contentious and distorted account of what is happening there and has broken the confidence to that extent, I do not propose to follow that example. I can say, however, as I said the other day, that while the lack of progress is discouraging that is no reason why we should call off the negotiations. It is far too early to say yet that these negotiations must break down in failure and futility. There is every reason why they should not. If they can only succeed in taking one step forward that would do something to remove that fear in the world which is the father of armaments.

It may also be, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to go into the details of this, that the introduction of the H-bomb into these discussions has really brought in a new element, and it may be that all of us will have to take a new look at this problem. The approach we have been making in the past has depended for any success on an agreement over a complete and foolproof system of international control. That is going to be more difficult than ever in the light of these new weapons which lend themselves even less than previous weapons did to such inspection and control. But without some kind of control and inspection which would give us a basis for confidence in any agreements reached being observed, any disarmament proposals under the present circumstances of fear and contention would merely be a cruel and hypocritical delusion and could be put forward only for propaganda.

The stakes are too high in this matter to call any discussions off quickly. We are told by scientists there is no means of ensuring complete or even adequate defence against these nuclear weapons and the means of carrying and dropping them on great masses of people. Therefore we must concentrate more than ever not only, I suggest, on the limitation of armaments, important though that may be, but in the search for measures which will prevent war itself. What is certain is that the control of our power to destroy ourselves is a subject of such desperate importance that if either side should use it as a means of propaganda or counter-propaganda it would be utter folly and might be supreme tragedy.

There are some who get comfort out of the conclusion that those new weapons are so annihilating that no side will dare use them if it is certain that the other side will retaliate and has preserved the means to do so against surprise destruction. It was said by an authority whose words we always respect—I refer to Sir Winston Churchill—in the House of Commons in London the other day:

> "It was an ironic fact that we had reached a stage where safety might well be the child of terror and life the twin brother of annihilation."

In other words, according to this view peace instead of resting on a balance of power now rests on a balance of terror. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in one sense it is true that the greatest deterrent against a general war, although not against a limited one, is the certainty of nuclear retaliation. In present circumstances that may be our best safeguard. If that is true it may give us some time which can and must be used for continuing the persistent and patient search for the solution to international problems and for the easing of international tensions. If we do not find such agreement and understanding then peace, such as it is, will be balanced on a hydrogen bomb or, to use the words which Mr. Nehru used a few weeks ago in London:

> "Mankind would be doomed to hover indefinitely on the brink of catastrophe."

To avoid such a fate, Mr. Speaker, demands, and I know it will receive, all the support, all the strength, the energy, wisdom and faith of every member of this house.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say to my hon. friend that he has covered several of the issues with clarity and authority, but there is one matter he did not deal with. No doubt the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will deal with that, pursuant to the promise he gave to the house in February—I refer to the commonwealth prime ministers' conference—so the house and the country will have some idea, over and above the sketchy outline that has been given to date, of what took place at that historic conference.

This debate affords the opportunity to discuss those matters that are of pre-eminent interest to the Canadian people, in the world of today, as well as to provide for the submission to the committee on external affairs of the estimates of the department. The minister stated that while Canada's influence is not always decisive, it is one of co-operation, and referred to the contribution made by the officials of his department in various parts of the world.

I think it is well that deserved tribute should be accorded to those who serve Canada in all parts of the world. When abroad I have had the privilege and opportunity of seeing the work done by members of the Canadian diplomatic corps. The career men are outstanding. Among others I think of Dana Wilgress, Mr. Robertson in London, Mr. Désy in Paris and Mr. Dupuy in Rome. These men and others that could be mentioned bring us honour by the representation they give Canada in those countries. If I may be allowed to do so I should like to refer to the contribution made by my own constituency in the persons of two former members of the bar in the city of Prince Albert, Mr. T. C. Davis and Mr. W. F. A. Turgeon, whose appointments have given satisfaction in the lands in which they have served and have redounded to the credit of Canada.

However, with respect to foreign representation, I feel that consideration should also be given to increasing the number of non-career diplomats, not to the extent that they constitute a majority, but to the end that the non-official mind will be available for the consideration of the problems that arise in the various countries in which they would represent Canada.

The minister referred to the increasing importance of Canada. That increasing importance has been shown by the fact that in recent weeks a number of outstanding leaders of world opinion have visited this country. Included in that number are the Prime Minister of Pakistan; the Prime Minister of Australia; Paul Henri Spaak of Belgium; the latest visitor to our country, John Foster Dulles—to whom I intend to refer in a moment—and today, the Prime Minister of Italy. The fact that they visit Canada and consult with the representatives of Canada is indicative of the importance of this country, in their view.

Mr. Dulles made a profound impression on Canadians during his recent visit. He spoke with authority, restraint, ability and a knowledge of world affairs that opened up new vistas in the thinking of those who were privileged to hear him and meet him. When he returned to Washington he used words that I think are particularly applicable on an occasion such as this, and are pertinent to the concluding remarks made by the minister:

> The goal of our nation's foreign policy is to enjoy in peace the blessings of liberty. Peace is the product of many wills and not merely of one alone. In the past it has been necessary to forgo peace in order to assure the possession of the blessings of liberty. We dare not be blind to the fact that that may happen again.

In those words are epitomized the words of the minister in the concluding paragraphs of his speech. One of the reasons for Canada's importance in the world is that we are the nearest neighbour of the United States and of the U.S.S.R. As Mr. Dulles said on the occasion of the press conference, the U.S.S.R. is unlikely to win a general war unless it can knock out quickly North America's industrial power, and for that reason measures must be taken by the United States and Canada—> —to assure that the great reservoir of the strength which resides in this continent shall not be subject to quick destruction.

The objective of our foreign policy is the achievement of peace. If ever there was a time when Canadians should speak with restraint and with a realization of the part that Canada will play in defence in the future should war ever come, that time is now. I feel that in this country there is a campaign of anti-American feeling, a dangerous luxury in the position in which Canadians are.

I shall refer to some events which have happened recently and which are discouraging. In southeast Asia the danger is great because of the march of communism and the industrialization of China that is taking place. With vast industrialization under way the pressure for markets in southeast Asia and Asia generally carries not only peril to the defence against communism, but is something to be considered by Japan, whose recent elections assured that communism has made no impression upon the people of that country.

The next two days are days of tremendous importance, as the French parliament faces the problem of the ratification of western European union. All will hope for the ratification by France of the organization of free nations that has been set up and without which peace in the world and a bulwark against communism may well be denied.

Yet there are other things that are favourable. I think one of the most symbolic moves in recent days, a move of great significance in a war-shadowed world, was made by President Eisenhower, to whom the minister referred in such proper terms, when in appointing Harold Stassen as secretary of disarmament he assured the world that the goal of the United States is peace. This is the first occasion in the history of mankind that a direct effort has been made to make peace one of the individual achievements and ideals of a country. On the other hand, of course, we have the statement of Zhukov a few days ago, on the occasion of the 37th anniversary of the Soviet army. He said that the aggressive forces of the imperialistic countries, headed by the United States monopolists, are openly preparing a new war against the Soviet union and the Chinese people's republic.

That is their story, but I believe the appointment of Mr. Stassen, with his magnificent record of unselfish service internationally, even if it does nothing else, will have a psychological effect in assuring doubtful peoples in various parts of the world that the United States does not have its finger on the trigger. The ratification of western European union by the various countries mentioned by the minister gives hope for the future. On the other hand, the mobilization of the U.S.S.R. and the seven puppet states that are today united in a military organization under Soviet command makes one pause.

No problem we face can be greater than this. Our aim and desire is peace, yet every minute of every day $165,000 is being expended throughout the world on armaments. That is the expenditure today on the preparation of armaments in every part of the world. One sometimes wonders whether Liddell Hart was not justified in the statement he made the other day, that it is very questionable whether much of the defence planning and expenditure since 1945 has been realistic.

I come now to the reference by the minister to the need of assistance to countries in Asia. He indicated that the armies of communism march on the empty stomachs of their potential recruits. I think it was Gandhi who, as I recall, said that to the millions who have to go without two meals a day the only acceptable form in which God dares appear is food. The minister spoke of the solicitude of the government, the fact that hunger entices men, and communism is thereby encouraged.

I ask the minister whether the precepts he has declared have been carried out in the recommendations of the government which he represents. What of the Colombo plan? What of this plan that is to assist mankind by raising living standards in various parts of the world? With pomp and ceremony the nations of the world met here last October. On that occasion the Prime Minister made a speech in the form of a prayer. He said:

> May an all-wise Providence, ever attentive to the efforts of men of good will, look with favour upon our efforts to assist each other.

As one newspaper said, graceful speeches do not feed hungry nations. One of them even went so far as to indicate that the minister alone of the members of the cabinet to which he belongs is a strong believer in the need of action in this direction. What are we doing? We are making pious declarations but are not coupling those declarations with effective action through votes in this connection placed before parliament. I do not believe in extravagant promises. My hon. friends to the left speak of a billion dollars.

Personally I think such a figure is as unrealistic as the present contribution of Canada is out of keeping with Canada's responsibilities.

The minister spoke in powerful language and phraseology of the tremendous advantages of movements such as this; yet the government of Canada intends this year to increase the contribution of each and every Canadian by 15 cents per person. That is an example of the precept not being matched by the performance. The total contribution being made by Canada in connection with technological advances and improvements in less fortunate lands will amount this year to $2.06 per person. I sometimes wonder whether the minister was affected by a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) a few short months ago. The Minister of Agriculture stated then that the situation in Asia was not very serious after all, since there were 100 million people in India who lived on a higher standard than did Canadians. That is not in keeping with the speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the house in 1950, on which occasion he used these words in support of the need of assistance under plans similar or analogous to the Colombo plan. He said, as found at page 131 of Hansard of February 22:

> The social and economic danger arises out of the fact that the people out there—

He is speaking of Asia.

> —are learning that independence is not enough.

Today he used words similar in kind but different in actuality.

> The agitation for freedom has stirred up in them other desires; for improvements in their conditions of life; for a change from distress, privation and even starvation; for a change from a life expectancy of 20 years and an average income of less than $50 a year. These new democratic governments are attempting to meet these new hungers, these new hopes, these new demands. There is danger not only to their own countries but to the rest of the world if they do not succeed in that attempt. But they are meeting these dangers as responsible, free, democratic governments, proceeding stage by stage without, as they progress, destroying the framework of society or of government.

I say to the minister that while his declarations are magnificent in their idealism he should do something to change the thinking of some of the ministers who sit with him, to the end that these ideals may be translated into effective action. No one can tell a serious-minded Canadian that Canada today is making the contribution in that connection which the demands of the times require.

Having said that, I pass on to an event that will occur during the coming months, the meeting in San Francisco of the United Nations. This afternoon I am going to deal with Canada's position under three heads. First, her position in the United Nations; second, her position in the commonwealth, to which I hope the Prime Minister will give his attention, and place before parliament a picture that is not as ambiguous and hazy as the one he presented a few weeks ago; and, finally, our position with relation to the United States of America in the co-operation which must, by reason of our geographical position, be maintained between us.

I ask the minister this: What is being done on the part of Canada to make a contribution to suggestions about alterations in the charter? I realize the difficulty. I realize the possibly insurmountable difficulties. Over the years it has been subjected to some 61 vetoes, a course of action that was never expected at San Francisco. There is the contention by the minister and also by the Prime Minister, when he returned from the old country, that possibly some of these matters might well be solved by secret diplomacy, by meetings outside the United Nations and by considerations beyond the United Nations, rather than through the instrumentality of the body that was set up for the purpose of making settlements of these matters.

Today there are many critics who say that the United Nations has become a debating society. I am not in agreement with them. But I do believe this, that on every occasion that secret diplomacy is resorted to, the authority and prestige of the United Nations is correspondingly reduced. I think Canada has followed a course that deserves commendation in one particular. Other countries more and more are by-passing the United Nations, in sending to that body representatives with other than cabinet rank. Canada has continued to be represented by two members of the government of this country. I believe that has been a course worthy of the aspirations of the United Nations and one that might well be emulated by those other countries that are members of that organization.

However, as I listened today as the minister outlined the question of Formosa, I could not but think that a considerable change has come over him since he delivered his speech the other day extra-murally in the city of Toronto. There has been a change in external affairs, particularly in Canada's position internationally, arising from the Formosa situation and also in consequence of our geographical position.

Mr. Dulles upon his return to Washington indicated there that the situation was serious in the Far East. The minister today used the expression "explosive". When Mr. Dulles came back from Asia he said he came back with foreboding which was analogous to that of an irresistible force about to meet an immovable object. He was asked to speculate on the question as to whether or not, with the uncertainties of the Chinese mind, war might result from the stand being taken regarding Formosa and the two islands of Quemoy and Matsu. He said, narratively, that collision might take place next week, next year, or perhaps never.

The minister says he is not in agreement with the stand being taken by the United States. That stand is a unilateral one so far as the United States is concerned. It has assumed responsibilities that, for generations, were discharged by the British. Today in Asia, by reason of its assumption of world power, it finds itself making decisions which are fearful in their import and dangerous in their possible consequences.

The minister pointed out the wording of Mr. Dulles' statement of the United States position, that an attack on Quemoy and Matsu as such—and he emphasized those two words—would not necessarily bring the United States into active conflict with the Chinese communists. In other words the position appears to be somewhat ambiguous. If in attacking those two islands the communists intend to use them as bases for an attack on Formosa, then as such they have conducted that provocation which inevitably, if United States policy is carried out, will lead to resistance by the United States. Indeed the power given to the President is such that he may proceed only if the conclusion to which he comes is that the steps being taken against those islands would indeed be steps indicative of an intention to proceed.

The United States sees that China is mobilizing industrially and agriculturally in a plan for the future, as no other nation in the world is mobilizing today. Communist China has tasted what the communists believe to have been a victory in Korea. The recital by the minister as to the situation in Korea might give colour to their belief. They believe that they are impregnable and irresistible. They take the view that the United States is irresolute because it did not stand at the Yalu river in 1950. They contend, in a propaganda way, that the United States welshed in Indo-China in 1954, and that the request to the Chiang Kai-shek government to relinquish the Tachen islands was indicative of irresolution and fear.

The minister says the situation in Formosa is potentially explosive. What message did he give today? When he spoke in Toronto a few days ago he used words that indicate a changed attitude on the part of Canada. I have his speech before me. Referring to the matter of continental defence he said:

> Twice in this century Canada has been involved in a major war, locked in a life and death struggle for a period of two years or more before our American neighbours came in. Today I think that the neutrality of either of us, if the other were engaged in a major war in which its very existence were at stake, would be unthinkable. That is a tremendous change, and one which must affect all our policies and relations with the United States.

Today, I suggest with respect that policy has been watered down in the face of some criticism within this country. Today it is watered down by the use of the words that if, in consequence of aggressive action on the part of any nation, a major war follows, Canada could not in these circumstances be neutral. I believe the stand he took the other day in Toronto was one that commended itself generally to the Canadian people. But today the realism of last week appears to have been dissipated in the events that have taken place since. I for one cannot understand the addition of the extra words today in determining what Canada's policy should be.

A few weeks ago there was serious disagreement between Britain and the United States—at least so the press reported—but in the intervening days of the last three or four weeks, and particularly from the time that the Prime Minister attended the conference in London, there has been a narrowing of disagreement as between the views of the British government and the views of the United States government. Sir Anthony Eden made his declaration in parliament on March 8.

> He stated his belief, with all the conviction in his power, that the United States government wished to see conditions created which would put an end to active military hostilities in the area and reduce the dangers of a wider conflict.

Then he went on to say that he hoped the Chinese government would refrain from continuing its claim on the Matsus. Then the foreign secretary continued in these words:

> Her Majesty's government trusted that they would continue to exercise this restraint and that they would make it apparent that, while maintaining intact in all respects their position in regard to Formosa and the Pescadores, they would not prosecute their claims by forceful means.

Finally he went on to say this:

> It was equally desirable that the Chinese nationalists should also do two things: we should like to see them withdraw their armed forces from the other coastal islands; we should hope they would let it be known that they, too, while maintaining their claims, would not prosecute them by forceful means and would abstain from all offensive military action.

I believe that in those words Britain took almost the same position as that taken by the United States.

The other day the minister dealt at some length with Canada's position in reference to the North American continent. This matter comes up for consideration particularly at this time; for in Canada's position with regard to her two neighbours, the great antagonists in the world of ideology, no one with a sense of reality could come to any other conclusion than that in any war in which the United States finds itself, with the U.S.S.R. on one side and the U.S.A. on the other, there can be no neutrality. But my hon. friend endeavours to leave the impression that if something should spring up in consequence of the difficulties between communist China and Chiang Kai-shek, it would be a bush fire. He has but to read the words of Molotov in which he stated that the situation in Asia was of equal concern to the U.S.S.R. In that case it is but fantasy to say that what might happen over there would not become an all-embracing conflict. If that comes, Canada's northland, which generations believed was a tundra of waste, will become the backbone of freedom's defence.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) chose the day of the external affairs debate, no doubt advisedly by reason of that fact, to place before the house the atomic energy policy of this country. Think of the vast uranium developments in northern Saskatchewan, where a few years ago there was no mineral development. Canada is in large measure the source of the uranium indispensable for modern war. With respect to Eldorado in northern Saskatchewan, I would suggest to the government that further consideration should be given to the preservation of that great monument to national endeavour, that necessary supply dump of uranium, to use the expression in its widest sense. Consideration should be given to the danger inherent in the fact that two of the heads of the union there are indeed communists, and do not deny that they are.

Let me pass on from there, sir, to the question of continental defence. The Prime Minister made in London several speeches that have never been elucidated or unveiled in the House of Commons since his return. Apparently there was some discussion in Britain regarding the contribution that Canada might make in connection with continental defence and also regarding the setting up of a strategic reserve available for service in the danger spots of the world. The Prime Minister pointed out, as was reported by three or four of Canada's outstanding reporters in the press who were in attendance in London—

Mr. St. Laurent: But not at the meetings.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no. It is true that they were not at the meetings, but there is such a similarity that it indicates someone in high authority, this anonymous somebody, sir, that invariably flies the kites for the government, did so on this occasion and furnished the information. The first was Mr. Jack Stepler, who stated—it is all in the narrative form—that the Prime Minister appeared before the commonwealth prime ministers' meeting and dealt with the question of defence.

And most impressive was Canada's contribution to northern defence through the three lines of early warning stations, where the $200 million spent on only the mid-Canada line is comparable to the New Zealand defence budget.

Mr. St. Laurent: I have already denied in the house, Mr. Speaker, the accuracy of that report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see. I have three more reports that will have to be denied. Mr. A. O. Tate, of the Toronto Star, a newspaper that seems to have an unusual capacity to think as the government is thinking, said this. I take it that this, too, is denied.

The Prime Minister pointed out that the Canadian people spent $200 million on only one phase of continental defence.

Then there are two others to the same effect. Miss Armstrong of the Toronto Telegram added that this person had been astounded by that information. There is nothing so secret about this except on the part of the Canadian government. There is a suggestion that there is something, oh so hush-hush, in what is being done in northern Canada. I have before me the Victoria Colonist of February 20 in which are set forth the plans of these defence lines. I am not going to particularize, but it shows where the D.E.W. line will be built, it shows the Alaska line, it shows the mid-Canada line and the "Pinetree" line. It gives particulars and details of each of these constructions and of what contribution is being made by Canada.

Furthermore, United States papers are setting out similar details. Remember the Prime Minister was at the conference. Apparently when he was asked as to what Canada's contribution could be he indicated that she could not go beyond the limits of her wealth. In support of the argument that we were stretched to the limit he told of the tremendous expenditures being made in connection with continental air defence.

Strangely enough in the United States the report is that these great facilities for defence, these eyes of the watchdogs of radar equipped with the bark of radio transmission to all parts of the United States, are being built by the United States. The Chicago American of January 23 sets out in detail what is being done in northern Canada. Do you know what the source of the information was? They say in this house that one should not ask about this because of security reasons. The source of the information in the United States was the secretary of defence who told of the expenditures being made in Canada on continental air defence. He said that the expenditures would be from $500 million to $2,000 million in the next few years. He set forth in considerable detail what is being done in connection with these various fences that are being set up and also in connection with the central military agency which is being established to co-ordinate with the federal civil defence organization, the state civil defence agencies and other governmental agencies.

One does not want to pierce the security of this nation, but the Canadian people have the right to know with regard to the H-bomb what stage it has reached today, its destructiveness described so dramatically by the Prime Minister of Great Britain the other day when he tapped his dispatch box and said that the plutonium that could be confined within that box would enable any one nation which alone possessed the power that plutonium gives, to control the hearts, souls, and beings of mankind.

These pictures of the terror of the H-bomb have struck fear into the hearts of the people. They have given a new urgency to the need of the preservation of peace, as the minister said today. But he pointed out also another side that we do not know: Some trigger-happy Chinese communist, flushed with the victorious past of these crusaders for the building of that better world they dream of, might in a moment of weakness pull the trigger that would start the conflagration. It will then be too late for Canadians to know whether or not these lines of radar will give the security they are presumed to give.

There has been a tremendous change in the thinking of the government of Great Britain. The white paper does not disclose the emphasis on manpower in the armed forces. The 48 battalions of the reserve army in Great Britain are to be used, not as a military force but as an ancillary force for civil defence. Up to the present time we have no information as to whether, if the ultimate awfulness of H-bomb warfare comes, what has been done in the way of air defence will meet our expectations that out of this world disaster we will at least be assured the maximum of warning for the people of our nation.

In the United States, if press reports are correct, they have gone so far as to remove from the President the power and authority to make the declaration that this is indeed war. They have appointed General Chidlaw as air defence commander with headquarters near Denver. He has his fingers on all these radar warning screens in the north. He has the power to say "I declare a military emergency" and take immediate steps to defend the country.

I say again that no one wants to pierce the curtain of security. But that curtain of security should not be simply a means whereby the Canadian people are lulled into a sense of false security. Let the Prime Minister speak with that authority, as I said the other day, which his position gives in matters such as this and of such importance to the preservation of mankind.

When I hear people in this country casting slurs and sneers at the United States I wonder whether they have any realization of the world of today. Our relationships have not always been of the best. There have been disagreements; agreement in objective but disagreement in means, just as we sometimes find it difficult, separated by 18 feet of green carpet, to agree here.

With that same objective in mind it is interesting to go back to something which I came across the other day. Ordinarily I do not put quotations on Hansard, but this particular item does indicate the changes that have taken place in North America. In 1880 the New York Herald was conducting a campaign for the annexation of Canada to the United States for purely defensive reasons, and they said this:

> The Canadian keeps 43,365 men armed to the teeth; he has much garrison and field artillery of the most destructive kind; his multitudinous cavalry horses say ha! ha! to the trumpets;—

They had cavalry horses then too.

> —he calls up 14,000 new heroes every year for drill and is altogether a perilous enemy.

Those were the days when Canada had military service.

> And at his back the British lion stands ready to roar most thunderously, supported by legions of regular troops, and capable of sending forth swarms of gunboats to shell the lake and river cities of the union, while his big men of war bombard New York, Boston and the cities of the Atlantic coast. The army of the union is small and scattered over the Indian territory—

Then it goes on to say:

> Ogdensburg, Oswego, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago and a hundred smaller towns would endure bombardment, and perhaps be burned to the ground, before the Americans could make any defences worth talking about . . . The United States should strongly fortify the St. Lawrence frontier of New York and be ready to lay down the ruinous torpedo at a moment's notice.

That quotation from 1880, within the lifetime of many Canadians, represents an attitude of mind which time, common understanding, and a dedication to the principles of freedom have obliterated.

We have mutual devotion and trust. We are bound together in economic and military co-operation.

Those who speak loosely in what the minister described as unjust criticism, who always picture the United States as an aggressor, make no contribution today to the building of that unity without which there can be no survival. Here we are, side by side, common heirs of Westminster Hall and Independence Hall, with a common dedication to a liberty which Lincoln described as "Liberty not alone for the people of this country but hope to all the world for all future time".

If ever there was a time when we require a co-operative attitude it is now. I refer to a co-operative attitude wherein, while disagreeing, we can make clear, as the minister said Mr. Dulles made clear to him in personal conversation, our common objectives; wherein we can voice to friends our just criticism and in that way build a unity and develop a co-operative defence basis without which there can be no survival.

The nations in this partnership must retain absolutely their respective sovereignties over their own areas to join with the British commonwealth in singleness of purpose, strength and steadfastness. For without that dedication, freedom indeed may perish from the earth.

I sometimes think the major reason for the invidious attacks that are made on the United States by certain people is that the United States represents the greatest example of free enterprise which exists anywhere in the world.

Now I come to another part of the minister's speech. I should like to say a few words about it. That speech in Toronto should have been delivered in the House of Commons on the question of trade a long while ago. We on this side of the house have repeatedly pointed out that the attitude of the United States in raising quotas and limiting imports is not in keeping with our world responsibilities. On more than one occasion we indicated that interfering with our agricultural production machine in this country by the scheme of quota imposition was a denial of that spirit of co-operation which is necessary to the preservation of freedom.

The minister in that speech made blunt and unequivocal objections to the restrictions being imposed, but it is strange that strong terms were not used when agriculture was affected.

On the 8th of May the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) sent a strong message to the United States. Previously the tone of the messages that were sent, when agricultural products were interfered with, was, to say the least, lukewarm if not apathetic.

Today, the closing out of our oil products to the United States will not only have a serious consequence to the western oil industry but the restricting of imports to 250 million barrels a year to all countries of the world will weaken the defences of North America.

The United States must realize that it depends upon us as the safety deposit box of the minerals of North America from which they get all their asbestos and nickel; and, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) has often said, they depend on us for their manganese and in large measure their cobalt, 55 per cent of their lead, and 42 per cent of their copper, all of which commodities are necessary to the preservation of freedom through the instrumentality of strong armaments.

Doubtless the minister will have read the United States' newspaper reports of his address; scant attention was paid to that speech. Canada gave it widespread publicity; but apart from the Washington Post, the New York Times, the New York Herald and the Chicago Tribune there was very little reference to that speech which set out in clear terms a viewpoint with regard to our national survival that ought to have been expressed long ago. If it had been expressed three or four years ago it would have removed many of the criticisms that one hears today.

The GATT agreement with preservation of the restrictive rights now made legal cannot but result in artificial barriers being legalized in defence in a situation serious to the maintenance of unity and the preservation of our respective economic lives.

I feel that today Canada, with its resources, should be to a greater extent than ever before manufacturing these raw materials to provide the sinews of freedom and to ensure that these resources within Canada may be utilized for the benefit of freedom everywhere in the world among free nations.

In support of my view I take the 1952 Canada Year Book, which says in effect that we do not have today a balanced Canadian industrial economy.

It says:

> Less dependence on export of primary raw materials and agricultural products and more processing of these resources in Canada—

Here I cease quoting—would bring about a balanced Canadian economy that is needed today.

That is certainly needed in the period in which we live. It is needed in order to make Canada strong and to provide those sinews for our joint defence with the United States in the event of war. On the other hand, should war not come, as we hope and pray it will not, at least Canada will be making its contribution to the building of power and strength so that negotiations based on strength may be the result.

I wish to discuss one other matter before I conclude. I was surprised that the minister, who was present in London at the prime ministers' conference, did not inform the house of some of the things that happened there. He bestowed upon the commonwealth just a passing glance. He said in effect that we must trust our friends, the United States and Britain, and one or two others. That is not enough. That kind of thing does not have any realization of the contribution that the British commonwealth makes in the world of today. I think one of the finest terse descriptions ever given of this commonwealth was given by one of the reporters from Canada, namely James McCook, who described the power of the commonwealth, lacking as it does any material organization. During the meeting in London it was possible, because of the vastness and the world-encircling nature of the commonwealth, to communicate with other peoples with ease. If a communication was to be made with the United States of America, that would be done by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). If there was to be a communication with Chou En-lai to ascertain his views on any subject, Nehru was there to perform that task. If there was to be a communication with Molotov in the U.S.S.R., Sir Anthony Eden, by reason of his previous association, was in a position to make that communication.

There is one thing I should like to say here, and I digress for a moment. Today we have become so accustomed to the power and the authority of Sir Winston Churchill that we wonder how different things will be if he decides to resign at the apex of his power and his world authority. If he does resign let us remember that the British commonwealth has always had a leader available. That leader today, Sir Anthony Eden, was right in 1938; and in the Yalta revelations of the other day—the publication of which was as unjustifiable as it was unconscionable at this time—Eden stood out as the man at Yalta who was right in the views that he expressed and the attitude that he held towards Stalin and those associated with him.

I mention the commonwealth because the Department of External Affairs publishes a magazine External Affairs purporting to tell the story of what happens, although it is restricted; in the superimposed fine print at the top it is stated that only government views are expressed. But in the last few years we have seen so many examples of that chiselling away at the British commonwealth relationship that it is interesting to find that the external affairs department has joined the others who are always preserving us from something or other. In the August issue they join in describing "Dominion day" as "Canada day". It used to be done with regard to the telephone book. That is the way they knocked "Dominion" out of the "Dominion of Canada". Now they decide to alter the name "Dominion day" to make it "Canada day". It is not a fearful thing but it is indicative. July 1 is not Canada day. Lest someone say that I overstate the situation, I am going to quote from a book entitled "On Being Canadian". In it at page 112, reference is made to this question of the British connection, and it is not brushed aside in the way that is sometimes followed by certain members of the government. The British connection is necessary, says the Right Hon. Vincent Massey at page 100 of this book. I am going to read this because it answers so many of those who today find it necessary to play down our relationship within the commonwealth. This is what Massey says:

I feel sure from my own experience—

And that experience was a great one, including that as representative to Washington and representative of Canada during the days of war in London. He continues:

—that the fact that Canada appears on the international scene, not only as an important country on her own account, but also as a member of a great world association, lends her enhanced prestige. In the international world, prestige means influence.

As far as domestic affairs are concerned, there is a persistent illusion in the minds of some people that the British connection has somehow a limiting effect on our national growth; that the term "dominion" is derogatory to our national dignity.

Then he goes on to say this:

"Dominion" is only a word, and it has all but disappeared. In any event, it is important to consider things rather than their labels. In Canada we have certain institutions and traditions and characteristics which give us, whatever language we speak, our meaning as a separate country.

Then he says this, and it is extremely important in view of our relationship with the United States, fearful to some because they picture the day when that economic and defence relationship will lead to other relationships:

Without the British connection these things would steadily evaporate and we should have less and less significance as an individual state. How long—

—says the Right Hon. Vincent Massey,

—would a Canadian republic maintain its individuality here in North America? The forms of our sovereignty might be retained, but we should be caught inexorably by the southward undertow and completely assimilated to American life. It is thus true to say that the British connection is essential to Canadian independence; we are the more Canadian for being British.

In those words, based on an experience of public service unequalled in our country, the Right Hon. Vincent Massey has not made statements that are not worthy of the serious consideration of Canadians in general and of parliament in particular.

Then what about Dominion day? The magazine External Affairs is afraid of that word "Dominion" in Dominion day. Dominion day was not changed by parliament. What does Mr. Massey say? At page 176 he says this:

If we abandon the old name, "Dominion day", for some new and meaningless phrase, as we nearly did officially in 1946, will it be because we have forgotten the significance of that moment eighty years ago when we took the first step towards full nationhood? In effect, we have long since outgrown the original meaning of the word "Dominion", but that offers no reason why we should not duly honour the anniversary of the occasion when we became a Dominion . . . It would serve to remind us of our foundations and the influences which have given us shape.

I read this excerpt and place it on the record of the house because it must not be forgotten that, in the world of today, our position within the commonwealth is one that is based on self-interest and sentiment. When the Prime Minister was in London he must have been impressed by the intangible power for good that exists in a group of nations, joined in freedom and having the common concepts of freedom, consulting for the purpose of assuring the preservation of freedom.

Yes, the house would like to hear the story of that conference from the minister, not the Prime Minister, not in that rather uncertain way that he displayed a few weeks ago when he said that on a later occasion an opportunity would arise to discuss it, namely, during this debate. That conference brought honour to Canada, for it enabled the city of London to confer upon the Prime Minister the freedom of that city, an act of which every Canadian was proud. There are now two Canadians holding that honour, the present Prime Minister, and the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, whose contributions to parliament and the country made him a worthy recipient of the honour and brought honour to Canada at the same time.

That conference was a clearing house of consultation and of wisdom. It was a catalyst of differences. It was joined in unity and objectives in the maintenance of freedom. Let us not forget that in the world of today there can be no international rights for Canada unless we recognize three things: first, our own country and its aims and purposes; second, our membership within the commonwealth of nations which makes us possess that prestige to which the Right Hon. Vincent Massey made reference when he spoke of the contribution that that membership makes to Canada in the world of today; finally, our membership in NATO. Sir, our aim and our purpose are to maintain and preserve peace. To that end we are dedicated.

The information I have asked for must not be concealed for the reason that it might hurt the feelings of Canadians in that all is not as well as the propaganda agencies would have us believe when it comes to our defence against the potential danger of the H-bomb and atomic warfare. Let us see the picture; let Canada know it; and, if the Canadian people realize the situation, apathy will give place to determination and the leadership of civil defence by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will receive the inspiration that is necessary today, for with the exception of three or four of our cities few seem to realize the awful danger in which we stand and the necessity of urgency now in preserving ourselves through the instrumentality of civil defence and through the maintenance and assurance of our armaments and our armed forces.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I hope that with respect to some of the remarks I am going to make this afternoon I shall not be accused of having an anti-American bias. I have never had bias against our good neighbour to the south. I harbour no ill feelings towards the people of that country, but this afternoon I am going to criticize some of the policies being pursued by the United States government in international affairs. I am very glad indeed that in his concluding remarks the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) paid tribute to our association with the commonwealth of nations. As I listened to him this afternoon I thought for a while that I was listening to one of the strongest pleas I have heard in the house at any time for acceptance of American policy almost without question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No suggestion of that.

Mr. Coldwell: I also want to say to the minister that I thought his speech was not as good a speech as the one he made earlier in the session. I thought it was not as clear or as concise, and it was longer. I sometimes think that a speech cannot be judged by its length. I have had the pleasure of sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom, the mother of parliaments, and I have heard questions as important as the ones we are discussing this afternoon discussed and concluded by the two principal speakers within the space of one hour for both of them. It seems to me we could learn something from the experience of the parliament of the United Kingdom in that respect.

Mr. Pearson: And have a debate every few weeks.

Mr. Coldwell: I was very happy that this afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) discussed and told us something about the situation in Indo-China, Korea and so on. But as I listened to him this afternoon I decided I should probably confine my remarks to about three important matters which I think have been disturbing the people of Canada and the world in the past few weeks. The first of these of course is the statements that have been made in connection with the Chinese offshore islands and the island of Formosa, and the confusion which was caused after the speech made by the minister in Toronto when various interpretations were placed upon it. I think that the statements of the secretary of state of the United States, Mr. Dulles, when he was here underline rather than minimize the dangers of the present situation and the policies being pursued at this time by the United States.

Then, of course, the second matter of great concern to our country and the world at the present time is the series of experimental explosions that are being carried on in the United States and in Russia to ascertain the power in the use of nuclear weapons. Let us not forget that the same type of experiment is being undertaken in Russia. We do not know with what power and we do not know with what success, but we do know that they are now experimenting with the hydrogen bomb and the atom bomb in the same way as our great neighbour to the south. We are told by atomic scientists, as outstanding as those who deny the truth of the charges that these scientists make, that these explosions may endanger the future welfare of mankind, indeed, the future continuance on the earth of mankind. It seems to me we must pay some attention as a country to these experiments and use our influence whenever we can to prevent this danger becoming more and more imminent.

The third matter, of course, to which the hon. member for Prince Albert also referred, is the publication of the American-taken notes, for such they were, of the Yalta conference and the statements that were made there and, indeed, the foreshadowing of further American-made notes of the conferences at Tehran and Potsdam.

The speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at Toronto contains expressions that at this time seem to me to have been inadvisable, and inadvisable under the circumstances because they could be subjected to interpretations which could have meant a change of policy in regard to the Formosan situation. I have the text of the minister's speech here, and he said:

> Our position in this regard is something that we should never forget when we say, and correctly, that certain United States commitments, those, for instance, covering help to Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa and certain Chinese coastal islands, have not been accepted by us. But that is not the same thing as saying that they may not involve us. And it is certainly not the same as saying that they do not concern us.

In this paragraph the minister stated that United States commitments have not been accepted by Canada, and he repeated that, I am glad to say, this afternoon. But he did say that the commitments by the United States might involve us in the consequences of those commitments; and at other points in the address we have the same sort of thought. He said:

> The neutrality of either of us, if the other were engaged in a major war in which its very existence were at stake, would be unthinkable.

Perhaps the minister is right. Perhaps if they were engaged in a major war it would involve us automatically, because of our geographical position with them. Nevertheless I do not think it is wise, in the state of opinion in the United States today, to make statements of that description and have them published in the press of that country. That can be construed as an assurance of our support should the United States be involved in what is, in effect, a major war on the mainland of China.

In the concluding portion of his address he went even farther when he said this:

> In any major war we—

That is the United States and Canada.

> —must be on the same side.

He then pointed out what he called the moral of this, saying:

> This is not that we should be less Canadian, but that we should do everything we possibly can to censure that Canada's influence and Canada's policy, especially in its relations with the United States, will be directed toward the avoidance of conflict, political and economic. The same of course applies to the United States.

With that statement one can have no quarrel, and of it one can make no criticism. But I wish to suggest this, that the Canadian people want our government to state forthrightly and without equivocation that we will do everything we possibly can to ensure that Canada's influence and Canada's policy, especially in its relations with the United States, will be directed toward the avoidance of conflict, political and economic.

There is evidence that the government is taking a stronger attitude with regard to the economic relationships of our country with the United States. This in my opinion is being taken belatedly. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that this afternoon. It should have been done when the United States took unilateral action against some of our farm commodities. But the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) yesterday is the kind of forthright statement that needs to be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) regarding political matters in which we are directly interested and gravely concerned.

Judging by the statements by the United States secretary of state, Mr. Dulles, the issue in his opinion—and he stated it over and over again—is between the government of Chiang Kai-shek, which he calls the Republic of China, and which he placed before the world as a desirable ally, and that of the Peking government which he regards not only as a usurper but as an outcast.

I could quote stronger terms than Mr. Dulles used. How many Canadians or Americans understand why the Chinese people drove Chiang Kai-shek out of China? A few days ago I reread a speech made in this house by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. MacKenzie), who was for some time in China with UNRRA. He told the house some of the reasons why the government was overthrown. Let me quote the hon. member as he is reported at page 1878 of Hansard for November 17, 1949:

> While I know nothing about the personal integrity of Chiang Kai-shek, I understand from his friends that it is quite good; nevertheless I know that his government officials practised a policy of graft and corruption that was incredible to me. I have also visited many cities of China and met many merchants. I met Colonel Kearney of the United States army, who was stationed there. He told me about many things that happened in the Chinese army which to me were inconceivable. When I went to China I understood that it was one of the great democracies of the world. According to my understanding and appraisal of democracy, it was as far removed from the principles and doctrine of democracy as it possibly could be. I could not conceive of conditions being as bad as they were. To me it was capitalism at its worst, where a few people controlled the whole policy and the rest lived in poverty and privation.

That was said by an hon. member who still sits in this house on the same side as the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government, said by a man who was in China for some time with UNRRA. The hon. member could also have thrown some light on the entry of Chiang Kai-shek's forces into Formosa. But the record is clear. In many newspapers and other articles which have appeared in the public press during the last six or seven years, there have been references to this Simon Pure government of Chiang Kai-shek.

I, myself, met a correspondent of a London newspaper who was an eyewitness of events to which I will refer. Let me hasten to say that he was not a communist, but was correspondent of a well-known London Liberal daily paper.

On February 28 of this year the Christian Science Monitor, which certainly is not a communist paper, but rather a religious one, published an article clearly outlining the history of Formosa. That article went on to say that when the Japanese were defeated in world war II, there was general island-wide rejoicing at the prospect of reunion with China. The moment the first nationalist troops put foot on the island, there was disillusionment. The nationalist soldiers and civilian autocrats under the government of Chen Yi, the general who took the troops there, acted as conquerors and seized the expropriated Japanese businesses from the Formosan people.

The discontent of the Formosans finally erupted in a protest march in February 1947, touched off by the brutality of government agents. The unarmed paraders were struck down by machine gun fire. The nationalist government, which at the time had an army of 2,000 troops in and around the capital, agreed to meet a small committee of leading Formosans to discuss reforms. They requested:

1. Election by Formosans of their own magistrates and mayors, who would be empowered to control the police;

2. Abolition of special armed police under government commissioners;

3. Admission of Formosans to higher posts in the administration;

4. The break-up of government monopolies.

These were moderate demands, indeed.

The government stalled for time, pretending to negotiate with the Formosans enabling them to call for reinforcements from the mainland. They arrived on March 8. A reign of terror followed. Reliable estimates placed the number of Formosans massacred or missing as high as 10,000, including more than 700 high school and college students.

I might say that these are not my statements. These are statements by the Christian Science Monitor. It goes on to say that this is the grim record of Chiang Kai-shek's occupation of Formosa.

Who is the moral leper? That is the grim and terrible record of the so-called democratic government of Chiang Kai-shek, which the United States government supports and which, according to the minister, should a major war develop from that support, might involve Canada in hostilities.

The islands of Quemoy and Matsu are coastal islands blockading the two important mainland ports of Amoy and Foochow. They are no more useful as jumping-off places for an attack on Formosa than the mainland itself. How far is Quemoy from the mainland? It is three miles. How far is Formosa? It is about 125 miles. The Pescadores are in between, 80 miles from the mainland. Between Quemoy and the mainland there is at least one island that is under mainland control. In other words, Quemoy is a part of the mainland of China and to talk about a jumping-off place to be defended because it may be a jumping-off place for an attack on Formosa is a palpable attempt to deceive the rest of the world into believing something that is not correct.

I have no use for a communist government, but I do not want to see this country dragged into a war by the policies that are being pursued by the secretary of state of the United States. I followed those policies and it is about time that this government and this house spoke out against that drift to war through those policies and the threats of certain United States officials.

To use precision projectiles of atomic power against the mainland is one which, if put into effect, would forever destroy any hope of support of the democratic cause in which we should be interested, by the masses of the whole continent of Asia, and I include in this Burma and India, two countries of great importance in the struggle against communist imperialism. Let us not forget this. The first atomic weapons that were dropped were dropped on the coloured nation of Japan, an Asian nation. Drop some more of them on an Asian nation and then try to win the Asian nations to the democratic cause. The thing would be impossible, and yet we cannot win this struggle against communist imperialism without the Asian masses on our side.

In view of this, I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make another speech in this house when this debate draws toward its end, where such speeches should be made, and to state categorically that we shall have no part in United States adventures on behalf of Chiang Kai-shek. In today's Gazette, Joseph Alsop, writing from Hong Kong, indicates that the United States cannot count on the support of the United Kingdom. He says that there is some doubt about the support of Canada. Perhaps I had better quote the paragraph:

> But if a serious war starts over Quemoy and the Matsus, the United States cannot now count on the support of Britain, where the vital forward bases of the strategic air command are situated. There is even some doubt about the support of Canada, which is the vital key to what passes for the American air defence system. And for these reasons, no one can be quite sure that the Chinese and Soviets do not want a big war on this divisive issue.

It is about time that Canada took a very firm stand in relation to this whole adventure around Formosa. We are told that it is part of the United States defence system. Where does that defensive system extend? We have been told that it extends right from the Aleutians, right through Japan, right through Formosa, right through the Philippines, right down to New Zealand and Australia. As a matter of fact, apparently the only interest in the southeast Asian organization is that New Zealand and Australia are part of the defensive system of the continental United States. It is about time that we reappraised this whole thing and spoke out. There was no hesitation some years ago in this house on the part of members on the government side in criticizing British imperialism. Why not for a change be outspoken about United States policies that are equally imperialist in a sense, not in the same sense as the old imperialism used to be, but in the sense that there is an attempt to control a very large part of the world through bases and by display of arms. I say the minister should remove any doubt that may exist about Canada's attitude regarding this matter.

Last September I had the great privilege of being present at the Labour party's conference at Scarborough in England and of hearing the Right Hon. Clement Attlee and other members of the British Labour party who visited China make their report on the visit. May I say that before Mr. Attlee went, Canadian newspapers said that here was a man who would go to China unprejudiced in its favour and would bring back a realistic and objective report. I heard that report. The same evening I had the opportunity of spending some time with Mr. Attlee and with Mr. Morgan Phillips, the secretary of the Labour party, and others who accompanied Mr. Attlee on that trip. Several points emerged. First, the new government in China had abolished corruption in government and, in Mr. Attlee's opinion, to use his own words, this was "a very, very great achievement." He said that they got that tribute "not from Chinese sources but from people with a long knowledge of the east." He said, "European people of our own sort who have been more than 50 years there. They have for the first time got an honest government. I believe they are a government of idealists." That was his considered opinion, and he is a former prime minister of Great Britain, a man of whom the papers said that when he came back he would bring an objective report. I am quoting directly from him. He paid tribute to the manner in which they had cleaned up old sinks of iniquity. They had introduced a new alphabet, reducing the original 36,000 characters to fewer than 1,200. Seventy million children are in school and attempts are being made to remove illiteracy in the adult population. He emphasized the importance of a settlement with China because of the influence of Chinese nationals, not nationalists, most of whom are non-communists throughout the whole of south Asia, and who jointly resent the manner in which the Chinese masses are being retarded by the western powers.

He suggested what I suggested long ago, that Chiang Kai-shek and his bloodthirsty warlords—yes, bloodthirsty warlords they proved themselves to be when they went to Formosa—should be exiled from Formosa and such of his followers as wish should be allowed to return to the mainland, and then let Formosa be neutralized under the United Nations.

This afternoon the minister said that when we talk about these things we forget the Formosan people. I have not forgotten them this afternoon. I have told of their terror, and I say that the sooner that that dictatorial group is removed from Formosa and Formosa placed under United Nations trusteeship—yes, I would support guaranteeing to them neutrality by the United Nations, not by a single power—the sooner shall we begin to build for peace in Asia.

Canada should support the removal of Chinese nationalist representatives from the United Nations and from the security council and support the seating of the effective government of the Chinese people. Sir Winston Churchill and Sir Anthony Eden recognized that effective government years ago. They supported the Labour party's recognition on January 1, 1950. They have been in power most of the time since then, and they still recognize that government as the effective government of the Chinese mainland, the government in power on the Chinese mainland. We recognize a mere rump; that is all. I say that Canada at the United Nations should support that inclusion of the government of China and we should make an effective effort to recognize the government that is in power in China.

[Mr. Speaker.]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was suggesting that the time had come when the alien government now in Formosa should be expelled from that island. I said that in my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, it was a dictatorship which had achieved power there by means which could not be described as other than bloody and cruel.

During the dinner recess I happened to be looking at some newspapers and I read that the moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, Dr. J. L. W. McLean, has just returned from Formosa and he is reported in the Victoria newspapers. I am going to refer particularly to the report which appeared in the Victoria Times of March 12, in which he stated:

> On his return from Formosa Dr. McLean called that world trouble spot a police state. "There is no open discussion," he said. Police were in evidence everywhere and people were very careful in what they said. In Formosa during the Tachens crisis, he said there seemed more alarm on this continent than in Formosa itself.
> The nationalist claim to liberate the mainland was "just propaganda", he said.
> The nationalist government was made up of mainland people who had fled to the island. Thus the government was resented by most Formosans, he said.

In another report he went on to say that the government could not exist but for the support of the United States.

I wish to put one more quotation on the record, from the speech which I heard Mr. Attlee make at Scarborough. May I just say in passing that naturally I am quoting these statements out of their context. Mr. Attlee and those who were with him are under no illusions as to the present government of China being a dictatorship; I refer of course to the mainland of China. They are under no illusions that that government, as is the case with all communist governments, has at times been overbearing and cruel towards its opponents. But there is a distinction in his opinion between the situation in China and the situation that has been found in some other communist-dominated countries.

He says this:

> As to the direction in which China will move, that is anybody's guess. There is a long tradition of civilization in China going back thousands of years to days when we were barbarians. The impact of communism on an ancient civilization like that is quite different from its impact on Russia, which was after all the most backward of all the European family. I cannot think that the Chinese with their great traditions will fall for the cruder forms of communism. Indeed, I think there is every sign to show that they apply their communism with a good deal of elasticity. You may say in its early days, it is anybody's guess how they will go. There is undoubtedly a considerable degree of toleration in matters of religion; that is a tradition in China. It may go the other way; at present there is a certain amount of it.

Then he adds:

> I do think that we in this country, who can take perhaps a more detached view than the people in the United States, should do all we can to try and bring together these peoples of the east and west.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the government of Canada to speak out while there is time to speak out and to support the establishment in Formosa of a Formosan government elected by the Formosan people with the island neutralized by the United Nations Organization and not dominated by any one of the great powers.

I mentioned the Yalta situation and the transcript of the American-made notes of that conference. Let me remark that this was done under the strong protests and later the reluctant acquiescence of Sir Winston Churchill. May I say that if off-the-record remarks and discussions at international conferences are made public, then there is a real danger that those attending will exercise such care in what they say that the results of such conferences may be seriously interfered with. To publish at this time, when conditions have changed so completely, remarks and discussions made under quite different circumstances, and for what appears to be purely political and partisan purposes in the United States, is, as I have said before, a shocking performance. I shall leave it at that.

I mentioned the third matter which is causing grave concern among all thinking people and that is the nuclear tests which are being made in the United States and Russia at this time. Scientists, of course, disagree as to what their effects may be; no one knows. But one group of eminent atomic scientists warn that the dangers are imminent and grave indeed.

Consequently, I appeal to the government again to do what it can and I think that Canada can do much because, after all, Canada is represented on the United Nations atomic committee along with the United States, Great Britain and Russia.

We should do all we can to bring about a conference of the powers which have nuclear weapons with a view first to ending these dangerous experiments. For my part, I believe the control of the manufacture and use of these weapons must ultimately be a part of a larger disarmament conference or agreement.

I realize that disarmament is inextricably linked with the settlement of political differences. The western powers said that a further conference of the great powers must await the ratification of the London and Paris agreements. Whatever views there may be of these agreements, the fact remains that France appears to be about to make the final ratification without doubt. Other countries involved have no further hesitation and hence a four-power conference should be called immediately if for no other purpose than to endeavour to negotiate an agreement regarding nuclear weapons. As I said, I would wish to see effective measures of disarmament as a part of a general agreement for the negotiated settlement of outstanding disputes and difficulties.

When I say that, I am under no illusion that such negotiations could be accomplished overnight. I realize it would take a considerable length of time and might have to be done piecemeal, little by little and bit by bit.

In urging this Canada could perform a very useful service in publicly and explicitly taking the lead in calling for such a conference followed, of course, by the implementation of the United Nations charter in regard to security and general disarmament arrangements. But in spite of what the minister said this afternoon I still think—and I think it strongly as do many others—that the solution of the present world problems will not be found in the development of nuclear weapons, the building of armaments or the stretching of strategic bases from one end of the world to the other in order to contain communism.

I think that the only way in which communist propaganda and aggression can be met will be in a field other than the field of military containment and organization. The United Nations Organization has done much in this regard already. The world health organization has done much to improve the standards of health and the elimination of tropical diseases which have afflicted Asian and African countries—yes, and some parts of Europe and South America—for generations. This is the kind of thing that will gain support for the western democracies. Yet the amounts we have appropriated, when compared with our expenditures on military defence, are pitiful and quite inadequate. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon put on the record some very compelling figures as to our inadequate contribution both to the Colombo plan and to the technical aid of the United Nations. Another fund that I think has done much to win support to the democratic cause is the children's fund of the United Nations. That is supported, of course, by public national—or international, if you like—contributions as well as voluntary contributions. All these activities have done much to win support. Of course, I could enumerate many other projects of the same kind.

After all, if we are to win this war, the cold war if you like,—the battle for men's minds across the world—we need far greater effort to remove the causes of disease, famine and poverty and to raise the standards of living everywhere in the world. Communism is born and bred mainly in depressed areas, not only in foreign lands but in our own land. Of course it is true that among the most active of communists are often men and women with, I think, mistaken ideals who, impatient at the slow development of humanitarian policies in our midst, believe that revolutionary movements offer the quickest and best hope of success. Needless to say, they are blind to the suffering which violent revolution inevitably involves, whether it is in China, Russia or any other country where these violent revolutions occur; and they continue not only during the period of the revolution itself but during the longer period of rehabilitation which follows these social upheavals.

So I say the response of the non-communist world must be made more forthright in the fields of economic and social progress. I join in the plea that was made this afternoon for a greater appropriation for these world needs. I am not talking about a billion dollars from Canada but I am saying that, instead of the paltry $20 million or $25 million subscribed by all the nations of the world for technical aid in the United Nations, a billion dollars would be insufficient to meet the world's needs in the years to come. Indeed, the new plan for the raising of capital for backward countries envisages $250 million for development.

When I think of technical aid, I am thinking not only of the one sort of technical aid by the kind of subscription that we have been making through the United Nations to that organization's special fund but of other funds as well to the extent of a billion dollars or so in all. So I say that with quite inadequate funds the United Nations Organization for technical aid has been doing a remarkable job. When one realizes, as I have said before, that the united nations together are subscribing just over $20 million a year for this purpose and when one contrasts that amount with the amount that we are collectively spending on military defence, running into hundreds of billions of dollars, we can realize what might be done if our appropriation for technical aid were proportionate in some degree to our expenditure on other—and, let me say at once, necessary—military defence.

Last autumn I had the opportunity of being in the Middle East in the state of Israel for a couple of weeks and in that state, which is led by a highly intelligent and devoted group of men and women, I saw a good many evidences of what can be done with outside capital aid and technical assistance. The draining of swamps and the ending of malaria, the engineering aspects of water utilization, irrigation and hydroelectric projects, and experiments in the production of new crops like cotton in that area have all been to some extent assisted by technicians sent by the technical aid division of the United Nations and financed, of course, largely by Jewish bond drives and gifts from abroad.

I might say that Canadian contributions to United Nations technical aid are now $1,500,000, a relatively paltry sum when the need of the world is considered.

Then, of course, there is the Colombo plan. That is the most interesting project in which we are engaged. Upon the success of technical aid, the Point Four plan of the United States and the Colombo plan, I believe, depends the victory of democracy over communist propaganda in southeast Asia. The Colombo plan originated in 1950 and has since then been extended beyond the confines of the commonwealth countries of southeast Asia to take in neighbouring states, and the United States has become involved.

This afternoon the hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned the extremely low standard of living of the people in this area. The people in this area—600 million of them—have annual incomes of about $50 or $60 a year. The people there live on a subnormal diet averaging about 12 ounces of cereals per day or less than 2,000 calories. Those are official statements. According to medical experts, this is regarded as a minimum for survival and, except in special circumstances, few persons in North America are reduced to such a low calorie diet. Yet, before the war these areas produced a third of the world's fats and edible oils, three-quarters of the world's tea, nearly all the world's natural rubber and many coarse textile materials such as jute, not to mention cotton. These resources were the monopoly of western companies.

Asians understandably believe that they were thus exploited to produce wealth for the western world. So I think we are under obligation to do everything we can to improve the standards of living and to make amends for the exploitation of earlier years. So I say if we are to retain the friendship and support of these people there is the necessity for rapid improvement in the standards of living. I am not suggesting that we make, as is sometimes said, great gifts of food and so on to these people though sometimes famine requires them. The main thing that we must do is to enable them to feed themselves and to build up their own economy, and to train young men and women and to assist them to do all that is possible, when they go back to their countries, to enable their countries to become prosperous in the years ahead.

So, Mr. Speaker, I want to make these few points today. But what I have said towards the conclusion of my remarks is what I should like to emphasize most, that if we are going to win this battle for men's minds we are not going to win it on the military fields. One of the disappointments I had when the United States secretary of state was here quite recently was that he seemed to emphasize the problems facing the world rather as a war minister than as one who was interested in matters of the kind about which I have just been talking. While defence may be and is necessary, nonetheless what our people need to learn most is that we have got to do everything we can to win the people of Asia to our side, and that means that we have got to assist them to improve their standards of life and eliminate the seed beds of communism; for poverty, misery and want are the seed beds in which subversive ideas thrive.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, the minister as usual gave a most interesting and thought-provoking speech this afternoon. There are quite a number of things I should like to have time to comment upon but I am afraid that my task has been made a little different as a consequence of one of the speeches at least made this afternoon. Therefore I shall have to refrain from commenting on the minister's speech to any great extent except to say I had hoped that in the course of his address he might have had something to say about the Middle East because there are some problems there which have got to be solved if peace is to be brought to that part of the world and if the security of one of the great trade routes of the world is to be maintained. However, perhaps in the course of his rebuttal he may have a chance to say something about it then.

I should like to comment briefly on the speech made this afternoon and this evening by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, (Mr. Coldwell). I think it was a speech which will give comfort to the enemy. I think it was a speech that paralleled to a very great degree the communist line.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, nonsense, nonsense, nonsense!

An hon. Member: Shame.

An hon. Member: Absolutely.

Mr. Coldwell: More Social Credit smearing again.

Mr. Low: I listened to my hon. friend, and I could not help thinking that he was very sincere in what he said. I am not criticizing his sincerity for one moment, and I believe that he believed every single thing he said. But that does not for one second mitigate the influence that it will have upon a great many people because they have not the facts at hand against which to measure the things that he did say. I was very much interested in the glowing picture that he painted of what the visionary Attlee reported as the accomplishments of the red government in China after a visit of some two weeks there, seeing, I suppose, what the Chinese government wanted him to see.

But in the course of telling about these things and painting that very glowing picture of what red China had accomplished in the social and economic fields and at the same time condemning Chiang Kai-shek for brutality, my hon. friend said nothing whatever about the millions of their own flesh and blood whom the communist regime in China have liquidated since they took over in 1949. Not a single word did he say. He made no mention at all about the brutal treatment of American and British prisoners of war in China. He said nothing about the brain washing and the forced admissions by torture of things that were false from prisoners of war in that country. That, of course, I suppose is honest government.

My hon. friend did not say anything either about the aggressions of the red Chinese, the aggression in South Korea, and after the years of killing, massacre and aggression in that area the refusal of red China to countenance free elections in Korea and try to bring about by honest effort the unity of that country under a government of their own. I suppose that is honest government. He said nothing whatsoever about Chinese induced and supplied aggressions in Indo-China and the terrific suffering of many hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of people in that land as a consequence. Nor did he say anything about the recent threats of the red regime to conquer Formosa, to take it by force. I suppose all of these things are to be overlooked.

I do not for one moment condone any brutal misdeeds of Chiang Kai-shek and the members of his government, but the fact that they may have committed such brutal misdeeds does not for one second excuse the red regime for committing hundreds of times as many even if they have made some progress in social and economic fields. In the course of his address this afternoon the hon. member failed utterly to distinguish between Chiang Kai-shek, on the one hand, and the strategic importance of Formosa in this very difficult time, on the other—not for one moment. That is exactly the kind of confusion that the communists of the world are trying to spread. That is what they want the people of the world to believe, that the two are one and that when you condemn Chiang Kai-shek you have to condemn Formosa and its possession for the time being by forces other than those of red China.

[Mr. Low.]

My hon. friend did not mention the fact either that from the best information available the Formosans themselves are in mortal fear of being "liberated" by red China, mortal fear of the kind of liberation they could expect from the mainland. The best information we can possibly get, the most reliable, is that they are free people and are determined to remain free. It is because of the fact that the hon. member failed to mention these things but painted the other picture of a black and brutal Chiang Kai-shek that I say his speech will be interpreted as giving comfort to the communists who are trying their level best to win the battle of men's minds by deluding them, leading them to believe a lie.

It seems that these days most of the discussion of international affairs centres around the policies of the United States. I suppose one could expect that this would be inevitable because of the position of leadership occupied by the United States in the world today, but I think that is reassuring when we review the changes that have taken place, especially in United States Far Eastern policy, since those bleak days of surrender to Russia and communism in the latter part of the Roosevelt and the first part of the Truman administrations. The world will be a long time recovering from the blunders and appeasements of those days, if it ever recovers.

On December 23, 1949, Mr. Acheson, secretary of state in President Truman's cabinet, sent to all overseas state department officials a secret memorandum that read as follows:

> American criticism of American policy over Formosa has come largely because of a mistaken popular conception of its strategic importance to the United States defence in the Pacific. The loss of the island is widely anticipated, and the manner in which civil and military conditions there have deteriorated under the nationalists adds weight to the expectation. All available material should be used to counter false impressions that the retention of Formosa would save the Chinese nationalist government, or that its loss would seriously damage American interests. Formosa has no special military significance.

That seemed to be the official American attitude in 1949, and anyone who takes the trouble to examine the implications of the whole statement will recognize in it the same ideas that the communist imperialists skilfully attempt to use to delude the American people today, and other free peoples of the world. Communists and their sympathizers are still trying to mislead the peoples of the free world with these ideas, and their purpose is to make it possible for red China to take Formosa and thus to cut the Pacific defence line.

After the close of world war II China became the centre of intensive communist activity and intrigue. Moscow-trained agents, communist agents, led bands of guerrillas in open violence and civil war against the constituted government of that country. Deluded or perfidious men in high places in America and other countries and, I might say, in some of the great newspapers of the world, went along with the communists in grossly misrepresenting the situation in China as an agrarian revolution—a peaceful, agrarian revolution, and to condition the American mind to accept the downfall of Chiang Kai-shek and his nationalist government without any question.

They did their work mighty well, and the people of America were made to believe a lie. And in their deluded state of mind they allowed China and its 400 million freedom-loving people to be pushed—and I say "pushed" advisedly—into the hands of the communists.

Chiang Kai-shek and his anti-communist forces were defeated in China in 1949 very largely because of treachery. They retired to Formosa, which was an island held for quite a number of years by the Japanese, who prior to world war II had spent vast amounts of money and effort to make Formosa the most important air and naval base in the western Pacific. Today there are on the island of Formosa and on the nearby islands nearly 600,000 anti-communist Chinese soldiers who are friendly to the western world. To keep up their morale for long years of absence from their mainland homes, families and interests is a big problem. But they represent the only available anti-communist Asiatic force in all the Pacific area. That is something we have to keep in mind. No one can identify that 600,000 with the government of Chiang Kai-shek and any treachery Chiang Kai-shek may have committed.

The sovereignty of Formosa rests in the hands of the 48 nations which signed the peace treaty with Japan in 1951, and Chiang Kai-shek governs the country on their behalf. There has been a great change in American attitude toward Formosa since Mr. Acheson sent that secret telegram in 1949 I told you about suggesting that Formosa was of no special military significance. By June 27, 1950, President Truman had evidently come to realize that Mr. Acheson's appraisal was wrong, because on that date he made this statement by way of an explanation of United States interest in Formosa:

> In these circumstances the occupation of Formosa by the communist forces would be a direct threat to the security of the Pacific area and to United States forces performing their lawful and necessary functions in that area.

Not long after that statement was made General Douglas MacArthur, who probably knew more about Pacific defence than any man living, discussed the military significance of Formosa in a message to the national encampment of veterans of foreign wars. Speaking of the United States chain of Pacific island defences he had this to say:

> Our line of defence is a natural one and can be maintained with a minimum of military effort and expense. It envisions no attack against anyone, nor does it provide the bastions essential for offensive operations; but properly maintained would be of invincible defence against aggression. If we hold this line, we may have peace—lose it and war is inevitable.

May I point out here that Formosa is one of the key parts of the chain of Pacific island defences. General MacArthur made this further statement on May 3, 1951:

> I believe that from our standpoint we practically lose the Pacific ocean if we give up or lose Formosa. Formosa should not be allowed to fall into red hands.

There was no equivocation about that. It is natural for us, of course, in the light of those statements, to ask how safe Canada would be if the United States lost the Pacific. It is most natural. Today Secretary of State Dulles and President Eisenhower are making it quite clear the United States believes Formosa and the nearby islands are of tremendous strategic importance to the defence of America, which of course includes Canada. They differentiate between Formosa and the government of Chiang Kai-shek, which it is clear some other people do not.

Last December the United States completed a treaty with Chiang Kai-shek known as the Formosa defence treaty. It was ratified by the United States Senate on February 9 of this year. Under that treaty Formosa becomes a defence post, a part of the United States Pacific defence system. The United States has pledged to protect Formosa and the Pescadores islands even to the extent of an all-out fight for them, if it is necessary. It is expected that the United States will build land and air bases at some time in the near future. The treaty says nothing at all about Matsu, Quemoy and Nanchi, the islands still in the hands of the Chinese nationalists guarding the entrance to mainland harbours.

Most of the controversy about Far Eastern policy at the present time seems to revolve around what should happen in connection with these islands, and a good deal of foolish talk goes on about it. But one fact should be kept in mind above everything else about those islands. They are important to red China only as a jumping-off place for an attack against Formosa. There is nothing certain today of course about what the United States will do, whether in fact she will attack, if any attempt is made by red China to take them by force. However, I think it is clear the United States feels that continued nationalist possession of the islands is important to the maintenance of morale of the nationalist Chinese troops. From what Mr. Dulles said while he was in Ottawa, and in recent speeches, one would judge that the United States government is giving most careful and earnest thought to what should be done about Matsu and Quemoy. If they think they are of special strategic importance and of outstanding value from the point of view of morale, then it may be that the United States will be prepared to fight for them if red China attempts to take them by force. It appears that the Americans are using the utmost effort in dealing with this delicate situation, and I think they are giving evidence that they will use every effort to avoid military conflict. I sincerely hope they will. But of one thing we can be sure, and that is if there is any show of weakness on the part of the United States, the reds will be alert to that weakness and will certainly make a move to take the islands by force.

What about Canada's position? What should we do in this situation? Well, it has been brought out here this afternoon—and the minister has made it quite clear in other speeches he has made recently—that Canada is not committed any more than to take whatever action may be decided upon by the United Nations itself. If the United Nations decides to take some action, then I suppose we would be committed to do what we can. The United States seems to be the only power committed to the defence of Formosa and the Pescadores. I think it our duty of course to remain calm and level-headed, to make our views known to the United States, whatever we may think, and to issue a word of counsel and caution when we feel that these things are necessary, but all with a view to being helpful to the United States in the dreadful responsibility that she has undertaken alone in the leadership of the nations of the free world.

It would be a mistake for us to engage in bitter criticism, because that would simply give comfort to the enemy, destroy the unity of the western allies and weaken the position of the United States. I join the minister in what he said this afternoon in expressing gratification that the final decision about Quemoy and Matsu rests on a man of vision, honesty and ability, a man of President Eisenhower's stature. In the final analysis, that decision must be a military one. I do not see that it can be anything else. We think that Canada should always keep clearly in focus the rights and wrongs of these international problems, and should never allow them to be obscured by fear or prejudice. We should try to assess the situation against the background of communist global strategy, but I think we have to take the position on them that will be best calculated to prevent the consummation of communist plans for world domination. If we take that position it possibly will be right.

We believe that the United States should be given moral support in their determination to prevent Formosa and the Pescadores from falling into the hands of red China, not because we feel any desire at all to protect Chiang Kai-shek and his government but because of the importance of Formosa for the defence of the free people of southeastern Asia, and even of America. We believe that when the communists have given evidence, indisputable evidence by deeds and not by mere words, that they are really anxious to establish peace in the world and they are prepared to discontinue their aggression, then the people of Formosa should be given the right to determine their own future.

We are firm believers in the principle of self-determination, and we are definitely opposed to using any country and its people as pawns in the game of international power politics. We believe that there has been too much of that sort of thing in times past. Too much human suffering has resulted. We think that to sacrifice the freedom of millions of freedom-loving Formosans to appease the communists would be grossly inhuman as well as criminal, and furthermore it would be useless and would violate a sacred trust. We believe that the Canadian people should resist the propaganda of the communists and their sympathizers on the Formosan question, as on all others, because we are convinced that they are trying to delude us and lull us into a sense of false security.

We find ourselves in fairly full agreement with the United States' Far Eastern policy as revealed in the recent speeches by Mr. Dulles and President Eisenhower, as well as by actions recently taken by congress. It is quite refreshing and reassuring to see the United States coming into a realistic policy at last. If the United States had followed in the post-war years a policy similar to their present one, the Korea fiasco would never have happened and a great many of the troubles now being faced in Indo-China and in other parts of southeastern Asia would not be vexing the people there.

Under the leadership of men of undoubted loyalty and vision and spiritual greatness, the United States appears to be developing today a policy which takes full account of a world situation made black and nearly hopeless by the monstrous blunders and perfidies of the not too distant past.

An hon. Member: In the United States?

Mr. Low: Yes, in the United States. They give evidence of possessing a full realization of the strength, character, resources and designs of a ruthless enemy that hopes to complete the conquest of the earth largely by the strategy of the cold war which has been described as a battle for men's minds, backed up of course by the threat of employment of massive military might if needed. It is reassuring to see a growing and widespread awareness amongst the American people of the great danger that their own nation was in from subversion during the post-war years. That awareness is reflected in their almost complete rejection of the recent skilful attempt of the communists to brain-wash the American people through the strategy of the shameless liar, Harvey Matusow. It is reflected also in American awakening to the fact that communist subversion is perhaps the greatest danger to all of the free countries of southeastern Asia.

We believe that we see the United States developing a new foreign policy that takes into account the rights and the wrongs of the various problems of international relations, and we go along with that. We believe that the cold war has caused too many people to become so preoccupied with the problem of preventing a shooting war that they have lost sight of the rights and the wrongs of the other pressing problems facing the world, just as those at Yalta allowed the rights and the wrongs of Russia's demands to be completely obscured by their intense prejudices and emotions or their foolish fears that if they did not appease her, Russia would leave them to fight Japan alone.

I believe that the United States state department released the Yalta papers last week as a means of demonstrating to the American people and the world at large that the United States has indeed made a major change in policy, and that alone is justification enough for their release; but there are many more good reasons. By their action in releasing those papers they told us that Yalta is an excellent example of how not to deal with the Russians and how not to negotiate peace settlements, and I hope we are paying attention. The people of the United States today give evidence of being determined to profit by the monstrous mistakes of their predecessors in office. It is unfortunate, of course, that the United States' version of the Yalta papers seems to cast a reflection on Mr. Churchill. I think everybody regrets that. It would have been better if this could have been avoided while the great man is living; I think everybody realizes that he has made an outstanding personal contribution to this generation, and because of that we all dislike seeing him hurt in any way. But I feel sure that world-wide knowledge of his priceless services to this world will quickly disperse any cloud that may have been cast over him.

While I am speaking of the Yalta papers, I am reminded of something that happened in this house two years ago. We Social Crediters for some years had been watching very closely what was happening in the international field, and we saw surrender after surrender to communism and an alarming growth in the strength of communism. We cried out against these things, very often at the risk of severe criticism.

Two years ago quite a number of things were being revealed as having taken place at Yalta, Tehran, Casablanca and Potsdam. At that time I made a statement to the effect that when the facts of this era were made known and the full history of this time was written many people—when I said that I had in mind the millions in East Germany, the millions in Poland, Korea and other countries that I could name—would say that the last two presidents of the United States were the great betrayers of humanity. I was made the target for a great deal of attack and abuse because I had used those words. I recall that in the election campaign of 1953 the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) went around my own province severely attacking me and the Social Credit candidates generally on the basis of that statement which I had made here in parliament.

We were to be eliminated, he said, this splinter party here, because we had tried to lift the veil of secrecy which had been kept over these international conferences. We had evidently committed a sin in trying to inform the Canadian people. However, time has a habit of vindicating or condemning. I should like to point out that statesmen should possess themselves of the knowledge which is so essential to the exercise of vision, especially in times like these.

I draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the facts as they were revealed in the Yalta papers released just last week. And I further draw his attention to a statement made by one of his very ardent newspaper supporters in western Canada, the Edmonton Journal. In its editorial column of March 18 last the Edmonton Journal, speaking of the Yalta papers, made this very strong statement:

> British fears that these disclosures would lead to embarrassment all round are likely to be only too justified. Even the first summaries appearing in the news are full of dynamite. All the participants, but especially the late President Roosevelt, appear in an extremely bad light. That the president's judgment was failing in the later years of his life has long been known, but few realized the depth of his credulity towards Soviet Russia and his animosity towards Britain, or at least towards the commonwealth idea, as revealed in these papers. The most striking example, of course, was his secret proposal to Stalin for excluding British influence in the Far East and even for the surrender of Hong Kong.

The editorial continues:

> It is dismaying, too, to find the responsible leaders of the free world seriously talking about such fantastic propositions as the division of Germany into three—or perhaps five—parts.

Perhaps under the pressure of his heavy and exacting duties the Prime Minister did not have the time two years ago to keep up with his homework and research work. Perhaps because of that we should excuse him, but I merely point out that sometimes when we are trying to get the facts and inform the Canadian people we suffer in consequence abuse and attack.

The Edmonton Journal editorial winds up by saying that today's statesmen and diplomats, by studying the record of why and how their predecessors went wrong, will have an opportunity of avoiding their mistakes. Relating that to the Far Eastern situation I should like to point out that the communists in China appear confident and alert to take advantage of any hesitation whatsoever on the part of America and the western nations. When Mr. Dulles was here last week he called it recklessness, but whether it is alert confidence or recklessness born of a belief that they whipped the United Nations' forces in the Korean war and France in Indo-China, it is clear that in the present situation any hesitation on the part of the United States and the western nations will be interpreted as a sign of weakness and will likely encourage the reds to try to take the offshore islands, and perhaps Formosa, by force.

The United States quite rightly feels that she must not sacrifice what loyal allies she has in the Far East. The 600,000 freedom-loving soldiers on Formosa and the R.O.K. army in South Korea, with valuable naval and air bases in their possession, it seems to me, are of tremendous importance to the morale and security of all the free peoples of southeastern Asia as well as Australia, New Zealand and the North American continent.

[Mr. Low.]

I think there is solid strategic sense in Secretary of State Dulles' recent statements of American policy in the Pacific. I think that this is in strong contrast to what some of the starry-eyed dreamers of the British Labour party have been saying. Only a few weeks ago one of Mr. Attlee's cabinet ministers made the silly recommendation that Formosa be handed over to the communists and that Chiang Kai-shek be exiled to St. Helena, there to be kept under guard by the United States seventh fleet. This kind of poison has been fed to the British people now for so long that the government today is not able to take a stand except one which is interpreted by the communists as weakness.

It appears that Mr. Churchill has been influenced to a quite extensive degree by the attitude of the British Labour party. It appears likely also that Mr. Churchill has been influenced very strongly by Britain's need for trade with red China. If that is so, we in Canada and the United States have nobody to blame but ourselves for the situation. By our reprehensible attitude toward trade and the dollar problem in the early post-war years we literally forced Britain into a position of dependence upon trade with Russia and China for many things essential to her very existence. Britain's present foreign policy reflects her anxiety about keeping some favourable trading relations with those countries. I think one of the strongest pieces of evidence in support of this belief is to be found in the speed and vehemence with which Britain denounced the recent proposal that she give up Hong Kong.

We were heartened by a number of things which Mr. Dulles said in his broadcast to the American people on March 8 last. I read the script in U.S. News and World Report. Mr. Dulles had just got back from Bangkok and he told the American people about how the United States, working within the framework of the United Nations charter, had joined in mutual security treaties which cover the freedom-loving countries of Korea, Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, South Viet Nam, Laos, Cambodia, Thailand, Malaya, Pakistan, Australia and New Zealand. He said that one of these treaties, the eight-nation Manila pact for southeast Asia, has just come into force and that he went to Bangkok to attend the first meeting of the treaty council.

Mr. Dulles stated that the three main purposes of the Manila pact were, first, defence against open-armed aggression; second, defence against subversion; and, third, the improvement of economic and social conditions in all these countries. As I read Mr. Dulles' speech it seemed to me that the whole attitude of the American government toward southeastern Asia was to bind these free peoples together in a brotherhood of mutually satisfactory and helpful co-operation in order to minimize the danger from aggression and also to destroy the subversive elements that keep gnawing away in an attempt to break down constituted government and to give the communists a chance to step in.

It was also clear and very heartening, too, when I read that speech to note that the United States held out to southeastern Asiatic countries the hope of substantial help from the United States in their efforts to improve their economic and social conditions. It appears that as a consequence of United States leadership in the formation of the Manila pact and by her actions since it was formed, United States' prestige has risen in southeastern Asia to considerable heights.

Reference has been made to the Colombo plan this afternoon and this evening, particularly by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In the debate on the speech from the throne I devoted a large part of my address to what I thought about extending Canada's contribution to the Colombo plan. I did not mention a billion dollars or any such figure at the time. I merely mentioned that the $26 million which we contribute today is not enough. I go along with the minister and with those who say that in extending economic aid to these countries under the Colombo plan we should extend to them the kind of help that will help them to help themselves. That is the only kind of help they can use. We should be prepared to give them whatever is required to assist them in bringing their social and economic conditions to a decent standard.

What satisfaction we have shown over the recent changes in United States policy is not based upon a desire to see a test of strength between the United States and Russia. God forbid that any such thing should ever happen. Canada would surely be involved in such a test. Our satisfaction arises because we see developing a firmer, more realistic policy that gives some hope of keeping the world out of war and of bringing us into an era of peace.

History has shown that human liberties have been won only after long struggle. They have been preserved in all ages only by being prepared to fight for them. We know we face a very, very difficult situation now, because while the only way we can preserve our freedoms is to be prepared to fight for them if necessary, we realize at the same time that if we did fight for them, it might have the effect of loosing upon the world all the tragic consequences of nuclear warfare. But we have to be prepared to take that chance just as our fathers have taken it times without number in the past.

This, of course, poses a real dilemma. If the awful nature of the problem forces us to our knees with the overpowering conviction that there is no other source of help to which we can turn but that of a just and loving God, then we will be well on the way to a solution that will save mankind.

Speaking of this dilemma on March 6, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) had this to say:

> It can be seen that whatever happens we will need, in the trying circumstances that we face, strong nerves, and deep faith; great wisdom and patience and understanding. And we will have to shape our education and our teaching more than ever to these ends.

With these words we heartily agree.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): I am happy to rise on this occasion to participate in a most important series of addresses by hon. members of this house.

At the outset I am going to state bluntly that as far as the intricacies of foreign affairs are concerned, I am going to leave them to the experts.

From my experience on the external affairs committees of this house since 1949 and from my experience as a freshman at the United Nations, I feel that I possibly did pick up something there which might be of at least some interest to the people of Canada and the hon. members of this house, whether or not it solves any of the problems that beset the world today in this era of cold war.

First of all, sir, I wish to pay a most superlative compliment to the hon. minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson). I have observed him at the United Nations and I am sure some of the girls and women of Canada will be envious when I say that while he was there many of the representatives from large and small foreign countries were so anxious to buss him when they met him that invariably he had to sit down. He has a great many admirers in all foreign countries and we in Canada, I think, can be justly proud not only of the minister but also of the staff—

Mr. Knowles: Our blushing diplomat!

Mr. MacDougall: —of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations.

In my youth I used to be a fair judge of feminine pulchritude and I want to tell this house—

Mr. Knowles: Don't tell everything!

Mr. MacDougall: —and the people of Canada that of all the lovely girls I saw in New York the queen rose in a garden of rosebud girls was a Canadian girl on the Canadian delegation. In the field of beauty we have nothing to be ashamed of; rather we have much about which we can be intensely proud.

I would also like to say a word about the permanent staff. It is very easy for a delegate to go to the United Nations with a roving commission and to enjoy life, but the boys who were down there for months on end and who attended sessions at nine o'clock in the morning and frequently worked far into the night deserve, I believe, the compliments and appreciation of the Canadian parliament and the Canadian taxpayers.

When I was a boy on the prairies we did not have sufficient money to support one particular church and we had itinerant preachers of all denominations. I do not mind telling you that 90 per cent of them were terrible, but just the same—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDougall: I heard my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) say, "hear, hear". I hope he is not referring to himself.

Mr. Knowles: Speaking from experience.

Mr. MacDougall: I recall my father telling me when I was a boy that when I went to a service I did not have to bother listening to a minister if he did not preach from a text. I feel that was rather good advice, and if I am going to take a text tonight it will be called "Potholes on the Road to Peace". I think that is very applicable.

Mr. Knowles: Especially in Ottawa.

Mr. MacDougall: "Potholes on the Road to Peace". Now, I wonder how I arrived at such a title?

Well, at the United Nations, as you know, there are great numbers of different types and races of people. When I speak of potholes on the road to peace I refer to the Middle East. You know without my telling you, although I wish to draw your particular attention to it tonight, the Arab world of the Middle East comprises approximately 1,500,000 square miles. What struck me as being particularly unenviable about various countries in that particular area was this, and I hope my hon. friends to the left will bear with me when I remind them of this fact. The great inhibiting factor in all that huge area, which is approximately cheek-by-jowl with any potential aggression from the Soviet, is what? First of all, it is instability of government. I would ask hon. members to listen to these facts. Jordan had 8 governments in 10 years, 50 governments in 30 years. Egypt had 15 governments in 10 years. Syria had 24 governments in 10 years. Lebanon had 17 governments from 1943 to 1954, 7 of those in the one year of 1952. Iraq had 50 governments in less than 30 years. By and large, in all those Middle East countries what do we find? We find there is practically no secondary industry. What industry there is in existence is that of agriculture. Here I should like to mention a word about the poor agricultural worker. I should particularly like to address these remarks to my good friends second to my left.

An hon. Member: The C.C.F.

Mr. MacDougall: They are always talking about the poor downtrodden farmer; he has nothing, he gets nothing but abuse—that is, those who do not spend the winter in Florida or in California. In the great majority of those countries the actual wage of the agricultural worker, who at the very best never works more than six to seven months out of the twelve, is the stupendous rate of 24 cents to 34 cents a day. From 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the people of the Middle East are suffering from three of the slow killers that beset humankind, namely Bilharzia, hookworm and trachoma. None of these diseases take the victim off suddenly like coronary thrombosis. Oh, no; they just sap the life out of him until he is ready to throw in the white towel. Lack of any initiative is the main feature of those poor victims of the diseases I have just mentioned. They are not diseases that are particularly applicable to those countries: they are tropical in nature and many of the tropical countries have them. But because of lack of sanitation, education and any kind of a standard of living worthy of the name, in those countries today we have victims who care little for the dawning of another day.

Furthermore, in those countries one finds something else that we in this house should bear in mind. Where the governments are formed, there is no sense of unity and there is no sense of loyalty. The gendarmes of the various governments are there not to protect that country or the people of that country but to protect the government.

An hon. Member: Do we have to listen to this?

Mr. MacDougall: You certainly do not have to listen; this is a free country. In addition, this instability of government breeds disloyalty. You have no national sentiment of loyalty in any of those Middle East countries, particularly those of the Arab world. As a result, you have complete chaos as far as unity of purpose is concerned, either of the people or of the governments thereof. Those that are out of power are constantly "on the make" to get into power; and when they get into power, there is no loyalty then because it is only a matter of days or months until their very best friends will cut their jugular veins, and that is the end of the dictator of that particular country.

At this point I might also say this lest any of us has the idea that it would be worth while to spend a large amount of money to rearm the Arab world. I want to tell you that, from a study of the works of men who know, rearmament of the Arab world is an utter and complete myth. However, there is a type of interloyalty amongst the Arab countries, but unfortunately it is not one that we can admire. It is a loyalty born of hatred; and that hatred is a hatred towards Israel. I think we should realize what our position is there. We know how the recent hatred has been brought about because in the Arab-Israelian war we sided with the new state of Israel against the Arabs. In order that we might have a better picture and a deeper knowledge of what is the causative factor in that hatred, I will proceed with that explanation in a few minutes.

I was particularly struck by the dislike of many of these Arab states for the free countries of the world. Let us not think, Mr. Speaker, that that dislike is something that can be glossed over. There is an old adage to the effect that the Lord loves a cheerful giver. With respect to that matter, I think it is necessary that we, directly or indirectly, must realize that we are never going to save any country by charity. The best way to accomplish that objective is for those various countries to get a certain amount of technical knowledge from us and, by means of that knowledge, to help themselves and to pull themselves up by the bootstraps. Of these various Arab countries I was particularly struck by the appearance of the representatives of a country that, through my ignorance, I had never heard of before, the Hashimite kingdom of Yemen. I therefore became intrigued with these people. There are only some 3,500,000 people in the state of Yemen but they have a great similarity in countenance and features to the people of Israel. So I asked myself why, with this apparent background of similarity, there should be this intense dislike of the Yemenite state for Israel. I asked some of my learned friends there if they could tell me something about the Yemenites. I did not get very many answers of an informative nature, and when I returned to Vancouver I called four or five of the outstanding clerics of that city to find out what they knew about the history of the Hashimites. I received some information. Amongst those whom I called were the outstanding Protestant ministers and also His Excellency the archbishop of the diocese of Vancouver.

From these calls I gathered some slight information, but there is a more ancient, historical and biblical background to this picture than you see at the United Nations. Naturally any of us would expect that in this great cradle of humanity, the ancient world, men and women in those days had their destiny and believed in their destiny. I now refer to the great biblical characters, Abram and Sarah. They in their day were reaching an advanced age without issue. Abram and Sarah were without issue when they were more than 80 years old, although of course in those times they reckoned days and years a little differently than we do now. Sarah said unto Abram: "This is a bad state of affairs. I suggest to you that you take my handmaiden, Hagar, and from such union beget an issue." Well, I guess Sarah did not have to break Abram's arm because the upshot was that they did have an issue and the son was known as Ishmael.

Peculiarly enough, the green-eyed monster did not immediately creep into the house of Abram and Sarah, but shortly after the birth of Ishmael the Lord made a pact with Sarah and Abram and they begat a son, Isaac, who was the spiritual son. That brought trouble that eventually resulted in Hagar with her infant son, Ishmael, being tossed out into the desert. As the child was about to die of thirst and starvation the Lord created a well beside them and the child lived. Ishmael was designated by the Almighty to be a wild man, and I need not tell you he was a wild man in no uncertain terms. It was also designated that from his loins should descend twelve princes, and that also was fulfilled.

That same Ishmael then became the original father of the Arab world. One reason for the continuing hatred was the illegitimacy, as we would term it today. That of itself, I presume, was sufficient to cause the everlasting and continuing dislike and distrust of the Arabs for the people of Israel.

I should like to say a few words about those unfortunate countries before I leave them. Early in its history Saudi Arabia had practically no wealth at all, but today Saudi Arabia and some of the other Arab states have an abundance of oil which in the next 40 years will bring into the coffers of their governments—you note I say "governments" rather than people—some $80 billion. A few years ago the income was up over $200 million annually. Saudi Arabia is one of the more fortunate countries in this unfortunate mess of the Middle Eastern nations. What has she done with her money? Certainly she has not had the warm heart and the open hand. In niggardly fashion she has made a loan of only $6 million to Syria.

Saudi Arabia has more stability of government than possibly any of the other Arab countries. One reason why they have more stability is that the people are governed by a monarchical system. Before I leave the various Arab countries I should like to refer to some words of the head of the Islamic community in the United Kingdom. He is speaking of Yemen, the country I have just mentioned, and, as the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would say, I quote:

> It is a sorry state. People live in a hell no man can for long endure. Yemen is the miserable limb of all the poverty stricken Arab nations, living behind iron walls, in iron chains.
> In most of the Arab countries the guillotine has harvested the heads of the intellectuals and the rest of the people are in utter darkness or behind prison walls.

I wonder if my good friend from Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) will realize that that is a condition that is not necessarily taken from the bolshevik government in the Kremlin, but is a condition that is applicable today in most of those countries that have the thumb of the Kremlin on their throats, or who have satellite administrations who are responsible to the murderers of the Kremlin.

I think it would be quite unfair if I were to speak in a critical manner of those countries without endeavouring in some way to bring about their betterment. Therefore before leaving the subject I suggest that a regional resources and development bank might be established in those Arab countries. I also suggest that the initial amounts for the fund could be gathered through the medium of nations in the United Nations that would contribute. Something resembling a beginning, it seems to me, would be a sum of about $500 million, to assist in a redistribution from the "have" Arab countries to the "have not" Arab countries. By that method, and possibly, sir, by that method alone, will we of the western world be able to help that million and a half square miles. Because if there is a place anywhere on the earth's surface that is a spawning ground for communism, it is that area. The more they can do to help themselves, the greater will be their appreciation of the methods and procedures of parliamentary processes, freedom of religion and freedom of speech—those things we appreciate and they do not have.

Before leaving this sorry mess in the Middle East I would quote the words of the poet Prior who said:

> Who breathes must suffer, and who thinks must mourn;
> And he alone is bless'd who ne'er was born.

[Mr. MacDougall.]

In this whole geographic area of which I have spoken, I am happy to say, there is at least one bright spot; and that one bright spot is Israel. At the United Nations I have heard this question asked: Is Israel a threat to the Arab world? The answer, Mr. Speaker, is unquestionably in the affirmative. Yes, she is—but it is not a fear from conquest but rather a fear from example.

Israel today is a democratic country that has within its confines more than 840,000 Arab refugees. She is educating them. She is giving every opportunity imaginable to all the various categories of people, rich and poor, who are within the confines of her geographic area. Let us not forget that should those potholes on the road to peace become increasingly jarring—and certainly with bad weather and the cold war they might do that—then we have at least one hope in that vast area, the hope of a democratic country that is loyal to the principles of democracy.

Tonight on this occasion I am glad to pay my tribute to the people of Israel who, under difficult circumstances, in my opinion are doing a terrific job in the rehabilitation and further development of that country.

I have already mentioned the multiplicity of parties, the lack of loyalty, the disunity and hatred that exist there. I wonder if we cannot learn a lesson from them. Although we have not a two-party system in this country, a system in which I thoroughly believe for the proper working of democracy, we still have national unity and national loyalty, despite the fact that we have twice two political parties sitting in the House of Commons.

I wonder, if we go along negligent of our duty as liberal democrats—and I use the small "l"—how long we can expect in a spirit of complacency to anticipate that this unity, harmony, benevolence and good will is going to continue. Will it go on ad infinitum or will it terminate within the near future? I ask hon. members to give that thought. How long, oh Lord; how long?

Now I come to the latter part of my remarks—and in doing so I am sorry my good friend from Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is not in his seat, because I appreciated his intricate skating and shadow boxing of a few weeks ago when he so effectively, without an answer from my Tory friends, sabotaged their political effort. I was very much surprised by that.

It may be that in the Tory party there are political diagnosticians who are much smarter than I am; but I am right here to tell you that if I had been a Tory that day I would have been forced to rise to my feet and challenge, if not deny some of the accusations the hon. member for Macleod made on that occasion.

Mr. Hodgson: He was singing hymns that day.

Mr. MacDougall: And if my hon. friend who sits behind me wants to join in the singing of hymns, that is all right with me. I can sing them as lustily as anybody in the house. The situation however was one that startled me. And I might say before I go further on that particular aspect of this non-political discourse that despite the work done by the then acting leader of the Tory party, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the absence of the permanent leader of that party from the house was in my opinion as conspicuous as the crash of a giant cedar against an opening in the horizon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacDougall: My good friends laugh at that. If their leader was to leave them through illness I would feel sorry for them as well. It is not every party that is as fortunate as the Liberal party that has alternates always ready to take over. It is a fine thing for democracy that you can do that, but it is not always easily done. In a more or less serious, and at the same time jocular manner, I would liken my Social Credit friends to a mulish party. You may interpret that as being stubborn. I do not wish you to put that interpretation on it at all. It would be unfair. But their party is composed of Liberals, and I might say former diehard Tories, who have joined the bandwagon of Social Credit. Because they have no lineage, if I might put it that way, certainly no long lineage of socred doctrine behind them, it is in order, in my opinion, to say that they are mulish because they are riding a hybrid organization. They are like a mule because they have no pride of inheritance and no hope for posterity.

As I listened to the attack of the hon. member for Macleod—and I am sorry he is not here, because I told him that I was going to speak in the external affairs debate—my mind goes right back to the Old Testament. I shall now quote from the second book of Samuel, chapter 20, verses 9 and 10. If hon. members do not think I am telling the truth I advise them to look it up for themselves when they go home.

> And Joab said to Amasa, Art thou in health, my brother?

That is the way the hon. member for Macleod kicked off that day. He praised two or three of the Tory members, particularly the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). He also spoke in glowing terms of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) until the hon. member for Kamloops interjected a remark which he did not like. Then he said: Look, my friend, be careful or I will not say nice things about you. Was that not exactly like Joab and Amasa? I continue:

> Art thou in health, my brother? And Joab took Amasa by the beard—

I love this.

> And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.

Ah, here is the tragedy, stark and naked.

> But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand: so he smote him therewith in the fifth rib,—

I remember that I used to do that when I was a youngster.

> —and shed out his bowels to the ground, and struck him not again; and he died.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This might be a convenient time to advise the hon. member that his time has also expired.

Mr. MacDougall: I have a very few words left, and if I can have the unanimous consent of the house I should like to finish them. Have I unanimous consent?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If so, it is my duty to remind the hon. member that we are engaged in a debate on external affairs, and I would appreciate it very much, as I am sure hon. members would, if he would confine his remarks to that subject.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that you brought up that objection, because there is no question of doubt that what I am speaking on now can have a marked effect upon external affairs.

In conclusion, sir, the possible effect on external affairs is this. We talk rather jocularly about the words that appeared in print all across Canada a couple of weeks ago to the effect that a Russian scientist had developed a two-headed dog. We never for a moment thought that right here in Canada we have a two-headed party. We have a party that could some day bring about a change in external affairs, one part of which preaches Toryism and practises it, while the other head of that party preaches Douglas Social Credit and the just price. How the bones of Mr. Aberhart must turn over in his grave when he realizes, if they do that in that happy region beyond the Jordan, that in the days when he was at his height he talked about bankers' toadies as being the most damnable thing on earth, and yet a few weeks ago in British Columbia where we have a Social Credit government, the Canadian Bank of Commerce took on to their board of directors a former minister of the Social Credit administration.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. MacDougall: I shall conclude my remarks before I am smitten on the fifth rib and die. Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask everyone in this house and everyone in this country to re-educate themselves individually and collectively in the form of freedom that we all enjoy, and to live within our minds and our hearts the words written by the poet, Arthur Hugh Clough:

> And not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light;
> In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly!
> But westward, look, the land is bright!

God save the Queen.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat at a loss as to just what to say in following my good friend and neighbour, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall). He has gone all the way from the Old Testament right down to the present Liberal party in Canada. Believe me, that is a long drop. My purpose in taking part in this debate is to get back to the subject of external affairs, but in view of the hour I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall take up interim supply, supplementary estimates and other items that may be available in supply. It is possible that the bill with respect to veterans allowances may be reported. If it is it might be desirable that it be put through its final stages in the house, if the report appears to justify that, so that we may have royal assent before the end of this month if the other place agrees with us.

Mr. Green: What does the minister mean by other items in supply?

Mr. Harris: We will take citizenship and immigration, which I believe has been reported by the committee.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—CORRECTION OF CERTAIN PRESS REPORTS

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Three French-language newspapers, Le Droit, Le Soleil and La Presse, have printed a summary of a speech delivered by me in Toronto, last Tuesday, regarding the Canadian flag. Now one of the paragraphs is not accurate, and the same inaccuracy appears in all three papers and probably in other Canadian Press dispatches.

The member added that, if Canada cannot have any national flag, the red ensign should at least carry a larger maple leaf and be rid of its outdated emblems.

L'Action Catholique of March 24 published another dispatch which is even more inaccurate than the one I have just quoted.

Toronto—Mr. Jean-François Pouliot, Liberal member for Temiscouata, asked for a "distinct and official" Canadian flag without the maple leaf. He told the Toronto junior board of trade that the union jack could fly next to this new national flag, but that it should not eclipse it.

The reports published by the Toronto Telegram and the Ottawa Journal were far more accurate. Briefly, here is what I said:

(Text):

I do not want the union flag to be minimized as a fraction of the flag. If we are to have it, let us have it full-size, but let us also have a truly Canadian flag. Both could be hoisted together.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pouliot: I continue:

Is it not the time to have a distinctive and official Canadian flag bearing only one emblem, a large maple leaf, which will tell all the other nations of the world that Canada is the greatest of them all?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: I should not want the intervention of the hon. member to create a precedent and, if I did not call him to order before, it was because I had doubts as to his right to raise the question of privilege in this house for the purpose of correcting newspaper reports of a speech he made outside the house. The hon. member, being an expert in procedural matters, may not share my doubts on this point; at any rate, I should like to make these remarks in order that this case be not considered as a precedent.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 281, to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.—Mr. Nixon.

TRADE

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON UNITED STATES RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the representations made to the United States Senate finance committee as to the views of the administration in relation to the quantitative restrictions on the imports of crude oil from Canada and elsewhere, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if the Canadian government will make it abundantly clear to the United States administration that the proposal to have these restrictions enforced by individual producers is no more acceptable than is the proposal to have the restrictions imposed by the government and that if this type of proposal is persevered in it is likely to disturb very seriously Canadian confidence in our trading relations with the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the proposal of the administration antedates the legislation that was introduced in the United States congress. Both proposals were known to this government when our protest was filed and I think the subject matter of our protest deals adequately with both proposals.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF TERM USED BY INCOME TAX APPEAL BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question asked on March 21 by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) who inquired what the income tax appeal board meant by the term "psychological discounts" when reviewing the case of a Winnipeg lumber firm, I would state that evidently he has reference to a decision of the income tax appeal board in the case of McDonald-Dure Lumber Co. Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue.

This company in selling lumber to its customers allowed a discount, presumably for prompt payment. In its income tax returns the company deducted the amount of the discounts from its accounts receivable. The assessor considered that the discount was only a contingent reserve and disallowed the deduction claimed. At the hearing the company established that the discount was always given the customer even if payment was late and the board therefore found that it was not a contingent reserve. Mr. Fordham, the member of the board who rendered the decision, made the statement that "the amount of the discount was added to an account simply for the psychological effect on the customer who was led to believe that by paying his account promptly his bill would become 10 per cent less". The term "psychological discounts" was apparently used by a newspaper in reporting this judgment.

It might be explained that in assessing taxpayers on an accrual basis all sales made in the year are included in income—less a reasonable reserve for bad debts—whether the customer pays or not. Had these discounts been established to be contingent only they would not be allowed as a deduction until the account was paid and the discount in fact established.

REPORTED NON-COMPLIANCE WITH ACT BY POST OFFICE OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the Acting Postmaster General can inform the house what steps are proposed to alleviate the considerable inconvenience caused departmental employees in Montreal and Ottawa by the department's non-compliance with certain provisions of the Income Tax Act.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any of the facts alleged in this so-called question but I will have inquiries made.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF DEBATE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the understanding, which appears to have been quite clear in the minds of hon. members of this house, that the Prime Minister would be making a further statement during the debate on external affairs in regard to the commonwealth conference, and in view of the desire of some of us to take part in that discussion, may I ask the Prime Minister if it is his intention to do so and when we may expect the resumption of the debate we were engaged in yesterday?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gave no undertaking about a further statement in connection with the prime ministers' conference. I said that there would be an opportunity to discuss that conference when the debate on external affairs was taking place and the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) did discuss it yesterday during the course of his remarks.

Replying to the second part of the question, there are many matters that we are anxious to have dealt with by the house. My colleague who has been leading the house has been discussing with the representatives of the other parties the most convenient arrangements that can be made for that purpose. I am not in a position to make any statement as to when it will be possible to dispose of the various matters.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if it will not be possible to fix a definite date so that in regard to a subject which is of such paramount concern and which was dealt with by only a very few members yesterday we might have a definite indication as to when it will be coming up so that appropriate arrangements may be made by those hon. members who may wish to participate in the debate.

Mr. St. Laurent: I hope that can be arranged to the satisfaction of all hon. members.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF INCREASES IN PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of what is already being done in the three western provinces and in view of Ontario's offer to match any federal aid boost to old age pensioners, will the government consider increasing the amount of the pensions paid under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Old Age Security Act and the Blind Persons Act?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend did not give me notice of his intention to ask this question, but after listening to him I think it is quite apparent that the hon. member has had that question replied to by implication so many times that there is no need for any further comment now.

An hon. Member: The silent treatment.

Mr. Knowles: How many times can you say "no"?

POSTAL SERVICE

SEVEN ISLANDS—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General. Following the question which I addressed to him on February 10 concerning the improvement of the mail service to the district of Seven Islands and certain localities to the east of Seven Islands, is he in a position to let me know if the department has now reached a decision?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. In answer I may say that the department has made arrangements for the Seven Islands district to be served six times per week in the summer instead of four times, and for certain localities east of Seven Islands to be served twice weekly instead of once. The improvement of the winter service is still under consideration.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Mr. Harris moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $515,411,790.67, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the items to be voted, as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament; and in addition thereto, a sum not exceeding $137,500, being one-half of the amount of item 437, a sum not exceeding $439,942, being one-sixth of the amount of items 193, 196, 200, 201, and a sum not exceeding $1,975,296.08, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 18, 37, 439, 440, of the said estimates be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the annual request for interim supply which has always been granted after full consideration by the committee. The custom has been to ask that two months' supply be granted on all the items which are to be included in the estimates, and that custom is being followed this year.

In addition, there are several other items in which more expenditure is made in that two months' period than in the latter part of the year, and as a consequence we are asking for a sum additional to the one-sixth of those items. They are set out in the resolution and they refer particularly to the Canadian international trade fair, as that expenditure will be made almost immediately. They also refer to the unemployment insurance commission, with respect to certain items which have to be paid at this time of the year; and they refer to the Senate and the House of Commons, the major portion of the cost of these items coming at this time of the year. In agriculture they refer to experimental farm services and other items; in trade and commerce, to electricity and gas inspection services, weights and measures, etc. Therefore the total amount being requested is as set out in the resolution.

There is no item which is being released to a greater extent than two-thirds, and in this case I wish to give the assurance which is given on every occasion when this bill is passed concerning the right and privilege of hon. members to criticize, or in fact to refuse supply at a future date. I give the necessary undertaking.

Mr. Macdonnell: I should like to ask the minister whether his undertaking is given to the actual members now sitting in this house, or merely to members of parliament from time to time; because a question arose about that point in 1949, when the minister took the position that in view of the pending election it was not necessary that the members sitting in the house at that time be the members for whom the undertaking was eventually carried out.

This question has always been a little hazy in my mind, and I rise now because I thought in view of the fact that we have a new Minister of Finance it would be an excellent time to have the point fully clarified.

Mr. Harris: I am not familiar with what the future might hold, of course, but it seems to me it is almost a physical impossibility to have an election in the period of time covered by this request; therefore I think it is unlikely.

Mr. Macdonnell: If the minister will look back to 1949 he will find how it is possible.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Interim Supply

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Harris moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely:

1. The sum of $515,411,790.67, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the items set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1956;
2. The sum of $137,500, being one-half of the amount of item 437 of the said estimates;
3. The sum of $439,942, being one-sixth of the amount of items 193, 196, 200, 201 of the said estimates; and
4. The sum of $1,975,296.08, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 18, 37, 439, 440 of the said estimates; as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 284, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1956.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 4—$439,492 granted for 1955-56.

Mr. Knowles: I wish to say something regarding schedule B which is referred to in clause 4. I am in your hands, sir, as to whether I should do it now or wait until you call the schedule.

The Chairman: Schedule B will be called in due course.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

On schedule B—Labour and legislation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, according to schedule B it would seem that in addition to the two months which is being asked for with respect to all the items in the main estimates, an additional two months is also being requested with respect to items 193, 196, 200 and 201. I am particularly interested in item 193, which reads:

To provide for the transfer of labour to and from places where employment is available and expenses incidental thereto, in accordance with regulations of the governor in council.

I assume that the reason the government is now asking for a total of four months out of the twelve in this item is as a result of the unemployment situation at the present time. What concerns me is this, Mr. Chairman. Despite the fact that we know that the unemployment situation this year is worse than it was last year, according to the main estimates the total amount to be asked for this year for this purpose is only half what was asked for last year. I am looking at page 34 of the main estimates where it is noted that $200,000 was voted for this purpose last year. But only $100,000 is being asked for this same purpose this year. If it is intended to expend four-twelfths of the year's amount under this item in the next little while, what will happen if further money is needed for this purpose.

Mr. Harris: The hon. member knows quite well what will happen. We will have a supplementary estimate next year.

Mr. Knowles: Is it possible to get from anyone on the government side a statement as to what is happening right now under this item, how much is being spent week by week or month by month, or how many people are being assisted to move from one place to another in order to obtain work?

Mr. Harris: Not at this moment. I will get the information and give my hon. friend what I have.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, may I, by consent, ask the minister a question with regard to clause 6, the power to borrow, which was not apparently in the act last year?

Mr. Harris: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Macdonnell: I am asking with regard to paragraph 6 or clause 6, the power to raise a loan.

Mr. Harris: The borrowing power was contained last year in the final appropriation bill. This year, since we have almost reached the limit of that power, we thought it would be appropriate to have a section here giving us power for this coming fiscal year to borrow the same amount as was borrowed last year. I am told that the borrowing authority is down to about $50 million at the moment. This bill will provide for the same borrowing authority that would normally be asked for and obtained in, say, May or June.

Schedule agreed to.

Schedule C agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By leave, shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Harris moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production service—

Health of animals—

552. To provide for payment of compensation to owners of animals or poultry affected with diseases coming under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which have died or have been slaughtered in circumstances not covered by the above act and regulations made thereunder, and to provide for payment to owners for loss of cattle during treatments for immunization against hemorrhagic septicaemia, all as detailed in the estimates, $7,725.

Mr. Charlton: Is the Minister of Agriculture going to be here to answer these questions, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister advise me about the first item amounting to $7,725? I am not criticizing it. I am just curious as to how and when they started this practice of paying this money out for animals that died, I presume, from the time they are immunized at Winnipeg until they arrive at Toronto or probably at the farm. I wonder whether the minister will explain that point.

Mr. Harris: As I think my hon. friend knows, last year it was decided to experiment with respect to certain diseases that overtake animals and also with respect to the treatment to be given especially with regard to those animals that are shipped from the west to the east. The result was that, in the course of carrying out this experiment, certain cattle died. The items set out here totalling $6,090 are the intended payments to the farmers who would ordinarily stand to lose. I notice that most of them or, in fact, all of them, are in the east and a large number of them are in western Ontario.

Mr. Charlton: That is to be taken for granted, Mr. Chairman, because they are all feeder cattle coming in from the west to western Ontario.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: I do not think they have much trouble with anything else.

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Charlton: They are immunized at Winnipeg.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister this question. Do I understand that these are cattle that have been treated for septicaemia and thereafter have died?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): If these cattle were treated prior to shipment, it seems most unusual, does it not, that they should die? That is the regular procedure in the shipping of cattle, according to my information and knowledge of the shipping of cattle. We generally have little loss if the cattle are immunized for septicaemia prior to shipment. This would seem to me to be a heavy loss if they were properly immunized prior to shipment. I wonder whether there is any further explanation with regard to that matter.

Mr. Harris: No. I do not think any further explanation can be made, Mr. Chairman. The fact of the matter is just what I said before. This was an experimental treatment of animals. As a result, certain animals died; and the department feels that they ought to bear the loss rather than the owners who agreed to submit their cattle to this experiment.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I wonder just why the department undertook this experiment. In respect of cattle going to the ordinary feeder channels through the Winnipeg market, the farmer undertakes his own responsibility. Is this going to be a procedure that is extended to all farmers shipping feeder cattle or is it merely with respect to those coming to eastern Canada?

Mr. Harris: I presume that from time to time the Department of Agriculture will carry out these experiments and tests under the conditions that they think would be most appropriate. It might be the shipment of feeder cattle one year; it might be some other form another year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister one question with regard to the nature of the compensation. For instance, a number of farmers bring to my attention the fact that where their cattle have been destroyed or at least have been found to be unfit for human consumption by reason of those animals suffering from lockjaw, there is no compensation. There have been quite a number of cases recently in which farmers have taken their cattle to the packers, where it has been found that they were suffering from lockjaw and claim for compensation was denied. Why is there that restriction?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I am devoting my attention only to those items that we are recommending for payment. Discussion on whether these animals ought to be paid for, I would suggest, could be had on the estimates for the coming year.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister how many cattle were treated for septicaemia under this program and how many were in different shipments? I should also like to know the total shipments which were made, those shipments which were treated and those which were not treated; and also in those shipments which were not treated, how many died. I should like to have that information if any record is made of those shipments.

Mr. Harris: The total number of animals which were subjected to the test ran to 9,400. Of those, we are paying for 73.

Mr. Bryce: I do not know whether or not the minister has this information, but on what basis is this compensation paid? Is it so much a head, so much a hundredweight or according to whether the animals were purebred or commercial animals?

Mr. Harris: I notice that the payments vary from a low of $77 in one case up to a total of $1,100 in another, so I take it that it was on the basis of the value of the animals.

Mr. Bryce: The $1,100 would be for how many?

Mr. Harris: Eleven animals.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Perhaps I did not make myself completely clear. What I wanted to know was how many cattle that were treated died and how many that were not treated died. I take it we are trying to determine the effect of this experiment and I should like to know how successful it was.

Mr. Harris: As I understood it, my hon. friend asked how many were subjected to the treatment and how many died. I gave those figures, 9,400 and 73. What is the other figure he is asking for?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The number of cattle that were untreated which died. Then I would have a comparison.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, but I cannot hear.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): How many were shipped which were not treated and which died of septicaemia?

Mr. Harris: The figures I have relate only to those which were treated. I have no information as to the numbers that were not treated because we are not concerned with those.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Then I take it we cannot have the information which would enable us to decide whether or not the experiment was successful. It could very well be that there were few losses among those which were not treated. In that case the experiment would not be successful. If the minister does not have the information, I suppose we will have to leave it at that. I should also like to know something with respect to a rather new disease, and I think it would come under this item. I want to inquire about what is termed the black disease which is a type of blackleg or septicaemia. The symptoms are rather difficult to diagnose. Has the department made any provision to investigate that disease which is occurring in western Canada, particularly in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Harris: My answer again must be what it was to the hon. member for Prince Albert. We are concerned here with the expenditure of money for certain purposes, and if the hon. member has other questions in mind he can ask them on the main estimates.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has suggested that this is an experiment and has said that 9,400 animals were tested. As I understand it, they are given an injection at Winnipeg to ward off hemorrhagic septicaemia. Is it a case of some of the animals having died after the injection? What happened to them? Where did it happen? Did it happen in the railway yards, on the trains coming east or after they arrived here? Under what circumstances were the animals slaughtered?

Mr. Harris: The animals died at various times. Some of them arrived in the east and were treated a second time and then died on the farm. Others died in transit. Of the 9,400, approximately 500 showed some signs of this disease and 73 died at one time or another.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I think this is rather important from the point of view of the livestock producers. Do I understand that cattle which were healthy were treated with the vaccine for hemorrhagic septicaemia and then either en route or after arriving at their destination 73 of them died?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. McIvor: That is what he said.

Item agreed to.

Terminal services—

554. Freight assistance on western feed grains—further amount required, $2,000,000.

Mr. Pearkes: This item brings the amount for freight assistance up to $19,500,000, I believe, by adding the $2 million to the original vote. I presume this amount is necessary because it has been decided to do away with the reduction in freight assistance announced earlier this session and restore the assistance paid on feed grains to British Columbia. If that is so, I should like to take this opportunity to thank the minister for having corrected the mistake made earlier this session. Of course, if it is not I would ask the minister to explain exactly what this amount is required for.

Mr. Harris: I should like to be the recipient of the good wishes of the hon. member but I am afraid I cannot be. This is in fact another $2 million that will be needed for the payment of feed grain subsidies in the year ending next week. It merely indicates that the original vote of $17 million was not sufficient for that purpose and that there has been a much greater demand on the vote than has been the case in former years. This item is for the purpose of providing the extra money we expect to spend before the books are closed for this year.

Mr. Herridge: Like the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, my constituency is very interested in the question of freight assistance on western feed grains. Since the government announced its change of policy I have been flooded with letters from poultry producers, dairymen, farmers' institutes and other agricultural organizations all expressing dismay at the government's change of policy and urging reconsideration. They have asked me to try to melt the minister's heart. It is a very serious matter for many of the poultry producers and dairymen in my constituency particularly because they live under somewhat unusual circumstances. They do not enjoy the good transportation and other facilities that exist in many places on the prairies.

One letter I received from the secretary of the Fauquier farmers' institute brings to my attention particularly what the loss of the $5 a ton means to the producers of the Arrow lakes area. The secretary advises me that egg prices have been at the lowest level for some years, an average of 16 cents per dozen lower than 1953. These two conditions are province-wide and that is the reason for the province-wide complaint from British Columbia with respect to the reduction in freight assistance. In the district I represent there are certain other difficulties that are more or less local. As a result of the loss of the C.P.R. steamship service on the Arrow lakes, it costs the farmers of that area $5 a ton more to move their grain by means of the present service than it did last year. In addition, certain other difficulties have arisen because of the change in service.

I am not going to delay the committee except to say that this is a serious situation for many dairymen and poultry producers in my constituency and will have serious effects on them in making a satisfactory livelihood. Because of the pioneer conditions under which some of them live it will mean complete bankruptcy. Therefore I do ask the minister to bring my remarks to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to see if something cannot be done to restore at least partially the assistance which has been so helpful to these pioneer producers in the years past.

Mr. Hahn: Earlier in the year I spoke at some length on the question of freight assistance. I was hoping, as did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, that the minister had prevailed upon the Minister of Agriculture to let him include $2 million for freight assistance on feed grain for the people of the west and British Columbia. I seriously hope that the Minister of Agriculture will look into this whole question to see if we cannot find some way of assisting these agricultural people in British Columbia. I can only repeat what I said before in respect to the need, and the fact that the prices received by the farmers are low while the cost of feed is high, making it practically impossible for these people to remain in business in the lower mainland area.

I know the minister is aware of the situation, and I know only too well that if he had the money available he would say, "I see no better place in Canada to put it than in British Columbia". I am looking forward to the time when he can make some money available to assist us in the way we believe we should be assisted.

Mr. Charlton: The item in the estimates last year was $17 million, and that amount was spent. This addition of $2 million would bring the amount up to $19 million, yet the estimate for this year has been reduced to $15,500,000. Does the minister suggest that is the amount to be dropped, $3·5 million for this coming year? Why the huge drop in this freight assistance?

Mr. Harris: I am sure that is a good question to ask on the main estimates when the item of $15,500,000 is before the committee.

Mr. Thatcher: I hesitate to speak on this item, yet I have had some views on it for quite a few years and I should like to lay them before the minister today. I want to emphasize that they are only my own views. The hon. member for Kootenay West expressed very ably a moment ago the views of this party.

This item of $2 million is going to mean that in the current fiscal year the government will have paid out $19 million on feed grain subsidies. This will bring the total amount which the taxpayer has been assessed for this subsidy, since its inception, to $222 million. Now, that is a good deal of money. I hope before this item passes the Minister of Finance will express an opinion as to whether or not it is actually of great value to the farmer. I ask the house to remember for a moment the original purpose of this particular legislation. Hon. members will recall that it was introduced during the war years to encourage farmers to grow more hogs and beef, in order to make meat available to Great Britain at a time when she could not get enough meat from Holland, Denmark and her other customary sources of supply.

I feel that the original purpose of the legislation has long since been achieved. Once you get a subsidy on the books, it is very difficult to remove it. I know there would be howls of anguish if it were removed. Nevertheless I should like the minister to state whether or not some emergency still exists which would justify this subsidy. The hon. member for Kootenay West has said that certain chicken farmers in his riding might go bankrupt if the subsidy were removed. If that is the case, of course it should be taken into consideration. Yet I am still not convinced in my own mind that this huge expenditure is a sound one. I have never been able to find evidence to prove that the payment of this subsidy meant western farmers were better off. Some people may argue that we could not sell our feed grains in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec if we did not have the subsidy. If anyone can prove such a fact, I might have to change my opinion. But to date I have found no such evidence.

As a matter of fact, I feel that if the subsidy were not there the prairie farmer would be much more likely to feed his grain on the farm in the west, and might in the long run be better off for having done that. If we must have a subsidy on feed grain to British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, why do we not also have some kind of subsidy on the prairies? Actually, this measure is discriminatory against the prairies. If a Saskatchewan farmer in the south is shipping feed grain to the north where there might happen to be a shortage, there is no subsidy on that shipment at all. Actually, the freight rate is higher than it would be on a shipment all the way down to eastern Canada. I am only speaking for myself, but I do find myself most unenthusiastic about this expenditure. I am not convinced it is doing anyone very much good, except some of the feed dealers.

Mr. Brooks: I just wanted to say a few words in reply to what the hon. member has said. He spoke about assistance to Ontario and Quebec, but I might point out to him that it is of great assistance to the dairy farmer and meat producer in the maritime provinces. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I do not know just what the maritime farmers would do if it were not for this freight assistance on feed grain.

Mr. Gillis: Fold up.

Mr. Brooks: They would not fold up altogether, but they would come close to it, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said. The hon. member mentioned subsidies to the maritime provinces, Ontario and Quebec but I should like to ask him about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. What help do the maritime provinces get from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act? We have never objected to it. If you make an estimate of what has been paid under that legislation, you will find it runs into $100 million or $150 million.

Mr. Thatcher: It is $75 million since the act was passed.

Mr. Brooks: Yes, and it is growing all the time.

Mr. Weir: Do the maritimes not get something for the marshlands?

Mr. Brooks: We get a few million dollars, but there is no comparison between the two. The marshland payments have been compared a good many times in this house with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There is another act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, under which many millions of dollars collected from the public all across Canada have been contributed to the west. I am indeed astonished that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre would speak in this house about subsidies going to Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces when there is all this money being paid to western Canada, without any complaint coming from the people in these other areas.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre asked a question and the hon. member for Royal has answered it, but I feel I should answer it also even if the Minister of Finance does not. The Minister of Finance was down in my constituency this summer, but I only saw him for a split second as he was driving through the Annapolis valley. He could very easily have answered the question from what he saw in that one constituency. The expenditures which have been made under this item throughout the years would be justified by conditions existing in that constituency. I am not particularly favourable to the payment of subsidies, and I am not discussing the relative merits of each of these expenditures, but I can say without fear of contradiction that the payment of this subsidy brings a more direct return to people generally than any other type of expenditure that could be made.

As a result of these payments the dairy industry and other forms of the livestock industry generally, as well as the poultry industry, are able to continue. My county of Kings, Nova Scotia, is now the largest poultry producer in Canada. This has come about with developments during wartime and since.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the Newfoundland market.

Mr. Nowlan: All these factors enter into that situation, but it could not exist if it were not for this freight rate subsidy, because of course the cost of moving feed grain all the way across the country to the eastern border is quite large. I did not intend to mention this item at all, but I could not sit here and let someone challenge it. I am satisfied that some items should be questioned more than others, and some are more valuable than others; but I am satisfied that there is no item more valuable than this one in the whole group of supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pearkes: When the minister replies to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, I hope he will point out to him that the prairie farmers enjoy the farmer-to-farmer benefit in the sale of their feed grain. When one prairie former is anxious to unload a lot of his grade 5 wheat he just sells it to his neighbour, and they do not have to go through the wheat board. But when the British Columbia farmer has to buy his wheat it has to go through the wheat board and he has to pay the premium thereon. I hope the minister will point out to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre that there would be no chickens and no turkeys on the prairies if it were not for the early-hatching eggs which come from British Columbia.

Mr. Gillis: It is much easier to justify this subsidy than the gold mining subsidy. It is national in scope and very necessary in the part of the country in which I live, particularly in relation to the poultry farmer. Last year, quite a few people came to see me on this particular question of feed grains. Despite the subsidy, feed grains have gone up in price by $5 a ton pretty well all across the country. In the last year the price of eggs has gone down in the maritime provinces. If they are to continue their operations on the present basis, then they need this subsidy. If it were not for this subsidy there is no doubt as to what would happen in Kings county in regard to poultry, and all through the maritime provinces. It is a very lucrative industry there and has been built up largely because of this subsidy. I am not going to argue it; I know the minister is taking the right position on it and he should continue it.

I would point out to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre that this subsidy is a great help in the marketing of feed grains in the part of the country from which he comes. In many sections of the country where these feed grains are needed we have to drag them thousands of miles across the country because we cannot grow feed grains and other grains in many parts of Canada. They do not grow there. They have to be obtained from the United States on the eastern seaboard or from Saskatchewan and Manitoba and from other parts of the country that sell feed grains. Without this subsidy I am reasonably certain that we would not be taking feed grains from western Canada all the way across the country because we can get them much closer on the eastern seaboard. This is one subsidy that no hon. member who has any understanding of what it means and what it has meant would suggest for a moment should be discontinued. It is a freight rate subsidy. That kind of subsidy is necessary if we are to market our own goods provincially.

Mr. Charlton: I am sorry the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre brought up this question today. I can assure him that if we did not have this freight rate subsidy the western farmer would not have a very big market for his feed grain. I can also assure him that if they do not keep this subsidy the feeders in the east will be buying a great deal less of it. It is a very important part of government expenditure. If this subsidy is cut off—it has been reduced for next year—it will make a terrific difference in the number of pounds of feed grain sent down east, because the Ontario farmers are now in a position where they are working very close to the line. A few cents difference on a hundred pounds of grain would just make the difference between profit and loss.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I did not intend to speak on this item. However, my good friend the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre apparently is more or less speaking as an authority. I realize that, like me, he has gone into the production of Herefords and the raising of purebred cattle. I am not sure that he is familiar with all aspects of agriculture. I am very happy that at least on two occasions in his remarks he indicated he was speaking for himself and himself alone. I farm in that part of Saskatchewan whence he comes. I take the view, sir, as do most members of this party, that we are interested in agriculture from coast to coast. It may well be that in the economic society which we in this party visualize there might not be the necessity for some of those subventions and assistance. However, under the prevailing conditions I go along with the hon. members from the maritimes and from the coastal province who have indicated that if this freight assistance were not paid, then those people would be in a very difficult position indeed. Therefore, I support it.

Since we are talking about subsidies, I think we are taking a very short point of view when we are prepared to go along with the subsidization of gold mining, when we take it from one hole in Canada and put it in another hole in Kentucky and flood and protect it down there where it does nobody any good, if we object to subsidies on feed grains. Here we are talking about subsidizing feed grains for the little farmers, the people in the poultry industry who are making a living out of it. Surely, no one in this house would object to that idea.

I regret very much that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre does not agree with the principle which has been endorsed by the members of this group, namely, that we are interested in those engaged in agricultural production from coast to coast. I fully realize that during the war the freight assistance paid to Ontario hog producers, as an example, enabled those producers to produce their bacon hogs and receive at least $6 more for their finished hog than we received in the west. We did not mind that. We feel that every phase of Canadian agriculture in every province in Canada should get a square deal. I am very sorry that the government saw fit to cut down the subsidy by $5 a ton this year. I wish they had kept the subvention on certain grains going to different parts of Canada rather than to decrease it, as they have done.

Mr. Hosking: I had no intention of taking part in this debate until I heard the socialists introduce the topic of cutting off subsidies for Canadians. We have the wealthy farmer from Saskatchewan saying that his western farmers are no better off with this subsidy, and we find the Tories criticizing his remarks very much. Then the hon. member for Moose Mountain rises in his place and suggests there should be no subsidy on gold mining. Let me tell my hon. friend—

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I did not say that. I said that if hon. members were prepared to support gold mining subsidies, then surely they should not be reticent about supporting such assistance as this.

Mr. Hosking: I do not accept the correction, for he went on to say that it did no good. Let me tell him this. One dollar spent on the gold subsidy employs more men than money in any other subsidy.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hosking: It employs more men than any other subsidy paid by this house.

The Chairman: Order. May I remind the hon. member that we are discussing agriculture, not gold mining.

Mr. Hosking: I shall return to the subject of grain subsidies. This is one of the few subsidies that benefit farmers who raise livestock in the province of Ontario. There are not many farmers in Ontario who would criticize our government for continuing to pay the subsidy that it was wise enough to put on a few years ago, particularly when the type of agriculture that it benefits is not nearly as lucrative as the type of agriculture that is carried on in the western provinces.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the thing that is wrong with this item and with the government's policy in relation to subsidies on feed grains is not that the subsidy is too high but that the government is out to reduce the subsidy and if the present trend continues I am afraid it is out to get rid of it entirely. Along with other hon. members, I believe that the subsidy on feed grains is essential to the welfare of the agricultural industry in Canada from one end of the country to the other. I do not believe with anyone that this subsidy is peculiarly favourable to the people who are raising poultry or livestock, but rather that it results in widespread benefits to Canada as a whole.

Surely everyone will agree that one of the factors that must be considered when you quote a price for grain is the cost of freight from where it is produced to where it is finally consumed. One of the economic impediments to the general Canadian welfare and the welfare of the agricultural industry is the tremendous freight cost and this subsidy results to the benefit of the Canadian people. As a freight subsidy it is just as important as the $7 million subsidy toward the maintenance of trackage between Sudbury and the head of the lakes.

As a grain producer and as someone who believes that he knows something about the economics of agriculture I believe that when you pay a subsidy on grain, no matter who may receive the cheque, the effect is not only, as it is, to lower the cost of feed grain to the people who are raising poultry and livestock, but it also increases the return to the people who are producing. If you removed the freight cost entirely you would automatically decrease the cost of grain to the feeder and increase the price to the producer. This may not be completely correct when you are dealing with a commodity the price of which is set by international trade factors, but almost all the feed grains produced in Canada are consumed in Canada and I believe that this subsidy helps the whole agricultural industry.

As I said, the thing wrong with it is the fact that apparently the government is out to get rid of this subsidy as quickly as it can.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I have always been one who felt that we should be thankful for small mercies. Some time ago when this matter was under discussion and the announcement was made that there was to be a drastic reduction in the assistance on feed grain freight rates I raised opposition on behalf of those engaged in the poultry and hog raising industries in the Fraser valley. At that time I asked the government to reconsider the matter and try to do something to extend the assistance.

We all know that the regulations have been carried out as was stated. Since that time I have had a number of protests and communications with respect to the matter. Without doubt it is imposing a great hardship upon farmers in British Columbia because of the present depressed prices for farm products. They are facing a difficult situation at the present time. We are glad that the government has seen fit to retain at least a part of the assistance but we do hope that no consideration will be given at any time in the near future to the complete elimination of this assistance. On the other hand, we would like it raised to its previous level.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, are we discussing these estimates or next year's estimates? All of this talk about a reduction in the subsidy for next year is entirely out of order. There is only one question here: are we going to vote $2 million that we have spent up to August 1 last with reference to this freight assistance?

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that every party in the house supports the idea of an increased subsidy on feed grains. While the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said that he was speaking for himself, I would request that he make a point of suggesting to the Minister of Agriculture that an investigation committee be set up to inquire into the whole problem of the price of feed grain. Apparently the facts are such that there is such a large spread in prices that it makes it practically impossible for the poultry and cattle industries to continue in existence. I would earnestly suggest that the minister consider this point and provide a few million dollars in a later estimate to cover an investigation of problems affecting feed grains and the price spreads existing in western Canada today.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, like nearly everybody else, I did not intend to speak on this item and the only reason I am doing so now is to reply to what the Minister of National Revenue just said. He seems to indicate that all we are doing here is to act as a set of rubber stamps to authorize money which has been overspent by the government and which they now have to come and ask us to grant them at the last moment. The Minister of Finance shakes his head but he can correct me later.

I suggest that it is eminently proper that we should talk about the desirability of spending this money. As I understand it, we are authorizing an additional amount to take care of something unexpected which the government did not accurately forecast. I would have thought that if ever there was a time when the discussions should be wide open it would be now. I am sorry that I cannot contribute anything to the merits of the matter.

Mr. Harris: I thank hon. members for what has been said. I cannot quite agree with the hon. member for Greenwood because after all this is merely to provide extra money for a principle which has been adopted already and which is going to be carried out. This money is needed because a great many bills are coming in now, a greater number than was expected. This is not because of any imperfect forecast, although one cannot be accurate in these things, but because there have been much greater shipments of feed grain to the east during the past season than were expected.

Under these circumstances, and having in mind all that has been said, I am sure that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre will reconsider what he has said and realize that while there might have been originally some opposition, it seems to be apparent that there is widespread support for the theory that the subsidy is doing some good, not only for the producers of feed grains in the west but for those who market poultry and livestock in the east. I will draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to this discussion and I am quite satisfied he will be prepared when his estimates come forward to speak on any subject that has been raised here.

Special—

555. Amount required to recoup the agricultural products board account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural products board as at March 31, 1955, resulting from the importation, in 1951, and the marketing of butter by the board, $278,494.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the remarks with which the Minister of Finance prefaced his statement a few minutes ago definitely do not apply to this item. As far as this item was concerned, the amount voted last year was only $10,000 for the administration of the agricultural products board. We are now being asked to vote as a supplementary item an amount of $278,494 to cover, as is stated here, net operating loss resulting from the importation in 1951 and the marketing of butter by the board. Now, it is a far cry back to 1951, Mr. Chairman. I would be very doubtful whether very much of this figure of $270,000 odd is due and can be traced back to the importation of this butter in 1951. I would like to know first of all how much of this sum is attributed to the importation of 1951, and how it is so attributed.

Mr. Harris: Gladly, Mr. Chairman. In 1951 we imported 12,514,081 pounds of butter for which we paid $6,436,684. There were various import duties of one kind and another amounting to $1,116,421. There were handling charges to the extent of $420,862, making a total expenditure of $7,973,967. We sold the butter for $7,695,473, leaving a deficit of $278,494, which is the amount of this vote.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Harkness: Since this butter was imported in 1951, I wonder if the minister could tell us if it has taken the government four years to sell the butter, and therefore we are just now getting this as a supplementary estimate well on into 1955?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is true that a large part of the butter was sold before this current fiscal year, but there were a few bills outstanding a year ago and they overlapped into this year, and we need this vote for that purpose.

Mr. Harkness: I take it the reason there is a loss on this butter is that it was held in storage for a long time and storage charges are included in the figure $1,116,421, which I presume must be paid in connection with this butter. In other words, it would appear that there was no need to import the 12 million odd pounds of butter at that time, and that the government made an error in so doing. Four years later, acting on the assumption, I suppose, that the error had been pretty well forgotten, we are now being asked to pay for that error.

Mr. Harris: Of course one can jump to any conclusion one likes, but the facts do not bear out what my hon. friend has said. He will notice I said there were various import duties amounting to over $1 million. These were in fact duties paid on the butter imported into Canada, and came into the consolidated revenue fund. If you take $278,000 from that you will find there was a net profit on the transaction of something in the order of $800,000.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, on this item in respect to butter, could the minister state how much butter was in storage at the time of the importation of butter in 1951?

Mr. Harris: No, I could not.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I understand we have a carryover in storage from year to year and the idea is to keep on hand a sufficient quantity to meet the needs of the coming year in order to facilitate a sort of stabilization of the price. What is the government's policy in that regard?

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend surely remembers that back in 1951 there was practically no carryover; and while I am not prepared to say at the moment that this was the year I had in mind, there was a year when in the last two or three weeks of March butter increased in price by 20 or 30 cents a pound because of its scarcity in this country, and about that time we did import butter because there was not a large carryover.

Item agreed to.

556. To provide assistance for the replacement of maple production equipment—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two questions on this item. I wonder if the minister could say whether this is the item which provides aluminum pails for the maple sugar industry, and also if he could state the amount which appeared in the original estimates? I cannot find an item in the original estimates for this.

Mr. Harris: This is the item the hon. member has in mind. Over the years there has been a program of replacing buckets for use in collecting maple sugar. We had thought the job had been completed during the fiscal year ending a year ago, but we found during the course of this present fiscal year that a few were left outstanding, and this is the amount required to clear it up. I am informed that this is probably the last item of this kind.

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for his reply. This is one item to which I have strenuously objected over the years. I think for a number of years we were spending $500,000 a year in this way. It was then reduced to $300,000 and finally to $100,000. I am glad to have the assurance of the minister that this is probably the last time we will have this expenditure, because it just does not make sense to me that the taxpayers of Canada should be providing farmers with aluminum pails for collecting maple syrup. If we are going to supply the maple sugar industry with aluminum pails I do not see why we should not supply dairymen with pails and farmers with water pails. This is an expenditure which I hope will be wiped out once and for all.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, did the minister say this was the last year it would be paid?

Mr. Harris: No, I did not; I said probably.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say something concerning this item, in view of the fact that the minister is not certain the item will not appear again. I was rather intrigued by his statement, because when I came into this house as a freshman some years ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture about this item and he gave us a most interesting and dramatic story in explanation, of how some high pressure salesman had most efficiently sold a vast quantity of buckets which were resulting in lead poisoning. It was therefore necessary to clear up the matter by supplying aluminum pails.

That appeared to be a reasonable explanation which one could accept. But the whole trouble is, Mr. Chairman, that this epidemic of lead poisoning occurred in 1940, following which this program was launched. I am wondering what degree of tolerance toward lead poisoning has been developed in the last 15 years. The physical structure of the people who were subjected to this poisoning must have been very greatly toughened in the interval, or else everyone has died. Surely there must have been a cut-off date if it was a matter of lead poisoning. If the Minister of Agriculture had not told us that dramatic story I would not have bothered with it again.

Mr. Harris: It is very slow poisoning.

Mr. Nowlan: It is very slow; it is as slow as death, Mr. Chairman. I think there should be a cut-off if there is this danger of exposure to lead poisoning.

Mr. Harris: I can assure you the Minister of Finance agrees with you.

Mr. Nowlan: They should remove the poisonous materials altogether. It is a terrible thing that people should be subjected to it for 15 years while this government pays out a large sum of money each year. I do not know what the lifetime of a bucket is, but last year we purchased about 17 million buckets, which is no small amount. I do not know how they would look in this chamber, but I do not imagine we could pile them all in here. I wish the minister could say that the danger of lead poisoning has now ended and that this will be the last payment. If it is not, he had better bring in another supplementary estimate this afternoon and increase the amount so we can get rid of the poisonous buckets once and for all. I am sure the minister of health and welfare, if he knew about it, would be interested in the situation, because people should not be exposed to such terrible poisoning.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness I wish to ask the minister a question. I understand that some maple sugar producers are using plastic bags instead of pails and containers provided by the department. Has any consideration been given to looking into that matter? I notice this item has decreased since last year, and I wonder if the department is considering supplying the maple sugar producers with plastic bags, which would be an economic measure?

Mr. Harris: No, Mr. Chairman. As I have said this is probably, and I certainly hope it will be, the last item with respect to buckets.

Item agreed to.

557. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration —further amount required, $416,674.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I am quite interested in this item; and while I do not wish to cast any reflections on the minister, who has been very considerate in answering questions this afternoon, I do think perhaps it would be much better if we had the Minister of Agriculture with us on this item. I am quite interested in this matter, coming as I do from Saskatchewan where we have had a disastrous crop failure this year. On coming to my desk this morning I found that on Tuesday, March 8, an order in council was passed concerning a regulation with respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This item is an increase in expenditure on this account. I should like to ask the minister for a clarification of this order in council. It is a section added to the regulations which in effect, I believe, excludes certain farmers from being eligible for P.F.A.A. payments.

In former debates I have indicated to the government that there has been a considerable amount of complaint coming from my constituency with regard to P.F.A.A. payments. While the Minister of Agriculture the other day in the house gave me the assurance that farmers who are not satisfied may appeal for a recheck to the P.F.A.A. office in Regina, nevertheless I still have coming to my office complaints from various farmers who have not as yet been eligible for payment. I should like to have, if possible, a clarification of this order in council which, it would seem to me, makes it possible that again there will be the possibility of exclusion of farmers who, in view of the large-scale crop failure, I think should be eligible for payment. I hope the department will see fit to be just as lenient as possible this year with regard to payment of P.F.A.A. payments to farmers in Saskatchewan.

I want to point out that in some parts of my own constituency in particular we have had not only last year's crop failure but two or three years of extremely poor crops where we have had flooding. Consequently some farmers today are finding themselves in bad financial positions. I therefore hope that the minister can give me some clarification, if he has this order in council with respect to change in the regulations whereby a farmer now apparently is not eligible who has sown in 1954 10 acres of rust-resistant wheat and has had a yield of 10 bushels or more per acre.

In this regard I should just like to refer the minister to the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture when we were discussing this matter some weeks ago. At that time he stated that farmers who had planted over 10 bushels of rust-resistant wheat—and of course he was speaking of the Selkirk variety—would not need assistance. I should like to point out that if a farmer, by applying to the government agency for Selkirk seed, had planted in the neighbourhood of 10 acres of wheat, he might very well have received 20 bushels or 30 bushels of seed to the acre, which would give him no more than he would perhaps need for his seeding operations this year. Yet that yield would disqualify him from a payment.

I should also like to point out that it would seem to me that, as the regulations are now, while the farmer would be disqualified, he would apparently still be considered to be in the category or in other words in the six contiguous sections which under the act could be taken out as ineligible for payment. The regulation is therefore confusing to me. I hope we can have clarification of it. I simply want to point out that we have some extremely serious financial conditions existing in my constituency. Letters are coming to my office day by day. I hope that the minister will have the Minister of Agriculture look into this matter and be as lenient as possible in respect of these payments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word as well with regard to this item. I should like to ask the minister how many employees there are in P.F.A.A., I should like to know how many there were in 1953-54 and how many during the present year 1954-55, which increase has resulted in the material increase in connection with the administration costs.

I should also like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, through the Minister of Finance, the number of complaints that are being received—and I think this is generally so among members coming from the western provinces—respecting the administration of the act this year. For some reason there seems to be an unusual strictness and an unusual emphasis—to a degree that has not existed in recent years—on the letter of the law rather than on the spirit. That is particularly so in northern Saskatchewan. Each day letters are received asking how the distribution is proceeding.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture told me that the total expenditure this year would be some $20 million, of which some $15 million has already been expended, and that the payments are going forward at the rate of $1 million a week, as I recall the statement that he made. There certainly is no lack of officials in P.F.A.A., because that is one body that seems to be unusually "officialized", if one could use that expression, in employees engaged in the work of this administration.

I do not want to go beyond the bounds within the estimates as pointed out by the Minister of National Revenue; nonetheless this item does give an opportunity to refer to administration not in general but with a view to having removed certain causes of complaint. I want to point out this to the minister. This afternoon, almost in a matter of minutes the interim supply was passed in order to assist. That action showed a spirit of co-operation. I think it demands a similar spirit when these supplementary estimates are being considered.

Relying on that consideration I point out that within the last two or three days I have received letters from the various parts of Saskatchewan, and in particular from the northern part, respecting the administration of this act. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat referred to the difficult conditions existing in the western provinces this year, particularly in Saskatchewan. Everywhere there has been a demand that consideration be given by the government this year to a material increase in the amount of the prairie farm assistance payment per acre in view of the fact that the amount now provided for was established in 1939 and that while it was very helpful at that time on the basis of the purchasing power of money then, today the payments provided for are totally inadequate to maintain and to keep the farmer on the farm.

That is the purpose of this legislation, to keep the small farmer on the farm, and I suggest that even now the government give consideration to redrafting the act in order to remove a number of anomalies. The area for qualification should be reduced, a request that has already been made by the Liberal party in convention assembled in the province of Saskatchewan, re-emphasizing what we on this side of the house have brought to the attention of the government on a number of occasions. There are various points that should be considered: First, the question of increasing the amount of the payment; second, reducing the period for qualification; and, third, accelerating the distribution of the payments. There are certain areas in which the payments have been held back for some reason to a degree that has not applied elsewhere, and while I compliment the administration on the degree to which it has in fact disbursed so large a sum of money in such a short period of time there are nevertheless areas in which there should be early and immediate action.

Mr. Argue: I want to add my voice to that of other members in support of the general provisions of this act. I think it is quite understandable that a fairly large additional sum of money is needed this year to provide for administrative costs. The year which will end on March 31, 1955, is one in which western Canada has experienced a very serious and widespread crop failure. With the widespread crop failure and the large prairie farm assistance payments that must be made, it follows consequently that in order to administer the making of the payments and to assess what farmers are eligible for payments there must be a substantial sum voted for administration.

I have no complaint about supporting substantial sums of money for the administration of this act in years of crop failure. Sometimes I do have a question mark in my mind as to the size of the administrative costs and some of the travelling and other expenses in years when there is no crop failure and when one would expect the administrative costs to be very low. I support those who have pointed out the benefits of the act and who have said that payments should be doubled. That has been put forward by other members of this group and members in other parts of the house during this session.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain pointed out that a new order in council has been passed which will very materially affect the administration of the act. I am not too clear in my own mind just what the effect of the order in council will be. It provides that those portions of land cultivated by any one farmer which were sown to rust-resistant wheat in the year 1954, if the total area so sown comprises 10 or more acres and the average yield thereon is more than 10 bushels per acre, will be excluded from the act. As I understand the provision, it means that if a farmer sows more than 10 acres of land to rust-resistant wheat and consequently has a fairly good crop on that acreage of land the yield of that crop will be excluded from the computation of average yield on which payments are made.

If my interpretation of the order in council is correct, then it certainly is a step in the right direction. The department should, however, bear in mind that a number of farmers have sown 6 or 7 acres to Selkirk wheat, that the yield can be 20, 30 or 40 bushels an acre, and that if a third of the farmers in a given township have seeded even that small quantity of Selkirk wheat the chances are that including the yield on the Selkirk wheat in the general average would deprive the majority of farmers who have a total crop failure of any payments at all. If, as I say, my interpretation of the order in council is correct, it is a move in the right direction. However, if experience shows that even with this provision hardship is worked on farmers who were not fortunate enough to have any rust-resistant wheat, I would ask the government to take that into consideration and remove rust-resistant wheat entirely from the yield computations so that the vast majority of farmers with no Selkirk wheat will be able to get payments based on their actual yields of wheat not complicated by yields from rust-resistant varieties.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Prince Albert asked the minister how many people were involved, and I think he might answer that.

Mr. Bryce: I do not want to repeat what hon. members in this group have already said. I endorse what they have said. My problem concerns the interlake country that I represent, which has been badly hit with floods, with the result that in 1953 there was practically no crop, and in 1954 no crop at all. People there are in bad shape. In many of these districts no inspection has taken place yet. I have discussed the problem with the minister and he tells me that area comes under the P.F.A.A. But I am getting letters every day from these people saying that the inspector has not been there and that they have been told they do not come within the area.

I suggest to the minister that it would be helpful if a small map of the interlake country could be prepared. The Minister of Agriculture came over here and told me that practically the whole of my constituency was under P.F.A.A. If a map could be prepared on which shaded portions could be drawn to indicate the area that is not covered it would clear the air and help me tremendously in getting some recompense for the people of my district for the tremendous loss they have had.

I do not need to say any more. The hon. member for Moose Mountain and the hon. member for Assiniboia have pretty well said all that needs to be said. If the Minister of Finance will be good enough to try to get the Minister of Agriculture to have a map prepared for me I will appreciate it.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Harris: I will see if I cannot get a map drawn through the kindness of someone in the office of the Minister of Agriculture, and I will draw his attention to all that has been said here. In answer to the hon. member for Prince Albert, I have looked at the estimates of the current year and of next year and I find that full-time members on the staff of P.F.A.A. number 46 for the coming year and 40 for the past year. But I notice that the allowance made for casual employment is just about double. It has increased from $85,000 to $155,000. I take it that is casual employment for various persons carrying out part-time duties, although it does not give the numbers of those who would be doing that work. The large proportion of this item is of course for additional administrative costs brought about by the unusual situation that developed in the west last year, and I am quite satisfied that the government hopes to have the extra work done at the earliest possible moment. There is no doubt that conditions developed such as had not been expected or, indeed, had ever been experienced, in some parts of the west in the fall of last year. I would think that in the future wise estimating would still keep the estimates down somewhat from what they will be with this addition. At the same time, I would hope that we could find the money quickly to provide additional labour and additional administrative costs should we enter again into a period such as we had last year. Of course, none of us hope it will be necessary to spend this type of money again in the west.

What the hon. member for Moose Mountain, the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Prince Albert have said about the improvement, from their standpoint, that could be made in the act and in the administration of it, I am sure will receive the careful consideration of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I might mention, Mr. Chairman, that I received today a letter which indicates the interest that the farmers take in the continuance of the system, and their desire to avoid taking advantage of the public treasury. The suggestion was made that in order to extend the operation of the act there could be no serious objection to increasing the deductions that are made. These deductions are restricted to 1 per cent, and it was thought they could be increased to 2 per cent. This suggestion had been made by a number of farm organizations, their desire being to build ultimately a system whereby they will make their contribution to an insurance fund. To that end the farmers are prepared to ask for an increase in the amount of the deduction that is made, and this is an indication of the value that they place on this type of legislation.

Mr. Harkness: I was rather hoping that in his reply to the hon. member for Prince Albert the minister would have given the number of employees in 1953-54 and the number in 1954-55. He gave the number of employees on the permanent staff, but looking at last year's estimates one sees that there were 40 of those with total salaries of $139,000, and then there were casuals with a total salary of $85,000. The number of casual employees is not given. I take it that this sum we are voting today, which is more than double the amount for the permanent staff and the casuals, of $225,000, is practically all for the casual employees necessary as a result of the disastrous conditions last year. I quite appreciate that such conditions would necessitate the hiring of a considerably increased staff.

However, in addition to that I notice that the travelling expenses were $104,000, which we voted for this current year, and the extra travelling expenses are $190,000, which will make a total of $294,000. In other words, the increase in travelling expenses seems excessive. I wonder if the minister could give us the number of employees, particularly those casual employees, how many extra ones had to be secured because of the crop failure, and why the travelling expenses should go up such a large amount?

There is another point here. The minister said that budgeting for this should be kept down, and I agree with that. It should, I believe, however always be possible to have funds available in the event of crop failure to make these payments. Now, that is what has been done this year, I take it. This amount of $416,000 which we are voting has already been spent. In other words, it is purely a dead horse for which we are paying at the moment. The only portion of that which would not have been spent is what might happen to be owing in the past month for wages, I presume, and a small amount that might be owing for transportation. Most of this sum has already been spent. I just wondered from what particular votes it was taken, and under what authority, to cover these expenditures which I agree have to be made.

Mr. Harris: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have two votes that provide for money under these circumstances, miscellaneous and unforeseen and a general salaries vote. We have transferred moneys from these two votes to the extent of $186,000 in one case and $226,000 in the other. As my hon. friend has said, this is largely as a result of the additional staff and their cost of administration. I would suppose that the extraordinary increase in travelling allowances was necessitated by the fact the employees had to go around the west to a much greater degree than they had in the past. I think I could make the answer to my hon. friend without offence, by suggesting that this is one job that has to be done in a motor car and not in an office.

Under those circumstances I feel that the travelling expenses are justified. Indeed, I would think my hon. friend would suggest we increase them if necessary to get the work done and get the payments made to the farmers.

Mr. Harkness: You have not the numbers of them?

Mr. Argue: A member of the opposition cannot be asking, on the one hand, that the government accelerate the making of these payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and on the other hand complain about the extra administrative costs necessitated by the acceleration of the payments. If we are going to ask that the government do everything possible to get these payments into the hands of the farmers as quickly as possible, then that is bound to mean an increase in the administrative costs.

Mr. Lennard: You can check on the accounts, though.

Mr. Argue: Fine, that is very good. A question was asked as to the number of persons employed. I received an answer to a question I asked concerning the number of persons employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for Saskatchewan for 1954, as well as the number employed under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. I have not added the figures up, but the answer looks as voluminous as the answer I received a couple of years ago which showed that there were 2,000 persons listed as having received moneys under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the way of wages and sustenance, as well as under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

I have, however, made a quick calculation of the number of persons employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in Saskatchewan in 1954, and it appears to me as though there were some 550 persons employed. The minister, if I heard him correctly, said that there were around 46 persons employed on a permanent basis under this act. Could the minister tell me briefly what these 40 or 50 people who are employed on a permanent basis under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act do in a year in which there is little or no crop failure? The intriguing part to me is that some of the people employed on a permanent basis have very high travelling expenses, totalling $2,000 or $3,000, in a year in which the area in which they were travelling had little or no crop failure. I quite understand that there must be a very large sum of money spent on travelling expenses in going from farm to farm to assess the yields of grain in a year of crop failure. These huge travelling expenses that are shown for some of the persons on a permanent basis in years in which there was no crop failure are something that, I think, might be explained.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The search becomes more difficult then.

Mr. Harris: I am not the one to inform the hon. member for Assiniboia on the fine details of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. If he will look in the estimates book which he has before him, he will see the duties of the 40-odd persons on a permanent basis in this particular administration are set out. I will leave it to him to discuss that at a later time with someone else.

Item agreed to.

558. Estimated amount required to recoup the agricultural prices support account to cover the net operating loss of the agricultural prices support board during the fiscal year 1954-55, including authority to credit to the account the net revenue received into the agricultural products board account from the sale of New Zealand meat received in exchange for beef shipped to the United Kingdom, $3,210,928.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say what was the net loss to the government under the New Zealand-United Kingdom meat agreement?

Mr. Harris: In 1952, on beef exported to the United Kingdom, $1,386.26. I recall that was the manner in which we dealt with it. I beg your pardon; we spent $3,210,928.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister tell us what products this loss covered, and how much was spent on behalf of each of those products?

Mr. Harris: I am glad my hon. friend asked me, because I read the amount of the item and not the details. The main programs completed in 1954-55, the net losses of which are included in the amount set out above, were: 1953, butter, $1,500,000; and the 1954 Nova Scotia apples, $625,000. Then we have included a portion of the expected loss for this year on eggs, amounting to about $150,000. This also includes a number of other items of earlier programs that have been put in here in order to dispose of them: 1952, canned pork, $940,000. The item I mentioned a moment ago, beef exported to the United Kingdom, over $1,000; and the 1952 butter, $6,541. The total of all of these last items amounts to $3,222,928, from which has been deducted receipts from the sale of New Zealand beef to the United States to the amount of $12,000, leaving a total net loss in the amount of over $3 million.

Mr. Harkness: This carries us back to what the minister said a little while ago in regard to the loss on butter, which he then said was not really a loss because they had received $1 million and some odd in customs duty on it, and therefore the government really was not out of pocket; at least that was the impression he left. That loss was sustained because we imported 12 million pounds of butter from abroad in 1951. At the end of 1952 we had a loss of $6,000 because we had a surplus of butter that had to be looked after. In 1953 the loss was $1,500,000 because we had a surplus.

It presents a ridiculous picture, and it indicates the difficulties we run into when the government gets into the butter business without having, so far as I can make out, any reasonable policy to follow as it carries on these various transactions. Therefore we are passing a vote in these supplementary estimates today for $400,000 some odd to cover the loss because we imported butter in 1951. We are now voting over $1,500,000 to cover the loss on butter in 1953, because we had a surplus.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

559. Departmental administration—further amount required, $4,500.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the minister a question of broad interest to the various Indian tribes, particularly in Saskatchewan but generally across the country.

The Chairman: Order. Indian affairs come under item 561.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is the administration item for the whole department, Mr. Chairman. It is the only chance I shall have to ask this question. Item 561 deals with the Indian affairs branch, but it provides for things other than administration.

The various Indian bands have been very much concerned over commissioners who have been sitting under the provisions of the Indian Act, set up for the purpose of determining the qualifications for membership in the bands. I am not going into the particulars with regard to their numbers and so forth, set out in the answer given by the minister to a question of mine on February 14 last, which appears on page 118 of Hansard.

What has happened is this. Commissioners have investigated. Evidence has been taken that consisted of hearsay, gossip and tittle-tattle. From that evidence—and I use the word "evidence" in the sense of testimony—decisions are to be made on the qualifications for membership in the several bands, and also to determine whether or not an individual is an Indian. This is a matter that does not concern members of the House of Commons from the point of view of having any interest in the votes of these people. They are the wards of Canada, and their happiness rests upon the department and the members of this house.

Since the minister has been in charge of this department he has taken a lively interest in it and in raising the standards of those whom he serves as custodian of their rights and privileges, and also as their protector. They have no members in the house to speak for them. There are 160,000 of these first citizens of Canada, and I have often thought that one of the finest gestures this government could make would be to appoint a full-blooded Indian to the Senate of Canada in order that the views of the Indians might be expressed and Indians in general would have an opportunity of having a spokesman in the parliament of this country. They have not that now.

The Chairman: Order. I am in some difficulty at the present moment. As hon. members can see from the details this item deals merely with travelling expenses, telephones and telegrams under the heading "departmental administration". I fully realize that in recent years the custom has grown up that on the first item of a department in the main estimates a general debate is allowed. I do not think we have ever extended that privilege so far as to allow a general debate on an item of this kind in the supplementary estimates. I understood the hon. member was merely going to ask the minister a question, and I allowed it. I am wondering whether I should allow the debate to get out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was just explaining the seriousness of the responsibility that rests on hon. members because of the fact that Indians are wards. Under the heading of "administration" these commissions have been sitting and they have caused a degree of ill feeling. I doubt whether the minister and his department have any realization of the feeling of frustration that exists among the Indians, when each feels that he is indeed the enemy of his brother if he challenges the right of that brother to be a member of that band. At this time I should like the minister to place before the committee information with respect to what has been done by these commissions, and also to give a word of hope to the people in those bands. Only in extreme cases when there is evidence to support the gossip and tittle-tattle should the registrar act and deny his rights to the individual whose fathers and forefathers have resided on the reserve. Yet today we find these rights being challenged, and this has caused a tremendous amount of ill feeling.

In the 50 years I have lived in the west on a number of occasions I have resided close to Indian reservations. I have never known the Indians to be aroused as they are now because each is in the position of having his ancestry looked into and testimony such as this may be given: "I remember my grandmother told my mother once and my mother told me that A is not altogether of Indian blood." The result is that you have proceedings under way which are causing confusion and dissension and unhappiness.

I should like the minister to say a word of reassurance to the Indians in this country whose ancestors have lived on these reserves ever since they were in existence. They should be told that only evidence will be accepted to bastardize those who are living there and deny them the rights which their ancestors had.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I may have the indulgence of the committee I should like to express appreciation to the member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question because of a particular reason he had at this particular time. I should like also to express my appreciation of the altogether unwarranted compliment he paid me because of the interest I have been showing in Indians. As a matter of fact it is the hon. gentleman now leading the house, who is asking to have these estimates voted, who is deserving of praise in that regard. I think the Minister of Finance, when he was minister of this department, did more to help the Indians than any minister has done since confederation. If I can do half as well I shall be very happy.

My predecessor faced two most difficult problems. One of them was the problem of Indian estates. I think it must be stated quite frankly that these are not in a very satisfactory condition. Part of the reason they are in anything but a satisfactory state is that over the years disputes and differences have arisen as to who were really members of these Indians bands.

When the act was consolidated and reenacted a year or two ago I was not a member of the house. Provision was then placed in the act for bringing these band lists up to date and certain procedures were laid down. I happen to know this because my predecessor discussed it with me when I was secretary to the cabinet. It was only after a good deal of reflection and with considerable misgiving that he established these commissions. There seemed to be no other way to get even the kind of evidence the hon. member for Prince Albert has described, and I have no doubt some of it is just the kind he has described, that would enable the registrar to get some kind of recommendation on which he would have a basis for action.

I may say that none of these commissions settles the question. I should like to make it clear that all the commission does is hear the various conflicting bits of testimony and report to the registrar. The registrar then makes a determination as to whether a person's name should be on the band list. The decision of the registrar is not final in a matter of this kind which, as the hon. member for Prince Albert has said, involves the rights of the Indian.

I do not regard these Indians as wards. Indians are citizens of this country, in fact they are the first citizens of this country, and as such their rights are fully protected. They have the right of appeal to the courts against the decision of the registrar. Not only that, the department assists them in every way possible if they want to make an appeal.

If hon. members will look at the proceedings of the special committee on estimates they will see that on March 17 I answered a number of questions dealing with this subject. Most of the information I could give now I gave to the committee at that time, and I shall not repeat it.

Although most of the reports of these commissions are in, up to now none has been subjected to a final determination. It was felt in the department that we should get them all in and that all the information should be assessed together so we would have a criterion to apply right across the country. They will be determined as rapidly as possible.

I did indicate in the committee, and I say it here in order to make my answer as complete as possible, that it may be necessary to ask parliament at the next session to clarify the law before these disputes can all be determined satisfactorily. I am giving consideration to that question, and I would like the opinion of any hon. member of the house on it, particularly those who are members of the legal profession and who have taken a particular interest in it, as has the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Harkness: When the right of a person to be a member of the band has been challenged and it is found that the objection is not based on good grounds, that it is frivolous or spiteful, is that person given a clearance at that time or does he have to wait, possibly for years, under the threat of having his family and himself thrust off the reserve?

Mr. Pickersgill: This rather difficult period has to be gone through. We do want to get these existing disputes determined once and for all as quickly as possible. We want to lay down some kind of simple and expeditious procedure, so that when disputes arise in future they can be settled quickly and not left as sores to fester and cause dissension in the band.

Mr. Harkness: I appreciate that, but the minister has not answered my question. I know of one or two cases where the commissioner expressed himself at the time as believing the complaint was frivolous or spiteful. In a case of that kind has he the authority to throw out the complaint so the mind of the man who is complained against may be set at rest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not understand the hon. member's question. If he is speaking of a case which has come before one of these commissions, then the registrar would be the one to determine the matter. The hon. member asks if it would be thrown out if the commissioner felt it was frivolous. That cannot be done until the registrar considers it. As I have suggested, none of these reports has received final consideration.

Mr. Harkness: The situation is that there may be no justification for a complaint against a man but he may be placed in the position that he will not know whether he will be thrown off the reserve. In other words uncertainty will be created in his mind, and it seems to me that should not be allowed to go on. I believe these commissions have been sitting for two years or more.

Mr. Harris: The first was appointed in July, 1953.

Mr. Harkness: It is nearly two years. One of the things on which we pride ourselves in this country is our expeditious administration of justice. It seems to me this is a great breach of the way in which we attempt to administer the laws of the country. In these cases an individual may have to find a new home for his family and himself, and to me that is more important than sending a man to jail for six months.

Mr. Pickersgill: We intend to deal with this just as expeditiously as is humanly possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister was kind enough to refer me to the proceedings before the committee, and I wish to make one reference to it. The evidence indicates the degree to which the examination has been conducted. In British Columbia there were 44 cases submitted to commissioners; in Alberta, 44; in Saskatchewan, 240; in Manitoba, 21; in Ontario, 52; in Quebec, 25, and there have been no commissions in New Brunswick, the Yukon or the Northwest Territories.

I think the hon. member for Calgary North has raised an important matter; there is uncertainty.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I referred to those citizens as wards. In common with other members of this house, including the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, I have been honoured by being made a chief in an Indian tribe. When one has had this experience one naturally feels an unusual interest in the welfare of the Indian people as the result of having been honoured in that way.

There is an uncertainty. When I called them wards I did so because that is the word they use to describe themselves, fearful that if they call themselves citizens they will lose their treaty rights. Therefore when they speak of themselves they invariably use the word "wards" in consequence of treaty relationships between Queen Victoria and preceding monarchs and themselves.

I join with the hon. member for Calgary North; and I am certain that the minister, with his realization of the difficulties confronting the Indians, will do everything he can to bring about early decisions so that uncertainty and suspense will not increase the degree of dissension within the bands. I know of cases today where Indians are bitterly antagonistic toward their closest relatives because of the evidence that has been given. Naturally it is to the interest of each of them to challenge the rights of the others and thereby reduce the numbers entitled to the band funds.

When there is an incentive such as that which brings a benefit to the person giving the evidence it always operates as a detriment to the credibility of the individual who will benefit in consequence of the evidence he gives. You cannot challenge the evidence when someone says, "My grandmother tells me that his grandmother was involved with some person." It is unchallengeable. There is nothing on which you can cross-examine. Generally those who are alleged to have made these statements are long since deceased; but the effect of statements like that cannot be conducive to equanimity among the bands nor to friendliness and co-operation.

I thank the minister for his assurance that the matter is receiving the serious consideration of the department.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I am very happy that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration refers to the Indians as the first citizens of this country. I think that is indicative of a splendid approach to the problems of the Indians in this country. I do not for an instant pose as an authority concerning Indian affairs in Canada, but for the last 20 years I have lived within a short distance of an Indian reserve, namely the White Bear reserve. Therefore I am quite familiar with the customs of some of the Indians in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to interject at this point. The leader of the house announced last night that my estimates would be taken up later today, after the supplementary estimates were completed. I wonder if it would be more appropriate to have a general discussion on Indian affairs when we are considering my estimates rather than at this time, when we are discussing departmental administration and the supplementary vote for telephones.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): In view of what the minister has said I am entirely willing to make my remarks brief. I just want to say that neither the former minister nor the present minister should take too much credit. It is perhaps quite true that what is proposed will be satisfactory and a credit to the Canadian people, but I wish to say that as far as I am concerned I do hope greater attention and justice will be given to the first citizens of this country. I do not think anyone in this house can be too complacent to date about our attitude or our policies in relation to our Indians. That is my observation, at least.

I might also say that I just returned from the west, and I do not think the Indians on my own reservation of White Bear are receiving quite the consideration that should be given them. I got in touch with the minister's department, and Colonel Jones there has been very receptive toward my ideas. I am quite agreeable to have the matter stand at this time, but I wish to point out that I think we should make a new approach to this problem so that with the increased Indian population, which will pose a serious problem concerning their integration and their acceptance into the various segments of our society, we can assure these people that we recognize them as citizens of Canada. Knowing the Indians as I do I am convinced they have the character and attributes which will permit them to become assimilated in our society. They will become citizens of whom we shall be proud, and I hope they can be proud of what we do to help them.

Mr. Montgomery: I have one question on this item. I notice the amount is $4,500, which is divided into $2,000 for additional travelling expenses and $2,500 for additional telephone and telegraph costs. I also note that in the estimates for last year this item was increased by a substantial amount which means that $4,000 more is required this year for telephone and telegraph items than was the case last year, and an additional $2,500 is required for travelling expenses. I also note there has been a small increase in the number of people on the departmental administrative staff. I would like to know if this small increase is because of the extra travelling expenses and the cost of telegrams and telephones. Perhaps the minister could offer us an explanation.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, as far as travelling expenses are concerned there is an unanticipated increase in the amount of travelling done by the people in the administrative branch because there has been the gradual establishment of an inspection service.

As for the telegraph and telephone service, the former minister was a minister for this province where the parliament buildings are, and I am minister for a province which is fairly remote. The cost of telephone and telegraph service is therefore considerably higher. In my capacity as the minister for Newfoundland I think I am somewhat more extravagant in the use of the telephone and telegraph services than was the previous minister, and I think a certain amount of the blame for the increase in this service falls on me because I represent a geographically remote province.

Mr. Dickey: This is the usual form of bill for the incorporation of a company to carry on business in the branches of insurance enumerated in clause 6, on the performance by the company of the usual financing arrangements which are set out in the bill.

The bill is in the usual form. It is approved by the superintendent of insurance. It has been considered in the other place. If second reading is granted it is proposed to move in the normal manner that the bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Campbell: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) was speaking on this bill when the house adjourned last Friday.

Mr. Harris: Stand.

Order stands.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The items under private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume discussion of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at five o'clock we had concurred in resolution 559 and were considering item 560.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

560. Citizenship registration branch — further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was very interested in the explanation given by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regarding the telephone bill, but I was not sure that I fully understood it. I wonder whether he would try to make it clear to me. It had to do with the distance between here and Newfoundland and various considerations of that kind.

The Chairman: Order. We had carried resolution 559. Has the hon. member unanimous consent to revert to the former item?

Mr. Pickersgill: We can do it later on my regular estimates.

The Chairman: Shall item 560 carry?

Item agreed to.

Indian affairs branch—

561. To provide that the amount of advances outstanding at any one time with respect to loans to Indians under section 69 of the Indian Act, notwithstanding subsection (5) thereof, may total but not exceed $650,000, $1.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister give us an explanation of item 561. It is for only $1, but we have to look at it rather closely.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the last thing I want to do is get into an ideological quarrel with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I have never, however—and I say this as a prelude to what I am going to say—agreed with his view that legislation through supply bills and appropriation acts is not just as good legislation as any other kind. In fact it was the original kind of legislation for which parliament was established in the middle ages. But I know he regards it as rather medieval.

Mr. Knowles: The Auditor General thinks that, too.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, the Auditor General has expressed his view. We all have our views on the constitution, and in a free country we are all entitled to our views.

Mr. Macdonnell: I think so too.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is probable, though, that at the next session of parliament it will be necessary to suggest some amendments to the Indian Act. If that is done I would certainly feel it would be proper to incorporate this provision in it. The sole purpose is to increase the allowable amount in this revolving fund from $350,000 to $650,000.

Mr. Knowles: Because of what the minister has said, I have no serious objection to this being done in this way. We have both made reference to the Auditor General. I do not have his memorandum before me, but if I recall correctly he does not object to legislation being effected by an item in the estimates when it is of a temporary character. The minister suggests that that is what we have here, a temporary provision until the Indian Act is amended. On that basis I have no objection to it being done in this way. Likewise I have no objection to the content of the proposal itself.

Item agreed to.

Welfare of Indians—

562. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $600,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: We have here an item of $600,000, a fairly sizeable sum, and the description is rather vague. There is $450,000 for materials and supplies. Would the minister explain what is covered by this money?

Mr. Pickersgill: The amount of $450,000 covers food, clothing and fuel for crippled, blind and indigent Indians. Then there is another $150,000, making up the $600,000, required for payment of accounts arising from the cost of food for tuberculosis patients awaiting admission to hospital or convalescing after discharge with their families, or for their families during hospitalization and post-hospitalization periods, as may be necessary. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris will remember that the main item was explained in some detail in the committee upstairs.

Item agreed to.

Education—

563. Administration, operation and maintenance—further amount required, $155,000.

Mr. Harkness: I notice there is an item of $100,000 for tuition and maintenance of Indian children in non-Indian and joint schools. I presume that is to cover the cost of sending Indian children to high schools and things of that sort, and it would appear that more Indian children are attending such schools than was estimated. If that is the case I am extremely glad to see it, and I would have been even more delighted if the vote had been twice as much, provided that is the purpose of the vote. Will the minister tell us what the vote covers and, if my presumption is correct, how many Indian children are attending high schools this year?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would not mind referring to volume No. 14 of the proceedings of the special committee on estimates where detailed information is given as to the number of children attending high schools and so on. I do not have the information at my fingertips. The main estimates provided $7,401,323 for Indian education generally and this particular item of $100,000 is, as the hon. member for Calgary North has said, an additional amount to pay tuition fees for children going to non-Indian schools. That includes high schools and technical schools and it also includes the considerable number of places—they are growing in number every year, and they cannot grow too fast to suit me—where we make arrangements with the local school authorities to send Indian children to the general schools that the rest of the children attend.

Mr. Harkness: I agree with the last statement of the minister. I merely wondered what proportion of this amount was for the first purpose I mentioned, to send Indian children to high schools and technical schools. If a considerable number of Indian children have now reached the stage where they can take that form of education I think that matter is even more important, because in my opinion the future of the Indian people really depends on carrying their education considerably beyond grade 3 or 4, as has prevailed up until recent years.

Mr. Pickersgill: This of course is an additional amount of money to make up the total for the year, and therefore it could not be broken down in quite the way the hon. member suggests. If he would not mind, I would rather answer his question when my main estimates come up and I can give the experience for the whole year and also the anticipation for the coming year.

Mr. Montgomery: In those provinces which supply free school books do Indian children get them the same as other children?

Mr. Pickersgill: They get them everywhere.

Mr. Campbell: Does the Indian department have any difficulty getting Indian children into the ordinary day schools?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the experience is steadily improving. There are some places where there are physical difficulties; the schools are not large enough, and that sort of thing.

Mr. Campbell: Only on physical grounds?

Mr. Pickersgill: There are one or two places where there is still a little hesitation, but they are fewer and fewer every year, I am happy to say.

Item agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

564. Salaries and contingencies of the commission —further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. Knowles: This item includes a detail listed as "telephones and telegrams, $5,000". I wonder whether the Minister of Finance has any better explanation for this expenditure on telephones and telegrams than the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration gave us a little while ago?

Mr. Harris: No, they are almost the same, because they represent in both cases increased inquiries about government business.

Mr. Knowles: But in the previous case the explanation seemed to be that the minister had a great many calls to the province of Newfoundland, a portion of which he represents. We are dealing here with the civil service commission. Is there any situation that is at all comparable?

Mr. Harris: What has been passed is passed. I am referring to this item which is required because of an unexpected increase in the number of competitions, some difficulty in recruiting classifications, the number of applicants and the number of general inquiries relating to civil service employment.

Mr. Knowles: Then the minister does admit he has a better explanation than was given for the previous case?

Mr. Harris: Not if the telegrams from Newfoundland relate to the matters to which I have referred.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

565. Passport office administration—further amount required, $23,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the nature of this additional amount? Why is the amount required? Has there been any expansion or extension?

Mr. Harris: The item is broken down, Mr. Chairman, into the purchase of 40,000 additional passports. I understand there was no great increase in the demand for passports, but on the other hand it was found that certain costs could be saved if the quantity ordered were in excess of that which would normally be ordered. This amount is to cover that particular item.

Item agreed to.

567. Canadian representation at international conferences—further amount required, $75,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: What was the amount previously voted? In other words, what percentage does this $75,000 bear to what has already been voted?

Mr. Harris: The original amount was $175,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: So this represents an increase of about one-third. I think we might reasonably ask to be informed whether there were unexpected conferences which arose, or how this very substantial increase came about?

Mr. Harris: Yes, a large part of the additional cost was quite unexpected. It takes care of the Geneva conference on Far Eastern affairs of about a year ago. You may recall, Mr. Chairman, that was called suddenly because of developments in Viet Nam, and the conference had not been expected at the time of making the estimates. In addition there was the nine-power conference on German rearmament in London, which also could not be foreseen at the time the estimates were drawn up a year and a half ago. Then there was the consequent NATO ministerial meeting in Paris which followed upon the nine-power conference.

Item agreed to.

569. To provide for the Canadian government's contribution towards the cost of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization permanent headquarters in an amount of 12,500,000 French francs, notwithstanding that payment may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of March, 1955, which is $35,100.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the explanation for this, Mr. Chairman? Has it to do with some building that is being put up as permanent headquarters?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For NATO?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the total cost of the building, and how is the obligation determined for each of the countries?

Mr. Harris: The total contribution is 250 million francs, of which 6·7 per cent will be Canada's share. Of that, 5 per cent will be paid out of external affairs estimates and the balance, 1·7 per cent, out of mutual aid contributions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister the contribution made by other countries?

Mr. Harris: No, I just have our own.

Item agreed to.

571. To provide for a gift of food and drugs as a contribution to flood relief for India, Pakistan and Nepal, $225,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under what circumstances was this contribution made to flood relief in India, Pakistan and Nepal?

Mr. Harris: In 1954, after floods had caused devastation over wide areas in India, Pakistan and Nepal, the Canadian commission in Karachi and New Delhi reported that the United States and United Kingdom were making efforts to provide a substantial amount of flood relief, and suggested that a contribution by the Canadian government would be welcome. In view of these circumstances it was agreed we would supply $225,000, to take the form of dried skim milk and drugs for this purpose, to be divided as follows: India, $100,000; Pakistan, $100,000; Nepal, $25,000.

Item agreed to.

572. Contribution to the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees in the Near East, $500,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This has to do with a contribution for Palestine refugees. How long has the Canadian government been making this contribution? What has been the total to date of the Canadian contribution, and has the minister a record of the number of refugees who are to be the beneficiaries of these grants, either on the part of Canada or collectively on the part of the nations making contributions?

Mr. Harris: This arose in 1949, Mr. Chairman, when the United Nations undertook, through a relief organization, to provide for those who had unfortunately become refugees as a result of the difficulties in Israel. We have been contributing yearly since, and our total contribution to date amounts to $3,555,929. We are the fourth largest contributor after the United States, the United Kingdom and France. We have been making this contribution in the hope that the problem could be solved. Indeed we have expressed rather strong views on occasion about what should be done. Since some hon. members are very familiar with the problem I perhaps should not say much about it, except to add that we do feel this is one of those cases where greater difficulties might have occurred if the problem were not met in the manner in which it is being met here. For that reason we continue the grant we have made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has stated the problem. There is no more difficult problem anywhere in the world, I would think, than one dealing with refugees. I personally spoke with a number of the refugees and learned that they realized Canada was making this contribution toward the alleviation of their condition. The minister has mentioned the strong views expressed on this question by Canada. Certainly there is no sorer spot than these camps which, as one visits them and leaves them, cannot help but impress one with the awfulness of the situation in which these people find themselves.

The minister mentioned Canada's contribution, and I think that is one contribution that does leave an impression upon the people who receive it. In addition, it is building a bulwark against the spread of communism in these areas.

Mr. Low: Can the minister say whether the nations who do contribute to this fund have made fairly strong representations to the effect that the contributions should be used for the rehabilitation of these refugees, rather than simple maintenance as has been the case up to this time? If so, what has been the response?

Mr. Harris: I believe the hon. member for Peace River has put his finger on the problem which, let us in all frankness admit, does exist here. Perhaps because of circumstances it was inevitable for a while that the relief item should go entirely to maintenance. One accepts the problem, and by maintenance looks after the people immediately. It takes a little while to work out a plan for the eventual rehabilitation of these people. This extended over a period of time after 1949, but we are satisfied that there is good evidence that the problem now is being looked upon as one which must be solved by way of rehabilitation and in other ways.

I would not think this was the time for me to indicate what those solutions might be, but we are satisfied that during the past 12 months there has been evidence the problem is being looked at in the light in which the hon. member mentions it, rather than in the light of maintenance.

Item agreed to.

573. Contribution to the United Nations Korean reconstruction agency, $500,000.

Mr. Knowles: In a general way may I express approval of each of these grants we are dealing with under this heading. May I also ask one or two questions regarding this item. Can the minister tell us in what form this contribution is made, and the total amount we have given toward relief and rehabilitation in Korea under various headings? Also, can he tell us how it is administered when it gets to Korea?

Mr. Harris: I regret very much that I will not be able to answer all the questions. I should add, however, that this is one of the items which, upon consideration this year, we decided ought to be continued for another year because of the special problems existing in Korea. I think my hon. friend realizes that, without boastfulness, we have probably contributed quite substantially to this program, having in mind any other contributions that have been made. I notice that in 1951 we contributed $7,250,000, and that we have made contributions since. I think my hon. friend also remembers that a citizen of our country was on this commission.

Mr. Knowles: King Gordon?

Mr. Harris: And a man from Sarnia. We feel, however, that this matter probably is reaching the point where other influences may enter into the solution of the problem; but having in mind the rehabilitation that is still needed, we believe we should still continue to contribute to the extent indicated here. In most cases it consists of purchases of Canadian goods and their shipment to Korea.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister say a further word? I notice in the main estimates for 1955-56, at page 188, it is indicated that an appropriation of this kind is not to be made, although $300,000 was appropriated in 1954-55. From what he said a moment ago in explanation of this item in the supplementary estimates, do I take it that this item is taking the place of the item that was in the main estimates last year, but which apparently it was decided not to include main estimates for 1955-56?

Mr. Harris: Yes, this item is to complete the program that we agreed to in 1951 and have carried out, subject to this payment being made.

Mr. Knowles: According to the description of the item last year, it was given in Canadian fish. Is it fish again this year, or does the minister know?

Mr. Harris: No, I have not the information.

Item agreed to.

574. To provide for a gift of fish as a contribution to hurricane relief for Haiti, $25,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: I note that this item is to provide for a gift of fish as a contribution to hurricane relief for Haiti. What type of fish was it? Was it codfish, canned salmon or sardines?

Mr. Harris: Codfish, and a little bit of flour.

Mr. Nesbitt: Was Haiti consulted as to the type of relief they wanted.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where were these fish purchased? Were these the fish that created something of an incident recently, when the government had a large amount of fish on hand and no place to dispose of it? Was this where it came from?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid if this is a joke I do not understand it.

Mr. Knowles: The Minister of Fisheries should know.

Mr. Sinclair: We have no fish on hand.

Mr. Bell: Have we some sort of general policy regarding the purchase of these gifts? It looks as though they are to be a continuing thing. Is there some sort of general policy, or is general consideration given to the areas where the fish may be obtained? Are they surplus products on the coast from which they come?

Mr. Harris: In this particular case there were three different items, codfish, flour and potatoes. Haiti was consulted, and in the end codfish and a little flour were decided on. Each of these decisions is made at the time it arises. If the government decides to contribute some form of relief, naturally we make the contribution which would be appropriate and most needed at the time.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one further question in that regard. When gifts are made for relief to another country, such as this, are concentrated milk products, powdered milk and so on, considered?

Mr. Harris: On several occasions we have given powdered milk and other products as relief but, as I say, it depends on the circumstances and what would be most appropriate to the particular country.

Item agreed to.

575. To provide for the cost of Canada's participation as a member of the international commission for supervision and control in Indo-China, $220,000.

Mr. Harkness: I note that under this item there is provision for 28 full-time positions to the amount of $56,000. I suppose that covers only a very few months of the year, which accounts for the comparatively small sum for the 28 positions. I believe most of the personnel who are representing Canada in Indo-China are seconded from the armed services, and some are from external affairs. I presume those 28 are extra people who have been employed by external affairs in addition to their own personnel and the military personnel who have been chiefly used in carrying out this task. Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: How many months does this $56,000 cover?

Mr. Harris: Well, at various times. That is, they have been employed as one could employ them for the job for the east. Some of them will have been four or five months on the payroll, some of them will have been longer than that and some for less time.

Mr. Harkness: Do I understand that a number of those are Indo-Chinese. Is that what the minister says?

Mr. Harris: No; they were employed for the east. I did not say "in the east".

Mr. Harkness: I note under this there is an item "courier service, $15,000" which I presume is for the purpose of sending messages, mail and so forth, back and forth between Canada and our personnel in Indo-China. The chief reason I am bringing up any question under this item at all is that I have had complaints from some of the relatives of military personnel who are serving in Indo-China of extreme slowness in the passage of mail back and forth. What arrangements exist for forwarding mail from their relatives here to the men serving in Indo-China and bringing their mail back from Indo-China to their relatives here?

Mr. Harris: This item is to provide for courier service not from Canada to the east, but an extension of that now existing to Tokyo. This is the courier service from Tokyo to Saigon to New Delhi.

Mr. Harkness: That has nothing to do with the question I asked. My chief purpose in saying anything is to find out what arrangements exist for forwarding mail to the men serving there and getting their mail back without undue delay.

Mr. Harris: I beg your pardon. I spoke to the item in the estimates we are discussing. I did not intend to speak generally on the postal service. If my hon. friend wishes me to I shall be glad to make inquiries. It is not a matter of concern in this particular vote that we are dealing with.

Mr. Harkness: I think it is a matter of very considerable concern because the failure of mail to come back, particularly in the Christmas season, was a matter of great concern to relatives of people who are over there—

Mr. Harris: I have no doubt of that.

Mr. Harkness: —who were anxious to hear from those who are serving in Indo-China. It seemed to me that the provision for a courier service was designed to expedite mail back and forth. The minister says it is carried only from Saigon to Tokyo. Certainly there is no courier service which goes out that far. I presume the situation really is that the Minister of Finance has no information in regard to this.

He would have to consult the minister of external affairs in order to get any information as to the mail facilities at the present time, and particularly if they have been improved since the Christmas period when the complaints arose.

Mr. Harris: I shall consult the Postmaster General and give the information to my hon. friend.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to join with the Secretary of State for External Affairs in paying tribute to a devoted public servant who lost his life in Indo-China. One reason for my referring to Mr. Jack Thurrott at this time is that on one occasion he and Mrs. Thurrott were my hosts in the country which the Minister of Fisheries is going to visit shortly. I remember their extreme kindness, and since then I have followed his career in the Department of External Affairs with considerable interest. I am sure we all deeply regret that his career had to come to such an untimely conclusion.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Administration of various acts and costs of special functions—

577. To provide for adjustment payments in respect of subsidies previously paid and administrative expenses incurred by the Minister of Finance on behalf of Her Majesty pursuant to the agreement entered into between Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd., and Her Majesty, on the 25th day of June, 1953, under the authority of order in council P.C. 1953—868, dated the 1st day of June, 1953; and to authorize the write-off of the outstanding balance of advances previously made to the said corporation, $65,277.

Mr. Macdonnell: When dealing with this matter last year the Minister of Finance pointed out that a similar item was an aftermath of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited which had been liquidated some years before, when it surrendered its charter. I should like to quote from page 3423 of Hansard of March 29, 1954 where the Minister of Finance is reported as saying:

> The Minister of Finance was authorized accordingly to execute an agreement with the company which provided—I will not go into all the details—for the payment over of moneys to the crown and the crown was to dispose of these moneys first by paying all outstanding liabilities, second, by paying any claim that might be made by Joy Oil Limited, which was the largest claim outstanding and which was under litigation, and third, by paying the government the balance of advances to the company.
> Mr. Macdonnell: Is it practically cleaned up?
> Mr. Abbott: It is practically cleaned up. I think this will perhaps be as close to the final clean-up as possible. The Joy Oil claim has now been settled. There are sundry administrative expenses which have been incurred by the crown and the vote of $310,000 is required for the administrative expenses together with the Joy Oil settlement and to allow for any further minor payments that may come up during the current fiscal year, the year which will end in the next day or two.

I should like to know the reason for this $65,277 hangover. At that time it looked as though the $310,000 then being voted was to cover everything.

Mr. Harris: This is a different item which has been found in the bookkeeping of the Department of Finance. It relates to sums which are on the books as being due to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, which we want to write off in order to clean up the account and not be in the position of having to carry anything on the books with respect to the corporation. However, should any of these outstanding accounts be collected the amount would be credited directly to the consolidated revenue fund and shown as a receipt.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is not a matter of vast importance, but I am still a little doubtful on one point. A year ago the minister referred to $68,000 of uncollected accounts. It is because of what the minister said a moment ago about new amounts being discovered in the accounts of the department that I find it a little difficult, as the negro gentleman said, "to make dem two tings paralyse".

Mr. Harris: But the item of last year did not write off the $68,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: I realize that. It is still carried as an asset.

Mr. Harris: It was. It is intended to go to the consolidated deficit account and disappear.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister said a year ago that was going to clean the thing up, but he was perhaps carrying in his mind this $68,000.

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Payments to municipalities—

578. Grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property—To provide for payments to municipalities in accordance with the Municipal Grants Act, and the rural municipal grants regulations amended by order in council P.C. 1954—1621; and to provide for payments to municipalities under order in council P.C. 1954—1497, in respect of the cost of medical and hospital services and supplies furnished to federal employees and other persons specified therein—further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property notwithstanding that formal transfer of administration has not been completed, $95,855.

Mrs. Fairclough: I notice that the main estimates show an amount of $3,202,348, whereas the previous vote was $3,190,000; that is a difference of only $12,348, yet the amount being asked for here is $95,000. I assume that the minister will say this is something that has arisen since the requirements were compiled for the main estimates. Would he also state what proportion of this amount is related to St. John's property and what amounts are required for other municipalities?

Mr. Harris: There are something in the order of 40 municipalities involved. If my hon. friend would not mind we could discuss this on the bill which I hope will be before us in a few days.

Mrs. Fairclough: What amount is required specifically for St. John's?

Mr. Harris: The amount this year is $22,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: Can the minister give the committee some idea of why the difference has increased from $12,000 to $95,000 in a short space of time?

Mr. Harris: I think the former minister of finance made it clear that these grants were made to municipalities that applied for them. As payments were made other municipalities learned of them and applied in turn. Then adjustments were made and the amounts were constantly changing.

Mr. Macdonnell: We are all aware that the act is to be amended this year, but for a moment or two I should like to deal with the inadequacy of the act and ask one question. Section 4 of the act reads:

> Where, in a form prescribed by the minister, a municipality applies for a grant, the minister may, in his discretion, out of moneys provided by parliament, make a grant—

When questioned about that the minister referred to this as being essentially an ex gratia payment, and said that was why the words "in his discretion" were put in the act. We were told that the basis upon which the minister exercises his discretion is the formula set out in the act.

The approach of the minister's predecessor was that the grant was merely an act of grace. I always thought this was rather a technical approach but apparently he felt it was correct, and for that reason this wide discretion was left in the act, which is subject to very obvious criticism because of the possibility of its being improperly used, but I shall not go into that.

The last minister said that notwithstanding this, the basis upon which the minister exercises his discretion is the application of the formula set out in the act. That, I take it, is still the case, and it is for that reason that I am still not quite clear, with this formula available and with no other applicants being entitled to come in, how we run into the figure the minister has mentioned. I know the minister has dealt with this already, but I would like to hear him tie it in with the statement of his predecessor as to the use of the formula.

Mr. Harris: I think I should begin by suggesting that the hon. member for Greenwood might bear in mind that despite the wide discretion, and in fact because of it, the Minister of Finance desires to make the right decision. If a decision is reached either in prospect or upon the first application based on certain information as to assessments and the like, and if at a later time the municipality complains that that is not a fair basis on which to deal with the grant being made to it and it supplies information which changes the picture from the standpoint of the Department of Finance, you will find you are making a larger grant.

I think the hon. member will appreciate that in any matter in which there is discretion rather than a grant of a fixed sum of money, the application of four different rules or four different groups of grants, as I recall it, would lead to uncertainty until you had in fact come to complete agreement with the municipality concerned.

I want only to add that we will no doubt have a further discussion of this in the consideration of the bill now before the house; but if there is any doubt in the mind of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I am happy to follow the practice laid down by my predecessor because I think it is a sound one, and I do not propose to change the exercise of the discretion any more than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister has shaken me a bit, because he has really made me feel there has been more discretion and less reference to a formula than I had thought to be the case. But I shall not press that now, particularly because, as he indicated, the matter will come up again for discussion.

There are one or two other things arising out of it. This is not the place to complain about the bill which has still to come before us, but I would like to ask the minister two questions. Can we take it that inevitably, when the dominion-provincial conference meets, the position of the municipalities will be a subject which will be given top priority? Is that a fair inference?

Mr. Harris: I think, Mr. Chairman, I might be pardoned at this time for making no guess as to what might arise at a dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Macdonnell: That being the case, I think the minister might at least answer my next question. Does he consider that the municipalities are in a situation where something does need to be done to adjust the balance between them and the other two taxing authorities?

Mr. Harris: I have my own views as a taxpayer in more than one municipality concerning the municipal problem, but I do not think it is a matter for discussion here.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suppose it is not a matter for discussion here because it takes two to discuss, and if the minister will not discuss I cannot go much further with it but will have to wait for another day.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, there is a little matter bothering me concerning item 578, part of which reads:

> Further amount required including authority to regard the admiralty properties in the city of St. John's, Newfoundland, as federal property notwithstanding that formal transfer of administration has not been completed.

If this is to cover grants in lieu of taxes for next year why should it be included here? I may misunderstand the whole thing.

Mr. Harris: This was discussed last year, Mr. Chairman, but I am sure my hon. friend would not feel that the government had not done its utmost in the meantime to acquire title to this particular property. However, that is the case. We have been using this building for anywhere from three to five years, I have forgotten exactly how long.

We have not yet obtained title for the crown in the right of Canada; but because we have been occupying it, and in fact own it, although the actual documents have not been exchanged, we feel we should use it in the computation of the grant to the city.

Mr. Montgomery: In other words, no taxes have been paid to the municipality concerned?

Mr. Harris: No, it is actually in the title of the admiralty of the United Kingdom.

Item agreed to.

Contingencies and miscellaneous—

579. To authorize the write-off to the consolidated deficit account of certain accounts, as detailed in the estimates, arising out of world war II and other transactions amounting in the aggregate to $1,010,111.38 which are uncollectable or for which no residual asset remains, $1.

Mr. Harkness: Concerning item 579, an amount is shown of $1 only but it is actually a write-off of over a million dollars. There is one part of the item which I can understand quite readily, and that is working capital advances to crown assets. There are, however, some other items which I think the minister should perhaps explain to us. There are, for instance, loans to coal companies of $33,000 odd. I wonder how the loans to the coal companies arise and why they are being written off?

I would like also to have some explanation concerning Bank of Montreal provincial notes of $27,560. It seems rather odd that the government is writing off Bank of Montreal provincial notes in the amount of $27,560.

An hon. Member: It is six o'clock.

Mr. Harris: I appreciate that, and if I give an explanation now which does not satisfy the committee perhaps we can go back to it at eight o'clock. I admit it is a little odd to be writing off items to the extent of $46,000 with respect to a bank robbery which occurred on January 11, 1869.

Mr. Harkness: What date was that?

Mr. Harris: January 11, 1869.

An hon. Member: The Tories were in power.

Mr. Harris: There was a theft of $46,000 from a bank in St. Catharines, Ontario. It happened that the notes had not been issued to the public and were stored pending issue. In the resulting accounting by the Receiver General of Canada this was undertaken as a liability of the government here. Over the years some of these notes have been turned in and cashed and this is to get rid of it on the books of the Receiver General.

Mr. Harkness: You have no hope of taking in any more of the notes?

Mr. Harris: I shall endeavour to answer the question concerning the coal companies and perhaps we can then pass the item. This item covers a loan to Empire Collieries Limited, Calgary, in the amount of $4,000; a loan to the Manitoba and Saskatchewan Coal Company Limited in the amount of $14,213.70; and a loan to the Tel Koal Company Limited in the amount of $15,000, which gives a total loan of $33,000 odd. These three companies folded up for financial reasons, and these are sums which were carried in the items of the Department of Defence Production and are now being written off.

Mr. Harkness: The companies are not defunct, are they?

Mr. Harris: Yes; they are defunct and have been for some time.

With respect to the ammunition and the bridge spans, these were items which were originally intended for China under the export credit loan but in fact were not shipped. They never did go to China. They were turned over to the war assets disposal corporation, were by them disposed of and the moneys were received for them. But we are writing off the item on our books in the Department of Finance because of the advance that was made originally.

I think those are all the items included.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering resolution 580. Shall the resolution carry? Carried.

Special—

581. To provide for a contribution to the government of the province of Ontario for assistance in meeting costs resulting from floods, arising out of "Hurricane Hazel", on October 15 and 16, 1954, and to authorize, notwithstanding section 35 of the Financial Administration Act, the making of payments under this vote up to May 31, 1955, $1,000,000.

Mr. Enfield: This item is to provide a contribution to the government of the province of Ontario to assist in meeting costs resulting from damage caused by "Hurricane Hazel" of last October, which did such a great deal of damage in various parts of Toronto and also in my riding. Shortly after the tragic occurrence those who had suffered damage were most heartened by the ready assistance that was quickly proferred by the federal government to the province of Ontario to help defray the cost of the damage caused by the floods.

If I may be permitted to mention it at this time, the only real solution to the problem is to put into effect there something like the proposal submitted by the Humber valley conservation authority. I understand that the government is considering the possibility of making a grant of some $5,300,000 to the province to carry out the conservation authority plan. When you weigh the amount involved there against the $1 million it is apparently going to cost to repair the material damage caused by the hurricane the $5,300,000 does not seem on balance to be out of the way at all. I urge the government to give sympathetic consideration to that proposal.

As far as the $1 million is concerned, I presume that will be the total cost. Perhaps the minister can say if that represents the total contribution to the provincial government, and also how the costs were shared and to what kind of losses the contributions were restricted.

Mr. Harris: The contribution was made, of course, to supplement the grant made by the province to those who suffered damage by reason of the hurricane. The province came to the conclusion that the appropriate grant in aid would be 80 per cent of the cost to the householder who lost his building. A minimum of $100 was imposed; that is, the first $100 was deductible, and there was a maximum of $5,000 on the amount of the contribution in respect of any one building. The federal government offered to share one-half of the amount the province was paying, and we think this sum of $1 million should be $30,000 to $40,000 more than may actually be needed.

Hon. members will notice that the item provides for the payment of these accounts up to the end of May rather than the end of the fiscal year in March. The committee set up by the provincial government, by advertisement and by letter, has been urging all those who have claims against the fund to get their bills in so they may be paid. Consequently we expect to be able to settle all accounts within this time limit.

In order that hon. members will know what we have not done, I should add that the provincial government and the metropolitan council of Toronto undertook in addition to buy, not by way of expropriation but by way of purchase, certain properties in order to ensure that no one would build again at these places, and we did not share in that. I think the reason is obvious. This was not a direct relief effort. It was a decision made by the proper authorities that it would be unwise to have people living in those dangerous areas again.

Mr. Hahn: Can the minister tell us whether or not trailer homes will be paid for out of the fund as well? I understand one war veteran lost his belongings and his trailer home, and has not been able to get restitution from the provincial authorities.

Mr. Harris: I am not familiar with the case but I should remind hon. members that in addition to the moneys paid out by the provincial government to which we are contributing, there was as everyone knows—mayhap many contributed—a substantial sum running into several million dollars raised to assist these unfortunate people. My understanding is that generally that fund was used for the replacement of personal belongings and losses of that kind, and the governments entered into the replacement of buildings and properties.

Mr. Hahn: This individual not only lost his belongings but his trailer house as well. It was later taken to a garage and left there. He was destitute and had no means of acquiring a home. It is a complete loss as far as he is concerned, and he is having difficulty in getting restitution.

Mr. Harris: Of course no federal agency has been engaged in the payment of the money. That has been done through the provincial government and the bodies they set up to handle the matter. If my hon. friend has a particular case in mind and will let me know about it I will see if the provincial people will give consideration to it.

Mr. Knowles: As one who, with others sitting near me, represents a part of the country where in 1950 we received help in time of need from the federal government—indeed, help from far and wide—I want to register my approval of this grant to help those who suffered loss as the result of "Hurricane Hazel".

Mr. Pallett: On behalf of the people who actually received assistance from the fund I wish to thank the government for deciding to put this amount in the supplementary estimates. I think it is a very sound principle. I was also pleased to hear the hon. member for York-Scarborough, who spoke in support of the Humber valley conservation authority plan, recommend that the government should take action on it. As to the suggestion that some people have been omitted in the settlement of claims, I have had something to do with the matter and this is the first time I have heard that the people administering the hurricane relief fund have overlooked anybody.

Mr. Harris: I hope nothing I said indicated that I was not satisfied with the effort and time put by the provincial authorities into the administration of the fund and in seeing that the needs of the people were met.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Special—

583. To provide for assistance in the construction of vessels of the dragger and/or long liner type, subject to such terms and conditions as may be approved by the governor in council—further amount required, $21,049.

Mr. Nowlan: This is a supplementary item of $21,049 in addition to the $200,000 we voted before. Can the minister tell us how many draggers are being constructed this year?

Mr. Harris: For the current fiscal year there will be 34 subsidy payments totalling the amount indicated, about $221,000.

Mr. Nowlan: For 30 different construction jobs?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: This item, of course, will be recurring in the general estimates that we will consider in a few weeks, and it can be discussed at greater length then than now.

Mr. Harris: Thank you.

Mr. Nowlan: I am sure the minister will appreciate my thoughtfulness on this occasion. I noticed in the press this week a news story, which of course does not necessarily represent government policy but which suggested some knowledge of policy. It was to the effect that an interdepartmental committee had been working on this matter of trawlers off the coast, that it was prepared to report in the very near future, and that there might be the possibility of a change in government policy with respect to this whole matter. I believe the committee had some legal advice from Dean Curtis of the University of British Columbia in dealing with the whole problem.

As the minister well knows, one of the conditions of the licence for each one of those 30 projects to which he has referred will be that they cannot operate within the 12-mile limit off Canadian shores, whereas United States fishermen are allowed to operate within 3 miles of Canadian shores. This, in itself, creates a problem. The operation of these vessels within the 3-mile limit creates another problem. In many places I know the situation is intolerable.

Frankly I do not believe the government can justify going ahead year after year spending public money for the construction of Canadian boats, manned by Canadian crews, and permitting them to come only within 12 miles of our coast, whereas under international law United States fishermen are allowed to come within 3 miles. I would rather see them all kept outside the 12-mile limit, because they are doing a great deal of damage to our inshore fisheries.

I should like to know if there is any statement with respect to this matter that the minister can make now?

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, there is not. I would not want to say anything now about whether or not the report has any foundation. I think my hon. friend will get full information on the fisheries estimates.

Item agreed to.

584. Amount required to recoup the fisheries prices support account to cover the net operating loss on completed programs of the fisheries prices support board as at March 31, 1955, $744,382.

Mr. Nowlan: In the general estimates we voted only the amount for the administration of this board. At the time I questioned the minister at some length, and he said that was all that was necessary to vote because apparently there were no foreseeable expenses for which he could provide in the main estimates. We voted some $85,000 for administration, and now we are asked to vote $744,000 to cover an operating loss on the completed program of the fisheries prices support board, as at March 31, 1955. I would have thought that part of that would have resulted from the operations of last spring, and we would have had some provision made in the general estimates. Can the minister tell us what were the operations, and how the losses did occur?

Mr. Harris: There are quite a number, and if the committee permits me I shall read them. There is the prairie provinces frozen fish support program in 1953-54, which showed a net loss of $191,521. There is the pickled mackerel fillets deficiency payments program in the Magdalen islands, Richmond and Inverness counties, Nova Scotia, in 1952-53, showing a loss of $21,903. There is a small loss for Newfoundland, the shore-caught salted codfish deficiency payment program, of $478. There is a small credit from the Canadian Commercial Corporation of $40. All this comes to $213,862. There is a further item of $355 with respect to the Magdalen islands pickled mackerel fillets. There is a large item with respect to the Atlantic coast salted codfish purchase program, 1953, amounting to $446,903. There is an item of $37,521 with respect to the Saguenay county salt codfish deficiency payment program, 1953. There is an item of $45,741 with respect to the bloaters purchase program, 1952 and 1953.

Mr. Nowlan: When the minister says of 1952-53, does he mean we purchased some in those years and the losses were only realized in the present year? Otherwise some of these items should have been in other estimates.

Mr. Harris: That was the production year, and these sums are to be paid now because this is the sale year.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Can the minister explain this a little further? I have the report of the fisheries prices support board for 1953-54, which contains a number of the items he read just now, but it does not contain anything for the period 1954 and 1955, for which I suppose this particular item provides. It says here that the completed program of the fisheries prices support board, as at March 31, 1955—there must be some other items than those the minister read out.

Mr. Harris: All the items I read, Mr. Chairman, come to the total of this item, $744,382.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Then there may be further supplementaries to complete anything beyond the dates to which the minister referred.

Mr. Harris: If there has been a fish support program during this fiscal year which is not completed by the sale of the fish by March 31, then there will be an item in next year's estimates.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was wondering, too, if the minister could tell us what sort of goal the prices support board has? Their objective, as set out in the report here, is to endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from fisheries and those from other occupations. I am asking the question because of comparative figures I compiled with regard to British Columbia and the maritimes. There does seem to be a wide discrepancy there. In Newfoundland, for instance, there are 19,566 fishermen, and the average value of the catch per fisherman is $770, whereas in British Columbia there are only 6,715 fishermen and the average value of the catch per fisherman is $5,061. I was wondering if there was some attempt under this particular program of the prices support board to bring the maritime fishermen up to some more reasonable income level.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Harris: I am sure my hon. friend would get more enlightenment on that point on the fisheries estimates, but I do want to say this. All the fishermen on the east coast look upon those on the west coast with some envy. My hon. friend knows the reason for that. This government has tried over the years, and particularly in the last three or four years, to find some means to not necessarily bring the average catch value up from $700 to $5,000 as he has indicated, but at least to see that the people on the east coast were not living at the low standards they had been before say 1948 or 1949, and particularly Newfoundland since it became a part of Canada. We feel there is some standard of living to which all Canadians are entitled, and this is one way of accomplishing that end.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I am not quarrelling about it; I am just wondering if you are doing enough. It still seems very little for the average fisherman.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

585. Yukon Territory—administration of justice—further amount required, $12,000.

Mr. Montgomery: Can the minister say if this applies to reform institutions or penitentiaries? It covers the acquisition of buildings and lands.

The Chairman: Resolution No. 585 covers the Yukon Territory.

Item agreed to.

586. Construction, improvements and new equipment, including provision for the establishment and construction of a new institution in the province of Quebec for the confinement and reformation of federal prisoners—further amount required, $200,000.

Mr. Montgomery: I believe item No. 585 was the one I really wanted to find out about. There is an item in that for construction or acquisition of buildings and land. Would the minister say whether that is to acquire reform institutions in the Yukon, or what is it?

Mr. Harris: As I think my hon. friend knows, persons who are jailed in the Yukon are often incarcerated in Alberta, and we pay the cost of maintaining these people under certain arrangements with Alberta. This happens to be an item which was discovered by an audit as not having been submitted to us two or three years ago. We are now paying Alberta, because had they submitted it at that time it would have been a proper charge on the federal government.

Mr. Montgomery: My next question is on this item, Mr. Chairman, and I see it covers money expended on these institutions in Quebec. Can the minister give us any information at this time on conditions in the penitentiaries? Is the population increasing? Is the accommodation sufficient? Will there be considerably more accommodation as the result of this new reformatory being erected?

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to repeat what I have said so often before. This is not the occasion for a discussion of general policies and difficulties that face a minister in charge of any particular department. The purpose of this vote, of course, is to provide extra money which had already been approved in principle last summer and has been found to be deficient in amount. This relates exclusively to the expenditures necessary as a result of the riot in Kingston last summer, and is for the purpose of rebuilding the property.

My hon. friend made some mention of the vote itself. It should be borne in mind that the vote which is referred to here is the same vote which appeared in the main estimates last year. In that vote there was a reference to an item with respect to the penitentiary of St. Paul in Quebec.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have one further question. The item on page 5 of the supplementary estimates reads:

Construction, improvements and new equipment, including provision for the establishment and construction of a new institution in the province of Quebec for the confinement and reformation of federal prisoners—further amount required, $200,000.

On page 19 of the details we find the following: "Penitentiaries: Kingston, $200,000." There is also another total of $200,000. Can the minister elucidate a little on that?

Mr. Harris: I am discussing the buildings item at the moment. Is there another item that my hon. friend wishes to take up now?

Mr. Nesbitt: There are two items.

Mr. Green: The details appear on page 19.

Mr. Knowles: I believe it is the same item set up in a different way.

Mr. Harris: We are talking about Kingston, which is the item I referred to, namely repairs to the penitentiary at Kingston caused by the riot last summer.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the minister has misunderstood me. Will he refer to page 5?

Mr. Harris: Of the bill?

Mr. Nesbitt: Of the supplementary estimates, which sets out the items. There he will find reference to construction, improvements and new equipment, including the construction of a new institution in the province of Quebec. The amount is $200,000. On page 19, in addition to that, there is another $200,000 item set out for Kingston. Perhaps the minister can deal with that.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry. I have been following the bill which I have before me and not the printed supplementaries that hon. members have. Let us confine ourselves to Kingston for the moment and dispose of that. There was a riot there last summer and repairs are necessary as a result. That causes us to ask for a further vote of $170,000 directly, and a possible expenditure of another $30,000; therefore we have made the item $200,000.

Mr. Nesbitt: No.

Mrs. Fairclough: It says "Quebec" here.

Mr. Harris: I am coming to that. I am asking hon. members to bear with me. If we pass this item, then we can go on with the other. Is that agreeable?

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Harris: All right. What is the other item you are talking about?

Mr. Montgomery: There is another item on page 5.

Mr. Harris: It is in the loans, and when we come to the loans we shall deal with that.

Mr. Pallett: The item on page 5 refers to the province of Quebec and the particulars refer to Kingston.

Mr. Harris: I made it clear, I hope, that the wording in this supplementary is the same wording as in the original estimate for the past year. It happened that in that estimate there was a reference to a building in the province of Quebec. The item also refers to all forms of construction.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

587. Annuities Act — administration — further amount required, $26,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would like to have an explanation of this amount. I note that this refers to commissions paid to agents. Commissions are paid to agents in some instances and in others to postmasters, as the case may be. This amount of $26,000 is approximately 10 per cent of the total commissions which are estimated to be required for the year. There is no increase in the amount in the main estimates for next year; therefore it would look as though it is not an increase in that case. Something else has come up in the meantime. Will the minister say what it is? Has a special contract been written, or was the business in excess of what had been expected? Just what is the answer?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The amount of commission has been growing because of the additional sales of annuities, apparently, and the amount in force at the end of last year, March 31 a year ago, had a valuation of some $794 million. On the basis of that and the expected sales during the year the main estimates provided for $997,000. We have found that we need an additional $26,000 to pay the two agents who are selling more annuities.

Mrs. Fairclough: I realize that we are not on the main estimates now. The main estimates give no recognition to the fact that this business is increasing, because there is exactly the same appropriation for commissions as there was for the preceding year. The sum of $26,000 is 10 per cent of the aggregate, and it would seem to me that surely there must be some special instance. I wondered whether a contract had been written for some large plant which employed several thousand employees, or something of that nature. Has the minister no information in that regard?

Mr. Harris: No, I do not think so. I have a fairly detailed statement on the method of paying the agents, but I have no suggestion that there is an unusual situation.

Mrs. Fairclough: I submit there must be an unusual situation, because it is not provided for in next year's estimates. If it is a steadily increasing thing, then the estimates were carelessly drawn.

Mr. Harris: Sometimes ministers of finance have a way of keeping estimates down, and they find out afterward that they were wrong.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is not very realistic.

Mr. Trainor: Has the government given consideration to advising prospective purchasers that the annuities they purchase today may be paid off at maturity in dollars that will purchase only 50 cents worth of goods in terms of the contributions they make?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Harris: It is a very hypothetical question.

Mr. Trainor: A very real one.

LEGISLATION

588. General administration—estimates of the Clerk—further amount required, $58,000.

Mr. Green: With respect to this item, page 19 of the supplementary estimates gives us the details, which show that $50,000 of this amount is for publishing the debates. In the original estimates for the present fiscal year we voted $250,000, which was $100,000 more than had been voted the year before.

Mr. Pickersgill: Too long speeches.

Mr. Green: I admit that in the intervening years the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has come to the house, and perhaps that accounts for it. Can the minister tell us why it is necessary to have this increase, amounting to $150,000, to cover the publishing of debates?

Mr. Harris: This item of $58,000 consists of $50,000 for publishing debates, $3,500 for stationery, supplies and equipment and $4,500 for expenses of committees and the like, making a total of $58,000. The cost of publishing debates has undoubtedly grown. I hope hon. members will recall that last session was the longest peacetime session since 1903, and under those circumstances you could expect a greater cost for the publishing of Hansard.

Mr. Knowles: How long a session does the minister expect this year?

Mr. Green: The minister I think will admit that this does seem to be a large increase, from $150,000 for the fiscal year 1953-54 to $300,000 for the fiscal year 1954-55. Surely that would not be accounted for solely by the greater length of the session?

Mr. Harris: The total expenditures to date are as follows:

Publishing debates, April 1 to June 30, 1954, $116,933.
Progress estimate to date, revised edition, first session, 22nd parliament, $52,645.
Add commitments, $169,578.
Publishing debates, January 7 to March 31, 1955, $97,000.
Progress estimate, revised edition, first session, 22nd parliament, $22,422.
Estimated amount to complete binding of first session, 22nd parliament, $11,000.
Total commitments, $130,422.

That brings the total estimated cost up to $300,000; we have voted $250,000, so we are asking for another $50,000.

Mr. Green: About two weeks ago hon. members received a letter from the queen's printer advising that if they wanted to purchase Hansard for any particular date at the rate which has been in existence for some time, that is 5 cents per copy or $3.75 per hundred, they must have their order in the distribution office by ten o'clock that night or in the printing bureau by midnight. This does not seem to be a very reasonable arrangement. In other words, if an hon. member wanted to order Hansard for today he would have to order it from the distribution office before ten o'clock tonight, that is before the house adjourned, or from the printing bureau before midnight. Perhaps the minister can explain why this change has been made.

Mr. Harris: I know that anything hon. members have to say on this matter will be considered carefully by the queen's printer and by the Secretary of State. The obvious explanation, of course, is that this is done to cut down costs. Hon. members will realize that Hansard is put into type some time after midnight and is delivered to hon. members the next morning around 9.30 or ten o'clock.

That being the case, should hon. members want copies of Hansard in addition to the normal run the queen's printer had in mind to send to the house, it would be much cheaper to run off the copies at the time the original run was being made. In that way the queen's printer would not be in the position of either having a large overrun on the assumption that additional orders would be placed, or setting up the type at a later date at considerable cost. If this should be inconvenient or work to the disadvantage of the public I am sure consideration will be given to changing the rule.

Mr. Green: I take it that whatever amount is paid, it meets the cost of these Hansards; is that not correct?

Mr. Harris: I do not think that is so, but I shall get the figures on that.

Mrs. Fairclough: It occurs to me that this is a matter which could properly be considered by the standing committee on printing. I have been a member of that committee ever since I came to the house six years ago, and I have yet to be called to attend a meeting. Apparently quite a bit of work is done and quite a few decisions are made with respect to printing about which hon. members, even those on the committee, are not consulted. I would suggest that before any such regulation is made at least the standing committee should be called to confirm it.

Mr. Harris: I think I should tell the hon. member for Hamilton West that some consideration was given to this about a year before she entered parliament. At that time there were a number of rules laid down about the printing of Hansard and its purchase by hon. members. However, I think the idea is excellent. If the printing committee has not met for six years and if the hon. member, along with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, would consent to serve I am sure we would have the best printing experience that could be brought to bear by hon. members.

Mr. Knowles: It is hard to resist an invitation of that kind, but may I point out for the record that the recommendations to which the minister has referred were made a number of years ago—before the hon. member for Hamilton West came here—but were never approved by the house. They were made by a committee of which I did not happen to be a member. That committee made its report, which was objected to by some hon. members, and the report was never concurred in by the house. Nevertheless its provisions were put into effect by the queen's printer.

In the meantime we have become used to most of those recommendations, and perhaps have grown to accept them. But I think the point made by those who have spoken is well taken. If any more changes are going to be made affecting hon. members of the house, perhaps we might be consulted.

While I am on my feet there is one other comment I should like to make. I believe that one of the reasons for the increased cost of publishing the debates—I am not now referring to the 10 cent charge for extra copies, because I think that could be looked into—is an increase in wages which was granted within the last couple of years. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra does not object to that any more than any of the rest of us do. In fact there is room for still further improvement on that score.

Mr. Pouliot: I happened to be the chairman of the debates committee when the matter was looked into. This committee did not sit very often, but on that occasion we had before us the editor of debates, the late Mr. Young. He suggested that we should dispense with the unrevised edition of Hansard. At that time there were two editions, the unrevised and revised, but since that time only the one edition has been published.

No doubt it is in an effort to effect economies that the queen's printer has asked hon. members to put in their requisition before the end of the day, so he does not have to keep the type set up too long. The printing of Hansard represents a formidable quantity of type, and as soon as the necessary copies are run off they can destroy the type and melt it down.

There was another matter which is of great interest to me, and perhaps the minister can give me some information tonight. Some years ago I insisted upon having early publication of the index of the debates of the past session. That index was most useful. It was completed during the summer recess, but a week or two after the session was prorogued we had an unbound copy of the index, prepared by Miss Kearns and another lady who was very competent, and the index was useful and complete.

Now, what is the use of having Hansard when we do not have a proper index? I do not think the index for the last session has been published as yet; I know I do not have a copy of it. What is the use of having this big book when we do not have an index? I made protests in the house on many occasions previously, and finally I obtained the famous index; but I had to be grouchy and unpleasant and I had to complain frequently in order to obtain it. I wonder if I will have to start again to make the bureaucrats move and induce them to complete the index and release it to us at the earliest possible opportunity?

It is a long time since the last session concluded and there is no excuse for not having the index prepared. I do not care about the bound copy, but I want a good copy, an index which will be as complete and useful as it was when Miss Kearns and her competent assistant were in charge of it. I do not ask the minister to answer this question now but I wish to put it on the record, and I shall complain again about the undue delay in delivering the index to the members. There is no excuse for that at all.

Mr. Knowles: I think there is one point which should be kept clear, and that is that there are two committees that seem to be involved here. The hon. member for Temiscouata made reference to the committee on debates of which he is a member, and I recall a report of that committee which was concurred in by the house. But the committee to which the Minister of Finance and I referred was the committee on printing. The chairman at the time was Mr. Emmerson, and I believe it is that committee which would deal with a matter of this kind. As for the index to Hansard, if the hon. member for Temiscouata is chairman of the debates committee perhaps he could call it into session.

Mr. Pouliot: I am no longer chairman.

Mr. Thatcher: While we are discussing the cost of the printing of Hansard I would like to point out a practice which the house adopts more and more, that of attaching appendices at the end of Hansard from time to time. Sometimes the information contained in the appendices is necessary, but frequently it is easily available elsewhere. I do not think we should give unanimous consent to the printing of appendices. After all it costs a good many hundred dollars to print one page of Hansard. I would suggest to the minister that in future if information is available elsewhere by the simple process of looking it up, we should not consent to having these appendices and other things printed at the end of Hansard.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Mines branch—

589. To provide for payments to McGill University in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Before item 589 is passed I would like to say a word or two about it. I notice in the estimates that again this year we are going to provide $50,000 for the experiment with the coal-fired gas turbine. I would like to know what practical progress we have made in the development of that turbine. I remember that two or three years ago when the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was speaking on this item concerning this particular machine he told us it was going to be one of the major items in the solution of our coal mining difficulties. We had pointed out to him that the coal mining industry of Canada was finding itself in a bad way, and he told us at that time that a little squeeze might do the industry good, if I recall the term. He thought the squeeze would do the industry good and that in time it would survive. Unfortunately, however, it has not been surviving.

The minister pointed out as a bright spot in the future the development of this coal-fired gas turbine, and said that within a few years it would assist in the rescue of our fast-fading coal mines. I wonder if the minister could tell us at this time what progress has been made in the development of this machine and how long it will be before we can expect substantial results so the waning coal industry in this country will receive some little benefit from it?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that I can make no forecast as to how long it might be. I can only say that when the treasury board were engaged in considering these estimates some weeks ago we considered the progress that had been made and the recommendations which were presented by various people who in our opinion were competent to know. They recommended that this vote be continued and the work of this experiment be continued. We accepted that recommendation on the basis that these people felt that real progress was being made.

One could hardly expect that a particular experiment would in fact solve all the problems of the coal mining industry. Indeed, we have heard many experiments suggested in the House of Commons as to what one might do about the coal industry. At the same time this seems to be giving satisfaction to those who think in terms of experimental work, and for that reason we consider the progress has been sufficient to justify its continuation in the hope that it will bring results which will be beneficial to the coal industry in both the east and the west.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister has indicated that when they were considering this estimate, those in authority gave him the advice that they considered it to be a worth-while project. They advised him that substantial progress had been made. I imagine in the course of this discussion when the government was considering granting this $50,000 some indication must have been given of the rate of progress, and some indication as to how much longer it would be necessary to continue this assistance.

I think the minister is sufficiently acquainted with business tactics and is himself a sufficiently good businessman that he would have said, "Now look, we are not going to give you $50,000 every year for as long as you want. We gave you assistance last year and the year before that and the year before that. How long is it to go on?" It seems to me the minister should be able to give us some indication. I would not expect that he could tell us within one year or even within three years, but he should be able to tell us when the machine will have advanced to the point where it will be a commercial proposition and of some assistance to the needy coal miners.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I do not expect that the Minister of Finance can possibly answer in the house for all departments, and I think this is one department where he does not have the details.

I was glancing at this item myself, and it brought to mind the fact that I had the privilege on two occasions within the last four years, the most recent being two years ago, of going down to Montreal with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and other hon. members of the house, and also press representatives, to take a look at this experiment.

The idea is that of Professor Mordell of McGill University. Of course a gas turbine engine is not a new idea; in fact it is a rather old experiment, but we have never been able to develop a cooling system to which the blades of the engine would stand up. The only new idea in regard to the turbine engine is that Professor Mordell feels he has discovered a cooling system which will make that engine work. I think the original intention in developing this engine was to use it in locomotives. They think it would be a better device than the diesel engine, and would be cheaper and so forth, if they could establish it. But the last time I looked at it and saw it in operation my conclusion was that it was at least five years away from the blueprint stage and at least ten years away from the stage of being of any commercial value. That is on the assumption that it will work, and there is no assurance that it will do so.

I do not think that that engine would be used in any locomotive in this country for a good many years. When you consider the amount of money that has been spent by the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. in the dieselization of the roads, you may rest assured that they are not just going to write off that capital expenditure for the purpose of swinging over to new engines. That sort of suggestion is just ridiculous. The last time I was down there I asked Professor Mordell if, in his opinion, these engines were interchangeable with the diesel engines being used at the present time. He said no, that before these can go into a locomotive, they would have to get the cooperation of the Canadian National Railways, that their people would have to come in with him as well as others and that they would have to build a locomotive into which might be placed this engine. As for its doing anything for the coal industry, in my judgment it will never do so. When you consider the factors I have just mentioned, the only place where it would be able to help the coal industry would be by the burning of coal on the railways; and that is out, in my opinion. It may have some value, if they can make it work, in generating power in small power plants; that is, assuming that it will work. It may be a good marine engine. I talked to some people—I am not going to name them—and I was led to believe two years ago that those in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys who have been watching the experiment were of the opinion that there was not much value in continuing to make that expenditure. However, I notice that it is here again. I am not going to ask the minister to take it out. Perhaps there are possibilities for the engine but I want to say definitely that, in my judgment, it will never be of any value to the Canadian coal industry.

Mr. Harris: What my hon. friend has said is, of course, said by one who knows a good deal about the coal business, and I am sure it will receive the careful attention of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

To answer my friend the hon. member for Bow River, let me just say that once again this is a clean-up item of this year's commitments to McGill University. If he will vote it now, subject to what he has said, he may have a discussion of it with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys on the estimates for the forthcoming year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I hope the minister will bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Harris: I will.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): If he can persuade him to give us an answer, I will certainly pass this item now.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister tell us when this project started and what is the total expenditure on it to date?

Mr. Harris: The expenditure to date has been $433,786 and, with this supplementary item, it becomes $483,786.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, when did the project start? Has the minister the date of that, roughly? We have voted $100,000 already this year for this item, and this is a second item of $50,000.

Mr. Harris: I think this is the fourth year.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes; I think it is the fourth year in which this matter has been before the house.

Mr. Harris: I think so.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not want to set myself up as an expert. We all recognize the knowledge possessed by the hon. member for Cape Breton South with respect to the coal industry and coal mines generally. Far be it from me to question his judgment. However, I suggest that possibly this is an engineering problem about which neither one of us knows a great deal and that we ought to try to get advice from other people with regard to it. I have talked to engineers and to men who are close to the coal industry, and they are people whom the hon. member for Cape Breton South knows very well. I think he would accept their word and their judgment. They have an entirely different viewpoint on this particular project than that which was advanced by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and, I think inferentially, by the hon. member for Bow River. Frankly, I am a little bit surprised by the attitude taken by the hon. members. Of course if their premises are correct, they are justified. But apparently there is a big difference of opinion on the matter.

My complaint is not that you have a $50,000 item in your estimates. My complaint is that you have not enough. I think that this matter should have been proceeded with with more vigour and that more money should have been spent on it. Then we would not be debating needlessly tonight whether it is a good thing or bad thing, or whether it is going to be a good thing five years or ten years from now. If this were a national defence project, Mr. Chairman, and if it were a matter of developing a turbine engine for an airplane during the war, as was done with the jets, you would put the whole resources of the nation behind that project. You brought in scientists from wherever you could find them, you locked them up and told them to come out with a solution; and they did so, time and time again.

As I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South will admit, this project may be of equal importance to the coal industry. The coal industry's life is measured today not in decades but in years and almost, one might say, in months. I think that the government should place on this project greater emphasis than has been placed upon it heretofore. I am not criticizing them for what has been done. I know what they have been told undoubtedly. I have been told this by those fairly close to the matter. The government have been told, "We are getting enough money; we are proceeding along and we are making progress". The men back of this project, the scientists working on it, deserve credit. I think they have really accomplished a great deal. However, they are proceeding in a laboratory atmosphere. They are proceeding in an effort to achieve technical perfection. I do not think they have quite the sense of urgency that the occasion demands. Instead of thanking the government for the amount of money they have received, I think they should be demanding twice as much; and I believe the government would meet their request.

My hon. friend says that this engine could never haul a locomotive. I am told that the British have developed an engine similar to this one, or rather a turbine, and that they are hauling trains in Great Britain with it at the moment. I am also told that they have been trying to license it to two American railways and that both American railways have said, "We are interested in the McGill project; we think it is a better machine and we are not going to license yours, although it is made in Britain where ordinarily engineering standards are very high. We are going to wait for the McGill project to be finished." That is the interest that at least some people in the United States are taking in this project.

My friend says that it cannot haul a train. It certainly can develop power. Those who are close to it and whose judgment I respect tell me that this may be the cheapest and most efficient source of power that has yet been developed by man. It certainly is a matter that deserves all of the attention of the government. Even if in the end we find that it does not work, a few hundred thousand dollars or a few million dollars spent on this project, having regard to the possibilities of it and what can be derived from it, should not matter too much. The possibilities are such that there should be no hesitation whatsoever. I urge the minister to give this matter most careful consideration. In the general estimates I hope there will be a much larger item.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings implied that I was opposing the amount of this estimate. I never did any such thing, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nowlan: That is what I understood.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, not at all. The only thing I want to be sure of is that we are getting something for our money and that we are not going to have to wait for the rest of our natural lives before some progress is being shown. Our coal mines are in a desperate position. We cannot wait for 10 years, 15 years or 20 years for this development to show some signs of progress. The hon. member is a great deal more hopeful than I am if he thinks—as was indicated by the hon. member for Cape Breton South—that the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. are going to dieselize all their locomotives and then are going to turn right around and equip them with this gas turbine. They just do not do that sort of thing. Before the railways go back to this type of gas engine, 25 years or 30 years will have passed. What I should like to see is a little bit more energy put on this development. Even if we have to double the appropriation this year, I would not be against it. But we want to at least see a little bit of energy put into it so we may see some tangible results in the very near future.

General—

590. Payments to Royal Canadian Air Force and commercial companies for air photography, and to defray the expenses of and the purchase of equipment by the interdepartmental committee on air surveys—further amount required, $1,200,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have several questions on this item. I notice that the amount is almost the same as the original estimate for this work. That suggests to me either that there was poor estimating or that considerable new work has been undertaken. Second, I notice that the work of aerial surveying is being divided between the Royal Canadian Air Force and commercial companies. Can the minister tell the committee just how the amount is divided between these two groups? Can he also give us the name of the commercial company engaged in the aerial surveying? This is an item of $1,200,000, and it would suggest that a large amount of additional aerial survey work is involved. Can the minister tell us the nature of the work and if this amount is sufficient to complete it?

Mr. Harris: As I think hon. members know, we have been carrying out a program of aerial photography in Canada, and estimates are made in advance of the amount of work expected to be done during the coming flying season. Last year happened to be a particularly good year in some parts and not so good in others. The contract for the photography was carried out not entirely to the extent that had been expected. In addition to that aerial photography, however, the people concerned were able to take photographs not of the area that had been set out but of other areas, and when they completed their work the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys realized that the photography that was being offered at that moment was of an area which they would have on their program in a few years and they might as well acquire it now. That accounts for the fact that they purchased this additional amount of aerial photography during 1954-55.

It may look a little odd that the amount is as much again as the original item, but when it came before us we concluded that it was a sound investment as it merely involved doing twice as much work in the one year as had been expected. The advantage I see to it at the moment is that we are able to purchase it at about a 10 per cent discount under the circumstances.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister tell me the name of the commercial company engaged?

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, I cannot.

Mr. Dinsdale: I suppose it is Spartan.

Mr. Harris: I think so.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us the policy of the government with regard to dividing this work between the Royal Canadian Air Force and the private companies? There has been considerable complaint that the government is not using private companies for work of this kind to the extent they could be used, and as a result the development of flying in Canada is being retarded, particularly in the northern parts of the country. I raised this matter last year with the Minister of National Defence. There had been cases where the air force was actually flying on contract jobs. I think one was for the Iron Ore Company in northern Quebec; the air force was doing work which could have been done by commercial companies.

Has the government a policy of deliberately trying to promote the development of civil flying in Canada by contracting as much of this work as possible to private companies? I believe that is the policy followed in the United States, and it is one reason they have made such great advances in civilian flying.

Mr. Harris: I am sorry that I am unable to give figures to show the amount paid the R.C.A.F. and the amount paid to private companies, but I think my hon. friend knows that we do not consciously do anything which would interfere with private enterprise, and that while we may not deliberately bonus flying by Spartan or similar photographic companies we nevertheless do give them the business which under any circumstances would be justified, having in mind national security and the cost of doing a particular job. As I say, I am not able to break down this item, but I would be very much surprised if there was not a very large amount on the side of private industry and a small amount on the side of the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is anything included in this item for acquisition of equipment?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): It is entirely payments?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

591. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $1,604,000.

Mr. Nowlan: What was the total tonnage moved for the year under this item?

Mr. Harris: I am afraid I have the details in dollars rather than tons. I see that I have the details broken down by areas in tons, but only in terms of the increase. Therefore I would have to have the original figures. For example, the increase in coal movement in Nova Scotia was 959,631 tons. Waterborne on the St. Lawrence river amounted to 299,000 tons. These are additional to what was estimated, but I cannot give the grand total.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Nowlan: These figures are up to when?

Mr. Harris: The 31st of March.

Mr. Brooks: Are they only for Nova Scotia?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Did I understand the minister to say there was an amount of money paid for the movement of coal by boat? If so, how much was it?

Mr. Harris: There are various amounts depending on whether it is all rail or waterborne to certain points in the province of Quebec; that is, transshipped there to rail. It is quite a complicated statement. I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend but I do not think he would understand it if I were to read it. This item, of course, covers all coal subventions, in the east, in the prairie provinces and in British Columbia.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What was the amount of the subsidy granted to the western coal mines for movement by rail and movement by boat? Would the minister have those figures here? Possibly we will have to get them from the minister of the department.

Mr. Harris: The total expenditure for Alberta coal is $2,426,000, for British Columbia coal, $13,750, for Saskatchewan coal, $196,000, for Nova Scotia coal, $8,752,000, a total of $11,454,000. As the amount of the main estimate was $9,850,000 the amount of this supplementary item is $1,604,000.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to say a few words about these coal subventions, though I do not want to carry on a debate at this time. The point that concerns me is that I am not sure that the amount of the subsidy is large enough. It seems to me that when we find our coal mines, particularly in the west and in the maritimes, suffering so badly because of lack of markets, some effort should be made by the government to increase the subvention to an amount that will enable our coal mines to get their fair share of the markets in Ontario and Quebec. There is no use increasing the subvention by 50 cents a ton if that is not sufficient to permit the coal mines of western Canada and the maritimes to get their coal to the markets of central Canada and compete favourably with imported coal.

We know a tremendous amount of coal is being imported, something like 22 million tons as against 15 million tons produced in Canada. It does seem to me that if we ever expect to get our coal mines back on their feet, we are going to have to increase the subvention to an amount which will enable those mines to compete with imported coal in Ontario and Quebec. I think that is one of the things we should be considering, not whether it happens to be 50 cents or 75 cents, as the case may be, but we should be considering an amount sufficient to enable these mines to put coal into the east in competition with United States imported coal.

Mr. Harris: I know my hon. friend is aware of the fact that there is an item of $10 million in the estimates for the coming year to cover this subvention. I am sure he can put forward his argument at that time as to the manner in which we might improve the situation.

Mr. Gillis: That is what I am going to do. I do not want to get into any argument about that with the Minister of Finance; I would rather wait for the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Health services—

592. Laboratory of hygiene—operation and maintenance—further amount required, $17,000.

Mr. Trainor: This item appears to represent an expenditure of some $17,000 over last year's estimates. There is one particular part of the item that strikes me as a little excessive, and that is an amount of $13,350 for materials and supplies. Can the minister explain why it was not possible for the laboratory of hygiene to estimate any closer than $13,350 for their actual expenditure?

Mr. Harris: I am sure my hon. friend would be the first to agree with me that in health experimental work one never knows what he has to do until he does it. If during the whole of a 12-month period you ran according to a schedule you laid down you might be fairly competent to come to certain conclusions, but you would not likely be able to take advantage of those unusual events which occur and which send you off on another tangent to success in the thing you are seeking. I must say that I cannot say why they were not able to come closer to what their needs would be, but they assure me they needed this additional amount. Perhaps my hon. friend could ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare about that.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to suggest to the minister that $13,350 is a lot of leeway.

General health grants——

593. To authorize and provide for general health grants to the provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory upon the terms and in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make additional commitments for the current year not to exceed $1,000,000, $1.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the minister knows that some of us welcome any extension in the health grants program. The item before us calls for an expenditure of only $1. We will not get very much health for $1 with medical costs as they are, but I realize that the purpose of this item is to authorize greater commitments than were authorized in the main estimates in respect of hospital construction grants.

I notice that the actual increases in the commitments authorized by this vote of $1 add up to $1 million for increased hospital construction grants in Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta. That is all to the good, but none of us has any illusion that this represents rapid progress in this field. I do hope, however, that the fact that the health grants program is being pursued even to this extent means that the government has not lost sight of the fact it has stated so often, namely that the purpose of the health grants program is to lay the foundation for nation-wide health insurance.

Despite the short exchange the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and I had this afternoon as to whether legislating by a $1 item is medieval or modern, I am still of the opinion that if pursued year after year it is medieval, and it is time any so-called progressive party became modern. I am not alone in this feeling, Mr. Chairman. I know that the ministers of health in a number of provinces hope the time is not far distant when this health grants program will be put on a statutory basis. Indeed, many of us hope it will be more than a health grants program, but at least, whatever it is, it should be on a statutory basis so those concerned will know what they can expect.

It was in May, 1948, that the health grants program was first announced. We accepted the fact initially that it was to be done by putting items in the estimates. This is now 1955, and it is still being done in that way. We do not know just how much is involved in the expenditure that is made possible by this $1 item, which simply underlines my point that we should have this on a statutory basis.

Those are the two main comments I make in addition to welcoming any improvement, first that it be not forgotten that this health grants program was said at the beginning to be the basis for nation-wide health insurance, and that sooner or later this should be put on a statutory basis.

Item agreed to.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL AND ATOMIC ENERGY

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited—research program—

595. Current operation and maintenance—further amount required, $155,000.

Mr. Green: Item 595 has to do with Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. There was a vote in the main estimates of $8,379,765. Then in last year's supplementaries there was a further vote of $250,000, and now we are asked to vote an additional $155,000. Can the minister tell us why this additional vote is necessary?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. This is the result of a change in the method of accounting and bookkeeping with respect to the houses and properties at Chalk River. After the estimates were made up last year there was a decision made that certain costs would be amortized, and that the cost of doing that would be charged against this item. The $155,000 referred to here is the cost in connection with the sum of $2,843,174, which is more particularly referred to in item 597, the second item from this one.

Mr. Green: Then I take it this vote of $155,000 does not mean the expenditure of any additional money?

Mr. Harris: No.

Item agreed to.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited—research program—

596. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment and to authorize Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to undertake construction of works at Deep River for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited—further amount required, $1,106,000.

Mr. Green: There is a similar situation with respect to this vote. The vote in the original estimates was $4,805,010. Now we are asked to vote an additional $222,000 for the construction of buildings and works and so on at Deep River. For the moment I am not mentioning the other part of the vote, which has to do with the reactor. Can the minister tell us why this additional vote of $222,000 is necessary?

Mr. Harris: These are actual expenditures, Mr. Chairman, and the first item is a metals preparation shop at a cost of $400,000, a pilot plant extension building, a diluting fluids disposal building, a uranium storage building and certain other facilities and equipment.

Mr. Green: The figures the minister has just quoted are considerably in excess of the $222,000 which is found in the details for this vote.

Mr. Harris: There is a 65 per cent reduction in connection with a certain refundable item. If my hon. friend wants to go into detail I can read it, but I think when he gets to the next item he will see the point of it.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Green: Of this vote of $1,106,000 the sum of $884,000 is described on page 21 as being—

Portion of cost of new reactor (NRU) representing the increase from 26 per cent to 35 per cent in the percentage of the cost of construction chargeable to the research program of the company, for the fiscal year 1954-55.

Does that mean the work was proceeded with more rapidly than had been expected when the original estimate was made, or just what is the explanation?

Mr. Harris: The explanation is something like this. Originally it was intended that the cost of these buildings would be divided between the portion which it was thought would be of a commercial nature and the portion which would be used for purposes of the atomic energy program itself. That portion was worked out at 26-74 per cent. It is now intended to change that to 65-35 per cent, and these items have to do with the alteration of the bookkeeping items of atomic energy and the government of Canada to make that change possible by writing down the cost in one case and cancelling certain capital stock in the other.

Mr. Green: How do those percentages apply under the new plan? I am not quite sure which was 65 per cent.

Mr. Harris: 65 per cent is the commercial item, and 35 per cent is the non-commercial item.

Mr. Green: That is, 65 per cent of the product is to be sold; is that the idea?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited—research program—

597. To authorize (1) subject to the approval of the governor in council, amendments to the agreement dated the 22nd day of January, 1953, between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited (hereinafter called "the company"), to provide for (a) the write-up in the accounts of the company in the sum of $2,843,174 representing the depreciated value as at March 31, 1954, of the housing accommodation at Deep River previously written off to the research program of the company; (b) the issuance by the company of obligations in the sum of $2,843,174 in such form and upon such terms and conditions as the governor in council may approve; (c) the write-off in the accounts of the company in the sum of $1,405,845, representing the increase from 26 per cent to 35 per cent in the percentage of the cost of construction of the new reactor (NRU) from inception to March 31, 1954, chargeable to the research program of the company, and other minor adjustments; and (d) the cancellation of the capital stock of the company in the amount of $1,405,845; and (2) the necessary entries and adjustments in the accounts of Canada in connection with the matters mentioned in paragraph (1), $1.

Mr. Green: This item is very hard to understand, at least for the layman.

Mr. Harris: I hope I am not making it harder for the hon. member.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us a brief explanation?

Mr. Harris: This item refers to the houses at this establishment. The cost of the housing was shown as a charge on the research items in bygone years. A decision was made to alter that by having the cost of the houses repayable by Atomic Energy, by that company issuing debentures to the government of Canada at 3½ per cent for 30 years, so that the rentals and accruals from the housing and so on would go to the retirement of this debt. In order to do that a sum had to be agreed upon as to the value of those buildings, and I think that is the sum of $2 million odd I read a moment ago.

In order to do that we had to create an item of $2,100,000 odd, because we had already written the item down to $1 in the books of the government. Therefore in fact what we are doing is creating a liability of Atomic Energy to the government, this amount to be retired over a number of years by way of repayment on the debentures. In fact that is all this is. It is purely a bookkeeping entry to place in a different category, the houses at this establishment and to pay for them over the years.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister says this is merely a bookkeeping entry. But is there not to be some element of reality? Do I understand that the government has really recreated on paper an asset of $2,843,000, with obligations to repay this amount assumed by the atomic energy organization, and that it is hoped that moneys will be earned in that amount and paid by that organization?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister has already explained that the organization is divided into two parts, part public enterprise and part private enterprise. Were those the two percentages he gave us?

Mr. Harris: No, not with respect to the houses.

Mr. Macdonnell: Where is the money to pay the obligations to come from?

Mr. Harris: It will come from the rentals paid by the occupants to Atomic Energy. It will be collected by Atomic Energy from the tenants and, as a charge on Atomic Energy, paid to the government finally on the debenture issue.

Mr. Macdonnell: So it will be real money originating from third parties that will eventually come into the public treasury?

Mr. Harris: Quite so.

Mrs. Fairclough: Those moneys will then eventually succeed in writing off the debenture debt?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Item agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY

598. Printing and binding the annual statutes—further amount required, $6,500.

Mr. Lennard: In connection with this item, we know that the statutes are printed in both French and English, and rightly so. I believe the regulations are to the effect that members of parliament are entitled to complete sets of the statutes in both English and French. I feel that this is wrong. I feel that in future if members of parliament were entitled to one set of their choice, in either English or French, it would mean a great saving in this department.

Item agreed to.

599. Canada Gazette—further amount required, $55,000.

Mr. MacLean: I notice that this is an additional item of $55,000. Last year the estimate was $105,000. The item for the current year is $110,000. It would seem to me that there has been either an unforeseen expenditure of a large amount or else the estimating is badly out of line.

Mr. Harris: The note I have here is that there were a great many more publications of the Gazette last year with respect to certain statutory orders, and that is why the bill ran up, and why it is not expected to be up this year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Architectural branch—

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—

601. Ottawa, $1,732,666.

Mr. Green: May we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. Harris: Yes. There are two items in the Ottawa area. There is an item of $156,000 with respect to a property at the corner of Bay and Wellington streets. There is an item of $1,576,666 with respect to payment for the former seminary building at Hurdmans Bridge. This latter item includes an amount of $757,000 with respect to certain federal district commission payments for grading and the like.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the seminary building at Hurdmans Bridge, there is an additional amount of $1,576,666, as the minister has just told us. Will the minister please tell the committee the total cost of this building, and also how it came about that this commitment during the fiscal year could not have been predicted a year ago? Perhaps the extra money has already been spent. If that is so, why is it necessary to spend it at this point instead of including the large item in the estimates for the next fiscal year?

Mr. Harris: We had rented the building for the purposes of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and after we had entered into a lease the owners of the building decided to sell, a decision they had not made before. We took advantage of the offer at a time when we thought we had a good price that could be justified, having in mind the rent that we had already agreed to pay. The reason we could not foresee it was that when we rented the building we did not know we would have the chance to buy it.

Mr. MacLean: Does this represent the total cost of the building?

Mr. Harris: No, there will be a further item in the coming year.

Mr. MacLean: In the regular estimates?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Hees: Does the R.C.M.P. require all this building? It seems to be a very large building.

Mr. Harris: I would be glad to take my hon. friend to the quarters formerly occupied by the R.C.M.P. and I am sure he would see that they were wholly inadequate.

Mr. MacLean: I cannot find an item in the estimates for 1955-56 covering this building.

Mr. Harris: I will have a look as soon as we adjourn.

Mr. Macdonnell: What was the rental, the assessed value and the cost of this building?

Mr. Harris: The rental was $370,000.

Mr. Green: A year?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: The details on page 22 read:

Acquisition of former seminary building—further amount required to complete payment.

That does not seem to fit in with the minister's explanation. I understood him to say that there would be an item in the estimates for the coming fiscal year. Can the minister give us the total amount that will be paid for this building?

Mr. Harris: Perhaps I have misread the item I have before me. The building was rented in June, 1952, at an annual rental of $370,000 for a term of five years, with the option of renewal.

Mr. Green: A rental of $370,000 a year?

Mr. Harris: Yes. That is all the information I have. If I have misled the committee I am sorry. I was under the impression that this was not the final payment but I shall have a look at it when we adjourn and let my hon. friends know. I should say that I am hoping to complete these items by ten o'clock.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister indicate what is the total purchase price?

Mr. Harris: As I say, I will let you know.

Mr. Churchill: Could we not make better headway if the minister of the department were here?

Mr. Harris: I do not think so.

Mrs. Fairclough: What is the floor space of the building?

Mr. Harris: I have not that before me.

Mr. Green: What is the assessed value of this building?

Mr. Harris: That is not here. As I say, I will get that for you.

Mr. Green: I suggest that this item should be allowed to stand until we get further information. The minister has not told us the total purchase price, yet apparently the annual rental was $370,000 for a period of five years. We must have a lot more information about this item before it is approved, and I suggest that the minister allow the item to stand.

Mr. Harris: We will let it stand for 25 minutes.

Mr. Lennard: Let it stand, period.

Mr. Brooks: Did the rental include heat, light and all the other requirements? It seems to be a tremendous amount.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the minister is getting the other information there is one thing I would like to have. This figure of $370,000 is a little staggering. Was the building rented before, and if so, what was the previous rental?

Mr. Harris: We were the first tenants.

Mr. Macdonnell: There must have been some way of arriving at this $370,000, which does seem to be a formidable figure. I suggest that we be given some information upon which that figure was based.

Mr. Harris: As I say, I hope you will have it by ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: Will the minister advise when the building was built, its floor space and the number of floors? Will that information be forthcoming.

Mr. Harris: I hope so.

Mr. Brooks: Does that include garage accommodation as well?

Mr. Harris: Maybe an underground shelter.

Item stands.

Architectural branch—
Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

602. Saskatchewan, $350,000.

Mr. Ellis: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. Harris: The amount in the original estimates was $1,050,000. Then there is an additional $700,000 item, and the further amount required is $200,000. I beg your pardon, the original estimate was $1,050,000, of which $700,000 was provided in the main estimates. Then there was a deferred vote of $150,000, leaving a balance of $200,000 which is being provided by this vote.

Item agreed to.

Engineering branch—
Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works—
Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amount required—

603. Newfoundland ($113,900, less the amount of $113,899 available from savings in other listed projects detailed in previous estimates for 1954-55 for this province), $1.

Mr. Herridge: I notice there is an item of $36,200 for a retaining wall at St. Lawrence, the province of Newfoundland to pay one-half the cost. What was the purpose of that retaining wall?

Mr. Knowles: Probably just "small wood".

Mr. Harris: This is a retaining wall 800 feet long required to maintain material dredged from the harbour.

Mr. Herridge: I just want to comment that when it comes to building a retaining wall in Newfoundland it is considered the joint responsibility of the federal and provincial governments, but when they want to build on the Columbia we are told it is the responsibility of the provincial government only.

Item agreed to.

Canal services—

607. Operation and maintenance—further amount required, $30,000.

Mr. Green: According to the details on page 23 this $30,000 is required for professional and special services. Can the minister tell us how this amount is made up?

Mr. Harris: This is for the construction of a model of the Gut dam in the St. Lawrence river. We have an explanation of the nature of the model, but I think it must be obvious that the model was constructed so that one could study the problems which arose from blowing up the Gut dam.

Mr. Green: Is this a model of the Gut dam or of the river after the Gut dam was blown up? I understand that the Gut dam was removed.

Mr. Harris: Yes, but we have had two things to consider there. The first was the original claim of the shore owners for damages caused by the construction of Gut dam; and then, as you may recall, the Gut dam was removed. We also have difficulty now in that some others think perhaps they have been damaged accordingly.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the model being made to help meet the claim for damages. What is the idea behind it? Why should there be any claims for damages in a case of that kind?

Mr. Harris: We are hoping there are not but this is to find the results of the water flow with the Gut dam gone. We had certain statistics before, but this is to provide information as to the present circumstances.

Item agreed to.

Marine services—

608. Nautical services—administration, operation and maintenance, including grants and contributions for the purposes indicated in the details of the estimates; rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidies to salvage companies, and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 306 of the Canada Shipping Act—further amount required, $57,000.

Mr. Macdonnell: Part of this vote is for subsidies to salvage companies. Could the minister tell us which companies are getting the subsidies and what amounts they were paid under the main estimates in addition to the present amounts?

Mr. Harris: To Foundation Maritime Limited in Montreal an amount of $40,000, to be paid August 31, and $35,000 to be paid

December 1; Pacific Salvage Limited, North Vancouver, payable $75,000 per annum, quarterly on the 2nd of January, April, July and October.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel service—

611. Contract dredging—further amount required, $1,529,361.

Mr. MacLean: I notice this is a large item over $1,500,000, and that the estimate for this fiscal year was $2,500,000, making a total of over $4 million, roughly. The estimate for the next fiscal year is only $2 million. Would the minister give a word of explanation as to what the expenditure was for this year?

Mr. Harris: Yes. The reason, of course, is that we were able to do more dredging last year than had been expected because of good weather conditions, and the total cost is made up of several contracts. There are in fact eight contracts for various yardages. I think this is most fortunate in that we were able to do this work last year rather than having to do it this coming year. Of course there may be other items that will have to be met this year, but if not, at least we have this work behind us.

Item agreed to.

Railway and steamship services—

612. Construction or acquisition of auto-ferry vessels, as detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $1,300,000.

Mr. MacLean: Could the minister give an indication as to when the ferry service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be improved.

Mr. Harris: No, I am afraid I cannot. Perhaps some other members of the house who are more familiar with the progress in the construction of the ferry could say something about it. All I can say is that we certainly hope it will be completed as early as possible because of the service it will give between North Sydney and Port aux Basques.

Item agreed to.

613. Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, deficit, 1954—additional amount in excess of the sum of $581,000 already appropriated to provide for the payment to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited (hereinafter called "the company") of the deficit for the year ending December 31, 1954, in the operations of the company and the vessels under the control of the company, as certified by the auditors of the company to the Minister of Finance and approved by the Minister of Transport—further amount required, $47,410.

Mr. Trainor: Could the minister give an explanation or a breakdown as to just how this considerable deficit on the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, has been brought about?

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, as far as Canadian National Steamships are concerned I think they have done very well. As a matter of fact I believe that last year the minister said on the main estimates that if there were not some improvement they might have to discontinue this service, and I might say that the balance sheet for the year shows they have done very well under the circumstances, with the cut-rate competition with which they have had to deal. I know something of their operations because I have had the privilege of travelling on their ships on two different occasions. As a matter of fact that is about all that is left of the Canadian merchant marine. I am pleased to find they had such an excellent year and have cut down the deficit to a great extent. I feel if they have another year like 1954 they will be in the black. I think this line should be encouraged and they deserve a lot of credit for the job they did last year.

Mr. Nowlan: I would like to support the statement which was just made by my deskmate. The report of the steamship line shows that the revenue of the company increased by 13·2 per cent during the past fiscal year and expenses went up by only 1·7 per cent. In this day of rising costs I believe that indicates extremely efficient management and is a very creditable showing.

I well remember that last year when this item was up the Minister of Transport threw rather a cold chill over some of us when he suggested that if the losses should continue to be as high as they were then he would have to give serious consideration to a withdrawal of the service entirely. At that time, a year ago, the operating loss was over $820,000. This year the operating loss is down to $319,000, which represents a saving of about half a million dollars. I certainly hope that never again will there be a necessity for any intimation—I won't say threat—or suggestion that this service should be abandoned or done away with.

I think it is a most important service for Canada as a whole, and particularly for the east. Last year I urged that we should be given more service and that more boats should be put on which would result in better earnings. To some extent my argument was justified, although perhaps by accident, in that the company this year was able to make 14 more trips than a year ago, according to the report. Of course, that was due in part to the fact that last year they were tied up in a strike but because of these additional trips and services the company went some considerable distance in building up the revenue and were able to keep expenses on a substantially level basis.

I am not going to discuss the matter at greater length here, but I hope that when the general estimates for this department are considered the minister will be here and that he will give assurance to the house that the department will consider extending the service.

The company has five small non-refrigerated boats and only three refrigerated ships. These ships travel in tropical waters to the West Indies and we hope to South America, so you can realize the importance of refrigeration. If they can do so well with so little I think it reflects credit on the company, and I hope another year we will have an increase which will provide for an extension of their operations.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could tell us if this is still on a one-year basis. When we questioned the Minister of Finance last year he was very careful to point out that the plans made last year were for one year only. In view of the fact that we have had a fairly successful year, I wonder if that changes the plans or if it is just going to be drawn up for another year?

Mr. Harris: I think the Minister of Transport would give an adequate answer to that.

Item agreed to.

614. Canadian National Railways deficit, 1954—amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1954-55, to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the national company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the national company in payment of the system deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) arising in the calendar year 1954, subject to recovery therefrom of accountable advances made to the national company from the consolidated revenue fund, $28,758,098.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the minister really going to ask us to vote $28 million before we have the report of the committee on government-owned railways? The committee has not yet been set up, and it has not yet met the officials of the railway. Surely the usual practice is that when this vote comes on it comes before this committee with the approval of the committee on government-owned railways. It is true that it is near the end of the fiscal year, but we are not there yet.

Mr. Harris: I am sure I would not mind if my hon. friend wishes to discuss this in the committee, and we could allow this item to stand, though I would hope it would be the only one.

Nevertheless, I might point out that I think I have announced the motion to appoint this committee every day during the past week, and we have never reached it. I would hope that my hon. friend would co-operate with me in getting the committee set up; then the work could be done, I would think, on Monday, or Tuesday or Wednesday at the latest, because we shall have to pass this item on Wednesday or Thursday if there is to be royal assent. I beg hon. members' pardon. We would have to pass it on Tuesday in order to have it passed in the other place.

We must do either one of two things. Either we pass it tonight or we shall have to hasten the work of the committee in a manner that I do not think will be possible at all. But I do not accept too much responsibility. I shall give my hon. friend the assurance that if the item is passed tonight it will not in any way prevent a full discussion of the Canadian National Railways item in the committee when it meets.

Mr. Macdonnell: It seems to me extremely undesirable to pass an item of $28 million without going through the procedure which is now well established. If, by some chain of circumstances for which no one is responsible, we have reached the stage where the thing could not be carried through, that is another matter. But as the minister has indicated, if we proceed with dispatch on Monday the thing can be done. I would hope that he could find an extra day. I hope it will not go to Tuesday. I think he had better put pressure on the other place to give him an extra day.

Mr. Harris: I could not do that.

Mr. Macdonnell: To come back to the point, I suggest to the minister that it is highly undesirable to do this. Certainly as far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for my colleagues—we will co-operate in the setting up of that committee on Monday. As a matter of fact I thought it was going to be done today, and it was a great disappointment to me that it has not been done. But that is another matter. I am putting it to the minister. He himself suggested a means whereby this can be done next week, and this seems to me a much more desirable course than passing this item now.

Mr. Harris: I would not want my hon. friend to misunderstand the situation. I am sure that if the committee is set up, by motion, by dinner time on Monday that would be the earliest we could hope for such action, and the committee could only meet on Tuesday. I do not suppose he would want to pass all items of the Canadian National Railways in one sitting or in one day. It would therefore appear that it would not be possible to deal with the item on Tuesday, the last day on which we could deal with it in order to have it dealt with in the other place by Thursday.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am greatly disappointed to find that the minister has not as much control over the other place as I thought he had. But leaving that matter aside, I suppose it is possible that the committee could reverse the order of its procedure and deal with a capital item—no, this is not a capital item. I admit that the matter is difficult. It will have to be done quickly, but I am still going to indulge the hope that the minister can get us the two days. I still feel very unwilling to have the item passed now without the safeguard which the House of Commons, in its wisdom, has provided for many years.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, I did my best to get these estimates down at the earliest possible moment. Indeed, I think they are being considered by the house a little earlier than they have usually been considered in the past. I have been trying to get the committee set up. I am not complaining about anyone.

Mr. Macdonnell: It is the railway committee that is really concerned.

Mr. Harris: All right. We have had it on the order paper for over two weeks. I have been wanting to get it done. These things have crept up on us. I would just suggest that, because of my uncertainty that we can do anything about the other place, we might pass the item tonight with the assurance I have given, namely that first of all we are obliged to pay the deficit anyway, and that this would not preclude my hon. friend from making the most searching examination next week in the committee or from having, I think, two if not three other opportunities to discuss this matter during the session. There will be the usual refunding vote; there will be the usual item in the main estimates, and so on.

Mr. Macdonnell: It seemed to me that the minister, by something he said a moment ago, implied the possibility of this thing working through according to the usual schedule. If I understood him correctly, he said that if he were not able to get it through the committee we might be forced into such and such a position. Is it not possible that there can be unanimous consent on Monday, if he finds himself in a real jam, to put this item through then?

Mr. Harris: If that is understood I have no objection to letting this item stand until Monday anyway, in order to see what the situation is at that time, subject to the warning I have given.

Mr. Green: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, there is also this item dealing with the seminary building. We are not prepared to let that item pass without further explanation.

Mr. Harris: You are going to get it.

Mr. Green: We cannot do that tonight.

Mr. Harris: Yes, we can. I am ready to deal with it.

Mr. Green: All the items cannot go through by ten o'clock. We are going to have a further look at it, so there is no question of everything else being passed.

Mr. Harris: I have the explanation on the seminary building now and was prepared to give it when we completed the other items. I hope my hon. friend would not expect not to dispose of these items tonight. We are near the end. We have taken longer on these estimates than has been taken on supplementaries at any time in my memory.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no.

Mr. Harris: Excuse me; I will say in recent memory.

Mr. Knowles: The minister's memory is short.

Mr. Harris: My memory is fairly long. There are not many items left. We can dispose of them in a few minutes. I can dispose of the seminary building, I hope, as soon as we complete the others. I am quite prepared to let this one item stand in the hope that we can put it through Monday and perhaps find on Tuesday that we can deal with it in the other committee.

Mr. Green: I am afraid we cannot let that seminary building item go through tonight.

Mr. Harris: You can hear what I have to say about it.

Mr. Green: We should be glad to hear the explanation; but even then we want time to look into the matter.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Do I understand that resolution 614 is to stand?

Mr. Harris: Stand.

Item stands.

Civil aviation division—

616. Grants to organizations for the development of civil aviation, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $60,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I believe the expenditure under this item is in the form of subsidies to students taking out private licences. I believe it is an extremely important function because it provides a pool of partially trained pilots for Canada. Can the minister indicate whether that is the case with regard to this increased expenditure of $60,000?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, we are talking about item 617?

Mr. Dinsdale: Item 616.

Mr. Harris: I thought we had passed item 616. This is an additional grant to flying clubs, schools, instructors and student pilots, as my hon. friend knows. It indicates that the amount required has moved up from $270,000 provided for in the year previous to $330,000. I could give details as to the number of pilots who have completed their course and so on, but I think my hon. friend is fairly well informed on that point.

Mr. Dinsdale: No. I have not those details, but I shall be willing to wait for them until we discuss the general estimates.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Item agreed to.

General—

618. To provide for the expenses of an inquiry, authorized pursuant to part I of the Inquiries Act, into the application and effects of agreed charges authorized by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada under part IV of the Transport Act, $23,000.

Mr. Green: Is this the total cost of the commission on agreed charges, or has there been an earlier vote?

Mr. Harris: Yes. This is the full cost that we are voting now.

Item agreed to.

619. To provide for reimbursement of the Department of Transport stores account for the value of stores which have become obsolete, unserviceable, lost or destroyed, $11,335.

Mr. Knowles: May we have some details as to how much of this amount is for stores which have become obsolete, how much is for stores that have become unserviceable, how much is for stores that have become lost and how much for stores that have been destroyed?

Mr. Harris: Obsolete stores, $9,498; $1,837, inventory shortages.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we have finished the Department of Transport with the exception of the C.N.R. deficit item. I would suggest that we call it ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

On item 601.

Mr. Harris: Perhaps you might hear my explanation with regard to the seminary building.

Mr. Green: We should be glad to hear it.

Mr. Harris: You will be sure of it then, and we will not have it again.

I think I made it clear to hon. members that this was a new building which had just been constructed, and for that reason we were the first tenants. The rental, as I have said, was $370,000. The purchase price is $5 million. This is in fact the final payment, and I apologize to my hon. friend for having misled him. There is no assessment on it because we were in there as tenants and no assessment was made by the municipality. For the purposes of our Municipal Grants Act we do that ourselves. There is a net floor space of 229,500 square feet. I do not think there are any other questions.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will you say that again?

Mr. Harris: A net floor space of 229,500 square feet.

Mr. Green: What is the area of the land?

Mr. Harris: One hundred and thirteen acres.

Mr. Green: One hundred and thirteen acres?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Green: We shall have to ask that the item stand, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Green: No, this item stands.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Before I turn to the other items of business on Monday, may I point out that it was my understanding that we would resume consideration of these estimates in such time that they might be disposed of in the other place before Thursday. That would mean I would have to have unanimous consent to go into supply on either Monday or Tuesday without a motion.

If that is the understanding we shall continue on that basis, unless we are unable to meet my hon. friend's wishes with respect to the sessional committee. I am not certain that the officials of the company can be here on Tuesday, but we shall do our best to arrange it that way.

On Monday then, subject to what I have said, we shall take the motion to set up the sessional committee on railways and shipping; then the bill with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act; then the bills standing in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the order in which they appear on the order paper, followed by the bill in the name of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to the Library of Parliament Act; then the bill in my own name with respect to the Municipal Grants Act, and then the bill in the name of the Minister of Transport with respect to grade crossings.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 28, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HON. MEMBER FOR TEMISCOUATA—
BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

Mr. W. G. Weir (Parliamentary Assistant to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are occasions when little courtesies, particularly to those of our members who have been here a long time, are I think appropriate. On behalf of the house I should like to extend congratulations and good wishes to the hon. member for Temiscouata and many happy returns of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Temiscouata): I thank the government whip for his kind wishes and my colleagues for their generous applause.

TRADE

GATT—TABLING OF CERTAIN DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the tables copies in English and in French of certain instruments which were opened for signature in Geneva at the conclusion of the GATT conference. These instruments, of which we now have received copies, embody revisions which it is proposed to make in the general agreement on tariffs and trade. They also include the text of the proposed agreement on the organization for trade co-operation which would provide GATT with a permanent and definite organization, and the declaration on the continued application of schedules to the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

I am also tabling another document, the final act of the ninth session of the contracting parties to GATT. This document which has been signed merely authenticates the texts of the other four documents. Hon. members will notice that copies in the French language of the documents I am now tabling are attached in each case to the copies in the English language and are therefore not being tabled separately.

[Later:]

SALE OF SURPLUS PRODUCTS BY UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he comment on the fact that the United States has launched the sale of a whole range of surplus agricultural products, consisting of wheat, oats, barley, flax and the like, on an open bid basis? I should like to ask the minister what effect this fire sale will have, in his estimation, on the market for Canadian farm products of a similar nature and kind, and whether it is not a fact that this action is in contravention of an agreement made by the United States government some time ago that it would not conduct a fire sale of surplus products?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member gave me notice of his question and I have read the press dispatch from James M. Minifie to which the question refers. I find nothing new in the dispatch. The United States has been making package offers of agricultural products to various countries in the world. They have made package offers of various commodities to the United Kingdom and to Germany. We have been happy to find that the countries receiving these offers are not inclined to upset their usual pattern of trade. We also know that the United States has called for bulk tenders on butter. The Canadian government enters a protest whenever it feels it is justified in doing so. It is difficult to protest a series of offers, but this government endeavours to look after the interests of Canada as well as possible. I think it is encouraging to find that, in spite of the offers of wheat made by the United States, Canada is selling more wheat than the United States has succeeded in disposing of by the various methods it has adopted.

[Later:]

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of his answer to the hon. member for Prince Albert. If the sales policy of the United States in relation to agricultural products has not adversely affected the sale of Canadian wheat, why has the Canadian percentage of the world wheat market dropped substantially during this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did not say that the sales policy of the United States had not adversely affected Canada. I think it has, naturally. But my hon. friend speaks of the percentage of sales of Canadian wheat. I do not know to what figure he is referring. Is he referring to the international wheat agreement sales or total sales?

Mr. Argue: Canada's percentage of the total world wheat sales.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not prepared to accept that statement without reviewing the figures. Our percentage of total sales has been reasonably good.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister in relation to the answer he gave me. Is it not a fact that the United States is following a fire sale policy now in connection with some $2 billion of farm products, and will that have any detrimental effect upon Canadian marketing conditions?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am not familiar with fire sales, Mr. Speaker; I never attended one. It is a fact that the United States has an appropriation, I think of a billion dollars, for the purpose of assisting in the disposal of surplus products. I think there is no doubt that by their disposal policies they have displaced our products in certain markets. What we can do about it, I do not know. The policies of the United States are their policies and are not ours. We follow our own policies. As I say, we protest where we think a protest is warranted, and we have protested in connection with certain recent transactions.

[Later:]

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON UNITED STATES RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the statement made by the minister, and the fact that he read to this house a communication to the government of the United States concerning the restrictions on the movement of oil across the boundary between Canada and the United States, can he inform the house if there has been any formal reply from the government of the United States or any official of that government, and if so, what the answer is?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A formal reply has been received, Mr. Speaker, and we are attempting to get the permission of the state department of the United States government to make that reply public. We have not as yet received such permission.

Mr. Fulton: Does that not fall into the same category as the Yalta papers?

LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED INCREASE IN UNITED STATES TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether the Canadian government has protested to the United States government against a possible restriction on the importation into the United States of Canadian zinc and lead, and if so what reply has been received?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): We have filed several protests over the last 12 months on the subject to which my hon. friend refers, Mr. Speaker, but whether any recent protest has been filed is a question that might properly be addressed to the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Hees: I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, following upon the reply by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the Department of External Affairs protested to the United States government on the possible restriction of the importation into the United States of Canadian zinc and lead?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would have to look into that matter. It is almost as difficult for us to keep track of these protests as it is to keep track of the questions concerning them from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Hees: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the minister take the question as notice and give a reply tomorrow?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

R. C. A. F. TRAINER CRASHES

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. How many Royal Canadian Air Force trainers have crashed since January 1, 1954?
2. How many of these were T-33 jets?
3. How many deaths have occurred as a result of such crashes?
4. How many of these (a) T-33 crashes; (b) other trainer crashes, were caused by (i) weather conditions; (ii) aircraft failures; (iii) human error?
5. How many crashes in each category occurred in each training station?

Mr. Campney:

1. 32.

2. 19.

3. 31 air force personnel.

4. Weather conditions are seldom a fundamental cause of aircraft accidents; human error is, in the last analysis, responsible for practically all aircraft accidents and may range from errors in design, construction or maintenance to errors in supervision and operation. In reality, often more than one factor is at work. In the T-33 crashes, weather was a factor in 1 case, aircraft failure in 4 cases and human error in 14 cases. In the remaining crashes, weather was a factor in 2 cases, aircraft failure in 1 case and human error in 10 cases.

5. It is not considered to be in the public interest to give such comparative information over so short a period. To do so might reflect unjustly on individual training stations. The irregular occurrence of aircraft accidents over a relatively short period of time must be closely related to the types of aircraft flown and the nature of training operations. The air force is, of course, alert to detect any signs of inefficiency at a particular unit.

The performance of aircraft now in general military use has advanced so far beyond those of the last war that when an accident occurs the consequences are generally more serious. It is worthy of note that the aircraft accident rate of the R.C.A.F. in recent years compares favourably with those of the R.A.F. and the U.S.A.F. For obvious reasons neither Canada, the United Kingdom nor the United States reveal these rates.

LOANS AND ADVANCES TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Has the Department of Defence Production made loans, advances or investments with respect to the following corporations, from April 1, 1945 to March 31, 1954: (a) Canadian Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Company Ltd., Longueuil, Quebec; (b) John Inglis Company Ltd., Toronto, Ontario; (c) Light Alloys Ltd., Toronto, Ontario; (d) A. V. Roe Canada Ltd., Malton, Ontario; (e) Sorel Industries Ltd., Sorel, Quebec?
2. If so, what was the total amount of loans, advances or investments in each case for the said period?
3. What amounts have been repaid by the said corporations as at March 31, 1954?
4. What interest, if any, has the Canadian government received, in each case, from the said corporations on these loans, advances or investments?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The Department of Defence Production made no loans, advances or investments with respect to these corporations from April 1, 1945 to March 31, 1954, apart from certain prepayments on a monthly basis in respect of contracts for the construction or acquisition of crown-owned capital assets by the first four contractors named, and in respect of certain production contracts with the first named contractor.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

INCOME TAX—FINES

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

What was the total amount of money received in fines from the four thousand or more (a) individuals; (b) corporations, who were convicted of infractions of the Income Tax Act in 1954?

Mr. McCann: Although fines to a total amount of $463,704.72 were received by the taxation division in the fiscal year 1953-54 as a result of convictions for infractions of the Income Tax Act, no information is available respecting the segregation of such amount as between individuals and corporations.

CAMP CHILLIWACK, B.C.—GARBAGE TENDERS

Mr. Patterson:

1. How many tenders were submitted for the garbage hauling contract at Camp Chilliwack, British Columbia?
2. By whom were these tenders submitted?
3. What was the amount of each tender?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Two.

2 and 3. It has not been the policy of the Department of Defence Production to make public information relating to other than the successful tenderer. The contract was awarded to the lower tenderer, Mr. Olley, of Chilliwack, B.C., for $490 per month.

TARIFF BOARD HEARINGS

Mr. Michener:

1. How many cases by the following classes have been heard and decided upon by the present tariff board since its appointment: (a) appeals by importers; (b) appeals by other interested parties; (c) references by the deputy minister of national revenue; (d) references by the Minister of Finance?

2. Of such cases in classes (a), (b) and (c), above, how many by each class (i) have been decided in favour of the importer; (ii) have been decided in favour of the interested party other than the importer?

3. Of the cases decided upon by the present tariff board (a) how many applications have been requested for leave to appeal to the exchequer court; (b) in how many instances has the exchequer court granted the applicant leave to appeal?

Mr. Benidickson: I have spoken to the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) and he has agreed that his wishes would be better met by redrafting this question and has suggested that it be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

LEVEL CROSSING, WOODSTOCK, ONT.

Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Have any accidents occurred since September 26, 1947, at the crossing where the main line of the Canadian National Railways from Montreal to Chicago crossed the Ontario provincial highway No. 2, approximately seven miles east of Woodstock? If so, how many?

2. Has the board of transport commissioners considered giving assistance from the railway crossing fund towards the construction of an underpass at this point?

3. If so, has the board yet reached a decision, and in what respect?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The board has no record of any accidents at this crossing since September 26, 1947. This crossing is automatically protected with a wigwag and bells, and to date no application has been received by the board for construction of a grade separation at this crossing.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING, ST. JAMES, MAN.

Mr. Churchill:

1. What areas adjacent to Stevenson airport, St. James, Manitoba, are affected by new zoning regulations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. What limitations on loans for housing development are imposed by the new regulations?

3. (a) How many houses have been constructed or are under construction in the areas affected by these regulations; (b) What arrangements are being made to prevent home owners from being penalized by these new regulations?

[Mr. Dickey.]

4. At what time and by what method was the St. James council informed of these regulations?

Mr. Bourget:

1. The restrictions apply to rectangular areas which extend 5,000 feet from the end of a runway and 1,000 feet on either side of a line that is a projection of the centre line of the runway. Furthermore, National Housing Act loans are not available within 1,000 feet from the side of a runway. At the Stevenson airport most of the restricted areas fall on undeveloped land or farm land. A portion of the restricted area at the south end of the north-south runway and a portion of the restricted area at the southeast end of the north-west southeast runway covers some developed areas of the municipality of St. James.

2. In the restricted areas mentioned above loans under the National Housing Act are not available.

3. (a) Financed under the N.H.A.: existing housing units, 333; housing units under construction, 37. (b) Since loans under the National Housing Act are only available for financing the construction of new housing units, existing housing units in the area are not affected, nor are housing units financed by other than the National Housing Act.

4. The restrictions on the availability of National Housing Act loans on housing units to be built adjacent to airports was announced on January 24 in the House of Commons. The manager of the Winnipeg branch office of C.M.H.C. attended a meeting of the municipality of St. James council on February 22, 1955, at which these restrictions were discussed.

NORTH SYDNEY-PORT AUX BASQUES FERRY

Mr. MacLean:

1. What is the number of automobiles capable of being carried by the new ferry to be put into service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques (a) when railway traffic is being carried; (b) when no railway traffic is being carried?

2. Are the automobile decks of this ferry capable of carrying large trailer-type trucks?

3. If not, what are the dimensions of the largest truck that can be carried on this ferry?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Railway traffic does not make any difference to the number of automobiles carried by the William Carson as the containers for railway freight are not transported on the car deck.

2 and 3. The automobile deck has a clearance of 6′ 11⅝″ and will accommodate 50 standard average size automobiles. The automobile deck will also carry 6 trucks of the non-trailer type, approximate dimensions 23′6″x8′ wide and two buses or tractor trailer trucks approximately 33′x8′.

FOREST INVENTORY, QUEBEC

Mr. Boisvert:

1. Does the federal government assist the government of Quebec financially in taking a forest inventory?
2. If so, how much has been spent by the federal government, to date?

Mr. Lesage:

1. No. The province of Quebec has not signed a federal-provincial agreement covering forest inventory, and for that reason does not receive federal financial assistance for this work.

2. Not applicable.

Mr. Boisvert:

How many railway-highway level crossings are there in each province of Canada?

2. What quantity of edible oils was imported into Canada in each of the following years: 1951, 1952, 1953 and 1954?
3. What quantity of such imported edible oils was used in the production of margarine in each of the abovementioned years?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CURRIE REPORT—ACCOUNTING IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of the reports of the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence drawing attention to accounting irregularities in No. 11 works company R.C.E., referred to in appendix "B" of the Currie report.

Mr. Campney: As my hon. friend from Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is, I am sure, well aware, reports made by the chief auditor of the Department of National Defence are confidential documents dealing with investigations into the internal administration of the department, and are a means of checking the efficacy of the administrative practices of the department. They are prepared solely for the guidance of senior officers of the department. It has long been the custom in this house, to regard such documents as privileged and I will therefore have to oppose this motion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would not just admit the possibility that these come into an entirely different category. They were referred to in the appendix to Mr. Currie's report, as stated in the notice of motion, and also in the text of Mr. Currie's report. What is desired here is information of real concern to the house and to the country in order that we may establish just what steps were taken to meet the situation to which attention was drawn at that time. In the light of current developments, and by virtue of the fact that they were referred to in a document made public here, does the minister not agree they are no longer in the category which he has described?

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anything the hon. member has said has changed the character of these documents. As a matter of fact, if I recall correctly, this issue was tested once or twice before in another place. The fact is that these are confidential documents of confidential officers prepared for the guidance of our officials. I think privilege attaches to them; otherwise there would be no particular advantage to be derived in having investigations of this type made within the department by departmental officials.

Mr. Fulton: They were seen by Mr. Currie and other officers of his company and surely the hon. members of this house should be as entitled to see them—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon member knows that this motion as he has put it is not debatable. I have allowed him to make comments upon the opposition indicated by the minister but beyond that I do not think it should be allowed.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? Since these bills are for funds which are appropriated by this house, should it not be made public—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whenever these questions come up it is always interesting to go into the subject matter of the motions. Hon. members must not forget it is they who choose this method of obtaining information. Standing order 51 says that when a member puts on the order paper a notice of motion indicated by an asterisk he intends to move it without debate. If a debate is desired it is up to any hon. member of this house to ask that these notices of motions be transferred to notices of motions. I have been lenient on this occasion because notices of motions cannot be reached. Later on, when we reach the period of oral questions and answers, if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) wants to put a question on the orders of the day to the minister with respect to the subject matter, he might at that time deal with it, but at this moment I think we ought to see that the terms of standing order 51 are observed.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt this motion?

Those who are in favour of this motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those who are opposed to this motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Fulton) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. I had occasion to give my views to the house with respect to divisions that are being asked for on notices of motions which are opposed.

Mr. Gillis: Before you proceed with that matter, Mr. Speaker, may I announce that I was paired with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Speaker: It is precisely because I am convinced that hon. members should perhaps go over the theory behind this standing order with a view to changing their attitude with respect to these motions that I am going to quote from the debate which took place in the session of 1909-10 when standing order 51 was adopted as we have it today. At columns 8370 and 8371 of Hansard of April 29, 1910, there is the following:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: . . . The object of this rule is obvious.

The rule as we have it today.

Almost every day we have notices of motions which go through unopposed, and these may be marked by the member with an asterisk, and the motion may pass without any discussion.

Mr. Sproule: I think this suggestion is a wise one and will result in economizing time.

Mr. Lancaster: What would happen supposing an hon. gentleman puts a notice of motion in the way indicated to show that he did not want to discuss it, while another hon. gentleman might want to discuss that very matter? I do not think any one hon. gentleman should have the right . . . to control the opinion of the whole house on that matter. I appreciate what the Prime Minister is trying to do and I am with him; but it seems to me we are going further here than we intend to go. We do not want to have half a dozen different notices of motion on the same subject on the order paper. When a notice of motion is on the order paper it seems to me that the consent of the house ought to be obtained if that motion is not to be discussed; else we would be in the incongruous position that, because some matter was of great importance and several hon. gentlemen thought it should be discussed, one of them would be able to say that it should not be discussed.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I doubt that, in point of fact, that this is very likely to arise. If any hon. member on the other side puts a motion on the order paper asking for the production of papers and desires that the motion should be presented without discussion, I do not know that anybody on this side will object. The government may object, and, if they do, the motion is transferred to the notices to be debated.

Mr. Crocket: But suppose that a notice comes from the other side, and a discussion is desired on this side, it would seem that there is no provision for that. If the government have a right to transfer a motion to the orders by requiring discussion, there should be some provision by which members on this side should have the same right with regard to notices from the other side.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I think there is something in that. The difficulty could be obviated by providing not "if on such motion the government may desire debate", but "if on such motion debate is desired".

That does give the right to anyone in the house to ask that the motion be transferred to notices of motions.

Mr. Lancaster: That is my point.

Mr. U. Wilson: How would that affect it so far as the order paper is concerned? Would it go to the foot of the orders?

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: It would go to notices of motion.

Mr. U. Wilson: But if it went low on the order paper it might not be reached again.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: It would take its place at the end of notices of motions of that day. The clerk will see to that.

Mr. U. Wilson: If there were many notices on the paper and it were put at the foot, it might never be reached again.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Possibly—it will take that chance.

Amendment agreed to.

This is how standing order 51 came about. In 1915 a notice of motion was opposed by Hon. Mr. Reid, who was then minister of customs, and as found at page 611 of Hansard of March 3 he said:

It has not been the custom of the department to bring down papers of this kind; they are always treated as confidential.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was then in the opposition, and he rose and said:

If there is objection to the motion it should be transferred to notices of motion for discussion when it comes up again.

Mr. Reid: I have no objection to its being transferred, if necessary.

Motion transferred to notices of motion.

This is the way that standing order 51 was interpreted in those days, and that is the reason why earlier in the session I made certain appeals to hon. members. I did so because I think that we have got away from the practice intended in those days, which practice was followed almost consistently until about 1935, I believe.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TABLING OF BUDGET AND REPORT OF SECURITIES TRUST

Mr. L. Langlois (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) I beg leave to table the capital budget of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, for the calendar year 1955; also the annual report of the Canadian National Railways securities trust, for the year ended December 31, 1954, in English and in French.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF NEW WHARFAGE FEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister reconsider giving effect to the new wharfage fees on automobiles and trucks which, according to P.C. 1683 of November 3, 1954, are to come into force on April 1?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Various representations concerning wharfage charges have already been made to me by several members on this side of the house, so that I have had an opportunity to look into the matter. All the representations received are being considered in order to determine if changes should be made in the tariffs authorized by order in council P.C. 1954-1683.

Mr. Pearkes: Could the new wharfage fees be held in abeyance until the minister has an opportunity to make a final decision?

Mr. Marler: I hope that the consideration will not be too long and we shall be able to come to a conclusion very shortly.

FISHERIES

REPORTED DAMAGE ON NORTH SHORE OF LAKE ERIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McBain (Elgin): I wish to direct a question, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries, to his parliamentary assistant. Has the minister been made aware of the widespread damage the furious gales and storms did to the fishing industry on the north shore of lake Erie during the past week? If so, has he been asked for any assistance by the fishermen's associations or by the provincial government?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): We had no notice of the hon. member's intention to ask the question, so we will have to take it as notice.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

ALBERTA—NEGOTIATIONS WITH INDIANS ON STONY RESERVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is reported by the Canadian Press that, according to the Alberta provincial minister of highways, no further work will be done on the new route of the trans-Canada highway west of Calgary until a final agreement is made with the Indians of the Stony Indian reserve. Is the minister aware of this situation and would he care to make any comment?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation. The route tentatively chosen by the government of Alberta was through the Morley reserve of the Stony Indians. The minister responsible, the Hon. Mr. Taylor, spoke to me and we have had an exchange of correspondence. I have also discussed the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. There have been negotiations conducted between the band council and the provincial government, all with the knowledge and approval of the officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The last report I had from Mr. Taylor was to the effect that negotiations were proceeding satisfactorily. I have had nothing since that.

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): Can the Minister of Public Works say whether any negotiations are under way at the moment with the province of Quebec concerning the trans-Canada highway?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): I have received no representations from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Hodgson: May I ask a supplementary question? Has the minister undertaken any negotiations with the province of Quebec with a view to doing more on the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Winters: I have had recent informal discussions with the premier of Quebec, but I do not know whether they could be termed negotiations.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF ARTS COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister reached a decision as to whether or not he will set up the arts council at this session of parliament?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no definite decision has been reached.

Mr. Hees: Could the Prime Minister indicate when he may reach a decision on the matter?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, Mr. Speaker; the best I could do would be to say that as soon as a decision has been reached it will be announced.

CANSO CAUSEWAY

OPENING CEREMONIES—INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Can the Minister of Transport tell the house whether a definite date has yet been selected for the official opening of the Canso causeway? If so, are any arrangements being made to mark this event with public ceremonies?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I do not believe a definite date has yet been set, Mr. Speaker. A committee has been appointed to co-ordinate the activities of all those interested in the opening of the Canso causeway, and I hope it will be possible to make an announcement on the subject at an early date.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING OWNED, OPERATED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records and to report from time to time and that, notwithstanding standing order 65 in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee consist of Messrs: Bell, Carrick, Carter, Cavers, Churchill, Dumas, Fairey, Follwell, Fulton, Gillis, Hahn, Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace), Hanna, Harrison, Healy, James, Johnston (Bow River), Knight, Langlois (Gaspe), Lavigne, Legare, Macdonnell, McCulloch (Pictou), Murphy (Westmorland), Pouliot, Weaver.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion seeks the appointment of a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. As the house well knows, it is the practice to refer to this committee for consideration the annual reports and budgets of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Trans-Canada Air Lines, the reports of the auditors and certain items of the estimates. I think all hon. members are in agreement that this committee serves an extremely useful and valuable purpose. It affords to them the opportunity of reviewing in detail the operations of the railway, of the steamship company, and of Trans-Canada Air Lines, and of putting questions to the officers of these organizations concerning their respective operations.

In these circumstances, I believe I should not make any further remarks, but I should simply ask that the motion be adopted, so that the committee may proceed to carry out its duties.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I shall try to copy the admirable example of the minister, Mr. Speaker, though I do not know that I shall get as high marks for brevity as he deserves. Needless to say the work of this committee is very important. I feel that this year it is more important than ever because of the stormy weather into which the railway business has run. After all, the assets of Canadian National total some $3 billion, and if we were able to have anything approximating an earning on that amount, it would be a matter of real significance in our economy.

If we go back to the year 1943, we find that the railway earned, that is in operating revenue, $116 million. After payment of taxes and interest there was still $35 million as against a deficit this year of $28 million. But with regard to that I shall have something to say later on.

Before doing so however I wish to digress for a moment to look at the background of this committee, because I think it is interesting, not only in itself, but also interesting as throwing some light on a question we have had up several times recently in this chamber, as to what information it is proper to give in the House of Commons, and what information cannot properly be given.

It so happens that in 1921, just after the railway had been set up, there was a debate—a very interesting one—in which remarks were made that I think are illuminating, and from which I should like to quote briefly today. They seem to me to go to the very point we have discussed here more than once.

First of all I wish to quote from an amendment moved by the then leader of the opposition, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, with relation to the production of papers. It states:

> Subject to the reservation that in exceptional cases there may be documents of a confidential character which, in the public interest, may properly be withheld from publication, the house declares that it is the undoubted right of parliament to demand and receive copies of all reports, accounts, correspondence and papers in relation to the management of every department of the public service including the affairs of the Canadian National Railways, whether operating directly under the control of the department, or under corporate form.

Now, it is relevant to read a short extract from Mr. King's speech to show the background of the words used in his amendment. I should remind the house that this was moved very shortly after the Canadian National Railways had been set up. Hon. members will recall that this railway system resulted from the putting together of several railways which previously had been operating separately.

Mr. Mackenzie King permitted himself on that occasion to say this, as reported at page 1179 of Hansard:

> The impression that the public entertains today in a word is this: that the government has constituted a board of directors, nominees of its own, friends of its own, gentlemen who have connections with other large industrial enterprises, and has left them a perfectly free hand to use this vast railway system of Canada as a great instrument for furthering business interests in which the country may be interested, but in which they themselves may also be interested. In other words, the fact that parliament is denied a full and free knowledge of every fact surrounding the situation, is leading to the impression throughout the country that our national railways are being converted into a gigantic political machine for the purpose of furthering the interests of the government and its friends. Now, sir, there is only one cure for that impression, there is only one way in which the impression can be removed, and that is by the government giving to parliament the fullest information with respect to any questions which hon. members care to address to the ministry in regard to the national railways.

In reply to that Mr. Meighen, the then prime minister, had something to say. In an endeavour to look at both sides of the question he said, as reported at page 1182 of Hansard for March 22, 1921:

> I think it will be obvious that if the Canadian National directorate are to be compelled to answer to resolutions, which by the dozen may be put upon the order paper of this house every day, calling for copies of correspondence, for the disclosure of every fact and of every deed connected with the operation of the road, they will be put under a disability that their great competitor is not under at all. Should we do that they might well say: You shackle us in the management of the road; you refuse to give us that latitude and freedom of management that every successful business must have; you therefore will have to take the responsibility of failure—we do not.

Realizing that matter was not a simple one, Mr. Meighen went on to say:

> I am quite aware that there is to be said from the other standpoint much that is plausible and much that is more or less difficult to answer. I know that it is a fact that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways are dealing virtually with the funds of the people of Canada. I know that parliament, and parliament alone, is responsible to the people for the disposition of the moneys raised by taxation; consequently I know that there must be ample facility for the exercise of the control that goes with and is inseparable from responsibility. The difficulty has been to evolve a line up to which you can go in disclosing to parliament the affairs of the system and beyond which you cannot go if the system is to succeed. Just where that is to be it is very difficult indeed to say.

And then finally he said this—and this is the point of what I have just read, because it brings us to the committee:

It has occurred to me that if parliament set to work, say, through a committee of this house, to study this specific question in order to evolve some rule that could be followed, looking to the discharge of the obligations of parliament, it would likely result in something definite and concrete. That committee could bring before them those who have to do with the operation of the system, the officers of the road, the president of the road, and if they so desired, touching the subject committed to them they could bring as well officers of the competing road or of the other business enterprises of this country. Having done so, they would clearly see just what it would be impossible to do, and I think likely they would be able to evolve something that it would be possible to do and that would be amply sufficient to put parliament in possession of all the information that parliament would require to come to an intelligent decision on those issues that parliament alone can decide.

I have read those passages because it seems to me they are relevant and that they are very apposite, when we consider that these questions are coming up so often. I wish now to read briefly from the report of the committee made in 1924. I have not been able to get the reports for 1922 and 1923. It does not seem clear whether the committee met in those years. But in 1924 there are two things worth bringing to the attention of the house.

During that year there had been an investment made in a building in Paris, which had resulted in a great deal of criticism. In the report of the committee there is the following, as it is set out in the Journals of the house for 1924, at page 515. We find this:

Your committee is of the opinion that the acquisition or sale of property for railway purposes involving large sums of money ought not to be possible except by authority or order in council previously obtained.

I have read this, not because I undertake to say that it is a proper solution to the question at the moment, but because I felt that, in referring to the report of the committee, I should not ignore it.

The portion I wish particularly to read from this report is a statement by Sir Henry Thornton; and it is a statement which, so far as I can judge from meetings of the committee I have attended, Mr. Gordon who is now president of the road would endorse today. I shall read briefly from what Sir Henry had to say:

It is, in my judgment—

And, may I say, these remarks were made upon the completion of his examination by the committee.

It is, in my judgment, quite essential that there should be some vehicle of discussion and communication between the administration of the railway system and the representatives of the shareholders, who are the people of Canada, and those representatives are, of course, members of the dominion parliament.

And later on he said:

I should like very much to be in a position to discuss from time to time, not only this year but in subsequent years, if I am here, matters which affect the people of Canada, and their railway system, and discuss these matters with the accredited representatives of the people, who are necessarily members of the dominion parliament.

I have made this digression because it seems to me these observations are relevant and perhaps might be useful for our guidance today.

I now come back to the problem facing this committee. I am going to be brief, and confine my remarks to the Canadian National Railways, partly because it is so much larger than the others, and partly because that is where the real difficulties are occurring.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the hon. member speak a little louder. We do not hear him down here.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am flattered that the hon. member wants to hear me. Yes, I shall be pleased to do so.

As I said at the outset, this year the committee is faced with a situation of special difficulty, such as always arises when those in charge of the operations have to come to the committee and report a substantial deficit. As I have indicated already, this year there is a very substantial deficit. When we get to the committee we shall find that substantial reductions were made in operating expenses, but this is not the time nor place to go into those details.

I want also to point out that comparison with class 1 United States railways reveals that the decrease in gross revenue is less in percentage in Canada than in the United States. The United States class 1 railroads showed a decrease in earnings from $10,646,000,000 to $9,370,000,000, or 12·1 per cent. The Canadian National operating revenue fell by $56 million this year, from $696 million to $640 million, or approximately 8·5 per cent.

In other words, there is some encouragement to be taken from the fact that our drop was less in percentage than it was in the United States. We can also take some comfort if we look back to 1931, which of course was a year of low economic activity. Here we find that the deficit of the Canadian National was nearly $61 million as against $28 million this year. One can take a little comfort from that, but not very much, because after all in 1931 times were very bad and no one needed to be a crystal gazer to know that the Canadian National did very badly.

But the thing that perplexes one at this time is that in a year of high economic activity the railway did so badly, and that perplexity is added to somewhat when we recall that it is only three years ago that we revamped the capital structure of the railway. At that time we hoped and the management hoped, although no one could guarantee it, that that was going to make it possible for them to have an operating surplus, or even more than an operating surplus, to earn their interest. That was the hope.

It is more than disappointing, it is serious, to find in a year of high economic activity this tremendous industry, which involves some $5,000 million or more—$3,000 million in the Canadian National system and $2,000 million in the Canadian Pacific—that it is sick. I take the word "sick" from a statement made by Mr. Fairweather, vice president of research and development, Canadian National Railways, to be found on page 14 of the Turgeon royal commission on agreed charges. Mr. Fairweather was being questioned as follows:

Q. At this particular time, Mr. Fairweather, could you make some observation as to the condition of the railway industry, as to its health or otherwise?

A. I think that anyone who gives any consideration to the railway industry in Canada could come to no other conclusion but that it is a sick industry. It is not a healthy industry. I think, too, that no one could give consideration to this problem without realizing that a sick railway industry is not good for the people of Canada. I think, too, that if you go further into the subject you will find that the sickness of the railway is not due to any fundamental defect of the railway as a functioning organization. It is a strange thing that, notwithstanding all this, railway net revenues keep sliding away, sliding away despite all the technological improvements that are put into effect. The problem of producing enough net revenue to meet the overhead costs of the railway is becoming increasingly more difficult. The fact that in a year where we have suffered only a slight decline in industrial output, the Canadian National Railways is forced, as it will likely be forced this year, to admit an income deficit running better than $20 million,—

Actually $28 million.

—makes one pause and consider, especially when one considers that it is only recently the capital structure of the Canadian National was adjusted to a basis upon which it was supposed to earn its keep one year with another . . .

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

I should like to quote further from this report, still dealing with Mr. Fairweather's testimony:

They ask to be relieved from certain handicaps in order to be able to engage freely in the pursuit of business in a large and growing competitive field. In so far as this can be done without injustice to others, I think appropriate action should be taken.

I remind hon. members that I am reading from the report of the Turgeon royal commission on agreed charges. This is not the time nor place to enter into a detailed discussion of railroad problems, but I think it is the time and place for us to remind ourselves of the truth of what Mr. Fairweather said, that a sick industry is not good for the people of Canada. The responsibility for creating conditions under which this vast industry, in which we are so deeply concerned as a nation, can work, is ours.

I do not think that I need take the time of the house to go much further into the matter except to mention one point which I have mentioned before and which I bring up again because I believe it is of some importance. The directorate of the railway is small, being made up of six gentlemen. I am perfectly sure that each one of those gentlemen is of high standing. I happen to know only one or two, but I know that they are. Nevertheless I suggest that it looks almost like a little family party on the directorate and that is not a sound thing.

I suggest that as in the case of the Canadian Pacific the directorate should be composed of a much larger number of men who are outstanding in the business community. I suggest this for two reasons. First of all I think the people of Canada, highly as they regard the president and officials of the railroad—those of us who met them in committee I am sure will agree—are entitled to have on this directorate the ablest men that can be found so that the outstanding ability of those men may be available to help in meeting the problems of the railroad which sometimes seem almost to pass the wit of man. As I look at the problems which confront the officials of the railway they have my intense sympathy. I feel that we should leave no stone unturned to give them every possible help we can.

There is another and perhaps more pedestrian reason, although it is still a practical reason which companies do not ignore when they are appointing directors. If you have on your directorate the heads of large businesses, not only do you get their experience and ability but you also get their capacity to attract business. The Canadian National Railways should not snap its fingers at that.

Therefore, I just recall again the words of Mr. Fairweather, and add that this parliament is faced through its ministry of transport and through the officials of this railway with a tremendous problem and it should receive as sympathetic and as close consideration as, and the best understanding that, this house can give it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make just one brief comment on the economic position of the Canadian National Railways. I can make this quite brief by putting on the record this quotation:

> The Canadian National, especially, has to maintain unprofitable branch line services in the public interest. It has to keep on increasing the quality of passenger services in response to public demands. Canada is well served by this transportation system and, all things considered, Canadians should not grudge the $2-a-head contribution indicated by the current financial statement.

That, Mr. Speaker, comes from a publication not noted for its sympathy with the Liberal party or the government now in power. It was found in the Toronto Telegram on March 23 of this year.

Another comment I should like to make with regard to the Canadian National Railways is that I hope the committee will give serious consideration to the employment situation on the railway. As the minister knows, this is something that has concerned a number of us for many months. We are deeply disturbed over the extent of the lay-offs and we hope that something can be done to put a stop to these lay-offs and start re-employing some of those who have lost their jobs.

I also hope that the committee will deal more effectively than it has in the past with the plight of retired Canadian National Railways employees, particularly those whose pensions are in the lower brackets. I invite the committee to study the figures which can be found on pages 1762 and 1763 of Hansard for Monday, March 7, in answer to certain questions of mine, which indicate the large number of retired C.N.R. employees who are on pensions of very low amounts.

I am not at all satisfied with the answer which the minister continues to make. It is the same answer that the previous minister made to those who asked that something be done about this matter. The answer seems to be that others are in the same tough spot due to contractual obligations so it is too bad for the C.N.R. employees and nothing can be done about them.

I do not accept that answer as valid nor do I accept it as final, that nothing can be done for these people. I hope that consideration will be given to their plight by the committee which is to be set up when this motion is passed.

As hon. members know, if it were not for something else which I wish to discuss, I would speak at greater length on the two matters I have just touched upon in passing; that is, the unemployment situation and the position of the retired employees of the C.N.R. I shall come back to these matters on another occasion.

The other matter to which I wish to address myself at this time is one which comes within the terms of this motion in that the motion refers to the committee the accounts, estimates and affairs of Trans-Canada Air Lines. In the report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for 1954 which was laid on the table of the house on March 14 there are references to two crashes which took place in 1954. One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), may speak later in this debate about the crash which took place at Moose Jaw. I wish to say something about the crash which took place near Brampton, Ontario, on December 17, 1954. That was the crash involving a Super-Constellation which had returned that day from a flight to Tampa, Florida. As hon. members will recall, there was—

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to limit the latitude which hon. members may wish to take on this motion but I am asking myself whether it is in order at this moment to discuss whatever one might want to put forward before the committee after it is set up. In some cases when these motions come up there is no debate with respect to the subject matter to which it refers and in some cases there is debate. We had an example of that not long ago when the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation committee was created, but I assume it was by general agreement that a debate on C.B.C. policies took place at that time. Unless there is a similar agreement on this occasion when an hon. member makes passing reference to the subject matter I can see no objection to it, but if anyone wishes to deal at great length with a certain subject which he would like to see debated before the committee, I submit he ought to wait until the committee is set up and submit it there.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on that point Your Honour knows standing order 38 does provide that a motion to set up a committee is debatable. It is also in order under standing order 38 to debate the reference to a committee of any report or return that has been laid upon the table of the house. As I indicated, the report to which I made reference has been tabled in the house. It so happens I am not a member of the committee but the point I wish to make is that in my view even before this matter is referred to the committee there is something that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) should do in relation to the crash to which I referred, and I point out again that that crash is covered in the report that is on the table of the house.

I do not ask any concession. I do not ask that I be allowed to deal with this matter on sufferance. I claim with respect that it is in order, just as much in order as it was on the motion regarding the radio committee for hon. members to discuss radio and television policy from A to Z. I feel I should be allowed to proceed with this matter and to make my appeal to the minister, before this motion passes, to set up a public board of inquiry with respect to the crash at Brampton.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has another opportunity of putting forward that request when the estimates of the Department of Transport will soon be studied. I think that is the time to direct that request to the minister. It is not the responsibility of any of the corporations whose annual balance sheets will be examined by the committee to set up that particular board referred to by the hon. member. It is the responsibility of the minister as Minister of Transport.

As I say, I do not wish to limit the latitude the hon. members may wish to have when we are setting up a committee. There may be general agreement with respect to setting up the committee but if hon. members on a motion to appoint and institute the committee are going to tell the house what they wish to see done by the committee, I think we are putting the cart before the horse.

I do not want to go any further because I do not know if there was some agreement prior to the moving of this motion that there would be some kind of general debate. That was the case with the C.B.C. committee, I think. As far as I can recollect, any time the motion to create the C.B.C. committee was moved there was always a debate on policy and a general debate on C.B.C. operations, but that was not the situation in relation to other committees.

I remember having to stop the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) on a motion concerning amendments to the elections act. I asked him to wait until the committee was set up and to put forward the suggestions before that committee and not to tell us the amendments he would like to see enacted by that committee before the committee was instituted.

That is the extent of the remarks I wish to make at this moment. I would like to leave it in the hands of hon. members and ask them to be reasonable so as not to extend too much the latitude which is allowed on these motions.

Mr. Thomas: On that point, Mr. Speaker, may I ask if concurrence will be asked when the report is brought in after the committee stops sitting? If so, that would give us an opportunity to fully debate the policy of the railway committee. If no concurrence is sought we will have no opportunity of debating it after the committee has finished its work. I suggest we should be allowed to debate it either now or after the committee has stopped.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, I believe, is thinking of a bill which is presented annually to appoint the auditors for the Canadian National Railways or the first item of the Department of Transport in the committee of supply. It is upon these occasions that policies are discussed as well as operations and various activities which come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport.

As I said, I do not intend to insist upon the latitude being curtailed any more than hon. members would wish to see it curtailed at this point. I think I have done my duty in pointing out that when we are setting up a committee it does not mean we should debate all the things hon. members would like to see the committee deal with on the motion to appoint the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I do not offer this as an argument or as a defence, but I think perhaps I might point out that I indicated to the leader of the house on Saturday afternoon—and there is one member in the house who was present on that occasion —that it was my intention to raise this matter on this motion this afternoon, and no objection was taken. Earlier I had thought perhaps I would do it as a grievance upon a supply motion, if one ever reached that stage. However, it seems to me that the very fact that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) at this moment is moving that the affairs of Trans-Canada Air Lines be referred to a special committee gives me the right to ask him, before he asks that his motion pass, to take further action with respect to this matter to which I have drawn attention.

As I was about to point out, a few days after the crash last December the minister himself announced that there would be a public inquiry. A report to that effect appeared in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, December 22, 1954. That report indicates that the minister was quite definite that there would be a public inquiry. He pointed out that first of all there would be an inquiry by a technical board within the department, and he indicated that the results of the examinations by that technical board of inquiry would be turned over to the public board. According to Harvey Hickey, who wrote the dispatch, the minister said that no effort would be spared toward achieving this end, the end being the ascertaining of the relevant facts in relation to this crash.

As hon. members know, when the minister, on February 22, tabled the report of the technical board of inquiry and the other documents related thereto he said that although it had been his original intention to follow this inquiry by a technical board with a public hearing, he had changed his mind. He gave his reasons for that decision briefly when he said this, as reported at page 1375 of Hansard:

> Having regard to the exhaustive inquiry made by the board and the positive nature of its findings, I have come to the conclusion that no useful purpose would be served by setting up a public board of inquiry as I originally contemplated.

That means, Mr. Speaker, that there is no dispute over my statement that it was the original intention of the minister to have the two inquiries, one by technical people within the department and the other by a public board.

Hon. members will recall that, a day or two later, I asked in the house whether, in the light of certain comments made by the president of the Canadian air lines pilots' association, the minister would reconsider the matter and have a public board. His offhand answer was no, and nothing seems to have been done about the matter since that time. It is my contention, Mr. Speaker,—and that is the reason that I feel that I should have these few minutes in which to speak on this matter now—that the minister should go back to his original intention and set up a public board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with him about having a public inquiry, but could not this matter be inquired into by this committee being set up, composed of members of parliament able to hear the evidence and thereby come to a conclusion?

Mr. Knowles: The committee could inquire into the matters that were raised a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) but it seemed to him appropriate to make those observations on this motion here in the house. It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of such serious importance to one individual, namely the pilot concerned, and to the public that, bearing in mind the original intention of the minister, I should be permitted to make now on the floor of the house this public appeal to the minister to go through with what was his original intention. That is what I am doing now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am trying to be just as generous as I can possibly be. I have been listening attentively to the hon. member's remarks but I must confess that, in my humble judgment, I do not see how the hon. member can be in order in asking the Minister of Transport to proceed via a board of inquiry on this motion. I do not want to argue with the hon. member indefinitely about procedure, but may I say this. We are setting up a committee to investigate the accounts and estimates and bills relating to the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines. Because of the fact that T.C.A. accounts are mentioned in the motion the hon. member says, "I am going to ask the Minister of Transport to set up a board of inquiry to go into the matter of the crash at"—was it Moose Jaw?

Mr. Knowles: Brampton.

Mr. Speaker: In any event, with respect to some crash that took place and that he has mentioned, and the pilot who was involved. I cannot see it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, how is it that we had a two or three day debate on the motion to set up a committee on radio broadcasting? What is the meaning of standing order 38 which reads in part as follows:

> (1) The following motions are debatable:—
> Every motion . . .
> (j) for the appointment of a committee,
> (k) for reference to a committee of a report or any return laid on the table of the house . . .

If it is in order to debate the proposal to set up a committee—which means that one can argue for it or against it—surely in doing so it is in order to discuss matters that relate thereto, as well as matters covered in reports that have been laid on the table as indicated in that motion. In this case the T.C.A. report has been laid on the table and the report, at pages 6 and 13 thereof, makes reference to the crash that occurred on December 17 near Brampton, Ontario. Just as there has been wide discussion of things that some members felt the government should do about radio, with those long appeals for a separate regulatory body and things like that which had not been mentioned in the motion but which some members felt were relevant to the question, I submit that in the same way it is relevant to the affairs of Trans-Canada Air Lines for me to say that, in my view, there has not yet been a proper and satisfactory inquiry into the crash that took place at Brampton last December and which is mentioned in the accounts and reports that are to be referred to the committee. I admit, as I said a moment ago, that I could have raised this matter as a grievance on a motion to go into supply. Your Honour is nodding your head. If the upshot of all this is that you compel me to cease going ahead with this matter, that is when I shall do it. But it seems to me that it is relevant to this question and that it might be better, in the long run, if I finished the speech now rather than having to start it all over again when we reach that other stage in our proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the hon. member having gone so far, if one is to be practical I suppose we might as well allow the hon. member to conclude. But my difficulty is that if I allow the hon. member to take a sideroad as far as relevancy is concerned, then I must allow all hon. members to do likewise if they wish to do so. That is my problem. At this moment I am somewhat puzzled. I know that some agreements are made and discussions of a general character take place on motions of this kind. I have indicated one, namely the motion to set up the committee on the C.B.C. But I submit that, by agreement, hon. members should not change the rules that it is my duty to ask hon. members to observe. In discussing a motion to set up a committee for a certain purpose, I do not see how it could be relevant to ask the Minister of Transport, before he sees this motion passed, to create a board of inquiry to investigate a crash in a certain district. I do not see it, but I will let the hon. member carry on a little further and see whether my mind cannot be changed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have every respect for the statement you have just made that your mind cannot be changed, because I am equally convinced that this subject is relevant. However, in view of what you have said, I will make my remarks shorter than I had otherwise intended in the hope that, if not today certainly within the next few days, the minister will respond to my request and set up a public board of inquiry, thus making it unnecessary for me to raise the matter again. If the matter is not dealt with satisfactorily in the next little while, I may find it necessary to raise it again on the motion to go into supply.

The reason I am not satisfied with the report tabled by the minister which was made by the technical board of inquiry is that, although it puts the blame for the accident on the so-called or alleged negligence of the pilot, I feel that the board itself has been negligent in not including in its report all of the facts of the case. Some hon. members may have seen the statements I have made to the press regarding this matter and will be familiar with what is in my mind. Precisely because I have made statements to the press I do not need to spell it out quite so fully here.

The report suggests that there was really no element of fatigue that could lead to the alleged negligence of the pilot. In my view the report goes out of its way to make out that the pilot had not had too difficult a week previous to the time of the crash. I have in mind particularly the statement on page xv of the report which says:

> Approximately one week prior to the flight in question Captain Ramsay returned from leave. During the ensuing week he made one round trip to Bermuda and two round trips to Tampa, involving a total flying time for the three trips of 43 hours. He was off duty for two days, on Tuesday and on Thursday, the day prior to the flight in question. Captain Ramsay spent Thursday evening quietly.

Anyone who reads those few sentences will gain the impression that the captain of this trip had had not too hard a week. He had had, so the report seems to suggest, a week involving only three trips. Actually the words are "approximately one week" and the reference is to "three trips". The fact of the matter is that in a period of six days Captain Ramsay made four trips. The report suggests in the sentences I have just read that he had had two days off before the trip to Tampa which resulted in the crash on the way back. True, it does say that those two days were Tuesday and Thursday, but the way in which the report glosses over what had happened on Wednesday is, I suggest, a case of negligence, on the part of the authors of this report.

The fact of the matter is that this pilot had made a trip on Sunday from Montreal to Toronto, on to Bermuda and back to Toronto. On Monday he made a trip from Toronto to Florida and back to Toronto and Montreal. On Wednesday he made a trip from Montreal to Toronto, on to Florida and back to Toronto and Montreal. On Friday he was making the same trip again when the crash occurred. I have gone into this matter very thoroughly both by studying the T.C.A. timetable which was in effect at the time and by making a thorough study of the transcript of evidence, which is over 550 pages, which was laid on the table of the house as sessional paper 187-A. I find that in that period of six days—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again but this time I am afraid it will be for good.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to ask to be on sufferance here. References are made to this crash in the report which was laid on the table of the house. With the greatest of respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we not treat each other with formal courtesy. I ask you to rule whether I have the right to make this speech now or have not. If I do not have the right now, I shall make it as soon as there is an opportunity on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If I may intervene for a moment, it seems to me my hon. friend has said too much for his statements to be allowed to go without rebuttal. He has stated that fatigue entered into the situation. I am prepared to show that there was no fatigue, and I think my statement should go out along with the hon. member's. If there are going to be charges of improper operation made here, we had better thresh them out.

Mr. Knowles: On that basis perhaps I had better carry on. By reference to the documents, and I suppose the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has the same documents, it will be found, as I have just said, that in the six-day period from Sunday morning until Friday night this pilot made four round trips, one of them to Bermuda and the other three to Florida. It will be found that the scheduled flying time for these four trips, had he been able to keep to the schedule, was 43 hours and 20 minutes. It will also be found that his actual flying time up to the point of crash was 43 hours and 57 minutes, although at that point he had not yet got back to Montreal.

But what you will also find, and to me this is something the board has failed to take notice of, is that if you take the time this pilot was on duty it adds up to a duty time in these six days of 61 hours and 37 minutes, which was put in in four working days. Some hon. members may wonder just how one adds up that time. I did it in the way that the board itself suggests. I started his day one hour before take-off time on each of the four days and took the time from then until he brought the plane to the conclusion of the trip that night. I have these figures and can put them on the record if they are necessary. They add up to a total of 61 hours and 37 minutes.

Two of the flights, the Monday flight and the Wednesday flight, were delayed to such an extent that he did not get back to Montreal from the Monday flight until 4.30 a.m. Tuesday and from the Wednesday flight until 2.00 a.m. Thursday. Yet despite that he was off again on the flight on Friday. Taking the calendar day from midnight to midnight, there was actually no calendar day in that period of six days that this pilot was not flying. I suggest, not as an expert in aviation but just as an ordinary human being who knows what long hours are, that you cannot have a person on duty 61 hours and 37 minutes in four working days out of six, and not have the possibility of some element of fatigue.

I take it that the Minister of Trade and Commerce proposes to make some reference to the documents, as he said. It is true that on page xxvii of the report the board deals with the matter and says this:

> The board finds itself in agreement with the company in concluding that if the crew have had adequate rest on the day preceding, the flight is not a particularly arduous assignment with modern flight equipment.

Well, in this case the day preceding was Thursday and he did not get back from the Wednesday trip until two o'clock Thursday morning. That was on top of an arduous trip on the previous Monday, and that again on top of the trip that he had taken on Sunday. I suppose that by "official documents" the minister may also have in mind the report that was made to the technical board of inquiry by a special board of doctors which was convened to deal with the matter. The board consisted of six departmental doctors, every one of whom is listed as a consultant in one type of medicine or another. Some of the words are too long for me to try to pronounce, but at any rate they state as follows:

> Although it is recognized that Captain T. N. D. Ramsay had been on duty for approximately 12 hours, with approximately 9½ hours of intermittent flying and that he was possibly tired, there is no indication that he was over-tired or fatigued to the point that it would interfere with the safe performance of his duties.

If that is the evidence, so far as I am concerned, it is not satisfactory for six doctors to say that, although he was possibly tired, he was not over-tired when they, in that report, first of all say that he had been on duty for approximately 12 hours that day when according to my figures it was something over 14 hours, and also when they fail to make any reference to the time he had been on duty during the five days immediately preceding the day that the crash took place.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, to this board of doctors, to the members of the technical board of inquiry, to the Minister of Transport and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that they arrange to take a series of trips of that kind. Let them go without any responsibility on their minds. They could take along Hansard and read that if they wished. They should just sit on the plane and fly from Montreal to Bermuda and back on Sunday; Montreal to Florida and back on Monday and Wednesday and Friday, making sure of course that the flights are delayed so that they do not get home Monday night until 4.30 and Wednesday night until 2.00 a.m. I suggest that at the end of that period, without having any responsibility, they will admit that they are fatigued. What about the pilot, under such circumstances, bearing in mind his constant sense of responsibility? I submit that any ordinary layman would recognize there must have been some element of fatigue after a work cycle of that kind.

Now, as is obvious, I had a good deal ready to deal with in connection with this matter, but in view of the argument we had over procedure until the Minister of Trade and Commerce rescued me I have had to cut out a good deal of it. I want to point out also that in my view some of the questioning by this board was not the kind that I think should be accepted as the end of the story. For example, on page 209 of the transcript of evidence, after Captain Ramsay has been questioned for 71 pages on technical matters, I find that he is questioned in these terms:

Q. Do you consider that this accident was caused then by failure, say, of the human element?
A. I do not believe there was anything mechanical involved.
Q. You can give us no suggestion which might explain the failure of the human element?

Even before the man admits it, it is thrown back at him.

A. No, I cannot actually.
Q. Do you believe yourself that this was a failure of the human element?
A. Well, to the best of my knowledge there was no instrumentation failure or any mechanical failure of the aircraft. At the same time—

At this point the evidence is broken off with a dash which indicates that the questioner cut in on the witness with this:

Q. This is the only other alternative then, or do you visualize any other alternative that would explain this accident?
A. I cannot.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Q. Are there any circumstances at all that you are aware of which would increase the possibility of human element failure on this particular approach?
A. I don't just quite understand that, what you mean by that.
Q. Well, was there any stress that you were under in any way—you or any other member of your flight crew?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. The human element fails in general when it is overstressed. There is usually, I believe, some explanation why the human element fails. Did you feel on this approach that you were overloaded? Were you under stress during the approach?
A. No, I didn't. To the best of my knowledge it was, you might say, just another let-down.
Q. You had no apprehensions yourself?
A. Not knowingly.

Then, there is some reference to a written statement which the captain had prepared which was to be accepted to be included in the evidence. Similarly, Mr. Speaker, over on page 291 there is a series of questions which were put to Miss Deruchie, the stewardess, about the flight. As I read these questions they seem to me to be, like the questions I just quoted which were put to Captain Ramsay, what are called leading questions. Up to this point all the questions had been with regard to flight matters, technical matters, and then all of a sudden comes this form of questioning which is more or less an assertion to the witness that it must have been the human element if no equipment is found to be at fault. Listen to this questioning of the stewardess:

Q. Perhaps one final question. If it can be established that all equipment was functioning normally and that there was nothing wrong with any instrument or altimeter, the cause of the accident then immediately becomes personal, human error on the part of the flight crew. This being the case, in order to help your flight crew, anything that you can say that might explain why they failed would be of enormous value both to them and to this board of inquiry and to aviation in general.
A. I know of nothing unless the captain had an attack of something, the same as the first officer and myself had.
Q. Nothing whatever in his appearance during the whole of this day would lead you to feel he was unwell or tired or under any strain or worrying about anything?
A. Oh, no, he's always a very gay boy. We had our meal together in the coffee shop and he looked around the souvenir counters. No, nothing abnormal there.
The Chairman: Q. I have one question. Your statement that you felt it must have been instrument trouble, that is a deduction you have arrived at since the crash?
A. Well, having looked—all I can remember is being so surprised because, as I say, I thought we were at 2,000 feet, and I'm—

Here again there is the dash which means the witness is cut off.

Q. Would you answer my question? It's a deduction you have arrived at since the crash?
A. Oh, yes.
—(Witness withdrawn.)

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that kind of questioning is not good enough, having in mind the fact that the results of an inquiry of this kind should be fair to the members of the crew and should be fair to the public in the sense that the facts of the case should be brought out if at all possible. That is my submission, Mr. Speaker. It is a great deal shorter than I had intended it to be for reasons that are now obvious to everyone.

Let this be crystal clear. My whole complaint is over the decision of the Minister of Transport not to hold a public inquiry, as was his original intention. I am not levelling any complaint against T.C.A. I have, as we all do, the highest praise for the tremendous safety record of this organization. Indeed I am proud of it as is the minister. I register no complaint against the pilots' association for any arrangement they may have made with Trans-Canada Air Lines. I am not attempting to set myself up as a judge of the technical factors involved in this huge document, though I have read it with a great deal of interest and I have learned a good deal in doing so.

However, it does seem to me that, as an ordinary human being, I have a right to comment on what 61 hours of duty in four days at work, during an elapsed period of six days, would do to anyone. In the light of that I call upon the Minister of Transport to go ahead with his original intention and have a public inquiry set up. I remind him I am not alone in this view. There are a number of newspapers in the country which have expressed this opinion editorially, but I shall not bother to quote from them. I have three such editorials on my desk, one from the Globe and Mail in Toronto and one from the Ottawa Journal. Lest he remind me that those papers do not support the government, even though that should not matter in a case of this kind, I shall tell him I have one from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which does support the government very strongly. While I have not checked all the newspapers in the country to see whether or not there are others, I have no doubt there are many people in this country who share the view that I have put forward.

I have no doubt there will be discussions on side issues. But the central issue is that the Minister of Transport said initially that, in addition to the technical board of inquiry by officials within the department, there would be a public board of inquiry. In my view the failure of this report to bring out all the facts and to deal with them properly makes it imperative that the minister now go ahead with his original intention.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will appreciate that to convey to the public of Canada the thought that Trans-Canada Air Lines send out pilots under situations which will make them subject to fatigue is very damaging to the air lines. I think the facts have not been brought out fairly, as deduced from the report, and I would like to amplify the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as regards pilot fatigue.

I would point out first that the terms of service of an air lines pilot are governed by an agreement between T.C.A. and the air lines pilots' association. I have the document here, and it is in great detail. Roughly however it provides that no pilot in four-engine equipment shall fly more than 900 hours per year and that, so far as possible, no pilot in four-engine equipment shall fly more than 75 hours per month. And that, I think, is a tighter regulation than applies for any other air line in the world. I know that in the United States—

Mr. Winch: How much in 24 hours?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is not specified, for the simple reason that if a pilot is flying across the ocean he must get to the other side before his hours run out. And if the aircraft is delayed by head winds he cannot stop on the ocean. It is not practical therefore to set the limit of flying time in one day.

Mr. Winch: How much in 24 hours of actual flying? It does not take 24 hours to cross the Atlantic.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, it could. I have been 22 hours coming back from the United Kingdom, as a result of a head-wind. However, it is not practical to place such limits, and there is no regulation which makes provision for the time of flying in 24 hours; although, by and large, it is not the practice to set up pilot cycles which call for much over eight hours of flying time per day. However, as I say, pilots flying between Montreal and London airport do fly longer cycles than that.

It is the business of T.C.A. pilots to fly aircraft. That is the way they earn their salaries. I often think that perhaps members of parliament do not realize that the air lines' pilots are the economic royalists of the labour movement. While they belong to the American Federation of Labour, I think there is no other branch of the federation that is paid nearly as well as the pilots. They all get considerably more money than members of parliament, and I think the calibre of pilot fitness that is maintained justifies that high rate of pay.

One requirement, I know, is that these pilots shall keep in perfect physical condition. In other words, they are not people like my hon. friend and myself who, occasionally, take long rides in the rear seats of aircraft and then go right back to our work. I think we both have had the experience of getting in at four o'clock in the morning—I know I have—and being at my desk down on Wellington street at nine o'clock on the same morning. In other words, there is nothing unusual in people going on working when they are tired.

But I say that pilots are required to be in perfect physical condition and so required in order that they can stand long hours, when the nature of their service requires that those long hours on duty are necessary.

Now, let us look at the duty time this pilot actually put in. From November 19 to December 12 he did no work at all. He was off duty. In other words, he was on holidays, and on his regular days off. Then on December 12 he was on duty for 14 hours and two minutes, including ten hours and 27 minutes in the air and three hours and 35 minutes on the ground. This was followed by 16 hours and 17 minutes off duty. In other words he was at home for 16 hours and 17 minutes.

Then on December 13 he was on duty for 12 hours and 32 minutes, which included nine hours and 54 minutes in the air and two hours and 38 minutes on the ground. This was followed by 33 hours and 15 minutes off duty at home.

On December 15 the captain was on duty for 17 hours and 29 minutes, which included 13 hours and 19 minutes in the air, and four hours and ten minutes on the ground. This was followed by 27 hours and 30 minutes off duty at home.

On December 17 the captain was on duty a total of 13 hours and 30 minutes, including ten hours and 13 minutes in the air and three hours and 17 minutes on the ground. If the flight to Montreal had been completed successfully he would then have had eight days off duty at home.

That is the situation.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question? Has he any details of his figures for the 13th? His figures for the other days are very close to my own. The 13th is the day the minister said he was on duty 12 hours and 32 minutes. My figures show 16 hours for that day. In any case, the minister's figures total 57 hours and 33 minutes for the four days. Is that correct?

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have not added the duty time up; but I would point out that there are three men in the cockpit of a Constellation. There is the pilot, the co-pilot and the flight engineer. I would point out that, on long flights of that kind, the fatigue is not particularly serious. The automatic pilot is used a good deal, and one member of the crew of officers can go back and take a rest. There is a bunk provided in the cockpit for that purpose. He does not sit there continuously with the wheel in his hand guiding the aircraft. He sits there and makes his calculations; he makes his check points; and for a good deal of the time the automatic pilot is operating the aircraft.

This is true on long trips, but it is not true on short trips, generally speaking, where there are a number of landings and take-offs. The strain on a pilot is much greater then than it is on a flight from Montreal to Bermuda or from Toronto to Tampa. However, this is beside the point.

No one has suggested that the cycle this pilot was following was in any way irregular or that it was in violation of the agreement between T.C.A. and the pilots' association. And it is very interesting to note, in the evidence of the crew taken on oath, that no member of the crew suggested they were fatigued, or that fatigue had anything to do with the landing at Malton airport.

I may say there is no dispute as to what happened on the aircraft. Why the pilot did as he did, I suppose we will never know. He says he does not know. But in an accident where there was no loss of life, where the facts seem to be indisputable and where, as I say, medical evidence was taken from six eminent physicians who found no sign of pilot fatigue, I suggest that to hold a public inquiry is an exercise wholly uncalled for in the circumstances.

What does my hon. friend expect to prove by a public inquiry? Would he prove that there was something wrong with the aircraft? Would he prove that the pilot was not responsible for the procedure of landing? I think if he attempted to prove fatigue, expert evidence could be brought from every air line in the world to say that the cycle that was followed by this pilot was not one that would produce fatigue to the point where the pilot no longer would be able to carry out his duties efficiently.

Mr. Knowles: When the minister refers to a cycle such as this pilot had worked as not being fatiguing, may I ask if there is any provision for changing the cycle, changing the flights within the cycle, when there is a delayed trip? For example, according to the schedule this pilot should have got back to Montreal at 11.10 p.m. on Monday but he did not get back until 4.30 a.m. on Tuesday. When that happens is it necesssary that the rest of the cycle be followed without interruption?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If the pilot had complained that he was suffering from fatigue or had asked that the cycle be changed I dare say it would have been changed. The regulations provide that if a crew find they are fatigued it is quite permissible to set the aircraft down until the pilots have rested. Every provision has been made in the agreement to protect the pilots against fatigue. In other words there is nothing in the regulations, there is nothing intended in the regulations, and there is nothing intended in the operations program of the pilots which would make it possible that aircraft shall be endangered through fatigue of the crew. That is well understood in planning pilot cycles.

These cycles are worked out largely to meet the convenience of the pilots. The pilots like to spend their spare time at home. You ask why does not a pilot fly down to Tampa and spend the night there before coming back the next day. Generally the pilot would prefer to have his day off at home, and the cycles are worked out so the pilots may have a few consecutive days at home rather than work one day, and then have a day off, to be spent away from home.

A great deal of experience goes into the setting up of these cycles, and the pilots are consulted as to their convenience. If there had been any suggestion anywhere in the hearing that fatigue had played a part my hon. friend might have had some reason for bringing this matter before parliament, but he will not find in the inquiry where anyone, including the pilot or any other member of the crew, represented that pilot fatigue had any part to play in the situation.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to relate my remarks to the Brampton crash but rather to the setting up of a committee to study the business of the Canadian National and its associated enterprises. We in this group will support the motion to set up a committee at this time.

In commencing his remarks the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre drew attention to an editorial in the Toronto Telegram in which the statement was made that the people of Canada would be happy to make a $2 contribution to defraying the deficit of the Canadian National Railways. I suppose most people in Canada will be happy to do that if it can be proved that the railway has operated as efficiently as possible, but I have news for my hon. friend. I for one know of many charitable organizations to which I would donate in preference to the C.N.R., so he can count me out if it is found that the railway is not run as efficiently as I think it should be.

The matter of employment has been mentioned. I often wonder whether it is the purpose of an organization owned by the government to act as an agency to provide jobs for people who are out of work. I think the business of the Canadian National Railways should be the transporting of goods and passengers as efficiently as possible. The setting up of this committee will give us an opportunity to discover the efficiency or lack of efficiency as the case may be. It will give us an opportunity to discover why the largest government enterprise has a deficit. It is not an unknown fact that government enterprises frequently go into the red. The reason might be that they are government-owned. However, we might have to establish that fact later.

It will give us an opportunity to study the Canadian National and possibly the piggyback service which we read of so often today. It will also give us an opportunity to discuss truck transportation as affecting the Canadian National and other transportation systems. I hope it will give us once more an opportunity to discuss the sale of hotels, and more particularly the building of another hotel by the Canadian National. I have always felt, and I have said so frequently, that the business of a railway should be that of transportation rather than the providing of hotel accommodation for people.

We welcome this opportunity to study again the activities of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited. I am particularly interested in this because I have found that all passenger bookings have been taken up until some time in mid-November of this year. If that is true of this year it was possibly also true of last year. When this steamship line has been able to book all its passenger accommodation so late into the year I wonder why it should show a deficit.

It will also give us an opportunity to discuss, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already discussed, the air crash at Brampton and also the one at Moose Jaw, that has been raised in this house on more than one occasion. Possibly certain revisions may follow our study of these crashes. The committee is the place where we can best decide what recommendations should be made as to changes. It may be that this committee will offer a good opportunity to discuss the need of civil airports. I have raised this matter frequently in the house, more particularly with respect to my own community.

However, I find there are other items of business on the order paper which this group would like to get out of the way so they can become law before the end of the month. That does not necessarily mean I am opposed to other hon. members going ahead to discuss matters which they have in mind, because they may consider them just as pertinent as the one we hope to deal with later. It might be that the government would make this other matter retroactive; I am referring to the war veterans allowances.

I do want to indicate once again that this group approves the setting up of a committee to discuss these questions.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, having listened to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had to say regarding this unfortunate accident at Brampton, Ontario, and the answer given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I personally believe that a public inquiry is necessary in order to clarify what is apparently a serious contradiction in the attitudes and views of my hon. friends. Certainly before the Minister of Trade and Commerce made his explanation I felt that an inquiry by the committee to be set up under this motion would have been sufficient. But the minister in the course of his explanation rather weakened his argument when he stated that the number of hours this pilot had been on duty were in reality and in effect nothing of any particular moment, for the minister himself had often gone to work when tired. Well, when the minister went to work four hours after his arrival in Ottawa he went to his office on Wellington street, and was not in a position where the lives of others were under his control.

The fact that the minister took that position is indicative of an official attitude that certainly deserves clarification in a public inquiry. Indeed, when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) replies I think he should answer why he changed his expressed intention to set up a public inquiry and had instead a qualified private inquiry? What was the reason for the alteration in his general attitude? What events caused him to change his position, which was categorical and clear at the beginning? No one wants to do anything that will cause fear in the hearts of Canadians who travel on the T.C.A., which has an outstanding safety record. On the other hand, no one wants to make a scapegoat of this pilot if the evidence is not such that an independent inquiry would bear out the conclusions arrived at by the private inquiry.

[Mr. Hahn.]

I feel that the minister should give serious consideration to the setting up of an independent commission, if you will, to have this matter investigated in order that no one will have any doubt that justice has been done. As things are now the findings of the private investigatory group have been challenged. There is a feeling among many people in this country that grave unfairness has been done to the pilot. That being so, the minister has a duty to those who serve this country to assure that no injustice shall be permitted to go unchallenged. The findings of an independent commission supporting what has already been found by the investigatory body that was set up would be conclusive, and would remove from the hearts of people any doubt as to whether fairness and equity were achieved in this man's case.

Having said that, there are one or two other matters to which I shall refer. When this committee is set up I should like it to consider the whole question of the payment of pensions to retired employees of the Canadian National Railways. The present basic pension rate of $25 is paid in a considerable number of cases. The particulars of the numbers who receive this pension were requested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and are recorded in Hansard. There is a feeling widely held that the present rates are unjustifiably low, and that the time has come for reconsideration of the claims for fairness presented by those who are retired on that basic pension.

Another problem which is of general interest is the matter of unemployment, the retirements and lay-offs on the Canadian National Railways. For several weeks in this house an endeavour has been made to ascertain the true situation. Various union representatives of Canadian National Railways employees across this country are wondering why it is that difficulty is met by those in this house who endeavour to ascertain the picture of lay-offs on the Canadian National Railways. Indeed, it is becoming extremely difficult to secure any information in the house regarding Canadian National Railways employees.

On the 28th of January I placed a question on the order paper asking how many section and maintenance men had been laid off since the 1st of January, 1955, and what further lay-offs, etc., were anticipated. That question should not have required weeks to answer, but the answer was finally brought down on February 21. My question read:

1. How many section and maintenance men of the Canadian National Railways have been laid off by (a) regions; (b) divisions, since the 1st day of January, 1955?

This was the answer given by the Minister of Transport:

This is another question which cannot be answered completely without the assignment of a special staff. Here again, the information would have to be assembled at the 42 divisions of the company, and would then have to be consolidated. This would take many weeks, and by the time the figures had been compiled they would no longer be currently accurate.

I say to the minister that if that answer is correct it does not indicate that the records kept by the Canadian National Railways are similar to records kept by other corporations. They could not be kept in the same manner. My next question was:

2. Is it anticipated that there will be further lay-offs and, if so, what are expected numbers by (a) regions; (b) divisions?

The answer to that question was as follows:

Seasonal employment, with resultant lay-offs at the termination of seasonal programs, has a very marked impact on figures relating to the strength of working forces.

That portion of the answer is simply legislative evasion. My third question was:

3. What is the total number of employees of Canadian National Railways in (a) office staffs; (b) all other positions, laid off either permanently or temporarily, since the 1st day of December, 1954?

The minister answered:

These comments apply particularly to parts 1 and 3, and similar difficulties exist as to part 2 of the question.

My fourth question was:

4. How many employees of Canadian National Railways have had their working hours reduced, since the 1st day of January, 1955?

The minister replied:

With regard to part 4, I would answer that no employees have had their working hours reduced since 1st January, 1955, except perhaps that in certain cases of illness an employee may be working part-time pending complete recovery.

I am not going to argue with the answer given by the minister. The same type of answers were given the same day to questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I submit that those answers given by the minister either do not give the picture as the railway company knows it to be, or indeed reveal a cavalier attitude on the part of the high officials of the Canadian National Railways toward the right of parliament to information.

I go on to point out that on February 28 I moved:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the minister or Department of Transport and the Canadian National Railways relative to a question placed on the order paper in the name of the mover of this matter on the 28th January last, the purpose of which was to ascertain the number of section and maintenance men, office staffs, etc., who have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways during the periods particularly set forth in the said question.

That motion was challenged by the minister, and it was dropped. A little later a further question was put on the order paper in order to ascertain the number in the employment of the Canadian National Railways as at the end of February this year. That is my recollection of the question. I am not certain of the date as I have not the question before me. In that case the answer again was that the information was not then available.

Those answers throughout do not meet the fair requests of Canadian National Railways employees across Canada who are asking for information on this matter, and for the assurance that their jobs are not to be placed unnecessarily in jeopardy. They are not in the position of being suppliants. They have the right to know the position in which they will find themselves in the days ahead, as far as the railway company can predict. They certainly have the right to information as to the number of employees who have been laid off since December last.

Among the employees in general—that is, sectionmen, maintenance men and the like—I find the desire to know what the situation is. They want information, but they do not seem to be able to get it. There is only one method by which they can secure it, and that is through their parliamentary representatives. At least that was what they thought until questions were asked by certain of those representatives in parliament.

I ask the minister, when he replies, to give the Canadian people and the railway employees the picture as to how many had been laid off from last fall until the end of February. The railway employees believe the number runs into thousands. Indeed, as a result of their own computations several of them have concluded that the number of employees laid off within the last year approaches 10,000. They may be in error, but the only way they can find out is to have the minister give that information, and give to those who hold positions today some reassurance as to the future.

After all, you cannot maintain morale unless there is full and complete disclosure. Today morale among Canadian National Railways employees is undermined as a result of the failure of the minister to give some information as to the picture and the course to be followed. I ask him, when he concludes this debate, to furnish the information to the extent that it is possible to do so.

As to the last question I asked, with regard to the number who were in employment as at the end of February, as I recollect the answer it was to the effect that the computation was made on the 15th of each month.

The 15th of the month is now past, so the information should be available. I ask the minister to furnish it.

Then I pass on to one other matter upon which the Canadian people are asking for information. I refer to the Queen Elizabeth hotel in the city of Montreal. On February 14 I asked not for copies of correspondence with the railway company but for the letters from the Department of Transport or the minister with regard to the Queen Elizabeth hotel. That motion was turned down by a vote of the house, with every member supporting the government voting against it. When a commitment running into millions of dollars—and the estimate of the cost of this hotel is some $20 million—has been made of moneys belonging to the Canadian people, upon considerations which must have governed the directors of the railway company in making such a commitment, surely the Canadian people have a right to know why, when this great hotel is completed, it should be turned over to the Hilton Hotels Corporation, a United States corporation. The Canadian hotel operators want to know what Canadian hotel corporations had an opportunity to bid in this matter. My information is that the hotel association communicated with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) early in January to ask him about the situation, and had no reply by the end of January.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been turning up the references, and I find that on Monday, February 14, the hon. member moved for information along somewhat the same lines as he is now discussing, and that the motion was negatived on that date. I am just wondering whether he is in order in going on at this time at this length on the same subject.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With deference, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that my motion was to get the documents. That motion was turned down. What I am asking for now is the information, not the documents. The motion for documents was defeated. I therefore can do no more than accept the decision of the house as, of course, I do. But what I am asking of the minister now is this. Why can we not get a peek behind this curtain of secrecy into the reasons that a management lease was given of this hotel?

The Canadian people are furnishing the money. They have a right to know what peculiar considerations would impel the Canadian National Railways to build this fine hotel needed in Montreal and then, having built it, turn it over to someone else for operation. Is it going to be profitable? How much is going to be paid? Or is it going to turn out to be a white elephant? I am not suggesting that it is, but it seems passing strange that so mysterious a transaction should have been entered into. Just imagine it, Mr. Speaker; we pay the money, get the hotel and then turn it over to somebody else. Why? That is what we ask. After all, parliament is being asked to consider the accounts and estimates. If ever there was an expenditure that should be looked into and that should not be hidden in a veil of secrecy, this is it. This is one transaction that deserves the fullest investigation.

Now, sir, I feel that the minister should give this information. I can do no more than ask that he do so. Today the Canadian people are wondering and the correspondence one receives indicates it, why this transaction was entered into. Why was the construction proceeded with at public expense? Why were Canadians not given an opportunity? If there was a change of plan on the part of the railway company, why was it necessary to go outside of Canada to find a hotel company to operate a Canadian hotel for and on behalf of the Canadian people or the Canadian National Railways?

There is one other matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) dealt with the deficit this year. The past year has not been a year of railway expansion except in the hotel line. Requests have been made and supported, I believe, by one of the members of the government, for railway construction to tap our resources, particularly the resources in the northern part of the western provinces. Indifferent transportation facilities have been the main cause of delay in developing the north country. Let no one say that is not a fact, because the statement was made quite recently by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage).

I believe the time has come for Canadian National Railways to consider the strategic extension of railway lines to meet the present and the long-term needs of the vast mineral empire of the north. Already consideration is being given, I understand, to a railway line from Waterways to the south shore of Great Slave lake. I say I believe such consideration is being given because the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is reported to have so stated. Having regard to the tremendous development taking place in the western provinces I believe there is a need of extension of railway facilities.

In Manitoba, Canadian National Railways extended its line from Sherridon to Lynn Lake. Consolidated has now commenced developments west of Hudson Bay, some 300 miles to the north. I believe that is one railway extension that will have to be seriously considered immediately. In the province of Saskatchewan there has been a change in the last few years since private enterprise has been welcomed to northern Saskatchewan, a change that deserves the consideration of the department and of Canadian National Railways so far as the extension of railway facilities into the north is concerned.

While public enterprise is something I do not often approve, a visit to the Eldorado development in northern Saskatchewan is a worth-while experience. The development there is tremendous. The future expansion of uranium production, while not unlimited, certainly seems to be approaching that condition. That being so, I believe the time has come for consideration of the extension of railroad facilities into the north in order not only to make possible the removal of what is being mined and produced there today, but to meet the needs of future years.

I was glad to learn from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that consideration is being given to one railway line into the north from Waterways to the south shore of Great Slave lake. In determining where that line should go the fullest weight should be given to the need of a line in northern Saskatchewan to tap the areas of mineral development now being opened between Eldorado and the city of Prince Albert.

I think that is all I wish to say at the moment, except to point out that at Uranium City, Eldorado's present milling capacity of 500 tons daily is being increased to 700 tons. At the present time two mines are sending ore to Eldorado for custom milling. I refer to Nesbitt La Bine and Rix-Athabasca. Eldorado's present payroll is about 500, and Gunnar, which is about 18 miles distant, has 500 construction workers. In 1953 the freight tonnage to Bushell, the end of the water route, was some 35,000 tons, in 1954 about 50,000 tons, and in 1955 it will be much greater. The developments taking place there are tremendous in their potentialities. That being so, when consideration is being given to the building of railroad facilities I ask that the potentialities of northern Saskatchewan be kept in mind, as well as the fact that today there is need of a rail exit for the production taking place there, which will greatly increase in the years ahead.

As far as northern Alberta is concerned, it has railway facilities that northern Saskatchewan does not have. It is my belief that railway extensions to resources will pay tremendous dividends, and will at the same time afford transportation facilities to enable not only the building of the northern radar defence lines but also their maintenance and upkeep.

Mr. F. S. Follwell (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, you indicated that you would allow some latitude on the discussion of the motion to set up this sessional committee. I hope the remarks I am about to make will come within that latitude, although I had intended to make them in the debate on unemployment because of the fact that we are all alarmed and concerned about the employment situation in Canada.

We are particularly concerned about the employment situation amongst the railroad workers on the Canadian National Railways. I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Prince Albert when he suggests that the railroad employees' pension scheme should be investigated and overhauled. I believe there should be an upward revision in the amount of the pensions paid these railroad employees.

What I particularly have in mind is to make a recommendation to the government with regard to the building of the trans-Canada natural gas pipe line. Canadian National Railways, as we well know, has a right of way clear across this great country. I believe we were all disappointed, no matter from what part of Canada we come, when we heard the announcement made by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines executives that for reasons of financing this project would have to be deferred for another year. I believe this project could go forward immediately if it were built under the direction of Canadian National Railways. As I have said, the railway owns the right of way.

It might be pointed out to me that this route would probably necessitate building a little longer gas pipe line than was expected, but in turn I could point out that the railroad is economically sound only because it serves the whole population of Canada. It must go where the people are. This route would make the Trans-Canada natural gas pipe line economically sound too, because it must go where the people are in order to serve them with natural gas.

Canadian National Railways has at its head Mr. Donald Gordon, who is well known for his great financial ability. He is surrounded by men of great courage and men of great skill in the engineering field who, I am quite sure, could build this natural gas pipe line much cheaper than a private company because they already have this roadbed. It is probably quite true that the pipe line could not entirely follow the railroad line, but there again the Canadian National Railways has a lands department, a legal department and, as I have said, a financial department. It has been suggested, more particularly by the C.C.F. group, that if the Canadian taxpayers are to guarantee the financial arrangements for the Trans-Canada pipe line, then the Canadian people should build it. I believe that if Canadian National Railways built this pipe line even that group would be satisfied that the construction was being undertaken in the right way.

The construction of this gas pipe line is a project that will require the placing of very large orders for steel pipe as well as many other materials. I am sure this would immediately set in motion the necessary production to take up the slack in our unemployment at the moment. I feel that it would be well if the Minister of Transport were to call together at the earliest opportunity the officials of the Trans-Canada pipe line and the Canadian National Railways to ascertain whether or not some method could be worked out to make possible the immediate construction of this pipe line under some lease arrangement from Canadian National to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. It has been mentioned here that Canadian National Railways built a hotel which it was found more advantageous to lease to another company for management.

As we well know, Canadian National Railways has been able to extend its lines to Lynn Lake and Kitimat. Agreements were made in connection with these extensions that made them profitable to build, yet they were a great service to the country in opening up our natural resources. I am sure it would be possible to work out some kind of satisfactory financial arrangement that would permit Canadian National Railways to finance the project and lease it to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines for management. I do not know what legislation would be required to provide the money for Canadian National Railways. It may well be that legislation is already on the books that would enable parliament to grant sufficient funds to start the project immediately. As I have said, I have in mind that the whole of Canada, particularly the producers in the west and the consumers in the central provinces, were disappointed when it was indicated that natural gas would not be coming forward this year, or at least there would not be an early start to provide it.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge the government and the Minister of Transport to take some notice of what I have said and call together the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines people and the Canadian National Railways officials. The building of this pipe line by the Canadian National would give the railway a great deal of traffic. As I have said, when it is indicated that it would be economically sound and in the best interests of the people to extend the pipe line to a particular point, it could be extended by means of branch lines the same as the railway lines are now extended. I feel that if this matter is looked into immediately some decision could be made that would enable work to be started this summer and orders placed for the necessary material.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I am not a member of this particular committee. I wish I were, because there are a few questions I should like to ask Trans-Canada Air Lines officials. I travel on T.C.A. a great deal, and I think their safety record is exceptional. Nevertheless I feel they should try at all times to make it even better. Today I feel there are certain elementary precautions which Trans-Canada Air Lines are not taking as they fly over military areas.

As hon. members know, the worst air tragedy in Canadian history took place over the city of Moose Jaw. Since that time there have been two or three other incidents involving military aircraft and Trans-Canada Air Lines planes. I feel that these incidents may continue unless something is done to have T.C.A. take certain safety precautions which I am going to suggest. I have proposed these steps to the Minister of Transport before, but I do not feel the answers he has given have been satisfactory.

I suggested in the first place, and a good many people have agreed with this suggestion, that when a Trans-Canada Air Lines plane is going over a military area it should radio the fact ahead, so the control tower at the military airport could notify all military planes which might be in the air. Then they could clear the airway and runways in order to minimize the danger of a collision. Such a procedure makes sense to me, and I do not know why it would not be feasible.

On February 9, in sessional paper No. 166-B, the government answered this suggestion by saying there were technical difficulties in the way. If that is so I think it is a rather shocking reply. This is a scientific age. No one can tell me it is not feasible to have a radio arrangement so that a Trans-Canada Air Lines plane can inform a military airport that it is passing over. I may tell the minister, as he probably knows, that Canadian Pacific Air Lines follow such a procedure today. I cannot understand the technical objections. Quite frankly I feel that the president of Trans-Canada Air Lines is taking a rather lofty attitude toward this whole subject.

Some reporters questioned Mr. McGregor in Edmonton some months ago about the incidents over Moose Jaw. They queried him regarding the questions I had asked in the house, and he had this to say:

Mr. Thatcher seems to assume that T.C.A. and the R.C.A.F. stand at opposite ends of a hall and shout at each other. Actually, there is very good co-operation between the two.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement is not an answer. If there is such good co-operation, then why are these incidents continuing? Mr. McGregor cannot afford to brush aside such proposals. If a proposal is not feasible, then I wish he would state clearly the reason. I hope the committee will investigate this whole matter when Mr. McGregor appears before it within a few days.

Another suggestion made was that T.C.A. aircraft, when flying over military areas, should fly at 8,000 or 9,000 feet instead of at 6,000, as at present. Most of the Harvard training aircraft simply cannot fly that high. The department replied to this suggestion by stating:

The establishment of such minima might be imprudent in that they might require an aircraft to maintain an altitude which had become unsatisfactory due to local weather conditions.

Such a statement might be correct six or eight days in the year, but how about the other 350 or 360 days? I believe that if T.C.A. would fly at 8,000 feet there would be almost no accidents from collision. And if their planes had to come down because of storms, then they could notify control towers at the military airports in advance, and thus lessen the danger.

Some have suggested that the sensible thing to do would be to move all military airports from areas in which Trans-Canada Air Lines operate. I do not think this is a sensible suggestion. In the first place there would be a considerable number of airports to move. In the second place the cost would be absolutely prohibitive. In the third place, if the stations were removed I believe the military authorities would find it much more difficult to recruit. Certainly it has been found that personnel like to be near the larger centres.

I say again there are certain elementary safety steps which look reasonable to a layman. I hope that the minister or Mr. McGregor will answer these proposals before the committee. If the suggestions are not sensible, then let them die once and for all. But at least let there be a full explanation.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, in a talk delivered before the Canadian railway club in Montreal, on December 13, 1954, the chairman of the Canadian Pacific stated as follows:

(Text):

Canada's resource industries share with agriculture the distinction of forming the backbone of the export trade upon which national prosperity depends. A country which derives more than 20 per cent of its national income from exports dependent for their competitive advantage in world markets upon a price measured in part in terms of transportation cost cannot afford to remain indifferent to those problems which affect the railroads in their ability to meet new as well as existing transportation needs.

(Translation):

Railways have been the spearheads of Canada's economic development. The district of which I have the pleasure of being one of the representatives has witnessed a new expansion at the end of the last century when it was linked by rail with the city of Quebec.

The railroad, built chiefly to open up new settlements and provide a new outlet for existing parishes, has not followed the progress of our district.

It has remained a settler's railroad. It is a slow, winding road, dotted with decrepit stations, where trains are seldom on time. It is becoming more and more urgent that improvements be made, that the railroad be shortened and modernized so as to meet adequately the needs of our district, which has become a great industrial area, and of our constantly increasing population.

(Text):

"One of the best tests of whether a people can see, in the economic sense, beyond its nose," says the editor of that internationally known journal, The Economist of London, "is in its attitude to transport, for transport, although absolutely essential to economic progress, confers its benefits indirectly."

(Translation):

The relevancy of that remark prompts me to speak of the necessity of undertaking as soon as possible the construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railroad.

On January 25 last, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler), in reply to a question of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), stated that he had no intention of introducing a bill about this matter during the present session. At the last session, legislation for that purpose was enacted by parliament. Unfortunately for us, none of its clauses compels the Canadian National to build that railroad within a set time, or provides anything to that effect.

In short, clause 1 prescribes that the governor in council may provide for the construction and the completion, in whole or in part, of the lines described in the appendix, before December 31, 1964.

Committee on Railways and Shipping

On the other hand, the then minister of transport, as well as the vice-president of the Canadian National asserted, both in the house and before the railway committee, that if a sufficient amount of traffic was guaranteed, the construction of our trunk-line would not be delayed.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Langlois) repeated it again in a speech he made last November in Roberval. He said to his listeners of the Saguenay area: "As soon as you can give us the same guarantees of 175,000 tons of freight per year, the Chibougamau-St.-Félicien trunk-line will be built".

I am told that these guarantees have been secured and supplied to the authorities of the Canadian National Railways.

On December 20, 1954, Le Soleil made the following comments on this news:

Prospects appear bright in the lake St. John area for the construction of the trunk line between lake Chibougamau and St. Félicien. The Canadian National Railways have all guarantees they required of a freight traffic of 175,000 tons per year in this lumbering and mining district which is now open to extraordinary development. For the time being, ten industrial establishments have undertaken to supply a total of 180,000 tons of freight, with the promise of bringing this amount to more than 400,000 tons when the new railway is in full operation.

The people of the area are going at it in no small way: eight large lumbering companies operating in this vast area north of lake St. John up to and beyond lake Chimougamau, over a distance of more than 200 miles, are getting ready to use the proposed railway for the transport of manufactured lumber shipped to various parts of the province. At the present time, they are using to a large extent the road that the provincial department of highways built some years ago, and also the rivers flowing into lake St. John. They look forward to the improvement that the railway will bring for the rapid and safe transportation of their products.

In a speech delivered in Toronto last November, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) advocated the construction of a railway line in the mining district of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories with the financial assistance of the federal government.

That is exactly what we asked for last year: a subsidy that would permit the Canadian National to undertake simultaneously the construction of the A and B sections of the Chibougamau railway. Besides, such a subsidy was granted in 1949 for the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern line from Quesnel to Prince George in British Columbia. And a precedent had been made in that respect in 1913 with the Ontario Northland.

The minister believed that the carrying out of such a project would be the best means to push the industrial development of our northern empire. After that conference, Mr. Charles Pelletier wrote in L'Action Catholique the following comments:

Mr. Lesage is indeed right. It is through the development of our means of communication, especially our railway lines, that it will be possible to integrate in our national economy areas which are rich in possibilities of all kinds but whose resources will not be adequately developed so long as they remain inaccessible. And it is perfectly normal for the government to help these transportation projects at the start until they become self-supporting through the developments that they initiate.

If the construction of railway lines had always depended on the guarantee of immediate profits, Canada would not be the great industrial country she is today.

But what is true of our northern districts is all the more so of districts which are much closer to our large centres and which are already developed to a certain extent, such as lake St. John and the Gaspe peninsula.

And further on:

Even if the eastern section of the railway were not immediately self-supporting, that would not be sufficient reason for putting off its construction when the progress of a large part of the province is at stake. As Mr. Lesage so aptly said, railway lines are esssential to economic development.

They should not be looked upon as the result or the crowning of progress, but as its essential condition. After all, the pioneers who built up this kingdom of the Saguenay, and so largely contributed to the opening up of the Chibougamau district, deserve as much consideration as the few inhabitants of the Northwest Territories.

The article concludes with these words:

Our representatives in Ottawa should carefully avoid dual policies, so to speak: one for the province of Quebec, where railroads would only be built or maintained to the extent that they would bring immediate returns; and the other for the remainder of the country, where equipment expenses would be readily granted in anticipation of increased activities and wealth. It is up to them to explain and defend the position of their voters with the same determination as the members from other provinces. The new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) whose broad-mindedness and fairness are well known, will undoubtedly do his best to ease their task.

I say, and repeat for the benefit of those to whom the local topography of this part of our province is not familiar, that the length of the rail-route from Chibougamau to Chicoutimi is 220 miles, of which 139 are still to be built; the route from Chibougamau to Barraute, and from Mont Laurier to Montreal comprises 515 miles, 350 of which are still unfinished; while that from Chibougamau via Barraute, Noranda and North Bay to Toronto is 750 miles long, with 165 miles still to be built.

The distance from Chibougamau to the port of Chicoutimi is 220 miles shorter than to the next nearest seaport. And even in winter, as the route from Chibougamau to Montreal or Quebec is shorter via Chicoutimi, freight rates to or from Chibougamau would be even more substantially reduced. The importance of this situation from a business standpoint is obvious.

The port of Chicoutimi is one of our national ports which is being managed by a federal organization.

Its facilities, if further improved, would be put to very good use if the ore, raw or refined, mined in the northern part of the province were shipped there and if goods from the exterior were sent and handled there.

Instead of being in the red as today, that harbour would likely become a paying national undertaking.

The manpower available in my riding, without par anywhere in Canada, would benefit from the project, one which would add stability to the prosperity of 100,000 good Canadians. That aspect of the problem is worth considering, and seasonal unemployment, which prevails every year in our cities, would disappear or at least be reduced if new industries springing from the economic development taking place at Chibougamau were established alongside existing ones.

The majority of the railways which were built across Canada, those in the west particularly, were built not because they were guaranteed a certain traffic by private enterprise, but because of the future development of existing material wealth. That principle should apply to the St. Felicien-Chibougamau line.

The people of my constituency have confidence in the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and they hope that he will recognize the justice of our claims.

Le Progrès du Saguenay, a daily newspaper of the queen city of the north, wholeheartedly devoted to the interests of the area and non-partisan politically, had this to say on September 29, 1954, following a rumour that the new Minister of Transport intended to visit us:

> It would appear that the Hon. George C. Marler, new federal Minister of Transport, has expressed the wish to visit Chicoutimi and meet there with the members of the economic development council for the Saguenay in order to discuss the proposed construction of the Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway. This news was greeted with a great deal of satisfaction by every businessman in the district. The reputation of this statesman is well known; his honesty is beyond reproach. His record of public service is an inspiration for the younger generation and his rise to his recent high estate has been gradual and perfectly natural. He is a man of real ability and his reputation extends throughout Canada. There is no better proof of his merit than the esteem in which he is held by his political opponents. This explains why the people from the lake St. John and Saguenay area were happy to learn of his elevation to the post of Minister of Transport. We are now certain of obtaining justice.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that these words of praise coming from a daily newspaper of my area will be amply deserved by the Minister of Transport.

(Text):

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, we in Canada have hotels from coast to coast of which we can rightly be proud. Around the world some of these hotels are well known, such as the Royal York, the Chateau Laurier, the Chateau Frontenac, the King Edward, the Bessborough, the Macdonald, and others. Now apparently we are going to have added to this list another name, that of the Hilton Queen Elizabeth. This hotel is to be built and paid for with public funds and operated not by Canadians but by others. This government, which to say the least has not facilitated the use of the word "royal" by some of our top transportation units but does condone the same word on things like poolrooms, and shoeshine parlours, is now leasing out the name of our gracious young sovereign for the benefit of a commercial organization which is not Canadian, and such action does give me some pause.

I know the attitude of the government is that this hotel is going to retain its Canadian identity, that this is purely a management arrangement which will have no direct bearing in the eyes of the public, and that this will be a $20 million project of which we as Canadians can well be proud. Actually it is evident, and I hope that evidence is going to be examined by this committee, that this will not be the case. We know from information already available to us that it is not the approach of the Hilton organization to keep their name in the background. They want the units associated with them to be presented to the world as Hilton units. This is understandable because it is at least a partial gratification to their president, a world-famous man who is admittedly a most capable operator in the field of hotel financing, but who is perhaps less widely known in the field of hotel operation. This is the man of whom Fortune of January 19, 1955, had this to say:

> For nobody, but nobody, quite matches Connie Hilton's passion to be the world's biggest and best known hotel man.

That is all very well. I admire a man with those attributes, but I rather hesitate when I find the Canadian government and the people of Canada financing him in his projects. For example, I read a few lines like these in the April 11, 1953, issue of Business Week:

Hotels Wide-eyed.

Hotelmen are broadening their view of possible sites, see U.S.-run hotels in every corner of free world.

Bent on building an empire abroad, U.S. hotelmen are eyeing every major city in the free world as a possible hotel site.

Those of us who admire free enterprise, as certainly I do, can admire admissions like that; but I do not think we necessarily need to condone the obvious attempt of the government in this instance to put Canadian funds and Canadian effort at the disposal of these empire builders of the United States, particularly when, as we know, they have sizeable funds of their own which we would be more than anxious, I would think, to welcome for investment in Canada, perhaps in the hotel business. We must not forget that Mr. Hilton himself invested some $111 million in the purchase of the Statler chain just a little while ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the statement that the hotel will be identified as Canadian, I point out to the house that the normal operation of this chain is to identify its hotels as Hilton hotels, particularly when they are located in parts of the world other than the United States. They so identify these hotels even under arrangements which as far as we can understand, are parallel with those they have with the Canadian government in this instance. In a parallel situation they continue to identify their hotels as Hilton hotels, taking away from them their individual nature and establishing them as a part of this chain. For example, they have the Palacio Hilton in Chihuahua, Mexico, the Caribe Hilton in San Juan, Puerto Rico, and the Castellana Hilton in Madrid, Spain. As I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, they are now going to have the Hilton Queen Elizabeth in Montreal.

I do not think any Canadian government has ever been party to the use of the name of our Canadian sovereign for the commercial benefit and personal gratification of a non-Canadian organization, and I think it is absolutely unbelievable that the Canadian people should be asked without adequate explanation—and thereby hangs much of my argument—not only to accede to this arrangement but to put up $25 million to make it possible. Of course, one of the great difficulties in assessing this situation is to penetrate the hot air curtain which the government has managed to throw up around the situation.

Before I deal any further with the matter I wish to make it clear that I have a great regard for American achievement and ability in this modern age, but I do not necessarily admit they transcend those of Canadians. I admire and respect the genius of Conrad Hilton and his organization who have built the world's greatest hotel empire. But I am not convinced that this genius, primarily demonstrated in the field of finance and manipulation, can do for this new hotel anything which Canadians could not do equally well.

I approach this entire problem from the viewpoint of a Canadian who, while admiring and respecting the United States and its business acumen, and being extremely friendly thereto, nonetheless feels that Canadians are capable of doing at least as good a job as our United States counterparts.

Let us see how the situation has come about and what information the public has been given on the subject. The project first swam into view when we were given information in definite form at last year's hearings of the railways and shipping committee. During this hearing there was considerable discussion about this new hotel, but there was absolutely no mention of it being managed by an outside firm. Instead, the impression was certainly given that it was a sound proposition on its own merits and that it would be a Canadian operation.

I am going to introduce into the record at this point certain quotations from these proceedings which bear on this point. The quotations are taken, unless otherwise indicated, from statements made by the president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Gordon. I do not hold him responsible in any way, shape or form for this situation, because he made it quite apparent what he had in mind and certainly any change in the situation can be laid at the door of the government and not at Mr. Gordon's door.

Mr. Gordon: Forecasts show that a range of from two per cent to six per cent on the invested capital could be realized and that an average return of at least three per cent could be expected after meeting all charges including maintenance, taxes and depreciation.

And later, during discussions of eventual development of the area around the hotel:

Mr. Gordon: I am positive that the hotel will stand on its own merits.

Later, in general discussion concerning the business prospects and future operation of the hotel:

Mr. Gordon: Our new hotel in Montreal is in the centre of the city and within 500 miles of it are nearly 53 million people; and we know from investigation there will be very intense interest in using the convention facilities of this hotel.

And again later:

Mr. Gordon: Our committee which considered the suggestion for this hotel came to the conclusion there would be a high degree of occupancy.

Then a little later on, following a question regarding the name which had not yet been decided and the probable opening date, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Fraser) asked the following question:

Is it to be all your development?
Mr. Gordon: That is the intention.
Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): All the way through?
Mr. Gordon: Yes.

Subsequently, following a question asked by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) about the inadequacy of convention facilities in Montreal:

Mr. Gordon: They are very inadequate and that is demonstrated by the fact that we already have received a great number of inquiries from organizations which have not been able to hold their conventions in Montreal by reason of their size.

Later, on the same subject:

Mr. Gordon: We have received inquiries, at this date, from 31 organizations all of which hold conventions. I think the interest being shown in the hotel long before we have begun at the site would indicate that we should not expect to have much trouble once the erection of the hotel takes place.

Just one further quotation, Mr. Speaker, regarding the plan to set up one corporation which would own and operate all the Canadian National Railway hotels:

Mr. Gordon: We will not organize the hotel company to be a complete operating company in all respects. Certain administrative services will be provided to the hotel company by the railway.

It seems to me that the principal service provided so far has been to sell the operation of the hotel down the river to the Hilton corporation. Certainly we have had no other factual data or indication in this house. However the quotations I have put on the record make certain facts clear. First, the new hotel was presented as something which would be operated on the same basis as the existing hotels. Second, it was indicated that on such a basis it would be a satisfactory business venture. Third, no indication was given that the operation would be conducted by an outside organization. Fourth, the presentation made to the committee indicated no need to call in an outside organization to operate the hotel, since it was indicated that it would be a satisfactory operation under existing circumstances.

It seems to me that policy has changed drastically since that point, and I think we must look to the government for an explanation of that fact. Tracing what the public might know about this project, for the benefit of the railway committee, the next development took place on November 15, 1954, when a general statement was issued by Mr. Gordon and Mr. Hilton announcing that the Queen Elizabeth would be managed by the Hilton hotel group. This was the first intimation hon. members of this house received that the hotel was not going to be operated by the Canadian National Railways itself; we read it in the newspapers. It was the last and only piece of authoritative information this house has been able to garner to date.

Under the guise of enabling the C.N.R. to operate its day to day business without interference, repeated questions in the house on this subject and repeated requests for information have met with a blank and stubborn refusal to give any more information. This point was extremely well traced by the hon. member for Prince Albert, so I shall not labour it. However, I wish to put on record the interesting fact that other organizations and the Hilton corporation itself find it unnecessary to throw what I have described as a hot air curtain around their operations, and secrete facts within themselves.

I turn to one paragraph in Business Week of April 11, 1953, referring to an hotel which is to be constructed at Havana, Cuba at a cost of approximately $10 million, in conjunction with a local labour union there. The paragraph states as follows:

The retirement fund of the union (with a bank loan to help) will finance the hotel and get two-thirds of the gross when it's operating; Hilton will lease, manage, and supply working capital in return for one-third of the take.

There is the financial information in connection with that particular operation, the division of the profits and everything else. Yet, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen sit over there on the treasury benches and say, "We will not tell you anything about this matter because it is not in the public interest."

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that there perhaps must be some reservations in dealing with the C.N.R. in order to keep its competitive position free and on an equal basis with that of other railways in Canada, but I just cannot see that certain particular aspects of its policy and certain of its major policy decisions should be kept secret when they represent matters of urgent public interest to the people of Canada, and when there is no competitive reason for so keeping them secret. Particularly, Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why they should be kept secret when a 15-year contract is involved and millions of dollars are at stake.

We will turn over to the Hilton corporation a $20 million hotel. It is indicated that we shall be putting up an additional $5 million in furnishings. It is an immense operation. For example, it has almost three times the value of the Chateau Laurier. Yet we cannot find out anything about it. This is not an operating matter. When you take $25 million of quasi-public funds and put them into an hotel and then turn it over to a United States organization for management, that is a matter of prime public interest and prime public importance, and one upon which the house has every right to be fully informed.

Turning to this announcement, stripped of its verbiage we find that the only information we have on the subject is this. The announcement tells us that the hotel will be managed by Hilton for 15 years under a percentage division of profits after payment of all costs of operation. Ownership remains with the C.N.R. At least 95 per cent of the staff will be recruited in Canada, where possible from the C.N.R. organization. The remainder of the announcement, probably in an attempt to camouflage the absence of facts, goes at length into the fine qualities and great size of the Hilton organization, the marvellous job they will do of managing the hotel, and the advantages—largely unstated—of the agreement to the C.N.R.

The facts which would enable the house to evaluate for itself the wisdom and advantages of this arrangement and its possible implications are simply not contained in that statement. For example, the reference to a percentage division of profits after all costs of operation are met is meaningless, even to a trained accountant. I personally have examined the standard accounting practice of the American hotel association, and the figure which is referred to here could be one of four or five different figures in their financial statements. There are some who would include in the cost of operation such items as depreciation and interest. If you do that, in the amounts at the disposal of such an agreement it means a difference of hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. Yet we do not know on what basis it is, and the committee going into its session will not have that information at its disposal, although I sincerely hope it will be made available.

The only basic advantage to the C.N.R. and the people of Canada which has been clearly set out by the president of the C.N.R. as arising from this agreement is expressed in the words:

> . . . the working agreement is likely to ensure a stable and high occupancy of the hotel.

These statements may well be true, but why pay for something we were going to get anyway? Just a year ago Mr. Gordon told the railways and shipping committee:

> We know from investigation there will be a very intense interest in using the convention facilities of this hotel . . . Our committee which considered the suggestion for this hotel came to the conclusion there would be a high degree of occupancy . . . We already have received a great number of inquiries from organizations . . . I think the interest being shown in the hotel long before we have begun at the site would indicate that we should not expect to have much trouble once the erection of the hotel takes place.

In just a moment I think we might call it six o'clock. If these statements I have quoted were correct, as I believe they were, why do we need the Hilton corporation to solicit business which already is banging on our hotel door? Why do we need to pay a percentage of the profits of our new hotel to get business which the committee evidence showed we could get for ourselves?

Mr. Speaker, would you call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, when we rose at six o'clock I was examining some of the statements contained in the press release regarding arrangements between Canadian National Railways and the Hilton corporation with respect to the Queen Elizabeth hotel, or the Hilton Queen Elizabeth hotel, in Montreal.

Continuing with that, I think we might well ask ourselves why there should be any relationship in any person's thinking between an argument concerning the advantages of the Hilton corporation as a sales representative for the new hotel, and the question of the management of the new hotel. There are hundreds upon hundreds of Canadian corporations that have appointed United States sales agents and representatives to handle the sale of their product or services south of the border, or even in other parts of the world. One of the largest hotel chains in the United States and Canada, for example, has agreements with over 3,000 different travel agents on a commission basis for the purpose of obtaining business for their chain of hotels, but these same travel agents have no more say in the management of the hotels than you or I.

The name of the Canadian National Railways and the names of its hotels are justly famous all over the world. People respect and admire hotels like the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa, the Macdonald and many of the others which the C.N.R. operate throughout the country. Surely association with the Hilton chain, great though this chain may be, is not going to do anything to increase or enhance the reputation of these Canadian National hotels. Let me add that this is particularly so in the place where this new hotel is to be erected because I think if there is one thing où les Canadiens français sont bien it is in their hospitality. French Canadians are proud of their hospitality. Down through the ages they have established an outstanding reputation for the hospitality and friendship they evidence toward the stranger. I suggest we do not need anyone to come to Montreal to show us how to attract guests to that city, or how to be hospitable.

Turning now for a moment to the question of the management of the hotel, for the agreement does turn over the management of this $25 million property lock, stock and barrel to Hilton for 15 years, the only basis I can see for it is the conviction on the part of the government that American management and control of the hotel would be superior to Canadian management and control. Quite frankly I cannot agree with this view. Perhaps, however, someone might argue that the advice and guidance of those closely associated with the operation and problems of the biggest hotels is needed. This may be so, but it should be pointed out that it is quite possible to get this advice and guidance without giving away the management rights of the operation. There are several highly reputable organizations in the United States whose particular work it is to give advice, counsel and guidance to individual hotels and to large hotel chains. They guide, counsel and advise, but they leave the management and operating control in the place where they rightfully belong, in the hands of the people who own the hotel and who have the major investment in it.

If you want a comparable situation you can turn to the position of the Sheraton hotels in Canada. This Canadian chain was purchased outright several years ago by the Sheraton corporation of America, which is next in size to the Hilton corporation. I have made inquiries, and I find that this organization use their head office personnel from the United States purely in a consultative and advisory capacity to their Canadian operations. Their units—and let us remember one of them is the Mount Royal in Montreal with a thousand rooms and another is the King Edward in Toronto, also an immense hotel—operate under complete local control, using the chain headquarters personnel for advice, suggestion and consultation to achieve the best possible operating and management results.

I see no reason why, if the need for such advice was felt, a similar arrangement could not have been worked out whereby advice, counsel and guidance would have been made available but the management control and final decision on all matters would have remained in the hands of Canadians in a Canadian organization. It is a far cry from calling in a consultant for advice and guidance to calling him in and turning over your business to him lock, stock and barrel for a 15-year period.

While we are on the subject of the Sheraton chain, I might point out that my investigations have disclosed that they have an iron-clad policy of employing only Canadian personnel from top to bottom in their organization. In their entire operations in Canada at the present time, with all their thousands of employees, there is only one single individual at the present time who has been transferred from south of the border to a Canadian position in a continuing capacity. In fact, it has worked the other way. They have been taking personnel from Canada and transferring them to the United States, because in certain cases they had a surplus of operating personnel here.

Compare this figure of one man among thousands with the proposal for the new hotel in Montreal, where the statement is made that at least 95 per cent of the operating staff will be recruited in Canada. This figure of 95 per cent sounds very reasonable at first, but it begins to look less reasonable when we realize that it means that up to 5 per cent of the staff will probably be brought into Canada from the United States, that this represents 60 to 75 people in a hotel of this size, and that this group which—I quote Mr. Hilton—"will be selected for their special skills, knowledge and other qualifications" will preempt almost every position of any importance in the new hotel, leaving for the Canadian personnel the jobs of hewers of wood and drawers of water, the subordinate positions.

Mr. Fulton: That is Liberal government policy.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That may be Liberal government policy but it is not one with which we on this side of the house agree, and I think the sooner they know it the better. You do not have to do it. There is absolutely no reason for it, because hotel operations in Canada have demonstrated that we have the stuff to do the job. The Royal York, the biggest hotel in the empire, uses Canadian people, and it is an extremely well run hotel. It was only two or three months ago that a young man who had entered the service of the hotel in the capacity of secretary to the general manager was himself appointed general manager of the entire, great Royal York hotel.

There was Dave Mulligan, another Canadian who, unfortunately, died a few months ago. He was known nationally and internationally as the grand old man of the hotel business. He owned and operated some of the greatest and largest hotels in the United States, but he started off in Canada.

An hon. Member: With the C.N.R., too.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The citizens of the United States are capable, ingenious and admirable in all respects, but Canadians are equally so and I think they are entitled to prove their worth in the top positions of this new hotel.

Then there is another argument put forward by the government in favour of the agreement with Hilton—and we are coming to the end of the possible arguments the government can advance. It is that advantage will be gained from association with a large hotel chain like this not only through obtaining specialized personnel but also through purchasing practices and in other ways.

Perhaps this argument would be valid if the new hotel were a separate body and had no other association. But one must remember that the hotel is part and parcel of the great Canadian National Railways complex. It does not exist by itself in a vacuum. It is associated with the Canadian National Railways. The Hilton corporation and its associated organizations have assets of around $230 million; that sounds rather impressive. The Canadian National has assets of about 10 times that amount. Hilton does $190 million worth of business in a year, but the Canadian National does about three times that amount.

In other words, you are not really bringing in a corporation which is any more powerful, which is any bigger or which has any greater facilities. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that under these circumstances there is very little Hilton can offer to the partnership that the Canadian National could not supply from its own resources. The Canadian National has lawyers, accountants, engineers, economists, a sales force and advertising men. They have all sorts and types of personnel they could use in this operation for guidance and counsel, without having to ask for it from the organization the government has selected.

I am not anti anything in this regard, Mr. Speaker, but I am pro-Canadian in these circumstances. I have a sort of fierce pride and reasoned belief in the ability of Canadians to meet the challenge of these days, to rise to that challenge and accomplish that which they must accomplish if we are to retain the leadership which is ours and which, God willing, will continue to be ours. I have no sympathy with those who feel, for whatever reason, that we should play a secondary role to any other nation or any particular people.

It seems to me that some of the arguments I have advanced here today show there could be some reasonable doubt as to the wisdom of this hotel arrangement. I think that is putting it very mildly indeed. I feel that this government is guilty of several charges in this connection. The first and greatest charge of which they are guilty is that they have not had confidence in the ability of Canadians to operate a property which Canadians, with their industry, their foresight and thrift, have managed to procure the capital to erect. They lack confidence in Canadians. Second, I think they are guilty of not giving information to this house to which this house is fully and legitimately entitled. Third, Mr. Speaker, I think the government is guilty beyond question of attempting to thrust an agreement down the throats of the members of this house and the people of Canada without taking into their confidence the members of this house or the people of Canada to the extent that they might make their own decisions.

When the day comes that the gentlemen who sit on those treasury benches can make these decisions by themselves, without taking the people of this country into their confidence, it will be a sorry day for Canada. I believe that in this particular case that day has arrived. I hope the government will rectify the situation in very short order.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to extend this debate; I would like nevertheless to take this opportunity to mention once again a matter which has long been debated but is still timely, namely the construction of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau railroad. Hon. members will recall that last December I placed on the order paper of the house the following resolution:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of taking whatever steps are necessary for the early construction of the eastern section of the St. Felicien-Chibougamau-Beattyville railway, for the purpose of connecting the lake St. John industrial district with the Chibougamau mining centre.

That resolution was not the first representation I had made in favour of this project; it was but the conclusion of constant and continuous efforts for the logical and rational development of the rich mining resources of the Chibougamau district.

In fact, I was the first in the house to request the extension of the Canadian National Railway lines to encourage the development of our large natural resources, which are so abundant in the Chibougamau district as well as in the lake St. John region.

On May last, in introducing the bill which has now become law, the Hon. Mr. Chevrier stated:

> It is expected that by the time the proposed line is completed from the western end into Chibougamau, if not before, projects for new industrial development in the Lake St. John-Saguenay area, which are now being considered by prospective investors, will have reached a stage which will justify the construction of this line and a decision can then be reached about any subsidy required and warranted in respect of the line. In the meantime, the Canadian National Railways will proceed to assist and encourage further developments in the lake St. John region as a means for building up potential traffic for this new line.

Now then, Mr. Speaker, this confidence in the future development of Lake St. John is shared by the whole population of my district. That is why, following the announcement of the Canadian National Railways' new policy to insist on guarantees of a sufficient volume of traffic, I stated last May 25 that the population of the Saguenay area intended to work in a constructive and intelligent way towards the achievement of this objective. Thus, since May last, I have not been chary of representations to the C.N.R. authorities, by the lumbering operators and especially to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler).

Guaranteed traffic proposals have now been submitted to the Canadian National authorities, who are now considering them. It is not within my province to assess the value of the guarantees offered, but the government might hasten a decision on the part of the Canadian National authorities by offering them the appropriate subsidies.

A decision along this line, at a time when there is evidence of a drop in employment, would stimulate the Canadian economy and contribute to maintain a high level of national income.

I have every confidence in the foresight and judgment of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Transport. By deciding to grant this subsidy, the government would at last favour the achievement of this railway project, one eagerly awaited by the whole population of my area.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak in this debate, but one or two things have been said which move me to say a few words.

First of all, I rise to support the request of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for a public inquiry into the Malton air accident. If I remember correctly, when replying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre the minister asked the question, "What are you trying to prove?"

Mr. Marler: I did not ask any such question.

Mr. Herridge: I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) asked that question. My understanding is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was not trying to prove anything; he was asking for an inquiry to ascertain the facts and to assure justice to the pilot in question, as well as to the Canadian public. I think from a reading of the evidence that a public inquiry is fully justified.

On February 25 the Minister of Trade and Commerce denied a statement by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the effect that the pilot had been on duty for a period of 16 hours in one day. If we heard the minister correctly this afternoon, by his own figures he admitted that the pilot was on duty one day for 17 hours and 29 minutes. I am not going to take the time of the house to discuss the case more fully. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre placed the matter on record after having made a careful study of the whole situation. I would only repeat that a careful reading of the evidence fully justifies his demand for a public inquiry into this air accident; and I trust when the committee sits it will have an opportunity to go further into the matter.

I wish to say a few words about the Queen Elizabeth hotel. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace who, I think, covered the subject fully. I agree with what he had to say. We in this group supported the proposal that the Canadian National Railways should build this great hotel as a public enterprise of great value for Canada, and one which would serve a very useful purpose. I believe it is true to say that public response to the building of the hotel, as well as general, tourist and commercial interest in it, indicate that it will be a profitable venture.

It is an understatement for me to say that we in this group are very disappointed to hear that the operation of the hotel is being given to an American company. We think this is a reflection on Canadian hotel personnel in Canada, and the capacity of Canadians generally to administer such affairs. I think the successful management of a number of Canadian National hotels in Canada and a large number of other excellently operated hotels is proof that we have the personnel in this country to do the job, and that there was absolutely no necessity to have an American company operate this hotel. One of the hon. members has suggested that it indicates a Canadian inferiority complex when it comes to the management of such a business.

Another matter that concerned me was the possibility of going to Montreal on some occasion and seeing there a large sign bearing the words "Hilton-Queen Elizabeth Hotel". That would be a ghastly business. I do hope that whatever happens so far as the management is concerned, the name of a man called Hilton is not allowed to appear on the building, on the stationery or in the advertising, but that it will be known for all time as the Queen Elizabeth hotel. I trust the committee will have opportunity to make inquiry into this unusual and, we consider, totally unnecessary arrangement which is damaging to Canadian prestige and would be a blow to Canadian pride.

That is all I am going to say on the subject. I am going to keep up my reputation for speaking briefly, stating the facts and presenting an unassailable argument.

Mr. Knowles: A good, solid C.C.F.'er.

Mr. Herridge: I wish now to say a few words about the trans-Canada pipe line question. I do so because I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell), when he urged that the government consider having this very necessary pipe line built by the Canadian National Railways. I was particularly interested to hear this proposal coming from an hon. member supporting the government. I thought it indicated that he had given serious consideration to the problem, one which is giving concern to a good many Canadians at this time.

Ever since we have talked about a trans-Canada pipe line this group has urged that such an undertaking should be publicly owned and under the management of the Canadian National Railways. This pipe line will be piping Canadian gas required by Canadian consumers. We in this group say, let Canadians build the pipe line, without paying tribute to any United States capitalist interests.

I think there are many arguments in favour of public ownership of this pipe line, and having it built under the jurisdiction of the Canadian National Railways. The railway company has a right of way across Canada, and no property problem would be involved. There would be none of the complex difficulties in the matter of easements and other things which take so much time and often cost large sums of money. The building of the pipe line by the Canadian National Railways would mean lower construction costs because it could be serviced from the railway itself. Maintenance under public ownership through the railway company would be lower, for the same reason. If we were to undertake this great project in the near future it could be a first step in an over-all plan for unemployment relief, as suggested earlier in debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I suggest the government should float a tax-free bond issue for the building of the trans-Canada pipe line. This procedure has been popular in the United States in connection with undertaking certain large public works. Such tax-free bond issue would be subscribed to only by Canadian citizens, and would not be transferable. This procedure has been followed in the United States with a great deal of success in connection with large irrigation projects and the like. I think the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) made reference to this in a committee we attended some days ago. These bonds would be of small denominations, perhaps from $100 up, and an opportunity could be given to hundreds of thousands of Canadians to subscribe to this Canadian-owned project. This would be greatly preferred to the procedure of asking United States interests to come in and build the line, and then reap the profits and have the control of this important public utility.

I am confident if the Canadian government were to undertake such a project it would capture the public imagination and would receive an excellent response from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Gillis: Not from the Atlantic. That is the pipe line that will scrap our coal mines.

Mr. Herridge: I understand there are some persons in the maritimes who have surplus capital to invest and who, no doubt, would be willing to invest it in this national project. However, I see I am treading on the toes of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis).

I do think this is a project well within our capacity. We have raised large amounts of money through the sale of Canada savings bonds, and I think it is about time that we started to raise money in Canada for these public projects. This is a good one to start with, a national bond issue for the building of a trans-Canada pipe line. This is an opportunity for the first step in the greater development of Canada and long-term plans to meet unemployment, by Canadians and for Canadians. I think it would be a demonstration of confidence by Canadians in Canada's future.

In the opinion of members of this group this is a natural field for public enterprise, in this case public enterprise supported by the investment of hundreds of thousands of Canadians who I am quite sure would prefer to see this being done in this way than to be dependent upon the whims of United States capitalists. This would be an investment by Canadians in a wholly Canadian project to serve Canadians for generations to come.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this motion. Some time ago I placed a question on the order paper, as follows:

1. What offers, if any, have been received by the Canadian National Railways for their various hotels listed for sale?
2. What terms of payment are suggested in respect of these offers?
3. What is the appraised value of each of these properties, if such appraisals are available?

I received an answer to the first part of my question giving the details with respect to two hotels. In answering the second part of the question I was told that it was inadvisable, in the light of the policy of the railroad, to disclose such information. In reply to the third part I was told that the information was not available.

I have no particular objection to this type of answer, provided the Canadian National Railways are prepared to stand on their own feet. Who owns this railroad? Does the Minister of Transport, or does the government, or do the people of Canada own it? If the people of Canada own it, then I submit the people of Canada have a right to this information and neither the minister nor the government have any right to deny them information that is vital, especially in view of the fact that the Canadian National Railways are coming to the people of Canada to make up their deficit. Still they refuse to give the people of Canada simple information as to how they are conducting the affairs of the railroad.

There might possibly be some objection to disclosing this information if the negotiations for sale were in the process of being carried on, but that was not the case. In the case of the two hotels referred to the negotiations had been completed, and there was no conceivable reason for denying such information.

Apparently the Canadian National Railways are developing into something in the nature of a sacred cow as far as the government are concerned. One cannot get any information about the operations of this railroad. There does not seem to be any logical explanation for this attitude. If it was a question of effective competition perhaps one could understand it, but these were cases in which no such factor was involved. Personally I do not see any particular reason why such information should be denied.

Rumours have been rife in Winnipeg and vicinity that the Canadian National Railways were disposing of these hotel properties at fire sale prices. This may or may not be true, but if it is not true I would suggest that the best way for the minister to disabuse the minds of those who so think would be to disclose the information, more especially in view of the fact that no particular purpose would be served by refusing to do so.

I have in mind another instance of this peculiar attitude on the part of the government with regard to giving out information. Some time ago I asked why the government would not allow Winnipeg and area citizens to travel to Europe over the trans-polar route by way of Scandinavian Airlines. The answer I received was that there was no reciprocal arrangement. I suggested that perhaps they might be able to negotiate such an arrangement, but no reply was given to that suggestion. When I attempted to pursue the matter further I did not get very far.

Here is an instance in which the convenience of the travelling public is involved. One would think the first objective and even the duty of the government would be to promote the public interest and public convenience. Do they do that? No. Apparently they want to reserve this route for Trans-Canada Air Lines, and are prepared to go so far as to force a person residing in Winnipeg to travel to Montreal over Trans-Canada and then take Trans-Canada overseas to Europe, whereas he could get in an aeroplane in his own backyard, so to speak, and be in Europe in eight hours. As far as I can gather the minister is the only citizen of Canada who has had the privilege of travelling this route, and he is not prepared to extend that privilege to his fellow citizens.

The hon. member for Hastings South made what to me at least was an interesting suggestion, and this was commented upon by the hon. member for Kootenay West. This was a proposal to have Canadian National Railways build a trans-Canada pipe line on their own right of way. This is a suggestion that could come only from a Liberal.

In the first place the geography is all wrong. The major gas distribution in western Canada happens to be along the line of the Canadian Pacific. The Canadian National right of way is some hundred miles or so to the north, which would mean another hundred miles or more of extra pipe line to be constructed. If one has travelled over the right of way of the Canadian National Railways from east to west, as I have, he cannot help but be struck by the type of country through which the line travels. How in the world would you expect to sell any gas along that line?

In the first place this line would not be able to buy any gas in western Canada, because they would not be prepared to pay enough money for it. In the second place they would not be able to sell any gas or oil along the route because nobody would want to buy it. So you would have a gas pipe line without a supply and without customers. All that would be accomplished, in my estimation, would be a carrying on of the pattern established by Canadian National Railways of deficit mounting on deficit year after year.

Finally, with regard to pensions for Canadian National Railways employees, this is a subject of great importance; as a matter of fact pensions in general are a subject of great importance. These pensions have been paid for in part by the pensioners' own money. Their good money has been taken from them and has been returned to them in money that is not so good, in currency that is debased to a certain degree.

Here we have the nub of this whole question, and the government must sooner or later face up to this proposition. Inflation is destroying the basis of all fixed income in the country, and in my opinion the government must take note of that fact. What is the use of giving pensions if 20 years from now when the pensions become payable they are going to be worth only half? That is what has happened in the last 20 years, and the trend is continuing. There is no indication that this inflationary trend in our economy is being arrested. There is no indication that the government is making any serious effort to arrest it.

There is only one possible stand for the government to take, as I see it. If it is not prepared to arrest this inflationary trend then it must compensate these people for the depreciated value of their pensions. Otherwise I suggest it is not quite honest to take from an individual money with a certain value and return it to him in money of half the value.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would make a plea to the minister that he not be so reticent in matters concerning the Canadian National Railways unless reticence is a matter of real importance, and I am not convinced that in the past it has always been a matter of real importance.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, you will notice that my voice is very hoarse. I was hardly able to speak, owing to a cold I caught in the barn that is used as a customs house at Halifax upon my return from Europe. I hope, however, and I am sure all of you hope that I will soon regain the full force of my voice. You must have missed listening to my eloquence in the three weeks since I have been home.

[Mr. Trainor.]

Never did I think I would live to see the day when Canadians would lose their vision and foresight to such an extent that the people of Canada as stockholders in the publicly owned railway would find themselves treated in a manner which the stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway would not tolerate for a moment. The stockholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway have the privilege of attending stockholders' meetings and voicing their opinions and displeasure to the management as they see fit.

We have all known the C.P.R. railway stock to go up and down. We have also known times when everyone sought eagerly to have C.P.R. stock in their portfolio of investments; it was a must. We also lived to see the day when they could not get what they paid for it, which was brought about by world-wide conditions. The stockholders of the Canadian National Railways do not have the same opportunity to voice their opinions as to whether the management is good or bad. This can only be accomplished through their spokesmen in the House of Commons of Canada, which is the voice of the Canadian people. At the moment I happen to be a member of that body which serves as the voice of the people of Canada, and I am one of those members of that body who do not entirely agree at all times that the management of the railway has been correct in its decisions.

I have known a time when the advice of competent government and outside engineers was accepted in relation to the construction of gigantic projects in Canada, and they turned out to be great flops. We know they built a canal leading out of lake Simcoe in the vicinity of Newmarket which was heralded as a great event. After they completed about one-third of this project it was discovered they were building a canal which would have required the water to run up hill in order to bring any benefit, and they finally abandoned that project.

Every new hotel that was built by the Canadian National Railways in the past was heralded as a great benefit to almost all of Canada. I can remember when they built the Minaki hotel. My father owned property around Minaki for about 50 years, for which he paid at least $500. I know that if I offered to sell it to anyone in this house tonight for $250 I would not get it. When the hotel at Minaki was built with every convenience, including a golf course, it was advertised throughout Canada and all over the world, but finally it was almost given away. Many other hotels were built about that time by competent, intelligent railway management.

As you travel throughout Europe you do not find hotels which are 1,000-room projects, with other hotels being constructed, each offering an increased number of rooms. Irrespective of the economic soundness of it, the building of gigantic and unfriendly hotels is a United States idea and many of those constructed in that country have been flops.

I can remember taking a room at the new Waldorf-Astoria when it was first opened. My room cost me $25 for half a day, and I took it so I could say I had stayed there at the opening. I think I stood on the rug in that room for the entire day in order to get my money's worth. I did not want to go downstairs to see anything else, because I said to myself, "I have paid $25 for the privilege of spending 12 hours in this joint, so I had better get my money's worth".

The management of the C.N.R. has done many things for which it deserves credit; but if the management of the C.N.R. and the representatives of the taxpayers in the House of Commons believe this hotel in Montreal is something which will benefit all Canada, surely the clever and ultra-brainy Hilton organization could have been induced to erect their own hotel. If the idea of the construction of this hotel was not good enough for the Hilton people we should benefit by their refusal, and construct a hotel in Montreal to accommodate not only those people travelling on the C.N.R. but all people coming to Montreal. Surely we need not rely on the prestige of the Hilton people to channel tourists and other visitors to this beautiful new multimillion dollar edifice. If we need that force behind us the construction of the hotel is not worth while.

Let us not continue to display marvellous architects' drawings to the people of Canada. Let us get down to earth and start to exert some of the old-time energy that made the C.P.R. what it is today. Let private enterprise do those things that are necessary and which will be profitable. Let those who build them take their chances. Don't put the burden on the taxpayers. If it does not succeed, let it crash; and let those people who have not the ability to manage or have not the foresight to plan for the future take their medicine. They are taking it now all over Canada, and they are perfectly able to take it on a project of this kind.

I would like to ask this question. If a 1,000-room hotel is necessary, how much more necessary would a 500-room hotel be? When we build something of this kind in this country, consider the position Canada is now in. When we build this absolutely necessary project—something the whole country has been crying for, something without which Canada can never grow—we must go down and select foreign management for a government project for the first time in the history of Canada, I believe.

Let me say this to the members of the Liberal party. This is one of the worst slaps in the face this government has ever given Canada and the Canadian voters. I wish there were a by-election going on somewhere in Ontario. If there were, I would take on any Liberal and defeat him amongst the honest Canadians of Ontario on that particular subject, namely that the time had now come to use the Canadian taxpayers' money to build something we must have—the same as we had to have those hotels we are now selling—and that through the greatest stretch of imagination on the part of those in the government or the Canadian National Railways, they could not find competent management out of 15 million people in Canada.

If that is true the sooner we take the boundary line down and stop paying salaries for members of parliament in Canada, go south to Washington and join up with those people in the United States, the better. If the time has come when we have to go down there to seek management for an hotel, it has now become time to join up on all other projects in the same manner. Don't be afraid to face the facts if the facts are there. But they are not there, thank God. It is only the imagination of this Liberal government that has tolerated the management of the C.N.R. going down into the United States and bringing up foreign management for a Canadian project.

If that were true I would say there was no need to keep this parliament open. Let us go down and throw in our lot with them and let individual Canadians who have some guts left take their chances down there as Americans. I am sure we would not starve to death any more than we have starved in the past. There has never been a time when I have felt inferior to any American or to any foreigner, particularly when I was walking on my own, my native land.

I say this with all respect to the present management of the railroad and to the minister. I believe there has been a gross slip-up with regard to the idea of bringing in the Hilton people to manage this project. If it has been given the consideration it should have been given, and if it has one one-hundredth part of the merit we are led to believe it has, then I say you have shown a bad example to Canadians. You have taken the starch out of every decent young Canadian working for the Canadian National Railways. Out of 120,000 employees you say you could not get managerial personnel. What a hope that is for these men down here in the Chateau Laurier, who either should be fired or promoted. If they are not competent, fire them. If they are competent, give them promotion. I am not speaking from the political angle—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): What a joke.

Mr. Ferguson: At least I am speaking with some degree of humour, apparently. There are some men who pay little attention to what goes on in the House of Commons. This is now bringing a little laughter to their lips. There must therefore be something in what I am saying when it creates a laugh even amongst those rubber stamps of the Liberal government. If I have done even that, I have done something.

I want to impress upon them that I am on my feet for only one reason. I believe Canada is a great country. I am disappointed about the unemployment situation as it exists today. I believe Canada should have 50 million people, with its terrific natural resources.

I am also firmly convinced that Canadians must stop looking for foreign aid. We have to stop living in prosperity brought about during the war. The first and second wars virtually put Canada on her feet. You cannot deny that. We made money when other people shed their blood. We did that to some extent. The two wars were the greatest experience Canada ever had. They brought manufacturing plants to this country that we would never have had today. In the eight years since the war we have been basking in the prosperity brought about by the fact that we were making munitions during the six years of war.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? Perhaps the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) would like a rest for a moment. I have been reading Beauchesne. I realize that I am only a junior member and therefore full of ignorance. However, I want to learn.

Mr. Ferguson: Sit down and you will learn, all right.

Mr. Richardson: Beauchesne, third edition, citation 546, reads as follows:

When the house is engaged in nominating the members of a committee—

I understand that is the purpose of the resolution before the house.

—it is not competent for an hon. member to open the whole subject.

Mr. Speaker, could we have a ruling as to whether we have not gone quite a distance?

[Mr. Ferguson.]

I myself refrained from rising for quite a while because, as the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I am much interested in the subject of hotels. But I am wondering whether we are not trespassing a little bit and getting somewhat far from the resolution that is at present before the house.

Mr. Ferguson: If my hon. friend had been here this afternoon he would have heard this matter settled. It was all discussed then.

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): He was here.

Mr. Ferguson: If you are still of the same opinion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member who has raised the point of order. It is my own impression that on a resolution of this kind we should attempt to discuss the advisability or inadvisability of setting up the committee. However, if one reads the debates on resolutions of this kind, one finds that in practice it is almost impossible to confine a debate so strictly.

In this debate today I am afraid that perhaps rather wide latitude has been allowed. While there is some merit in the point of order raised by the hon. member, I do not feel that I could at this time rule that the hon. member for Simcoe North was out of order. At this stage in the evening, however, I would request all hon. members to confine themselves, so far as possible, to the principle of the resolution, namely the advisability or the inadvisability of setting up this sessional committee.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, my friend the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George will, I am sure, have his wish fulfilled within the next five or six and twenty years. He will learn something in the House of Commons. If at times the hon. member feels as sincerely as I do, through the bitter experience of watching the slow growth of this country of ours, I hope he will voice his views in order to try to alter the opinions of those in power even when he finds himself, after the next election, in opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ferguson: Much gross mismanagement of Canadian affairs of the kind we are now seeing at the hands of the present government will bring about that very result. There are many people who feel like I do. They believe there is no reason for the management of Canadian National Railways to do what it is about to do. They feel that the example they are setting is a great detriment to the progress of Canada and is a bad example for the coming generation. They believe it is taking away their ambition and the feeling that they can accomplish things in their own dominion.

One of our greatest troubles is that after we have paid for the education of our young Canadians they go south of the border to take positions. Here we have the case of a Canadian-owned railroad building the biggest hotel in Canada and employing foreigners to manage it. I say there can be no possible justification for such action. I say it is a slight to Canadians, and if the people of Canada knew the full facts of the case they would feel they had been slighted in such a way that they would never forgive this or any other government.

I am not trying to harangue the government. I am speaking as a member of the opposition to the government which, I believe, still has the power to let the Hilton people build their own hotel if they believe this enterprise is going to be as good as the government would lead us to believe the Hilton people are going to make it.

I am sure we shall live to see the day, and in the not too far distant future, when the government will be called upon to subsidize this very project in spite of the fact that the miracle workers from south of the border are going to manage it. You know, Mr. Speaker, I was looking over the statement of the Canadian National Railways steamship lines. I know they did not make any money. There may be all the excuse in the world for that, but in looking at their statement I see that there is a bond issue of $9 million guaranteed by the Canadian government. As a purchaser of bonds I know that simply means that these bonds are as good to the bondholders as Canadian government bonds. Canadian government bonds draw interest of 3 or 3¼ per cent. These bonds are paying 5 per cent and they mature, thank God, in the year 1955.

I am sure the public are getting fed up with guaranteeing bond issues for government corporations involving the payment of interest at 5 per cent when the Canadian government can borrow all the money it wants at 2½ to 3 per cent and lend it without interest to the steamship company. The minister has the report right there in his hands. Turn over another page and you will see it. The minister has already discovered it. I am sure when he sits over here in opposition he will remember my words.

An hon. Member: You will not be here.

Mr. Ferguson: We are being called upon to make this building possible so that people can live in the greatest hotel in Canada. There was a blunder in the first place in deciding to build it, and in the second place a grosser blunder has been made by appointing foreigners to manage it. Let Canada be for Canadians, for God's sake, and let us stop the nonsense of believing that Canadians cannot manage their own affairs.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to say, with all due respect to the minister, that he should still continue to look at the page that was referred to, because in connection with the setting up of this committee there are two matters that I believe should be given special consideration this year. The first is Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited. I understand that last year in the committee and elsewhere word was given out that the operations of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, were to be discontinued. This matter was brought up in the house shortly afterward and the then minister of transport, with all due respect to him, landlubber that he was and not being too interested perhaps in the east coast, did say that the steamship service would be continued for another year.

From a quick look at the annual report we see that they have had a fairly successful year of operation. There is a slight deficit, but even with the pessimistic year to year outlook they have been able to put together quite a good year. In my opinion a considerable amount of time should be spent this year in examining the entire operations of the steamship company, and definite plans should be made for a long-range program.

I notice that money is to be taken from the replacement fund for the refinancing plans. I question the right to take money from the replacement fund that is not earmarked for new ships. I also believe that we should be making definite plans for new refrigerated ships and a further continuation of the service that means so much to us on the east coast.

There is also a lesson to be learned so far as the entire merchant shipping business is concerned. In my view a very pessimistic and wrong outlook has been taken. I think the successful year of operations of this steamship line just ended indicates what could be done for our merchant shipping generally if we had farsighted plans and a long-range program. Operations of the West Indies steamships line were planned for one year more. We were told that would be the end of the line, that it would be discontinued; yet even in spite of that they have had a very good year. I earnestly hope I may be present in the committee to see that this matter receives most serious consideration.

I should also like to refer to the present plans for discontinuance of branch railway lines. I have been given to understand that this is the first year that extensive plans have been made for the discontinuance of many such lines. While there have been some discontinuances out west in past years, this is the first time that wholesale plans have been made. In my constituency it was necessary to give notice of intention to abandon two small branch lines. The board of transport commissioners naturally were involved in the matter, and I think it is fair to say that they conducted a reasonably impartial and extensive inquiry.

It was my good fortune to be able to attend the hearings for part of the time, and two things came out of them upon which I feel the committee must give some direction with respect to future abandonment plans. The first concerns the policy of considering the entire revenue of the region in these matters. Second, there is the part that the future development of the area is to play in these abandonment plans. The hearing I attended was weak in so far as both these matters were concerned. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that these two matters should receive extra consideration this year.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will conclude the debate.

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I should like to review as completely as possible, but at the same time as quickly as possible, the principal points which have come up during the course of the discussion of this motion. The first topic I have noted relates to the information given to parliament concerning railway matters. The first thing I should like to say is that there is certainly no desire on my part or upon the part of the government to conceal the facts relating to the management of the Canadian National Railways. If we had no responsibility whatever with regard to the management of the railways, then it would be very easy for us to respond to all inquiries without regard for the consequences.

However, Mr. Speaker, since we have responsibility for the Canadian National Railways there are certain rules we must observe, and it is for that reason that, though very often the correspondence between the Department of Transport or the minister and the Canadian National Railways has no particular implication, it has been the custom followed by the government, both when the Conservatives and when the Liberals were in power, to look upon this kind of correspondence as privileged. It is for that reason that, since I have been minister, I have opposed the adoption of motions requesting the production of such correspondence. It was not particularly because I wished to frustrate members of the opposition in their attempts to obtain the correspondence they wished to have, but merely because that has been the tradition.

I feel there are good reasons for it. I believe one of the obvious reasons is the fact that very often the information requested would prejudice the position of Canadian National Railways vis-à-vis its competitor. It is not, I believe, in the interests of the railway itself that it should be called upon to make public certain matters which have been the subject of questions or the subject of motions. There is another aspect of that too, Mr. Speaker, and that is that there are very often occasions when customers of the railway are dealing with it and when, in turn, the railway is dealing with suppliers, contractors and others, when clearly it would not be to the advantage of the railway that the details should be made public or that a customer should feel that all his affairs and all his dealings with the railway are subject to publication at any time.

I am quite sure that if hon. members had for a moment the responsibility of deciding whether or not information concerning the railways should always be made public, they would realize there are many instances in which it would not be in the interests of the railway that such information should be made known and thus given to its competitor, the Canadian Pacific Railway. No one, I think, would suggest that the same information would be made public by the Canadian Pacific Railway, either normally or during the course of a shareholders' meeting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel the same remarks are pertinent to replies to questions that have been asked during the course of this session. Certainly so far as I am concerned I have sought to obtain the information when questions have been asked and I have believed it proper to reveal the information to parliament. I believe I should say a word about the answers that have been given. First of all, I should like to say that none of the information I have given has had any other origin than the Canadian National Railways. In other words, though it has been implied on one or two occasions that perhaps I was providing the facts, I want to assure hon. members that such is not the case.

I have in my hand the answers to six questions which were put concerning employment on the Canadian National Railways. On reading them I notice that in each case the reply states that "the Canadian National Railways advise as follows", and then the information follows. I assure hon. members that the source of the information is not my imagination, but is the records of the Canadian National Railways. I believe the information given is truthful and accurate; otherwise, as the responsible minister, I should not give it to the house.

I should like to say also that no answer has been given while I have been minister that I have not examined personally. I want to say, therefore, that I accept full responsibility for the language used in all the answers which have been given. I have reread them since the debate this afternoon, and while I might perhaps be a somewhat prejudiced observer, I do not believe any fair-minded person would say that the answers given were arrogant, or that they suggested the minister lived in an ivory tower and wished to withhold information, except under the circumstances to which I have already referred.

On this same subject of questions I should like to say that a number of questions have been put concerning lay-offs by the Canadian National Railways. I am quite sure hon. members will appreciate the difficulties that arise from the use of this term "lay-off". As I understand it, if the railway discharges an employee and immediately engages another in his place, there is in fact a lay-off and there is also the engagement of a new individual. Consequently when members ask for information concerning lay-offs, it seems to imply a consideration of all the cases where the services of an employee have been dispensed with or where he has voluntarily retired.

We have not, in the Department of Transport, endeavoured to avoid giving information concerning employment with the Canadian National Railways. The difficulty has arisen when questions have been asked that would have involved special research on the part of the railway staff. If any member had made a case for having special information concerning a particular date, I think we would have endeavoured to obtain that information. We have received information as to the total number of employees on the railway at the middle of each month. Whenever questions have been put and the records of the railway company would permit us to give an answer in that way, we have made no effort whatever to conceal the facts concerning employment figures.

Not very long ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked about employment during the month of February. I must say I was sorry I was not able at that time to furnish the information, for the simple reason that the information was not then available. In fact it was only this afternoon that I was able to obtain information with regard to the level of employment in the middle of February. I would have liked to give that information to the hon. member for Prince Albert who, I am sorry, is not in his seat at the moment. Had he been here I would have told him that at February 15 employment in the Canadian National Railways was 102,262, which shows very little difference from the figures for January, 1955.

I do not want unduly to prolong the discussion, but I think hon. members would be interested to know that there are very marked fluctuations in the level of employment in the Canadian National Railways. If I might merely put a few examples on record, I believe they would serve to demonstrate the difficulty of arriving at any very positive conclusions from the number of persons employed at any mid-month point.

For example, in March of 1952 the employment level was 118,561, whereas in the following month it was 113,375. One would have thought that meant a tremendous number of lay-offs. Yet only a few months later in the same year the total was back to 120,095 employees which, up to that time, was probably an all-time high in employment on the railroad.

I notice that as between the highest and lowest month of that year there was a difference of some 6,700 employees, while in 1953 there was a difference of some 11,000 and in 1954 of some 6,000. So the figures from month to month can be very misleading. And it is a fact that, though August seems to be the month of peak employment—a fact which I am sure hon. members will understand—the month of minimum employment seems to vary and is not always the same every year.

At all events I would say that we do not wish to conceal any information concerning employment with the Canadian National Railways, and if questions are asked concerning employment at mid-month dates it is usually not too difficult to provide the information hon. members desire to have.

Then the hon. member for Greenwood referred to the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. I think I shall merely say to him tonight that there is on the order paper legislation to consolidate into one statute the various enactments relating to the Canadian National Railways, and he will have an opportunity to debate the matter fully when that legislation is under consideration.

On the subject of pensions, to which a number of hon. members have referred, I think I can only say that the subject was covered very fully last year by my predecessor, Hon. Lionel Chevrier; and after reading with a good deal of care what he said, as it appears at page 3125 and following of Hansard for last year, I do not believe I can say it either more eloquently or more clearly than he did. I have also had the opportunity to read the remarks on the same subject by Hon. Douglas Abbott, who was my predecessor in the House of Commons for the constituency of St. Antoine-Westmount, and who held the portfolio of finance. His remarks are to be found at page 2576 of Hansard for last year. Consequently I do not believe I would be doing more than taking up the time of the house if I were to reiterate the views these two gentlemen expressed so clearly last year.

I should like also to touch on the question of the inquiry into the accident which befell the Super-Constellation aircraft at Brampton late last year. It was my original intention to hold both a technical and a public inquiry into the causes of this accident. However, after I had had the opportunity of reading the evidence and the report of the technical board, and after the officials of my department had given extended and careful study to the evidence and the report—which may I say in passing was tabled in the house, made public and available to the newspapers—it seemed to me that a public inquiry could have no result other than to duplicate what had already been done by the technical board.

Before the inquiry of the technical board was initiated it did seem to me there might be some very real doubt as to what was the cause of the accident. I think it is a fair statement to make, after reading the evidence and the findings of the commissioners, that there could really be no doubt as to the cause of the accident. I thought possibly, too, originally, there was some possibility that officials or employees of the Department of Transport had been at fault. I would like to assure the house that had the technical board ascertained any facts which showed fault on their part, even though it might have seemed to be a duplication of effort I would have felt that a public inquiry should be held, so the public would be fully aware of the fact and could see to what extent my department was at fault.

However, after reading the evidence most carefully I came to the conclusion, just as the commissioners did, that my department had not been at fault. Consequently that was another reason which seemed to me to justify more than adequately the decision I came to afterward, namely not to hold a public inquiry. It also seemed to me—and perhaps I might be accused of being too sympathetic to the pilot—that a public re-examination of all the facts brought out before the technical board might easily be regarded as a persecution of the pilot, rather than an attempt to throw new light on the subject. I would tell hon. members that the case of the pilot is under consideration by my department, and I assure them that his case will be studied sympathetically, and that the treatment he will receive will be just and fair.

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I would reach different conclusions on the evidence. I do not think perhaps there is any difference in sympathy between us, so far as the pilot is concerned. But I must say that, having read the evidence, I do not reach the same conclusions he does; and I do not think the conclusions to be drawn from the evidence are other than those to which the board came itself. I should like to remind the house that the board consisted of three aeronautical specialists: D. W. Saunders of Toronto, who is district superintendent of air regulations of the Department of Transport, a former pilot and one of Canada's first flying instructors, who acted as chairman in this instance; Dr. J. J. Green, M.B.E., of the defence research board, who is also an experienced aeronautical engineer and who until recently was scientific adviser to the chief of staff for air; and Group Captain Leigh, a member of the R.C.A.F., who was head of the R.C.A.F. auxiliary group in Toronto. I think the quality of the three men whose names I have just mentioned is a guarantee both of the independence of the board itself and of the impartiality with which the inquiry was conducted.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a question? In view of his expressed sympathy for the position of the pilot, would he care to comment on the fact that at the hearings the pilot had no counsel? There was no one representing him or advising him in any way. Would the minister care to comment, particularly in the light of some of the questions put to the pilot?

Mr. Marler: I do not think I should comment on that at the moment. I think really it comes back to the evidence given before the board. I think I should say quite candidly to my hon. friend that I do not entirely share his view with regard to the questions. He read some to the house this afternoon and I did not detect any unfairness in the questions. I do not believe it was anything but the fairest and most impartial inquiry by the technical board.

Some comments were made during the course of the debate, I think by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher), about T.C.A. flying over military airfields. I say with deference that I do not really believe that subject is pertinent to the motion we are now considering. I would feel at a disadvantage if I attempted to reply now to what the hon. member said, for the simple reason that I would necessarily have to go far beyond the limits of the present motion in order to do so. I do not wish to evade my responsibilities to discuss the matter, but I would prefer an occasion when I would be within the rules of this house in giving a full explanation and replying fully to my hon. friend.

There are just two other matters to which I should like to refer. A number of hon. members have spoken of the arrangement for the management of the new Canadian National hotel in Montreal. I think I shall merely say in that connection that the Canadian National Railways made public, I think approximately on November 15, a very full statement regarding the parts of the arrangement with Hilton which they believed ought to be made public. I should like to say that no pressure whatever was exerted at any time upon the management of the railway to make an arrangement with the Hilton people. The decision which has been taken is a free decision of the management of the railway, and no pressure of any kind has been brought to bear upon the management by the government.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Marler: I think if my hon. friend would wait until after I have dealt fully with the subject it would be better. I would have no objections to questions then. I might say that I did not interrupt him, although I felt very much tempted on several occasions to do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are an unusual minister in that.

Mr. Marler: In my political life I have always found that patience is a useful virtue to cultivate, and since listening to my hon. friend I have been endeavouring to cultivate it intensively.

I think hon. members will realize that the setting up of this committee affords them an excellent opportunity of discussing with the officers of the railway the arrangement which has been made concerning the management of the hotel, and of putting questions which they believe they have the right to ask in order to elicit information which they think is necessary in order to pass judgment on the merits or otherwise of the arrangement itself. I have a feeling that Mr. Gordon, chairman of the board, will probably be able to convince those who are willing to approach the matter with an open mind. I think not only that he ought to be able but that he will be able to persuade fair-minded people that the arrangement which has been made is in the interests of the railways and is advantageous to them.

So much has been said on the subject that I would like merely to quote two references, which are quite brief. In the 1954 report of the Canadian National Railways, which was tabled last week, paragraph No. 71, one of the four referring to the new hotel, reads as follows:

> This specialized form of patronage can be secured only through a vigorous sales organization extending into all of the principal cities of the United States where the great majority of conventions originate. The Canadian National has been able to retain the services of such an organization on very favourable terms through an agreement with Hilton of Canada, Ltd., the Canadian subsidiary of Hilton Hotels Corporation. Through this management contract, there will be brought to the new hotel and to the Canadian National system generally the extensive solicitation facilities of the world's largest hotel operators, and the special skills of an organization already pre-eminent in the American convention business.

I should like to quote just a few paragraphs from an editorial which appeared in the January, 1955, issue of the Hotel and Restaurant magazine published in Toronto, as follows:

> They tell us that many Canadians were both shocked and surprised to learn that America's leading hotelman, Conrad Hilton, will take over the management of the new $20 million Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal when the C.N.R., its builder, opens it in 1957.
> That's a lot of baloney.

Those are the words in the editorial; that is not my language.

> Let's look at it this way: Who else but Sheraton and Hilton can do the type of a selling job that will be required for this hotel? And Sheraton already has two big establishments in the city.
> Surely it would be foolish not to take full advantage of the facilities the Queen Elizabeth will offer for the staging of the largest conventions. That is what it is being built for and that is what it must be run for. How can masses of American conventioneers and tourists be attracted without a big, hard-working, widespread selling organization operating for the hotel south of the border?
> Let's think for a moment of the hotelmen who are now operating in Montreal. Would you want to see them competing against this big, luxurious, new hotel, against its tremendous financial advantages (as outlined in our July editorial) for the Canadian business? Or would you want to see them benefiting from the flood of U.S. business that perhaps only Hilton can bring into this country?

I am quite sure that any words I might utter this evening will not convince hon. members opposite that what they said this afternoon and evening should now be unsaid, but I do hope the meetings of the committee will afford them an opportunity of going into the matter and perhaps forming a new opinion with regard to the arrangement, and also perhaps convincing themselves as I have been convinced that it is a good arrangement for the railways and therefore a good arrangement for the people of Canada.

I should like to say just one or two words more. The hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Gauthier) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) spoke this afternoon with regard to the proposed branch line from St. Felicien to Chibougamau. I think I should say that at the present time it is not possible for me to add anything to what was said by my predecessor, Mr. Chevrier, during the discussion on the bill last year.

I offer my apologies to the hon. member for Chicoutimi for replying to him in English rather than in French, but I do so because it is necessary to quote a letter in English. This afternoon he spoke about the traffic guarantees which are required. He certainly left the impression that it was the opinion of those in the lake St. John area that the necessary guarantees which had been arranged by them were more than sufficient to justify the building of the line. I do not want to dispute any statement that he might have made concerning the impression which existed either in Chicoutimi or Roberval, but not very long ago one of the persons who had been particularly interested in the subject sent me the last letter which he had received on the subject. Whether he misunderstood it or whether I misunderstood him, I do not know; but after describing the traffic he went on to say:

You will recall that in our meeting at Quebec I stated that the additional traffic which I then understood the local firms were prepared to guarantee—

I will skip the details.

—was not sufficient to justify the construction of the line.

It was not sufficient, Mr. Speaker. In other words, those who have made representations concerning traffic guarantees in relation to this branch line have been told that what they have offered did not constitute a sufficient guarantee from an economic point of view. I wish to say for the benefit of the hon. member for Chicoutimi and also the hon. members for Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) and Lake St. John, who have manifested a continuing interest in the subject, that the matter has been under continuous study since I have been Minister of Transport and I may say that it is receiving most sympathetic consideration. As soon as it is possible to make a constructive announcement on the subject I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I have taken rather a long time replying to the comments of various hon. members. I was interested in the reflections of the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Ferguson) concerning the West Indies steamships. The reason I took out a copy of the report and read from it was not to verify the fact he alluded to concerning the maturity of bonds in 1955, with which I was quite familiar. I was looking back to see whether the bonds which then carried a rate of interest of 5 per cent had been issued at a time when that was the prevailing rate for money. It seemed to me they were issued quite a long time ago, and I do not believe it would be reasonable to suggest they should have been paid off earlier than the date upon which they could have been called. Since they could not be redeemed before 1955 they are being redeemed in 1955. That was the fact I was endeavouring to check by rereading the report. I might assure my hon. friend that I had read the report before.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Marler: Certainly.

Mr. Macdonnell: When the minister was discussing the question of the hotel and referring to the meeting of the committee, I would like to know if I was wrong in getting the impression that he thought the information would be available when we got to the committee so we could fully understand the proposed transaction and, as he expressed the hope, be convinced by it. There apparently has been some question about the information, and I am anxious to ensure that when we get to the committee we shall not be frustrated by the want of it.

Mr. Marler: I can give the house no assurance that the committee will have the contract with Hilton, the production of which was refused by me earlier. Just offhand I am not able to say to what extent the management of the railway will consider that it is able to give any information in addition to that which has already been made public, on November 15. I do not propose to anticipate what will be the position of the committee. I think hon. members will have to allow the committee to sit and questions to be asked, and then the committee will decide to what extent the questions ought to be answered. No doubt the management of the railway will tell us to what extent they feel they can answer them.

Mr. Macdonnell: I would just venture to call to the minister's attention the fact that this committee is empowered to send for papers, persons and records, which was not the case with a certain previous committee.

Mr. Marler: That fact did not escape me.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Would the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Just a quick one. In his remarks the minister indicated that the arrangement with Hilton has been a matter of railway management, and the decision had been arrived at by the railway management. Would he indicate to the house whether the government as such is in agreement with this policy and the action which has been taken?

Mr. Marler: The government considers that the subject was a matter which should be decided by the management and, believing that, it allowed the management to decide it in accordance with the provisions governing the administration of the railway property.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell: May I ask the minister one question? Would he care to say now whether the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited are to be on a one-year basis again this year?

Mr. Marler: I would say the matter is under consideration at the present time.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS, CERTAIN ESTIMATES, ETC., TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): If I might have leave to revert to motions, I would like to move:

That the annual reports for the year 1954 of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, the auditors' report to parliament in respect of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled on March 21, and the report for the year 1954 of the Canadian National Railways securities trust and the budget for the year 1954 of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following items of estimates for 1955-56:

Vote 469, Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals deficit, 1955;

Vote 473, North Sydney-Port aux Basques ferry and terminals deficit, 1955;

Vote 478, Maritime Freight Rates Act;

Vote 479, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, deficit, 1955;

And that the resolution passed by the house on February 4, 1955, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply be rescinded so far as the said resolution relates to votes 469, 473, 478 and 479.

Motion agreed to.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE ALLOWANCES AND PERMISSIBLE INCOME, ETC.

The house in committee on Bill No. 164, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Brooks: I wonder whether the minister or his parliamentary assistant is going to make a statement at this time?

Mr. Bennett: I had not intended to make any statement. This bill has been considered carefully by the special committee on veterans affairs. I think there are full explanatory notes with the bill before the committee.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks on this bill. It is now five minutes to ten. I was wondering whether we might call it ten o'clock?

The Chairman: Is it agreed that I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said. Tomorrow we shall begin with the adjourned debate on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister whether it is the intention to go on with supplementary estimates at eight o'clock?

Mr. Harris: I would hope, Mr. Speaker that before the day is out we could find that we could perhaps wind up some of the business of the house. I would be prepared to postpone consideration of the supplementary estimates if we could find a way of doing that. However, if there is no possibility of doing so we shall take the estimates late tomorrow night. Otherwise they might go over until the following day.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESS REPORTS OF IMMINENT ATTACK ON QUEMOY AND MATSU

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is there any foundation for the general statement that is being made in the press of the United States that an imminent attack on Quemoy and Matsu by red China is anticipated? Would the minister say whether he has any information that would confirm or deny this statement. Would he also give a general résumé of the present situation relative to those two islands.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the reports to which my hon. friend refers and I have no information from any official quarter which would confirm them or that an attack on these islands is imminent. Of course, in the present situation it always remains a dangerous possibility. As far as our policy in respect to this matter is concerned it has already been made clear, and I do not think I need repeat it here, that if an attack were made on these offshore islands it would not involve the intervention of the Canadian government.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED PAYMENT OF INCREASED ALLOWANCES IN APRIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I did not notify him of my intention to ask this question because I did not think it required notice. Is it the intention of the government to amend Bill No. 164, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, to make the allowance payable in April regardless of whether or not that bill is passed in March?

Mr. C. E. Bennett (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): The hon. member is wrong, in that I do require notice of this question. I shall bring it to the attention of the minister and will let the hon. member know in the near future.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

ARMED FORCES—STRENGTH—RECRUITING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence when I might expect to receive answers to two questions which were passed as orders for returns on February 28 and which concern entirely the Department of National Defence.

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I was not aware that any of our orders for returns were delinquent. I shall look into the matter.

FISHERIES

REPORTED DAMAGE ON NORTH SHORE OF LAKE ERIE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Yesterday the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McBain) asked my parliamentary assistant whether I was aware of the widespread storm damage caused to the fishing industry on the north shore of lake Erie and whether representations were made to me by fishermen's associations or by the provincial government.

I am aware of the damage that was done last week. The hon. members for Kent, Ont., (Mr. Huffman) and Norfolk (Mr. Anderson) brought to me wires from fishermen's organizations. I pointed out to them, however, that both commercial and sport fishing in the province of Ontario are entirely under the jurisdiction of the province, other than the inspection of fish at points of export. I told them that the practice in the provinces where we do control the fisheries is for the provincial government to assess the storm damage. If the province decides to assist, and the amount of assistance is beyond the financial capacity of the province, the federal department of fisheries has assisted.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REPORTED INCREASE IN UNITED STATES TARIFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday I asked him if the government had lodged a protest with the United States government about the possible restrictions against imports into that country of lead and zinc. At that time he said he would take the question as notice and give an answer today.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when proposals of this kind were made previously in Washington, which would have increased the duty against Canadian imports of lead and zinc, official representations were made. Since then a new proposal to this end has been put forward. It is at present only a proposal, made in connection with the consideration of a congressional bill. However, since this proposal was advanced our views on the matter have once again been brought to the attention of the United States authorities and our position has been restated and, I hope, reinforced.

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON UNITED STATES RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister yet received any communication in regard to the request for the release of the reply of the government of the United States to the representations made by the government of Canada in connection with the movement of oil across the border from Canada to the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as I stated at the last sitting, a reply has been received. This reply can only be made public with the permission of the sender. We have asked for that permission but, to the best of my knowledge, a reply to that request has not been received.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO SESSIONAL PAPER NO. 80-C

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to sessional paper No. 80-C which he tabled on Thursday, March 24. He will recall that he and I agreed that representative communications would be satisfactory with regard to the subject matter of the return, namely unemployment, rather than all the communications. In view of the fact that in these documents there is no communication from Winnipeg, will he not agree that it is hardly representative and will he bring down a supplementary return?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to see that any representative documents from Winnipeg are added to those the hon. member has in his possession.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REFERENCE TO CANADIAN PERCENTAGE OF WORLD SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister care to comment on the fact that the percentage of Canadian wheat sales to world wheat sales is down? Would the minister care to say whether Canada's percentage of such sales is likely soon to be recovered?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has sent me a document entitled The Wheat Review, published by the department of which I am minister, which shows that for the full year last year Canada supplied 42 per cent of the world's wheat and that for the first six months of this year Canada supplied 36.1 per cent of the world's wheat. May I say that the figures are not comparable. The shipment of wheat from Canada is largely seasonal. Our ports are closed, except for the Atlantic ports and Vancouver, from about December 10 until some time in April. We have a heavy movement booked out of the St. Lawrence for the opening of navigation and I have no reason to believe that, when the year ends, we shall not hold our percentage of total world sales. I may say that in some markets our percentage of sales is well ahead of last year.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the minister would take a second look at those statistics. If he will do so, he will see that the periods quoted in each year are the same periods, and not a part of the year against the whole year.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mrs. Fairclough, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, in the earlier part of my speech in this debate last Wednesday I referred to the rapid growth in recent years of western Canada's oil and gas industry, and to its importance in creating jobs for Canadians. Today this industry is directly and indirectly supporting some half a million Canadians, of whom about 300,000 are in the west. Continued growth of the industry—which is inevitable provided there is the incentive of expanded markets on an economic basis for its oil and gas—could rapidly expand the number of Canadian jobs and the number of Canadian families supported by this industry. Many thousands of additional jobs could, in fact, be created in Canada over the next few months by the natural gas phase of the oil industry if this government would remove the shackles of political expediency with which it has tightly bound up this resource.

Only one man in Canada, namely the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), has been in the position of power to wrap the shackles around gas. He is today perhaps the only man in Canada with sufficient power and influence to tear off the shackles. Under the circumstances, I must attach to him the credit, if credit it be, for the gas mess the nation is in today and the credit, if credit it be, for the disappearance of the thousands of jobs that so many Canadians had counted on to start in 1955. These gas shackles I will therefore label "Howe's folly", in doubtful tribute to a man whose many real and great contributions to Canada must now be somewhat dimmed by the unrealistic thinking that produced his natural gas policy.

That does not mean that "Howe's folly" will not create any new jobs in Canada this year. It could, for example, put a stenographer or two to work preparing dismissal notices for a considerable number of western Canadians working for companies with shut-in gas reserves, or on drilling rigs that need no longer be kept at work drilling more gas wells to join the hundreds already shut in. These notices might read: "Gas jobs cancelled by Howe's folly. Glory be to nationalism and Howe". We can also put some sign painters to work painting signs to decorate several score idle gas fields in western Canada. Some of these signs, to be different, might read: "This gas field is graciously permitted to remain shut in, by authority of the Canadian government, in order that it may have the privilege some day, some way, of serving the nation".

Then of course we shall need signs for the information of job seekers who have been looking forward to starting work this spring building gas gathering and transmission pipe lines from Alberta to Winnipeg and southward; who have been looking forward to building distribution systems in Moose Jaw, Regina, Brandon, Winnipeg and other western communities; to building some more eastern Canadian transmission pipe lines in southern Ontario and perhaps also through to Montreal and Ottawa; and to expanding gas distribution systems in many southern Ontario and Quebec communities. Those signs might be for the information of the host of Canadians who had looked forward to new jobs in the manufacture of line pipe, or in the manufacture, transport, sale or installation of gas furnaces, stoves, water heaters and other appliances. These signs could keep a few painters working, for there are a great many national employment service, utility, contractors' and manufacturers' offices where the signs might be hung. These signs might read: "Howe's folly still in; jobs still out—but give thanks for unemployment insurance".

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it may still be possible to get gas and jobs unshackled this spring. Maybe the Minister of Trade and Commerce will suddenly see the light, and apply to gas the same realistic and sound thinking he has previously applied to many other Canadian problems. Maybe the members of his cabinet who in recent weeks successfully resisted his demand that an all-Canadian pipe line be built with backing of the Canadian taxpayer will now persuade the government to put gas in its proper light, and regard it as simply one of several competing fuels, in increasingly surplus supply, and desperately needing freedom to market in an economic way; and that means yanking down the barriers erected by Canada at the international border to its south.

Mr. Prudham: You are more interested in American jobs.

Mr. Nickle: Because maintenance of present jobs is important to Canada and creation of more new jobs is even more important, I hope the minister and/or his colleagues will act quickly enough to beat the fast approaching deadline beyond which no project can be started this year. As of now, there are only a few days left. After that? Oh well, the 1956 construction program is only a year away and maybe job-hungry Canadians will not mind waiting.

But in fairness to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) I should like to explain what I mean by "Howe's folly", as well as outline what can be done to replace folly with common sense. To do that, let me first quote from the speech made in Dallas, Texas, last night by an outstanding Canadian, Arnold Heeney, our ambassador to the United States. I presume Mr. Heeney spoke officially for the government. Mr. Heeney had this to say in Texas last night with reference to oil and gas:

> But when full provision has been made for Canada's own foreseeable requirements, we will still have large surpluses of those two energy resources. It is our hope that they can be exported to the United States and used to fill such shortages as are apparent or may develop in this country. Here, as so often, wide scope would seem to be left for profitable co-operation between the two countries even after each government has given first consideration to the needs of its own citizens.
> From time to time we in Canada have been disturbed by doctrines expressed in the United States which, if applied in full rigour, would seem to make such sensible co-operation impossible. In addition to the difficulties we have been encountering for some time with regard to natural gas, we have been disturbed by recent efforts to restrict imports of crude oil into the United States.

That is one quotation from the speech last night by Canada's ambassador to the United States, a speech delivered, I presume, with the full approval of the government and expressing the government's policy. May I say that I fully agree with the conclusion of Mr. Heeney, which I presume is now shared by the government, that Canada will still have large surpluses of both gas and oil over and above Canada's needs which will have to find markets in the United States. In general, this government has fully recognized that fact in regard to oil and has thus permitted oil pipe lines and market planning on economic, international lines. But unfortunately its whole policy on gas has been based not on recognition of surplus but on fear of shortage, not on international co-operation but on denial of economic sense in favour of nationalism.

There was one statement made by our ambassador to the United States in Texas last night which I am sure many people in that country will find, as I do, closely resembles a three dollar bill because it is just as phony as a three dollar bill would be. That is the argument contained in these words in Mr. Heeney's speech:

> From time to time we in Canada have been disturbed by doctrines expressed in the United States which, if applied in full rigour, would seem to make such sensible co-operation impossible.

He referred directly to the problems related to the marketing of Canadian natural gas. Our problems having to do with the marketing of Canadian natural gas are in no way due to conditions created in the United States. They are 100 per cent due to the policy of the government in placing artificial restrictions upon the movement of gas on economic lines and the policy of the government to completely disregard economic factors in planning for the marketing of Canada's surplus gas.

Just as will the Americans who are going to digest Mr. Heeney's speech, I should like to point out in what way the government of Canada and those in charge of things in the United States have acted on this general principle of co-operation between nations in regard to gas and oil. In 1952 the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement in the house in reply to a speech by me in which he stated conclusively that based upon his findings co-operation between the United States and Canada in matters related to natural gas was not possible. A few months later, in October, 1953, the federal power commission of the United States offered a supply of gas for a long-term period to the city of Toronto. It took six months, until March, 1954, for the federal government to finally decide that the offer of American gas for Toronto made common sense and would best serve the interests of this country.

Then we find the argument expressed so often on both sides of the house that we cannot trust the Yankees to allow a Canadian pipe line between Canadian gas fields and Canadian markets to pass over United States soil. We find that as a result of that policy of the government the federal power commission in Washington decided in June, 1954, against allowing Canadian gas to serve the northwestern United States, a market without which no pipe line would be possible to service the needs of British Columbia. Why did the federal power commission of the United States turn down Canadian gas? For one reason. They turned it down because of the policy of the government in refusing to give the United States security of either supply or price. In effect we were asking United States consumers, through their federal power commission, to accept Canadian gas offered by us with one hand with at the same time the Canadian government holding a meat cleaver in the other hand to chop off the hand of any Yankee who reached out for that Canadian gas. We reserved the right, without even a public hearing, to cut off the flow of gas at any time, to curtail it, or to impose a prohibitive export tax.

After all the damage was done the government finally saw the light. Two years after I called this matter to the attention of the house and the government, the government introduced amendments to the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act last month which finally removed the barriers to common-sense arrangements for the sale of gas to the United States offering security of supply and price to the American consumer which had been responsible for the loss of the northwest Pacific market. We come now to recent months and we find the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines project which, on the basis of a great deal of information available to the government from a great many sources, was not economically sound, a project which the government, on the basis of the information it had in its possession two years ago and supplemented last year, was a project that would have to be subsidized by the Canadian taxpayers and its bonds guaranteed by the Canadian taxpayers in order to make the project feasible.

All those facts were disregarded, the Stanford survey, the three Bechtel surveys, the conclusions of the gas utility companies of eastern Canada and several other surveys, including one made for the Ontario government a year ago, all of which condemned an all-Canadian pipe line as uneconomic. It was recognized by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines itself that access to the middle western United States market was vital to the economic success of any pipe line from Alberta. So what happened? With the full knowledge of the government months ago that the project was not sound, Trans-Canada went before the federal power commission in Washington to ask permission to enter the Minneapolis market. Under the rules of that commission, sound rules based upon proof of the economic soundness of any project, based upon proof of gas reserves and so forth, the federal power commission should have thrown out holus-bolus Trans-Canada's application last month because Trans-Canada had neither the gas to sell nor places to sell it in eastern Canada. They had no contracts, nor did they have the finances with which to build the line. What did the United States federal power commission, which according to the statement of opinion expressed by Mr. Heeney on behalf of this government was opposed to Canadian gas, do? They did not throw out the application. They said that they are not going to throw out the Trans-Canada application for the import of gas into Minneapolis. They believed that to do so would sound the death knell of the Trans-Canada project to the possible economic detriment of both Canada and the United States. In other words, the United States federal power commission, with a far greater knowledge of oil and gas matters I am afraid than is evidenced by this government in Ottawa, kept this project alive in the hope that Canada would use common sense and allow the gas to be marketed in an economic way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we then come to Mr. Heeney's speech of last night, and against that we must weigh another statement made by this government last Friday and Saturday, which is reported in a number of newspapers in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member embarks upon quoting again from the statement, perhaps he would care to be informed that his time has elapsed.

Mr. Nickle: I appreciate that my time has run out. I might say that during last Wednesday's portion of this address approximately half of my time was taken up by interruptions. I would appreciate it if the house would give me its permission to carry on for a few more minutes to complete this statement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Philpott: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would the hon. member say that the decision of the federal power commission was designed to make sure of getting enough gas for the United States or was it designed to prevent Canada from building a pipe line where Canada wants to build it?

Mr. Nickle: No, the decision of the United States federal power commission was based upon the recognition that the mutual interests of both Canada and the United States would be served by a little greater degree of co-operation on gas than this government has seen fit to allow.

Mr. Prudham: May I be permitted to ask the hon. member a question?

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. Speaker: May I point out that the hon. member's time has expired, and if unanimous consent is not given he cannot continue. If before that question is decided hon. members ask questions, naturally he will have to answer them. We are not in committee. I do not think that the hon. member can say that half of his time was taken up by interruptions. I have before me pages 2324 and 2325 of Hansard for March 23, 1955.

Mr. Nickle: Well, about ten minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. McIvor: I should like permission to ask the hon. member who has just taken his seat a question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ferguson: There would be no more sense to it than we get from this government.

Mr. McIvor: I was going to ask the hon. member what the Alberta government, which is making millions out of oil, is going to do to make the construction of a Canadian pipe line possible?

Mr. Nickle: I should like to answer that question because I believe it is one of the most important questions asked in this house on this subject for a long time. I am going to answer it this way. I have heard the so-called oil millionaires in the west charged with killing the trans-Canada project. Let me answer it this way. The price of gas in Toronto, that is the average price at which gas will be sold in the 1955-56 season, is $2.64 per thousand feet. Out of that the Canadian government will collect in income tax about 22 cents a thousand feet. Out of it also the municipal, provincial and federal governments will collect another 20 cents per thousand feet in other forms of tax. Out of that $2.64 per thousand feet, which is the average cost of gas to the consumer in Toronto, the producers who bear all the risks of exploration and the Alberta government which owns these oil resources will actually share five cents per thousand feet or 2 per cent of the price the consumers in Toronto will pay.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we had butter sold at $1 per pound in Toronto, I am sure the butter producers would set up a merry old fuss if they were asked to accept 2 per cent of the official price of that product. I am sure that if this government is satisfied it is entitled to 22 cents out of that price of $2.64, then the producer and the government of Alberta are entitled to more than one-quarter of what the federal government may collect in income taxes for doing nothing toward the exploration and development of gas in Canada.

Mr. Ferguson: They have collected all their taxes for doing nothing.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): As the current debate on unemployment progresses, it becomes more and more evident that this government has no policy whatever for dealing with this very important problem. As a matter of fact, as more and more statistics become available as to the magnitude of the unemployment problem, and as statistics become available regarding the continuous drop in farm income, it is becoming evident that this is a depression government led by an indifferent Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). It is a depression government because over 600,000 persons in Canada are out of work and have no visible means of livelihood. When one adds to the list of unemployed those who are dependent upon the unemployed, their children and their wives, it is clear that at least a million, if not more, Canadians have little or no income.

I am amazed that the Prime Minister has not entered this debate long ago and presented the policy of the government of Canada for dealing with this most important current problem. Instead, we had speeches from two cabinet ministers on the first day of the debate, almost a month ago. Even though the unemployment situation has become progressively worse, the government is silent. So far as dealing with unemployment is concerned apparently the Prime Minister is on strike. He is sitting it out. He is not entering this debate, as I believe he should, to place before parliament and the people of the country the policy of the government for dealing with this most important problem. When asked in the house if the matter of unemployment would be a subject for discussion at the coming dominion-provincial conference, the Prime Minister replied that he would be greatly surprised if that question was not discussed while the provincial premiers were here.

Instead of saying that he would be surprised if the question were not discussed, the Prime Minister should have given this nation some leadership by outlining in parliament the proposals his government was prepared to make to the coming dominion-provincial conference. This is a far cry from the attitude of the government 10 years ago when it faced a similar dominion-provincial conference and it brought out its voluminous green book proposals. There was no question then as to the policy of the government. Its proposals were clear, and all could see them. This time the government is saying nothing. The Prime Minister is not even telling the country whether or not he is prepared to place the subject of unemployment high on the agenda of the coming dominion-provincial conference. A statement that the Prime Minister and the government are not prepared to set forth a program to deal with unemployment shows me that the government and the Prime Minister have abdicated the role of leadership.

Mr. Martin: Why don't you read the exact words of the Prime Minister and not give your own interpretation, which is wrong.

Mr. Argue: There goes the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) again. I quoted the Prime Minister's exact words, and I would be very happy to have—

Mr. Martin: The Prime Minister—and I hope I have the hon. member's permission to interrupt—

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Martin: The Prime Minister did not say what my hon. friend is now paraphrasing as to what he did say.

Mr. Argue: The Prime Minister said that he would be greatly surprised if that question was not discussed while they were here.

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Argue: And that is exactly what I said he said.

Mr. Martin: No. My hon. friend said that the Prime Minister was not prepared to discuss this question. Now, the Prime Minister never said that.

Mr. Argue: I never said what the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said I said. But I would suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as one of the frontbenchers of the cabinet, and as a minister of the crown, that he stand up in this debate now and say what the government—his government—is prepared to do about unemployment. Instead of that, what does he do? He interrupts, that is all. He interrupts opposition members when they are trying to get some action out of the government. I will quote what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. Martin: That is better.

Mr. Argue: On March 10, in answer to a question asked by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), he said this—and perhaps I had better read the question. It is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if, in view of the fact that this preliminary conference is taking place in April, he will consider the suggestion I made earlier, namely that this opportunity be taken to discuss the unemployment situation and the manner in which the federal government and the provincial governments can best co-operate to meet those problems which are in their own fields.

And the Prime Minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I should be greatly surprised if that question was not discussed while they are here.

Mr. Martin: Is that not what I said?

Mr. Argue: The record will speak for itself, that that is precisely and exactly what I said, when I was quoting the Prime Minister's remarks originally. And I would like to ask —I would challenge—the Minister of National Health and Welfare to tell parliament and the country what his government is prepared to do to solve the unemployment problem. And the unemployment problem is a pretty important thing in the minister's own city of Windsor. I am sure the constituents of the minister would like to know what plans the government has, if any. But all I can tell—

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: All I can tell him—

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask a question, a very important question?

Mr. Argue: The answer is no. No, not at all. I know Mr. Speaker has a clock, and when 40 minutes have gone I will have to take my seat.

Mr. Martin: The record will show that you refused to face this problem, just as you have accused the government of refusing to face it.

Mr. Knowles: Let the minister make his own speech next.

Mr. Argue: There is a fine admission, when the minister admits that he himself will not face this problem.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Argue: He makes these interjections, and that is all the statement the minister makes. And, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin: On a point of order. The Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Mr. Argue: No, no.

Mr. Martin: It is a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend ought to have patience, and he should not get unduly excited.

Mr. Argue: Is that your point of order?

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Martin: I rise to say that the hon. member, when he said that we were not facing this question on this side of the house, and when he said he was quoting the words of the Prime Minister in support of that, was inaccurately quoting what the Prime Minister had said. Then he himself later correctly quoted what the Prime Minister had said, by referring to the willingness and the desire of the Prime Minister to face this important question. And I might tell my hon. friend—

Mr. Knowles: Now who is misinterpreting?

Mr. Martin: And I might tell my hon. friend that there is no one in this country who is more anxious to deal with this problem than the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Why doesn't he do it, then?

Mr. Argue: That is the contribution that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is prepared to make to solve the unemployment problem: Leave it to Uncle Louie; he is a great man, and somehow or another something will happen to take care of this situation.

I issue a challenge to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take his place in this debate and tell the people of Windsor what he is prepared to do to help solve unemployment.

Mr. Martin: Will you be here when I speak?

Mr. Argue: But he prefers to rise and chisel in on my time. Let him speak. He can have his 40 minutes—and I think he will need all of them to explain why the government has not done something long ago to meet this very desperate problem. But instead of a minister of the government leading the fight to solve the problem of unemployment, they have retreated to the swamp of unemployment, with all the human misery and degradation that attaches to a situation when there are 600,000 unemployed.

And I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he has read the contribution made by a gentleman by the name of Duncan K. MacTavish, O.B.E., Q.C., president of the national Liberal federation, yesterday in Ottawa, when he charged that opposition parties are conducting a deliberate campaign to undermine the economy of the country. I would like to know if the Minister of National Health and Welfare agrees with that statement, and with his—

Mr. Martin: You ask me?

Mr. Argue: —further statement, when he says:

> The prophets of gloom—

Just listen to this.

> The prophets of gloom reported the fact that unemployment was up but not the encouraging fact that employment is also increasing.

You ask the 600,000 who are unemployed whether—

Mr. Martin: Are you asking me?

Mr. Argue: —it is any help to them if there is going to be one more on the employment rolls next year, and we shall be happy to listen, and without interruption, to a 40-minute speech by the Minister of National Health and Welfare explaining his position on the statement.

Mr. Martin: I have.

Mr. Argue: And Mr. MacTavish goes on to say:

> Mischievous little boys who play with fire and cause public damage can be punished, but mischief committed in the guise of free speech which results in serious damage to the common welfare escapes the punishment it deserves.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that such a statement is an affront to parliament. It is an insult to members of parliament. And that statement, made by no less a person than the national president of the Liberal federation, should be repudiated by the Prime Minister of this country.

Talk about the Liberal party being on a one-way track to the one-party state. According to the national president of the Liberal federation he would like to punish the opposition members for daring to suggest that this is not an all-beneficent government, and that this is not the greatest government anywhere in the world.

Mr. Ferguson: He was speaking for the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin: When was the speech delivered?

Mr. Argue: It was delivered in Ottawa, and I will send it across to the Minister of National Health and Welfare after I have concluded my speech, so that he will have it when he makes his contribution.

Mr. Martin: I will be very glad to have it.

Mr. Argue: But I say again, Mr. Speaker, that this is further evidence of the attitude of the Liberal party. It is bad enough that we have to deal with statements of policy by the Liberal party and the Liberal government when made in this house. But now, apparently, we are going to have to deal with more persons making statements outside the house, reflecting on the proceedings of parliament.

I say that that is a statement that will not be forgotten in Canada for many months, and perhaps for many years to come. And I should like the Minister of National Health and Welfare—and again I challenge him—to stand up in this house and tell us not only what he and the government are going to do about unemployment, but whether he agrees with the statements I have quoted, as made by the national president of the Liberal federation of Canada.

Not only does the government offer no solution for the employment problem; now we are being subjected to insult, and the people of Canada who are unemployed are being subjected to this abusive treatment. I have heard it suggested that in this debate the C.C.F. members are conducting something of a filibuster. Well, I suggest that is a much better attitude than the attitude taken by the government, which is to say nothing, fold their arms and hope something will happen to relieve the unemployment situation.

We had two contributions by cabinet ministers. We had the contribution of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), which was a kind of academic discussion as to whether one set of figures issued by his department was more reliable in interpreting the exact unemployment situation, or whether the other set of figures was more reliable. But in the long speech of the Minister of Labour there was not one sentence on the government's policy to relieve this critical and terrible situation in Canada. There was some very amazing information given in that speech. The minister told us that there were 543,000 applicants for unemployment insurance in January, and that 450,400 persons were receiving unemployment insurance in January, amounting to $28,400,000 in total. What does that mean by way of income to those persons and those families who have to exist on unemployment insurance and unemployment insurance alone?

Let us assume that each person receiving unemployment insurance has just one dependent and does not have a whole family that has to live on the small unemployment insurance payment. Let us assume that each person's unemployment insurance payment has to maintain only two persons. What does the payment amount to? It amounts to $31 each for the month of January; in other words, $1 a day. I tell the Minister of Labour that that kind of a program for the unemployed is a disgrace to Canada; it is a disgrace to the government. A dollar a day is not very much better than the treatment in the 1930's when the young men of Canada were sent to work camps and given a few meals a day and 20 cents. A dollar a day at home with which they have to provide their own meals is not much better than the treatment of the unemployed in the 1930's.

The government now says, wait and see. Maybe spring will do something, and the president of the Liberal federation insults the opposition members who are continually endeavouring to get this government to do something about the horrible situation that prevails in all of Canada. Read the unemployment statistics of almost any city in the country and you will see that the unemployment problem has created and is creating an unbearable burden on the financial resources of the municipalities involved.

Over the week end I had the privilege of speaking to an alderman from the city of Toronto. He said that over a week end he often gets as many as 50 telephone calls from persons who have no income at all and do not know where they are to get enough money to buy the next meal. I read a report in the Toronto Daily Star of March 26. The articles reported in that paper generally reflect credit on the government. Certainly, it is not an organ of any opposition group. Yet, it reported something that casts a very serious reflection on the adequacy of the legislation implemented so far by this government. I refer to the report headed:

2,552 jobless in city find there's no way to get financial aid.

It says:

According to Reverend J. F. Culnan, director of the Catholic welfare bureau, cases of hardship, want and suffering—where in some instances whole families with several children have been required to live on as little as $9 a week—have been common in Toronto since unemployment worsened in December.

"Generally speaking, a person who is old or sick in Canada can count on being taken care of," said Father Culnan. "But if a person who is unemployed is able-bodied and ready to work—in other words, if he or she is employable—there is no agency to assist such a person when his or her funds disappear and still no work has been found."

Some specific examples are given of unemployed families. I shall refer to only one.

Case 2: A landscape gardener with six children, from 12 to 5 years, who lives near Spadina avenue. Up to now he always had a job during slack season. This winter he pounded on doors—no luck. The family has two rooms and a hall entrance with rent at $19 a week. His work has never brought him within the unemployment insurance bracket. He is not eligible for D.V.A. or city relief. The family has got some assistance from the Catholic welfare bureau but there is not enough money to buy food.

I ask the government what it intends to do to provide employment for a man in that situation? There are 600,000 unemployed in Canada. There are all kinds of people who are undernourished, but still there are huge agricultural surpluses. We need more schools, more hospitals and more civic buildings. We need irrigation projects; we need public works of all kinds. The government does nothing. Many people are suffering from malnutrition. The best that the Minister of National Health and Welfare can do is to interrupt on minor points of no significance. We heard from two cabinet ministers, but not a word on what the government is going to do about the unemployment situation.

We had an amazing statement read to the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I should like to refer this paragraph to the gentleman who holds an office in the national Liberal federation, to whom I have already referred. I refer him to a paragraph of the minister's speech at page 1630 of Hansard, in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce lists the factors that led to unemployment in 1954. His first statement is as follows:

This levelling off in productive activity was a result of certain new influences which began to affect the market situation in the latter part of 1953 and early 1954. Hon. members are no doubt aware of most of the difficulties encountered—a general business let-down in United States—

They used to call it a depression. That became a bad word; you should not use it; it might cause a depression. Therefore, when you are in a depression do not use the word; say "recession". Well, that became a bad word also, and they dropped it. Now it is a let-down. The next time it will be a turndown. Somebody says behind me an adjustment. They will use a lot of words, but as the significance of each word becomes known to the Canadian people, then they will change the word and use another. The minister went on: the trouble in 1954 was caused by a general let-down of business in the United States. He continued:

—a consequent decline during 1954 in Canadian exports to that market; reduced incomes of grain producers—

I wonder who is talking blue ruin now? These are all the things that happen when you are in a depression; a general business let-down, a drop in exports and reduced incomes of grain producers. The minister continued:

—and the effects of this on sales of farm equipment and other manufactured goods; reduced procurement in 1954 of defence goods—

In other words, less armaments, more unemployment, the thing that the C.C.F. says always happens when a Liberal government is in office.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Knowles: The government will be reading MacTavish out of the party.

Mr. Martin: Don't interrupt.

Mr. Argue: The minister continued:

—a tendency during 1954 for businesses to meet orders from inventories rather than new production;—

In other words, to use surpluses in hand instead of producing more. That is what I take that sentence to mean. The minister went on:

—and, finally, intensification of international competition in manufactured goods which presented new difficulties to some manufacturing industries, in foreign and also in domestic markets.

This government loves competition, and as soon as their free enterprise friends find a little international competition, what is the result? Unemployment at home and a statement from the Minister of Trade and Commerce listing all of the reasons for this dreadful situation in 1954. How does the minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) summarize somewhat later that very realistic statement that he himself has made? Listen to this; a real gem—two pages later, 1633, same speech, same minister—

Mr. Knowles: Same time, same station.

An hon. Member: Dragnet.

Mr. Argue: The minister said:

I do not want to claim that the economic policies which were followed were solely or mainly responsible for the reasonably good showing in 1954.

In one breath he tells us we are in a terrible position and he says next that it was a reasonably good showing. Half a million unemployed and the Minister of Trade and Commerce says it is a reasonably good showing. That was his contribution to the debate. He said nothing at all as to government policies. He gave us a review of past history while the situation grew steadily worse.

Then I shall have to again paraphrase this statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). He said in his Reform Club speech, "If my government cannot solve the unemployment problem, then the public of Canada should turn us out of office as being incompetent". That is cold comfort to the unemployed. The people of Canada will have to wait until there is another election in order to do something about it. That is not good enough. This government has accepted the responsibility of office given to them in a democratic manner by the Canadian public and given to them on a platform of full employment and jobs for all. The Liberal party has electioneered on the same platform in 1945, 1949 and 1953; full employment.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) shakes his head in the negative. That is a fine attitude for the minister to take.

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Argue: No, I shall not permit the minister a question.

Mr. Martin: Then you do not believe in the democratic procedure of free speech.

Mr. Argue: Well now, I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to resume his seat.

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Argue: The answer is no. When I outlined the statement made by the Liberal party election after election, a belief in full employment and a campaign program of jobs for all, the Minister of National Health and Welfare shook his head in the negative. Well he might shake his head in the negative; well he might.

Mr. Martin: You are afraid to let me put a question to you.

Mr. Argue: When the former minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, and the same Prime Minister said that the government did not agree to implement its policy of full employment even if all of the provinces agreed to sign the dominion-provincial tax agreements, still we believed that the federal government's attitude toward full employment as outlined in its proposals in 1945 still held good until January 17 when the Prime Minister rose in this house and told us in no uncertain terms that the government had completely abandoned those concepts of full employment that would be brought about by the dominion-provincial agreements—

Mr. Martin: You are wrong again. You are misquoting the Prime Minister apparently deliberately. Apparently you are misquoting him deliberately.

Mr. Argue: I would ask whether such a remark is parliamentary—

Mr. Martin: You read his remarks and see how far off you are.

Mr. Argue: If it is in the rules of the house, all well and good; but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that I was deliberately misquoting the Prime Minister should be withdrawn.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not impute any motive to my hon. friend, notwithstanding the fact that he would not let me put a reasonable question. But what I meant by referring to that was that my hon. friend surely must know that he is not quoting the Prime Minister accurately when he makes the statement which he has just made.

Mr. Argue: I will accept the minister's apology and his amended statement. I was not quoting the Prime Minister at all. I was saying that the Prime Minister's statement made in this house on January 17 showed conclusively that the government of which he is the Prime Minister had abandoned its concept of full employment and the concept of the dominion-provincial tax agreements as laid down by the 1945 proposals.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend is full of confusion today.

Mr. Argue: I still challenge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to make his own speech; I do not think he will—

Mr. Martin: I will surprise you.

Mr. Argue: —because he has no answer; there is no answer.

Mr. Martin: There is no answer?

Mr. Argue: There has been no answer from the government for one month, just silence. The Prime Minister is out on strike. He is sitting in the bleachers because he does not have a policy to deal with the unemployment problem.

The reason I say the government has abandoned its taxation agreement is because of this unilateral move to reduce the income tax paid by taxpayers in a certain province in this country which does not happen to be under the income tax agreements. I suggest that was a retrograde step, no matter whether a reduction had been made in the province in which it was made or in the province of Ontario or of Saskatchewan. When such a reduction is made it is a temptetion to the government of Ontario, for example, to suggest that on the basis of the same taxes levied in the province of Quebec, it would be as much as $34 million financially better off outside the agreement, and is a temptation to some other provinces to get out of the tax agreements, agreements which the government has always said were necessary to provide it with the fiscal strength with which to deal with unemployment.

Suppose the government, as a method of dealing with unemployment, should decide to reduce income tax in order to stimulate purchasing power. If provinces are outside the tax agreement they then have the right under the constitution to increase their own tax by the amount of the reduction made by the federal government in income tax and thus thwart the move by the federal government to provide by this means a stimulus to unemployment.

Mr. Martin: My, my.

Mr. Argue: And if it should be suggested that the people in the province of Quebec are pleased and jubilant over this carrot on the stick offer, I should like to quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 15 which reports statements made at the Quebec federation of industrial trade unions by the director, Mr. Romeo Mathieu. In that statement he said that the proposals were not a solution and he attacked them on the ground that they were, first, unilateral; second, that they were not squaring with the cyclical ideas of fiscal arrangements; third, they were an injustice to the province of Quebec; and fourth, a hindrance to national unity.

The C.C.F. party was quite prepared that provincial income tax be fully deductible up to the amount of the grant offered to the provinces, provided the provinces would agree to return any surplus collected; but the government did not follow that avenue; instead it reduced the income tax of taxpayers in a certain province. That move made by the federal government has created two classes of income taxpayers in Canada, one paying the full rate and one paying the 90 per cent rate. When you divide Canada as this government has done into two classes of taxpaying Canadians you have directed a blow at the very foundation of national unity in this country. If we are to have national unity in this country, let us have equal taxation treatment for all taxpayers by this government and let us not have a reduction in income tax payments made by the taxpayers in one province, no matter which province it may be, and the full rate or some other rate applied to taxpayers in the other provinces.

Mr. Benidickson: If you are interested in employment, why do you not get back to the subject?

Mr. Argue: That is exactly on the subject. A former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley; another former minister of finance, Mr. Abbott; a former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King and this Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who was minister of justice in 1944 and who put before the dominion-provincial conference the views of the government of the day, said that for the government to deal with full employment or to maintain full employment, they had to have adequate fiscal powers that could be obtained only by dominion-provincial tax agreements. Now the federal government has turned its back on the tax agreements, it has turned its back on full employment and it has betrayed the best interests of the people of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): I must confess it is easy for opposition members to attack the government on this important unemployment problem, and to saddle it with the responsibility in this regard. Still it must be admitted that criticism has been made all too easy, first by the seriousness of the situation, a situation steadily growing worse to the point where, at this time, there are 600,000 unemployed, an impressive figure, and second, by the failure of the government to take action. It has been content to adopt a defensive attitude, making no attempt at any useful action.

I have listened closely to the speeches made by members on both sides of the house. Moreover, I have been reading the newspapers in order to ascertain the reaction of the people of this country to the course taken by the debate in this house and to the attitude of the government. It is obvious that the general feeling can be expressed as follows: The government seems far more concerned with warding off attacks than with taking any positive action in order to solve this unemployment problem.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) was saying last week that, with fewer speeches on the subject, the government would now be at the stage where it would be voting money for the solution of the unemployment problem. But the hon. member forgets that, while the government has had a whole year to look for a solution, it has procrastinated, and put us off, by saying that any unemployment was merely seasonal and regional. The Canadian people, in fact, feel that the government have been putting them off with fine words, on this unfortunate matter. For a year now the government has been claiming that unemployment was merely seasonal or regional and was only an adjustment in the economic situation. Nevertheless the number of jobless has gone on increasing. It has now reached 600,000, an impressive figure, in one of the richest countries in the world.

It is an easy thing to fiddle around with words. One could, of course, say with the government that we have seasonal unemployment for we have it in all seasons; one could also admit that we have local unemployment since it is acute in every locality. But that would only add to the torrent of words that we have already heard while 600,000 unemployed are looking for work. Will the needy unemployed find comfort in the thought that their unemployment is seasonal?

What would the government say if unemployment were to bring about its downfall at the next elections and if, by way of comfort, it was told by the electorate not to worry about it because it would be merely a seasonal defeat?

By way of rebuttal, the government insist that members of the opposition are pessimistic. Words again! How indeed can you be optimistic when there are 600,000 unemployed in a country as rich as ours? More eager to free itself than to act, the government thought it would find another way out, in shifting part of its responsibilities onto the provinces.

The solution looks fine, but what real relief does it bring to the unemployed? Whether or not the provinces have any responsibility as far as unemployment is concerned, they will say to the government: "You have taken over our sources of revenue, do not give us the responsibilities."

It seems to me that the Canadian people should not look too much to the federal-provincial conference for the solution to a problem such as unemployment. The provinces will say to the government: you take 77 cents of each tax dollar; give us back our powers and we will look after our responsibilities.

All sorts of things have been mentioned as unemployment causes, but there is one consideration which should prevail. It is that, whether or not the government is more or less responsible for unemployment causes, it has the responsibility of organizing our economy in such a way as to create employment for everybody, the more so in our country, with all its wealth. I think that as soon as it became evident that unemployment was increasing the government should have added to the number of trade commissioners posted in every country in the world. Thus, by adding one small order to the other in each country, an imposing volume of exports could have been reached, as it is a well-known fact that one of the main reasons for unemployment is found in sluggish exports, for in Canada we do not lack producers, but consumers. It could therefore be said that if our consumption were increased our unemployment problem would be settled.

As I say, there should be reductions in taxation, for they would result in a higher purchasing power on the part of Canadian taxpayers who would thus be able to absorb our surplus of consumer goods.

The government is trying to hedge. Yet, during the war, those that were called heroes did not confer for months on end, and look for an excuse, before going over the top. They accomplished brave deeds and gave us our most splendid victories, because they understood the gravity of our position at a glance and felt the necessity to act. That is why they got results. If the government, instead of remaining on the defensive, instead of hedging, had tackled the problem forthwith there would be no unemployment, to my mind, and there would be no need to talk about provincial responsibilities with regard to this issue, or about the gloomy outlook of the opposition, and so on.

I think there has also been a suggestion to carry out public works in order to fight unemployment. This would obviously not lead to any final solution, but might lessen the gravity of the issue at hand. That is why I would like to take this opportunity to point out to the house some public works which, I think, might be undertaken in my county, and would contribute to the settlement of the unemployment problem.

The people of my county, being mainly workers, are much more affected than others by the present serious unemployment situation. I should now like to call the attention of the government to the problem of level crossings in the city of Arvida. This city, which is becoming increasingly populous as a result of intense industrial development, now has to cope with considerable mid-town traffic problems which constitute a public hazard. That is why I urge the government to include in its budget the funds required for the elimination of level crossings in the city of Arvida.

I should also like to recall to the government once more, as has been done on several occasions in the past, that the city of Jonquiere is in urgent need of a retaining wall on the bank of the river Aux Sables, which is used for logging operations and whose erosion threatens both banks in the centre of the city.

There are also other public works which I should urge the government to carry out in the eastern part of my constituency. I refer to the Saguenay river at Ste. Anne de Chicoutimi where, for a long time, a retaining wall has been requested.

In closing, I should like to remind the government once again of the necessity to build the Chibougamau trunk-line, the construction of which is increasingly urgent. It would have the extraordinary advantage of solving the unemployment problem for good, not only for a time, as it would give to a district which is entitled to it the railway upon which its future development depends.

[Mr. Girard.]

(Text):

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak a second time in this debate for one reason and one reason only, to protest vigorously against the casual and disinterested attitude the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has adopted towards the No. 1 problem facing the country today, namely, unemployment. When things are going well the Prime Minister travels all around the country making speeches and telling the people what a smart government he has and how well they are running the country; but when things are going badly, as they are today, the Prime Minister cannot be coaxed to his feet. He is strangely silent. He has been asked on numerous occasions to express the government's attitude on this problem and to outline the government's plan. He has even been taunted to do so, but he steadfastly refuses.

To me it is unbelievable that the leader of the government refuses at a time like this to take part in the debate on the most important problem faced by the country. Yet that is the case today. A few moments ago the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) assured us—and I jotted down his words—that there is no one more anxious than the Prime Minister to solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: All right. If the Prime Minister is so anxious to solve the problem, then why in the world does he not do something about it? Why did he not a long time ago, as he was urged to do by the opposition—the opposition upon whom the president of the Liberal federation looks with such condescension—call an immediate conference with the provinces to discuss how relief costs can best be shared and how increased public works can be put into operation to provide jobs? But the Prime Minister flatly refuses to take that step. Second, why does he not rise in his place and outline to parliament and to the country the long-range plan which the government has for correcting the conditions that lead to increasing seasonal unemployment every year and to a great deal of permanent unemployment that is also increasing year by year.

If the Prime Minister is so anxious to do something about unemployment, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare has assured us he is, why does he not prove it?

Why does he remain so silent? That is something the people of Canada want to know. I think if he and the president of the Liberal federation would spend a little more time listening to this debate, they would learn something about the problems faced by the unemployed people today. I also suggest to members of the cabinet that if they would spend less time in their oak-panelled offices and would go to the cities and towns where unemployment is a problem today, they would learn firsthand some of the problems being faced by Canadians who are undergoing very serious conditions at this time.

As has been outlined in the house earlier, in cities like Toronto, men are having to leave their families so that their families can get relief. That is a fine state of affairs. Yet the Prime Minister does not deign to stand up and outline a policy to meet the problem. As I said, when things are going well, the Prime Minister is only too glad to make speeches. He made one in Quebec city on September 18 last which I do not need to paraphrase because I have his exact words here. At page 25 of a copy of his speech issued by his office I find the following:

> In a country such as ours, there should be work for everybody. If we cannot manage the national economy in such a way that there is work for everybody, then we are incompetent.

Today, Mr. Speaker, there are more than 600,000 unemployed Canadians who are living proof that the Prime Minister and the government are incompetent. When you have, not only a government that is incompetent, but also the admission by its leader in his own words, not mine, that it is incompetent, then there is only one honourable alternative for that government to adopt, and that is to resign.

It is obvious, and has been for a long time, that the only way a solution for the immediate problem of no jobs and no unemployment insurance benefits for thousands of Canadians today can be found is to call an immediate conference with the provinces to work out how relief costs can be shared and public works can be increased to provide jobs.

A later conference, the agenda of which will be settled on April 26, should deal with a long-range plan to create conditions within the country which will attract the establishment of additional secondary industry in Canada, to process far more of our primary products than we do today. This is the best potential means we have available to us of providing jobs on a permanent and productive basis.

In the meantime, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) can do two things which will materially increase jobs for all Canadians. First of all, when he brings his budget down next Tuesday night, he should reduce the high commodity taxes that are adding so much to the cost of the goods we have to sell today, and are making it increasingly difficult to sell these goods, both here and abroad. This reduction in commodity taxes would not necessarily mean a reduction in total tax revenue, as was made very evident in the case of the cigarette tax a couple of years ago. The greater number of products which will be sold, because their prices will be more acceptable to a great many more people, multiplied by the lower unit tax, will probably equal or even exceed the present total tax revenue.

The second thing which the Minister of Finance can do is to reduce today's high income taxes, which are making it increasingly difficult for Canadians to buy consumer goods. Once again, a reduction in the income tax does not necessarily mean a reduction in the total income tax revenue because, by making it possible for more people to buy more goods, it will make it possible to employ more people manufacturing these goods, and these people will be earning incomes on which they will be paying income tax instead of drawing on the government for unemployment insurance benefits, or for relief. In addition, the increased quantity of goods which we would sell by taking this measure would again increase the commodity tax total.

The Minister of Finance has within his power the possibility of greatly increasing the number of jobs available to Canadians. By taking the two steps which I have recommended, I do not believe he will reduce by one cent his total tax revenue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in answer to questions which have been put to him in this house concerning unemployment, the Prime Minister has tried to make the people believe that the preliminary conference which this government has called for April 26 will deal with today's critical unemployment problem. The Prime Minister knows that nothing is further from the truth, because that conference to be held on April 26 is nothing more or less than a planning conference which will arrange the agenda for the later conference to deal with dominion-provincial problems. The conference to be held on April 26 will not deal with unemployment. The purpose of it is simply to discuss whether or not unemployment will be on the agenda of the later conference.

Now, the Prime Minister knows that quite well, but still he has pretended that the solution to the present critical unemployment problem will be worked out at the April conference. In order to illustrate just how he has tried to create that impression in the minds of the people, I should like to quote his answer to two questions which I put to him in this house, the first of which was on March 10. The question, as reported at page 1882 of Hansard for that date, reads as follows:

> Would the Prime Minister advise the house what attempts were made, if any, to assemble an immediate conference with the provinces to deal with the present critical unemployment situation?

The Prime Minister's answer was:

> There were none made, Mr. Speaker.

I asked the following supplementary question:

> Does the Prime Minister believe that a preliminary conference held later in April and a dominion-provincial conference held later in the year will suffice to deal adequately with today's critical unemployment situation?

Here is the answer the Prime Minister gave:

> The Prime Minister's attitude is that that will be the opportunity to deal with this important problem.

The Prime Minister knew quite well that this important problem would not and could not be dealt with at that time because that will be a planning conference, pure and simple. Yet, that is what the Prime Minister said, to try to mislead the people into believing that this problem was going to be dealt with at the April 26 conference. This illustrates the attitude of the Prime Minister who, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has just told us so piously, is anxious to do something to clean up this unemployment problem; that is his attitude in dealing with this critical problem that involves the lives and welfare of many thousands of Canadians. The Prime Minister has done nothing more or less than shilly-shally and shadow box with this problem. Yet the Minister of National Health and Welfare has declared so piously, practically with his hands folded in front of his vest, that no one is more anxious than the Prime Minister to solve the unemployment problem. I will bet you that at this moment in the Chateau Laurier the Prime Minister is probably standing up beside the president of the Liberal federation and saying that no one is more anxious to solve the problem of unemployment than are the Prime Minister and this government. The faithful will cheer and shout and have a whale of a time, but that is not doing one thing to solve this unemployment problem.

I might illustrate the interest of the Liberal party in unemployment by saying that a friend of mine in the house has just passed me a note informing me that there are only 17 Liberals who are sufficiently interested in the problems of their constituents to be in the house at the time this vitally important matter is being discussed.

Mr. Weir: There are less than 10 Tories.

Mr. Hees: That is the example which the Prime Minister and the rest of the cabinet are setting to the country, 17 Liberals who are interested enough to listen to the problems of the people for whom they are supposed to be legislating.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the following day, March 11, I asked the Prime Minister the following question as recorded at page 1928 of Hansard:

> In view of the fact that the Prime Minister's decision not to call an immediate conference on unemployment is depriving many thousands of Canadians who have no jobs or means of support of any chance of a solution of their problems, would the Prime Minister not reconsider his decision and call an immediate conference?

Then the Prime Minister answered:

> I cannot agree with the premises of the hon. member's question as a basis for reconsideration.

There is gobbledygook with a great big "g". What kind of an answer is that to the 600,000 unemployed people in Canada who desperately want an unemployment conference to be called with the provinces at the present time to deal with their problem? What kind of an answer is that? I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is that a constructive answer? No, he shakes his head, and he admits it is not.

Mr. Martin: No.

Mr. Hees: It is simply the kind of gobbledygook in which this government has been dealing for years.

Mr. Martin: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hees: This will be interesting.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend said that when I shook my head I was agreeing with what he said. Under the rules of this house my hon. friend has no right to make such an assumption. I was shaking my head because of the wholly irresponsible statements the hon. gentleman was making.

Mr. Hees: I would be very anxious to have the Minister of National Health and Welfare explain why my statement was wholly irresponsible.

Mr. Martin: Because my hon. friend has implied throughout his speech that the head of the government of this country was uninterested in this problem. He went on to say that at this very moment, in all probability, the Prime Minister was down at a political meeting when the fact is that the Prime Minister at this time is engaged in his own office in a matter of great importance affecting the welfare of this country.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the 600,000 unemployed people are going to be very interested to know that the Prime Minister's own business or correspondence or whatever he happens to be dealing with is more important than listening to the representatives of the people—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Listening to your speech.

Mr. Hees: —on this important matter. The government just does not know how important this problem is. They never get out of their offices. They never get closer to the people than being guest speakers at a Canadian Club luncheon; that is their idea of really getting down and mixing with the masses. They have no idea what goes on in the minds and bodies of people who work for a living, and who are today unemployed. They have forgotten about them. They are happy in their oak panelled offices and their private cars. They do not give a hoot, and that is exemplified by the fact that the Prime Minister has refused to call a conference this year, to deal with this problem which involves 600,000 unemployed people. He knows quite well that the April conference cannot deal with anything except the agenda for the conference to be held later in the year.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend has said the Prime Minister of this country has refused to call a conference to deal with this particular matter.

Mr. Hees: Right.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend knows that is not the case; that is a misstatement, and my hon. friend should not repeat something he knows to be without any foundation.

Mr. Hees: That is absolute nonsense, Mr. Speaker, because the only way this present unemployment problem can be dealt with is by an immediate conference, not by a conference later in the year, the agenda of which will be arranged at the April 26 meeting. The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows quite well that that is so.

Mr. Martin: What I was objecting to was your statement that the Prime Minister refused to call such a conference.

Mr. Hees: He did.

Mr. Martin: When did the Prime Minister refuse to call such a conference?

Mr. Hees: I asked the Prime Minister on several days if he would call an immediate conference, and he said no.

Mr. Martin: When did the Prime Minister refuse to call a conference as my hon. friend just stated he did, a moment ago?

Mr. Hees: Then I shall ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if, after a number of requests put to him to call such a conference, he has agreed to call it.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend knows, since he asked the question, the Prime Minister had suggested to the provinces that we meet with the provinces on April 22, and because two premiers could not come the conference has been put off until April 26. Why does my hon. friend persist in trying to convey to this country that the Prime Minister has refused to call a conference?

Mr. Hees: Because it happens to be true, and I will tell you why.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) knows perfectly well that this meeting on April 26 will deal with nothing but the setting of the agenda for a conference to be held later in the year. It will not deal with the present unemployment problem, and the minister knows that perfectly well. The Prime Minister knows it, and the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the rest of the cabinet are simply shilly-shallying this thing through, hoping that by the middle of May the unemployment picture will not be so grave, and that they can escape and not have to deal with the situation today.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare knows that perfectly well, and so does the Prime Minister. They know perfectly well that there will be nothing but an agenda for a later meeting dealt with at the meeting on April 26. And I challenge the minister to say if there will be anything in addition to that.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend challenges me to say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should point out to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) that if he resumes his seat I will have to call the next speaker.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend challenges me, and I am going to accept the challenge, if he will permit me.

Mr. Hees: So long as I do not have to sit down. I cannot sit down, because Mr. Speaker has told me not to. But I would be glad to have the minister speak from his seat. We can hear him just as well that way—and that is the way the Minister of National Health and Welfare speaks most of the time, anyway.

I would say from the attitude of the Prime Minister and the government in ducking away from this problem and in refusing to face it, and from the Prime Minister's refusal to speak on it—although he has been challenged and asked and urged to speak, to outline the government's plan in the matter—I would say that all these things show very clearly that this government and the Prime Minister are not interested in the slightest degree in solving the present critical unemployment problem. And the Minister of National Health and Welfare as well as every other cabinet minister knows that perfectly well.

Mr. Martin: We do not. And you know that is perfect nonsense.

Mr. Hees: I know it happens to be the fact, because if it were not the Prime Minister would have called weeks ago an immediate conference with the provinces. Therefore all we can conclude, in the Prime Minister's own words—and again it is very pleasant to be able to quote the Prime Minister—

> In a country such as ours there should be work for everybody. If we cannot manage to organize the national economy in such a way that there is work for everybody, then we are incompetent.

Today there are 600,000 unemployed. The Prime Minister says that if we cannot organize the economy to make work for everybody we are incompetent. Obviously this government is incompetent. The Prime Minister has admitted it and, Mr. Speaker, there is no honourable alternative for the government and the Prime Minister but to resign.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I have been disappointed several times this afternoon when the most voluble member of the cabinet has been content merely to interrupt opposition members and not to place before the house the program of the government with regard to unemployment. One can only conclude that the government has no program, in which case it would be well advised to repress the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and prevent him from making the rather rude and ill-mannered interruptions which, thus far, have had to go as the government's sole contribution to this debate on the question of unemployment. They have passed up every opportunity.

No doubt throughout the country we shall hear that the government is seriously concerned about unemployment. But no cabinet minister has got to his feet yet in this debate to offer any sound ideas as to the solution of this problem. As a matter of fact I have some sympathy for them, and a great deal of sympathy for the members of the official opposition, because within the philosophy of the Liberal and Conservative parties there is no solution, and they know it. That is why they are sitting tight.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that in many respects our present situation with regard to unemployment is much more serious and more ominous than the situation that prevailed during the hungry thirties. Even though we have not yet the body of unemployed or the volume of misery, there are certain aspects of the present situation that are, as I say, much more ominous. In the thirties we had a large volume of unemployed and a tremendous volume of human misery arising from the fact that our economic machine was almost running down. In many areas it had stopped completely, and in most areas it was seriously retarded.

But that is not the situation today. The situation today is that our machine is running almost at the same level it was last year. There was, true, a great decline in farm income to the extent of some $600 million. But on the other hand there was a great increase in salaries and wages amounting to $300 million, and an increase in interest, dividends and rents of nearly $300 million. As a matter of fact the net decrease of personal income in 1954 over 1953 was only $36 million, and the decline in gross national product was only 2½ per cent over the previous year. And yet it has produced this really quite dangerous and serious problem of unemployment to the tune of over 600,000, or nearly 15 per cent of our working force.

That is the question the government and the official opposition have to face, the fact that their method of economy just is not working. And people are going to ask awkward questions, very serious questions. They are not going to be put off by any suggestion that the statistics are misleading, as we are told so often. Maybe they are misleading; but if so, then it is the government that is doing the misleading, for both sets of figures come from government organizations. And I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the unemployed are not going to be very well satisfied by being dismissed as misleading statistics. They do not think of themselves as misleading statistics; they think of themselves as flesh and blood, men and women, with the problems of men and women. And, as I say, they are going to ask awkward questions.

Indeed, there was an awkward question asked only the other day down in the province of Quebec. I quote from Le Devoir of Monday, March 21, where Jean Marchand, secretary-general of the Catholic federation of trade unions, had this to say:

(Translation):

Our governments are in the act of demonstrating that communist countries alone have no unemployment problem. How is it that the only statesmen who seem able to solve this problem should be people like Hitler and Stalin? It does not make sense.

(Text):

And Mr. Marchand goes on to suggest that no one would dream of leaving such affairs as the army or the postal service in the hands of private enterprise, because they are too essential; but when we come to consider the economy of the country we adopt a policy of laissez-faire and, he says, evidently with disastrous results.

I could wish that more of Mr. Marchand's labour colleagues, both French and English speaking, had such a grasp of the realities of the situation; because they are suggesting this, that if you cannot make this system work you have got to make way for something better.

One of the reasons blocking any activity on the part of the government, one of the reasons that no proposals are made from government benches, is that they are still sunk in some of the myths of free enterprise. They are still pretending that our economy is composed of a vast number of little, private free enterprisers, all busily engaged in their own businesses, and by that means improving the condition of all of us. But of course, as we know, that is not the kind of world in which we are living today. The kind of world in which we are living today is one of vast, enormous and powerful economic organizations which are not responsible to this parliament, nor controlled by the parliament; vast aggregations of wealth and power which decide just how much Canadian workers are going to get to live on, which decide the number of hours they are going to work and consequently the number of them who are going to have jobs. These are the realities of this so-called free enterprise system. Their behaviour was quite well characterized by Mr. Justice McRuer, in speaking only a few days ago on the conviction of the ten electrical equipment firms who were found guilty of operating a combine. Mr. Justice McRuer remarked on the way in which the public is entitled to free competition except in so far as it may be interfered with by valid legislation. I quote from the newspaper report:

He recalled Mr. Robinette's contention that there was no allocation of business nor restriction on technological advances.

The chief justice said that if a company developed a superior type of cable, its price would still be controlled by the group.

Not only the price of that commodity, but the wages paid to the men who produced that commodity; not only the wages paid to them but the number of hours they are going to work, and therefore the number of them that are to be employed in that industry are controlled. These are the real seat of power in our society today. That is true not merely of the electrical industry. It is true in practically all the basic commodities of industrial life today: aluminum, oil, timber, pulp and paper, nickel, heavy machinery, milling of grain, processing of food, and retail distribution. I hardly need drive home that point. There is not one of us who has not noticed a new Loblaw store going up every week. We know that distribution is being concentrated in the hands of a few, and numbers of people are going to pay for it at their cost. The number of people who are to be employed in distribution, the conditions of their work, all these questions are decided, not by this parliament, not by this stronghold of democracy, but by groups of people whom we do not know at all and over whom we have no control.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are not forever going to be put off with the suggestion that they should pay this as a ransom price of our liberty, as suggested by the young man I quoted earlier who suggested that it would not be wise for the government authorities to go to the unemployed and tell them that their miseries were the ransom price that they were paying for liberty, because he suggests that the human being with the least possible liberty is the unemployed person. They are going to demand from this government some serious thought with regard to this economy that no longer functions, because it cannot be said to function adequately, when operating almost at full speed we have thrown over 600,000 people right outside the economic machine. We have discarded them. We have told them that we do not need them; that we can operate the machine without them. At the same time we tell them the only way in which they can acquire the goods they require for living is to have a job, but there are no jobs for them. It is too bad. The implication is that they have to die, to get out of our sight because they are a problem to the government; they are a problem to those who own and control our economy.

We in this group have often been accused, Mr. Speaker, of being impractical and of being visionaries, of advancing Utopian ideas. But I suggest to you, that there is no more Utopian, unrealistic visionary that the man who rises and says, in the name of free enterprise, we must continue to have 600,000, 800,000, 1,000,000 people thrown right out of the economic machine, right out of the social garden in which the rest of us live. That is the impractical visionary view that will bring disaster not merely to this government—and no one could wish it to come there more quickly that I—but to the people of Canada. I suggest that those who sit on the Liberal benches in this house had better use all their influence and all their efforts on those few men who at the present time control the political life of Canada and suggest, for instance, to that—I don't know who he is—Liberal lawyer who was quoted earlier, who suggested that the opposition members are deliberately undermining the economy, and his kind, that the 600,000 unemployed, their friends and their families, are not going to have a very kindly view of a political party that permits those responsible officers to make irresponsible, inane statements such as that. These people are going to demand from the Liberal party something more reasonable, something more realistic. They are going to demand from them some hope at least that there will be a permanent solution to this problem of producing and distributing goods in the interests of all the people of Canada. No clap-trap about free enterprise, about individual liberty, initiative and all the other nonsense we hear is going to weigh in the balance one iota. They want results.

I would warn this Liberal government and this Liberal party that they have been in office over an unusual period of free, easy and comfortable years, and that in the dangerous and difficult years ahead something more than sitting at a desk and pounding it when a minister speaks is to be required of them. Their constituents are going to ask them very nasty, awkward questions when they go home at Easter and in the summer. They are not going to be satisfied with being told that the Prime Minister is the most marvellous and unique personage in the history of Canada. They are not going to be told that they should leave the decisions to these men who have guided them so well in the past, because people are not interested in how they were guided in the past. They want to know how they are to be guided tomorrow.

So far, not one single member of the cabinet has risen in his place to give us even the slightest inkling in the first place that they recognize the seriousness of this problem, and in the second place that they have even the ghost of an idea of how to deal with it. Such governments do not last very long. In spite of overwhelming majorities, such governments eventually go into the discard very quickly, very suddenly.

We have heard in this house that the problem of unemployment is giving great concern and great worry to the government. We have seen no sign of it. On the other hand, we have seen a government that has been determined to reject every practical proposal put to it. Proposals have been put to the government for two years to embark on a large-scale international aid program such as the Colombo plan, as a pilot plan. We were told in the first place that we were very generous; we have actually increased our contribution by $1 million this year. Every Liberal member must have cringed in his seat when that was announced. They must have all cringed when they heard on the radio the scathing denunciation of that niggardliness; but of course we are told that we have increased it as far as it is possible to increase it because there is a definite limit to the power of those places to absorb aid. That was the nonsense that came from the government benches last year. I hope it does not come again this year because it will mean that our government does not even pay any attention to the statements of those in control of the administration of the Colombo plan who told us here in Ottawa last summer that there is no limit to the power of those areas to absorb capital aid.

The government will have to produce something better than that as an excuse for not increasing our contribution to such plans as the Colombo plan to the extent of making a worth-while contribution there and to the extent of solving, temporarily at least, the problem that is posed by unemployment in Canada. Therefore, I hope that we shall have from the government, some time before this debate ends, a sensible, reasoned, practical statement of what the government proposes to do, not merely a recital of this government's bleeding heart, not merely to be told that it is shedding bitter tears over the plight of the unemployed, but some permanent program that has been evolved as a result of serious thinking of the kind that this government has ceased to do for many years.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise before the vote is taken because of the amendment to the amendment. And I wish to deal with that and refer briefly to the subject matter under discussion. The amendment to the amendment reads as follows:

That the amendment be amended by inserting therein immediately after the words "this emergency", the following words: "including the immediate implementation of the federal government's promise of 1945 to make adequate provision for the employable unemployed"; and also by inserting therein, immediately after the words "a long-term program", the following words: "of public investment and economic development".

The words which have been included in that subamendment have already been approved by members of this party in their statements during this debate. They are words taken precisely from the documents which were before the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and were approved in principle by all the governments attending at that time. For that reason, so far as these words are concerned, we naturally support their addition. They have already been used by members of this party during the course of the debate. I wish to leave no doubt, however, in supporting these words in the exact form in which we ourselves have put them forward that we are certainly not putting any interpretation upon them other than the careful interpretation which was put on them at the time they were accepted, approved and put forward.

I say that for this reason. The hon. member who spoke just before me spoke about the 600,000 unemployed in the name of free enterprise. I wish to leave no uncertainty about the fact that we subscribe to no such comment as that in relation to this debate. The 600,000 unemployed are not unemployed in the name of free enterprise. Nor would I wish to leave any suggestion that I approve of such a statement as the one to the effect that we do not want to hear any clap-trap about liberty. We want to hear a great deal about liberty, and a discussion of liberty is not clap-trap at any time.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that in supporting a subamendment which contains words with a specific meaning which we ourselves have approved in exact terms on earlier occasions, we most certainly are not accepting any of the doctrinaire interpretations which may be put upon them by hon. members to the left, nor are we subscribing to any suggestion that a discussion of liberty is clap-trap or that 600,000 people are unemployed in the name of free enterprise.

I had not thought of entering into a discussion of the politics of any other country, but I cannot help recalling that when a good dose of real free enterprise was given to the people of Britain a couple of years ago, immediately there was a response which manifests itself today in the greatest spirit I have seen in Britain for many long years. I make that observation because it would not be well to leave any impression that the doctrinaire policies which have received some support in this chamber on certain occasions find approval here.

In view of the fact that I feel impelled to comment on this statement, may I also comment on something else. I would regret very much if the reports are correct that the Right Hon. Clement Attlee is coming to this country to speak on behalf of or at meetings arranged by a political party in this country. I recall over the years that when Lloyd George came here he firmly refused to take part in anything that savoured of political discussion in this country, and the same has been true of leading members of other parties.

There are obvious reasons why it is highly desirable that those who occupy positions such as that of Mr. Attlee should not engage directly or indirectly in the political activities of another nation within the commonwealth. I feel at liberty to make this statement, and I make it of a man for whom I have the highest admiration, a man I have had the privilege of counting as a friend for some years. I would hope that no matter what imports we would welcome from Britain, we should at no time attempt to import politics from there any more than we attempt to export politics from Canada to the United Kingdom.

I think it would be a healthy thing to remember that no matter how confident the members of any party may be, there is always the possibility of the judgment of the people reaching a different conclusion. That, after all, is the essence of our system and the principle that gives our system life and vitality. I believe there are obvious reasons why anyone who might be called upon to occupy the position of prime minister at any time would be well advised not to have placed himself directly or indirectly within the political arena of a country with which he might subsequently be dealing as prime minister of another government.

I say this in the hope that the reports are incorrect, and that a long established position, which I thought had been accepted by the leaders of all parties, will not be changed at this time. Obviously, if a leading figure in any party in Britain, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan or any part of the commonwealth sees fit to come here to engage in what might be regarded as political discussion within our country, he then naturally places himself immediately in the position of expecting an answer in appropriate terms in regard to any arguments he makes.

I shall not pursue it further, except to repeat once again that I would hope a tradition which has been well recognized for good reasons is not going to be broken at this time, in spite of certain suggestions to the contrary which have appeared in the press.

In regard to this particular subject the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has not indicated any views other than those which have been expressed on other occasions. I wish to leave no uncertainty about the fact that we believe there are things than can and should be done to meet this situation, within the framework of our economy and under the authority which the government already possesses. A number of those things have been mentioned, some of them today. A number of those things have been discussed during the period this debate has been taking place. But, Mr. Speaker, I have heard from the government no answer which would indicate what their intentions are with regard to these various industrial and other activities where unemployment is a reality.

I regret that anyone would suggest that a discussion on unemployment is an attempt to undermine confidence. If there is any attempt to undermine confidence on that basis, then of course it must come from the agency of the government which gives the figures. The figures that have been used are given by the dominion bureau of statistics. Surely there is no suggestion that the dominion bureau of statistics is deliberately seeking to undermine public confidence. After all, it is a statistical agency which we believe has been giving us reliable information within the pattern it has established with regard to these and other matters. The interpretation to be placed upon those figures is for the members of this house and the public of Canada.

Many of us know where there is unemployment. There is unemployment in the textile industry, in the electrical industry and in other industries that have already been under discussion. There is unemployment in the various servicing agencies which ordinarily would be called upon to deal with the movement of food products which today are not being sold to the same extent they have been sold on other occasions. We know where this unemployment is; we know that from records that are available to us. Far from there being any suggestion that this discussion seeks to undermine confidence, may I say that we would indeed be open to criticism if we failed to bring forward the facts that are produced by agencies of the government set up for that purpose, and to seek action by the government to deal in some way with a situation which is apparent from a study of those very figures.

I want to refer to one other industry with regard to which figures have been given just within these past few days, in order to show the nature of the problem. We have in this country an extremely efficient rubber footwear industry. Last year in Canada 3,260,952 pairs of rubber footwear were sold. Our industry is capable of taking care of our own requirements with rubber footwear of high quality, and of producing for export large numbers of rubber shoes as well. The export trade in rubber footwear has diminished seriously. In 1947 we exported two million pairs. Last year we exported only 15,000 pairs. Of the 3,260,952 pairs sold in Canada last year, 1,062,362 pairs were imported.

Again, let us not have any suggestion that the moment you mention these figures you are urging that there should not be trade. On the contrary, no argument of that kind is being made. But let us see what happened. Of those 1,062,362 pairs, 717,202 pairs came from Hong Kong. The information is that those shoes—that is the 717,202 pairs that came from Hong Kong—arrived here at a cost of 64 cents a pair as compared with a cost of $1.90 a pair for a comparable Canadian product. You do not have to look far to find out what the problem is there.

Mr. Croll: But in his finding the judge said, did he not, that there was no competition in the business, and that they maintained prices? That is what he said.

Mr. Drew: We are not dealing with anything of the kind to which the hon. member has referred, and he is well aware of that fact. He is also well aware of the fact that there was no suggestion of any inaccuracy in the cost figures; and I am referring to cost figures. The hon. member indicates that he agrees with what I have said. Since he agrees with what I have said, then quite obviously the interjection has no bearing on the point I make, namely that the cost in Canada—which is largely made up of labour—is $1.90 as compared with 64 cents in the case of these imported shoes.

There are obvious reasons why we want to trade with Hong Kong and the other trading centres of Asia, Europe and all other parts of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that we face the realities of this situation and recognize that figures of this kind explain some of the problems of unemployment. It is also essential that we decide whether there is to be any attempt to make use of the laws which are actually on the statute books to protect Canadian workmen under a free enterprise system which gives to the people of this country a standard of living that we wish to preserve.

Since the hon. member for Spadina interjected his remark with regard to the comment of the judge, may I remind him that the comment to which he has referred was made in a proceeding which in itself is intended to preserve free enterprise. He therefore can have no objection to the acceptance of these figures when we ask that this matter be carefully examined under the laws as they now stand, and that we decide exactly what should be done with regard to the maintenance of employment for Canadian workmen when we find in existence elsewhere wages that are so far below ours that they are producing the result we see in this case. That can be done under the existing machinery with due regard to our desire to trade with Hong Kong and with every other great trading centre of the world; but let us remember that the first responsibility of the government of Canada is to the working people of Canada, and let us see how we can meet the situation with which we are now confronted.

There is a growing feeling that we are strangely reluctant to make any move ourselves to assure continued work to Canadian workmen, although we see international arrangements being disregarded when other governments think that will be to the advantage of workmen in their countries. We had under discussion earlier this afternoon the nature of the answer that has been given by the government of the United States to the request that there should be no artificial limitation upon the movement of oil from Canada to the United States. The government has the answer. We are awaiting it. Having regard to the fact that the submission of the government was made public in the first instance, I must confess I am curious as to why there is so much delay in making public the answer. After all, this is an ordinary business communication. We were told what the government of Canada was saying to the government of the United States, and we want to know what the government of the United States has said to the government of Canada. There are a number of other cases where we want information of that kind.

The Prime Minister has said that the government must accept responsibility for employment. The Prime Minister has not sought in any way to diminish the effect of the statement he made. Under our system it is the responsibility of government to administer the laws passed by parliament. The opposition cannot do that. There are laws on the statute books which can be invoked to deal with these subjects. There are laws on the statute books which can be invoked to deal with some of this very unemployment that we are discussing. This afternoon I have simply added to the many examples already given the figures only recently made public showing how unemployment is being created in one particular industry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have explained we shall support the sub-amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). We support it not only because the words used are specific words but also because it is a want of confidence motion with respect to the action of the government on this very important subject and we wish to register our vote accordingly.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

ST. MARY'S RIVER BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 281, to incorporate St. Mary's River Bridge Company.

Mr. Green: Could we have a statement from the sponsor of the bill?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to incorporate a company with powers to construct a bridge over or a tunnel under St. Mary's river at or near Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. The location of the two "Saults", Canadian and American, marks a very important point and is often referred to as the hub of the great lakes. This can be readily understood when one realizes it is at this point that the only international border crossing is provided between the westerly end of lake Superior and some 700 miles east, at the southerly end of lake Huron.

I understand that in 1927 the number of motor vehicles which crossed the river at the Sault by ferry was 76,000, and that the number has increased until last year there were approximately 290,000, which means an average of about 800 vehicles per day. I think it is reasonable to expect that this number would increase greatly if the crossing could be made by bridge or tunnel, especially when we realize that under construction at the present time, just 60 miles south of Sault Ste. Marie, is the Mackinac straits bridge, connecting southern Michigan with the upper peninsula by the longest suspension span in the world.

The four-lane highway on the Mackinac bridge will have an estimated capacity of 3,000 cars each way per hour. I am advised that a four-lane highway from southern Michigan to Sault Ste. Marie via the Mackinac straits bridge is assured and will tap important transcontinental roads in the heavily populated states bordering on the state of Michigan. This is bound to result in further increasing traffic to the north.

The government of the province of Ontario has indicated that the trans-Canada highway around the north shore of lake Superior will be completed within the next five years. This will give a tremendous impetus to tourist traffic and will add substantially to the inflow at this point of vehicles from the United States.

The Sault area is recognized as vital in international defence matters because of the importance of the locks located there, so much so that important measures have been taken and installations erected to provide adequate protection. This involves prompt movement of defence forces and heavy equipment between the two countries. Therefore you will see that the ever-increasing need of adequate facilities for crossing the river at the Sault by traffic of all kinds presents an urgent problem for solution and, in keeping with many other international boundary points, a bridge or tunnel seems the best and most natural solution.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words regarding this bill. The project envisioned by the bill, either a bridge or a tunnel at the Sault, is one that is indeed welcome. We feel it is the type of project which might well be undertaken by a public authority, but since that does not seem to be in prospect we are glad to see the proposed bridge or tunnel being undertaken by the company referred to in the bill.

I presume that according to the usual practice the bill will go to a committee of the house. There are two matters which I hope the committee will study closely. As the sponsor of the bill knows, Their Honours in the other place made a change in the terms of the bill from those in which it was originally introduced concerning the maximum interest rate to be allowed on the bonds or debentures of the company. The original suggestion was a ceiling of 7 per cent. Their Honours reduced that to 6 per cent. Bearing in mind that interest on the securities of the government of Canada runs at figures of 3 and a fraction per cent, or in some cases even less, it seems to me this figure is still too high. I also have in my hand an advertisement showing that the Household Finance Corporation, an institution which makes money out of money, has recently put out 4¼ per cent sinking fund debentures due in 1975. I do not intend to pursue the argument at this juncture. I rise merely to make the point that I think this is something into which the committee should go when it is dealing with the bill.

[Mr. Nixon.]

There is one other point I think the committee should investigate, and that is the provision in the bill concerning tolls. As I understand it, the bill proposes that the company be permitted to fix the tolls, subject only to the provisions of the Railway Act. If a line of railway were included on the proposed bridge or in the proposed tunnel that would seem to bring it under the provisions of the Railway Act and perhaps bring the tolls under the supervision of the board of transport commissioners. However, if there is no line of railway on the proposed bridge or through the proposed tunnel, the question arises in my mind as to whether or not the board of transport commissioners would have any authority over the tolls to be charged.

I think my hon. friends would agree with me, not only the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Nixon) but also the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), if on this occasion I may refer to him by that designation, that there should be some body definitely having authority over the tolls to be charged on the proposed bridge or through the proposed tunnel. As a matter of fact, my interest in the question of the rate of interest bears on the question of tolls, because the tolls to be charged will be affected by the rate of interest that is paid on the bonds or debentures.

With the request that these two points be looked at in the committee, we are glad to let the bill have second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

WESTSPUR PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 283, to incorporate Westspur Pipe Line Company.

He said: By reason of the amendments to the Pipe Lines Act passed at the last session of parliament, it is now necessary for any person constructing or operating a pipe line extending beyond the boundaries of a province to be incorporated by special act of parliament. Recent discoveries in the oil areas of the four western provinces have been very close to the provincial boundaries, and the problem has now arisen of providing a gathering system to collect the crude oil from the wells and carry it to the main pipe line that is available serving the industry either to the east or the west.

An example of the problem is to be found in southeastern Saskatchewan, where to get from some of the recently discovered wells to the main pipe line it is necessary to cross the Manitoba boundary line. Any company seeking to do this must be incorporated by special act of parliament, and this bill is to provide for that sort of thing.

It will be noted first that the authority is limited to the four western provinces and the Northwest Territories. Second, it will be noted that the persons seeking incorporation, as indicated in clause 1 of the bill, are all personnel of Imperial Oil Limited. In other words, it is a request to parliament to permit the incorporation of this company so it can set up gathering and branch lines to serve the producing wells.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): The explanation just given by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), Mr. Speaker, indicates that it is the intention of the applicant to apply for a charter to construct a gathering system or something of that kind in the western provinces. He went on to say that the bill only referred to the Northwest Territories and the four western provinces, but in addition these applicants are asking for power to construct pipe lines outside of Canada. Of course this brings up the old pipe-line battles that we have had in this house during recent years.

I notice that during the debate which took place in the other chamber, to be found at page 318 of Senate Hansard, the sponsor there indicated that the purpose was to construct a pipe-line gathering system or branch lines crossing provincial boundaries in the four western provinces. A secondary possibility was the construction of a pipe line to cross the British Columbia-Alberta provincial boundary to accommodate deliveries from the Peace river area. Then he also referred to a small pipe-line gathering system with branch lines which cross provincial boundaries. In concluding his remarks he pointed out that this bill was in the form which had been followed throughout since the original Pipe Lines Act was passed in 1949.

Actually the bill is not in the form of the other bills which have been passed within recent years. For example, I refer the hon. member for Ottawa West to the Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited charter, which is contained in chapter 68 of the statutes of 1953. The applicants there applied for incorporation in 1951 under the name of Border Pipeline Corporation, but their bill was talked out that session. They applied again in 1952 for a charter for a company to be known as Boundary Pipeline Corporation, and that bill was also talked out. The reason was that they proposed to build their pipe line through the United States. However, they came back in 1953 and applied for a charter under a different name, Mid-Continent Pipelines Limited, and on that occasion they had decided to build their pipe line in Canada.

We find that according to section 6, clause (a) they only asked for power to construct within Canada, purchase, lease or otherwise acquire, and so on. Then any reference to international pipe lines was deleted, and what was left were the words "interprovincial pipe lines". They also agreed to the insertion of this proviso:

> Provided that all pipe lines for the transmission and transportation of gas and oil shall be located entirely within Canada.

The bill went through with these changes having been made. The changes followed the course which had been adopted in the session of 1951. I would refer hon. members to several pipe-line charters granted in that year. The first was Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company, as set out in chapter 87 of the statutes of 1951. The next was Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited, set out at chapter 88 of the statutes of 1951, and the third Independent Pipe Line Company, chapter 91 of the statutes of 1951. The fourth was Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, as contained in chapter 92 of those statutes, and the fifth was Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company which, as Your Honour knows, is actually piping oil from Edmonton to the west coast, and whose charter is contained in chapter 93 of the statutes of 1951.

In each case a provision was written into the charter, that the main pipe lines would be within the borders of Canada. I would suggest to the hon. member for Ottawa West that he take up with the Imperial Oil company, or whoever is behind this present application, the question of whether or not they are insisting upon having the charter go through in the terms in which it comes before the house.

As I said a moment ago, the charter contains the power to construct pipe lines outside of Canada, and it does not contain the proviso that the main pipe line must be constructed within Canada. I should think there would be no objection to having these changes made when the bill goes to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, in view of the statement made by the hon. member for Ottawa West in introducing the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question, so that I may understand his point more clearly? Does he suggest, for instance, that in respect of those wells now being drilled in southern Manitoba, the branch lines should be brought backward against the flow to join the Interprovincial pipe line, and not taken across the border through part of the United States to join the Interprovincial south of Gretna?

Mr. Green: That is a detail which can be gone into in committee.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the whole principle of it.

Mr. Green: These other applicants for charters agreed to write in this provision to which I have referred.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the opposite to what the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Nickle) was recommending this afternoon.

Mr. Green: That may be. I am not speaking for the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. Benidickson: That is a divided party there.

Mr. Green: It will be very unfair for the Imperial Oil company or anybody else to come along and get a charter which gives them wider powers than those held by these other companies. Certainly if it is the intention of Imperial Oil to construct the main pipe line outside of Canada then that will have to be given pretty serious consideration. I do suggest to the sponsor that he discuss this with the people who are asking for the charter.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member asking a question, or does he wish to close the debate?

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to ask a question. Does the hon. member suggest that the producing well should construct a pipe line going against the flow in the main pipe line, instead of coming in at the logical point at a pumping station that might be south of the border, thereby increasing the cost of the crude oil and putting the burden on the crude oil producer?

Mr. Green: The hon. member will find, I think, that these pipe lines in the United States are constructed by American companies, and not by Canadian companies at all. It might be that Imperial Oil or Interprovincial would have an American subsidiary which could build a branch of that kind; but the provision upon which we have been insisting has been that the main lines of these companies should be built within Canada, and I see no reason why a similar provision should not be written into the present bill.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations concerning this rather small but very important bill. I notice from the report of the Senate debates that they spent about five minutes on the bill, on second reading. That does not mean, however, that some time was not spent in committee.

A number of applications for charters for pipe lines have been received in the House of Commons in recent years. This of course indicates a need for pipe lines; but the fact that these applications come from large private companies also indicates that the building of pipe lines and the transportation of oil and gas is a very profitable undertaking in Canada at this time. Members of this group want to be certain that these lines are always in the public interest, and we want to know if they are built in relation to any over-all plan.

The pipe-line developments of today remind me of the railway developments of 50 years ago. At that time there were many railway charters granted by parliament without consideration of any over-all plan for the development of the country and, so far as I can find out, with very little study by the House of Commons or by committees of the house. This procedure of granting charters without some measure of planning and consideration for the future ended in bankruptcy for some well-known railways, with the investors being bailed out by the people of Canada assuming a huge funded debt, which is still a heavy burden on our people.

As we have repeated on a number of occasions we stand for the public ownership of pipe lines. But, failing that, we in this group believe everything possible must be done to protect the public interest now and in the future, so as to prevent a repetition of what occurred in connection with the building of railroads in Canada 50 years ago. I am referring to the unnecessary duplication of services, the unnecessary issuing of charters, and the waste and consequent loss to Canadian taxpayers.

On that account we believe this bill does raise certain questions. We want to know whether this pipe line is necessary and in the public interest. Second, we want to know if it is part of an over-all plan so as to prevent duplication, as well as future waste and unnecessary costs and expenditures. We are very much of the opinion that the building of these pipe lines is almost a duplication of the building of the railroads in this country and, if we are to prevent a repetition of the experience we had with the railroads, there should be some over-all planning with regard to the transportation of gas and oil in Canada. We are not convinced that this is being given effect to at the present time.

I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that we wanted to know whether the company which may be granted this franchise and charter is going to speculate on that franchise or charter, or go ahead and build the pipe line. I judge from the remarks of the sponsor that there is no question but that the company applying for this charter intends to proceed with the building of the pipe line mentioned.

As I said before, 50 years ago our railroad charters were granted without any plan or much consideration for the future. Surely that experience should teach us as members of this house, and therefore responsible to the Canadian people, that we must do everything possible to prevent a repetition of those mistakes. When this bill is referred, as I expect it will be, to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the committee should investigate the several points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and in addition several points I have raised in these few brief comments. Pending receiving complete information on the questions I have raised, this group does not give final support to this measure.

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this bill, may I say first of all that, like others that will be coming before the house this session, it has my support. This particular bill will involve authority to one company, Westspur Pipe Line Company, to build, when and if needed, certain oil-gathering pipe lines across provincial borders and perhaps also across international borders, in order to most economically connect either present oil fields or oil fields to be discovered with main transmission pipe lines or with refineries.

A week ago a statement was made in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It was the text of the statement he had delivered to the United States government. I should like to refer to one paragraph of that statement before commenting further on this particular bill. The statement appears on page 2297 of Hansard of March 23:

> A great deal would certainly be lost in terms of continental efficiency if both countries were to develop their respective oil industries along purely national lines.

That statement is obviously correct. I fully agree with the government's conclusion, just as the United States oil industry and the Canadian oil industry fully agree that the soundest economic planning of pipe lines is quite right and in the best interest of the two countries.

To impose any restrictions that would prohibit any pipe line crossing an international border, and specifically the border between the United States and Canada, would be to impose a burden which could be extremely costly to this country as well as to our neighbour to the south, and could in fact make it impossible to build a direct connection by pipe line, which is the lowest cost method of transport, between certain United States refineries, United States pipe lines or Canadian pipe lines, which must have markets across the border. In other words, to enact any restrictions by legislation in Canada that would prohibit a pipe line from crossing the United States border would make it far easier for the United States to say, quite justifiably, "We have no direct connection with your oil fields; we have no financial investment; we have no lines of communication or transport with your fields; therefore it is far easier for us to use alternative sources of supply instead of Canadian crude oil".

To that extent I disagree with the comments made by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I believe, sir, that this bill should be passed in its present form, just as other bills to come before the house should be passed in a form that will not prohibit the building of pipe lines on the most economical basis for the benefit of this country and perhaps also for the benefit of our neighbour to the south.

I believe this is one of those questions that should be raised at this time, namely whether this parliament, as it has in the last two or three years, should take on itself the responsibility of dealing with matters concerning pipe lines for oil and gas, or the marketing of oil and gas—matters about which unfortunately not too many members of parliament know too much—and take that power to decide away from a competent authority such as the board of transport commissioners, or any other board this government may set up. I am thinking of such boards as the Alberta conservation board, which will pass on any matters which will involve pipe lines over Alberta territory, and the Saskatchewan board that has been set up to look after pipe lines going through that province, the Manitoba board, the British Columbia board, and so forth. Let us not bind in advance the hands of such investigating bodies. Let these matters be decided upon the basis of evidence, not upon the basis of prejudice or upon the basis of misguided nationalism or anything else but plain economic common sense.

I would urge, sir, that the government find the means of taking out of the hands of parliament matters upon which parliament, I am afraid, is not competent to judge, and to put the whole question of routing the pipe lines, oil or gas, and the whole question of the marketing of our oil or gas, into the hands of a competent board which can call witnesses and deal with all the economic and other phases of the over-all problems of putting Canada's oil and gas to work for Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

The house resumed, from Friday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for the second reading of Bill No. 186, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when it was declared six o'clock on March 18 last I had just begun my remarks upon this bill and had pointed out the reasons why I thought it was not adequate to deal with the problem with which it purports to deal; and had related to the house that a conference had taken place between representatives of the governments of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in Regina on October 1. At this conference a unanimous decision was reached, subject to the approval and confirmation of the governments concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on with that, will he permit a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has to do with the suggestion he made the other day that the new section is different in import and purport from the old section. Before he goes on to explain the ramifications arising from the meeting that took place, will he be kind enough to explain wherein the new subsection 2 of section 165 is different from the old section that has been in the law for a number of years? I have not the section number in mind at the moment. The old section read:

> A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right common to all His Majesty's subjects.

The minister pointed out the other day that the new subsection 2 of section 165 reads:

> (2) For the purposes of this section every one commits a common nuisance who does an unlawful act or fails to discharge a legal duty and thereby
> (a) endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or
> (b) obstructs the public in the exercise or enjoyment of any right that is common to all the subjects of Her Majesty in Canada.

[Mr. Nickle.]

With the exception of the redrafting, what is different in these two sections?

Mr. Garson: If I understand my hon. friend's question correctly he is asking me whether I contend that the new section differs in any point of substance from the old section. I agree that there is no substantial difference between them. I did not argue that there was. All I was arguing was that the amendment moved by my hon. friend, whether made to the old nuisance section or, as he proposes, to the new one, was not for the reasons I have already developed a proper amendment for the purpose for which he was seeking it.

I was, and am, suggesting that a much more rational method of dealing with the problem of the pollution of rivers is not by any police court prosecution under the code at all, but by concerted action on the part of the governments concerned which will bring to bear upon what is essentially a health problem the work of experts in the field of health rather than the efforts of criminal lawyers.

I pointed out that a unanimous decision had been reached at the conference on October 1 that the three prairie provinces would join together in setting up a proposed joint pollution control board with certain functions. This board would first of all collect information as to the source and type of domestic, industrial and other waste being discharged or flowing into interprovincial rivers. Upon the basis of this information which had been so collected it would assess the physical, bacteriological and chemical effects of such wastes on water to be used for domestic, industrial or other purposes. It would then select priorities of use and establish the objectives for the control of pollution of these rivers. It would make recommendations for the correction of these conditions which might be shown to affect adversely the accepted use of the water in these rivers.

It would recommend, for example, the control of pollution by the granting of permits to those who may put any effluent into these rivers, or by any other means; and would recommend also such further action as might be required to meet those objectives which I have named. It would continue an educational campaign based on the fundamental idea that water is a valuable resource which must be protected and used logically.

And then it was agreed that the recommendations of the proposed joint board should be carried out by the provinces concerned, either through existing legislation or if necessary through new legislation; and that so far as possible the legislation of the three provinces concerned would be uniform.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister proceeds, would he allow a question? Does the minister realize that within the last few days Premier Manning of Alberta has announced that he will not make an appointment to such a board because to do so would place authority over the province of Alberta in a board composed not only of members from Alberta but from the other two provinces?

Mr. Garson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I realize that, and I am coming to that point. First, however, I want to satisfy my hon. friend, if I can, on the point that arising out of these meetings a course of actual conduct is being carried on in relation to the waters of the North Saskatchewan river which in my judgment is infinitely more effective than any results which could be obtained by the passage of my hon. friend's bill and by criminal prosecutions thereunder.

There was agreement at this Regina conference of October 1, 1954, that there would be a technical staff for the proposed joint pollution control board composed of a senior public health engineer, a chemist and a clerk-stenographer, and the duties of these officials were outlined.

Now, it is quite true that subsequently the government of Alberta, as my hon. friend from Prince Albert has just stated, signified its unwillingness to join in the setting up of this joint board. But before I come to the statement of their position I think first I should place on the record an official statement which was supplied to me by Hon. T. J. Bentley, minister of public health for Saskatchewan, as his conception of the function which this joint pollution control board would perform. I am now quoting:

> It was conceived that this board would examine interprovincial stream pollution in a comprehensive fashion by selecting priorities of water use, assessing and co-ordinating all data pertaining to wastes and polluting substances, recommending suitable corrective action and conducting an educational campaign on the logical conservation of our invaluable water resources.

This was back some time ago and the statement goes on to deal with this matter concerning which Mr. Bentley was keenly disappointed by actions of the Alberta government, confirmed by Premier Manning in the communication to which my hon. friend from Prince Albert has just referred. I quote further from Hon. Mr. Bentley's statement:

> The government of Saskatchewan was keenly disappointed when it learned that Alberta was not prepared to accept this proposal for a co-operative joint control board. A counterproposal for the establishment of an informal committee to meet occasionally as problems arose was considered—

That is, by the government of Saskatchewan—

> —to be utterly inadequate.
>
> Further, the government of Alberta's assurances that it would do everything in its power to prevent the occurrence of any pollution, while welcomed, could not be accepted as a suitable substitute for a joint board designed to launch a comprehensive attack on the problem. A pollution episode as recent as January 3, 1955, at North Battleford and January 7, 1955, at Prince Albert adds additional evidence to the view that a joint control board is necessary.
> Consequently on January 18, 1955, Dr. W. W. Cross, minister of health for Alberta, has been requested to ask his government seriously to reconsider this proposal. Willingness of Alberta to discuss the creation of a joint control board would demonstrate its willingness to co-operate in finding permanent solutions for pollution of interprovincial streams.

I think it is only fair to also place upon the record the reply of Hon. Dr. Cross to this suggestion which was made by the government of Saskatchewan. Dr. Cross's reply takes the form of a letter dated January 24, 1955, addressed to Hon. Mr. Bentley, which reads as follows:

> I have your letter of January 18, 1955, regarding the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river and I believe it would help if I were to explain the procedures that are in effect in the Edmonton vicinity for the control of pollution.
> We are paying attention to a number of sources of possible pollution but as you are aware we are most interested in a particular material or group of materials which caused trouble one year ago. It is believed by the engineering staff here that this problem arises from one chemical plant and the odour is spoken of here as the "typical" odour.
> Aimed at the control of pollution, an Alberta team has been watching the North Saskatchewan river since 1950 and has collected a lot of useful information which has been supplied to your division of sanitary engineering and to the federal authorities. This team was enlarged last winter and additional help was obtained from the department of national health. Resulting from the work of these teams, specific orders were issued to a number of industrial plants in the Edmonton region and to the city of Edmonton.

Edmonton, by the way, would not be affected at all by my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was that observation?

Mr. Garson: My observation was that when Dr. Cross in his letter stated that specific orders were issued to a number of industrial plants in the Edmonton region and to the city of Edmonton, it was the city of Edmonton which would not be affected at all by the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Albert which we are now considering. Then I continue with Dr. Cross's letter:

> To see that these requirements are met a number of checks have been established.
> 1. The various companies have been asked to report promptly any failure in their control machinery. The particular company which was considered to be the source of last winter's problem now takes samples of their effluent every two hours and reports immediately if anything is found amiss.

2. The Alberta department of public health picks up samples daily from this plant's effluent and from the river at Fort Saskatchewan about 14 miles downstream from Edmonton. Recently equipment has been installed so that samples covering the whole 24-hour period can be obtained from these two points.

3. The Sherritt Gordon plant at Fort Saskatchewan uses the water on the North Saskatchewan river for domestic as well as for industrial purposes. They are very interested in the pollution question and have been asked to report immediately if anything unfavourable turns up.

4. At Duverney another plant has been asked to report. However, they do not use the water for domestic purposes and might easily miss contamination.

5. At Lindberg (about 25 miles west of the Saskatchewan border), the Canadian Salt Company uses North Saskatchewan water for domestic purposes and they too have been asked to report.

From the above you will see that the Alberta provincial board of health has issued orders which actually have controlled the situation. You will remember that last year the pollution was noted at Prince Albert, first in early November, whereas, this year, to date, only a few days of trouble have been noted and the river is again clear. Incidentally it might be worth while pointing out that our regular tests show that there is nothing objectionable in the river between Edmonton and Prince Albert at the moment.

That was on January 24, 1955. To continue:

This means that Prince Albert will have no reason to complain for at least 25 or 30 days and we see no reason to expect a breakdown in the control machinery in the future. In addition, a system of checks has been developed which will give prompt information as to any accident and, therefore, an opportunity for prompt corrections.

In early December our check at Fort Saskatchewan showed the "typical" odour. This lasted less than one day at the point but the period of pollution widened out as it went downstream. When this was checked at the place of origin the effluent was already back to normal and no reason for the pollution could be found. According to the plant staff, to the best of their knowledge, nothing had occurred in the plant which would account for the pollution which had occurred.

However, because of this "accident" the company has tightened up their controls and the odour factor is now well below the requirements of the Alberta provincial board of health.

Our department is well pleased with the effectiveness of the control procedures which have been developed and we feel that the plant from which the "typical" odour comes is doing a very good job in controlling their effluent and we have had every co-operation from them. Certainly a very marked improvement has been obtained over the condition which existed one year ago.

We believe that the above information indicates that an adequate system of controls has been provided and that a system of checks has been developed which does give prompt warning if any of the control mechanism breaks down.

May I give you the assurance of this department that everything will be done which can be done to prevent the pollution of interprovincial waterways. To this end we are quite prepared to have our technical staff meet with yours as suggested in my letter of October 22, 1954, so that by an exchange of information the best control measures may be maintained.

[Mr. Garson.]

That letter is signed by W. W. Cross, minister of health. In other words while the government of Ontario, after having sent its delegates to this meeting at Regina on October 1 and in spite of the fact that that meeting reached a unanimous decision, did not feel that it was possible to confirm that decision by joining in this joint interprovincial—

Mr. Diefenbaker: To what government did the minister refer?

Mr. Garson: The government of Alberta.

Mr. St. Laurent: You said "Ontario".

Mr. Garson: I am sorry. I meant the government of Alberta.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought there was a slip.

Mr. Garson: When I said "Ontario", I meant "Alberta".

Mr. Diefenbaker: I just thought I would have the matter cleared up.

Mr. Garson: That is all right. While it had taken part through its delegates in this meeting on October 1 and those delegates had agreed unanimously to the conclusions, and while the Alberta government did not feel free to confirm its adherence to this joint control board, I take Dr. Cross's letter to be a statement that his government was prepared to do, as a single provincial government, that which the joint control board would have done if it had been set up, and that to that end he was prepared to co-operate with the government of Saskatchewan and, if necessary, the government of Manitoba.

In view of everything that has taken place in this matter up to date, it seems to me this co-operative attack upon the problem offers the best hope we have of improving conditions. While I do not profess to be any expert in these pollution control measures—that co-operative attack seems to me to involve the acceptance by all concerned, that is those situated on the upper part of the river as well as those situated on the lower part of it, of the principles with regard to the pollution of boundary waters which were adopted by the international joint commission years ago, and which have been generally accepted by public health authorities since then.

Hon. members will recall that when this matter was up for debate about a year ago I outlined some of the steps that had been taken by the international joint commission with regard to the heavily polluted waters in the Detroit-Windsor area, for example. Those principles indicate that the waters of normal surface streams—and this would certainly be true of the North Saskatchewan river, as I am sure my friend the hon. member for Prince Albert would agree—are not safe to drink until they are treated in water purification plants. From that it follows that since the waters of normal untreated surface streams are not safe to drink there is no reason, when industrial development begins, to prevent the disposal of wastes into such rivers, always provided that the total load, made up by all contributors of effluents, does not exceed the normal capacity of modern municipal water purification plants. While in this present case my hon. friend's amendment to the Criminal Code does not apply to public corporations at all and therefore has no effect upon municipalities, it is noteworthy that the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river, both before and after this straw that broke the camel's back which has been the cause of all this discussion in the house—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was no straw; it lasted three months.

Mr. Garson: If my hon. friend wishes me to put it that way I shall describe it as the anvil that broke the camel's back. I was about to say that the pollution of the North Saskatchewan river is a composite matter. For example, below Edmonton 50 per cent of the biological oxygen demand pollution load is contributed by that city. Apart from the fact that criminal prosecutions are a most unsatisfactory method of dealing with problems of this sort, even if we accepted the untenable premise that that was a good method my hon. friend's amendment would leave out of account, in this very situation which he is attempting to cure, that factor which contributes 50 per cent of the pollution load at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What factor is that; municipal sewage?

Mr. Garson: Yes, quite.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was not what we were disturbed about.

Mr. Garson: No, that is not what my hon. friend is disturbed about; but if he were aware of the fact that the capacity of a river to accept more pollution depends upon the load it is already carrying he would understand that a very substantial contributing factor to the inability of the North Saskatchewan river to carry the additional pollution put into it last year arose from the fact that there was a basic pollution load of 50 per cent already before the latest effluent was put into it at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow a question?

Mr. Garson: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my amendment were altered to include municipalities which put raw sewage into rivers and thereby contribute to the pollution, would the minister then accept it?

Mr. Garson: I am now expressing my own personal views. I would not accept it because I would think if that were done it would expose a great many municipalities, including perhaps the city of Ottawa, to prosecution in police court, which prosecution would in my judgment contribute very little, if anything at all, to the solution of the problem with which the hon. member is attempting to deal. In other words, I do not think police court prosecutions are a solution for river pollution. In my opinion the only result of my hon. friend's amendment would be that it would have a very mischievous, disruptive and disturbing effect upon municipalities that discharge effluents into rivers all over Canada, not only in the three western provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba but in all or nearly all provinces of Canada. It would cause a great deal of mischief and make no progress whatever toward a solution of the problem.

The solution by co-operative effort lies along the lines I have been indicating. In line with the letter of Dr. Cross which I have quoted I am told that the companies concerned have been co-operating wholeheartedly in the matter, and that during the past year they have spent something of the order of $500,000 in an effort to cure this difficulty. I think it is partly as a result of the conference held in Regina on October 1, 1954, that it has been possible to get that degree of co-operation from industry and that degree of co-operation from the government of Alberta, notwithstanding the fact that it did not agree to the setting up of a joint interprovincial board. As Dr. Cross's letter clearly indicates, and as is also indicated by the heavy expenditure of money that has taken place largely under the auspices of the province of Alberta—it had to be under their auspices since it took place in that province—much greater results leading to a solution of the problem are being achieved already than could conceivably take place as a result of the amendment my hon. friend proposes to make to the Criminal Code.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely sorry to interrupt the minister but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Garson: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, your intervention to advise me that my time is up has occurred almost at the precise moment when I have exhausted my material.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Go on. As a matter of fact I think the minister is long over his allotted time because of the time he spoke the other night, but he should continue anyway.

Mr. Garson: I can do no more than to recapitulate that the reason I am strongly opposed to the hon. member's amendment and intend to vote against it is that even if it were conceded that we could cure a problem of this sort by police court action, I think his amendment is still defective. I think it is defective as an amendment and I also think it is fundamentally misconceived and defective because this is not the proper method to deal with a problem of this kind. There is also the additional reason why we should not deal with it in this way at the present time, namely that it is being dealt with quite effectively in the proper manner and by proper authorities, the provincial governments concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On an interprovincial river?

On motion of Mr. Campbell the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind hon. members that at eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Harris for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mrs. Fairclough, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Regier.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): There are now, Mr. Speaker, between 600,000 and 700,000 unemployed in this country. There is no more serious domestic problem than this; yet the degree of importance which the government attaches to it can be seen in the way they have treated this debate since its inception almost four weeks ago. It has been kicked about from pillar to post. It has had to make way for the most inconsequential legislation, and that I think is evidence of the degree of the government's real interest in the matter. In the conduct of the house business there has been nothing more incompetent than the way this debate has been run. That being so, we need not be surprised at the incompetent way in which the suffering of so many hundreds of thousands of Canadians is being treated today.

It has been said before in this debate, and I repeat it, that it is high time the Prime Minister spoke. After all, he is the leader of the government. He has to take his measure of responsibility. It is not good enough for the Prime Minister of Canada to just sit tight and say nothing, to present no program at all for his government. We expect something more than that. His predecessor would have given us much more. At least we would have been inundated with a barrage of words, words indeed so confused and confusing that the very faculties of eyes and ears would have been confounded. But not this Prime Minister; he plays it rather differently. If I may here paraphrase a dramatic criticism I read once, he plays King as though somebody else had the ace. It is not good enough. The fact that he desired to remain silent is no excuse at all for him or for the government. At least the late prime minister had some ideas as to what should have been done about 15 years ago in connection with the plight of the employable unemployed. Mr. King said then that to transfer to this government the whole cost of the employable unemployed would prevent a repetition of the confusion, inefficiency, waste, delay and inequalities which admittedly have prevailed in relief since 1930. The Liberal party believed that 15 years ago, yet nothing has been done about it.

Mr. King said that to transfer the whole cost of the employable unemployed would prevent a repetition of confusion, yet this government revels in confusion. He said that it would prevent a repetition of inefficiency, but the government wallows in its own inefficiency. Mr. King said it would prevent a repetition of waste, but the government glories in waste. He said it would prevent a repetition of delay, and the government delights in delay for obviously it is hoping that by delay the problem of unemployment somehow or other will be solved. Mr. King said that to transfer the whole cost of employable unemployed would prevent a repetition of the inequalities which we have seen, yet this government seems to exalt those very inequalities.

The debate has, unhappily, savoured too much of a repetition of what we heard last year when the opposition, and indeed the people of Canada, frustrated and angry at not knowing the solution and not knowing the government policy, saw a smug and lethargic government mouthing platitudes. Some of these are worth considering. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), for instance, said that the federal government has a duty to sponsor national policies that will encourage a high level of employment. What he said was true, but we have tried in vain to find out what those policies are. Two ministers have spoken, and neither has enlightened us. They both praised the past and carefully forgot the present and the future.

As I said, the minister believed the government should sponsor national policies which would encourage a high level of employment. The government may argue that today there is a high level of employment, but the fact remains there are between 600,000 and 700,000 unemployed and we still do not know what is the answer of this government to the all-absorbing domestic problem which confronts us. The minister said that we should look at these facts quietly and sanely. But what sort of sanity is this on the part of a government which permits, and apparently willingly permits, homes in this country to be broken up, for that is the net effect of unemployment as anyone who has been through it must know. Part of the Liberal clap-trap which we have been fed repeatedly, especially around election time, is this stuff about the sanctity of the family.

What can we say about a government which professes to believe in the sanctity of the family and yet, as a deliberate act of policy, permits those families to be destroyed and broken up as we know they have been, from evidence which has been adduced. In an attempt to secure municipal relief for their families men are leaving them and going heaven knows where. Young men who have to make a way for themselves in life are leaving their homes and going from one town to another. They are unwelcome visitors, and all too frequently are given a railway ticket to some other town so the municipality can avoid paying for their cost of living while they are unemployed.

Today we heard some objection taken by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) to a remark of my colleague, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron), who said that the miseries of the unemployed were being obscured in other clap-trap about liberty. There have been a tremendous number of crimes committed in the name of liberty, and a tremendous number of clichés hurled at us in the name of liberty. But there are various concepts of liberty, Mr. Speaker, for I maintain that it is possible to be bodily free yet still enslaved. The great mass of Canadian workers who are today compelled to live in the thraldom of fear of what may happen to them tomorrow are not free men. But liberty certainly may have some meaning. There is the liberty to go to the soup kitchen, the liberty to be unemployed, the liberty to travel from town to town looking for work. Liberty, as I construe it, means something vastly more than that. Liberty in a modern democratic state must take into consideration the liberty of a man's spirit and soul, as well as the liberty of his body.

As I have said in the past in this house, poverty has caused more hurt and more harm in this world than all the wars which have yet been fought. But the government apparently does not realize that the poverty which arises from unemployment is more than detrimental to the family. It can destroy the individual in a more fearsome way than any nuclear weapons, in that weapons can destroy the body while what arises from unemployment will destroy a man's mind, a man's soul. We have seen that happen too often in the past.

Then another extraordinary aspect of the government's attitude toward this problem was in this statement that many unemployed workers have already been assisted by family allowance payments and old age pensions. In other words the government is depending upon robbing children to see that the unemployment problem is alleviated. I thought the purpose of these family allowances was to help children, not give some sort of subsistence to the unemployed. The statement says that the unemployed are being assisted by the old age pension. That is a wonderful source of solace to those over 70 who still are compelled to work because the pittance given them by this government as a pension is so utterly and completely inadequate. The fact remains that the government has no policy.

At page 1630 of Hansard the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in this debate that productive activity has not been sufficient to absorb the net increase in persons coming into the labour force. If that is so, what is the minister's policy? What is the government's policy to make the productive activity sufficient to absorb the tens and hundreds of thousands of Canadians in this country who want work and who cannot get it because the government has no policy?

Then the minister went on to say that our difficulty in Canada is seasonal unemployment. But that is not the whole difficulty, by a long sight. I would like to know if the government has any policy to solve the problem of seasonal unemployment. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) is going to be given the opportunity next week in his budget speech. Perhaps then he will make some declaration about policy. If we cannot smoke out the Prime Minister and get him to make a declaration this week, perhaps we will get it from the Minister of Finance next week.

Two or three weeks ago a resolution was sent to the Department of Labour from the Winnipeg labour council. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, made reference to it today, and as it was not among the papers submitted to him perhaps I might deal now with some of the points mentioned in it. It says that the labour council calls upon the federal government to take measures to meet the unemployment situation immediately by—

(1) Starting a public investment program federally, municipally and provincially, to build houses, schools, hospitals, roads and so on.

The Winnipeg labour council, along with other labour councils across Canada, are asking for a three-way partnership in this, but it should not be an even three-way split so far as responsibility goes, because obviously the municipalities of Canada are not in a position to pay as much as the federal government, which is the principal taxing power in Canada.

The labour council asks that more homes be built. There is a drastic need for them, despite the evidence which was given by officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation last year in the House of Commons committee on housing. I maintain that there is a need for over 500,000 houses in this country. This year we may have built 105,000 or 110,000, and I ask you to note that these houses were not built for those who needed them most. No, they were built for those who could afford them most, those whose incomes are, let us say, above $4,000 a year. The majority of Canadians do not earn that much money a year. It is for them we have to build houses, and we have to build them on a subsidized basis.

While I am all in favour of a man having a sufficient stake in his country so that he may own his own home, nevertheless it is a demonstrable fact that there are a great many who would prefer to rent their homes. For these people, if the proper accommodation is to be provided, rentals have to be sufficiently low that they can afford to pay them which, in turn, will mean subsidized housing. But the government has turned a blind eye to this whole procedure. It is against the concept of subsidized rental housing. That is one reason there is so much immobility in labour today. It is all very well to say that labour ought to become more mobile, that labour ought to go about from town to town looking for work. But if a man has a stake in his own home, and has a family, he will think several times before he will leave that home and go to another city without any certainty at all that work is going to be available for him. Government policy has helped to make labour immobile.

There are other homes needed. There are homes needed for the aged people in this country, for our old age pensioners, to permit them to spend the evening of their lives in some decency. There is no reason why this government could not co-operate with the provinces and the municipalities in the building of homes for old age pensioners, on a subsidized basis, whereby these old people could know some happiness in the last years of their lives.

Then we need schools in this country; we need them desperately in almost every city. It may be said that this would be federal aid to education. But in the past this government has not been averse to giving federal aid to education, and it has introduced supplementary estimates to help rebuild schools gutted by fire. One of the problems of the municipalities is that they are faced with the necessity of providing either schools or roads. I have in my constituency the two municipalities of East Kildonan and West Kildonan, and in these areas are many married couples with young children. The taxing powers and revenues of those municipalities are quite inadequate to build both schools and roads. They have to make up their minds which are going to be built. Quite rightly the money goes toward the building of schools; but this still leaves people living on streets which at this time of the year are almost impassable.

There is scarcely a province in this country that does not need more hospital beds and more hospital accommodation. Here is an area in which the federal government could help the people of Canada all across the country by providing the financial assistance necessary to build hospitals where required.

Another way in which the minister might be of some assistance next week would be in relieving the municipalities of the sales tax they have to pay on so many things they buy for the uses and purposes of the municipalities. One of the worst examples, of course, is the sales tax which the municipalities must pay on educational equipment. I suggest that this government, when the main burden of roads and schools is on the municipalities, ought to give them this minor relief.

The Winnipeg labour council goes on in item No. 2 to say that the federal government should take measures by providing out of the consolidated revenues extended benefits for those who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits, but are still unemployed. The council states that the government should give them some form of assistance. One of the unhappiest groups in this country today must be those whose benefits have run out and who know that there is no work available for them in the communities in which they live. They have to exist on something. What happens is that they become a charge upon the municipality and, too frequently, upon those who are least capable of withstanding the financial burden.

The labour council then asks that there should be a nation-wide public assistance program to provide for workers not covered by unemployment insurance. There are hundreds of thousands of these workers. At least 20 per cent of our labour force are not covered by unemployment insurance. What happens to them when they find their jobs gone, when they find themselves dismissed, or when a plant is closed down? What hope is there for them except to go on under a form of relief known as municipal assistance? And, once again, the government leaves it entirely to the municipality to bear the financial burden of that assistance.

Then the labour council asks that there should be increased unemployment insurance benefits. After all, if this is a democracy in the modern sense of the word then surely there are certain things which go along with it, and it seems to me that in a democracy a man has the right to work. There has to be a bill of social rights as well as a bill of human rights. Surely a man has a right to work in a modern democracy. If through no fault of his own he becomes penalized by unemployment, then I do not think it is right that the family should have to bear the brunt of that penalty. In other words there is a case which can be made out in economics and a case which most certainly can be made out in morality for very much larger payments to the unemployed from the unemployment insurance fund than they now receive.

One of the results of increasing unemployment insurance payments would be to create more demand in the country, to stimulate demand, and therefore to that extent to stimulate employment in other areas.

Another point raised by the labour council is that the government should, by increased efforts, promote exports through special trade missions and trade agreements with specific countries, and should lower the barriers of international trade generally. I hear in this house frequently, even during this session, this synthetic and phony fight between Liberals and Tories as to which is the low tariff party in Canada. They are both high tariff parties; that is all there is to it. The Liberals will keep the tariffs up and even increase them as long as it suits their particular purpose. But by increasing tariffs we are strangling trade, and by strangling trade we increase unemployment, and the effect is bound to be seen throughout the whole body of our society.

Then we have this labour council asking for adequate measures to maintain and increase farm purchasing power, because the workers of Canada know that when the purchasing power of the farmer goes down there will be unemployment. The urban workers and the rural workers are completely interdependent. When things are going well on the farm, when there is a high farm income, the farmer spends that income in the city, and when he does that in the cities there is high employment and in turn the city worker buys back those things which the farmer himself produces. One group cannot be well off and the other hope to exist not even reasonably well-off; the two are too completely interconnected. Therefore one of the basic attacks which should be made on this problem of unemployment is first of all to increase farm income so that farmers can buy the products of their brothers in the cities.

Another matter which the labour council brings up is this. They ask the federal government to take measures to combat unemployment by substantially increasing Canada's contribution to the Colombo plan and to the United Nations' technical assistance program. Obviously the labour unions of this country are very much further ahead than the government in connection with this matter of assistance to the underprivileged countries. It is an easy matter to get a vote through this house to give arms and equipment to other countries. It is confoundedly difficult to get through a vote that will give economic assistance to the underprivileged countries of the world, and those are primarily the countries of Asia. What they need above all today is capital assistance so they can start to bring themselves up from the poverty in which they now exist. Asia is going to become industrialized, and if we are wise we shall be playing our part now amongst our friends in Asia in helping that industrialization.

This policy would have several effects. One, it would create friends for us in Asia; two, it would help to combat communism by raising their standards of living; and three, and no less important, it would give very important and valuable work to Canadians.

The eighth point of the labour council is this:

> By special measures to help depressed industries and depressed areas by bringing industries to such areas or by helping workers to move to places where work is available.

There are hundreds of thousands of unemployed in this country today who want work. They are not work-shy, but they do not have the financial resources to permit them to transfer to another city, and of course they have no knowledge that when they get to another city they are going to find work. The government has to take some initiative in this matter of helping those who want to go to other places to find work by subsidizing them financially.

The government has to do more than that. It is more than a matter of factories here and factories there. What this country wants to know is what is the policy of the government. We do not know, because we have not been told; and surely the very least the Prime Minister owes to this house, and to Canada, is, before this debate is over, to rise in his place and make that statement of policy for which all Canadians are waiting.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak in support of the subamendment to the amendment respecting unemployment which is now before us. It is quite obvious that I am surprised at having to immediately follow a speaker from this group. It would appear, sir, that on this most important issue of unemployment the Conservatives and the Social Crediters have folded up. I cannot say the same thing for the Liberals. They have not folded up, because they could not; they have never opened up.

Even though there is now, according to their own last figures, a total of something in the neighbourhood of 614,000 Canadian citizens in search of employment—a figure, may I say, only just 225,000 below the peak of unemployment in the hungry 1930's—I have been surprised that, although this subamendment has been moved, not a minister on the government side of the house has seen fit to speak.

I want to say at the outset that I very definitely have been amazed at the fact that although this debate has been going on now for approximately four weeks, and although the numbers on the unemployment roll have been increasing, according to government figures, the Prime Minister, as the head of the government of Canada, has not seen fit to speak. We know the Prime Minister is very busy, but he has been here quite often. He has never moved from his seat to take part in this debate on the biggest problem that is facing the people of the Dominion of Canada. I can only say, sir, that he has the same aptitude as those who are taking part in the rocking-chair marathons which are now the rage in some parts of Canada. He sits glued to his seat.

This is a mighty important issue. It is not one that can be answered by complacency on the part of the government, or complacency on the part of those who support the government. I can come to only one conclusion—I do not like to come to it—and that is that those who support and inform the government either have never been unemployed and hungry or they have forgotten what it is to be unemployed and hungry. I am rather afraid that perhaps the complacency of being a $10,000 or $27,000 a year man has so settled their stomachs that their brains are atrophied. They are refusing completely to face up to the facts and the situation that is facing hundreds of thousands of our people here in our Dominion of Canada.

I know it has been said and even boasted by government supporters that there is going to be a dominion-provincial conference held around April 26. According to the Prime Minister he would be surprised if the question of unemployment was not raised. Well, Mr. Speaker, a preliminary discussion on April 26 to lay plans for a dominion-provincial conference some time in the fall cannot be a great deal of satisfaction to those who are in need of food, of shelter, of clothing and of jobs at the present time.

With all due deference to the first citizen of Canada, who is our Prime Minister, it is not a sign of good government, it is not a sign of leadership in our dominion for him, while he can be in the house, to remain in his seat stroking his moustache and saying nothing about the problem or what the government is going to do about it.

Mr. Speaker, I have been unemployed, and I have gone hungry. I notice that of the 614,000 unemployed in Canada, according to the government's figures, 62,000 live in the province of British Columbia and 31,000 of those live in my own city of Vancouver where I, too, in 1931 and 1932, was unemployed, where I had to go on relief and walk over two miles each two weeks to get supplies and then take them home in a gunnysack.

And then, sir, I knew heads of families by the dozen who went hungry day after day in order that their children could have more at that time, under Liberal and Conservative governments and under your system of free enterprise. What happened? Tear gas by police battalions; concentration camps for single men at 15 cents per day, until the war came along.

This pertains to our present situation. It has been said by the Prime Minister, and I was surprised to hear him say it, that he does not think the situation is sufficiently serious that it cannot be handled by the provinces. We shall continue to point to that statement until something is done to fill the promise and commitment made by the federal government in 1945, when it promised to assume responsibility for the employable unemployed in Canada.

The provinces are not financially capable of taking care of their employable unemployed. I wish to say most emphatically that no province in the Dominion of Canada would dare to take care of the unemployed even on a humanitarian and Christian basis if they were not domiciled in that province, because immediately they did so that province would attract an influx of all the unemployed in the dominion. I care not what province it might be, very soon the province would be bankrupt if it ever outlined such a policy, much as the provinces might like to do on a humanitarian basis. From my many years of experience in the province of British Columbia I know that province received an influx of transient unemployed; they are there today. The province does not dare take care of them for the reason I have just outlined.

And what does this government do? The members sit back smug in the knowledge that they will continue to receive their $10,000 and $27,000 a year and let the unemployed go to blazes—

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Winch: It certainly is true. I defy the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who interrupted so much this afternoon, to get up and outline any policy whereby this government will accept the responsibility for the permanent and transient employable unemployed. You know they won't. You have only to look back in Hansard and read the speech of your own Prime Minister, who said the problem is not so serious that the provinces cannot take care of it. That statement has been made I think not less than three times during the present session, and not less than twice since the commencement of this debate on unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, there is no use of our Liberal friends trying to bluff their way out of this situation. They are not facing up to the problem. They are hoping that something will happen, that these people will remain quiet, quiescent and acquiescent, and that in the summer jobs will open up or perhaps a war will occur.

I wonder how many of those in this house who support free enterprise have ever troubled to trace back in their own minds their experiences during their lifetime in this dominion, to observe the recurring cycles of depression and war and prosperity through war? On the basis of the present unemployment figures it is difficult to understand the reasoning of the government and its lack of action in relation to the unemployment problem. As I pointed out on a previous occasion, the Dominion of Canada from 1914 until the end of December of last year spent the sum of $44,047,947,807 for war. Surely something is wrong with the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and every member who supports this government if they can sit here complacently, with full knowledge that when we require $44 billion for war and defence we can readily find it, and not outline any policy in this house during the past four weeks for action to take care of, first, the immediate unemployment situation and second—and perhaps I should have put it first—the granting of a degree of security to the unemployed in this dominion who are definitely in need.

I wish to point out that if Canada were to go to war tomorrow this government would move and within 24 hours take care of all the financial requirements of war. They could take care of those more than 614,000 unemployed and do as they did in the last war, put 1,100,000 Canadian men and women into uniform and feed and clothe them and take care of them in every way. My hon. friends know they could. Why will the government not take action to correct the unemployment situation? Is it not an indictment of the Prime Minister, his cabinet and every Liberal on the floor of this house that we have proven that we can—and I say we will—have full employment in Canada if men and women want to die for Canada? However, the government will not budge now to take care of the 614,000 unemployed who want to live for Canada.

If we required small arms tomorrow in Canada this government would lay down policies so that we could have the small arms. Is it not logical to ask that they lay down some policy to take care of the 885,690 homes in Canada that have neither hot nor cold water piped in? If we required war planes tomorrow in the event of war, we would get them. The orders would be issued, the plants would be built, and the men and women would be employed. Why does the government not take care of the 998,660 homes in Canada that do not have inside toilets?

If we needed warships, we would have them. Why cannot the government assist in providing electricity to the 443,000 homes in Canada which have no electricity? If we needed medical care, clothing, ammunition and transportation for a million men and women in the armed forces tomorrow, this government would supply them and would do so mighty fast. If necessary they would exert extraordinary powers to accomplish this. In a time of peace, when the men and women and the factories are available, and when the House of Commons is in session and can pass any immediate legislation that is required, why can we not take care of the 1,200,000 homes in Canada that have no refrigerators of any kind; the 938,000 homes that have no vacuum cleaners of any kind; the 1,400,000 homes that have no telephones, and the 2,000,000 people who have no cars?

That is not rhetoric, Mr. Speaker; it is fact. We have the resources. We have the men and women with the brains and brawn. We have the machinery of production and distribution. We have the democratic parliament. Why is it that the government is not prepared to move in a war against poverty, depression and unemployment when it is prepared to move in a fighting war? I ask that every hon. member who supports this government in its inaction ask himself this question.

I believe one of the reasons is that this present government has never had a plan. Its policies are confusion confounded or confounding confusion, whichever way you want to put it. For some reason best known to themselves they have advanced confusing policies, with the result that private industry itself, which wants to get to work, has not been able to get to work because it did not understand government policy and also because this government has not exercised sufficient initiative to give a lead to Canadian industry and Canadian investment. We should have more in the way of secondary industry, and do more in the way of utilizing our own natural resources, instead of exporting our natural resources as raw material and then importing the finished product.

Mr. Speaker, I said there are policies of confusion confounded, and there are. A few weeks ago in this house I mentioned the fact that there were companies in the shipbuilding industry where we have thousands of unemployed, thousands of skilled men and women out of work, but that this country was not permitted to build ships for certain other countries. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and in particular the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) endeavoured to give an answer. What was the answer given in this house by the senior member for Halifax? I presume that what he pointed out was government policy. In a quotation from some communication he stated that the department had advised some firm as follows, and I quote from the second column of page 1386 of Hansard, part of the speech of the senior hon. member for Halifax:

> Perhaps you would be good enough to inform us if your clients are prepared to place firm orders with you on the basis of detailed specifications.

Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Halifax placed this statement on the record I take it that was the government viewpoint and government policy; would this firm advise the Department of Trade and Commerce as to whether their clients were prepared to place firm orders on the basis of detailed specifications. If that is the policy it certainly is confusing, because that is exactly opposite to the policy enunciated only a few weeks previously by the same department in connection with the same firm. I have here copies of two letters. Here is one dated January 3 from the Department of Trade and Commerce, foreign trade service. I want to quote this one section. It is to the same firm and it says:

> We would, therefore, suggest that in the case of any items on the export control list which you wish to ship to destinations other than the United States or in the case of any shipments whatsoever to area control destinations, you consult us for a ruling before you go after firm business. A telegram, a letter or 'phone call in this regard would enable us to give you a speedy ruling.

That is not the only one. I quote from a letter dated December 27, also from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the same firm. What does it say?

> It would be wise to make sure that an export permit would be granted before you go after the business and obtain firm orders. It is possible to obtain export permits before business is obtained.

I am quoting from copies of letters sent out by the Department of Trade and Commerce to people interested in bringing new business to the Dominion of Canada, to the shipyards of eastern and western Canada. They are told by the Department of Trade and Commerce, "See us first about export permits; see us before you ever go after any firm business". Then on the floor of the House of Commons we are told by the senior member for Halifax, quoting from something else, "Get firm business first".

That is enough, Mr. Speaker, to show the confusion that must exist in this department. If that is an example of the way in which the department operates, no wonder that even private enterprise in Canada, most certainly desirous of keeping their plants operating and most certainly desirous of building up export trade, do not know where they stand, do not know what to do. So they throw up their hands and let it go, a situation which naturally leads not only to the part-time operation of plants but, of necessity, to unemployment.

On the shipbuilding end we were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that we are in line with Great Britain. I cannot see it. Just the other day in our Canadian newspapers I read that Sir Wingfield Digby, civil lord of the admiralty, said that British shipyards are free to accept orders from the U.S.S.R. and other eastern European countries. My main point is the confusion. I have quoted only from statements of the minister and the senior member for Halifax and from actual copies which I had made from the originals, which were sent out within a matter of only a few short weeks, as to what had to be done by a company that wanted to try to get into the export field.

I also made mention of the fact that there is a great deal of unnecessary unemployment in Canada because the government has not shown initiative in having manufacturing done with our own raw materials. I was most interested in the statement made the other day with regard to the threat by the United States to curtail the import of crude oil from Canada. If it were not tragic, Mr. Speaker, it would be humorous. Here we have members of this group rising day after day, week after week and month after month, when it is a matter of dealing with a problem of the agricultural producers of this country, when the United States are taking action in the field of agricultural products by stopping imports of our products into the United States, and all we get are a great many platitudes and sanctimonious statements from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. But lo and behold, when there is talk in the United States of some action being taken to curtail the importation of our crude oil, the government and the Conservatives are up on their feet screaming their heads off to high heaven about it. We wonder why. Of course we want to export but, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made the statement from his place in the house last year that Canada had exported $7 million worth of oil and refined oil products to the United States, and we had imported $130 million worth from the United States.

We now have a 30-inch oil pipe line, the Trans Mountain, going into the municipality of Burnaby right next to Vancouver. Because of that pipe line oil companies—yes, private enterprise companies—poured millions of dollars into new refineries and additions to existing refineries. What happened? From that 30-inch pipe line a 20-inch pipe line was run to Ferndale, Washington. We want to export all we can export, but is there not something wrong when the Liberals and Conservatives scream to high heaven about any talk of a stoppage of the flow of our crude oil to the United States, and at the same time say that we are importing $130 million of refined oil products into Canada and only exporting $7 million worth? We have the ability to do the refining in our own country, employing our own industry and our own men and women. We should give more thought to getting more advantage out of our own black gold instead of spending our money on United States oil.

What is true of that raw material is also true of many others. With my knowledge of the resources of Canada and the abilities, capabilities and potentialities of the people of the dominion, I am convinced that if we had a government with any initiative, any vision—yes, any principle of Canada and Canadians first, Canadian employment first and the utilization of Canada's resources in this country—we would not have the number of unemployed we have at the present time. I say that the records of Liberal and Conservative governments have proven the absolute inability of their system to function except in time of war. They have proven their incapacity to govern. They have no vision and no plans.

We cannot expect that the government, even if they are awakened, are going to be very speedy in making long-term plans. Certainly they should have an answer to the request that they proceed now to lay down immediate plans to make certain that no person goes hungry or in want in our country until such time as they can put plans into operation to enable free enterprise to give employment to everyone desiring, able and willing to work.

I think it is an absolute disgrace that we have a Prime Minister, a cabinet and followers of the government who are prepared to move on an hour's notice if men are prepared to die for Canada but are not prepared to take action when there is unemployment in our land. I say they will prove themselves to be a government when they lay down policies and take action to take care of the men and women of this dominion who want to be self-respecting residents of their communities, who want to be true citizens of this country and live for the Dominion of Canada.

Unemployment

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: If hon. members will be patient for a moment or two they will see that I shall not take much of the time of the house. Because of having to attend several committee meetings, I have not had the opportunity to participate in this most important debate. However, with full knowledge of the serious nature of the unemployment situation in Canada and a great personal concern about that situation as it affects many Canadians, I rise at this time simply to express my support for the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier). I also wish to express my support of the vigorous pleas made by members of this group to the government to do something to remedy this most unfortunate situation.

May I also say I was particularly taken with the excellent speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in which he visualized a long-term plan that would reach its consummation in the year of the 100th anniversary of this country. I thought he outlined a number of practical proposals that should appeal to the imagination of the government and the people of Canada. I trust that as the result of this debate the government will take some immediate action to remedy the present situation and develop long-term plans so that this unnecessary evil, unemployment, will be banished from Canada for all time.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I could not let this opportunity pass—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —without having something to say about the serious problem facing Canada today.

Mr. Dickey: Have you got anything to say?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I am quite certain that the 600,000 unemployed indicated by the statistical figures—

An hon. Member: Repetition.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):—will not be smiling tonight but will be taking their situation quite seriously. I feel that the speeches that have been made in the house asking the government to be serious about this problem will, if nothing else, surely bring about some action rather than the sit-down strike which seems to be in force on that side of the house. It is not sufficient for Liberal members to say they are concerned. What the people want is action.

It seems to me that once again history has repeated itself. We have gone the full cycle of the threat of war, then war, then a period of prosperity, and now once again the beginning of a period of depression. Certainly there is no member on either side of the house who can get up tonight and say there is any program under the capitalist system by which our people can be given useful employment. They simply have not brought forth such a plan.

When we on this side of the house make certain representations to the government they and their supporters more or less laugh at them. We are faced today with perhaps the last chance to bring democracy to the world. I say to those on the other side of the house who espouse democracy that unless we can bring about that democracy in the social and economic spheres of the world we are not going to win against communism, and they can chuckle in their collars about that if they like. That is the problem facing the world at this time.

Here in Canada we have our own serious problem. I do not think it behooves us to look far afield and find trouble with other types of economies unless we can do better at home than we have done. The latest figures published by government departments indicate that there is a continued increase in unemployment, and it is surely up to the government to get busy and do something about it.

I have already stated that it seems the cycle of history is repeating itself. I say that with good reason, because today the farmers in this country are suffering from a loss of markets as a result of the capitalist philosophy of so-called overproduction. The farmer has been too progressive, too good in his husbandry, and has produced more than people can eat. Yet we find that the nations of the world have not been able to use these foodstuffs to feed the hungry.

One could readily understand what a real problem it would be if it were one of trying to produce enough food for the people. But when it is possible for Canada and the United States, which are both capitalist countries, to produce an abundance of foodstuffs and other things to enable their people to have a high standard of living, yet no way is found to give these people an opportunity of enjoying those things, then surely any person with any sanity at all will agree that something is decidedly wrong. All we in this group are asking is that those who sit on the government benches do something about it. If you have an answer, then we want it. We are quite prepared to support any of your policies if you will announce them, but do not sit back in smug complacency and try to disregard this serious situation.

Apparently it is not only in Canada that we are running into this cycle. I have here a clipping which indicates something which is happening in another part of the world. From this article it would appear that next year when an atomic explosion takes place there may be a smell of coffee in the air. It may well be that it will be a true smell, indicating that there is a surplus of coffee in Brazil which they are burning. We can all remember the recent increase in coffee prices. It appears that, so far as the capitalist countries are concerned, those who put their complete and unfailing trust in the capitalist system apparently have no answer to the problem of distribution, the problem of giving the people the purchasing power with which to buy back some of the foodstuffs they have produced.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know full well that the members of all groups in this house are good members. They are concerned about their constituents. They are concerned about the unemployed. I want to pose this question to those who are always defending this competitive system, the so-called free enterprise system. What satisfaction is it to the 600,000 unemployed to know that each and every one of them is competing against the other for a job to earn the bread and butter for their families? That is what takes place unless there are jobs for these people to enable them to do decent and honest work to earn a living for their families. I do not care in what part of the house any hon. member sits, he must be concerned about this situation.

There are people who are well paid and who, perhaps, through conviction adhere to one philosophy or another. They, perhaps, are quite honest in their convictions and I grant them the right to their own convictions. But we have certain people like Max Eastman who, in the last issue of U.S. News and World Report, apparently made an attack upon the socialists throughout the world. He said they are the biggest flop in history. All we need do is look over the countries in which God has been provident, and where we have been able to produce an abundance under the capitalist system, yet we find that those countries are unable to prevent these recurring depressions. There are these recurrent unemployment situations such as the one in which we find ourselves today.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of reasons why no government under a capitalist system can find an answer to this problem. I recall that in 1945, prior to coming here, we heard it said that after the war the government would have a shelf of public projects and if unemployment started to show its ugly head the people would be put to work. What has happened to that? A year ago I required of the Minister of Public Works what had happened to that program, and he indicated that there was no program. Back in February, 1951, the manpower council was set up. What has become of this manpower council? We have been told in this house this year that they have not met; they have not been doing anything. Why have they not been doing something? I should like to ask those responsible cabinet ministers what they have been doing about this problem. It seems they have been doing very little, so we find ourselves in a worse situation all the time.

Tonight's Ottawa Journal indicates that there is going to be a revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act. So far as we in this group are concerned we do not believe that unemployment insurance in itself is the answer to this problem. It may be a good thing, and it certainly is a good thing for people who cannot find jobs or who are temporarily unemployed. But we believe that in this country, with all our resources, we can put our people into useful employment. These people could help themselves provided we had a government which would get out and do some planning that would provide employment. The government has put all its faith in the free enterprise system.

The war ended in 1945, and by 1947 the government had started to remove price controls. One after another they were thrown out the window, until we had a condition of unbridled free competition in this country, the kind hon. members opposite seem to like. This has meant that the people who are in a position to charge more and more for the commodities which they produce, and get more and more profits, have practically priced Canadian products out of the world market. Today we are in a very competitive world situation, and we cannot sell many of our goods. It is for this reason we find many factories shut down. They simply cannot meet foreign competition because of the high cost of production in this country.

Let it not be said that it is labour in this country that has been responsible for the increased cost. It is true that today our labour force is enjoying better conditions than ever before, but it is equally true that the profits made since 1945 in some industries have increased year by year. That in itself is the most important reason.

Unemployment

Then we have another situation which has a direct relationship to the position in which we find ourselves. I have a clipping here from a newspaper which indicates that when the United States attempted to get a waiver under the Geneva agreement the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs went to Washington as fast as they could to see what could be done about the situation. They knew full well that such action would have an effect on the Canadian economy as well as on Canadian agricultural products going to the United States or into world markets. But apparently, according to the article and according to the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this House of Commons, they were defeated over there if they put up any tremendous fight to have Canada's position verified and supported in respect of those agreements. Consequently we find today that the United States has now been allowed legally to do under GATT things which formerly they were doing perhaps quite illegally and in breach of the Geneva agreement.

The whole situation is one of indifference on the part of the government. Not only did it not see fit to protect our people in the post-war period so they could buy back the goods they were producing under adequate price controls, but it has left the farmers in a position in which their incomes have drastically deteriorated. This fact has been effective in decreasing employment in those industries which depend upon farm purchasing power.

I would like to put on record figures to show the fall in farm income, a condition which is largely due to the prices the farmers receive for their products, rather than to any lack of production. According to the figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics it is estimated that the drop in net farm income last year was $400 million. In the three-year period from 1951 to 1954 there was a drop from $2,150 million to $1,200 million, or 44 per cent.

This can have only one effect upon the Canadian economy. When we western members came to the House of Commons and tried to advance the idea that we should have adequate floor prices for farm products, that a national livestock marketing board should be set up, with guaranteed parity prices for farm commodities, in effect we were promoting an idea which would be beneficial to the whole economy and would give us a type of stabilization for all our economy at the same time.

What has happened is this. Last year we saw 6,000 workers in the farm implement industry without work. They sent a delegation to Ottawa. I sat in on the conference when they met the Minister of Trade and Commerce. At that conference the minister told the workers, when they asked where they were going to get jobs, that they would have to go to other places and find them. The result is that these people have been looking for jobs; they have been going from pillar to post in search of them.

In all major industries there has been a decline in employment. According to the figures of the government's own bureau, the dominion bureau of statistics, there has been a drop of 11 per cent in employment in the clothing industry, 11 per cent in the railway equipment industry, 11 per cent in the automobile parts industry, 17 per cent in textiles, 17 per cent in primary iron and steel, and 20 per cent in farm machinery.

I feel that if this government were to undertake a program—not just an emergency program, but a long-term plan—to put our people to work, it could be done. That should be a program of full employment, but with this dominion government taking the responsibility it agreed to take in 1940 when the British North America Act was changed, when it undertook to bring in unemployment insurance. As a result of that change I maintain the federal government took the responsibility for unemployment in this country. I say the responsibility rests with the federal government.

There are a number of plans by which the government could make a real beginning. So far as I am concerned I welcome any increase in unemployment insurance, or any enlargement of its scope at this time. The government has been remiss in its duty in failing to undertake a program as the necessity has arisen, by which our people could be properly employed.

This, however, has not been done. We know what is the immediate problem, and I do not think it is sufficient to wait until we have a dominion-provincial conference, worthy as that may be, because when that conference is called there will be dickering back and forth between the provinces and the dominion not only in connection with jurisdictional rights but also in connection with grants. Then the provinces will have to go back to their level of government and begin to carry out some plans. What I want is something begun by the federal government right away. I want them to take the responsibility at this moment, and to begin herewith.

One of the things they should do—it might mean a change in the budget proposals, or the bringing in of supplementary estimates; I do not care how it is done—is the implementation of a national health program. I am sure it would receive the support of this party and also the party sitting to my right because they, too, have spoken in favour of it. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), who sits in support of the government, I am sure would stand behind a program of this kind, because I understand he supported it in the campaign as a result of which he was elected to this parliament.

If instead of waiting, as it did in 1945 when the green books were brought out, it were to assemble data for a national health program, it could begin now with health grants to the provinces, and the provinces could make their plans for a national health program. We need hospitals in every province of Canada. Under the hospitalization plan in Saskatchewan we have advanced to the stage where perhaps we need very few new hospitals. However, I was reading an article—I do not have it with me—in which the minister of health in the Ontario government indicated that they are short of hospitals, and that they do not have the facilities for the treatment of many of the diseases we treat in Saskatchewan on a free basis. I am thinking of polio, cancer, and some other diseases. That is something tangible upon which a start could be made at the present time. If this government had the will to do so, I am sure there is a way.

We remember back in the war years when the government said that anything physically possible would be made financially possible, and that is the principle we should adopt in this instance. Anything physically possible should be made financially possible. I am saying that a national health plan should have a real beginning this year, particularly when we have so many unemployed. The construction of hospitals would employ large numbers in the building and service trades. It would mean that we would also set up—and in my estimation quite properly—grants so that we would have technicians, doctors, nurses and those other persons who are necessary so that when a national health plan came into operation they would be available to look after it.

Any member who has studied the need for a national health plan, and the problems involved in it, will recognize that first of all a great deal of groundwork must be done before such a plan can become operative. The government should not sit idly by at this time and do nothing about it, particularly when they had it in their program in 1919 and again in 1945. Let them get busy and do something about it. This is the time to make the beginning. Start now by giving grants to the various provinces. Get in touch with the ministers of health, and do not dicker along for six or eight months or a year trying to find out who is responsible, or who will do something about it. Do it yourselves, and insist that the provinces come in with you. I am sure they will do so quite readily. You will not have to force it upon any of the provinces if you are really sincere about bringing in the initial stages of a national health plan.

There is one thing we should do, Mr. Speaker, when we realize that there are so many breadwinners unemployed, some of them even eating in the soup kitchens. Because of that fact many children will not be getting proper health care; they will not be getting their teeth attended to; they will not have the operations and the other medical care they should get. A national health plan would be of tremendous benefit to this country if the government would be serious about it and immediately undertake such a program.

There is another thing we can do. I wish to refer to public works projects which have been advocated by different members in this house. I hold in my hand a newspaper report of a speech delivered by the Minister of Public Works, in which he said that a public works program was no panacea for an economy. That may well be, Mr. Speaker, but those of us on this side of the house, and particularly in this group, have never believed and I do not think will ever believe that a public works program would not be beneficial at this time. We have felt that a public works program would in fact be very beneficial at this time. We could build roads and spend a large amount of federal money to put our people to work. I do not think we need to have the sort of theory the other parties had in the 1930's. At that time it was the intention at first to put people to work so they could have some wages. I am talking now about useful employment, construction of highways, public buildings, beautification of our parks, things which will be beneficial to the country.

It is well known that the central government of the United States puts money into every single road in every state in the union. That is a principle which should be accepted in this country. The central government of this country receives the greatest percentage of the revenue of this country, and is therefore in a position to help our provinces and municipalities in the construction of both provincial and municipal roads. Therefore it should take into consideration the practicability of helping those various levels of government so they can undertake their own responsibilities.

Because of the rising cost of production and the rising cost of operation of hospitals, together with the general rise in prices everywhere, our provinces, and particularly our municipalities throughout Canada, are finding it more difficult to carry out their responsibilities at the local level. Rather than remit taxes to private enterprise, such as the government did in 1947 to the tune of $460 million in revenue, when they cut off the excess profits tax, the government should reimpose those taxes. It has been said that private enterprise needs more incentive to make more profits to be in a position to put our people to work. I am one who is convinced that you will never have full employment in this country without public enterprise and public money going into those projects which will make this a better country in which to live.

In the farming industry we have experienced a severe set-back during the past year. I say to the Minister of Labour and to the government that while unemployment insurance will perhaps help those people who have had jobs and who qualify for unemployment insurance, it will not help many of our agricultural workers and other common labourers who do not come under the unemployment insurance scheme. If those people have to depend upon the kind of relief we had in the 1930's, then of course you can understand, Mr. Speaker, the hardship that will be involved in that type of situation.

I am hoping that what I have said will have some effect on this government. We have sat in this house listening and waiting for some proposals to come from the other side which would confirm the fact that they were prepared to meet this situation head on with a program which would give us some answer to the serious unemployment problem. We are disturbed, and I am disturbed over the fact that in addition to the people who are unemployed, many of our people who have little or no incomes, such as the old age pensioners, are, owing to the higher cost of production and the higher cost of living, worse off today than they were in 1939. I do not think this is satisfactory. I believe the government should increase old age pensions so that our older citizens may be able to live decently. It would help to satisfy many of these people.

As farmers in this country, we want our food eaten; we want it to be made useful to the hungry people of the world. I have often heard the Minister of Agriculture say that the farmers' best customer is the Canadian people. Let us make them our best customer for our farm products. Let us have a program under which our older people will have adequate incomes and jobs so they can sit down to their tables well laden with the products of our farms, butter, pork, cheese, beef, eggs and everything else. If we achieve that goal we shall have a better situation than we have today. We know that many of these 600,000 people cannot get the kind of living they are entitled to in this country. What I am saying in effect is that this government is washed up. I was going to use a stronger expression, Mr. Speaker. We are not satisfied that this is petty criticism of the government.

I came here after the last election quite prepared to listen to anything the government had to say after being returned by the electors of this country. If they had a program that could guarantee us full employment, that could guarantee the farmers farm security and could guarantee the workers job security, I was quite prepared to listen to what they had to say and to support their program. Since that time the situation has been getting worse and worse, and they do nothing except sit in their places and belittle what we say from this side of the house. If they have better programs, I shall be quite happy to listen, but we just do not want to make this whole matter frivolous. It is quite serious.

Some hon. members are saying that I have taken 40 minutes. It may seem like 40 minutes to them, I do not know. I do not mind one bit whether they like it or not. I am trying to put forth what I think can be a program for the Canadian people. Our people in this country, rich in resources and rich in men and women ready to work, are not prepared once again to go back into the hungry 1930's or anything like that. We believe the challenge is great today. If we are fighting anything we are fighting an idealistic war, a cold war or a hot war.

I have often heard members across the way talk about communism. If we are to fight communism we have to fight it with an idealism that is going to be better than theirs, with an economic philosophy, with a social philosophy and, if you like, with a spiritual philosophy that is better than theirs.

It is not sufficient, Mr. Speaker, just to cat-call. It is not going to be sufficient simply to try to belittle the ideas of others. We will first have to have a positive program in this country. We will have to put our own house in order before we go across the seas and try to cram down the throats of other people the idea that we have the best system in the world.

I believe the democracy we have in this country, fortunately, is not necessarily tied to capitalism or free enterprise. There are social and economic orders in other countries, such as New Zealand, where they do not have a capitalist philosophy operating in their economy at the present time. Therefore I for one believe that to the political democracy we have to add the economic democracy; and by economic democracy I mean full employment, self-determination and the means by which we can have fullness of life in an economy rich with resources.

We can have that, Mr. Speaker, when the government opposite is prepared to sit down and do some thinking and some planning, and put into operation some of the things we on this side of the house have asked it to do.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a letter from Miss Nora Lea, president of the Toronto branch of the Canadian association of social workers. This letter is of interest to every member from metropolitan Toronto, and I presume each member of the house who comes from metropolitan Toronto has received a similar letter. It is an invitation to us to attend a meeting of this association to be held in Toronto on Saturday morning next. The purpose of the meeting, as stated in the letter, is this:

> —we would like to consider with you what is the present situation with respect to employable people for whom jobs are not available, who are ineligible for unemployment insurance, or whose benefits have run out.

The concluding paragraph of the letter states:

> We will look forward to considering some of these aspects with you and your colleagues in the house as well as the members of the other level of government in the Toronto area. This is a matter of serious import to great numbers of men, women and children in this community.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the problem which confronts me and the other members from the Toronto area—and it must also confront the Liberal members as well as the opposition members—is that although this debate has been going on since the 1st of March we have as yet received little information from the government which we could take back to these people on Saturday morning in order to tell them what is the answer to their problem.

I presume the minister will be closing this debate, so I would ask him if he would be good enough to give a direct answer to two or three questions. First of all, can he give us some assurance that at the forthcoming meeting with the provinces this question of responsibility for the employable unemployed will be discussed, and that a serious effort will be made to reach an agreement regarding the responsibility for those people?

My second question is, will the minister consider extending the deadline for the supplementary unemployment insurance benefits beyond April 15, in view of the fact that late spring is approaching with its effect upon unemployment?

My third question is this. Has the government given consideration to or is the government prepared to take steps such as those suggested by the hon. member for Spadina? As far as I am aware, the hon. member for Spadina is the only member speaking from the government side who has put forth any concrete proposals as to what should be done, and who has done anything except make an effort to apologize for the government's present position. Has the government given consideration to undertaking a housing scheme, for instance, or any other public works program involving as it will deficit financing in order to meet the unemployment situation?

If the minister will give us an answer to these three simple questions we shall have something concrete to take back to these people with whom we will meet in Toronto on Saturday morning.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment to the main motion lost. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: Just before you put the question, Mr. Speaker, I think it might be appropriate to observe under the circumstances of this evening that the residual effects of some of those hard facts about which we have read lately appear to have affected the judgment of some of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the main motion lost.

Mr. Patterson: I should like to raise a grievance, so may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has, I think, spoken in this debate.

Mr. Knowles: He spoke to the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: Then the question arises, on a motion to go into supply, even if an amendment and subamendment have been moved; is it not true that a member can speak only once?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: It is now ten minutes past ten o'clock, and I shall put my finger on the authorities and be in a better position to assert my point when this motion comes before us again. I want to tell hon. members that on a motion to go into supply one may speak only once. He may speak on any subject whatever, but only once. He cannot raise two or three grievances. Hon. members have chosen to speak on unemployment, and those who have spoken on that particular subject have disposed of their right to speak about other grievances on this motion; see Beauchesne's third edition, citation 468.

Mr. Quelch: Some members have already spoken twice, on the amendment and the subamendment.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may be quite right in that some hon. members have taken advantage of the situation to speak on the amendment and the subamendment in the same debate, because once an amendment has been moved that, in itself, creates a debate and the subamendment is a consequence of the first one. I agree with the hon. member that there is that complexity about it.

As I say, there is the opportunity of moving one amendment and one subamendment with respect to one grievance. The minute you want to go from one grievance to another subject, as some hon. members do who have spoken on the first grievance, they ought, especially if they have spoken twice on the amendment and the subamendment, to be reasonable and wait until another motion is moved in order to discuss another grievance. If hon. members are satisfied with my views at this moment, we might perhaps ask if the house is ready to accept the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Although the debate has been long, Mr. Speaker, I think my memory is still longer and I do not remember having spoken to the main motion or either of the amendments. I have a particular grievance which I should like to place before the house, so we might perhaps leave the matter until tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has not spoken, and if he wishes to do so, it is his right. I shall, therefore, have to put the motion for the adjournment of the house at this moment.

Mr. Knowles: Before you rule on the point raised when the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) attempted to speak, will you permit us to make representations on the point tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker: As I said, I am not deciding the point at the moment. If hon. members had been ready to accept my views I would have considered it decided. If they are not, I shall put my finger on the authorities and give them later. I know that the authorities do exist, and I shall quote them to the hon. member. If at that time hon. members have views on the subject, I shall be very pleased to hear them.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Quelch: I would like to point out that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) has not spoken on the main motion. He spoke only on the amendment.

Mr. Speaker: That does not alter the point. Let us say that at this moment, until the point is decided—it is time to adjourn—we will postpone any settlement of this question to whatever time the motion is presented again.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, relying on the unanimous consent given on Friday, I shall move to go into supply to take the remainder of the supplementary estimates. Then, if this matter has been cleared up and if it is not likely that there will be much in the way of grievances, we possibly could consider calling those after the supplementary estimates, but not necessarily so. In any event we shall also call the War Veterans Allowance Act and, if there is any time, any legislation standing in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

It being fourteen minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

REFERENCE OF PETITION TO COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake) moved:

That the petition for a private bill to incorporate Consolidated Pipe Lines Company, presented on March 29, 1955, together with the clerk of petitions' report thereon of March 30, 1955, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders for such recommendations as may be deemed advisable.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

Mr. Castleden:

What are the requirements of grain content of No. 1 feed screenings, as certified by the board of grain commissioners?

Mr. Dickey:

It shall contain not more than three per cent (3 per cent) small weed seeds, chaff and dust combined, not more than five per cent (5 per cent) ball mustard, not more than six per cent (6 per cent) small weed seeds, chaff, dust and ball mustard combined, not more than eight per cent (8 per cent) wild oats, and shall be cool and sweet.

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS, QUEBEC

Mr. Boisvert:

1. How many persons were registered with the national employment offices in (a) Trois-Rivieres; (b) Sorel; (c) Drummondville, in the province of Quebec, on the 1st of January, 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954 and 1955?

2. How many of these persons were in receipt of unemployment insurance benefits at the same dates?

Mr. Gregg:

1. The number of unplaced applicants on the reporting dates closest to January 1, 1950-1955 and the number of active claimants for unemployment insurance benefit (exclusive of short-time claimants who are not usually registered for employment) on December 31, 1949-1954 in the Drummondville, Sorel and Trois-Rivieres employment offices are as follows:

Unplaced Applicants

Reporting Date	Drummondville	Sorel	Trois-Rivieres
Dec. 29, 1949	1,367	2,189	4,116
Dec. 28, 1950	1,170	1,759	3,279
Jan. 3, 1952	1,695	1,365	3,813
Dec. 31, 1952	2,022	1,655	5,040
Dec. 31, 1953	2,918	2,149	5,293
Dec. 30, 1954	2,243	3,070	5,225

Active Claimants

Reporting Date	Drummondville	Sorel	Trois-Rivieres
Dec. 31, 1949	1,117	1,760	3,377
Dec. 31, 1950	840	1,731	2,606
Dec. 31, 1951	1,537	1,215	3,574
Dec. 31, 1952	1,891	1,366	4,585
Dec. 31, 1953	2,923	1,992	4,355
Dec. 31, 1954	2,141	2,980	4,721

2. The records in local employment offices are not kept in a manner which readily identifies those applicants for employment who are actually in receipt of benefit. The data described as active claimants represent those applicants who make a claim for benefit. In the process of adjudication some of these claims may be disallowed.

Unplaced applicant statistics are compiled by the employment branch of the local office and claimant statistics by the insurance branch. Because there is always a certain number of applications and claims in process, it is possible on occasion, such as is shown above for Drummondville on December 31, 1953, for the number of claimants reported to be slightly in excess of the number of applicants.

MENTAL INSTITUTIONS—PATIENTS

Mr. Proudfoot:

1. How many patients were residing in Canadian mental institutions at the end of the calendar years 1943 and 1953?

2. What are the ratios of the numbers of these residents to the number of persons in Canada?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 1943, 46,631; 1953, 60,565.

2. 1943, 395.9 per 100,000 population; 1953, 410.4 per 100,000 population.

Questions

GOVERNMENT EGG PURCHASES

Mr. Hahn:

1. How many dozen eggs were purchased by the government to place in storage, during the years 1952, 1953 and 1954?
2. What was the total cost of handling, phone calls, telegrams and meetings, in the procurement and holding of these eggs for each of the years indicated?
3. In each of the above years, what was the (a) freight cost; (b) expense of regrading; (c) over-all gross cost of the eggs?
4. What was the net loss or gain to the government in the handling of eggs for each of the above years?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. Shell eggs were purchased in storage according to the specifications of the agricultural prices support board as follows: 1952 production, 1,345,980 dozen; 1953 production, nil; 1954 production, 4,953,768 dozen.

2, 3 and 4. (a) 1952 egg costs subdivide as follows:

Egg purchase cost	$548,854.65
Freight and cartage	24,984.47
Telephones and telegraph ..	2,228.90
Storage following purchase	4,107.12
Other costs of handling	3,769.15
Gross cost	583,944.29
Revenue from sales	520,401.84
1952 net loss to the board ..	$ 63,542.45

The trade was responsible for any regrading in both buying and selling operations.

(b) No eggs purchased in 1953.

(c) Accounts are not yet complete for 1954 shell eggs but all eggs not resold as shell eggs have now been processed into frozen egg melange by the board. Present estimates indicate that the total net loss may be about the $700,000 estimated by the Minister of Agriculture in his statement to the agricultural conference in December 1954.

FISH STICKS

Mr. Bell:

1. Do any concerns process fish sticks in Canada?
2. If so, what concerns, and where?
3. What has been the total production each month since January, 1954, of cooked and uncooked fish sticks in Canada?
4. What has been the total export of cooked and uncooked fish sticks to the United States since January, 1954?
5. How does the export tariff on fish sticks compare with the tariff on the other main fish products?

Mr. MacNaught:

1. Yes.

2. There is no official record but it is known there is production by eight or nine firms.

[Mr. Dickey.]

3. Information not available on monthly basis. Total production 1954—1,693,000 lbs. Production 1955 to February 28—836,181 lbs.

4. Figure not available but quantity insignificant.

5. Presuming reference is to United States market, import tariff in that country makes it uneconomic to export fish sticks to that market.

Mr. Goode:

1. How many automobiles have been purchased for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Nelson, British Columbia, in 1954, 1955?
2. Were these purchased subject to tender?
3. If so, what firms tendered and what were the tender prices submitted to the government?

Mr. Garson:

1. 1954, 6 automobiles; 1955, 3 automobiles.

2. Yes.

3. List of firms and net prices quoted after deduction of trade-in allowance on old car are set forth below:—

MENTAL INSTITUTIONS—ADMISSIONS

Mr. Proudfoot:

1. How many patients were admitted to Canadian mental institutions in 1943 and 1953?
2. What are the ratios of the numbers of these admissions to the number of persons in Canada?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 1943, 10,946; 1953, 23,131.

The above includes first admissions and readmissions.

2. 1943, 92.9 per 100,000 population; 1953, 156.8 per 100,000 population.

The above includes first admissions and readmissions.

STATIONARY ENGINEERS

2. If not, will such arrangements be made soon?

Mr. Pinard:

1 and 2.

Approval has been given to a five-day 40-hour week for stationary engineers and firemen and will become effective as soon as sufficient additional stationary engineers have been trained to meet departmental requirements.

INSTITUTIONAL COSTS PER PATIENT

Mr. Dickey:

1. 1943, $0.98; 1953, $2.70.

2. Tuberculosis sanatoria (non-federal sanatoria only) 1943, $2.65; 1953, $6.25.

Public general hospitals: 1943, $4.08; 1952, $10.45; 1953, data not yet available.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

"O.H.M.S."

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the abbreviation and designation of "O.H.M.S." been discontinued on letters dispatched by any of the departments of the government and the designation "G" substituted in lieu thereof?
2. If so, for what reason was the change made?
3. Who authorized the change and what was the date of such authorization?

Mr. Pinard: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CURRIE REPORT—IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all letters, memoranda, etc., in the possession of the Department of National Defence, which have been exchanged between the Auditor General or any official on his staff and the Department of National Defence or the minister or any official thereof, since January 1, 1950, concerning irregularities in accounting and other procedures as referred to in appendix "B" of the Currie report.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, without judging in any way the propriety of tabling the documents referred to in the motion, if there were any, I should like to say that a search of the files of my department has been made and that, so far as can be determined, there has never been any exchange of correspondence between the Auditor General or any official on his staff and the Department of National Defence or any official of the department concerning irregularities in accounting and other procedures as asked for in this motion with regard to appendix "B" of the Currie report. I would suggest that the motion be dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion dropped?

Some hon. Members: Dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BENEFIT RATES, ADJUST CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act and, inter alia,

(a) to increase benefit rates, as well as to provide for certain changes in the duration of both regular and seasonal benefits;

(b) to adjust the contributions, and to change contributions from a daily basis to a weekly earnings basis, and benefits from a daily to a weekly basis;

(c) to provide a graduated scale of allowable earnings in place of present provisions related to casual earnings and non-compensable days and,

(d) to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF HOUSING ACT TO OLDER HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Public Works if the government proposes to introduce at this session any legislation with a view to extending the lending provisions of the National Housing Act to include older houses? If not, why did the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation advocate such policy yesterday in a speech in Toronto?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the general question is that these are matters of government policy which are always announced at the appropriate time and in the proper place. As to the remarks yesterday by the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, as I understand it they were made in the course of a forum held in Toronto at the meeting of the national home builders association. I don't believe this was a text, and I did not hear the remarks. I saw only the report in the paper, and as the president is absent from Ottawa now I have not had an opportunity to discuss it with him.

Mr. Fleming: When the minister says that announcements of such matters will be made in the proper place and at the proper time, does he mean they will be made in parliament by a minister of the crown?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Winters: I think it goes without saying this is the place in which legislative changes are made, and in the first instance my hon. friend referred in his question to changes in the legislation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

SUPPLEMENTARY BENEFITS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF DEADLINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the late spring and its effect upon seasonal unemployment, will the government extend the deadline for unemployment insurance supplementary benefits beyond April 15?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): A good deal of consideration has been given to that matter but the government has not decided to take the step referred to.

THE MINISTRY

REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF CABINET MINISTER FROM SOUTHERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Will he advise the house if he is making any progress toward appointing a cabinet minister to represent the great industrial section of southern Ontario?

Mr. Weir: You have no chance.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whenever there are appointments to the cabinet they will be announced in the house immediately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER REPORT CONCERNING CONSCRIPTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an article in this morning's Gazette concerning the report that a high government source has indicated that Canada may soon have to make a decision on conscription for northern defence? If so, has the minister any comment to make on the report?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I must thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. I have seen the article to which he refers, and I may say in reply to his question that there is no basis in fact for the assumption in the article to which he has referred.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

RELOCATION OF EMPLOYEES LAID OFF AT A. V. ROE PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Are any steps being taken to relocate the people who are being dismissed by the A. V. Roe company as a result of the order of the government to cut back production of the CF-100?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The Minister of Defence Production follows the instructions of the Department of National Defence as to the requirements of that department. If any program of the type mentioned is initiated, it will be initiated by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Has the department any more recent plans for another type of plane which will replace this type of production?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not want to be too persistent, but can the minister give us any idea if the new plans for another plane will have any effect in creating employment for the people who are being laid off, and how soon that will be?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No lay-off has taken place. The A. V. Roe company has been given notice of a cut-back in the number of planes to be produced which will take place some time next summer, I think next September. The intention is to maintain as normal employment as we can until the new aircraft comes into production. That is the purpose of regulating the flow of aircraft from that plant. I do not know that I can give my hon. friend any more information.

TRADE

OIL—REQUEST BY UNITED STATES REFINERIES FOR GREATER DELIVERIES FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Carl O. Nickle (Calgary South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Weir: Make it quick.

Mr. Nickle: In view of the minister's recent statement concerning the possibility of United States restriction on the importation of Canadian crude oil, could he now comment upon the fact that United States refineries in the Pacific northwest and great lakes areas—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Sinclair: You made your speech yesterday.

Mr. Nickle: —have now formally requested—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nickle: —from the Alberta conservation board—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member began his question by asking the minister if he could comment, and in order to find out what he has in mind we will have to hear on what he proposes the comment should be made.

Mr. Nickle: Would he comment on the fact that United States refineries in the Pacific northwest and great lakes areas of the United States have now formally requested from the Alberta conservation board delivery during the next month of even more Canadian crude oil than has been taken—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nickle: —by United States refineries in recent months?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is the victim of his own ambition. Could he not shorten his question and give less information?

Mr. Nickle: I think I have now asked the whole question provided the minister was able to hear the last few words over the interruptions that were being made.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am quite satisfied to read the information my hon. friend has given me in his very well annotated bulletin, but I have not done so yet. If I have an opportunity to do so I will be glad to inquire into the matter.

IMMIGRATION

CANADIANS ALLEGED TO BE DISCOURAGED FROM RETURNING TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. On March 16 I asked a question regarding Canadians abroad not being allowed to return to Canada as settlers. Has this matter been brought to his attention? Many of our young men are going to be kept out.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): No one wants to keep out Canadians if they want to return to Canada, and what my hon. friend has said has been drawn to my attention.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The Chairman: When the committee rose previously we had reached resolution 601.

Architectural branch—
Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—
Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amounts required—
601. Ottawa, $1,732,666.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, this item is to complete payment for the expropriation of a property at the corner of Bay and Wellington streets, and for the acquisition of a former seminary building. The further amount required to complete payment for the seminary building is $1,576,666. I have been looking through the estimates, and while this item is to complete payment may I say I have always understood that the purpose of supplementary estimates was to tidy up odds and ends here and there. In June last year an amount of $2 million was voted of which $1 million was for practically the same item. Here we have an item of over $1,500,000 to tidy up things, and I do not see any reason why the government has brought in this item at this time as a supplementary estimate. I have newspaper clippings here to prove that the seminary building has been under the control of the government for some three years. I want to find out why this item was brought in as a supplementary estimate and not as an ordinary estimate in the regular routine of providing for government requirements. This matter is not new. It has been before parliament for some three or four years. It was a new building, and there is no doubt in the world that the mounted police certainly needed new quarters. They were spread all over the city of Ottawa and had no real home. Why this building has been purchased when, even during the time it was occupied under a rental basis, it was found to be inadequate for mounted police purposes,

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

I do not understand. Yet, the government has gone ahead with the purchase of this property.

In the Ottawa Journal of May 21, 1951, we find this:

New seminary being acquired by government.

The new seminary today was slated to become headquarters for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some R.C.M.P. staffs in the city are reported getting ready to move into the building about August 1.

No official figure on the deal could be obtained. It was understood that final details still had to be ironed out between federal and diocesan authorities.

The seminary, just now nearing completion, cost almost $4 million. It is located in Overbrook.

The large building will provide badly needed space for the R.C.M.P.'s expansion program, which will see new laboratories and training facilities all gathered under one roof.

The R.C.M.P. now is spread over the city in the following locations:

Then there is a list of the locations given.

Then again on September 12, 1952, there was an article in the Ottawa Citizen headed "Seminary as Mounties' HQ". It reads as follows:

A sprawling building in Overbrook that was built as a seminary but never occupied will become the headquarters of Canada's federal police starting next month, it was learned today.

Millions of fingerprints, thousands of records—

And so on. There follows a list of things to be moved.

It will concentrate under one roof offices and divisions which have been scattered all over Ottawa. It will free about six floors of the justice building on Wellington street and smaller offices in a score of locations throughout the downtown area.

All R.C.M.P. divisions except "A" division, the local police detachment and the training division at Rockcliffe will move to the seminary. "A" division will move across from the Canadian Bank Note building into the justice building to occupy some of the space that will become vacant. The training division and the crime detection laboratory will stay at Rockcliffe barracks.

The move will rank with that of the dominion bureau of statistics in magnitude. It will take several weeks to complete owing to the mass of fingerprints and records that must be transferred. Divisions will be moved in sequence to their new offices.

Evidently the building was occupied on a rental basis at that time, in September of 1952.

In the Ottawa Journal of April, 1953, we find an article headed, "Fournier backs building policy". The article reads in part:

As to the seminary building, Mr. Fournier told the house that this new structure and an additional building which will cost $150,000 "is absolutely necessary for the efficient operation of their headquarters, and to take care of their normal expansion requirements." The smaller building to be put near the huge seminary will have 12,500 feet of floor space.

Evidently the new building was in process of being purchased, that is April 10, 1953.

In the Ottawa Citizen of November 16, 1953, some six months later, we find an article with this heading, "$10 million project; New R.C.M.P. buildings will be built here".

The subheadings are as follows, "Homes, offices for men"; "Have choice of two sites", and the article reads:

A new permanent R.C.M.P. headquarters and housing development is to be built in Ottawa within the next five years at a cost that may run well over $10 million, it was learned today. The force said in its annual report that it is making plans for construction of the new headquarters which will replace its temporary quarters in Overbrook—

This is the new building they are talking about here. The building was rented at that time.

The site has not been picked out, but it may be on land already owned by the government, either south of the Rideau river and not far from the projected Ottawa railway station when it is moved from its present centretown area, or east of the city on the proving ground site at Green's creek which has been mentioned as a possible site for the proposed national defence headquarters.

In any event, officials said, it would not be in or near the centre of the city, but would definitely be in a suburban location.

It will be larger than the present temporary headquarters building, running to around 260,000 square feet of space, and designed to accommodate all branches of the force, including stores which are still located in rented quarters in downtown Ottawa.

Adjoining the new headquarters will be a housing development for members of the force, and shops, stores and other subsidiary buildings.

The present temporary headquarters building was occupied by the force only a few months ago but already is inadequate. Halls and passages are used for filing cases and records and the building is not the most suitable because it was designed originally as a religious centre.

It is held by the Public Works Department on a five-year lease with an option for two more years if required.

"It is definitely hoped that the new headquarters will be ready when the lease runs out", a works department official said today.

That would mean that work would have to start on the new headquarters within two or three years. The site must be approved by the national capital planning committee and the federal district commission, as well as the Public Works Department and the force itself.

Preliminary plans have been submitted by the force to the Public Works Department, and there may be an appropriation in the estimates for the 1954-55 fiscal year to cover the cost of preparing detailed plans.

Once the site is picked, it is expected there will be few delays in proceeding with the plans and the letting of a contract.

That article was written on November 16, 1953, and the building still had not been purchased but was occupied on a rental basis. Even at that time the building was found to be inadequate for a mounted police headquarters. The government decided, after renting it for two or three years, to go ahead and purchase it. I should like to know why the government delayed so long in buying it. If it was suitable and large enough at the start, it is probably big enough now. The article in the newspapers says it is inadequate. Another question I should like answered is whether or not the rental paid has been applied on the purchase price. Will the Minister of Finance answer that when he has time? I should like to know also why some of this money has not been put in the regular estimates. Is it an attempt to slip it through with appropriations for other buildings in the Ottawa district? It looks as if this was something the government was trying to keep out of sight.

In June, 1954, there was an amount in the supplementary estimates of $1 million for this building, that is a year ago. On June 23, 1954, a question was asked by the hon. member for Kamloops concerning this building, and it appears at page 6575 of Hansard for June 23, 1954:

Mr. Fulton: I have a question or two about this item. I understood that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were acquiring a large building out here as a new headquarters at a cost of some $6 million.

The amount now mentioned is $6 million, but before that time an amount of $5 million had been mentioned. We would like to know what it is going to cost when the additional building is added. I continue the quotation:

I do not find it listed anywhere under acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, or under the administration item or anywhere else.

Mr. Garson: I am afraid that I cannot assist my hon. friend in that regard. We are the occupants of it as the mounted police, but the purchase of it would be arranged through the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Fulton: That is different from the other items in the minister's department.

That is another thing I want answered: why make any difference in connection with this building?

Then, on June 25, two days later, there was a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra which appears at page 6773 of Hansard. It reads as follows:

Mr. Green: Why was it necessary to have this amount in the supplementary estimates? It is two-thirds of the total vote. The Department of Public Works is supposed to have the new look, and we understood that they had everything up to date.

Mr. McIlraith: They have.

Mr. Macdonnell: We want evidence of it.

That is what we want, evidence of it.

Mr. Green: They are asking for an additional $2 million for public buildings in Ottawa, in the supplementary estimates.

Why was not at least some of this amount put in the main estimates?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that $1 million is for the seminary and $1 million for property on Wellington street which was expropriated last year.

Mr. Green: Why was not at least some of this amount indicated in the main estimates?

Mr. Bourget: I am told that at that time the decision had not been taken. That is why it had to be brought in with the supplementary estimates.

They had this building. Evidently they knew they were going to buy it. But still the minister's representative said at that time:

I am told that at that time the decision had not been taken. That is why it had to be brought in with the supplementary estimates.

That was last year. Why has this been brought in with the supplementary estimates this year? Why was it not included in the regular estimates? It is about time that this government, in its business activities, would put them out in the open so that people could see them, and not try to mix them up with other buildings, with other moneys invested for the district commission of Ottawa. It looks as if this might be a hidden fixture. It is just another part of the government's secret activities in hiding the estimates that refer to the business done throughout the year.

I do not see why they did not put it through as an order in council. That is one way they have been hiding things for years. I know the official opposition is sick and tired of this kind of business, and I think the people of Canada are getting sick of it, too. I do not see why the Minister of Finance could not have included this in the regular estimates. I do not see why he has coupled it up with something else, and called it money for the district commission, or for Ottawa, or something else. Then it might appear that only $1 million was spent last year. Does this mean that it is costing $6 million, or does it mean that the original purchase price was $5 million? Why has there not been something in the regular estimates either last year or this year?

Mr. McIvor: Carried.

Mr. Hodgson: No, it is not carried yet, and it will not be carried for a while. And I am surprised that the hon. member for Fort William is calling "carried" on an item of this kind that has been hidden for some three or four years. He is surely not the man who would stand up for that sort of principle.

Mr. McIvor: I am paying close attention to the hon. member.

Mr. Hodgson: I have the floor, and I am making the speech; and if you want to speak, you can speak afterwards.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Hodgson: I would be glad to hear what you have to say about it, if you are a minister of the gospel and a member of the House of Commons.

The Chairman: Order.

[Mr. Hodgson.]

An hon. Member: Don't bring that into it.

Mr. Hodgson: I will bring anything I like into it. I have the floor. And I would like to hear from some of you rubber stamps.

The Chairman: The hon. member should confine his remarks to item 601, which is under consideration.

Mr. Hodgson: Let the rubber stamps keep quiet, and I will finish my speech. I would like to know the total purchase price, and what it is estimated it will cost when completed. I would like to know why this has not been brought in, in the regular way, in the main estimates rather than leaving it to the supplementary estimates both last year and this year.

There is no doubt about it that, as I said before, the mounted police need new quarters. But I think I have proven that this building is inadequate for them. They needed a new building. Probably it will cost $10 million before we are through. We know that the Hon. Mr. Fournier, when minister of public works, brought in an estimate on one occasion for $140,000 for a building in the city of Ottawa, and before he was through it cost $600,000. So we want to know whether this is going to be the same set-up. This seems to be the way the government is doing business, and I think it is about time they got down to doing it in a straightforward and frank manner, so that the people would know what they are doing.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel at the moment over the price being paid for this building, but I would like to make reference to the manner in which it is being purchased. At page 3648 of Hansard for April 9, 1953, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), in questioning the then minister of public works, Mr. Fournier, had this to say:

Is there any intention to expropriate the seminary?

In reply the then minister said:

I would not give any inkling as to that. Actually for the space we get in that building, I think we are paying a little bit less than we do in the normal unit price over the city. I would not say yes or no. The government has not considered that. We needed space badly for the staff of the mounted police who had been asking for it since the war, and this was the only place that we could get rapidly. We have taken a lease on it for five years. As to the future intention of the government, the matter has not been considered, to my knowledge.

On May 22, 1954, I find this in the Ottawa Citizen:

The government Friday provided $1 million in supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year toward acquisition of the Overbrook seminary building now occupied by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police headquarters.

And on November 30, 1954, the following:

A new concentration of government buildings at Hurdmans Bridge was in prospect today with announcement that the purchase of the seminary there had been completed at a cost of $5 million, the purchase including 114 acres of land.

The seminary now is occupied by the R.C.M.P. as a headquarters and there is no proposal to move the Rockcliffe training establishment or the A division uptown offices from their existing locations . . .

The purchase of the building had been practically decided a year ago but the Public Works Department and the vendors decided to wait until November 1 to have the final arrangements made.

It is mentioned there that in the late spring of 1954, which was a year ago, the government had provided $1 million in the supplementary estimates for the purchase of this building. Then, in the estimates before us at the moment there is an amount of $1,576,666 as payment toward the purchase price of this building. On Friday evening the Minister of Finance stated that this was the final payment. What I wish to know is this: Are any of the payments made by way of rentals for this building included in the purchase price? Are they being applied against the purchase price?

One further question is this: Have any of these payments been estimated for in the regular estimates? If not, when were other requests brought down for the completion of the payments on this building? I must say I have been unable to find them in any of the estimates, other than these two amounts which total something more than $2,500,000.

Finally, let me say that I have no quarrel with the purchase of the building. At the moment I have no quarrel with the price being paid; but I think these payments have been made in an irregular fashion, and not according to the practice of the House of Commons.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, in support of what has been said by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., I should like to ask the minister some questions. It has come to my attention that nowhere in the estimates can one finds any details of the transaction—that is, other than what has already been stated, and what has appeared in the press in the last two or three years.

The only information we have been able to get was obtained last Friday when the minister was asked what this item was for, and he was unable to give the information. He asked for delay so that he could get it. Then he informed the committee that the building was being rented for $370,000 a year. Probably it was to be purchased for $5 million. I notice that the area is something like 229,500 square feet. The property consists of 113 acres. The rental per square foot is not exorbitant when one considers what would be paid normally, but it was not niggardly either. Why was there concealment in this proposition? Why was it not a clear-cut transaction? Why was the transaction not brought before the house and explained that it was necessary to abandon the project they had in mind to build a new building for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police designed and constructed to fit their particular and peculiar requirements? Why were they possessed of the idea all of a sudden when the building, which I suppose started to appear on the eastern horizon at Hurdmans Bridge, should be taken over? Why did they suddenly abandon the plans that they had to build one which would be more acceptable to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? There is no particular objection to the purchase of the building. If I were the owner of the building I would try to make the best deal I could and secure the best price. Was there an offer of purchase made or a tentative offer? Was any deal commenced or consummated that can be laid before the house, giving the information as to why this deal was necessary?

According to the assessment of the city of Ottawa, the building is rated at $2,568,375. Three parcels of land are involved in it. One parcel contains about 25¾ acres and is valued at about $37,600. Another parcel contains 5¼ acres and is valued at $8,175. The other parcel contains 82 acres and is valued at $24,600. According to the Ottawa assessment, the total is $2,638,750. I understand that is not based on the Abbott formula for making assessments on public buildings.

The time has come for the government to get away from their characteristic of concealment and come clean and give us the facts. If the minister would explain the proposition in a clear-cut fashion so that everyone could understand, there would be no objection to it. If the proposition had been submitted to the house in the first place as an ordinary transaction that the government was going to consummate it would have had the hearty support of the house. To use this hidden channel of carrying items through the estimates does make one suspicious of the whole deal and it is looked at with distrust. No one can come to any other conclusion than that they are trying to put something over. Does the minister not think that it is time the government came clean on this deal?

Mr. Ferguson: Would the Minister of Justice not save a lot of time—and time has already been wasted—if he produced the facts regarding this transaction so that the members of parliament could get the information and transmit it to the public that this deal is open and aboveboard in every respect, instead of taking pot shots at various ministers and getting no definite information? Surely the pressure could be relieved and we could go on to other subjects if the facts were laid before parliament, where they should be given. Are we now to believe that during Mr. Fournier's regime as minister of public works, and the regime of the present Prime Minister when he was minister of justice, something happened and all of a sudden overnight it was realized that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police ought to have a building that would cost millions of dollars? If that is so, then some person in charge of that department at that time was negligent in performing his duties. He should have been well aware of the requirements of the police and should have been preparing for them. He should have known that the department would require a building to house the police adequately. Apparently they had to jump in and buy a building which does not suit the requirements and nobody in this house can get any information about it.

Nobody in the country would ever think of purchasing a building under this method, a building that would be adequate to perform the services as efficiently as one which was designed for the purpose of housing the police. This deal should never be rammed down anybody's throat. We should not be told that we can buy a building already constructed that will meet all of the requirements of the police and enable them to function properly in that building. That is ridiculous. This building must have been purchased because of some unforeseen pressure that there was no other building suitable for the police. How ridiculous that is. Imagine any government or any private corporation functioning in that manner. This government is not prepared to cope with circumstances as they arise from time to time. The situation is that this government either does not know, or knowing, is not doing its job. If they know, then they are ignoring their duty. They suddenly realize that we must purchase this building for $5 million, $7 million, or $8 million. The amount is still unknown. The facts of the transaction are still unknown. If that is the way they are carrying on business, then the public should know what is going on. If we are to get the facts from the Minister of Finance, I would like to hear them. I do not think he can give us the facts regarding this deal in the few minutes that he has at his disposal.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, out of politeness I have been waiting for all the questions from the other side to be asked at the one time. I did not expect, however, to sit here and be lectured by one who apparently did not pay any attention even to what the members of his own party were saying about the deal.

Mr. Ferguson: If I did not pay any attention to them, I know I will not get anything by paying attention to you. I will learn nothing from you.

Mr. Harris: I agree that the hon. member cannot learn anything from very many people.

Mr. Ferguson: You learn nothing; we all know you.

Mr. Harris: This transaction is a perfectly simple one.

Mr. Ferguson: You are too big for your shoes.

Mr. Harris: If hon. members had followed the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., they would have heard, I think, a strictly correct chronological statement of what happened, with one exception. This building was being constructed from 1948 on. About 1950 it was decided that the R.C.M.P. who, of course, had need of extra quarters for quite some time and not overnight, as my hon. friend seems to think, would have to be given extra and better quarters. The result was this building—and I am going to telescope for a moment—was rented for the purposes of the R.C.M.P. under negotiations which ran from 1951 and were concluded in 1952. It was not until 1953 that the owner of the property indicated that the property might be for sale. It was not until 1954 that the property was bought, and that is the simple explanation of the timing of the whole transaction.

That also explains why there was no item in the estimates that were prepared a year ago last fall. The explanation as to why it is not in the estimates for the coming year is that we put it in the supplementary estimates for this year to clean it up at this time. It is finished. I do not think there is anything hidden about that. I am sure hon. members will agree with me that this is the normal method of dealing with supplementaries.

Mr. Lennard: Will the minister permit a question? Will he fill in the gap between the first supplementary estimate and the last one?

Mr. Harris: Yes, I will come to that. At the time that the supplementary estimate was being discussed here last May or June—I think I heard a date of June 22 referred to but I cannot find a reference to it on that date—the first supplementary estimate of a year ago was a sum of money to be used to secure the transaction, if it could be negotiated. I think hon. members will agree, however, that at that point, without a firm agreement, it would not be likely that there would be any indication given in parliament as to what price we would be prepared to pay for the property. Negotiations for the property were continued throughout the summer last year and only completed by a treasury board minute in August of last year. From then on the next step and the only step to be taken is to put a further item in the final supplementaries for the current fiscal year and vote it, and that is what I am asking parliament to do at the moment.

I think I have given the committee the basis of the transaction, but I should like to comment on the price for a moment. I notice that the hon. member for Wentworth was not complaining about the purchase price, so I take it, but I notice that the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., and the hon. member for Simcoe North thought that we ought to have spent $10 million on a new building instead of the $5 million we are spending on this one. I want to warn them that while I was not minister of finance—

Mr. Ferguson: Does the minister not think that it is sometimes better to spend $10 million and get $10 million worth than to spend $5 million and not get your value? That is what I said; that was the implication. Do not make statements that are misleading.

Mr. Harris: In every expenditure made by the government there is always the problem that if you spend $1 you might not possibly get the most you can hope to get, but if you spend $2 you are sure of getting it. That is a decision that has to be made every time something is purchased, particularly a large property of this kind.

I agree that if the Minister of Public Works were to build a building designed specifically for the R.C.M.P. it would be a better building from the standpoint of the police force; no question about that. The point is: is it worth another $5 million? That is the point, and I suggest that in this case—

Mr. Hodgson: Are you paying $5 million for this or $6 million? How much would the other building cost that would make it a $10 million building?

Mr. Harris: I am not familiar with the expenditure on any other building that is being built. I have not an estimate for this and I do not know. I do know the purchase price for this building which is $5 million.

Mr. Lennard: I asked the minister to fill in the gap between the first $1 million in the supplementary estimates and this amount of $1,500,000. There is a difference of nearly $2,500,000 that has to be accounted for.

Mr. Harris: I thought my hon. friend was referring to the time rather than the money. In every public works vote for a province there is an item which can be used or transferred to permit the construction of buildings that can be completed in that one year when other items are not completed. We have transferred $2,500,000 from that fund toward the purchase price of this building. In doing so we saved interest on the purchase price and that is why it was transferred.

Mr. Lennard: In what year was that?

Mr. Harris: This would be in the normal estimates for the current year. No money was paid on this building until the calendar year 1954.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister has suggested a figure of $10 million for a properly designed building. I never suggested any figure whatever. I merely suggested and said that in my opinion the requirements of the police should have been known over a period of years.

Mr. Harris: They were.

Mr. Ferguson: Long before this building was purchased a concrete idea of their requirements or a near-concrete idea should have been formulated. Therefore the government should have inquired into the cost of a building, whether it be $1 million, $2 million, $5 million, $10 million or $20 million. That figure should have been arrived at as a comparison figure between the cost of building a building suitable for the requirements of the police and any other. They should have had that figure to compare with the price they paid for this building which the minister admits does not meet the requirements fully.

Mr. Harris: I did not say that.

Mr. Ferguson: But you agreed that if a building had been designed for the purposes of the police it probably would have been a better building.

Mr. Harris: For $10 million it certainly would have been.

Mr. Ferguson: Would you suggest that you might even have improved it for $5 million over the same figure?

Mr. Harris: I did not suggest that.

Mr. Ferguson: Is it not possible, leaving out studding the building with diamonds, that it might have been better even at $5 million if it had been planned for the purpose? Your answer to that is simply yes. I am sure it would have been better at $5 million if properly planned. Is that right? You will not concede that.

Mr. Harris: Of course not. After considering this building and the use to which it could be put, we purchased it. We think it is a good building for the purpose. I quite agree that if we had hired an architect and told him to design a building for the R.C.M.P. he could have designed one which probably would have had more outside entrances, probably a back door for motor cars to come into the building and probably a larger mess hall for the sergeants. But we cannot afford these things in some cases.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister says "We cannot afford these things." This is one of the first instances I have ever known this government to say "We cannot afford these things."

Mr. Harris: You have heard it many times.

Mr. Ferguson: Since the government has lost the support of the Vancouver Sun they are probably getting down to earth and giving consideration to these things. They are afraid of the signs right across this country. The minister says that he has never had an estimate placed before him of the cost of a building adequate for the use of the police and then he says that we cannot afford these things. They cannot afford it even if it costs less than $5 million. That is a fine admission from the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should like to refer specifically to the question of cost, and perhaps the minister would be good enough to help us. I understand from a previous question that the usable space of this building is 229,500 square feet, and a rental of $370,000 a year seems to be reasonable. However, the purchase price would appear to work out at about $22.50 a square foot. Could the minister indicate if this building is completely air-conditioned, does it have all these fine finishes such as terrazzo floors, does it have a modern type of heating and cooling system? Perhaps the minister could give us some information on that because this would seem to be an outside price. I understand that architects consider that they can provide the best type of accommodation with all these facilities I am speaking of for somewhere between $15 and $20 per square foot. As the hon. member for Simcoe North has said, there must have been a few diamonds in it if you are going to be able to squeeze it up any higher than that.

Mr. Harris: I warn the hon. member that the average cost of these items he mentioned should not be applied to the city of Ottawa. If he confines himself to asking whether or not these costs are average for Ottawa we will be able to find the information for him. The practice has been for the Department of Public Works to obtain at least two valuations of a building before it is purchased and that practice was followed in this case. We obtained two valuations, one of $4,491,750 and the other $5,386,242, and the purchase price was $5 million. Both firms are well known for their competence in making valuations and I think it will be found that the building is well worth $5 million.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Simcoe North that if ten years ago we had gone to work on a plan we could have planned for a perfect R.C.M.P. building, but in 1954 we had to decide whether we should build a building for the R.C.M.P. We probably might have spent the $10 million that the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., mentioned. But the building would not have been ready for another three or four years. This building is ready. It has a value to that extent that we would not be able to be in a building that we built until three or four years from now.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I understand from the minister that building costs in this area are generally considerably higher than they would be, say, in cities of comparable size in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Harris: I have always understood that building costs in Ottawa were slightly higher.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That situation might be caused by the fact that the government was prepared and willing to pay slightly more.

Mr. Harris: I think it is caused by the terrain.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I understand that there was an option. I understand that this building could have continued to be rented under an option during this period when plans might have been drawn and a building quite acceptable to the R.C.M.P. could have been constructed. Is that right?

Mr. Harris: I do not quite understand.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): There was an option to renew, at the same rental, the lease that was in existence covering the building?

Mr. Harris: Yes. The lease was for five years with an option of renewing it for two years.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): What I mean is this. Would that have been adequate time to construct a building according to plans and specifications which would have met R.C.M.P. requirements?

Mr. Harris: No; not from last year. We could not have had a building of this kind ready for three years from last year, with the building difficulties we have in Ottawa.

Mr. Low: Is the building complete now?

Mr. Harris: Yes. We have been in it for three years.

Mr. Low: I understand that you have been in it; but sometimes you go into these buildings when they are not completed. What I am anxious to know is whether this is the final, complete price of the whole business.

Mr. Harris: Yes, as far as I know. I have been looking in this coming year's estimates and while I have not been able to run through all the items while we have been talking here, I do not see any. There may be additions such as garages and the like. But there is no substantial building going on, so far as I know. Certainly there is nothing here except completion of the purchase price of the main building.

Mr. Low: As to the two figures which the minister quoted as having been given by reputable firms as to the value, there is a difference of nearly $900,000. Was one estimate to be for sale and the other for purchase? That is a rather broad spread, it seems to me, in the valuations made by reputable firms on a building of a value of about $5 million.

Mr. Harris: I think there is not a difference of $900.000 in their valuations; there is a difference of about $400,000.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Not in the figures the minister read out.

Mr. Harris: I beg your pardon. That is right. The difference is about $900,000.

Mr. Low: Does the minister not think that is a rather broad spread in valuation on a $5 million building?

Mr. Harris: I am not in the business. These are two companies which have done a considerable amount of this work for us. I would suppose that nearly a million dollars in five is probably quite a considerable variation. At the same time I would not want to say that these people do not know what they are doing.

Mr. Lennard: Some short time ago I understood the minister to say that about $2,500,000 of this amount was used from appropriations that had not been used by the Department of Public Works for some other building or buildings?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Lennard: What I want to know is this. Is it common practice for the Department of Public Works to use moneys that have been allocated to certain specific buildings; that is, instead of building those buildings, to use the money for some other building without those buildings ever appearing in the estimates at any time, and without their being mentioned by the government in any part of the picture?

Mr. Harris: No. That is not the practice. In fact, it would be contrary to the financial practice and to the Financial Administration Act. When parliament passed this first $1 million item last spring, parliament authorized the purchase of this building. Thereafter it was in order to allocate funds on hand to the purchase of that building.

Mr. Lennard: What funds?

Mr. Harris: The funds that were in the unused portion of the public works vote of last year.

Mr. Lennard: What were those votes from which that $2,500,000 was taken? What buildings were those votes specifically for?

Mr. Harris: The Ottawa grant is usually a lump sum which is set out, of course, in the original estimates. That is true of all the provinces. The money is gathered together and listed under provincial items; and you can transfer from any unspent money within a province, if you will.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister tell me what that money was allocated for when it was voted by parliament a year ago? Parliament apparently was asked to vote X dollars for buildings in Ottawa. Did not the minister know for what buildings that money was to be allocated? If so, what buildings were dropped?

Mr. Harris: No buildings were dropped. I do not want hon. members to understand that the treasury board or the Department of Public Works arbitrarily decides, after a vote in the house, that building X will not be built but that building Y will be built. That is not what is done. If the progress of building X has not used up the amount of money which has been allocated to it, the unspent balance may be used to build the other building. That is what is done here.

Mr. Nowlan: We have heard a great deal about this mythical treasury board which scrutinizes so carefully every government expenditure. Treasury board apparently passed X dollars for the acquisition or the building of buildings in Ottawa. I want to know what particular building or buildings treasury board approved in this expenditure of X dollars which afterwards was diverted to the purchase of this building.

Mr. Harris: I perhaps misled my hon. friend. I did not suggest that there was any one particular building in Ottawa about which the item was underspent. I did say as to the province of Ontario that if your provincial sum is underspent, you can allocate within the province. When it comes before treasury board, it comes in the form of a recommendation that a sum—$2,500,000 in this case—might be used towards the purchase price of this building; and attached to it is a certificate that the moneys allocated for the province are sufficient to provide for this payment having in mind the progress of other various works.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister say at what date that decision was made?

Mr. Harris: Yes. A while ago I said August, 1954.

Mr. Nowlan: August, 1954? That was after we voted the estimate.

Mr. Green: I should like to go over the dates again with the minister. I understood him to say that this seminary building was under construction from the year 1948 on. Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Victoria, Ont., read from a press dispatch a statement that the building had cost under $4 million. Is that figure correct?

Mr. Harris: I have not that figure.

Mr. Green: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. Harris: I do not keep the clippings. I do not know whether that was in the press dispatch or not.

Mr. Green: The minister has no information as to what the building cost in the first place? Is that right?

Mr. Harris: We did not build it. I would not know what it cost.

Mr. Green: Then apparently in 1952 the government entered into a five-year lease of the building?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

[Mr. Harris.]

Mr. Green: At a rental of $370,000 a year or just a little bit over $1,000 a day. Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: Then for how long did the government pay this rental of $370,000 a year?

Mr. Harris: My understanding is that the rental was paid down to the date of the purchase which was, as I say, last year and that the purchase price then bore interest from then on, and we would pay interest and not rental.

Mr. Green: Then it was not part of the agreement that the moneys paid by way of rental would apply on the purchase price?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Green: How much rent was paid altogether for the building?

Mr. Harris: I do not know whether that has been adjusted. Total payments for rental to March 10, 1954, were $449,166.62. I take it that was the day on which there was a firm offer made by the owner of the property.

Mr. Green: What date was that?

Mr. Harris: March 10, 1954.

Mr. Green: So that on March 10, 1954, the government made a firm offer to purchase the building.

Mr. Harris: No, they made a firm offer to us that they would sell.

Mr. Green: What was paid from that date in March, 1954, until the date the purchase went through?

Mr. Harris: Nothing was paid until after the $1 million vote was put through the house on the supplementary estimates early last summer. Since that time we have paid $3,500,000.

Mr. Green: Did I not understand the minister to say interest was paid from the time the building was offered for sale by the owner? Is that right?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: How much interest did the government pay?

Mr. Harris: I am sorry, I did not understand my hon. friend. The bill for interest will of course be adjusted when we complete final payment. We expect that will run to $56,666 at 5 per cent.

Mr. Green: First of all there was $449,000 odd paid for rent. Then there was $66,000—

Mr. Harris: It is $56,000.

Mr. Green: Then there is $56,000 for interest.

Mr. Harris: Right.

Mr. Green: The minister said something about the building being offered for sale in March. At what price did the owners offer it?

Mr. Harris: Five million dollars.

Mr. Green: They offered it then at $5 million, and apparently in June of 1954 there was a vote of $1 million placed in the supplementary estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: Later in the year the government took about $2½ million from the Ottawa buildings vote of the Department of Public Works—

Mr. Harris: Right.

Mr. Green: —and applied it on this purchase.

Mr. Knowles: Is it Ottawa or Ontario?

Mr. Harris: Ottawa.

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us whether he is referring to vote No. 369 under the Department of Public Works, which was for $10,640,000?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: The details of that vote are found at page 442 of last year's estimates, and they include roughly 20 different buildings in Ottawa, each of which has a figure placed opposite it. Apparently the government just picked $2½ million out of that vote. Is that what happened?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Green: Why was something not put either in the original estimate for last year or in the supplementary estimates which were dealt with in June—

Mr. Lennard: Or in the regular estimates this year.

Mr. Green: —or in the regular estimates for the fiscal year which starts the day after tomorrow, rather than taking $2½ million, half the total cost of this building, from this vote for other buildings so that there was not the slightest possible chance of any member of parliament being able to trace that vote?

Mr. Harris: The answer is of course the one I have already made, that the time factor is involved. We did not have an offer from the owners that they would sell the property at the time these estimates were being prepared. My hon. friend would have been the first to suggest to the government we should not put an item in the blue book for a building that we had no idea was for sale. The first occasion on which we could bring it before parliament was on the presentation of the first supplementaries to last year's estimates, namely, in late May or early June, because at that time we had an intimation from these people that they would sell at the given price. Far from there being any secrecy about the matter, we bring it to the attention of parliament at the earliest possible moment we can in the ordinary and everyday way. Parliament approved of the purchase by voting $1 million in last year's supplementaries. That is all. It could not have been done in any better way, if I may say so.

Mr. Green: Yes, but at that time I think the house was not told what the total purchase price would be. I may be wrong.

Mr. Harris: I think you are perfectly right, but the reason is that the government had not in fact agreed to purchase the property at $5 million. At that time the offer was outstanding but had not been accepted and we were in the process of trying to negotiate the purchase price. Hon. members will understand that under those circumstances we would not want to be indicating what our view was about the value of the property. It is true that at a later time we did complete the purchase by agreeing to buy at the price of $5 million. We might have been able to get it for less, but as it turned out we did not.

Mr. Green: Why could the balance of the purchase price not have been included in the estimates for 1955? Then the house would have known exactly what the deal was. If this practice is followed by the government in other cases we have no possible way of checking these purchases. If buildings are going to be bought with moneys taken out of a vote covering 20 other buildings, how is it going to be possible for members of parliament to make an adequate check of these transactions?

Mr. Harris: I quite agree that this is the type of thing one should avoid if one can, not that there is anything wrong in it, but if you can have an orderly purchase of property through the public works branch for a 12-month period, well and good. However, I would think that hon. members would not suppose that we would close our minds and our thoughts to purchasing property in any period other than in September, October and November when the estimates are made up for a given year. When the item of $1 million was drawn to the attention of hon. members in the supplementary estimates last year they were asked to vote for the purchase of this particular property. I agree that because of the fact negotiations were continuing it was not possible to disclose the purchase price, and I do not think the minister who presented the item to the committee did in fact do so.

As I say, the purchase price had not been negotiated so that to that extent hon. members might very well say that they voted $1 million thinking that the purchase price was going to be $2 million. I agree that is one criticism that can be directed at this particular item. On the other hand, hon. members are now being given the item with all the details of the purchase. If they feel that $5 million is not the proper price to be paid for the property they have precisely the same right as they would have had if the item had appeared in the blue book.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, no.

Mr. Harris: Oh, yes. That is the situation. As I say, I would hope that we would not do this too often. I would hope that you could have orderly planning.

Mr. Green: How many times have you done it in the last year?

Mr. Harris: So far as I know, we have not done it at all. I would hope that it will not happen, but here it is. Nevertheless, there is no difference in virtue between a supplementary estimate authorizing the purchase of a building and an item in the main estimates. It does the same thing, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. Green: Why would it not have been fairer to the house if the whole balance of the purchase price had been included in this supplementary estimate rather than picking up $2½ million, half of the total price, from a vote covering other buildings?

Mr. Harris: My hon. friend could perhaps lay some of the blame on me because I did not make it clear the other night when I was giving information that the other $2½ million had been allocated in the manner I have now described, but on the other hand I think he would also agree that we should not inflate our estimates and that if I were now asking hon. members to vote $3½ million, being the $2½ million already used in the manner I have indicated and this $1 million, you would have an artificial vote of $2½ million that you did not need. Under those conditions, you would have your estimates considerably higher, and I think my hon. friend agrees we should avoid that if we can.

Mr. Green: We were told last year by the Minister of Public Works that he had taken a broom and cleaned up his department; we were going to have a new deal in the Department of Public Works. They were only going to call for money to be voted that they would spend, and yet in his own department apparently we have the one case where they picked up $2·5 million out of a vote which was supposed to cover other buildings and used that money rather than put it in the estimates and have it brought before parliament. Surely the Minister of Finance does not condone procedure of that kind.

Mr. Harris: I think we are disagreeing, Mr. Chairman, and I hesitate to say it again, on the timing. This is the only occasion on which we could vote this money. We could not have put it in the blue book until the transaction was completed and part of the purchase price paid. Even if you forget for a moment the $2·5 million, we have already paid $1 million, and the purchase is in fact authorized. We have an outstanding agreement of sale from last summer bearing interest at 5 per cent. The sooner the money is paid the more interest we will save. Surely, the only way to do it is to bring it forward into the supplementary estimates, get the money and pay it on the purchase price to complete the transaction.

Mr. Rowe: Why did we vote the $1 million?

Mr. Harris: I think the $1 million probably could have been in the $3·5 million, but once again it is a case of voting enough to secure a contract and not enough to make the purchaser feel he is getting all he is asking.

Mr. Rowe: The purchase had not been made.

Mr. Harris: No, the purchase had not been made. We had an offer then from the owner of the property and we were engaged in negotiations which would lead to purchase. We had to have money to make a down payment if we got an agreement, and that is what, in fact, the $1 million was intended for.

If my hon. friend will forgive me, if we voted this in the main estimates for this coming year, we might not pass that item for some time to come. At any rate, it is not something for the future, it is something in the past; it is done. The arrangements have been made. This is just like every other item; it is to clean up existing obligations of the government of Canada.

Mr. Green: Did the Minister of Finance know that the Department of Public Works had picked up $2·5 million to apply on the purchase price of this building by getting it from the moneys voted for other buildings?

Mr. Harris: The answer is yes, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Finance was the chairman of a meeting of treasury board that authorized this manner of dealing with the subject.

Mr. Ferguson: Was the $2 million the net down payment?

Mr. Harris: No, the down payment was $1 million. We are speaking now of the $2·5 million.

Mr. Ferguson: I know you are.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Finance was a party to this transaction, then, of taking the $2·5 million from the other vote in public works and applying it on the purchase price of this building, without bringing the expenditure to parliament; is that correct?

Mr. Harris: I hope the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra does not think I am so simple as to fall into a trap like that.

Mr. Nowlan: It is no trap; it is a fact.

Mr. Harris: The Minister of Finance authorized the payment on the property which had already been purchased by agreement on which a payment of $1 million had been made as a down payment, consequent upon parliament having passed it. Now, without the item in the supplementary estimates of last May or June there would have been no subsequent payment because parliament had not authorized the purchase.

Mr. Green: The minister did not seem to know anything about this $2·5 million last Friday night when we were asking about it.

Mr. Harris: As I said a moment ago, that was my fault. I had the figure in front of me and I did not read it out. I accept full responsibility for not explaining the method of financing this building until this moment.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a further word regarding this $2·5 million. As I understand it, when parliament passed item 369 in the estimates for the year which ends tomorrow, it was under the usual provision that that money was to be spent as detailed in the back of the book, with the usual statutory provision that if any changes in those details were to be made they had to be submitted to and approved by the treasury board. The Minister of Finance now indicates that was done. I suggest that there must have been some pretty clear-cut report or recommendation laid before the treasury board. There must have been a formal minute which would indicate how it came about that out of a vote of $10,640,000, there was spare money to the tune of $2·5 million.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a guess that was fairly accurate; he said there were about 20 buildings here and I count 21, so that is getting pretty close. They varied in amounts from $50,000 for the construction of a parking area north of Wellington Street to a vote of $2,400,000 for a food and drug laboratory for the Department of National Health and Welfare. I believe that was built. As I look over these estimates, it seems to me that something was done on most of them. What I am trying to do now is set out what I believe to be the picture, and I believe I have stated it correctly. I am asking the minister to produce, if he cannot do it today he can table it in the house very soon, the minute of treasury board and the recommendations dealing with this matter so we will know just how it was that $2·5 million was saved out of this item. He should let us know the secret as to which of these items was not spent or was underspent. Surely the treasury board, of which the Minister of Finance was chairman at the time, did not pass this minute without knowing what it was doing. How about letting us know what was done? Will he table this minute of the treasury board?

Mr. Harris: I am glad to tell my hon. friend the date on which the treasury board changed the $2·5 million, and I can assure him now, and will give him any evidence he wants, that treasury board does not act on those things until there is a recommendation that, in fact, there is a deficiency in the vote and these moneys can be used for that purpose.

Mr. Knowles: I do not want to be obnoxious about this, but it does seem to me we have a right to see that minute of treasury board. In fact, it is pretty near to an order in council. I believe that it has the same status as an order in council. It is a little different from the ordinary order in council in that automatic publication is not required. Surely these matters are not secret. This makes me wonder how many other instances there may be where the details in the back of the book have been altered after the item has been voted by parliament, as laid down in the Financial Administration Act. I am ready to admit that is provided for by law. When we pass an item in the front of the book, the details at the back of the book are mainly for our information, but it is more than that. The money is to be spent as provided in the details, unless the government wants to make a change which it can do by application to the treasury board. Surely that application must include all the facts. Surely we are entitled to those facts.

The minister nods his head, but that is not recorded in Hansard. I ask again, can this minute be tabled?

Mr. Harris: Certainly.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I want to ask a couple of questions here. The minister said the decision to buy this building was not made until a year ago. However, back in 1952 according to the public accounts some $203,000 was spent on repairs and alterations to that building. Now, were any other repairs and alterations besides that $203,000 made?

Mr. Harris: Did my hon. friend say $303,000?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I said $203,-230.18.

Mr. Harris: My notes say that we spent $247,305.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): This would be spent in 1952?

Mr. Harris: That is the grand total in repairs and alterations.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): Was any consideration given, in the final figure, on account of those payments, and these alterations?

Mr. Harris: Yes, we took it into account in considering the valuation of the $5 million on the other building we are buying.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): They never gave consideration in regard to the rentals.

Mr. Pearkes: One of the most serious aspects of the situation seems to be that in June of last year we received assurances from the Minister of Public Works that in the future there was to be no inflation in his estimates. Yet, two months later, in this one item, they are able to collect 25 per cent of the amount authorized for expenditure in Ottawa. Surely there is a case in which there was very definite inflation of the estimates. Within two months of the passing of the estimates in the House of Commons he was able to collect $2,500,000.

Mr. Harris: I did not say that. August, 1954, is the treasury board minute authorizing the purchase of the building. That was not the date on which the $2,500,000 was transferred.

Mr. Pearkes: When was this money made available? The minister told me, if I heard him correctly, that it was made available in August of last year.

Mr. Harris: Yes, but that was the date of the purchase agreement. Is the hon. member asking when the $2,500,000 was paid?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, when the $2,500,000 was paid.

Mr. Harris: Well, $1 million of it was paid, or authorized, on September 30, and $1,500,-000 on February 11.

Mr. Knowles: Two separate treasury board minutes?

[Mr. Fraser (Peterborough).]

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. McIvor: Is it not a fact that this $2,500,000 that was not spent on other buildings was used on this one so as to save interest?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): To save face.

Mr. Rowe: It does appear, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very irregular way of doing business.

Mr. Harris: Perfectly regular.

Mr. Rowe: It is irregular, despite what the hon. member for Fort William has said. I note that the minister says it is entirely regular. Well, if it is, it is strange that when the government asked us to vote $1 million they must have known what the situation was. Treasury board would not vote $1 million unless they knew what it was for.

Mr. Harris: Treasury board did not vote it; parliament voted it.

Mr. Rowe: But it was voted, and your intention was to buy the building.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Rowe: The intention was to buy the building at the time. Then, $1 million should not have been voted, unless $5 million was voted. It would not have cost any more, if these moneys had been voted in the regular fashion. Surely, when it is making a purchase, the government does not need to tell the seller that because a vote is passed in parliament the government has to use the total amount when making the purchase.

Mr. Harris: No, but what vendor would not pay any attention to the vote?

Mr. Rowe: As the hon. member for Simcoe North points out, at the rate the government spends money, sellers know that you do not need to pay out all that is voted. I know the minister has lived in a rural district and traded horses, and he will know that you do not—

Mr. Harris: I know my hon. friend trades them, and he never tells in advance what he is going to pay for an animal, so that that information gets to the ears of the man who is selling it.

Mr. Rowe: No, but I will say this to the minister, that nobody has ever charged me $1,000 more for a horse, merely because he thought that that meant I had $1,500 more in my pocket.

Nobody is going to sell anything to the government of Canada without knowing he is going to get paid for it. No salesman expects that the minister, spending upwards of $5 billion each year, is not going to have enough to pay for an item like this. If it was the intention, as it appears to have been, to pay that amount, then it should have been voted as $5 million. And if it required only $4,500,000 it would be easy to come back and say that in the vote of $5 million you had $500,000 more than you needed.

And so I think we should have the information asked for by the hon. member from Winnipeg. We should have the details. I am glad to hear the minister admit that it must be irregular, because it had not happened before. And I think he has given the intimation today that he does not intend to let it happen again. In any event we would hope that it would not happen again. While I am casting no reflection upon the integrity of any of the parties to the deal, and while I am not questioning the value—I am not arguing whether it is worth $5 million or $5,500,000 or $4,500,000 or $7 million; you may have got a bargain; we do not know about that—I certainly do feel that this is a very irregular procedure. It is unfair to the opposition, unfair to parliament and unfair to the taxpayers to make a deal in the way this one was made.

The minister seems to imply that it would have made some difference had the vendor known that a vote for $5 million had been passed. But surely that would not affect the price of the building. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich points out that you had $2,500,000 that you picked up from somewhere else. We do not know what other building that was dropped from, but we do know there was $2,500,000 from somewhere. If you had been aboveboard in stating what it was to be spent for it would not have cost any more. I think we should be told what other building suffered, if any did suffer. And if no other building suffered, then you voted $2,500,000 you should not have voted in the first place.

I do not think we should hold up the item indefinitely. It is a matter that can be regretted, and I think the government more or less admits that its procedure has been a bit irregular.

Mr. Harris: I have not said that.

Mr. Rowe: No, I know the minister has not. He says he is not going to be led into any trap, by admitting anything. Somebody says that it is not a trap, that it is a fact. Whether you admit it or not, the fact is that we say this was highly irregular.

Mr. Hees: In addition to tabling the minute of treasury board which, I understand, the minister has agreed to do, would he also table the lease agreement and the sale agreement, as well as the evaluation certificates?

Mr. Harris: Before we go further, of course I have no objection to the tabling of all these papers in the normal way. I would not wish to undertake to do it myself, but I presume the Minister of Public Works, or whoever negotiated the transaction, would do it. I can give the details of the lease, and the bare fact that $5 million was the purchase price. I do not know of there being any arrangements other than that. If my hon. friend wants to have the papers, I would have no objection.

But I have one word to say about the treasury board item. I regret I shall have to inform the committee that it has not been the custom to table treasury board minutes. I was not aware of that a moment ago. I am prepared to answer any questions asked, but I gather that the tabling of treasury board minutes is not done.

Mr. Knowles: Is it because of custom that it is not done, or is it prohibited by law, or is this part of the veil of secrecy?

Mr. Harris: As hon. members know, treasury board is in fact a committee of cabinet, and the only results of cabinet meetings which are tabled are orders in council. Under those conditions I cannot table it.

Mr. Knowles: I must say I have seen such things tabled as minutes of treasury board. Now, whether there were various categories I do not know. If that cannot be done, will the minister answer a question if someone puts it on the order paper—I can think of someone who will—as to what happened to the details of this particular vote? Which of the items were spent in full, which were not spent at all, and which were spent in part? How did $2,500,000 come to be saved?

Mr. Harris: Yes, I shall get that information.

Mr. Knowles: That set of questions will be on the order paper shortly.

Mr. Ferguson: On an item of $5 million we have two appraisers acting for this government and on behalf of the taxpayers of Canada. There is a difference of $500,000.

Mr. Rowe: It is $900,000.

Mr. Ferguson: I am taking the minister's word, although I do not believe it is very accurate. I am willing to take his word, but I have another figure of around $900,000.

An hon. Member: That is what he said.

Mr. Ferguson: If that is what he said my hearing is not any better than a lot of your statements. There is a difference of $900 million.

An hon. Member: It is $900,000.

Mr. Ferguson: I got that from the Minister of Trade and Commerce; what's a million here or there? If the minister were doing business for himself or the Minister of Public Works were doing business for himself, if he were buying a piece of property for around $5 million and obtained two appraisals on the building in which there was a difference of $900 million—

Mr. Harris: It is not $900 million.

Mr. Ferguson: No, $900,000. I would think the first thing he would do would be to say there is something radically wrong here. I am going to call in competent appraisers. Certainly one of these firms is crazy or has made a great error. But no, that is not the way this government does business. That is not a sufficiently large figure to stop them in their tracks from purchasing the building and seeking the correct value somewhere else. They say one firm says so and so and another firm says something else, and there is a difference of $900,000. What does that amount to? After all, the ministers are just human beings. Do not lose sight of the usual practice of human beings in transacting business, because any human being in the world in charge of a transaction of this magnitude would be struck dumb with a difference of $900,000 in the evaluations.

I am going to ask some friends of mine who are doing federal government contract work to give me a figure at which they would be glad to tender on a similar building, to give me a figure they would be glad to submit in this day and age when construction costs have risen above what they were when the government purchased the building. I believe we still might find, and I believe the government would be glad to know, that they should not be so foolish as to be stampeded into buying this building to provide the accommodation they need. They rush into it. They obtain two evaluations. There is a difference of $900,000 in the figures. They say they have to get this money; there has to be the utmost secrecy in the whole transaction, or the vendor will not sell us the most valuable piece of property in Canada. We will take a five-year lease with the vendor—how long was the lease? Was it five years?

Mr. Harris: Yes. If my hon. friend is saying we had this property then he is quite wrong.

Mr. Ferguson: You needed the building and you leased it for five years.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: That was not satisfactory. You had plenty of time to erect a building at proper costs before you closed this deal. If you had done that you would not be guessing at where you stand today. The public of Canada would know where they were heading, and they would not be guessing at the course you have taken.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Apparently I am a little unusual, Mr. Chairman. I am still interested in the value of this building and the price paid for it. I notice that in the public accounts for 1953, volume I, at page V-8, it is indicated that 269,000 square feet of space were occupied in this building. I also notice that the minister indicated at page 2425 of Hansard that 229,500 square feet were occupied. Does this mean that the space leased was greater than the space purchased?

Mr. Harris: No. The simple explanation is that the larger figure is the gross area; the smaller figure is the net that is used.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): These figures would indicate that in Ottawa the purchase price is high and the rental is fairly reasonable. In connection with the observations of the hon. member for Simcoe North, may I ask whether this figure was arrived at simply by an offer from the vendor, or was it simply a split the difference transaction between two evaluations, or how was the figure of $5 million arrived at?

Mr. Harris: The $5 million was arrived at by the usual process of having evaluations and having the department itself come to the conclusion that the purchase price was fair, after all the investigation of the building as to its value, as to its usefulness to the government, and so on.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with the evaluation, I think the minister said that he had no access to the cost of this building. I think he indicated that by nodding his head.

Mr. Harris: I do not understand what the hon. member is saying now.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister had no indication of the actual building costs, because he did not put up the building.

Mr. Harris: No, I did not say that. I said I did not have them. I presume the Department of Public Works has them.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Did the government have an indication of the actual amount spent by the vendor to put up the building?

Mr. Harris: I would doubt very much whether the vendor of a building would disclose to a would-be purchaser the cost of that building.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That may be true, but in connection with the closing of this transaction I assume the minister had a statement of adjustments of some kind.

Mr. Harris: Not until we get this money to close the deal.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is still not closed?

Mr. Harris: No.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has there been any indication to the government that there are any arrears on mortgages on the property, or of liens filed against the property.

Mr. Harris: Not that I know of.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has there been any indication that the vendor has taken care of the outside purchase price and has paid all bills?

Mr. Harris: If he has not they will be deducted on the completion of the transaction, in the usual legal way.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That may be so; but his reasons for selling or the price he might have to get may have some bearing on that.

Mr. Brooks: The minister has told us there were two appraisal firms and there was a difference of $900,000 in their evaluations. Can the minister give us the names of the two appraisal firms and the evaluation set by each, and also when they were given?

Mr. Harris: I have not the dates. The appraisers were E. S. Sherwood of Ottawa and J. E. Pitt of Montreal. The Sherwood appraisal was $4,491,750 and the Pitt appraisal, the higher one, was $5,386,242.

Mr. Lennard: Can the minister say whether the government put a heating system in this building, and if so, what was the cost?

Mr. Harris: I am not aware of the government putting in a heating system.

Mr. Lennard: I understood they did.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister tell the committee the fees paid to these two firms that appraised the building?

Mr. Harris: No, but I shall get that for the hon. member.

Mr. Montgomery: I have a question on item 369 out of which I understood the minister said the $2,500,000 was taken to complete the purchase price. In this item there is $150,000 for improved accommodation for the R.C.M.P. at the seminary building. Was that $150,000 spent in addition to the $2,500,000?

Mr. Harris: The $150,000 is what I gave a moment ago, and then there is $247,000 for additions and repairs.

Mr. Green: What money has been spent on the upkeep of the grounds, landscaping and work of that kind? This property comprises some 113 acres.

Mr. Harris: We have no property yet; we have not spent any money except the amount of $247,000 I have given.

Mr. Green: Is there anything in the estimates for the next fiscal year covering an expenditure of that kind or of any other kind in connection with this building?

Mr. Harris: I shall let my hon. friend know in a minute.

Mr. Lennard: I think this is a case where the Minister of Public Works could well have been here this afternoon, on an important item like this.

Mr. Green: I understood the minister to say that what one might call the cost over and above the purchase price of $5 million, or rather the expenditure by the government over and above the $5 million, amounted to approximately $449,000 paid as rent, $56,000 paid as interest, $247,000 for alterations, and then there was a vote of $150,000 to which the hon. member for Victoria (Ont.) referred and which was covered by vote No. 369 of last year, which was described by Hon. Mr. Fournier as being absolutely necessary for the efficient operation of the headquarters and to take care of normal expansion requirements. That adds up to about $900,000 over and above the purchase price. Am I right in saying that is what it cost the government in addition to the purchase price? Are there any other expenditures in connection with the building which have not been taken into account in the discussion today?

Mr. Harris: I think the $150,000 referred to by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., is part of the total expenditure of $247,000 which I gave. To answer my hon. friend, the expected cost of valuations, surveyor fees and legal fees is $20,000.

Mr. Green: Is the minister tabling the lease and the sale agreement?

Mr. Harris: Yes, I will do that.

Mr. Hodgson: I think we should tidy this up a little bit before we finish. The purchase price was $5 million and now we have added to that nearly $900,000.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Hodgson: Half a million for rent, a quarter of a million for something else; $150,000 for repairs. That is $900,000 according to my figures, although it may be up or down $2. That brings it pretty close to the $6 million mark. This big building is not adequate for the mounted police requirements, is that not right?

Mr. Harris: It is very suitable.

Mr. Hodgson: In 1953 when they moved in it was said that this was not big enough or was not adequate. Even yet all the mounted police and their equipment are not out there. You are still renting space in the city of Ottawa. Are you going to build more buildings out there?

Mr. Harris: We have 988 people in the building. Should it be necessary to provide for another 1,000 people some day no doubt we will do so.

Mr. Hodgson: You are still paying rentals in the city of Ottawa for the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Harris: There is hardly a department of government which is not located in three or four different buildings in Ottawa. We have never been able to find money to provide separate buildings for all departments and I do not suppose we ever shall, except in the case of veterans affairs and their new building. It seems to be the lot of the civil service and the government to have departments divided up all the time.

Mr. Hodgson: In November, 1953, the Department of Public Works had this to say:

> It will be larger than the present temporary headquarters building, running to around 260,000 square feet of space, and designed to accommodate all branches of the force, including stores, which are still located in rented quarters in downtown Ottawa.
>
> Adjoining the new headquarters will be a housing development for members of the force, and shops, stores and other subsidiary buildings.
> The present temporary headquarters building was occupied by the force only a few months ago but already is inadequate. Halls and passages are used for filing cases and records and the building is not the most suitable . . .

What has the minister to say to that?

Mr. Harris: As I said before, personally I am happy that we are spending $5 million, or $6 million if you like, rather than building a new building. I think these quarters are much better than the quarters the police had before and I think they will do for some time to come. The time will come, no doubt, when it will get so crowded that we will have to find another building, but I do not suppose I shall be around at that time.

Mr. Hodgson: This building is not adequate now.

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Mr. Harris: I do not admit that. This building is doing the work for practically all the R.C.M.P. except for some storage space for goods of one kind and another in downtown Ottawa. There is no reason in the world why that storage space should not be downtown instead of out at this particular building. Perhaps it would be more convenient if it were out there, but once again there is a great deal of inconvenience in these things and one has to put up with it. I doubt very much if we will be able to build a special building for the R.C.M.P. for some time to come.

Mr. Rowe: Is it the intention of the department to use the 100 acres of extra land purchased with this building for a housing project or for future additions, or is it the intention of the department to dispose of this land, which might reduce the cost?

Mr. Harris: No. The moneys which my hon. friend was referring to were in connection with a new building project.

Mr. Rowe: It did not go with this building? I thought it went with this building.

Mr. Harris: We bought 113 acres with the building, but the money the hon. member referred to, to build a new building and a housing development in connection with it, was not this project.

Mr. Rowe: What are you going to do with the land?

Mr. Hodgson: That was in your estimate of $10 million.

Mr. Harris: I have not an estimate of $10 million.

Mr. Hodgson: The other day the public works department estimated $10 million for the over-all picture. You still have buildings rented downtown and will have for years to come. This building is not adequate. There is no force or organization in Canada that needs proper attention and care and proper housing more than the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I think it is a mistake for the government to go ahead and buy a building which is not adequate for the force. The R.C.M.P. are going to be increasing by leaps and bounds because province after province is doing away with its provincial police and turning things over to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This is just like building a post office which is too small in the beginning. You are not planning for the future at all. In future years we may have an estimate for the construction of another building alongside this one, and the result will be a mixed up, jumbled affair. I suppose we will have to follow the late Mr. Mackenzie King's policy and wait and see what is going to happen. The fact is that this building is inadequate, and the minister knows it.

Mr. Lennard: I might say it was not adequate at the time, because Hon. Mr. Fournier, the then minister of public works, stated in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that they were going to construct an additional building to cost $150,000. Mr. Fournier at that time said this:

> Mr. Fournier (Hull): Even at that, when they moved out of the justice building and went over there, they still found that they did not have sufficient space. They made this request to the Department of Public Works to furnish them with another 12,500 feet. So this building, I am told, will not be of a permanent character as are the buildings you have on Wellington street, like the veterans' building or the justice building. It will be to complete the space that they need for their operations.

At that time the space was not adequate. They asked for an additional 12,500 feet, and that was several years ago, in 1953, when they were merely renting the property. I imagine that today they are still cramped.

Mr. Harris: As I say, we have spent $247,000 in making the building more adaptable to their needs. But I can assure hon. members that at this moment I know of no request from the R.C.M.P. for a new building of that nature.

Mr. Pearkes: Earlier this afternoon the minister referred to garages. Are there garages on this property?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: There are garages constructed?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Adequate in number?

Mr. Harris: I am told so.

Mr. Small: What part of the establishment is housed at Rockcliffe? Is there not part of the establishment out at Rockcliffe yet?

Mr. Harris: There will be establishments of a small nature, of course, here and there in order to be located closer to the work they are dealing with. But this is the headquarters of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, since the last time I was on my feet I have managed to draft the questions that I suggested I would put on the order paper, and they will appear in print tomorrow. In the meantime it seems to me that this whole question has raised an issue even more important than the particular item of expenditure we have been discussing. It has been clearly brought out that there was this amount of $2,500,000 which was paid by saving it out of item 369 of the estimates of 1954-55. The minister at first seemed to think I had made a reasonable request when I asked for the tabling of the minutes of treasury board making that alteration. He now tells me, or rather he told me later, that it is not the custom to table such minutes. I have been looking through the Financial Administration Act to see if I can find any authority for withholding such minutes, and I have been unable to find any such authority. It might be there, but as yet it has escaped my notice, at any rate. However, in the Financial Administration Act there is section 29, which is pertinent to this discussion. It comes under part III of the act which is headed "Public Disbursements". After all, this is a fairly important activity of government over which there is laid down strict parliamentary control. Section 29 reads as follows:

> At the commencement of each fiscal year or at such other times as the treasury board may direct, the deputy head or other officer charged with the administration of a service for which there is an appropriation by parliament or an item included in estimates then before the House of Commons shall prepare and submit to the treasury board through the comptroller a division of such appropriation or item into allotments in the form detailed in the estimates submitted to parliament for such appropriation or item—

It is quite clear that the deputy minister is required to submit to treasury board the details of an item in the form in which they are set out in the back of the book. In other words we rely on it when we pass an item, that the intention is to spend it as set out in the back of the book. The section continues:

> —or in such other form as the board may prescribe, and when approved by the board the allotments shall not be varied or amended without the approval of the board, and the expenditures charged to the appropriation shall be limited to the amounts of such allotments.

I think I was perfectly fair in my previous statement when I recognized the fact that the department has the right, under the statute, to request a variation in the details. But that variation cannot be made unless it is approved by the treasury board. But I submit that two-thirds of this blue book of estimates becomes a mockery if these details can be altered time and again without our being able to get the minutes of treasury board which indicate such changes as have been made.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this matter now goes a great deal further than the question of this particular expenditure now before us. As I indicated a moment ago, I have taken the minister's suggestion and have submitted order paper questions which I trust will get the information we want with respect to this particular item. But I ask the minister to consider further the seriousness of his statement that it is not the custom to table these minutes.

I am the last one to suggest that every last minute of treasury board or every last little order in council or regulation that is passed should be tabled. The table would not hold them. Everyone knows that there is a great deal of detail that is routine and administrative, about which we do not need to be concerned. It may also be true that there may be alterations in details of expenditures which are minor and about which we do not need to be unduly exercised. But surely we should have the right at any time to have brought down before the House of Commons a minute of treasury board altering any of the details that are set out in the back of the book of estimates.

I give as my authority for that submission section 29 of the Financial Administration Act, to which I have just referred. I realize that perhaps the minister is not now in a position to look up the authorities to find out why this custom has been as it is, but I seriously ask him to review the statement he made to me a few minutes ago.

Mr. Harris: I shall do so, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be prepared to discuss the matter on my own estimates.

Mr. Hodgson: I have one more question, Mr. Chairman, and then I am through. The government purchased 114 acres in this property out there. Will the minister say what they are going to do with all this land? Is it going to be space for officials and officers of the R.C.M.P.?

Mr. Harris: The present intention is not to sell the land but to retain it as part of the federal district authority. If, however, additions to this building should be needed from time to time in order to house additional staff, if that can be done effectively and efficiently, it will be done; and we shall continue to have this as a good headquarters for the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Ferguson: The minister says this land is to be retained as part of the federal district commission over-all picture. Is that his own opinion or is it according to the planning of the commission? Are we to believe that from now on if we purchase a building or make some deal with regard to a building with 100 acres attached, whether it is in accordance or in keeping with the general over-all plan, if there is around there a 100-acre area more or less that cost $2,500,000, we will just keep it too? Does the minister know for a positive fact that it is part of the plan to retain that property? He spoke with authority.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, the great difficulty one always has when dealing with vacant land which is expensive is this. If you dispose of it, in a few years you may regret it because you will need it for other purposes. If you dispose of it you can no longer have a certain amount of park land in a heavily populated city. In this particular case, holding the land has two virtues. The first is that some day we may feel that we have to add to this building, and add to it substantially. We may also have to erect other buildings as they are needed, if we have room on this ground. In the meantime it is desirable to hold it as part of the long-term build-up of the federal district area and it will be suitable, during the period of time that is desirable. Ultimately it would no doubt be used as commercial property, either by government or otherwise.

Mr. Ferguson: From the point of view of ordinary common-sense business methods, does the minister not hope for the sake of the taxpayers of Canada that there will not be many more such purchases involving an excess amount of land, certainly to the extent of 80 acres? If the government purchased 100 similar properties with the same amount of land would the minister still think it would be advisable to retain the extra 80 acres whether or not the government knew what it was going to do with it, and pay out the taxpayers' money in that way? Does the minister sincerely believe the statement he has just made, that they are going to hold the land because they are not sure what they are going to do with it and, although it has been purchased with the taxpayers' money, they are going to hold it because they may want to use it for a building or as park land? It may be required for a polo park.

We have purchased it, and the minister says when we did so we intended to get a building large enough to accommodate the mounted police adequately. That was the reason the building was purchased. It was not a venture on which money might be made or lost as holders of land on behalf of the taxpayers. The purpose was purely and simply to purchase a building because there was dire necessity for it to house the mounted police. We have done that. Now the minister comes along and says they are going to keep the land because it may be needed for a park or for expansion. We do not know what it will be used for. But that is what we are spending the taxpayers' money on, and it is a most improbable proposition when we do not know definitely what is going to be done with it.

We are putting the taxpayers of Canada into the real estate business. That is what we are doing.

Mr. Trainor: Would the minister say a building could not have been designed specifically for the needs of the mounted police and constructed for $6 million or less on an adequate amount of ground?

Mr. Harris: I am not a builder and I could not say that. What I have said is that both on the basis of the valuations received and on the basis of the judgment of the Department of Public Works, who are charged with the responsibility of making the decision for the government of Canada, it was thought that this building at $5 million and the additions that have been made to it would be suitable for the purpose. It was also decided, as I have already indicated, that it was preferable to buy the building at that time rather than design and wait for the completion of a building which might cost more. As a matter of fact I still rely on the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., who has quoted from a document indicating that such a building would cost $10 million.

Mr. Trainor: Does the minister not think it would have been desirable to have the Department of Public Works look into the question and find out if it would have been possible to design a building specifically for the needs of the mounted police, rather than put the mounted police in a building which admittedly is not altogether suitable for their needs, and that could have been improved upon if a building had been designed specifically for the purpose?

Mr. Harris: I have said before that the ideal would be to design a building for a particular purpose every time, but we cannot achieve the idea. We try to get something less than that and get value for our money. I suggest to the committee that that will always be the viewpoint. Certainly in this case it was. I am quite prepared to agree with my hon. friend that a building for the R.C.M.P. could have been designed which would not have been the same as this building. There is no question about that. But, as I say, the people we have on our payroll who are charged with the responsibility of making such decisions decided that this building was suitable and valuable at that price. If they are not acting wisely and giving proper advice to the government in the discharge of their duties I would listen to a suggestion from my hon. friend that we might dispense with their services, but I have faith that these people do not make these decisions without careful consideration.

Mr. Trainor: But the minister admits he did not get an alternative price. He did not find out how much it would cost to design and construct a building specifically for the purpose of the mounted police. He did not explore the alternative. He took the recommendation of the valuators that this building would probably do and that the mounted police could get along with it, but he did not explore the possibility of securing for the mounted police exactly what they required and finding out how much that would cost.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, I was all through but the minister has tried to put words in my mouth. He said that I said a building costing $10 million was required. I do not know whether those were his exact words, but may I say that so far as I am concerned there is nothing too good for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Their numbers are increasing all the time, and we certainly need them. However, when I referred to the figure of $10 million I said for that amount you could have a much better building than the present one and could also construct a housing project for all the officers and officials who go with the mounted police.

This may not be a bad deal. I do not know, and I am not prepared to say. It may be a good deal, but you have not an adequate building for the mounted police. There was plenty of time to build a new building after this one was rented, if the department had seen fit to do so.

I do not like the minister to say that I suggested a building costing $10 million. I do not suggest that the government should spend a dollar more than it has to, but when you are constructing a building and spending money it may be better to look ahead a little and spend $10 million now for a suitable building. You will need the 114 acres; don't worry about that. I would gamble money—I will spend the odd dollar that way any time—that within four or five years you will decide you have made a bad deal because you will have to construct another building costing $5 million before adequate accommodation is provided for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Vincent: I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Nowlan: You do not have to answer questions.

Mr. Vincent: Has he ever seen the building?

Mr. Hodgson: Yes, I have seen the building.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Railway and steamship services—

614. Canadian National Railways deficit, 1954—amount required to provide for the payment during the fiscal year 1954-55, to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called the national company) upon applications approved by the Minister of Transport, made by the national company to the Minister of Finance, and to be applied by the national company in payment of the system deficit (certified by the auditors of the national company) arising in the calendar year 1954, subject to recovery therefrom of accountable advances made to the national company from the consolidated revenue fund, $28,758,098.

Mr. Green: This is the item covering the Canadian National Railways deficit for 1954. I understand it has been considered in the sessional committee on government-owned railways and shipping, and we have no further questions to ask.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

621. Departmental administration—further amount required, $39,738.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask the minister what this amount is for. In the details on page 25 there is reference to office stationery, supplies and equipment. Is that for the new veterans affairs building in Ottawa or is it for supplies throughout the country?

Mr. Harris: It is for microfilm cameras and Recordak cameras and things of that nature at headquarters, for the card index system.

Mr. Brooks: In the new building.

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Item agreed to.

War veterans allowances and other benefits—

623. Assistance fund (war veterans allowances)—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. Brooks: I notice this is quite an increase in the assistance fund. Is it on account of more applications by veterans for such assistance?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. Brooks: The number is increasing all the time?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Loans, investments and advances—

626. To provide, subject to regulations of the treasury board, for working capital advances in the current and subsequent fiscal years to posts and employees on posting abroad, and to authorize the creation of a special account in the consolidated revenue fund to which shall be credited expenditures made by and advances recovered from the said posts and employees, the excess of the amounts charged over the amounts credited to the account at any time not to exceed $230,000.

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Mr. Mitchell (London): There are one or two observations I should like to make and one or two questions I should like to ask. The minister has said this afternoon that the function of these further supplementary estimates is to catch up during the course of the fiscal year on payments which it was found necessary to make over and above those provided in the main estimates for specific items. Here we find that he is providing funds both for current advances and subsequent advances. This in fact, I submit, represents a change of policy, and the time for changes of policy to be considered is when the main estimates are before us, not when we are considering supplementary or further supplementary estimates. I suggest to the minister that this item should not be appearing in these further supplementary estimates at all, but should be appearing in the estimates for the coming fiscal year.

My second observation is that it also covers subsequent fiscal years, and that is worse. That figure should, in fact, also appear in the estimates for 1955-56. I would be glad if the minister would advise the committee as to the reasons for this change in policy being made in this manner.

Mr. Harris: I agree partially with what my hon. friend has said, Mr. Chairman. However, my remarks as to the purpose of the final supplementary estimates were not to be taken as an exclusive definition of every item that could appear. As he knows quite well, we cannot let the treasury board and its officials cease to work when the blue book is brought out. In this particular case, and I confess it without any difficulty, it was not decided upon at the time the main estimates were certified by me in late December.

Subsequent to that time it was decided to carry a revolving fund of this kind for the immigration people. Now then, there is a choice, either to put it in here when it should get dealt with at the earliest possible moment, or leave it until next year when it would appear in the main estimates. There seems to be no particular point in waiting. This is a principle which has already been approved by parliament. We have these revolving funds for persons who are far away from Ottawa and who need money for the purposes set out in the fund. We do it in external affairs, for example, and for that reason we are asking that we may be permitted to do it with respect to immigration personnel.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Do I understand that this policy was decided upon subsequent to the time the blue book for the coming year was printed?

Mr. Harris: That is right.

Mr. Mitchell (London): Then may I ask the minister how much of that $230,000 has been spent in the current fiscal year?

Mr. Harris: I could not give that, Mr. Chairman. This money is spent by the various officers abroad and then reimbursed by the government. I could get the figures for the total disbursed up to any given date my friend wants.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Loans, investments and advances—

627. To provide for advances to the government of Nova Scotia (not to exceed $42,084) and to the government of Prince Edward Island (not to exceed $74,257) in accordance with the terms of agreements to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, by the government of Canada with each of the said governments; the advances to be seventy-five per cent of the loans made by each of the said governments for the purpose of replacing abnormal losses of equipment suffered by reason of severe weather conditions during the period February 1 to July 1, 1953, $116,341.

Mr. Nowlan: In connection with this item my argument somewhat follows the lines suggested by the hon. member for London. Certainly I am very happy to see this item in here. I think it should have been provided long ago. Nevertheless, I am somewhat intrigued by the particulars given for this item. This is a payment in accordance with the terms of an agreement to be entered into, and that suggests some future arrangement. At least when these supplementary estimates were printed—I am not sure what the situation may be today—apparently the agreement had not yet been executed. Will the Minister of Finance say if that is the situation? Has the agreement been executed? If not, does he think, as Minister of Finance and as a matter of principle, it is advisable to include in the supplementary estimates for a year which is to conclude tomorrow an item which apparently will not be paid until the financial year which begins the day after tomorrow?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman; this government is so very careful about its conduct of affairs that the Minister of Fisheries is not going to sign the agreement until parliament has authorized him to spend the money.

Mr. Nowlan: Then we are legislating here by supplementary estimates for an expenditure which has not yet been made in this fiscal year?

Mr. Harris: No, no.

Mr. Nowlan: Is it not the basis of the supplementary estimates that they are to provide for moneys which were spent or were overspent for purposes authorized by parliament?

Mr. Harris: No, that is not the sole reason. It is the principal reason, as I indicated before. But as I think my hon. friend knows, we have a 13-month accounting year, and these moneys could be paid out during the next month.

Mr. Stick: I notice that this proposed agreement applies to Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Is there any contemplated agreement with Newfoundland in this regard?

Mr. Harris: No, this vote arises as a result of a severe storm in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia two or three years ago. Its purpose is to carry out an arrangement which was tentatively made with the provinces at that time to grant money to the lobster fishermen to repair their nets.

Mr. Low: I was going to ask the minister if this vote does not provide for loans to the provinces, and I was going to ask him the terms of the agreement with respect to the rate of interest and the length of time for repayment.

Mr. Harris: There is no interest, Mr. Chairman. This is not a loan to the provinces, but is a loan to the lobster fishermen who lost their gear. It was understood between the province and the federal government that loans would be made to the fishermen to replace their gear, and that we would advance 75 per cent of the amount required and the province would advance the remainder of the loan, which would be interest free.

Mr. Low: Interest free, and over what period of time?

Mr. Sinclair: Three years.

Mr. Nowlan: Have these loans been made already?

Mr. Harris: Yes, by the provinces, and this is authority to reimburse the provinces.

Mr. Nowlan: Why the delay in having the agreement executed? This damage occurred between February and July, 1953, about two years ago. Has the delay been due to the government at Ottawa or to the government at Halifax, in not getting the agreement signed?

Mr. Harris: There has been no delay. These advances have been made and are now audited. A specified amount is ready to be paid. All the money is now accounted for in the sense that we know precisely the share we have to pay, and that has caused the delay. There has been no delay in advancing the money to the fishermen.

Mr. Nowlan: There has been a delay in negotiating the agreement, because it has not been signed yet.

Mr. Harris: This was one occasion on which we did not want to make the agreement until we had authority from parliament to do so.

Mr. Nowlan: There is no authority yet?

Mr. Harris: No, but I hope you will vote it.

Mr. Nowlan: The agreement has been signed by the provinces, signed by Nova Scotia, but not by Ottawa?

Mr. Harris: The agreement has not been signed but will be when this vote is put through and the money is available.

Mr. Nowlan: You have just told us that the agreement has not been signed, yet you are voting moneys under it?

Mr. Harris: No, that is not what you are told. You are told we have waited to bring this forward until we knew the precise amount that we have to reimburse the provinces. In the meantime they have made the loans to the fishermen and they are now billing us for our share.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Loans, investments and advances—

628. To authorize the operation of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act for the purposes of acquiring, managing and manufacturing materials used in industrial work done for: (a) government departments, and (b) penitentiaries including the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries; the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $300,000.

Mr. Mitchell (London): The remarks I made with respect to item 626 also apply to this item. I wonder if the minister could give us some further details of the work which it is intended shall be done or perhaps has been done as a result of this item.

Mr. Harris: This is merely a different way of doing the bookkeeping with regard to the penitentiary. In the past there have been two items in the accounts, and there was a credit of a sale given to the other account. This provides for a revolving fund which will be one bookkeeping entry to take care of the two we were formerly using.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

Loans, investments and advances—

629. To authorize the operating of a revolving fund in accordance with section 58 of the Financial Administration Act, for the purpose of financing the purchase of stores to be used in construction projects at the new Aklavik site; and to authorize the charging to the revolving fund of expenditures already made for this purpose from votes 324 and 695, Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1954; the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $500,000.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps the minister would outline some of the details in connection with this half million dollar expenditure? I assume it is in connection with the movement of Aklavik to a new site on firmer ground. Perhaps the minister will give us some idea of how the money is to be spent?

Mr. Harris: This covers a number of items which will be spent during the course of moving Aklavik to other ground. It will cover materials and supplies used in buildings and structures, utilities and services; materials and supplies used for administrative personnel and work crews, the operation of equipment and the maintenance of buildings and structures; and it relates to repairs, upkeep, small tools replacement and living quarters for administrative personnel and work crews.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is this money being spent completely for government-owned structures, or is it to reimburse any others?

Mr. Harris: This is for government structures.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask certain questions on this item, in view of the fact that this is an historic site, as well as a site of some importance in the north. I think the committee might well be told by the minister the considerations which have determined its move to the location which has been chosen. I know there are members in the house who have seen this location. It is a great, broad, and flat land there, and the suggestion might well be made that the site could be on the west as well as on the east. The fact is that if it were on the west there might be the possibility of a road to the mining developments of the area which seem to be very promising, and which are attracting attention to the west.

While the main means of communication will be by air and water, the fact remains that with the extent of the mineral deposits generally throughout that area this conceivably could be a very interesting development. We have seen other movements of this kind in the flat silt lands of other areas, and we certainly know that it is of the utmost importance to be sure that the site chosen is the proper one. Without elaborating further, I feel sure the minister is aware, as I am, of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the removal of some of these old historic sites, difficulties experienced not only by the dominion government but by other governments as well.

If the minister could give an explanation I believe it would be helpful, because this obviously will involve the removal of an historic site which has been part of the history of this country for almost 200 years in one way or another, and there would be involved such things as the removal of cemeteries. It would be desirable that we be certain that the proper site is chosen when the change is made.

Mr. Harris: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition could advance good reasons for the choice that has been made, and perhaps good reasons for some other choice, because I am sure he is familiar with the area. It was for this reason, as a matter of fact, that we decided that the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources might properly be sent to the committee on estimates for consideration, where we expected this question might be canvassed at some length. I think the minister responsible is either covering it now, or is expecting to cover it, because there are items in his forthcoming estimates which would deal with this expenditure. While I would like to accommodate the Leader of the Opposition, I think perhaps the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources could make a better exposition of the reasons than I could at the moment. Probably he is doing so now in that committee.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Loans, investments and advances—

630. To extend the operation of the revolving fund authorized pursuant to subsection (2) of section 101 of the Financial Administration Act for the purpose of acquiring, managing, manufacturing, producing, processing or dealing in stores or materials, the amount to be charged to the revolving fund at any time not to exceed $5,000,000; additional amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. Harris: This is an increase of $1 million in the revolving fund in the Department of Transport. I do not think I need go into detail as to the purpose and use of the revolving fund, because that was discussed at some length in the house when it was determined upon three or four years ago. However, with the increase in the activities of the department it is felt that the fund might be increased by $1 million to take care of additional sums needed, having in mind the experience we have had since the fund was set up.

Mr. Green: What is the total in the fund now?

Mr. Harris: The total is $4 million, and it is being increased to $5 million.

Item agreed to.

Loans, investments and advances—

Railway and steamship services—

631. To authorize, on such terms and subject to such conditions as the governor in council may approve, the delivery to Her Majesty by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, of 16,000 shares of capital stock of the company having a par value of $100 each in satisfaction of $1,600,000 of the loan made to the company under vote 764 of the Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1954, $1.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the minister give an explanation of this item? Obviously this is a refunding operation. It refers to a loan of $1,600,000 made under the Appropriation Act, No. 4, 1954. Was that to cover accumulated deficits, or was it for capital; and what is the capital position now, after the issue of the 16,000 shares? Are those additional shares which will be issued and, if so, what will be the capital?

Mr. Harris: As my hon. friend has said, this is an interest-free loan of $1,600,000 which falls due on June 30 next. The purpose is to take capital stock for that amount; and when that is done the situation will be that we shall have 16,400 shares at $100 each—$1,640,000—and we will have a fixed interest debt of $2 million to the government. I beg your pardon; I should have said that that is the change. The present situation is that there is capital stock of 400 shares at $100 each, $40,000, and a 25-year bond issue due to the government, or guaranteed by the government, for $9,400,000. So that at the moment the capitalization is $9,440,000, and in the future it will be $5,800,000.

Item agreed to.

Air services—

632. To provide for the acquisition of land required to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports in order to prevent the erection of hazards to flying and for future development of those airports—further amount required, $1,000,000.

Mr. Pallett: How much of this is being allocated to each point?

Mr. Harris: This covers Vancouver to the extent of $311,000; Winnipeg, $231,000; Toronto, $759,000; and Montreal, $697,000, for a total of $2 million. That is the total estimate, including the main estimates and this supplementary item.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, with respect to item 632, may I point out that the wording is rather unusual. It states that it is to provide for the acquisition of land required to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports in order to prevent the erection of hazards to flying, and for future development of those airports. And it states that a further amount of $1 million is required.

In the main estimates of either last year or this year I have been unable to find an item in these exact words. I am wondering if this item arises out of a regulation filed by the Department of Transport and passed in April of 1953. This was filed without notice to the land owners. This regulation has the effect of limiting considerably the use of these lands, and gives very arbitrary powers to the minister.

The Aeronautics Act provides that claims shall be honoured only if action is brought within two years of date of filing. These regulations were filed in the registry office, so far as they affect Malton airport located in the counties of Peel and York, without notice being given to the land owners at the time. The situation has only recently been brought to their attention.

It would seem that some steps are now being taken to give them compensation. I suggest that the amount for the airport at Toronto is only $759,000, and that it is quite insufficient in view of the amount of land involved. I also suggest that since the regulations were filed without individual notices being given to the land owners involved, the procedure taken is improper.

In addition, lands were actually expropriated after notice of expropriation, and people were deprived of ownership some years ago. Up to now they have not been paid for those lands. I do not know where the blame lies, whether it is that of the administration of the Department of Transport, or whether it is because the estimates were not placed before the house in time for the money to be voted. I do know the explanation has been given to some of the people that the money was not available to pay them, and this has been offered as the reason for delay.

This supplementary estimate is put in to take care of the claims of the people who will be filing under this order in council of April, 1953, and is also to provide the moneys to be paid to the people whose lands have been expropriated. The amount is completely insufficient. It will not even come close to the amount that will be required. I would hate to think the government are so misinformed as to the value of land in that area, or that they have a deliberate plan under which evaluators will be able to go out and say, "We can reach a conclusion but we have not the money to pay for it". If the money is not sufficient I would suggest to the minister that the proper amount be put in, if that is what this estimate is meant to cover.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, just a brief word. I appreciate that my hon. friend is quite aware of the fact that $700,000, $800,000 or $1,000,000 will not meet the claims that are going to be made on this fund as these airports expand in the various cities I have mentioned. And I regret to say, in my official capacity, that I expect there will be larger claims than those we have had to deal with so far.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The problem raised by the hon. member for Peel also affects my constituency. What method is used where they restrict the use of the land only? I think it is referred to in the order in council mentioned by the hon. member. Is there some method of evaluating the restriction, or providing compensation?

Mr. Harris: I am sure the Minister of Transport could describe the procedure better than I can, but I think the hon. member for York West knows that this is pretty well breaking new ground, and that we shall have to work out the principles as we go along. I am sure no one wants to do anything that would harm persons who own property around airports, except to the extent of carrying out the zoning rules and protecting the lives of people and property in so far as that can be done. But I am sure that, as I said before, this will grow on us and we shall have to work out the best way of dealing with the problem.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I have one other question. I do not want to get too technical with the Minister of Finance in connection with air problems here, but in connection with the money that is being spent to enlarge these airports this problem was raised by one of the members on the government side. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard discussed it in connection with the Vancouver airport. Has any attention been paid to the more recent developments in aerodynamic design and the recent theories on boundary layer control in aircraft development? We may be on the threshold of developments which will make expropriation of properties of this kind entirely unnecessary because of aeroplanes being able to take off and land in much shorter space than is required at the present time. Has the department taken that into account in setting up a fund of $14 million for airport development extension, and also this supplementary estimate?

Mr. Harris: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I do hope we will not have to pay damage claims of this kind, if we can avoid it. If the development of aircraft will lead to that result I shall be very happy.

Mr. Pallett: I was interested to hear the minister say that the government does not want to hurt anyone. I draw to his attention the fact that the regulation has very seriously hurt land owners around Malton airport, particularly since there is no provision in it for advances by the government on the payment of claims. There is no provision within the regulations themselves under which a proper negotiation can be made as to the payment of claims without the people concerned commencing an action. It seems to me that this is, to say the least, a little high-handed. It puts the owners of land to a much greater expense than they should be put to when their rights are arbitrarily taken from them. You are asking people who are by and large farmers to commence actions in the exchequer court to obtain payment of proper claims. They are put to all the extra legal expense involved. The government are exacting hardships which the minister says they do not wish to do.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Perhaps the minister would give an undertaking to use the same type of evaluation around Malton airport that was used in Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Harris moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1955, the sum of $53,934,585 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 305, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1955.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE ALLOWANCES AND PERMISSIBLE INCOME, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, March 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 164, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the committee of the whole a few days ago I intimated that there were a few remarks I wished to make. As you know, the resolution preceding the bill was debated in the house three weeks ago, and there was also a debate on the motion for second reading. The bill was then sent to the veterans affairs committee which held a number of sittings, during which the principles of the bill were discussed. The bill is now back in the house with very little change as far as the committee is concerned. In fact we could not make any changes, but I believe there is an amendment which will be suggested by the minister.

It will be recalled that the bill provides for a 20 per cent increase in war veterans allowances, bringing the single veteran's allowance from $50 to $60 per month and the married veteran's allowance from $90 to $108. I may say that as far as the committee were concerned this bill might as well have never been sent there, because we were not able to make even any recommendations. However we did have the benefit of briefs presented by the different veterans' organizations such as the Canadian Legion, the national council of veterans' associations in Canada, and other organizations. As usual these briefs and representations were well prepared and quite logical, and I am sure these organizations deserve credit for the presentations they made.

As I have said in this house before, we find that when national veterans' organizations appear before our committee they never exaggerate. They state logically and clearly what they consider to be the requirements and needs of the veterans. As has been said many times in the house, the Canadian veteran has never tried to stampede the electorate or the elected members of the House of Commons into giving him more than he was entitled to. This cannot always be said of veterans in other countries.

We of the opposition were confirmed in the attitude we had taken with respect to Bill No. 164 before it was submitted to the committee. At that time we claimed that it did not go far enough. Along with the veterans we approved the increase from $50 to $60 a month for the single veteran. We all considered that was a step in the right direction, and the government was given approval for having recommended that increase. But the increase from $90 to $108 did not seem to us to be enough, and this also was the opinion of the veterans' organizations. But the chief point of disapproval as far as the bill was concerned was in conection with the ceilings on permissive income. I should like to read from the brief presented on March 11, 1955, to the committee by the Candian Legion, in particular their comments on the ceilings on permissive income, as follows:

Ceilings on permissive income—

Recommendation—

That the ceiling on total permissible income under W.V.A., be increased to $1,200 per year in the case of a single recipient and $2,000 per year in the case of those married.

Comment—

We must again reiterate that, even if this section of the act is amended as proposed in Bill 164, the act will still tend to defeat its own purpose. If the allowance is intended to assist the aged and needy veteran the low ceilings on permissive income prevent him from supplementing the allowance sufficiently to enjoy a reasonable standard of living.

The national council of veterans' associations in Canada also presented a brief. Both these organizations are nation-wide and represent hundreds of thousands of veterans of both wars. The recommendation made by this organization contained in the brief presented to the committee on March 14, 1955, was as follows:

That the total annual allowable income including war veterans allowance permitted under the War Veterans Allowance Act be the amount set as statutory exemptions under the Income Tax Act, subject to supplementation of $200 in the case of the single man.

As we know, the exemptions under the Income Tax Act are $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married person. This recommendation amounts to $1,200 for the single man and $2,000 for the married man, and is the same as the recommendation by the Canadian Legion. Their comment on this is as follows:

We note with concern the means test limitations proposed by this bill for the single man is $840 per annum. This would permit only $120 per year or $10 per month through income from earnings or other sources. We consider that the means test for the single man should be at least set at the level of $1,200 which would permit $480 of supplementation.

In the case of the married man who must maintain a home, however modest, we consider that it should be advanced proportionately and suggest again the statutory exemption in respect to income tax, namely $2,000.

There were other recommendations by other veterans' organizations, but these were the main representations in connection with the permissive income. The Legion stated in its brief that the act will still tend to defeat its own purpose. As we understood it, the purpose of the War Veterans Allowance Act was to help those who most needed help. I think it is a fair comment to say that the whole act and the whole veterans allowance regulations are weighted in favour of the veteran who is employable and who is able to obtain work. The veteran who needs it most, the veteran who is unemployable, is the one who receives the least consideration. I do not think that is the intention of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I admit—and it was admitted a few minutes ago—that as far as the allowance is concerned, the single veteran has received fair treatment. As far as the employable veteran is concerned, we acknowledge and admit that he is in a fair position. I say that, Mr. Chairman, taking into consideration the fact that the regulations now permit of a broader—I might almost say generous—interpretation of casual earnings as far as the employable veteran is concerned. As I say, the employable veteran is in a fair position. But as far as these veterans are concerned—and they are mostly veterans of the first war—we must take into consideration that fact that they are old men.

The act was brought into force in 1930. It is 25 years since the War Veterans Allowance Act was first passed. Twenty-five years have been added to the age of these men, many of whom in those days were considered not able to fend for themselves. Hence when I say the position is fair, we must take into consideration first whether the veteran's age permits him to take advantage of casual labour. That is the first consideration. Then there is another "if", and it is a big one, namely if his health permits a man of 67 to do so. That is the average age today, and many are years older than that. Then there is a third "if", namely if there is employment. We have been discussing unemployment in the House of Commons for some days now. When there is much unemployment in the country the man who is least likely to get employment is the old veteran 65, 66 or 67 years of age. In many parts of the country, while he might consider himself to be employable, nevertheless employment is not there for him.

In the committee we tried to find out just how many veterans could take advantage of casual earnings. We have no information as to the number of men. We have information as to the number that take advantage of section 4, which allows a man to take his war veterans allowance by the month and then, when he can get work, to go off the war veterans allowance and take that work. But only some 1,100 out of over 40,000 war veterans were able to take advantage of this section 4.

That is a fact which indicates that there are very few war veterans today who can take advantage of the type of work permitted under section 4. I will venture to say that the number who are able to take casual employment would turn out to be extremely disappointing to our hopes.

As I just stated, if the employable veteran can get employment, and if his health permits it, he is very well looked after. But this legislation does not help the unemployable veteran, the man who really needs the war veterans allowance more than any other veteran.

First, we have the man with a small pension, say of $25 a month. The ceiling is $70 a month. The war veterans allowance he would receive would not be $60 a month but would be only $45 a month, and the total income he would have would be $840 a year.

Then there is the veteran who has worked, has been thrifty and has been able to lay aside enough to purchase an annuity which brings him $20, $25 or $30 a month. He is in exactly the same position as the veteran with the disability pension. The ceiling for him is again $70 a month, and that man has to live on $840 a year.

Then again there is the veteran who has reached the age of 70. While every other man in Canada over the age of 70 years can take full advantage of the $40 monthly which the law allows him, as well as of whatever other income he has—whether it be $100, $1,000, $10,000 or more he can take full advantage of that income—the war veteran over 70 years of age is given the $40 old age security but his ceiling again is $70 a month and he is permitted to receive only $30 out of the $60 allowed him for war veterans allowance.

As to the unemployable veterans who are obliged to live on their very small pensions, who cannot go out and seek casual labour, I say this act discriminates against them to a great extent.

During the sittings of the committee there were some members who said—and it was echoed and bandied about from one to another of the government members—that the $70 is not a ceiling but a floor. There is a certain amount of truth in that contention with regard to the employable veteran, the man who least needs the war veterans allowance. But as far as the unemployable veteran is concerned it is indeed a ceiling which cannot be penetrated as far as his income is concerned. To me that argument sounded shallow indeed.

Taking all these things into consideration, Mr. Chairman, and after listening to the Legion and the other veterans' organizations, the opposition members of the committee—and I refer to the official opposition, which was supported by the other opposition members—felt that the unemployable veterans should be assisted. I might also say that in the Legion's brief, when they were recommending assistance, this statement was made:

> We would urgently request that this committee recommend to the government the immediate adoption of the following measures:

The measures I read here a few moments ago were the measures they recommended that the committee should recommend to the government; and we thought they should be recommended to the government. We realized that we as a committee had no authority to make variations in any section dealing with money matters, and that the only motion we could make was one requesting the government to consider some increase. The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, moved the following motion in the committee:

> That the committee recommend that the government give consideration to introducing legislation during the present session of parliament which will provide that the maximum of total income, as set out in section 1 of schedule "A" to Bill 164, be increased to $1,200, and that in sections 2 and 3 of said schedule "A" the monthly rate be increased to $120 and the maximum total income be increased to $2,000.

The meaning of this motion is simply that we recommend a ceiling of $1,200 for the single man and $2,000 for the married man, and that instead of a 20 per cent increase in the allowance to $108 per month the increase should be to $120 a month for married men. That was the substance of the recommendation we made, and we thought it would receive favourable consideration in the committee. As I say, the matter was placed before the committee. All members of the official opposition and all members of the other opposition groups supported it. They supported what the Legion and other veterans' organizations that had made a definite study of the situation thought was necessary.

I almost hesitate to state some of the arguments used by hon. members on the government side regarding our recommendation. One was that if it went through it would defeat the bill, and I believe some of them actually persuaded themselves that it might. Another was that we must get the bill through before the 1st of April. They said they had made representations to the government, they knew we could not get any more, and therefore we must hurry this matter through the committee. We were told we must not ask for more. That was the main argument, and it was said that we might lose what we had.

There are other members here who were on previous committees and will recall, as I do, that that was not the attitude of the committee in 1951 when it was considering increases in disability pensions. We had a bill presented to us at that time which provided for an increase of only 10 per cent. Every member of the committee was indignant that such a suggestion should be placed before a veterans affairs committee. They would not accept it. We told the government so. Resolutions were moved, the government were contacted and they offered an increase of 15 per cent. Again the veterans affairs committee said it was not enough, it was not fair, and the members of the committee demanded reconsideration. The matter was reconsidered and in the final result an increase of 25 per cent was provided instead of the 10 per cent that was first put before the committee.

We thought some such study would have been made by the committee this year. It may be—I do not know—that the amounts of $1,200 and $2,000 are too much. It may be that an allowance of $108 is enough, but no study was made. There is quite a difference between the total income of $720 now permitted a single veteran and the suggestion of $1,200. Some amount in between might have been more appropriate. It could be that $1,000 or $1,500 might have been considered proper, but the matter was never studied. We should have had some evidence.

So far as married veterans are concerned, it may be that the total annual income of $2,000, instead of the $1,440 provided by the bill, requested by the different organizations and by our resolution, was too much. The matter should at least have been studied. We were told, "This is the bill that has been put before you and there is to be no change; you will accept this and this only". That is the ultimatum that was handed to us as members of the veterans affairs committee.

It seemed to some of us that the committee had not been established for the purpose of finding out what was best for the veterans. I thought it was our purpose to study the bill and, if we did not consider it satisfactory, to make recommendations. But I found out that all we were to do was be rubber stamps and approve whatever was put before us. That is why I said at the beginning of my remarks that the veterans affairs committee might as well not have had any meetings at all. The committee held a number of meetings, but all it accomplished was simply to rubber stamp the bill that had been presented by the government.

I do not think it is necessary for me to prolong this argument. I think the house, people across Canada and particularly the veterans must consider that this is a matter of unfinished business. We waited for three and a half years for the war veterans allowance bill to be brought before the house to provide the increases which everybody knew were needed, but when we got it we found the amounts were practically the same as before. The allowances were raised 20 per cent, by $120 and $240 respectively. It would appear that we will have to wait another three or four years before these matters are properly adjusted. The war veterans allowance is the only means of livelihood for unemployable veterans without any other income, of whom there are thousands across the country.

When we considered the question of war veterans allowances in 1951 we had much more evidence placed before us on which to base a finding than we had this time. One of the chief yardsticks for determining what the amount of allowances should be was the cost of living at that time. According to the family spending schedule prepared by the Toronto welfare council at that time a veteran with 100 per cent disability and living alone needed $93.34 a month to provide a minimum basis of living. That is what the figure was in 1951, $93.34 for a single veteran. These figures were worked out scientifically by the Toronto welfare council. If $93.34 was needed in 1951, then just as much and more is needed today; but such a man is only to be allowed an income of $70 a month. For a veteran with a wife and no children the estimate worked out by the Toronto welfare council was $153.43, but we are only permitting him an income of $120 a month.

After waiting three years for the veterans affairs committee to be set up we now find that the business we felt we could and should have done has not been done and, as I said a moment ago, as far as the House of Commons is concerned it must certainly be regarded as being in the category of unfinished business.

Mr. Gillis: As one member of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to see this bill go through the house as quickly as possible, but I am reasonably sure we are not going to get it through tonight. I have a few comments to make with respect to war veterans allowances.

The witnesses who appeared before the committee for the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans in Canada in my judgment made one of the most reasonable presentations that has ever been made to any committee of which I have been a member. In fact their presentation was very temperate. In my opinion they did not ask for anything they could not have been given without any great strain on the treasury.

In my opinion this veterans affairs committee has lost its original function. The original function that it used to perform in years gone by was that when veterans legislation was referred to it, the committee had the privilege of opening up the old acts and relating them to the new forces. Back in the 1940's it was a committee that could initiate action and advise the Department of Veterans Affairs on veterans problems. It was a committee in which there was little political bickering. The members were unanimous in their efforts to get the best possible deal for the veterans. But in the last five years I have seen a complete change in the complexion of the committee. Today the government drafts a bill and decides upon policy. The committee has now deteriorated into the position of merely examining the legislation.

I feel sorry for the government members on the committee, because they are placed in the position of having the cabinet make a decision and then being told, "This is what you are going to get." It is put in the form of a bill. Opposition members are at least free to express their opinion and say the things that should be said about certain sections of the bill, but in the last five years government members have been placed in the position that they are not free to get up and argue and express their opinions without being charged with disloyalty to the party or to the government. I feel that the committee is not performing the function it was intended to perform when it was first inaugurated as a non-partisan committee. Then the committee had the right to examine legislation and make recommendations.

I recall occasions upon which the committee had the minister running back and forward to the cabinet day after day, week after week, getting a lot of beneficial changes made. I do not believe that, in so far as some special matters are concerned, the cabinet has all the brains. I do not believe the cabinet has the time to pay attention to different problems, to sit down and study them and decide what is reasonable. I feel this committee on veterans affairs should be a standing committee of the house. It could be called, under the chairmanship of the very capable parliamentary assistant, to take a look at legislation and decide what should be done. The committee's views could be obtained and taken to cabinet, where they could be looked at and some decision arrived at that would be reasonable. I think the committee are reasonable and fair if they are met half way.

I hope the cabinet will consider the advisability of making that committee a standing committee of the house. It is about one minute to six, Mr. Chairman, and there are a few more comments I should like to make, so I wonder if we could call it six o'clock.

Clause stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall continue this debate and hope we can complete it and give the bill third reading. Then we shall take legislation on the order paper in the name of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the order in which it appears. Then we shall resume—I think it would meet with the approval of hon. members—the debate on the motion that Your Honour do leave the chair.

On Friday it would be our intention to begin with the debate on external affairs, and if that does not carry through the day we would take legislation which I shall indicate tomorrow night. On Monday it is the intention to introduce the resolution with respect to the revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and that may or may not take all of Monday. I would hope, however, that before we adjourn it may be possible to complete what I have indicated, particularly the motion that Your Honour do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MR. DREW—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS IN HOUSE

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I feel it appropriate that I should deal with this matter in the House of Commons in view of the fact that a statement appears in the press today relating to something I said in the house the day before yesterday. It is stated that I indicated I believed there should be restrictions on the free exchange of views between nations. The statement refers to remarks I made expressing the hope that the Right Hon. Clement Attlee was not coming here under the auspices of a political party to engage in Canadian political affairs.

I can assure hon. members to the left, as well as other hon. members, that no one in Canada will join in a warmer welcome to the Right Hon. Clement Attlee any time he comes here as a distinguished citizen of Great Britain. He deserves our recognition of his great service during and since the war. But I pointed out at that time not that there should be any restriction on anyone expressing his views but rather that there is a tradition which has not been broken since confederation, that the head of the government and the leader of the opposition—always a possible occupant of the position of prime minister—should not engage in the political activities of other nations of the commonwealth because of the fact that as heads of governments they may be dealing with heads of other governments, and should be free from political entanglements.

I certainly did not criticize Mr. Attlee, nor did I criticize the C.C.F. party for extending the invitation. I expressed the hope that the report was incorrect, and I would still hope that the Right Hon. Clement Attlee, one of the most distinguished Britons of these days, would not break a tradition that goes back to confederation and which is based on extremely sound grounds for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say to the Leader of the Opposition that I think it would be well to reserve any criticisms that he feels he should make until Mr. Attlee is in the country and we have had an opportunity to hear what he has to say.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

STATEMENT RESPECTING PRODUCTION CUT AND LAY-OFFS AT A. V. ROE PLANT

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, following the questions asked in the house yesterday by the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for York West regarding future lay-offs of workers at the Avro plant, and also questions put to me outside the house by the president of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Minister of Defence Production and I have agreed that this brief statement should be made in the house today.

As hon. members know, the Avro company has for some time been producing planes of the type known as the CF-100 to fill orders to meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence. Having regard to the number of these planes now required and on order, the company has found it necessary to put into effect a progressive cutback in the rate of production which will involve a reduction of the company's work force by approximately 1,000 men over the three-month period of May, June and July next. I am advised that the new production schedule which is planned will become effective after the annual holiday period in the plant in August. The company is engaged in engineering and advance planning work on a new plane, but a considerable period of time must necessarily elapse before actual production of this plane can be expected.

When the representatives of the workers at Avro met with the Minister of Defence Production and myself early in the year they expressed criticism of the very short notice that had been given with regard to the lay-offs that had taken place just after Christmas. Because of this the delegation was informed that the Avro company would be given the necessary information to enable advance notice to be given to the workers with regard to any future lay-offs. That is why the present notices have been sent out as far in advance of the actual lay-off dates as possible.

The national employment service will obtain immediately full particulars of those who are to be laid off and their qualifications, and I can assure the house that every effort will be made by that service to assist them to find new employment.

CF-100 PLANES—USE BY NATO COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of an answer given by the Minister of Labour in connection with the employment situation at A. V. Roe. Does the cutback in A. V. Roe employment in connection with the production of the CF-100 indicate that the member countries of NATO—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): —are not interested in this plane for augmenting their air squadrons?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I was not able to catch the last part of the question. Perhaps my hon. friend would repeat it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If the minister's friends would be quiet for a minute, he would be able to hear it.

An hon. Member: It should be on the order paper, anyway.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Does the cutback in the production of CF-100's at A. V. Roe indicate that the member nations of NATO are not interested in this plane for augmenting their air squadrons?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think that question needs to be answered by me, Mr. Speaker. It probably concerns the Minister of Defence Production, if anybody, but there is certainly no indication that any member of NATO is not interested in any piece of Canadian equipment which would aid in the collective defence.

[Later:]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister any knowledge of any orders for CF-100 planes from any of the nations in NATO?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): I know of no orders from any nation other than Canada.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

R.C.M.P. HEADQUARTERS, OVERBROOK—TABLING OF RENTAL AND PURCHASE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): In accordance with an undertaking given by the Minister of Finance yesterday I am tabling herewith photostatic copies of the rental agreement and subsequent purchase agreement in respect of the building occupied by the R.C.M.P. in Overbrook.

KOREAN REHABILITATION

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley):

1. Is Canada supplying goods intended to aid in the rehabilitation of Korea?
2. If so, under what program or programs is such aid supplied?
3. What is the value of goods shipped for such purpose by calendar years since the beginning of the Korean war?
4. Is the government considering substantially increasing its economic assistance to aid in Korean rehabilitation?
5. Has the government any information with respect to Korean profiteers preventing the proper distribution of United States' aid intended to facilitate Korean rehabilitation?

Mr. Pearson:

1. Yes. The government of Canada has aided Korean relief and rehabilitation by making available financial assistance and gifts of codfish. A substantial part of the financial support has been spent on Canadian goods.

Questions

2. The financial assistance in 1 above was given to the United Nations Korean reconstruction agency which was established by the United Nations general assembly in 1950 in order to assist in the long-range rehabilitation of the Korean economy. The Canadian salted cod was donated to the United Nations emergency relief program which is carried out by the United Nations command and which provides immediate aid in the form of food, clothing, etc.

3. A Canadian cash contribution of $7,250,000 was made to UNKRA in March, 1951. The first contribution of salted cod, valued at $300,000, was made in the fall of 1953. A second contribution, valued at $450,000, was made in the spring of 1954.

4. The Canadian government has recommended that an additional cash contribution of $500,000 be made to UNKRA for its current financial year. This recommendation was approved by the House of Commons on March 25, 1955. No consideration is being given to further contributions at this time.

5. The Canadian government is not in a position to answer a question of this kind which concerns matters falling within the jurisdiction of the United States and Korean governments.

BROADCASTING

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF INDEPENDENT REGULATORY BODY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Revenue whether the government intends to appoint a commission to consider bringing Canadian radio and television broadcasting under an independent regulatory tribunal or body, as recommended yesterday by the advisory council of the national Liberal federation, whose committee on resolutions was presided over by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill)?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have not yet received the resolution.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fleming: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he will be good enough to communicate to the Prime Minister the resolution to which I referred earlier, so we may ask the Prime Minister whether the commission will be appointed by the government as proposed by the national Liberal federation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I know of no competence I have in this matter.

Mr. Fulton: Or any other.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wonder if the Prime Minister would advise the house whether, having regard to the experience with radio, he considers an independent board desirable or necessary?

Mr. St. Laurent: My personal opinion is that it is not desirable nor necessary, but that is my personal opinion. As I recollect the terms of the Massey report there was a recommendation that after a period a further examination be made of the question, but I am still more impressed by the recommendations of the majority of that commission than by the minority report.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BUREAU OF STATISTICS REPORTS—REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if, in view of the reports of what he said last night, he would regard the reports of the dominion bureau of statistics concerning the employment situation in the textile, electrical, footwear and other industries, as undermining public confidence?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would hope not, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEFENCE OF CANADIAN NORTH—REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the light of the answer given yesterday to the hon. member for Kootenay West, can the Prime Minister tell me if it is now the intention of the government to have Iceland defend the northern frontiers of Canada, in view of reports appearing in the newspapers?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I have never heard the suggestion and I am sure, from the relations I have had with the government of Iceland, that they will make no such suggestion to us.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the resolution passed yesterday by the advisory council of the national Liberal federation, will the government proceed soon with the introduction of national health insurance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not quite as busy as the Prime Minister, and on that account I have had a chance to see this resolution. My hon. friend asked me the same question last year, and my reply then was that this government and the actions of the national Liberal federation are always consistent.

Mr. Knowles: Will that still be the reply 36 years from now?

NATURAL GAS

REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PIPE LINE TO SERVE WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the adequate supply of natural gas in Alberta, and in view of the willingness of private interests to construct a pipe line to Winnipeg, how long is he going to deny the citizens of Winnipeg the use of natural gas?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member has based his question on information that is not in my possession. I am afraid I cannot answer his question.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the very great and natural interest shown throughout the whole of Canada, and particularly in western Canada, in regard to prospects for the transmission of gas from the Alberta fields, may I ask if it is the intention of the minister before he leaves for Australia to give a statement to this house in regard to the present situation, informing us what are the facts, in the light of certain statements that have already been issued by one of the companies primarily concerned, and others?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am hardly in a position to make a statement of that kind. Trans-Canada Pipe Lines are still carrying on with their project. They have negotiations under way in several quarters. I had an interview a day or two ago with some of the directors, and they gave me certain information which I would not feel free to pass along at this stage. However, I can assure hon. members that as soon as there is a positive statement to be made I shall be very glad to make it. But to report on negotiations now in progress would be hardly fair to the directors of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

TRADE

GATT—INQUIRY AS TO PRINTING OF AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what arrangements are being made for the printing of copies of the documents he tabled in the house on Monday pertaining to the trade agreements reached at Geneva, so hon. members may have copies for study as soon as possible.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall have to accept that question as notice. It is my impression arrangements have been made for printing the documents, but I would have to check with my office to make sure.

CANSO CAUSEWAY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE OF OPENING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) asked whether a date had been selected for the official opening of the Canso causeway. I should now like to inform him and other hon. members that, upon the recommendation of a committee consisting of representatives of the government of Nova Scotia, the Canadian National Railways and my department, August 13 has been definitely set for the opening ceremonies.

It was considered that the formal opening of the causeway would be a fitting climax to the tourist season in Nova Scotia, and if held on that date would not interfere with other events such as the gathering of the clans of Pugwash, the highland games at Antigonish, the Gaelic Mod at St. Anns and the Acadian bicentenary at Grand Pré and Annapolis Royal.

It is our intention to allow highway traffic to use the causeway as soon as the swing bridge over the canal has been completed and the other work has reached a stage where this traffic will not interfere unduly with construction activities.

TAXATION

ELIGIBILITY OF WELFARE ORGANIZATIONS FOR SALES TAX REFUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Finance? Has he received requests that all social welfare organizations be made eligible for sales tax refunds, and if so is he giving consideration to such requests?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I think this request has been made at least in each of the last seven years to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister giving consideration to the matter between now and Tuesday night?

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE ALLOWANCES AND PERMISSIBLE INCOME, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. 164, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Definitions.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned last evening at six o'clock I was making some observations on clause 1 of this bill. I was a member of the committee, and I realize it is the desire of most members of the house to have this bill passed so it may receive royal assent, and so the increased rates may appear in the cheques of recipients of war veterans allowance for the month of April.

May I repeat what I said last night, that in my view the veterans affairs committee should be made a standing committee of the house.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Gillis: Am I making too much noise, Mr. Chairman? Perhaps I am disturbing some other discussions. I was saying that the veterans affairs committee should be made a standing committee of the house which could give continuing study to veterans problems as they change from time to time. This will be a continuing question, because we are going to have veterans with us for a long time.

I think the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans at this session of parliament made perhaps one of the most reasonable presentations ever made in the history of the committee. In my view everything they recommended could have been accepted and included in the bill without increasing the cost of war veterans allowances to any great extent; and I shall try to prove that as I go along.

Both the Legion and the national council recommended $60 per month as a maximum for single veterans and $120 as a maximum for married veterans. The bill now before us accepts the suggestion of $60 a month for the single veterans, as suggested in the briefs of both organizations, but it does not meet the request for $120 for the married veterans. Under the bill before us the basic maximum for married veterans is $108 per month, but provision is made whereby that $108 can be brought up to $120, through the aid of the assistance fund.

However, to receive a grant under the assistance fund it is necessary to make a second application, and it involves a second means test and investigation before the assistance can be obtained. In my judgment it would have been much cheaper and the mechanics of administration would have been definitely better if the demand of the Legion that the rate be increased to $120 per month for married veterans had been met. I believe this would have prevented many applications for assistance from the fund, and would have obviated the necessity for a lot of administrative work, red tape and investigation. There would not have been many applications for assistance to help those in need, after payment of the $120.

However, those who drafted the bill have not seen fit to follow this suggestion. I realize that anything we may say at this time will not affect the bill. I have in mind, however, that this is a continuing problem, and that if hon. members who sat on the committee and had the opportunity of meeting the officials and listening to statistics express their opinions at this time and have them recorded in Hansard so they may be read on the next occasion upon which this matter is given consideration by the government, those who are considering the matter at such time would have the benefit of those views. I am assuming, of course, that the views expressed will be reasonable and fair. I do not have in mind any wild propaganda statements. It is my desire at this time to try to put the thing in its proper perspective, as I see it, in relation to the representations made by the veterans organizations before the committee. On that particular point the basic rate is set at $120 a month. Having regard to the over-all picture you would spend less money than you are spending now, you would prevent a lot of hardship and require much less paper and administrative work and investigation if the other angle were cleared up.

The second point that was made by both organizations, and I have made it a good many times in the house in the past, has to do with the manner in which the means test for war veterans allowance affects many people across the country who were employed in industry, in the civil service or in other organizations. They came under superannuation schemes, contributory schemes in industry, and in that way had built up small retiring allowances for themselves that were paid over the years. When they reached the age of 65 and retired, hundreds of them—I know of many in my own part of the country who were employed in the steel and coal industry—received pensions of from $20 a month to a maximum of $70 a month. Very few of them receive $70. The average would be around $40 a month.

Many of these men are veterans. They paid for the pension or retiring allowance they are receiving from industry. By virtue of their age and their service they are qualified to come under the War Veterans Allowance Act. When they make application for war veterans allowance they find that the small retiring allowance they paid for over the years is deducted from the war veterans allowance, and in many instances they cannot obtain it at all.

What the act is doing in this regard is discouraging thrift. I have talked to many veterans during the past 10 years who have told me that they have pulled out of the contributory scheme in their companies, because they would get only so much out of it. They told me they were spending money on it, and if they pulled out of it and did not spend that money, when they reached 60 or 65 years of age they would be eligible for the maximum war veterans allowance. They questioned why they should continue to put their money into the other scheme.

It is very easy to cure that problem. It would not cost the country any money. If the ceiling on permissible income were raised, the man who is receiving a small retiring allowance of $30, $40, or $50 a month, which he has paid for himself, could get both without costing the government anything at all. That should be considered.

The other point about supplementing the war veterans allowance is very good in many respects. I refer now to casual earnings, income permitted under the War Veterans Allowance Act, without interfering with the maximum paid under the act. That is very good and very generous with respect to the veteran who is in condition to take employment. But there are many sections of the country in which the casual earning provision is completely valueless. It is particularly true in my section of the country where there is nothing but heavy industry, coal mining and heavy steel work. There is no possible chance for a veteran who is physically incapacitated, either by age or in some other way, to take employment and obtain casual earnings, because there is no work in that area.

I imagine that is equally true in Hamilton, Windsor and in any section where there is heavy industry. It is all right in Ottawa where a man can get a job as an elevator operator, or in Toronto where a man can go out to the race tracks and earn a certain amount of money. A veteran can be an individual real estate operator so long as he is not working for a company. He can earn money in that way so long as he is working for himself. But in many other sections of the country casual earnings do nothing for the man at all. In these sections the casual earnings are not costing the government anything at all because they are not applicable. The only way you can give relief to recipients of the allowance is by raising the maximum payable under the act. I think $120 is a reasonable target to shoot at.

Another point the Legion and the national council of veterans made, which I think is valid, was that the ceiling on permissive income should be raised to compare favourably with the income tax exemption levels. In addition to the maximum payable under the act, the veteran should be permitted to earn other income, and that would include small pensions and superannuation payments, to an amount equivalent to the income tax level, namely $2,000.

Those organizations asked that the same principle be made applicable to the single veteran, up to $1,200 a year. Their argument on that point was valid also. They pointed out that a married couple are permitted a deduction of $2,000 for income tax purposes. There may be a young veteran who is physically handicapped and who has small children. He is in exactly the same position as the person who gets a $2,000 exemption for income tax purposes. Today his maximum under the act, in regard to permissive earnings, is $1,440 a year. The argument put up by both veterans organizations is valid. We should make the ceiling for permissive income under the act as close to the income tax exemption levels as possible, because the government has already set up that principle in the income tax exemptions.

Another point they made, and I think it is worthy of consideration, was that the allowance for minor children of recipients of the war veterans allowance should compare with the allowance now paid to disability pensioners under the Canadian Pension Act. I do not think there should be two classes of citizens, when it comes to payments for children, in the same department of government. That should be straightened out. There should be equality, at least in so far as the children are concerned, in the matter of allowances. The child of a recipient of war veterans allowance and the child of a disability pensioner require exactly the same things. They have to go to school; they require the same clothes; they should have the same nourishment. It is something the government should take a look at, and they should try to wipe out the inequality as soon as possible.

The Legion made another recommendation that I have asked for in the house a good many times without very much effect. It has to do with the veterans who served in world war I and got only as far as England. When we amended the act to make veterans who served in England in world war II eligible for war veterans allowance we should have included veterans of the first great war. I say that for this reason. You meet many veterans across the country who got only as far as England in the first war. England was not considered a theatre of war at that time. Today those men are pretty well worn out; they are broken down, physically incapacitated, and they point out that this is rank discrimination so far as they are concerned. Here is a young veteran who comes back and qualifies by virtue of a physical incapacity. He may be 35 years of age, while I am 65 years of age. We both may have served in the same theatre of war. I cannot understand this differentiation between the first and the second world wars as to what is considered a theatre of war. England was considered to be a theatre of war in the last war, but not in the first war. They say that situation should be cleaned up, and I believe it should. I do not think it would cost a great deal of money.

I would point out that hundreds of thousands of men who served in England during the first war did so because they were ordered to do so. They were in the service to go where they were sent. They performed the duties allocated to them by their officers. Many were technicians, cooks or clerks. When the pay office was set up in London men were kept there. Many vehicle shops were set up and mechanics, machinists and men of that type were kept in England by order of the services. It was not their desire to stay. I know of many in my own unit who were kept there because they had specialized training. Many of them are dead, but some are still living and they think it is rank discrimination to refuse them the benefits of legislation which is applicable to the veteran who served in England during the last war.

I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that when he is going over the legislation for the next parliamentary committee he might sit down and look over this Hansard just to provoke his thought. I have no doubt as to where the parliamentary assistant stands on these matters. I believe that he, along with every member of this house who is a veteran and is free to express his thoughts, thinks exactly the same on these matters as does the veteran who is affected. I know that when the parliamentary assistant takes a look at these matters he will give a hint to those who have the right to make the financial decisions.

Another outstanding grievance has to do with the widows of imperial veterans. It would not cost much money to correct this matter. I use the term "imperial veteran's widow" advisedly because in the presentation to the committee they used the term "allied veteran's widow". I think the term "allied veteran's widow" as applied to the last war would be pretty broad and would take in some strange countries. I believe the wording should be boiled down to "imperial veteran's widow" because in the years gone by when I was doing a lot of talking about this in the Legion it was the imperial veteran's widow we referred to. We were making our demand that the imperial or commonwealth veteran's widow be taken care of.

At the present time if a widow meets the residence qualification and her husband has passed away before completing 20 years' residence in Canada, she is not entitled to the allowance. You may find one widow living next door to another. The one is receiving an allowance because her husband had completed 20 years' residence in the country, while the other receives no allowance because her husband died four days before completing 20 years' residence. It would not cost a lot of money to correct this. Instead of having the qualification that the husband must complete 20 years' residence in the country we should swing it around and say that if the widow completes 20 years' residence in the country she will qualify. That is the only change that is necessary.

I want to leave just one or two more thoughts with the parliamentary assistant. That completed the representations in connection with the war veterans allowance, but the national council of veterans made one or two recommendations to which I think attention should be drawn. These referred to the Pension Act as such.

The first was that consideration should be given to sections 1 to 11 of the act, which have to do with disability pensioners who may require treatment in a departmental hospital for some disability not related to their pensionable disability. Under the provisions of the act they are obliged to pay for their hospitalization, though at a reduced rate. They object to having to pay at all, and I agree with them. I suggest that someone should take a look at this.

The second point they made in relation to the Pension Act was in reference to pensioners who go into hospital. Under the act it is the practice to deduct from their pensions $15 per month, and this has particular application to the pensioner in the higher brackets. I do not need to tell hon. members the physical condition of a 100 per cent pensioner. Many of them are blind, while others have lost both legs. When such a man goes into hospital, while he receives treatment he finds his income, which may consist solely of his 100 per cent pension, reduced by $15 per month.

On the other hand when a man with a smaller pension goes into hospital he is immediately placed on a 100 per cent pension and in some cases his income while in hospital will be increased by 15, 20 or 50 per cent. The pensioner in the lower brackets does not suffer under that arrangement because he is compensated for the $15 a month which he loses by the increase in his pension rate brought about by being hospitalized. As I say, the man who is 100 per cent disabled finds his income reduced by $15 a month while in hospital.

I am not going to make any hard-boiled or firm recommendation on this, because I think there are many angles that require consideration. I would suggest that the next time the interdepartmental committee are taking a look at prospective veterans legislation they consider all these problems so that in the foreseeable future we may be able to finally tie up this act and say that we have done a good job, that we have reached the saturation point. I think there comes a time when you do reach that point, but before we tie it up finally with a little bow of red ribbon the matters I have been discussing this afternoon should receive attention and be ironed out.

I am sorry I have taken up so much time. I think the committee this year was as good as we ever had, but I feel it was a bit restricted because of the terms of reference. I figured that at times it got into a kind of political shemozzle instead of carrying on as a non-political committee such as it used to be. My final remarks would be to strongly recommend that this committee be made a standing committee of the House of Commons so that when legislation is being contemplated by the government in future the committee could be called together and could sit down and study the legislation and send it back to the government before they decided finally on a bill which might be considered irrevocable.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, the consideration of Bill No. 164 by the veterans committee was most enlightening to me, as it was the first time I acted as a member of that committee. I am glad the government has seen fit to introduce this legislation to give further assistance under the war veterans allowance. I was particularly pleased because I had a resolution on the order paper asking that this be done.

In the committee we heard representations from the Canadian Legion, the national council of veterans and the Canadian non-pensioned veterans' widows. I found that those briefs were presented in a most amiable, genial and concise fashion. I would like to congratulate the people who presented the briefs on behalf of those organizations. The departmental officials themselves did not hesitate to give us the answers we asked for, though they were not always the answers for which we hoped. However, they too deserve credit for the frank way in which they responded to our questions.

I was somewhat disappointed in the committee because I had heard so much about the non-partisan way in which it is habitually conducted. I was somewhat taken aback when I found how a particular party voted on a certain portion of the bill. I would very much like to see the committee get back to its original non-partisan nature, and become a committee which recommends legislation that receives the consideration of the government by reason of the fact that it completely expresses the views of the veterans.

I spoke earlier when this legislation was at the resolution stage, and at that time I indicated that I was unhappy with the proposed ceiling levels. The committee did nothing in respect to the representations that were made by the Canadian Legion and the national council, which bodies suggested the ceilings should be higher than those provided in the bill. I find fault with that because it does not take care of certain veterans who are disabled, or who have been thrifty and who stand to lose considerably when this legislation comes into effect. I was very unhappy to see the Liberals as a group vote against the proposed ceilings. Possibly some of the supporters of the government felt as we did, that the proposals we made, despite the terms of reference, should have been included in the recommendations we brought before the house.

There was considerable urgency in respect to the passing of the bill. It was suggested it would come into effect on the first of the month, and therefore it would be effective on the 1st of April. In order to do that it would have to be passed by both chambers, which made it necessary to have our views expressed in this chamber as quickly as possible. This appears to be the first opportunity to have been made available, with the result that according to the terms of the bill it probably will not come into effect until the 1st of May.

I abhor such an action, though possibly there were reasons for it. I would suggest that the minister make it retroactive to the beginning of this month in order that the veterans will not suffer as a result of this delay. I hope we can pass it today so that if at all possible it can obtain royal assent this afternoon. In any event, I suggest it should be made retroactive.

The bill leaves an undesirable situation in the case of small disability pensioners. It also penalizes the thrifty veterans who have saved during their lifetime or who have a small superannuation, a small annuity or income from some small investment. The small disability pensioners suffer the most because the bill does not make it possible for them to obtain more than the ceiling allowed under its terms.

By way of comparison, the single veterans who are in a position to obtain casual earnings are granted war veterans allowance of $60 a month. These veterans are permitted casual earnings up to $50 a month and they may have other income of $10 a month if they can prove the need, which gives them a total permissible income of $1,440 a year. The small disability pensioners, on the other hand, are allowed a disability pension of $50 a month. Because the ceiling is set at $840 the maximum war veterans allowance would be $20 a month. They are penalized to the extent that they are permitted a total maximum allowable income of only $840 a year.

Married veterans are permitted casual earnings up to $50 a month and other income of $12 a month, and obtain $108 a month under war veterans allowance. The maximum casual earnings would then be $600 a year. They would have a maximum war veterans allowance of $1,296 a year and at the rate of $12 a month they would have a permissible income of $144, which would give a total income of $2,040 if the veteran were able to obtain casual earnings to that extent.

A married veteran on a small disability pension may receive $50 a month in casual earnings which would give him a total of $600 a year. Because his total permissible income is $1,440 his maximum war veterans allowance would be only $840. This group of veterans are penalized because their total permissible income is $1,440, whereas other veterans who can obtain casual earnings have a permissible income of $2,040 a year.

The only way to overcome that condition, I would say, is to make it possible to have these ceilings set at $2,000 for the married veteran and $1,200 for the single veteran, as was suggested in the Legion brief. I realize that the small disability pensioner receives $50 in disability pension, but he has no way of obtaining additional earnings. Therefore he must do with $1,440 a year what another veteran who is capable of finding and accepting employment can do with his $2,040 a year. What it actually amounts to is that the single veteran who is eligible for casual earnings and can find a job he is capable of doing is not getting too much, but certainly the man on a small disability pension is getting too little. I earnestly suggest that consideration should be given to that factor. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, possibly we should keep that in mind for future legislation, although I would have liked to see it included in the legislation now before us.

Other recommendations were made. I do not intend to deal with each one of them, as did the hon. member for Cape Breton South, in order to indicate my approval or disapproval. As I indicated earlier, the whole brief was well presented and I did not think the veterans were making many unreasonable requests. There may have been one or two things on which I could not quite see eye to eye with them, but in the main their proposals and requests were quite reasonable.

I strongly urge the government to consider the recommendation in respect of widows of imperial war veterans as a matter of some urgency. Some of these veterans who came here 20-odd years ago are no longer living, and their widows do not receive an allowance. I do not see any possible reason for that. If their husbands had lived they would receive the allowance, but because they passed away before the 20-year period had elapsed their widows do not receive any allowance. I urge the government to give serious consideration to this matter and see that it is rectified in the very near future.

I also suggest that there should be a permanent committee on veterans affairs. In my opinion a standing committee on veterans affairs is most important. It is apparent that we will have the veterans with us for a long time, and I do not agree with the practice of setting up a special committee at certain times. Last year the committee was not established until the latter part of the session, and I see no excuse for that. If there were no business for the committee to consider then it would not have to meet, but there should be such a standing committee.

Another matter has been drawn to my attention that I cannot recall seeing in any of the briefs. It has to do with the burial of former recipients of war veterans allowance. The department now buries only veterans whose estates have a value of $1,000 or less. The department pays $175 toward a casket and $30 to open and close a grave, but no provision is made in these cases for a plot. In the city of Vancouver, Mountain View cemetery charges $95 for a plot and the money is payable in advance. I am thinking more particularly at this time of a widow whose husband was on war veterans allowance and who passed away just a few days ago in Shaughnessy hospital. She finds herself in a very awkward position. She gets $175 toward the expense of a casket and $30 to open and close the grave, but she does not get the $95 with which to buy a plot, and the money for the plot must be paid in advance.

The act is quite stringent. Apparently no allowance is made for a plot. It is a most unfortunate thing that, although we look after the optical needs, care of the teeth and so on of the veteran while he is alive, no allowance is made for a small plot when he dies so that he can be properly placed at rest. In this case the widow did have certain assets of the value of $280, but they are not immediately realizable. The point of the matter is that she falls within the group of those who have estates left to them of a value of less than $1,000.

If, on the other hand, this man had died at home the Last Post fund would have taken care of all the expenses, including the price of the plot. It was her misfortune that her good husband should pass away in the hospital instead of at home. If he had not done so she would not have had any worry. I can understand how upset she would be to receive notice that there is no place for her husband in the veterans' section of the burial ground.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to speak at any length on Bill No. 164. I can go pretty well all the way with the hon. member for Cape Breton South in most of the things he said. I can also go an additional mile starting from scratch with respect to what the hon. member for New Westminster said, but in neither case do they share the great responsibility for this measure that rests upon the government. Sometimes I think it must be a marvellous thing to sit in the seats of the opposition. It may be one of the spots where I shall sit, but until that day arrives I shall be on the government benches.

The situation respecting the objections of the opposition is of course quite clear. They have no responsibility for securing the money. We on that side and this rump side of the house have that responsibility, and we owe it to the people from whom we collect taxes to see that their money is spent in a manner that is at least equitable so far as the general over-all expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs are concerned.

I recall, and so will other veterans in the house who were overseas in the first world war, that there were a number of Canadians who did not leave the United Kingdom. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, some of them were so ordered, but I think it is also fair to say that some of them were not so ordered.

When we heard evidence in the veterans affairs committee one of the presentations was that of the national council of war veterans, which is composed of five or six different types of men and women who served in various branches of the service and in all probability comprise some 50 per cent of the total membership of the Canadian Legion. They are entirely in disagreement with the Canadian Legion respecting those who served in the United Kingdom in the first world war. They stated when they gave evidence before the committee that at this time they were not prepared to advocate that the veterans of world war I, who served only in the United Kingdom, should come under the influence, if you care to put it that way, of the recipients of war veterans allowance.

As to that I have no fight with the Legion or with the national council of war veterans. But I do say, Mr. Chairman, to all returned men, whether of the last war or of the first war, that there is a great deal of disagreement with respect to this very point. It would seem desirable if and when we consider that question again that there be greater unification of thought either for or against the government introducing that particular legislation.

Certainly I am in agreement with the suggestion that we should have a permanent veterans affairs committee. I can see nothing inimicable in it at all. As the hon. member for New Westminster has said, it now appears as though we are going to have veterans with us for a considerable length of time. I hope that is true.

Mr. Herridge: So do I.

Mr. MacDougall: I hope that is true because the day it ceases to be true I shall not have a voice in this parliament.

When the veterans affairs committee met three years ago I was astounded to learn for the first time that a 100 per cent pensioner had to pay a certain amount to the hospital while he was hospitalized. I do not know that we can hang too many skeletons on that, because it seems to me that the quintessence of all legislation respecting war veterans is that we are really more concerned about the "have-not" character who has served than we are or ought to be about the one who has a high pension. I have no fight whatever with that, except to say that it does seem a bit discriminatory that the man who served and received disabilities sufficient to put him into the highest disability category should be penalized that additional $15 a month when he is hospitalized.

Then again, you could come back if you wished to the real basis of our veterans charter and find there is possibly room for argument on both sides. I think our greatest concern, either as veterans or non-veterans, either as members of this house or non-members, is in assisting the "have-nots" above anyone else. I would not wish particularly to line up on either side of the argument at the moment, but I was surprised to learn that that condition did exist. I did not know it existed until I was a member of the veterans affairs committee three years ago. If anyone wished to do so that could be interpreted as discriminatory legislation.

Before I resume my seat there is one thing I should like to draw to the attention of the committee and the minister. I want to restate a condition which I think needs clarification, and it has nothing to do specifically with the individual pensioner at all, either the disability pensioner or the war veterans allowance recipient. I believe most hon. members are aware of the fact that in Vancouver we have one of the larger military hospitals in Canada, Shaughnessy military hospital. Two or three years ago the superintendent of that hospital sent a recommendation to the Department of Veterans Affairs that the number of personnel in the dispensary of that great institution be increased. Now, by and large the patients who come in from the various parts of the province require medicine, pills, powders and what have you. Many of these patients are hundreds of miles away from Shaughnessy, so they write in to have such and such a prescription number filled. In this dispensing department we have an extremely well trained dispenser who has graduate pharmacists under him. But with this constant influx of mail order prescriptions the time of the chief dispenser is completely utilized in filling them. This results in restricted service from the dispensing department. As I said, the superintendent, a very outstanding man—

[Mr. MacDougall.]

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am afraid we are getting far afield. This may be partly my own fault, in that I allowed the hon. member for Cape Breton South to speak about treatment. However, I would be obliged to hon. members if they would confine their remarks to the bill which is before us. I feel that we are now a little far afield.

Mr. MacDougall: This matter was brought up when we were discussing the bill in the veterans affairs committee and none of us were called to order. If it is your request that I say nothing more about it, I shall abide by it. My remarks were related to the improvement of facilities for those who are receiving treatment as veterans under the Department of Veterans Affairs.

The Chairman: Order. I recall that the hon. member for Cape Breton South prefaced his remarks by saying that the subjects to which he was referring had been mentioned in the committee, and I was hoping he was going to relate his remarks to the bill. I am afraid that certain matters which may have been referred to in the committee should not be referred to here, because we are dealing with the bill itself.

Mr. MacDougall: I shall bow to your authority, gladly and willingly. I shall, therefore, bring my remarks to a rapid conclusion.

The bill, by and large, as it comes before the house from the committee, not only in my opinion but in the opinion of a great number of the recipients of war veterans allowance in British Columbia, is a much better bill than a lot of them had suspected they would get. It is generally recognized that in British Columbia we have 28 to 30 per cent of the total recipients of war veterans allowance in Canada.

As a representative from British Columbia I am sure the large part of the population of that province who are recipients of war veterans allowances will be pleased with this bill in its present form. When I say this I am not suggesting that the bill contains everything that one might expect to find ultimately in legislation which may come up later. But, as of this moment, I am quite sure the bill will receive the hearty endorsation of war veterans in Canada generally, and particularly those in British Columbia, and that it will be recognized as a great advance over what we had last year and in preceding years.

Mr. White (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak only briefly, and to concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Royal and other hon. members of the opposition groups who have spoken. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has said the responsibility is that of the government, but I do not altogether agree with him. The fact is that the great majority of members who have served on veterans affairs committees have been veterans who have actually seen war service, men who understood and appreciated the debt Canada owes to the veterans, particularly those of world war I.

It is true that the government must find the money to meet any increase in the allowances. I do feel, however, that the citizens of Canada will never object to any grant or allowance or pension paid by the country to Canadians who served so well in two world wars. The hon. member who just took his seat also referred to what appears in the brief with reference to service in England in world war I. I was not exactly clear as to what he said, but I would point out that at page 8 of the Legion's brief they make this recommendation:

That veterans of world war I who saw service in England only be granted war veterans allowance.

That is certainly plain enough. It is clear from this recommendation that the Legion wishes to have those veterans who served only in England made eligible for the allowance. The comment in the brief is as follows:

The veterans of world war II who served in England only are eligible for war veterans allowance, and many who served in the same theatre during world war I suffered equal if not greater hardship.

It has been pointed out by other speakers, and I am sure the parliamentary assistant and the government will realize, that the number of veterans of world war I who would receive this allowance would be very small indeed at this date, and that each year the number is decreasing. I would hope the parliamentary assistant and members of the government would give earnest consideration to including these veterans in the bill.

Many hon. members have made reference to the brief presented by the Legion, and have commented at some length on the moderate and reasonable nature of the recommendations made therein. Of the briefs I have heard presented by the Legion to various committees I think that presented this year was not only one of the shortest, but the requests made therein were the most modest. It is difficult for any hon. member, particularly one who has seen service in a theatre of war, to say that the minimum asked by the Legion of $60 for a single man and $120 for a married man, as well as a ceiling of $1,200 for a single and $2,000 for a married man, is either excessive or unreasonable. They have pointed out the amount of the deductions allowed under the Income Tax Act. They have also pointed out that the recipient of a war veterans allowance is one of the few citizens in Canada who is discriminated against in the matter of the old age pension. Hon. members know that when a war veteran reaches the age of 70 he will receive the pension of $40, and that at such time his war veterans allowance cheques are decreased accordingly.

Speaking briefly when the bill was before the house previously I pointed out that one of my reasons for believing the ceiling should be increased was that it would encourage the veteran to earn as much as possible, so he would not have continuously hanging over his head this threat, if it may be so described, of having his allowance decreased in the event of going over the ceiling. The parliamentary assistant may make reference to casual earnings. It must be realized, however, that because of the areas in which they reside, the opportunities of many veterans to earn casual earnings are very limited indeed.

I was disappointed when the bill was before the committee to find that there was no opportunity to make any change in its terms. In committee I moved this amendment:

That the committee recommend that the government give consideration to introducing legislation during the present session of parliament which will have the effect of providing for amendments to this bill that will substitute $1,200 for $840 in section 1, column 3 of schedule A, and $120 for $108 in sections 2 and 3 of column 2 in schedule A, and $2,000 for $1,440 in sections 2 and 3, column 3 of schedule A.

My amendment was in line with the recommendations made by the Canadian Legion, and it had the support of all opposition members on the committee. As it turned out, the motion was defeated; and it was pointed out to me that if I insisted upon the amendment it might have the effect of killing Bill No. 164, so that the veterans would lose the benefits contained therein. If that was correct then it seems to me there was little purpose in having the committee, and very little to be gained by having the Legion or other veterans organizations appearing before it to make recommendations.

I would hope that at some time in the future amendments would be adopted to bring the legislation in line with the recommendations made by the Legion. I would point out, however, that the War Veterans Allowance Act is not amended every year, or every two years, and I fear that we might have to wait a very long time before amendments could be brought in whereby the allowances would be increased and the ceilings raised.

The bill provides that, if it receives royal assent today. the measure will take effect tomorrow, April 1. As this winter has been exceptionally severe, because of the cold weather and the great amount of snow; because heavier expenditures for fuel, clothing and food have been necessary, and because jobs for war veterans allowance recipients have been very much restricted, I suggest to the parliamentary assistant that this is one occasion when the government should consent to having the bill made retroactive to January 1, 1955. If that were done I am sure it would have the hearty support not only of all hon. members but of all citizens of Canada. There have been other occasions in this house when benefits have been conferred in income tax legislation, in the budget and in various other ways. They have been made retroactive to the first of the year. I would most earnestly recommend to the parliamentary assistant, even at this late date, that when we come to the last clause of the bill he move an amendment providing that the act come into force and have effect as from January 1, 1955.

Mr. Herridge: I am going to make only a few brief comments on this bill, because I know a number of hon. members wish to speak this afternoon and perhaps this evening. All hon. members want to see the bill receive royal assent today. I must first of all say that I support the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Royal, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and other hon. members who have spoken on the government's failure to accept the proposals of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans. The special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs has had the opportunity to study and discuss this bill, and also to obtain some very valuable and important information from the officials of the department. The deputy minister of the department, the chairman of the war veterans allowance board, the director general of rehabilitation services and others gave to the committee some very valuable information, which can only really be obtained satisfactorily in committee as the result of questioning. The committee heard representations from the Canadian Legion, the national council of veterans and the non-pensioned veterans' widows organization. With regard to the non-pensioned veterans' widows, I was particularly interested to note that our new parliamentary assistant has made a special study of widows' problems. That was evident in the proceedings of the committee, and his promptness in answering all questions that arose with respect to the needs of widows and their problems.

These ladies come before the committee whenever it is established and make their representations. I think hon. members will recognize the fact that, because of their broad experience and association, they have brought matters to the attention of the committee which might not have been brought to its notice if they had not formed themselves into an organization and come to Ottawa to make those representations. I notice that when one of the representatives of this organization was giving evidence before the committee she said that she would love it—that was the term she used—if the parliamentary assistant would visit their organization and explain the act and the regulations whenever required.

In view of the special study the parliamentary assistant has made of this problem —and I might say it is apparent that this is another evolution in the development of the department and its specialized activities which I think is most necessary—I am writing to the persons connected with these organizations of widows receiving war veterans allowances and advising them to write the parliamentary assistant and send to him their problems; to come to Ottawa, if necessary, and when they come to Ottawa to see him. If they are unable to come to Ottawa I tell them to be certain to write and ask him to attend their meetings and explain the act and regulations to them. I am quite confident, Mr. Chairman, that our parliamentary assistant will be only too willing at all times to give these ladies the benefit of his extensive knowledge, understanding and appreciation.

We of this group regret very much that the government has not seen fit to accept in full the proposals of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans. I think it is quite fair to say that they are gratified with the improvements in the act and the benefits this bill will bring. In that respect the editor of The Legionary set it out very clearly in the last issue. He said:

> While grateful for the improvements contained in the bill,—

And we are all grateful for these improvements.

> —the Canadian Legion will be presenting a brief to the parliamentary committee in which the above points will be emphasized.

He is referring to an increase to $120 for married veterans and an increase in the permissive income. The article continues:

> It can only be hoped that the committee, always composed of members of parliament who are ex-servicemen themselves, will be able to influence the government to go the whole way in its sympathetic treatment of these old veterans.

The committee was not able to persuade a majority of its members to recommend to the government amendments in line with the hopes of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans. While it is to be regretted that the government has not seen fit to raise the married veterans' income to $120 a month, yet one of the most unfortunate things about the present bill is the failure to raise the permissive income as suggested by the veterans organizations.

That occasions particular hardship to three groups of veterans in receipt of war veterans allowance. The first group consists of those who have no other income and are unable to earn. They are sadly in need of an increase in the allowance, particularly the married veterans. The second group consists of veterans receiving a small disability pension without the ability to earn casual earnings. The third group consists of those who have a small regular income, such as an annuity or an industrial pension, or something of that sort, and who are also unable to earn.

These three groups suffer severely from the fact that the government has not agreed to raise the allowance for married veterans to $120, and to raise the ceiling on permissive income. When the minister was speaking some time ago, at the resolution stage, or when the bill was introduced, he referred to the cost to the country of meeting the proposals of the veterans organizations in full. It is quite right that he should think the cost should be considered. All hon. members recognize that we have a responsibility to Canada as a whole, to all the citizens of Canada. I do not think any one of us should act irresponsibly in that respect. We have to consider the cost of this legislation to the people of Canada as a whole.

In view of the cost of meeting the proposals of the veterans organizations we are fully warranted in accepting our responsibility to the veterans concerned, in introducing legislation which will meet the proposals of those organizations. In this connection, we have been spending in recent years an average of $2 billion on defence. According to this year's estimates the cost of defence will be reduced by about $133 million. When the minister spoke he informed the house that to give effect to the proposals of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans would cost the country an additional $24,750,000. That is only about one-fifth of what we are saving on national defence this year. Surely when we have the opportunity to save $133 million this year on national defence we would be acting in a responsible manner if we took $24,750,000 of that saving and applied it to meet the needs of the veterans who have fought for this country.

The minister informs us that to give effect to the proposals contained in this bill will cost about $9·5 million. In addition to the fact that we would be able to meet the representations of the veterans organizations with only a fraction of the saving on defence, in the opinion of members of this group this type of legislation simply represents a redistribution of wealth which is most necessary in Canada at this time if we are going to maintain prosperity and improve our social democracy. The putting into effect of this legislation would introduce into the purchasing power stream about $800,000 a month. That would be of considerable assistance throughout the whole country. As I say, we look upon this type of legislation as a form of transfer payment, as providing an opportunity to transfer wealth from those who have it to those who do not, in order that they may have some opportunity to maintain a satisfactory standard of living.

According to newspaper reports and rumour in general, which sometimes has some foundation, when the budget is introduced it will provide for some reduction in corporation taxes. I want to say to the parliamentary assistant that if that proves to be true, if the government of this country which has been able to save $133 million this year on national defence should reduce corporation taxes—any reduction would run into quite a number of millions—without granting the veterans the legislation proposed by their organizations, then it will have demonstrated that it is willing to give more consideration to the representations of large corporations in Canada than to those of veterans organizations with respect to legislation necessary for the veterans of this country.

However, I am always somewhat of an optimist. The committee has not presented its final report, and I do hope that as a result of the discussion in the committee and the bombardment from the opposition side of the chamber during the discussion of this bill it will recommend to the government a further consideration of the proposals of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans so that in the near future we may have an opportunity of discussing legislation which will be satisfactory to all hon. members of this house, which will be approved by the veterans organizations and which will meet the needs of veterans across this country who require our urgent consideration at this time.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, realizing the desirability of completing the discussion of this bill as quickly as possible, I do not propose to take very long. However there are several observations I want to make in connection with this legislation. It is my privilege to represent all the residents of the Fraser Valley constituency, among whom will be found a great many war veterans. I think I would be remiss in my duty if I allowed this opportunity to pass without expressing to the department and the government their appreciation for the measures which have been brought forward to improve the conditions of those receiving war veterans allowances.

Having voiced that appreciation I should like to say that the general reaction to the minister's announcement with respect to war veterans allowances has been just what was expected. In the first place there has been appreciation, but coupled with that there has been an expression of disappointment and resentment over the fact that the government has not seen fit to go all the way in meeting the requests of the various veterans organizations.

Speaking during the debate on the throne speech I referred to the proposed legislation and stated that anything less than full compliance with the Legion brief would not be satisfactory to the Legion branches. At this time I should like to refer to a number of communications which I have received in this connection. I shall give their source only, except that I shall read two brief telegrams.

I have received telegrams from T. W. Krell, president of the Maple Ridge branch No. 88, Canadian Legion, at Haney, B.C. There is another telegram from C. E. Gummerson, secretary of the Chilliwack branch 4, Canadian Legion. There is one from D. MacLennan, secretary of the British Columbia command, Canadian Legion; one from B. W. Harris, Fraser valley zone commander, Canadian Legion, and finally one from Mr. C. J. Inkman, president of the Agassiz branch, Canadian Legion. As I have said already I shall read only two of these. The first one from D. MacLennan, provincial secretary of the British Columbia command, reads:

> The Canadian Legion in British Columbia considers proposed increases in war veterans allowance rates and permissible income inadequate and therefore requests your earnest support in committee and on the floor of the house for what we consider minimum adequate increases as requested in brief presented by our dominion council.

The other telegram I wish to read is from B. W. Harris, Fraser Valley zone commander of the Canadian Legion. This reads:

> Two thousand members of Canadian Legion in Fraser valley zone deplore limited increase of war veterans allowance and demand the government implement the Legion brief in its entirety. Your full support in this vital matter respectfully requested. We are tired of accepting the fragments.

[Mr. Patterson.]

I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who stated that those in the Legion generally felt that they had received more than they anticipated. According to these telegrams that would hardly seem to be so, because they voice their dissatisfaction most definitely and clearly. We had hoped that some of the remaining inadequacies in the veterans legislation would be dealt with by committee recommendation, but there have been no appreciable changes.

There are two or three matters I should like to mention, only briefly, because they have been referred to already by other speakers. A clarification of the casual earnings provision is most important, and further publicity should be given to this provision. There are many members of the Legion and a great many veterans who are not cognizant of the privileges they are entitled to under this particular clause. Therefore I think as much publicity as possible should be given to this provision.

On looking over this legislation it would seem to me that the neglected group is the one made up of war veterans allowance recipients who are without the means of supplementing their income. They are those who are physically unable to accept work to supplement their income even under the casual earnings clause. Therefore we find that this particular group are having a difficult time making ends meet, and certainly they are not receiving sufficient income to live in any degree of comfort whatsoever.

The other group in this same category, of course, are those who are unable to secure suitable employment. There are quite a number of veterans in this class referred to in the various briefs which were presented and in the replies to questions given by the witnesses. Surely some way can be found to give additional assistance to these veterans.

I might just say that one of the matters which has been drawn to my attention is the fact that in British Columbia some former enemies are receiving more under the old age pension that is received by veterans under war veterans allowances. This does not contribute to the happiness of veterans who served in theatres of war. I believe some further consideration should be given to this particular matter.

The second recommendation in the brief presented by Mr. A. J. Wickens, president of the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, which has been called to our attention this afternoon, reads as follows:

> That the practice of deducting $15 per month from the allowance payable to a disability pensioner, when he goes into a Department of Veterans Affairs hospital for treatment of a disability which has occurred as a result of active service, be eliminated.

I trust that this matter will be taken under advisement and that close attention will be given to it as soon as possible.

I had the opportunity of discussing veterans affairs with representatives of veterans groups in the Fraser valley just a short time before I came down to this session, and there were several matters which they brought to my attention. One of these is the situation in which the veterans of the first world war find themselves, those who did not serve in theatres of war, so classed, but who served only in England. I was not previously aware of the fact that during the first world war Canadian troops were bombed in England and suffered casualties. There does not appear to be any justifiable reason for excluding such veterans from the benefits of the war veterans allowance.

The question of the standing committee has again been referred to this afternoon, and the Legion groups in my area are very desirous that this matter be given consideration and that a committee be set up. There are other subjects to which I could refer, but they are outside the terms of this bill so we must leave them for a future occasion. However, we do appeal to the government and to the department to fill in some of the gaps which still remain in the veterans legislation, and remedy some of the remaining inadequacies so that assistance will be given to the veterans in all cases adequate for their needs and commensurate with the feelings of a grateful nation.

Mr. Henderson: As a veteran and a member of the veterans affairs committee I would like to say a few complimentary words about this bill and also about those who are responsible for the administration of veterans affairs in this country.

I might say in the first place we should be extremely proud of the veterans of Canada. We as Canadians were proud of them as soldiers and are still proud of them as veterans, and we cannot measure in dollars and cents the gratitude and assistance which should be given to unfortunate veterans in need.

I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that on behalf of the people of Canada we still have to consider the cost; but I would like to congratulate this department upon the advances they have made in this bill in keeping abreast with the needs of our veterans. It is very easy to say "too little and too late"; nevertheless I think great progress has been made in this committee, and I would not want any impression left that the committee members were working against each other. As a member of the veterans affairs committee since I have been in this house I have always found that veterans from all parties strive toward a common end, and that is to the benefit of the veterans. It brings a great feeling of satisfaction to belong to a group of veterans in Canada who endeavour to play their part and give assistance to the other veterans. I think it has been a good committee composed of good people.

We in Canada have advanced veterans legislation when we compare it to veterans legislation in various countries throughout the world. I think this can be attributed to all governments since world war I, and to the fact that we have been fortunate in having the very best men serve as ministers of veterans affairs. We were most fortunate in the predecessor to the present minister, and I congratulate the present minister and his parliamentary assistant on the work they have done in bringing about this present bill.

In closing I would like to say these few words. Since I have been a member of parliament I have always found those in the Department of Veterans Affairs anxious to do everything they could to assist the veterans and endeavour to ensure that they received their just rights. All I can say in conclusion is that I hope they keep up this good work.

Mr. Lennard: Mr. Chairman, as one who has been interested and active in veterans affairs since 1919, and who has served on various veterans affairs committees in this house since 1935, with the exception of the last two committees, I feel obliged to take up the time of the house for a few moments this afternoon.

In connection with this bill I must say that I am thoroughly in accord with what has been said by the hon. member for Royal, the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac and the other members of the opposition who have spoken. In that connection I suspect that those who have spoken and probably all members of this house have received many letters and communications relating to these matters, but they have refrained from taking up the time of the house to put them on the record.

In the matter of veterans affairs generally I have always felt the policy of this government has been one of delayed action. Over the years the government has appointed veterans affairs committees, possibly one every two or three years, and occasionally the appointment of the committee would coincide with a meeting of the British Empire Service League in Canada. The government have always rushed things through because they had to have them finalized before the national meeting, and there was a great hullabaloo raised at these meetings that we had done so much for the veterans; but as far as the veterans of the first great war are concerned I do think they are receiving too little too late. In that connection may I say that the pattern on this occasion is the same. This measure was brought into the house a couple of weeks ago, rushed to the veterans affairs committee, came back to the house just yesterday, and is being discussed now on the last day of the fiscal year. We are told now that if it does not pass and receive royal assent today the benefits will be delayed. That has always been the case with respect to veterans affairs since I have been a member of the House of Commons. I am not critical of some of the legislation that has been brought forward but I do feel that it has been the practice of the government not to do anything until the last minute so that they may save a dollar some place. I have always regretted that. Finally, may I repeat that the veterans of the first great war are getting too little too late.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the bill to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act has come back to the house from the special committee on veterans affairs with only one minor amendment, an amendment which was suggested by the departmental solicitor and which does not bring any direct benefit to the veterans at all. In so far as any amendments which would go further than the original bill to meet the request of the veterans organizations are concerned, there simply is no such animal. Today we are discussing in effect the bill in the same form as it was when it went to the committee.

The reason why there is no amendment is that the solid Liberal phalanx in the committee stood behind the government and refused to have any amendment made. They voted down any suggestion that the government should even give consideration to further changes to help the veterans. In this committee, as distinct from the last two veterans affairs committees, there has not even been a recommendation brought forward to the house that consideration should be given by the government to something better.

I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard put his finger on one of the reasons for this attitude of government members in the committee when he said this afternoon that on the government side they have a great responsibility so far as legislation is concerned. He should have said they have a great responsibility to the Liberal party. That has been the basis on which the veterans affairs committee of the present session of parliament has functioned. It seems to be the thought among government members on the committee that they have done their duty by the veterans of Canada if they have protested quietly, secretly, and anywhere else but in the house or in the committee, to the Minister of Veterans Affairs or his parliamentary assistant. Of course that strikes at the very roots of parliamentary government. The place for them to protest is right here on the floor of the house. If they are not satisfied with the legislation brought down and feel it should be improved, their protest should be made on the floor of the house and not to a minister behind some closed door. As long as that is the only type of protesting done by government members about these veterans bills, the veterans of Canada are never likely to see the legislation passed to which they are so justly entitled.

The objectionable features about this measure still remain. They are that the allowance to the married veteran remains at $108 per month instead of having been raised to $120, that the permissive income for a single veteran, over and above the allowance, is still only $10 a month, what it was before the bill was introduced, and that the permissive income of a married veteran is only $12 a month, just $2 more than it was before the amending bill was introduced.

As hon. members know, recommendations were made by two thoroughly responsible and statesmanlike bodies of veterans. I refer to the Canadian Legion and the national council. They recommended that married veterans should be paid an allowance of $120 per month, that the permissive income over the allowance should be $40 in the case of the single veteran, which would have enabled him to receive $100 per month in all, and that the permissive income of the married veteran should be raised so that he could receive a total of $2,000 per year.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard say this afternoon that his and my province of British Columbia, which has the largest percentage of war veterans allowance recipients of any province in Canada, would give hearty endorsation to the amendments as set out in the bill. I do not know where he got that idea because I have a wire here from Mount Pleasant branch No. 177 of the Legion in his own riding. It reads as follows:

> The Mount Pleasant branch 177 Canadian Legion has ordered a night letter to be sent to you asking for your continued support on behalf of the recipients of war veterans allowance as presented by the Canadian Legion dominion command convention. The Vancouver zone council has set up a committee for the purpose of dealing with this matter and to arouse public opinion and support for this cause. The Legion request as outlined is reasonable and should receive the full support of the members of parliament on the government side of the house.

It has not had support from one member on the government side of the house. The wire continues:

We the members of the Legion are sure the other members of parliament will support the Legion program.

They are right in that, because all opposition parties have supported the Legion program. Then I had a wire from the provincial secretary of the whole British Columbia and northwest states command which reads as follows:

The Canadian Legion in British Columbia considers proposed increases in war veterans allowance rates and permissible income inadequate and therefore requests your earnest support in committee and on the floor of the house for what we consider minimum adequate increases as requested in brief presented by our dominion council.

That command went further. They advertised in all the daily papers of British Columbia. I have here the advertisement taken from the Vancouver Province of March 15. It reads:

Canadian Legion

British Columbia and N.W. States Command

We strongly protest the federal government's proposed increase to War Veterans Allowance Act as being inadequate. We consider our request, originally made three years ago, as the minimum which will be acceptable to improve the lot of our veterans.

Below they published the telegram, a copy of which I have read. I endorse the recommendations made by the Legion and the national council and I propose to say a few words in support of those recommendations. First of all, I will deal with the recommendation that the allowance for a married veteran should be increased to $120 a month. As I pointed out, the bill only increases it to $108. This question was dealt with in the committee, and dealt with very adequately by Major A. J. Wickens, an outstanding veteran of Canada, who is the president of the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada. He had this to say about this recommendation, and it is found at page 28 of the proceedings of the committee:

I do feel, as our brief says, that it costs a war veterans allowance recipient just as much to maintain a wife as it does to maintain himself, and we feel that a wife of one of these veterans is entitled to live at the same standard as her husband is, and we do not feel that because a man has taken unto himself a wife, as he is entitled to, that he should either require the wife to live at two-thirds of the standard he is authorized to live at, or that he should average his income out, and thus reduce his own standard. I do not think there is much more which can be said about that. It is fairly evident that the cost of maintaining a war veterans allowance recipient's wife should at least be fixed at an equal level. If that is accepted the total for a married couple would be $120 a month, and if any gentleman in this room can show me how my wife and I can live in decency and moderate comfort on that sum, I would be very grateful to him for dealing with the question, because that information would be invaluable.

The war veterans allowance, as it was contained in the veterans charter, originally did provide a married veteran should have twice as much as a single veteran. This percentage has been changed only in recent years.

Then, I turn to the question of permissive income over the allowance or, in other words, the ceiling on the money a recipient can receive. The provision under this bill is for $10 per month for a single man and $12 for a married man. Everything that was heard in the committee clearly pointed to the crying need for an increase in the ceiling. This was the one way in which the need of this group of veterans could have been met adequately.

Let us consider, for example, a veteran or widow who has reached 70 years of age. One would think, and I do not doubt that most Canadians think, when a war veterans allowance recipient reaches 70 years of age, he or she automatically gets an additional $40 per month, just as all other Canadians do. Well, that is not the case. Instead, every veteran who happens to be a small pensioner or on a superannuation or to have a small income obtained from some other source up to $10 per month, if he is single, or $12 per month if he is married, will get nothing additional whatever when he reaches 70 years of age. If he has not any other such outside income, then he can only benefit to the extent of $10 per month if he is single or $12 per month if he is married when he reaches 70 years of age.

The national council dealt with this very clearly in their brief, and I quote from page 3, recommendation No. 3:

That the recipients of war veterans allowance, upon qualifying for old age security, should receive the old age security, without reductions in the W.V.A., except in so far as the total income exceeds the total allowable income under the W.V.A. Act.

As recommended by them, it would have been $1,200 a year for a single veteran and $2,000 a year for a married veteran.

The comment contained in the brief on this recommendation reads as follows:

Increasing age is generally attended by gradual reducing possibilities of supplementing allowance through casual earning. Therefore, the aging recipient of war veterans allowance who may have been able through his efforts to supplement and enjoy a few comforts will under the proposed provisions of this act be reduced to the subsistence level of the war veterans allowance recipient who has never been able to supplement.

The individual who has never been able to supplement has undoubtedly suffered hardships to which he may have become more or less reconciled. The individual who is forced to reduce his living standard by reason of age and more completely disabling physical capacities, experiences discouragement amounting to tragedy. It would seem only humane to permit the W.V.A. recipient to enjoy the old age security allowance, coupled with sufficient war veterans allowance to the total of permissible income from all sources.

I point out that there is a source from which this additional $40 can come, and that is from the old age security fund. The old age security payment is not supposed to be a handout at all. Government supporters have taken the position, and spoken on platforms all over the country, to the effect that the old age security is something towards which we contribute. In other words, the people have paid for it and are entitled to it as of right. The veteran has paid for it too. He has paid the 2 per cent sales tax just the same as you and I have paid it. He may have paid a 2 per cent income tax, and he is entitled to the benefits of the 2 per cent corporation tax which is devoted to building up this old age security fund. This is not the case of a handout. This old age security fund is contributory and the veteran should be entitled to get the full $40 per month when he reaches the age of 70.

Really, the question of the man over 70 or the widow over 70 is the real basis for this whole problem. The average age today of all recipients is between 65 and 70. It will only be a matter of a few years until practically everybody now on war veterans allowance is over 70 years of age, and that applies to both veterans and widows. I refer hon. members to table 3 on page 76 of the proceedings of the committee. This table shows the age groups of the recipients of war veterans allowances. There were 44,794 veterans and widows getting war veterans allowance at the end of 1954. Of that number, 11,836 veterans and 3,706 widows were 70 years of age and over. This group totalled 15,542, which is over one-third of the total number drawing allowances at the present time. Then, in the next group from 65 to 70, many of whom will be 70 in the next year, there was another 11,521. Within five years, therefore, you will have well over half of the war veterans allowance recipients over the age of 70.

Those who have reached that age cannot benefit from the war veterans allowance assistance fund because they would get a small amount of the old age security if they did not have any other income. We are told there are only 193 who are 70 years of age or over, and who are able to come under what is called section 4 which enables a veteran to take a job for a period of say two months or six months. Practically none of them have been able to qualify under that section. I am sure there are just a handful who are able to get casual earnings in this group over 70 years of age. These people can only be given fair treatment by raising the ceiling, and they should be allowed to get the additional $40 per month.

Another group to consider is the small pensioners, people on small pensions, and some of the ex-employees of the Canadian National Railways who are on small superannuation payments, or civil servants in a similar position—and I am referring to both veterans and widows. Some of these are over 70 years, and the remarks I have made apply to them.

But, taking those under 70 years, here again is a source from which money could come. They are on pension or on superannuation. They cannot benefit from the war veterans allowance assistance fund, because they have these small pensions or small superannuation. They are trapped by the low ceilings. In the case of a pensioner, it really means that that pensioner is penalized for his wound. He is penalized because he was wounded. And in the case of a man who has been thrifty and has put by some savings, no doubt he is penalized by reason of his thrift—and all because the ceiling on permissive income is too low.

According to the figures given to us in the committee there were 28,612 veterans and widows under 70, including the small pensioners or those who happened to have superannuation. Out of that 28,612 there were 20,648 who had no accountable income—no income whatsoever. One might think that they could benefit from the assistance fund up to the extent of the ceiling, which in the case of a single veteran is $10, and in the case of a married veteran $12. But the regulations with regard to the assistance fund are pretty strict. First of all, there must be a second means test. The veteran or the widow of a veteran must be grilled about his or her assets, and all that sort of thing, and go through this second means test.

The regulation dated October 6, 1954, P.C. 1954-1538, states in paragraph No. 7:

A recipient under the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, whose income is less than that shown in column III of schedule A or B to that act, as the case may be, may be granted on application assistance by the district committee to the maximum allowed by the provisions of the act relating to income—

That is, he could be granted up to the ceiling of permissive income.

Provided—

And here is what does the damage.

Provided that, in the opinion of the district committee, such recipient requires financial assistance to relieve distress.

And the result, as it is shown in the table appearing at page 77, is that there are only 3,757 veterans and 1,531 widows, or a total of 5,288 out of the 20,648 who have no other income, who have been able to qualify for the war veterans allowance assistance fund.

The department says: Well, that is because they did not apply. In other words, the implication is that 15,000 of these veterans and widows did not apply for assistance under the war veterans allowance assistance fund. In this same table however we find how much was paid to them in a period of ten months last year. There was a total of $393,533.71, and that works out at $74.42 each for that ten-month period or $7.44 a month. So that they were not getting even the $10 allowed under the act.

If the ceiling on permissive income were increased, then more of these veterans and widows could benefit from the assistance fund, and those who are on the fund could benefit more than they do at the present time. But the whole story is that the ceiling is too low. Everyone who served on the committee knows this to be the fact. I do not believe there is a member in the house who will rise in this debate and say he believes the ceiling on permissive income is not too low. We were given a good example of this by Mr. A. E. Lanning of the Canadian Corps Association when, at page 34 of the evidence before the committee he said:

The means test is another thing with which we are concerned. Not long ago, on Bay street, I heard one of our wealthy friends quipping facetiously that he was buying a big new car. His friend said, "You are going to get only about 14 miles to the gallon with that." He said, "Yes, but my birthday is in February and I am going on the old age pension; and I figure that the government can pay for the gas for the new car."

This, by the way, was not a veteran speaking. Mr. Lanning continues:

That is all very well, but the veteran on war veterans allowance is not going to be able to buy a big car and run his car on gas paid for by an allowance without a means test. So we think that the means test is a little harsh on war veterans, and every opportunity should be given to the older man who is ambitious enough to go out and do something. You set a ceiling of $10 a month, but you have to pay a boy $10 a month to come and cut your grass. What is a man going to do to keep his earnings down to $10? It is a ridiculous figure.

That sums up the whole argument: it is a ridiculous figure. I say that $10 for a single veteran and $12 for a married veteran is ridiculous.

The Legion dealt with this matter, too, because at page 5 of their brief we find this:

The War Veterans' Allowance Act recognizes that the ceiling is too low, and under section 4—

The one to which I referred, which enables a man to work for a period of a few months.

—and the regulations governing casual earnings, permit it to be substantially exceeded. Yet for those unable to avail themselves of these provisions no exceptions are permitted.

And there is not the slightest doubt that only a handful are able to avail themselves of those provisions.

Section 4 and the provisions governing casual earnings also recognize the desirability of self-help, but this recognition is not extended to those who by forethought and thrift have gained for themselves small pensions or retirement annuities. The great merit of our Old Age Security Act is that it recognizes the desirability of encouraging individual thrift and saving, but the War Veterans' Allowance Act discourages it.

Our pension laws recognize that pensions for disabilities cannot be affected by the earnings of the individual, but the small pensioner who must also use war veterans' allowance finds his pension of little value because its amount is practically deducted from his allowance.

These and other anomalies would be largely eliminated if the ceiling on permissible income were increased to $1,200 and $2,000.

It is a tragedy that these ceilings are not being raised at this session, as requested by these veterans organizations. But the question will have to be faced; it is not going to be allowed to die down. These men and widows are entitled to a raising of the ceiling. Practically all the men were front-line soldiers, most of whom served this nation in the front-line trenches in Europe in the first war. Practically all were volunteers; and I believe the failure of the government to raise this ceiling at this session by an adequate amount means shabby and ungrateful treatment of these veterans of Canada.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to unduly delay the passage of the legislation; but I believe that if by this action the opposition groups were able to convince the government of the necessity of amending the bill to provide for the recommendations made by veterans organizations, such a delay would be publicly approved. It is highly improbable that that could be done, since the opposition groups were unable to convince the government members of the veterans affairs committee who without exception are veterans. We were unable to convince those who have a complete understanding of the position and the need of the burnt-out pensioners of the desirability of those changes so it is very optimistic to suppose that we can convince the government.

I certainly share the view of the opposition members who have spoken on this bill. As has been pointed out, this legislation could be described as too little and too late. The need of those recipients of war veterans allowance existed five years ago in the same way as it exists today. Legislation should have been introduced at that time to provide relief for those in need. If the principle of providing assistance is desirable today, it was equally desirable many years ago.

I know that those who will receive the increase in the allowance will appreciate it. But I share the view of the other members that two significant factors were overlooked. The permissive income was not increased sufficiently and the allowance for the married veteran was not increased to the desired proportion.

When negotiations take place it is the practice of those making their request to ask for more than they hope to achieve. However, in the case of the veterans organizations, I am convinced that this is not so. I do not think anyone can accuse the Canadian Legion of asking for more than they realized was required by the veterans of Canada. It is most unfortunate that the recommendations of hundreds of thousands of veterans, through their organizations, were ignored by the federal government. I would request the government at this stage to reconsider the recommendations of the veterans organizations and increase the permissive income to $1,200 and $2,000, and to increase the allowance for the married recipients from $108 to $120. That is the least we can do at this time.

Not too many days ago we completed the debate on unemployment and it was generally agreed that it was a serious problem to have 614,000 unemployed in Canada. That has a very close association with the topic under discussion, because a lot of emphasis has been placed on the fact that a veteran is able to augment his income with casual earnings. It has always been difficult for a man getting on in years to get those odd jobs. It is more difficult for war-worn men to compete with 614,000 unemployed in seeking little jobs to augment their income.

I am pressing the point that it is necessary to increase the permissive income so that if a man has a permanent job which does not pay very much, but is still a permanent job, or has wisely invested his money in a pension fund he will be permitted to receive the maximum benefits and not have to expect to augment it in competition with the younger unemployed men through casual earnings.

One of the methods that the government has used and relied on to ease unemployment is the transfer payments, family allowances, old age pensions and unemployment insurance. Surely, to increase the war veterans allowance payments of the married veteran to $120 as well as increasing the permissive income would be one way of transferring payments, because the veteran would not be able to save that small amount of money. He would have to put it back in circulation in order to live.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I am expressing the view of the Legion bodies and the veterans in my own constituency, as well as those in the rest of Canada, when I make a strong appeal to the government to take the protests of the opposition groups in this house into consideration and make the desired changes as recommended by the veterans organizations.

Mr. Quelch: I appreciate the fact that in Canada we have a very fine program of veterans legislation. However, for a number of years the main weakness in that program has been the War Veterans Allowance Act. Let me hasten to add that when I say that I am not for one minute criticizing the officials who administer that department. So far as they are concerned, they are doing an exceptionally good job in leaning over backwards in looking after the interests of the veterans, but they are limited in their actions by the legislation.

At the second reading stage, I congratulated the government on increasing the amount of the allowance, but I deplored the fact that they had not seen fit to increase the ceiling. Unfortunately, the committee did not see fit to make any recommendations in that regard at this time. I hope the Liberal members of the committee will not be offended when I say that the new Liberal members of the committee, the members of the Liberal party who have been appointed to the committee during the last ten years, are a little hesitant today about making any recommendations, or supporting any recommendations, that will go beyond the government's program. I would point out that the veterans committee of today functions very differently from the way the veterans committee functioned ten years ago. One might well ask, why is it we have such a fine program of veterans legislation today? Liberal members might say it is because the government introduced it and passed it. But let me also point out that it was due in part to the procedure that was adopted in drawing up the charter. Let me remind some hon. members how that was done.

A veterans committee was set up and a number of draft bills were sent to that committee. The members of that committee were permitted to make any amendments to those draft bills that they saw fit to make. Then we sat in camera and the late Ian Mackenzie, who was then minister of veterans affairs, sat in with us and told us just how far the government would go in accepting those amendments. But mind you, we were allowed to make any amendments that we saw fit to make. Then, after we had threshed it out in camera, the government introduced bills in the house, based upon the draft bills, with the amendments made by the committee that the government had seen fit to accept. I would suggest to the parliamentary assistant that if he could persuade the government to adopt a similar practice today, it would be much fairer to the members of his own party, as it would give them a chance to join with the opposition in committee in order that certain amendments or certain recommendations could be made.

I agree that the Liberal members on the committee today are in a difficult position. They know what the program of the government is; they feel they cannot join with the opposition in urging recommendations that go beyond government policy. But if the practice that was adopted in drafting the veterans charter, of putting draft bills before the committee and allowing that committee to make any amendments that it saw fit to the draft bills and then allowing the minister to sit in with the committee and tell us how far the government would go, were adopted once more, I am sure hon. members would be surprised at some of the changes that would be made in the bill. While the minister might not consider that the changes would be in the interest of the government, they certainly would be in the interest of the veterans.

I should like to join with those hon. members who have congratulated the Legion upon the brief it submitted, and also the national council of veterans associations. I think it was a very moderate brief and the government could very well accept its provisions.

The main point dealt with in the brief was the present ceilings. While it is true that the present interpretation of casual earnings helps a veteran who is able to work, this definition does not help the veteran who is unable to work nor does it help the man with a small disability pension or annuity. In the case of the man receiving a small disability pension or a gratuity the amount of that pension is subtracted from the ceiling and what is left governs the war veterans allowance to be paid. The veteran able to work is allowed to have casual earnings of $50 a month or $600 a year. There is no question that there is severe discrimination against the small disability pensioner or the veteran in receipt of a small annuity.

I raised this question in the committee and a good deal of sympathy was indicated for my point of view by a number of hon. members. However, it was felt that no recommendation should be made at that time but that later when we drafted the final report we might be able to include a recommendation dealing with the question. It seems to me that the logical time to make a recommendation with regard to war veterans allowance is when the committee is reporting the war veterans allowance bill rather than to wait until the final report of the committee is made. However, if the committee sees fit before concluding its sittings to include in its final report a recommendation to take care of the situation I have just referred to I am sure the veterans will appreciate it. I would hope in that case that at a later date the government would see fit to act upon it.

I should like to join with those hon. members who have referred to the plight of the widow of the imperial veteran. For the life of me I cannot see why the government should refuse to grant a war veterans allowance to the widow of an imperial veteran who had died before completing 20 years' residence in this country. The actual cost would be quite small and I hope the parliamentary assistant will again try to impress upon the government the desirability of making this change.

There was some criticism of the chairman of the committee but personally I think he did a remarkably good job. It is not easy to act as the chairman of the veterans committee because we always feel we should be given more latitude than is given to any other committee. Taking everything into consideration, I think he did a remarkably good job and he was just as lenient as could be in stretching the various rules of procedure.

Along with other hon. members I regret that the motion to increase the ceiling was voted down. If I felt that the parliamentary assistant was able to give us any assurance that the government would consider the question and perhaps do something about it at a later date I would be much easier in my mind.

In conclusion let me say that I hope the government will bear in mind the repeated recommendation of hon. members on all sides of the house that we have a standing committee on veterans affairs so that from year to year we could review the various pieces of veterans legislation.

Miss Bennett: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended entering this debate this afternoon because I feel that that is a monopoly belonging to hon. members of this house who are veterans. However, after listening to what has been said I feel that as a member and citizen of this country I should say something for these glorious men to whom I and every hon. member of this house and every person in this country owe such a great debt.

A very strange thing is taking place in this Canadian parliament this afternoon. We are debating how much should be paid to men who have seen long years of honourable service, who have given practically everything they have to this country. As a matter of fact we would not be sitting here debating this afternoon if it had not been for what these men have done for us, particularly those who fought in the first world war.

I say this with some diffidence, but if I were a young man sitting in the galleries this afternoon hearing what I have heard in this debate I would consider for a long time before I would offer my services to this country should another emergency arise. When these men offered their services in the first great war particularly we promised them everything. We told them what they would have when they came back. We told them what rights and privileges they would have by virtue of their services to this nation. But today we find ourselves cajoling, coaxing and doing everything possible to get this government to raise the permissible income to a decent standard as requested by the veterans themselves.

I think every hon. member of this house going about his particular constituency knows very well that these men do not have a standard of living, do not have the type of home, do not have the things in their homes, do not have many of the ordinary amenities of life as they are growing older that they should have and to which they are most certainly entitled.

The permissible income for single veterans has been raised to $60 a month, but instead of raising the permissive income for married couples to $120 a month it has been raised to only $108. I agree with what an hon. member to my left said today, that in doing this the government would simply be doing what it has done to increase purchasing power in this country through the payment of old age pensions, family allowances and all that kind of thing. After all this would come back to the people of this country. These veterans would have additional purchasing power and in the final analysis there would be extra employment. The benefit would be felt all through our society and all this would cost the country but very little if anything at all.

Another thing that comes to my mind is that we have a group of men who are home from the second world war and who may some day be burnt out just the same as those veterans we are discussing at this moment. What incentive are we giving these young men to save or to be thrifty? Why should they? All they have to say is, "If we do save and if we do have this money, when we reach the age when we are entitled to a burnt-out pension the amount will be deducted according to what we have saved." That situation is not fair to the veterans in this country. I do not think the citizens of Canada would approve for one moment of the bill we are attempting to pass at this moment in the House of Commons.

May I reiterate one matter which has been dealt with by practically every hon. member who has spoken today. As I say, the veterans have made it possible for us to sit here today and have made it possible for Canada to be what it is now. I think it is outrageous that we should even think of deducting the old age pension or an amount commensurate with the old age pension from these men when they reach 70 years of age. There are millionaires in this country who receive it and nothing is being deducted from them, not a cent. They receive their $40 a month and there is no question about it.

Before this bill is passed I hope the government will reconsider these things. I think the people of Canada would expect it and I think we owe these men a tremendous unpayable debt. Nothing we can do for them would be too much and their request is fair. As men and women and as members of this house the least we can do is to comply with their request.

Mr. Cardiff: It is not my intention to take up the time of the house at this late date. Yesterday I received a telegram from one of the Legion branches in my riding and they asked me to speak for them in this debate. The telegram reads:

> Members of branch 180, Canadian Legion, Wingham, request you support the maximum of war veterans allowance.

I think perhaps I would be remiss in my duties if I did not thank the Minister of Veterans Affairs for having brought in this bill and for having given the veterans some assistance; I think they expected it. On the other hand, however, the veterans feel they should have obtained the full allowance asked for by the Canadian Legion. I think, in view of what we have heard this afternoon and in view of what we have read of the proceedings of the committee, that we are in agreement in this matter. I think it was a modest request which the Legion made, modest indeed, and I think it should have been complied with.

I cannot understand why the government insists upon not raising the permissible income of veterans. If a veteran works and makes a little money in order to help himself it is then deducted from his pension, and I do not think that is right at all.

I would like to follow the last speaker by stating that I think it is absolutely wrong that when a man reaches the age of 70 and has earned his allowance as a veteran it is deducted from his old age pension. I think he is entitled to it as a right regardless of whether or not he receives an allowance as a veteran. I do not think it should be deducted and I hope that before our young veterans reach 70 years of age some consideration will have been given to this matter.

In the county of Huron we have perhaps more veterans according to population than any riding in Canada—

Mr. Bennett: I wouldn't say that.

Mr. Cardiff: I would, according to population.

Mr. Bennett: What about Grey county?

Mr. Cardiff: We have the reputation of supplying more men to the army than any other county in the province of Ontario and I wish to say something on behalf of our veterans. I feel, as they do, that they have been very modest in their requests all down through the years. They have been given allowances piecemeal when they should have been given more, and it went on and on until the government thought it was time to raise the allowance, without being asked, after the fight which took place last year.

Now, I hope the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs will take into consideration what has been said this afternoon and that even at this late date some further consideration will be given to this matter. I shall not take up any more time because I would like to see this come to a vote.

Mr. Knowles: Most of us have been here long enough—even those members who came for the first time in 1953—to know that when legislation gets as far along as this piece of legislation has now gone the chances of the government making any changes in it are not very great. Even so, I hope that the government will pay attention to the appeals which have been made by members of this house to the effect that our burnt-out pensioners be given a better deal than is provided in this bill, particularly with respect to the permissible income ceilings. I support wholeheartedly the appeals that have been made with respect to that phase of the matter and I support once again the appeals that have been made to make it possible for burnt-out pensioners when they draw the old age security pension to draw it without any reduction in their war veterans allowance. I support once again the appeals that have been made with regard to the widows of imperial veterans and also the appeals made to the effect that England should be regarded as a theatre of war in relation to those who served in world war I. These indeed are the main improvements that can and should still be made and despite the fact that there is some pressure to get this bill through today in time for royal assent tonight, in order that its provisions can be effective tomorrow, I say to the government that if the minister would come into the house and agree to any of these changes that have been suggested the house would give unanimous consent at all points necessary to make these improvements before this day is through.

If that cannot be done—and the only reason it could not be done would be because of unwillingness on the part of the government—there is still another way in which this problem can be met. As hon. members know the Unemployment Insurance Act is being amended twice in this session. The Minister of Labour brought in a bill which was put through some weeks ago and is now law. Despite that fact there is now on the order paper notice of a resolution to amend it again; in fact, we might even alter the very provision that was dealt with in the bill that went through earlier. I mention that to underline the fact that is known to all of us that it is possible to amend the same statute twice in the same session. I suggest that this house would be happy to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act twice during this session. If the government feels it cannot make up its mind on this matter before the end of this day's sitting I suggest something might be done even yet before the end of this session.

Indeed all of us who are not members of the special committee on veterans affairs are pleased to learn that the committee has not finished its work and that that committee will be bringing in a report later on. I hope that the committee will consider including in that report recommendations along the lines of the representations being made here this afternoon, namely, that the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act be brought up to the level of the suggestions made by the Canadian Legion and other veterans organizations.

Like others who have spoken, I do not want to delay the legislation now, but I should like to see some action on the part of the government. I certainly hope that some one of the courses being suggested by various members will be followed and that we will yet give a better deal to our burnt-out pensioners, particularly with respect to the permissible income ceilings. Like others who have spoken, I am satisfied I am speaking for a great many people, not only members of the Legion branches in my constituency and my city, not only for members in other veterans organizations but for Canadian citizens at large.

We on this side of the house are not impressed at all by the argument of some private members on the Liberal side about responsibility, namely, that they are the only ones who have to take any responsibility for the cost of proposals such as we advocate. It is time to throw out this cliché about opposition members being able to ask for anything without having to take any responsibility for it. Surely hon. members opposite know that we have to go back to our electors and face them on the question of the taxes or other costs that have to be met to satisfy the demands which we make on the floor of parliament. But I am satisfied that the people of Canada generally would like to see the best possible deal for our burnt-out pensioners.

I mentioned that I know I am speaking for the members of a number of branches in my constituency and in my city. Other members have had the same experience, I know, but I should like to put on the record the names of the branches and organizations from which I have heard recently with respect to Bill No. 164. I have heard from the Winnipeg branch, Manitoba No. 1, on Sargent avenue in Winnipeg, as well as from the Brooklands and Weston branch of the Canadian Legion in Winnipeg North Centre. I have heard from the Valour Road branch, the St. James branch, the Imperial division No. 84, the Ukrainian veterans, the Duke of Kent branch and the Fort Rouge branch. I have also had representations from the Manitoba and northwestern Ontario provincial command and from the veterans' widows organizations in my city.

These are not all the Legion branches and organizations in the city of Winnipeg but they are the ones, and they are a representative group, from which I have heard during the time this very bill has been under discussion, and although they make their representations in different language, though they write different letters or send different telegrams, they all add up to the same thing. They feel that parliament should meet in full the modest, justifiable representations of the Canadian Legion. Once again I want to indicate my full support for those representations.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief but I wish to say a few emphatic words. I think the very least this house should consider, in honour, is to give our veterans what they have asked for this year, and everything they have asked for.

If the veterans of this country had haggled with Canada at the time of decision as disgracefully as Canada is haggling with them, this country would have been safely tucked away in a German empire long ago.

There is no conceivable excuse. What we are able to do financially depends on what we can do physically. There is not a doubt in the world that Canada is producing enough goods and services to supply more by far than all these men are asking for.

It is our business to make what is physically possible financially possible. Let the members of the government bear in mind that they have the responsibility to do that. They are loud in their protestations about their responsibilities. They do not understand half of their responsibilities. One of their most vital responsibilities is what I have mentioned, to make what is physically possible in this country today financially possible; and then, so far as our veterans are concerned, do what the veterans have asked.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I wish to add my voice to those of all the members who have spoken today. I have had representations from the Legion branches in my riding. I know what some of these veterans have had to undergo over the years, and I do not think it is right that the government should allow conditions to exist as they are today. It is not right that the amount of permissible income should not be increased so that they can live in the way they should be able to live. As things are at the present time, the welfare organizations of the Legion branches throughout the country have to look after these veterans in many cases and help them out when they are sick, members of their families are sick or when other things happen. The welfare organizations and ladies auxiliaries of the Legion have to help these veterans and their families.

It would not cost the government one red cent to raise the ceilings on permissible income. It is the right and fair thing to do and I know that I and everyone else feel that the ceilings should be raised to give the veterans who have fought for you and me a fair deal.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, in view of the course the debate has taken I should like to speak for two minutes. As one who has been associated with the Canadian Legion ever since that organization was formed, I do not think I could very well sit here and not participate in the discussion, if only briefly. I am not going to repeat the arguments already advanced by so many speakers. There is no need to reiterate them or put them on the record again. They have been clear, and I think for the most part they were fair and reasonable. Certainly that is true, with respect to increasing the permissive ceilings and changing the act so as to include veterans who served in England during the first war.

I have over 200 files in my office at the moment dealing with various veterans and one of the most difficult questions for me to answer is why a veteran who served in Britain in the first war cannot get the war veterans allowance when his next door neighbour is getting it who served in Newfoundland in the second world war. It seems to me that is a perfectly illogical and unfair provision, and it should be changed. As I said, I am not stressing individual arguments whatsoever. They have been put forward here, and if the government will not accept the arguments of others they certainly will not accept mine.

I should like to add a further word. I think this country has been very fortunate in the type of organization that has been looking after our veterans since the first great war. I refer to the Canadian Legion primarily but also other organizations. Without casting reflection on other organizations in other countries, I think all of us in this chamber realize that we owe a great deal to the sane leadership given our veterans in this country, particularly by the Canadian Legion. I think the Canadian Legion deserves the support of the government and the house when it approaches us with what apparently is a very reasonable proposition. You cannot expect that organization to continue to maintain its leadership and to have the support of the returned men throughout Canada unless its voice is listened to and unless it commands the respect here that it does with veterans generally. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant and to the government that there is—I will not say that "danger"—that possibility.

Unless these demands are pretty well met, when they are reasonable and when they are approved by the great majority—I believe every veteran in this house would approve of these demands—there is that possibility. Some hon. members cannot give support for obvious reasons. I am not suggesting their demands should be met in full in every case, but they should when they are reasonable, as they are in this particular case. I feel the country owes the Canadian Legion a great deal, and we should support that organization by meeting, so far as the government can possibly do so, its demands. Otherwise, we may find that the veterans in this country will receive the same type of treatment they have received in other places.

Mr. Stanton: I should like to express my opinion on this subject. I feel that we could give the veterans everything they have requested because they have not been unreasonable in their requests. I have received many telegrams and personal communications from the veterans of Leeds county. They have been very moderate in their demands. The government says that they are responsible, but I do not think they are. I believe everybody would agree with me that if a plebiscite were taken in this dominion on the veterans' demands, those demands would receive the wholehearted support of the people of this country. When these demands have the support of the rank and file from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I see no reason why they should be refused.

I do not wish to take up too much time, but requests have been made to me to uphold the veterans' demands and I would be very remiss in my duty if I did not raise my voice in support of them here today. While I do not believe the government will do so, I hope they will reconsider this bill and amend the act so the veterans can receive what they have requested. I believe they should have a larger permissible income because they are not going to lay away those funds. They are going to spend them for their everyday wants and that will put the money into circulation. It would not be costing the government anything. Above all things these veterans should receive the full $40 per month when they reach 70 years of age. Other people across Canada receive that $40 a month, regardless of their income, so why should the veteran not receive the same treatment?

Mr. Bennett: I shall be as brief as I can because we are all anxious to have this legislation passed by this house as soon as possible. First of all, I should like to acknowledge the fact that the three veterans organizations did present briefs to the special committee on veterans affairs, those being the Canadian Legion, the National Council of War Veterans and the Canadian non-pensioned widows. As has been said, those briefs were presented in a very able manner. Although I do not share all the views expressed in the briefs, nevertheless they were presented well and in a moderate tone. I do not need to tell hon. members that these veterans organizations, all responsible bodies, have done a good deal in Canada to further the well-being of the veteran. Their co-operation and assistance to the Department of Veterans Affairs is reflected in no small way in the veterans charter as it stands today.

At the outset, too, I should like to say that I am sure hon. members on both sides of the house are genuinely and deeply concerned with the welfare of the older veterans, particularly the veterans who saw combat service. I think we all recognize what we owe to these veterans, and I think we are all anxious to do just as much as we can to help them.

I have listened with great interest to the speeches made here because I am a greenhorn in the field of veterans affairs. Many of the members who have spoken have had a great deal of experience. I hope that in my reply I do not sound dogmatic because, as hon. members know, this side of the house is charged with the responsibility of setting the rates and ceilings. No one can say definitely if $1,440 is right or $1,500 is right. I am going to try to place on the record some of the thinking of the government as I know it.

Most of the criticism today has been levelled at the permissible ceiling. I think hon. members will agree that when you discuss the amount of the ceiling you have to take into consideration all the benefits which are available to war veterans allowance recipients. You also have to take into consideration the historical background of the war veterans allowance legislation, the purpose for which it was set up and its scope. I feel some members have the wrong conception of war veterans allowances, because of some of the statements made here today.

It has been said many times that the War Veterans Allowance Act is welfare legislation based along old age pension lines, payable to veterans who have seen service in an actual theatre of war but 10 years sooner because those people are pre-aged by 10 years as a result of that service.

Now, that proposition has often been laid down. The Hon. J. H. King, minister of pensions and national health at the time the old age pension act was introduced in 1926, pointed out that an additional clause should be inserted giving special consideration to veterans who, while not 70 years of age, fulfilled the other requirements of that act. Then, four years later, the War Veterans Allowance Act did provide the equivalent of the old age pension under the same means test for a restricted group of needy veterans at age 60, or younger, if they were incapable of supporting themselves. On March 4, 1930, Mr. King said in connection with war veterans allowance legislation:

> It is not considered a pension matter in the sense that we have been discussing pensions heretofore. This is an allowance to the veterans.

During the same debate Mr. Mackenzie King said:

> This measure has been introduced amongst other things to give relief to the man of 45, 50 or 60 years of age, who is prematurely aged. Instead of having to wait until 70 years of age, as he would under the Old Age Pension Act, the returned soldier will receive the equivalent of the old age pension at the age of 65. Or if declared "burnt-out", as it is expressed, he may receive this equivalent at a much earlier age, at any age in fact.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs said the other evening in a broadcast on the "Nation's Business", that the War Veterans Allowance Act had been, from its inception, a social security measure designed especially to meet conditions peculiar to veterans who have seen combat service. Sir Arthur Currie, when he was grand president of the Canadian Legion, called it a fine piece of social legislation.

Our predecessors who were responsible for the various acts which we now call the veterans charter decided then that there was an altogether different base for the assistance available to the veteran under the War Veterans Allowance Act, as compared with the pensions paid to veterans suffering from disabilities related directly to war service under the Pension Act or to the dependents of veterans who gave their lives in the service of their country.

It has been argued on the other side of the house that war veterans allowance legislation should not be compared with welfare legislation or with the Pension Act, but that it should stand on its own legs. Well, I think it is elementary—indeed some hon. members opposite have agreed with this—that when we consider the benefits under an act such as the War Veterans Allowance Act we must consider other welfare legislation and the Pension Act, just in the same way as it is our duty in parliament at all times to keep in mind and to compare the needs of all groups and classes making up this great nation. There must be a balance maintained.

I would remind hon. members that under the Old Age Security Act a civilian gets $40 a month, and a married couple, if they both qualify as to age, receive $80. But remember that in my own province of Ontario, for instance, if there is a married man at the age of 70 whose wife is aged 63, that married man gets only $40 a month. There are no old age pension supplements in the majority of the provinces.

Now, comparing the war veterans allowance with disability pensions, the ceiling of $70 a month is the equivalent of a veteran who has a disability assessed at 56 per cent. The ceiling, recommended by the veterans organizations and by all hon. members opposite, of $1,200 for a single man, would amount to a disability pension of 80 per cent, or only $25 a month less than the 100 per cent disability pensioner receives.

The $120 ceiling contained in Bill 164 is the equivalent of a 70 per cent disability pension, whereas the recommended ceiling of $2,000 would be just about the same as a 100 per cent disability pensioner receives, namely $2,040, if a married man.

Mr. Knowles: But is it fair to compare the ceilings in one case with the amounts paid in the other?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, it is fair, in view of the assistance fund; and I shall come to that later. It is true a veteran will receive $60 and if he needs it $70, and in the same way a married veteran can receive $120. As I say, while all of us would like to see the older veteran as well off as possible, still I think we have a pretty fair bill in front of us. We are all familiar with the terms of it: A single man gets $60 and, as I have said, if he needs it he can be paid $70. That is $10 more than the veterans organizations recommended. The ceiling, of course, is $70.

But the big point I wish to make to hon. members of the opposition is this, that raising the ceiling will not help the man who has no outside income; and I suggest he is our basic man. The War Veterans Allowance Act was set up to help needy veterans, those who were without income. Raising the ceiling will not help them. Hon. members opposite seem perfectly content with the $60 for the man who has no outside income, and that is all he can get. Now under the act we can pay $10 more, and for a married man we can pay him up to $120; and that is what was recommended by the veterans organizations. The ceiling is $120 for the married man.

But once again our basic man is surely the man without income. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said, and quite rightly, that there are 20,648 veterans on war veterans allowance who have no other income. In other words, half the W.V.A. veterans have no other income. I say to hon. members that raising the ceiling will not help them; but hon. members opposite do not seem to be concerned with that fact. They say, "Oh, they are all right." They are trying to help the fellow who has income.

Mr. Knowles: Raising the ceiling would help those over 70.

Mr. Brooks: Would that not help the veteran over 70?

Mr. Bennett: I will come to that. And may I say I was quiet as a mouse when you fellows were directing your barrage at me today. I would ask the same consideration.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe you had nothing to say.

Mr. Bennett: I have plenty to say.

Mr. Martin: And saying it very well indeed.

Mr. Bennett: It is estimated that the cost of the increase in rates and ceilings in Bill 164 will amount to about $9,250,000. All the present recipients of war veterans allowances will benefit from this expenditure. The proposal to raise the ceiling to $1,200 and $2,000 respectively would cost $12,500,000, in addition to the $9,250,000, or a total additional expenditure of $21,750,000.

The extra $12,500,000 to raise the ceilings would not benefit the 20,648 at all. They would not get a cent of it. It would go only to those who have incomes. I would point out to hon. members opposite that $12 million is a lot of money. It is a substantial portion of the total expenditures on war veterans allowances in 1954-55, which in round figures amounted to $28 million.

I notice it is about six o'clock. May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Bennett: Mr. Chairman, before the dinner recess I was discussing the amount of the permissible income ceilings in the bill. Once again I should like to say that I am putting on the record some of the reasoning of the government for the setting of the ceilings at the limits in Bill No. 164. I think hon. members opposite will concede that perhaps it is easier to make a speech urging the raising of rates and ceilings than it is to make one to defend a certain limit, no matter where that limit may be drawn. I want to say once again that we on this side of the house are just as interested in the older veteran as hon. members who have spoken on the other side of the house. When you draw the line in welfare legislation, no matter where you draw it, there will be some inconsistencies, inequities and cases of hardship.

The hon. member for Royal drew our attention to three or four cases, as did other hon. members. The first one was the case of the veteran with a small disability pension. The hon. member for Acadia also feels very strongly on this point. We are all very sympathetic toward the disability pensioner. As I understand it, the point is that under our present ceiling the veteran with the small disability pension is losing the benefit of a portion of that pension. I say to hon. members that the same argument would apply exactly with the ceiling at $100 a month. For instance, a single person with a disability pension of 30 per cent would receive $37.50 pension and $60 veterans allowance, or a total of $97.50, which is just about the same amount as the 80 per cent pensioner gets. Surely, the 80 per cent pensioner would say: my disability pension is being wasted.

I do not know what is in the mind of hon. members opposite, but—

Mr. Quelch: On account of the casual earning being allowed in the sum of $50 a month or $600 a year, the disability pension should be placed in the same category up to $600.

Mr. Bennett: By doing that you are equalizing the 30 per cent disability pensioner and the 80 per cent disability pensioner. Surely the 80 per cent veteran or the fellow at 100 per cent would say: well, I am getting the same pension now as the man on a 30 or a 50 per cent disability pension. If hon. members mean that they want to exempt disability pensions altogether, I would point out that that would cost over $10 million, and a married man on a 100 per cent disability pension would get $170 a month disability pension and $108 war veterans allowance, or a total of $278 a month. The War Veterans Allowance Act was not intended to work in that way or for that purpose.

The second case the hon. member for Royal brought up was the old age pensioner. The hon. member said if a veteran were receiving war veterans allowance, when he became 70 his war veterans allowance would be reduced, which is perfectly correct. A single man would get $40 old age pension and he would get an allowance to the extent of $30 under the present bill. But the hon. member for Royal knows perfectly well the answer to that. He knows that the war veterans allowance legislation is old age pension legislation but the pension is granted to veterans 10 years before it is granted to civilians and on much more generous terms.

I said this afternoon that in Ontario a married man at age 70 with a wife 63, if he is a civilian, gets $40. Our veteran gets either $108 or $120. To pay him a full war veterans allowance at 70 would be to pay him the old age pension twice.

The third case that the hon. member for Royal brought up was that a man with a small pension. He said that the man with a small pension was losing the benefit of part of that pension because of the ceiling we have in the act at the present time. Surely the same argument would apply if we had the ceiling at $1,000 or $1,200. Take a veteran with a small pension of $60. With the ceiling at $1,200 he would get $60 pension and only $40 war veterans allowance. He would be losing $20. And have hon. members ever thought of the man of age 60 who wants to work? He is, say, getting $2,200 and he wants to continue to work, and yet he has a pension coming to him. Certainly, it would be quite an inducement to him to say: I can retire at 60 on $2,000. Would not hon. members opposite say then that that would be a measure to discourage people from working when they reached age 60 and could retire on an income of $2,000?

Mr. Brooks: May I just correct the hon. member? My argument was that it is based on the cost of living, or should be. It should be based on need. What I said was that a man with a small pension of $25 or $35 a month should have his full veterans allowance so that his income would be brought up to a decent figure of between $1,000 and $1,200. If that were done he would have something on which to live. I did not mention any large amount such as $50 or $60 over and above his war veterans allowance. I was thinking of $25 or $30.

Mr. Bennett: I do not think we have time to argue across the floor. But what amazes me, as I said this afternoon, is that the hon. member for Royal is perfectly satisfied for the married man who has no income to live on $120 a month or the single man on $60.

Mr. Brooks: The same principle applies.

Mr. Bennett: He has no other income. The hon. member is satisfied with that.

The next point the hon. member for Royal made—and I am not picking on him; he acted as the official spokesman for the opposition and I think he mentioned nearly all the points that were covered by the other speakers—was that we were discriminating against the veteran who wanted to go out and work. It is quite true under the present set-up of casual earnings that a person can go out and make more money than the veteran who cannot work. But the same thing would apply if you had a ceiling of $1,200. The man with an income of $1,200 who went out to work would have a greater amount than the man with $1,200 who had to stay at home. These arguments apply all the way down the line, no matter where the ceiling is set.

Mr. Brooks: No.

Mr. Bennett: The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is usually pretty careful in what he says. I do not think he gave a full explanation of one thing this afternoon. He mentioned that 20,648 veterans were receiving war veterans allowances and they had no other income. He said that 5,581 were receiving benefits from the assistance fund. That leaves a remainder of 15,067 individuals who have no other income and who are not getting assistance from the assistance fund. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that when he asked the departmental officials about that they replied that they did not apply. That is true, but the acting deputy minister also said this:

I will only make one observation, and that is these 15,067 are either getting along satisfactorily on the basic rate because they are living in areas where the cost of living is not too high, or they are augmenting their incomes.

I said at the outset that when you consider the adequacy or inadequacy of the ceilings you must take into consideration all the benefits of the act. I must not talk out this bill, but I do want to remind hon. members that we have a reasonable set-up for the war veterans allowance recipients.

The minister announced the other night that the assistance fund has been liberalized. This fund now includes two more factors in computing the monthly grants under the fund. Evidence was given before the committee that the assistance fund is being administered very sympathetically and that over 90 per cent of the applications for assistance from the fund are being approved.

I think hon. members are familiar with the new interpretation of casual earnings. They all agree that this new interpretation is a very generous one. A veteran who can go out and work can certainly augment his war veterans allowance. I commend all hon. members to read that directive which is appended to the appendices of the proceedings No. 3 of the special committee on veterans affairs of this year.

There is also a farm directive which makes the position of the war veterans allowance recipient engaged in farming a much better one. Many farmers are now eligible under the War Veterans Allowance Act who were not eligible previously.

There is just one more directive to which I want to draw the attention of hon. members. This is a new one that applies particularly to the recipients of war veterans allowances who take in boarders and lodgers. This is a most generous directive and it is important because many war veterans allowance recipients cannot go out to work but are able to supplement their income by taking people into their homes.

I wish to mention too that war veterans allowance recipients are entitled to free medical treatment for any condition. Last year this cost over $9 million, which is roughly one-quarter of the total amount spent on war veterans allowances.

Just a word on the work of the committee on veterans affairs. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South state that during the last five years the committee has not been as effective. The hon. member is reported on page 2559 of Hansard of March 30 as having said:

Then the committee had the right to examine legislation and make recommendations.

I would remind the hon. member for Cape Breton South that last year he made a couple of recommendations in the committee on which the government acted and the government subsequently amended the legislation. This year the committee decided to report this bill at this time in order to have the increased payments go into effect for the benefit of the veterans, on the understanding we would draw up our final report at a later date when we would take all these problems into consideration. It might well be that the committee will recommend to the government certain changes in the legislation.

Mr. Brooks: That will not benefit this bill.

Mr. Bennett: That is perfectly true, but bills can always be brought into the house by the government. The hon. member for Royal in his speech left the impression that he was stifled as far as getting information from the committee was concerned. I do not understand that because a good deal of information and material was laid before the committee. We had the acting deputy minister there, the deputy minister being overseas on leave of absence.

Mr. Brooks: I think the hon. member will admit that I was discussing casual earnings. On a number of occasions the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked the number who were under the casual earnings provisions. We could not get any information regarding casual earnings at all.

Mr. Bennett: I admit that there was no answer given to the question about casual earnings. I do not think the veterans of this country nor the government want to keep tab on the earnings of veterans doing such things as lawn-mowing, snow-shovelling and so on. The hon. member for Royal did leave the impression that he did not get all the information he required because he said, "I do not know whether the ceiling should be $1,200, $2,000 or maybe less; I do not know whether the rate is right at $108 because no study was made of it."

I want to tell the hon. member that the Liberal members have studied it; the Department of Veterans Affairs has studied it. This Bill No. 164 is no hit-or-miss legislation; it is the result of a lot of research and study on the part of the officials of the department and of the government.

Mr. Brooks: You must have been given a lot of information we were not given.

Mr. Bennett: All the officials were sitting there and when there were no more questions we started to consider the bill.

I want to say that this war veterans allowance legislation is under constant study, always with the object in view of making sure it is meeting the needs of the older veterans. The original act was passed in 1930 and it was amended in 1936, 1938, 1946, 1948, 1950, 1952 and the present amendment. The regulations have been amended by order in council in 1941, 1943, 1944, 1945 and 1946.

Do hon. members opposite note anything significant there? If they do not, may I tell them that there were no amendments made to the act or the regulations in the period 1930-35. But since that hiatus 1930-35, when a Conservative government was in power, there has been steady and regular progress towards working out a better deal for the older veteran.

I should like to say to the hon. member for Halton, for whom I have the highest regard, that this afternoon she seemed more concerned about the older veterans than her namesake and my namesake was in the thirties.

Mr. Pearkes: No man was more concerned about the older veterans than R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Bennett: When I talk about a better deal I am talking in terms of increased ceilings and increased rates, a better formula under the assistance fund, a wider interpretation of casual earnings, an easier lot for the veteran engaged in farming and free medical treatment provided for the war veterans allowance recipients.

Perhaps it is not true to say that we have to be more realistic on this side of the house, but I think it is realistic to say that the increases in the rates and ceilings provided by Bill No. 164 are substantial. To summarize these increases, the single man under the new bill gets an increase of $10 whether he has outside income or not. The married man, if he has outside income, gets an increase of $20, that is if he is on old age pension or has some outside income. The married man with no outside income gets an increase of $18. Under this bill every recipient gets a raise of $10 if single or $18 or $20 if married. I submit that those are substantial increases and I think the veterans across the country think they are substantial.

Hon. members opposite have been reading telegrams. There are four Legion branches in my riding and I have not heard from one of them. I have not had a telegram or a letter. I have not heard from my zone. I talked to many veterans during the week ends and I would suggest to hon. members opposite when they go home for the Easter recess that they talk to the veterans in their own constituencies, who I am sure will express to them their gratitude to the government for this legislation.

In closing I want to repeat that we on this side are vitally interested in the older veterans. We are going to watch this legislation in operation. If there are gaps in the program, if there are deficiencies in the legislation we will plug them as we have in the past.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the veterans of this country would be interested if they were here this evening in hearing the applause by Liberal members when it was indicated that the government does not intend to act upon the recommendations and suggestions of the Canadian Legion and the national council of veterans. If they were here tonight they would be interested in hearing the applause that greeted the words of the hon. gentleman as he spoke rather disparagingly of the fight which we in the opposition have put up on behalf, not of something ephemeral and fantastic but of something that is asked for, and reasonably asked for, by the Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veterans Organizations.

I say this, sir, as one who has been a member of that Legion for well over 30 years, that it is a proud organization and nothing can be a matter of greater pride than to belong to it. It has always been characterized in its representations by sound and patriotic considerations and there has been no endeavour at any time to make block raids on the treasury, as has been the case in some other parts of the world. That deserves to be said. Let me say something more. This measure was held up until the last possible moment.

Mr. Hosking: By your party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We cannot continue the fight. Did the hon. member for Wellington South have something to say?

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): He said, "By our party".

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend from Wellington South says by his party. It certainly has been a fight by silence. That is what has happened in so far as the Liberal party is concerned in reference to this matter. I say, sir, that tonight we have to give up this fight because in a matter of a few minutes this legislation has to be brought before the Senate. If it were not for that fact my hon. friends on the other side of the house who laugh and jeer at the fight we have put up would have an opportunity tonight to express by vote what they voice in secret.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, that opportunity is not going to be given to them tonight for the reason that it is impossible for us to make that motion which could be made, thereby enabling the hon. members who support the government who remain silent in parliament but who in secret say that something more should be done than is being done under this legislation to express their real feelings. But, oh, behind closed doors or outside of parliament or in their letters to their constituents or to the Canadian Legion they invariably say, "We are all for it; wait until the committee starts sitting and action will take place".

When that committee sat, Mr. Chairman, it was handed a dish and told, "This is your dish; this is what you accept; no other ingredients will be allowed to be placed in that dish". And when my hon. friend the member for Hastings-Frontenac, and my hon. friend the member for Vancouver-Quadra, in that committee endeavoured by the motion to which reference was made today to have implemented the reasonable request of the Canadian Legion, that motion was voted down and every Liberal member did exactly what the government intended them to do when it placed this measure before the committee complete and in its entirety.

I am going to say nothing more at this time. There is no opportunity on second reading for us to secure a vote on this matter. As far as it goes it is acceptable but as far as parliament is concerned no action can be taken; we are handcuffed. Regardless of how many hon. members in this house would vote for the representations of the Legion and the national council in their entirety we cannot do anything because this is a money bill that muzzles and handcuffs private members.

My hon. friend brought up the period from 1930 to 1935. How old were the veterans then? They were 32, 38, 39 or 40—

Mr. McIlraith: No. There were a lot of them around Ottawa in real difficulty.

Mr. Bennett: Many were on war veterans allowance and that is why the Liberal government introduced the measure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend brought that up and he realizes the change that comes over these men in a matter of 20 or 25 years.

Now, sir, one more word. If the government had not intended to railroad this legislation through in its present form it would have submitted a draft bill to the committee and would have presented them with an opportunity to give consideration to what should be incorporated in that bill. Instead, the government produced a bill before that committee and on party grounds alone the Liberal members of that committee stood united against the representations which were made by the two bodies to which I have made reference.

There is nothing more that we can do. The members on this side of the house without regard to the position of the opposition have endeavoured to secure action by representation. Their representations have been disregarded; nothing has been done to answer them. There is nothing more we can do because the Governor General waits, and if we were to move an amendment this evening we would find ourselves in the position where it would be too late to have this matter brought before the Senate. Half a loaf is better than no bread, and therefore, as far as I am concerned, having expressed the strongest possible condemnation of the government's attitude in failing to do what is reasonable and fair for the Legion which has itself always been reasonable and fair, we can do nothing more.

We have expressed our opinion and having fought to the last moment we can simply say that as far as the government is concerned it has the majority and it has made the decision. There is nothing that we can do to prevent your failing to carry into effect the reasonable representations that have been made by the hon. members who have spoken and that, as far as I am concerned, concludes this question. We have tried.

My hon. friend says that he has not had any representations; it must be that his parliamentary secretarial position has insulated him from the representations that hon. members in every part of the house have received in recent days.

On clause 3—Surviving spouse.

Mr. Bennett: I have an amendment which I understand the Minister of National Health and Welfare is prepared to move.

Mr. Martin: I move:

That clause 3 of Bill No. 164 be renumbered as "3. (1)" and that a new subclause (2) be added to clause 3, as follows:

(2) Where any veteran or surviving spouse of a veteran was receiving or was eligible to receive an amount under section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the date of the coming into force of this act, in respect of a period ending on or after that date, the district authority may, in its discretion and in lieu of any further amount under that section, award to such veteran or spouse (a) in respect of the portion of that period that is prior to that date, an amount determined in accordance with subsection (1) or (2), as the case may be, of section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the coming into force of this act, and (b) in respect of the portion of that period that is on or after that date, an allowance determined in accordance with subsection (1), (2) or (3), as the case may be, of section 5 of the said act as enacted by this section, less any amount received by such veteran or spouse in respect of that period pursuant to an award made under section 5 of the said act as it was immediately prior to the coming into force of this act.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

INCREASE IN INDEMNITY OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 179, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Sessional indemnity to elected members.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, when we were at the resolution stage the hon. member for Mackenzie River made the following suggestion, and I quote from page 1496 of Hansard of February 24:

I would like to suggest to the minister that when he brings the bill in he have it provide a minimum of at least $1,000 a year. That would enable the members of the council to visit their constituencies and I think it would be a fair minimum.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I may say that the government has accepted the suggestion, and consequently I will ask my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to move the following amendment to clause 1:

That clause 1 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"1. Subsection (1) of section 12 of the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 331 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

12. (1) Subject to this section (a) where in any one calendar year the total number of days on which there was a sitting of the council is ten or less, each elected member may be paid in that year an indemnity of one thousand dollars, less one hundred dollars for every such day on which the member was not in attendance,

(b) where in any one calendar year the total number of days on which there was a sitting of the council is greater than ten, each elected member may be paid in that year an indemnity at the rate of one hundred dollars for each such day on which the member was in attendance, or two thousand dollars, whichever is the lesser."

Mr. Prudham: I so move.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIVING ALLOWANCE AND ATTENDANCE OF COUNCIL MEMBERS

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 180, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—When member deemed in attendance for purpose of ascertaining indemnity.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to move an amendment to this clause which will have the same effect as the amendment moved a few moments ago when we were dealing with the Northwest Territories amending bill.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 1 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"1. (1) Subsection (1) of section 15 of the Yukon Act, chapter 53 of the statutes of 1952-53, is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

15. (1) The commissioner in council may provide for the payment out of the Yukon consolidated revenue fund of indemnities to members of the council, allowances for living expenses, and travelling expenses as follows: (a) where in any one calendar year the total number of days on which there was a sitting of the council is ten or less, each member may be paid in that year an indemnity of one thousand dollars, less one hundred dollars for each such day on which the member was not in attendance, (b) where in any one calendar year the total number of days on which there was a sitting of the council is greater than ten, each member may be paid in that year an indemnity at the rate of one hundred dollars for each such day on which the member was in attendance, or two thousand dollars, whichever is the lesser, (c) an allowance for living expenses, not exceeding twenty-five dollars for each day he is in attendance at a session of the council, and (d) the actual travelling expenses incurred by the member in travelling from his place of residence to the place where the council holds its session and return, but no payment shall be made to a member in respect of more than one return trip for each session of the council.

(2) Section 15 of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

(3) For the purpose of ascertaining the indemnity to which a member is entitled under subsection (1), each day on which a member is in the place where a session of the council is held but is because of illness unable to be in attendance at the session shall be deemed to be a day on which he is in attendance at the session.

(4) For the purpose of ascertaining a member's allowance for living expenses, (a) each day during a session on which there has been no sitting of the council in consequence of its having adjourned over that day, and (b) each day on which a member is in the place where the session is held but is because of illness unable to be in attendance at the session, shall be deemed to be a day on which he is in attendance at the session."

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister one question? In the amendment now moved reference is made to living allowances as well as to the indemnity. I did not notice anything comparable in the previous bill. Is there any significance?

Mr. Lesage: No, but it is in the bill as printed, Mr. Chairman. If hon. members will look at the bill as originally printed before the amendment, they will see that subclause 2 deals with allowances for living expenses.

Mr. Knowles: I am afraid the minister did not catch my point. My question relates to the fact that although there are living allowances in this bill I did not notice any reference to that in the previous bill.

Mr. Lesage: The Northwest Territories Act was amended last year to that effect. The provisions provided in subclauses 2, 3 and 4 are for the purpose of bringing the terms of the Yukon Act into conformity with the Northwest Territories Act.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, TRAVELLING EXPENSES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lesage for the second reading of Bill No. 182, to amend the Historic Sites and Monuments Act.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): In rising to take part in the debate on Bill No. 182, I should like to remind the house that the province of Newfoundland is singularly rich in records of the past and in historic places. Indeed, as the house knows, this fact was emphasized by the Massey commission in its report, reference to which was made earlier in this debate by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean). I should like to draw to the attention of this house, and in particular to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) that one of the historic sites of Newfoundland has recently been offered to the federal government by the government of Newfoundland to be developed as an historic national park. I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the Signal Hill area at St. John's.

Signal Hill, Mr. Speaker, is a site of exceptional historic significance. It is a lofty eminence situated on the east side of the narrows, as the entrance to St. John's harbour is called. On the summit of Signal Hill stands Cabot Tower, a stone building erected to commemorate the fourth centenary of the discovery of Newfoundland by John Cabot on St. John's day, June 24, 1497. Signal Hill dominates the seaward approaches to the capital city of the great island which was Britain's oldest colony and is now Canada's youngest province. Ever since Sir Humphrey Gilbert, that intrepid but ill-fated adventurer and explorer, took possession of the "New Found Land" in the name of his sovereign, Queen Elizabeth I, on August 5, 1583, Signal Hill has formed a natural bastion guarding this strategic seaport.

In particular, Signal Hill played an important part in the long Franco-British duel for supremacy in North America. Throughout the epic struggle which has been so aptly described as the second hundred years war, Signal Hill provided St. John's with an impregnable defence against direct attack from the sea. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, Signal Hill was the scene of the last battle fought on Newfoundland soil. It was also, I believe, the last land battle fought in British North America between the British and French for the possession of what is now Canada, the great country in which these two historic races now live side by side in amity and peace.

This battle, known as the battle of Signal Hill, was fought on September 15, 1762, in the closing phase of the seven years' war. In the summer of that year, the French had captured St. John's, but a relief force was dispatched in an attempt to recapture the city and that force attacked the French defences which had been organized on Signal Hill. There, on September 15, a decisive battle was fought. The French defences were stormed and after a gallant resistance, Signal Hill was taken. Signal Hill is hallowed by the blood of the brave men of both races who fell in this fierce encounter.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, Signal Hill is hallowed by the blood of the brave men of both races who fell in this fierce encounter.

(Text):

After the defeat of the French garrison on Signal Hill, Mr. Speaker, the French occupation of St. John's ended. It was not, however, the last occasion on which St. John's was threatened by the French. In the course of the war of the French revolution, a formidable French fleet, under Admiral Richery, stood in St. John's on September 3, 1796, with the evident intention of attempting a landing. However, Richery was so impressed by the strength of the fortifications and by the martial appearance of the three or four thousand men, including units of the recently formed Royal Newfoundland Regiment, whom the energetic admiral, Sir Richard Wallace, had assembled on Signal Hill, that the French fleet abandoned its designs on St. John's and contented itself with a raid on Bay Bulls.

It is not, however, only in the history of war that Signal Hill has won renown. It is also famous for its intimate association with one of the outstanding achievements of scientific progress. It was in Cabot Tower on Signal Hill that the great Marconi received his historic message from Poldhu in Cornwall on December 12, 1901, and thus established the first communication by wireless telegraph across the Atlantic ocean. Here is how the inventor described that great moment:

> It was about half-past twelve, I remember, when quite unmistakably three faint clicks in the telephone sounded several times in my ear. I listened again and again; but I wanted corroboration. I turned to my assistant: "Can you hear anything, Mr. Kemp?", I asked, handing him the telephone. He listened and heard it too.
> Faintly, but with unquestionable certainty, we were receiving signals, tapped by our kite aerial, which had left Poldhu and traversed the Atlantic, serenely ignoring the earth's curve which so many doubters had considered a fatal obstacle.
> On the following day the signals were again heard. The great experiment had succeeded.

That is the end of the quotation from Signor Marconi's statement of his feelings at that great moment. Thus, it was on Signal Hill that the historic feat of bridging the Atlantic by wireless was first accomplished.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that these glimpses of its storied past will justify the claim of Signal Hill to be ranked as one of the most historic sites in all Canada.

I would add however, Mr. Speaker, that Signal Hill is not only a landmark of absorbing historic interest; it is also a place of scenic charm and beauty. It possesses that rugged grandeur so characteristic of the storm-swept shores of Newfoundland. Moreover, its terrain lends itself naturally to landscaping and terracing. From its bold slopes and, above all, from its majestic summit, as one looks landward, there is an incomparable view of the historic city of St. John's and of the lovely countryside beyond. Then, as the eye turns seaward, it beholds the mighty surge of the Atlantic rollers and the ever-changing interplay of sky and ocean.

This, then, is the area which the government of the province of Newfoundland has recently decided to offer to the government of Canada as an area to be developed as an historic national park. The offer was officially announced in St. John's on December 22, 1954, by the Hon. Dr. F. W. Rowe, minister of mines and resources in the provincial government.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Canada will accept that offer in the spirit in which it has been made. By doing so it will give fitting recognition to one of the most historic sites in all this great country.

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all listened with great interest and pleasure to the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Fraser) who has told us about the historic significance of Signal Hill, on the island of Newfoundland. We appreciate what he has said all the more because we know that the hon. member is an historian in his own right, and one who takes a great deal of interest in the bill now before us. I trust that he will support a suggestion I am going to make in connection with the bill before the debate is concluded.

I think, frankly, that this measure is more important than perhaps would appear from the interest which sometimes is paid to legislation such as this. I think the hon. member for St. John's East will agree with me when I say that in this country we have not always given to the preservation of historic sites the attention the subject deserves. That distinguished Nova Scotian, Joseph Howe, who, I might say, was also a distinguished Liberal—although afterwards he saw the error of his ways and joined the Conservative party—once said that an intelligent people erected monuments to the memory of those who had gone before. I think in this country we have been sadly lacking in that respect. However in my view this bill is a step in the right direction, a step toward correcting the errors we have committed in the past.

Since the hon. member referred to something in his own constituency, possibly I would be pardoned, coming as I do from the most historic constituency in Canada, if I were to follow his example by making reference to my own constituency. Applause was given this afternoon when it was announced that a celebration will take place in the coming summer of the anniversary of the return to Grand Pré of the descendants of the expelled Acadians, and that it will be the 200th anniversary of that event. I am very happy and proud of the fact that the village of Grand Pré, one of the outstanding historic points on this whole continent, is located at one end of my constituency, while at the western part of it lies the little village of Port Royal, the first establishment of the white man north of the gulf of Mexico. At that point this summer we are celebrating the 350th anniversary of the arrival of the white man in what is now North America.

Sometimes my hon. friends from the province of Quebec boast of the fact that settlements were first achieved there. I must say however, without reflecting in any way upon them, that after all a base had to be established first in my constituency in order to get their roots firmly in the ground. And it was from there that Champlain and the others moved on, and went up the St. Lawrence in order to find what they did. Because I am sure if they had not had the Annapolis valley to return to they would have become discouraged and gone back to France before establishing a settlement.

In any event there will be in my constituency this summer those two remarkable anniversaries, a bicentenary in one instance and a 350th anniversary in the other. And so it is fitting that tonight we should pay something more than casual attention to the bill now before us for second reading.

In that connection I would mention that I think it is more important to preserve historic sites than to erect monuments. For instance, at Grand Pré, by a combination of efforts on the part of the railways, religious organizations and possibly others, we have a magnificent park marking the original location of the village. At Grand Pré, we have an exact replica of the Acadian church, and we still have preserved what is presumed to be, and what I believe is, the original well, known as the Evangeline well, from which the people who were confined in the church prior to expulsion obtained their water during the days they were there.

That is an historic site. And I suggest to you, sir, that it is much more important to preserve these sites than to erect monuments which do not attract great interest, and which may be ignored. The government of Canada deserves a great deal of commendation because of the fact that at Port Royal it has restored the original habitation in which the first government of this country was carried on, in which the first trading transactions took place, and where the first residences were established. Some time prior to the war—I think it was either in 1936 or 1937—this government finally obtained in Paris the original plans of the old habitation. It has been rebuilt according to the exact measurements, with wooden pegs—no nails used whatsoever—with isinglass for windows, with skins for walls, and with the partitions set out as they were in the days when Champlain established that habitation so many years ago.

Nothing could be more valuable than an historic site of that kind. I do hope that when this board carries on its work, as it will in the future, it will go further in the preservation and reconstruction of such sites rather than, as I said, proceed with the erection of memorials at the side of a road, memorials which are usually ignored because, when travelling along at 60 miles an hour, one passes these points of interest before he knows what they are and does not bother to turn around to look into them further.

The historic sites and monuments board deserves great credit for the work it has done in the past. For years it operated under orders in council. The members of the board were a group of men who gave their time gratuitously to this work and, although I believe there was a great deal more that should have been done, the fact that it was not done was not the fault of the board. They were given very little money and, I think, very little encouragement. And yet, it was owing to their effort that there was a renaissance in historic interest in this country. Now that we have a body incorporated in the act which we are amending tonight, I think it is fitting that we pay tribute to these men who for over 30 years carried on as members of the historic sites and monuments board. But there is one matter that I should like to suggest to the minister in this connection. I noticed in the debate which was adjourned a month or more ago the minister was discussing the details of this bill. He pointed out that the membership was increased in Ontario and Quebec from one member to two members. He said that was owing to the fact that the Massey commission had so recommended. With that I agree. I noticed this afternoon the Prime Minister referred to a part of the Massey commission report and said that he supported it and accepted it in that connection. I agree. I suggest to the minister that in connection with the historic sites and monuments board, the Massey report said—and I draw this to the attention of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Fraser), who is an historian in his own right—that two members of this historic sites and monuments board should be nominated by the historical association of Canada, the association of professional historians. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is a recommendation which the minister should carry out.

On the board as it is now constituted we have, outside of the official designations, one member from every province.

Mr. Lesage: And every member is a member of the Canadian historical association.

Mr. Nowlan: Every member may be, Mr. Speaker; I am not questioning the minister on that. If he says so, I accept his word.

Mr. Lesage: Four members are past-presidents.

Mr. Nowlan: I am saying that no member was recommended by the Canadian historical association. Under the orders in council which constituted this historical sites and monuments board in the past, one qualification for membership was that the individual should be a "recognized Canadian historian", and there is no such qualification in this bill. The minister says, of course, that they are all members of the Canadian historical society, but there is nothing to hinder him in the future from appointing someone else who not only may not be a member of the Canadian historical association, but may not have any knowledge whatsoever of history.

The historical association has done a great deal in preserving and perpetuating the history of this country through their papers and their documents, and I think it would be very fitting indeed to recognize the contribution that the association is making to the history of this country. As a matter of courtesy, if nothing else, the association ought to be asked to nominate at least two members to the board, as was recommended by the Massey commission. The minister can say that they are all members of a Canadian historical society. I can tell him that there are some who are disturbed because there is no qualification whatsoever in the act today. The order in council required that members be "recognized historians". That qualification is now omitted from the act.

If it were not for the responsibility of the minister, which we would not question, of course, I would not be so happy about this thing; but there is nothing to limit an appointment which may be made to that board in the future. I do not think it is good enough. I am suggesting that the minister give that consideration and, if not in committee, at least in the very near future, the act should be amended to give recognition to this association which has done so much to preserve the history of this country, and which is so tremendously interested in this matter.

I have one other suggestion to make to the minister in connection with historic monuments. It is true, sir, that there has been an improvement in the monuments which have been erected during the past two or three years. At one time, I know, perhaps I rather hastily described them as looking like piles of nuts outside a squirrel's cage in wintertime. You had this little pyramid of pebbles erected on the side of a road, which certainly should not mark any historic site. Any tourist who saw it would think that any site that was so marked was not worthy of attention in any event. That has been changed to some extent. We are now getting cut-stone monuments, which are an improvement on the old, but they still are not in keeping, I would suggest, with the historic sites which we have to preserve in this country.

At Grand Pré there is a statue of Evangeline, which was brought from France. It is a beautiful bronze statue, one which probably was fairly costly, I grant you, but one which once seen is never forgotten. I am suggesting, sir, that perhaps there should be fewer sites marked but those which are marked should be marked much more appropriately than they are today. I say with all respect that the type of site marker which we are erecting today does not command the attention and is not worthy of the ground or the particular memorial which it is supposed to indicate. The board has a history of two or three years under the original act. We are now amending the act. We are now taking away, and I think it is an improvement, the suggestion that these men were working for a fee of some kind. That has now been abolished. Certain feelings that were aroused have certainly been assuaged by this. It is a step in the right direction.

I express my opinion that this is one of the more important pieces of legislation with which we have to deal. I am not suggesting for a moment that from the financial or pecuniary angle it is the most important, but so far as secondary bills are concerned, it is one of the more important pieces of legislation with which we have to deal. I am glad to see that the minister is proceeding with this, but I do hope that in the days that lie ahead he will use his influence to see that this board is given more and more support and provided with more and more funds so that we can carry on to a far greater degree the marking of historic sites and the erection of monuments than we have in the past. If that is not done within the next few years, then many of them will have been obliterated entirely.

Mr. G. T. Purdy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, Scotland is famed as the land of brave men and virtuous women. New Scotland, Nova Scotia, has followed in the footsteps of old Scotland. No matter whether our forebears were highland Scots, lowland Scots, United Empire Loyalists, pre-revolutionary New Englanders, Yorkshire Methodists, Irish, Lunenburg Dutch, descendants from West Indian slaves, native MicMacs, or, last but far from least, the descendants from French peasants, this tradition prevails. Longfellow's Evangeline is a symbol of the last-named hardy race who were the original settlers in that portion of Nova Scotia referred to by Longfellow as in and around the basin of Minas, but naturally extending beyond those confines. I was therefore astonished to see a headline in the Ottawa Journal of March 1, in raised letters, reading: "Longfellow's Evangeline nonsense, eastern member of parliament tells Commons." This heading was based on the remarks of the hon. member for Queens, as reported in Hansard of February 28, at page 1591, where he had this to say:

> That may be a fine piece of literary work but from a historical point of view it is utter nonsense. It could not be further from the facts. I think our Canadian children should be made to realize that fact.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that a very proper subheading would have been: "Eastern member of parliament attempts to sabotage Evangeline."

I wonder what the hon. member had in mind when he made these remarks. Did he seek to take away from the area in and around the basin of Minas and Cobequid bay the distinction of being known as the land of Evangeline? Can he point to one instance where Canadian children are being taught that Evangeline and the other characters in Longfellow's poem were actually people? Can it be that he wishes to show the hon. members of this house the results of the extensive reading we all know he has done, or did he follow the example of the small boy who after his father had taken him out behind the barn and told him some of the facts of life rushes out to his chums and tells them that there is no Santa Claus?

It takes a much shorter time to destroy than it does to rebuild, and I crave the indulgence of hon. members for a moment while I endeavour to restore the virtue of Evangeline. The characters in Longfellow's Evangeline did not actually exist, but there were no doubt many similar characters living on those rich Acadian lands 200 years ago who found themselves in the fall of that same year widely scattered, separated from their families with their lands and goods confiscated and their villages levelled to the ground. Evangeline is but a symbol of those people and I suggest that the historical background is far from being utter nonsense, as the hon. member suggested.

Surely he does not claim that there was not an Acadian settlement at Grand Pré as well as many other similar settlements at Pisquid, now Windsor, and other points on the shores of Minas basin and Cobequid bay, or that these people did not suffer the fate indicated earlier. History seems to confirm that the largest assembly of Acadians for the purpose of the expulsion was not at Grand Pré but on the shores of Cobequid bay near where Truro now stands. The location of the church in which the men were imprisoned can still be found and the settlement is now called Mass Town for the very reason I have mentioned. It is also clear that when the New England planters came to take possession of the Acadian lands in this area the only signs of habitation left were two old barns across the bay from where the church stood. Hence the name Old Barns which this area bears today.

I could go on at length to show that Longfellow's poem has a great background of historical fact but I think I have said enough to prove my point. The hon. member may not share my views and he indicates that he still has doubts, but may I say to him that I have here a booklet entitled "Canada Vacations Unlimited" which is issued under the authority of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage). It makes reference to this and surely the hon. member would not charge the minister with the responsibility of putting out a publication which contains a lot of utter nonsense.

Possibly up to this time my remarks have not followed closely the principle of the bill under discussion but I assure you that from now on I will be strictly in order. At Annapolis Royal we have reconstructed the Habitation thereby perpetuating the memory of Champlain and his "Order of the Good Time". But this reminds us of French noblemen with powdered wigs and knee breeches. What have we to keep before us the way of life of the Acadian peasants who were removed from their lands in the fall of 1755? Surely they made a great contribution to the development of Nova Scotia and I do not believe that in the areas I have mentioned previously, Grand Pré, Windsor, Mass Town, Old Barns, there is one descendant of an Acadian living on the lands formerly owned by his forefathers.

At the mouth of the Ishgonish river, Colchester county, the board has erected a monument to mark the starting point of the old Chignois crossing. This was the route by which the Acadians kept up communication with Louisburg, taking their small boats and canoes up the Ishgonish or Chiganois river as far as possible, then portaging over the hills and relaunching them in the French river, down to Northumberland strait and from there on to Louisburg.

Today near this monument power shovels, bulldozers, pile drivers and all types of modern machinery, directed by a staff of engineers with great heaps of plans and blueprints, are constructing an aboiteau to provide protection to a considerable marsh body and a crossing of the river as part of the trans-Canada highway. This activity is duplicated at many points around the bay of Fundy. They are in most cases erecting dikes to keep the tides off the lands reclaimed from the sea by the Acadians prior to 1755, reclaimed not by modern methods as outlined above, but with the axe, the yoke of oxen and the diking spade. With these crude tools they erected dikes and aboiteaux which stood the might of Fundy tides for generations.

Surely the way of life of these people is worthy of being kept green for the information of posterity. This year we are to be visited by descendants of the Acadians of the expulsion in order to commemorate the period 200 years ago when the cruel hand of fate descended on their forebears.

What a thrill these people would get, as well as others interested, if they could visit a reconstructed Acadian village with its church, its well, its blacksmith shop, its houses and barns. Of course it is now too late for this year, but I suggest that within the four walls of the present act such an undertaking is permissible. If not, could the scope not be extended?

I know that it would cost money, but I also feel that it would pay dividends in years to come. Located at or near the site of the Mass Town church previously referred to it would have the factual historic background of the area. This is one of the few sites of former Acadian settlements located on the route of the trans-Canada highway.

At many points around the land made famous by Longfellow's Evangeline you will still find the forest primeval with its murmuring pines and its hemlocks provided by nature and replaced by nature when man destroys. The Fundy tides go out and the Fundy tides comes in, still rising as much as 60 feet in some places. The dikes built by man, destroyed by tide, time and tempest, are being replaced by man. Why should man not replace one of the Acadian villages built by man and destroyed by man of another race?

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, when I began to speak on the resolution on February 25 I drew the attention of the house to a particular monument in the area which I have the honour to represent which I felt should be preserved for posterity so that at some future date history may recognize something in the far west that was worthy of preservation. I feel that the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) was right when he referred to the monument of Evangeline and that it be recognized. The hon. member said that it was more important to preserve historic sites than to erect monuments. In this instance I would direct the attention of the minister to the fact that I am not asking for the erection of a monument. The monument has been established for some time and I simply ask that it be preserved as a historic site.

On June 15, 1846, the treaty of Washington was signed. This treaty defined the boundary between the United States and Canada as being a continuation of the 49th degree of parallel on into the gulf of Georgia and then to the strait of Juan de Fuca. There are certain historical incidents which have some romantic backgrounds and in this connection it is interesting to note that no less a personage than Kaiser Bill of considerable fame settled this particular controversy.

Some 15 years after the treaty of Washington was formally signed a monument was erected in commemoration in 1861 by the government of that day. At the present time the site of that monument is half on United States territory with the other half being on a farm belonging to a farmer in British Columbia. This gentleman has seen fit to offer it to our government from time to time but the government has possibly never considered it to be sufficiently significant historically to make it one of our historic sites. However, I wish to draw to the minister's attention that the people of the United States feel differently about their half. They have set aside seven or eight acres and are preparing a park area in that region to commemorate a treaty of long standing between the two nations. I would strongly urge our minister to seriously consider doing likewise in this instance.

I have here an article from the Vancouver Sun of September 6, 1952. I am not going to read the entire article because it is quite lengthy, but parts of it do describe the monument much more vividly possibly than I would be capable of doing, and I shall read from this article about the historical significance of the monument itself. Part way down the first column the article says:

> But, somehow, the Canadian government has officially forgotten all about the monument.
> "I've written to them, and I've written to them about it," Jordan says—

Mr. Jordan is the gentleman who owns the land.

> —"and still, they won't acknowledge there's any monument here. But the tax collector in Ladner sure knows about it. He charges me for it in my assessment."

This monument is a fair size; it has a 22-foot shaft with a needle-like projection and the names of those who were responsible for the signing of the treaty appear on one side. I might also point out it is one of the few monuments that stand on the border between the two nations. It is possibly the least known of all our monuments. I quote from the article again:

> The needle-like monument bears the names of the border commissioners on the south and north side. The American side contains the name of Archibald Campbell, the U.S. commissioner, and on the north side, Capt. J. Prevost, R.N., Capt. C. H. Richards, R.N., and Lt.-Col. J. S. Hawkins, R.E., "H.B.M. Commssrs."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member but may I point out that we are discussing the principle of the bill on second reading. I observe that that part of the principle is an amendment to the phrase "historic place", but I do believe that we would be extending the debate entirely too far if we allowed at this time a description of various monuments of which there are a great many in Canada. I therefore think that the debate at this stage should be limited to a general debate and that so far as possible, except for the purposes of illustration of the principle, we should refrain from referring to descriptions of particular monuments.

Mr. Hahn: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I very much appreciate your ruling in this instance. I was merely referring to the article because I believe that very few people in Canada are familiar with the historical significance of this particular monument and because the monument depicts the history of its day on the west coast. I think it is sufficiently important that the hon. members should be somewhat familiar with the historical aspects of it. I shall bow to your ruling and confine my remarks to statements of a more general nature.

The monument of Evangeline was very romantic in its own right in so far as it tells a love story of an individual. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this monument too has a romance of its own. It tells a different story, of course, a story of a much more shady nature. It tells a great deal about the instances of smuggling which took place between the United States and Canada at that time.

An hon. Member: That is worth remembering.

Mr. Hahn: No; I would not say that we should necessarily remember that particular part of Canadian history, but it is a part of our history. The monument in itself had nothing to do with the shady part of our history but it is located in an area that possibly lent itself to some of this shady business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) is going to be in that area, or in the lower mainland, on May 8, 9 and 10. I have only one request to make of him at this time. I hope that while he is in the area he will make a point of availing himself of some transportation—and if he finds that inconvenient I shall be only too happy to transport him to the area—so that he might see the area for himself and perhaps be persuaded to set aside a few acres to commemorate this site as the American government has seen fit to do.

In three years' time we will celebrate our centennial in British Columbia and it would give me a great deal of pleasure indeed if at that time I were able to give credit to the present minister and be able to tell the people that this would not have come about except for the minister's foresight in seeing that this monument is preserved for posterity.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) in the tribute he paid to the members of the historic sites and monuments board for the work they have done in preserving historic sites and more particularly in marking them across Canada. The board has been hampered in carrying out that work by limited funds and by the policy laid down by the government under which they have had to operate. I am quite glad to see this bill for this reason in particular, that it changes the definition of a historical building and makes it possible—I think it was quite possible before, actually, but the amendment in the bill makes it certain—to acquire or to mark a building which is of national historical importance because of its age or type of architecture or anything else of that nature.

It seems to me that the policy which we have followed in regard to our historic sites has been a most imprudent one. In this country we have allowed a historic building, a fort or a house or whatever it might be, to fall completely into disrepair and the rubble that was left was in many cases carried away so there was practically nothing left to show that a historic building had been there. Then many years later we would erect a cairn and put a plaque on it to indicate it was a historic site. As the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said, people driving along the highway see a small cairn of that sort and they are past it in most cases before they are in a position to stop and look at it. Another disadvantage is that there is nothing beyond the cairn to attract their attention which would make them think it is worth while stopping. It seems to me the policy we should follow is to prevent our historical buildings from falling into ruin.

I would hope that the historic sites and monuments board might be given a different policy. I am quite sure they would be only too happy to take part in the work of preservation and restoration of some of the historic buildings existing in this country which are rapidly disappearing at the present time. There are numerous examples of that sort of thing. There is one not very far from Ottawa. I refer to what is known as Langton house at Fenelon Falls which was built shortly after 1800. It is of particular interest because there happens to exist an itemized account of what practically every board and fitting in the house cost. I believe it is the only house of its kind in the English-speaking part of Canada. I do not know about the French-speaking part of Canada. The house is falling rapidly into decay at the present time. In three or four years it will be gone and its considerable value as a historical building, arising from the detailed accounts that exist regarding it, will completely disappear.

I make a plea to the government to change their policy with respect to historical buildings in particular and to adopt a policy of acquiring and preserving such buildings. In many cases it is not necessary for the government to pay any money to secure them because the people or societies involved will be glad to turn them over to the government. In some cases, such as the building I cited, they are waiting to be taken so that something can be done with them. As far as restoration is concerned, I think the amount of money which might be employed in that way would not materially affect the general balance of payments, and it is the type of expenditure which the people of this country will not only be willing to have made at this time but which our children and grandchildren will be extremely glad we were far-sighted enough to make.

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, like all hon. members, I support the bill. In my section of the country, the Ottawa valley, we have the Ottawa valley historical association which also includes the county of Pontiac on the Quebec side of the Ottawa river. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) has just recently, by his persistent efforts, completed negotiations for the construction of the Allumette bridge connecting the provinces of Quebec and Ontario in the Ottawa valley. Mid-stream in the river lies an island of about 450 acres known as Morrison's island. Because of the projected construction of the bridge the island is now becoming more important, and it is the intention of the historical society to ask the directors of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada, which has been doing a most commendable job on a small amount of money, to consider, if deemed advisable, the acquiring of Morrison's island as a historical site. The society will receive the support of all sections of our community in this application.

It was on this island in the seventeenth century that Samuel de Champlain and his companion, Nicolas de Vignau, bivouacked for some time on their journey westward in search of what was believed to be Cathay, now known as China. Champlain bivouacked on the island for security reasons because off the northern shore of the island there is fast, white, running water and off the southern shore there are what are known as the Lost Chenail rapids which no man, as far as we know, has ever attempted to run and survived.

The leader of the Algonquin tribe, Chief Tessouat, took Samuel de Champlain to this island to safeguard him from the enemy tribes. History reveals that while Champlain was on the island he was impressed with the extensive cemetery of the savages with its sepulchres and shrines, and it is believed that on this island a rich find awaits the archaeologist, possibly a lost Algonquin village which would rival in national importance the Fort Ste. Marie site near Midland. It would be a pity indeed if the island were sacrificed for commercial reasons. At the proper time we hope to bring this matter to the attention of the board of directors in an effort to have the island pinpointed as a memorial site.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the passing of the bill by getting involved in a long debate, and I can assure the house I will be very brief. However, I want to congratulate the minister on introducing these amendments to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Historic Sites and Monuments Act. I want to refer to certain remarks made in the house by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean) when speaking on second reading of the bill on February 28 last. These remarks have also been referred to tonight by the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy).

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the poem, "Evangeline", cannot be regarded as an historical document and no one has ever insisted that it be regarded as such. It is obvious that the poet used his imagination in the details of what he called, to use his own words, "The Tale of Acadie". I have read over and over again the poem in question, the text of which I have before me at this moment. From my own judgment, far from calling this literary work "utter nonsense", I cannot but admire the American poet for his literary efforts based on an historical fact which no right-thinking Canadian can deny.

I can assure my hon. friend, and I regret his absence from the house this evening, that at no time will I hesitate to recommend the reading of Longfellow's poem "Evangeline" to any one of my eight children. To Acadians the name "Evangeline" is one of tribute to a memorable page of Acadian history, a page which ended in happiness and success. The name Evangeline has been adopted for our French language daily newspaper, L'Evangeline, published at Moncton, and has been recognized for generations as a name of tradition and romance not only by Acadians but by the great majority of our Canadian population, and even in a number of foreign countries.

(Translation):

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Queens (Mr. MacLean), whose fondness for books is well known and who likes looking for information in historical works whenever he has an opportunity of doing so, should know better than to say that a tradition based on an event in our history is nonsense and contrary to fact. Longfellow's poem "Evangeline" is not of course an attempt to narrate in detail and with historical accuracy one of the memorable events of our history. On the contrary the author merely uses his imagination to remind us of one of the incidents relating to an event which is itself commemorated by an historical monument known as Evangeline's well, in Grand Pré. The member for Queens should recognize that, in this instance, no effort was spared in putting up a monument as artistic and as realistic as possible in a corner of the country known as "the land of Evangeline".

May I remind the house, Mr. Speaker, that Longfellow's poem "Evangeline" is recognized in the schools' curriculum approved by the New Brunswick department of education, which is certainly not in the habit of allowing our children to be taught facts which do not stand up and which could mislead them. I have here the first volume of the poetical works of Longfellow, containing the poem "Evangeline". I regret being unable to find in it any of these facts "which could mislead us and which do not stand up". Could they be, for instance, the events described, such as the deportation, the hardships, the searches? Could it, perchance, be the part that describes the Acadians as a peace-loving and happy people? The hon. member might be well-advised to satisfy his curiosity and to refresh his memory by consulting the works of the Canadian historian, Dr. J. Clarence Webster, whom he himself quoted.

The whole Acadian people would be honoured if, this year, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) could come to the land of Evangeline and join us in the celebrations to commemorate the bicentenary of the 1755 deportation.

I take advantage of this opportunity to invite him on behalf of the whole Acadian people.

(Text):

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): I wish to take part in this debate and join with my colleagues from New Brunswick, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) and the hon. member for Colchester-Hants (Mr. Purdy), in making a few remarks that arise out of the statement made by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. MacLean). This statement is reported in Hansard for February 28 at page 1591, and reads as follows:

> In that connection, we should not be misled by such fanciful literary efforts as the poem "Evangeline". That may be a fine piece of literary work but, from a historical point of view, it is utter nonsense. It could not be further from the facts. I think our Canadian children should be made to realize that fact.

This statement, made this year which is the bicentennial anniversary of the expulsion of the Acadians of Grand Pré, comes as a distinct shock to us in the Moncton-Westmorland area. The city of Moncton will be the centre of a reunion of the Acadians this year. It is expected that many tourists from the United States of Acadian descent living in Louisiana and elsewhere will journey to Moncton to take part in the bicentennial.

This winter over 100 Acadians from our district journeyed to Louisiana and attended the festivities marking the opening of the celebration of the bicentennial of the expulsion of the Acadians. At St. Martinville they visited the burial place of Emmeline Labiche who, according to the stories handed down through the generations, was supposed to have been the real Evangeline. No one expects the details of the poem to be factual, but the background material upon which the poem is based is historical. This literary work has, through the years, been a cause for binding the Acadian people together, and Evangeline has been the symbol of their social, religious and material progress through the last two centuries.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this is the third speech we have had read here tonight on this same subject. I think if anyone, the present speaker or anyone else, is going to speak on this subject, he should not read his speech.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I am not reading my speech. I am referring from time to time to my notes, as many members of the opposition have done. It would seem to me that more speeches are read from the other side of the house than from this side of the house, although we are too polite to say so.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): The bicentennial celebrations are not meant to mark the hardships suffered by the Acadian people nor the differences in this land of ours at that time, but are festivities marking the march of progress by these people from their status at that time to the proud race that comprises a large proportion of our population in New Brunswick, who have contributed so much to the advancement of our communities.

I have the pleasure of representing in this house a constituency made up of a substantial number of people of Acadian descent. The visitors to Westmorland county this year will hear the songs of old Acadia, will hear the singing of Evangeline, and if they pursue their visit to Nova Scotia will see the statue of Evangeline standing on a piece of land granted by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Acadians for perpetuating the historical facts of the expulsion of the Acadians. I consider the statement made by the hon. member for Queens an insult to the 270,000 people of Acadian descent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hate to interrupt the hon. member but it seems to me we are getting away from the subject matter of the bill. Great latitude has been taken in this debate. I know that attempts have been made from time to time to keep members within the ambit of the principle of this bill, which I do not think offers the scope which would allow members to speak in the manner they have. I have been listening attentively to the hon. member and much of his speech is a repetition of the speech we have just heard. I am sure the hon. member knows that according to standing order No. 40, paragraph 2, he should not repeat his own arguments or the arguments used by others in the same debate. I hope, therefore, he will not repeat arguments that have already been used.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): I had just about concluded my remarks, which were meant to show that this statement concerning an historic site made by the hon. member for Queens was not in accordance with the facts. I had no way of knowing, since I have been attending committees all day, who was going to speak or what they would say. In closing, I wish to say that this remark is a reflection on the 15,000 Acadians in Prince Edward Island, as well as the 270,000 in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Historic place.

Mr. Herridge: I shall be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I am very glad to see this definition of historic sites, because it will remove a lot of ambiguity that has occurred in the past. I rise to say that I cannot agree with the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings that no historic monuments should be erected. I feel the board should continue marking sites that require marking. I cannot agree with his suggestion that the present monuments are not appealing to the eye or satisfactory. I think they are of good design, excellent structure and size, and are witnesses to some historical event of the past.

Mr. Nowlan: On the matter of monuments, it is a question of taste. I have expressed my views on that and I am not going to quarrel with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I do agree with him, and I am glad to see that this definition of historic sites is a national thing. I think that is something the minister should keep in mind. In my own province the provincial government has purchased and has developed sites of provincial significance. I hope the minister will see that matters of provincial interest will be developed by the provinces only and that sites of national importance will be looked after by this board.

Apparently it does not do to indulge in a sense of humour in this chamber. We have heard tonight a series of three speeches, all of which, as my colleague has just interjected, were apparently written by the one person—

An hon. Member: Are you sure of that?

Mr. Nowlan: —and all aimed at the hon. member for Queens. I feel that any historian will agree with what he said, that there are some errors in that literary work. After all, however, I am not one to quarrel with that because it has been one of the greatest forms of publicity for my constituency.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, section 1 emphasizes the inclusion of buildings or structures that are of national interest by reason of age or architectural design. I would say briefly that it seems to me there has been a tendency to emphasize more recently—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—SUGGESTED EXCHANGE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he had an invitation from the U.S.S.R. for an exchange of parliamentarians? What is the reaction of the government, and what are the circumstances under which the offer was made?

Hon L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for giving me notice of this question. It deals with a matter which I had hoped to include in my remarks winding up the debate on external affairs. But in view of the fact that I might not have that opportunity today, and in view of the interest in this matter, possibly I could answer by reading a short statement concerning it.

Hon members have shown, of course, an understandable interest in the declaration of the Supreme Soviet of February 9. After making strong and grossly misleading attacks on the policies of this and allied governments, that declaration does include three paragraphs at the end on the desirability of direct contacts between parliaments throughout the world. Presumably, Mr. Speaker, that is the invitation to our parliament.

When news was first received from Moscow of this declaration by our ambassador in Moscow, it will be recalled that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in answer to a question, replied as follows:

The suggestion that has been reported will no doubt come to us in some more official manner than merely this report in the newspapers, and it will certainly be given careful consideration.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

I think the situation is such that we should all do our best to take advantage of any suggestion that might bring about an easing of the tension in the world.

The official text of the Soviet note to our embassy in Moscow on this subject and the declaration have both now been received and have been transmitted to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Speaker in another place for the information of members of parliament. And consideration is being given, I understand, as to how this matter can best be brought to the attention of those directly concerned.

So far as this government is concerned, it has been our constant view that there is a continuing need for contacts between the Soviet union and the non-communist world. It is not we who have lowered the iron curtain; and we would welcome opportunity, I am sure, for genuine, as distinguished from propaganda, contacts, between peoples and between their parliamentary representatives.

We could have wished, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the declaration in question might have been couched in language less reminiscent of the too-familiar propaganda line uttered by Soviet representatives at official conferences, and disseminated through their less official channels outside, and that it had not been approved by the Supreme Soviet so quickly, with customary unanimity, and in the shadow of Mr. Molotov's speech on foreign affairs of the same date which dwelt on the need for Soviet policy to take into account what he called significant contradictions both between individual capitalist countries and within these countries. So, having regard to the background of this declaration, of which this invitation is a part, there is need for us, I think, to be cautious, but not necessarily to turn a deaf ear to the suggestion which has been advanced.

I am not convinced, myself, by the argument that the propaganda intentions of the Soviet government, their unending lack of cordiality with the West in so many spheres of our relations and the lack of deeds to support their protestations of friendship, means that Western countries should not respond at all to gestures of this kind. The implications of such an argument as that might be that we should take no initiative to improve relations, because the Soviets would interpret it as a sign of weakness and would speak of a further communist victory.

There is, therefore, as I see it, much to be said for giving serious consideration to invitations of this kind, whatever their background may be, and there is certainly a good deal to be said for visits by Canadian parliamentarians to the Soviet union either individually or as a group in response to invitations which would be of a kind to make the visit worth while.

It might also I think be valuable to receive Soviet parliamentarians in this country—which is, of course, not the same thing as inviting members of a visiting delegation to participate in the deliberations of the House of Commons. Nor—and I think it is only fair to add this—has the word "parliamentarian" the same meaning in Moscow as it has in Ottawa, especially in relation to the opposition.

If and when such visits took place, I think we should never neglect, nor would we wish to neglect, any opportunity to create the conditions which might lead to a better understanding between peoples. In a world living under the shadow of the hydrogen bomb, it is of course essential that such an understanding be reached. And that is only possible if one side succeeds in convincing the other that they are not bent on mutual destruction.

And so, if no obstacles were put in the way of holding free and frank discussions during any such visit to Moscow—there would certainly be no such obstacles in Ottawa—I think it should not be difficult for members of parliament to convince representatives of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., or the people of that country, that we in Canada have no such design of mutual destruction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that we are going to have the opportunity to know what an opposition is. However, I would like to ask the minister to elucidate one thing, and that is this: Who transmitted the invitation? Was it official in any way, and from whom was it received?

Mr. Pearson: The invitation consisted of a three-paragraph declaration made before the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. That declaration, including those paragraphs, was transmitted officially by the foreign office of the Soviet union to our embassy in Moscow.

The translation from the Russian reads:

The ministry—

That is, the foreign ministry of the Soviet union.

—would be grateful to the embassy for transferring such declaration to those for whom it is intended.

When that came to the department at Ottawa we assumed it was intended for the two houses of parliament, and therefore was forwarded by us to the Speakers of the two houses.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Does the invitation suggest that any visiting parliamentarians might speak before the Supreme Soviet? Also, may I ask if any corresponding invitation has been extended from Canada to the Soviet union?

Mr. Dickey: You may get a chance to speak there.

Mr. Pearson: The invitation is not quite as —if this is the right word—is not quite as specific as that. Probably I should read the paragraph from the declaration which would be considered as containing the invitation. It reads:

The Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics considers that the establishment of direct links between parliaments, the exchange of parliamentary delegations, and speeches by parliamentary delegations of one country in the parliament of another, will correspond to the desire of the people for the development of friendly relations and for co-operation.

Technically, I am sure we would find that a little difficult to implement in this particular parliament. And I have no doubt, as the Speaker of the House of Commons at Westminster indicated in their case, it would be a breach of our customary privileges and traditions to include delegations of that kind from any country on the floor of the house for parliamentary discussion. But it may be that it is not intended the invitation be taken quite so literally, and that all it involves is an exchange of views between parliamentarians of each country.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since this is a general statement, perhaps I might ask the courtesy to make some comment, in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has, very properly, drawn a great distinction between the position of the Leader of the Opposition in this house and that in the Kremlin.

He has also drawn attention to the fact that there has been a substantial change in Russia in these past few years because, for the first time since Lenin came to power, we have seen an opposition take form and be successful. Their methods, of course, of disposing of those who have been in power earlier are not in accordance with our system—and I hope they never will be.

But may I strongly support the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the more opportunity there is of movement back and forth across the curtain—under appropriate assurance of return —the better it will be for everyone. Undoubtedly nothing could better contribute to an understanding of the weakness of the communist system than for a great many people from Russia to see that freedom with which we exchange ideas here in the House of Commons. And, by the same token, I should think nothing would more firmly establish the convictions of our own people in regard to our own methods than that they should see what takes place in Russia.

Without in any way taking exception to the terms which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has used as to the question of the appropriateness of the term "parliament" in relation to the particular place in which they gather in Russia to hear the dictates of the Supreme Soviet, we must remember that the word "parliament", after all, comes from the world parler; and the one thing they cannot do is speak—except to make appropriate sounds at times prescribed by the ruling authority.

Whatever objections we may have to what is done here, there is plenty of evidence of the fact that we still can speak, and there is a distinction in regard to the two methods. But most certainly, everyone who has an opportunity to go there under an appropriate arrangement will gain some advantage by seeing what communism is actually like in Russia itself. I would hope that under appropriate arrangements it might be possible for some of the members of this parliament to go to Russia and to have some of them come here. Under our rules they cannot speak here, and I do not know anyone in our house who could speak over there so that they could understand it; but the fact remains that it would be an opportunity to gain information, to extend the contacts; and at this time what we need more than anything else is some meeting between the people who themselves in the end will decide whether there is to be peace or war.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PRESS REPORT OF PROBABLE GENETIC DANGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether his attention was drawn to an article in today's Globe and Mail in which the head of the physics department of London university has warned us of the probable genetic danger if atomic bomb tests continue? Can the Prime Minister tell us whether this government is prepared to initiate that study into the danger that the United States federation of scientists asked for recently?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention has not been drawn to the article in this morning's Globe and Mail, but I have seen similar articles in other publications at other times. This is a matter which has, no doubt, given serious concern to those who feel that they have a background which would enable them to have some well based opinion upon these subjects. It is a matter that is being seriously studied here and elsewhere, but the Canadian government has not decided to take the initiative in the study of the problem.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF HOUSING ACT TO OLDER HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he has now had an opportunity of discussing with the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation the question I raised in the house on Wednesday, and whether he is now in a position to comment on my question as to whether it is government policy to do what was recommended in his speech on Tuesday by the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation that the lending provisions of the National Housing Act should be extended to include older houses? If that is not government policy, how does it happen that the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation comes to make such public statements in the realm of policy?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have had the opportunity of discussing this matter with the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, who says he had no intention whatsoever of making any statement that could be interpreted as government policy.

Mr. Fleming: Was it a feeler?

Mr. Winters: There certainly was no intention to put it out as a feeler. There was an interpretation put on certain remarks that were made in the course of a panel discussion and not from a prepared text. It was in no way intended to forecast or indicate government policy.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate what is government policy on the subject?

Mr. Winters: Government policy is as set forth in the National Housing Act, 1954.

Mr. Fleming: No more?

NATURAL GAS

REQUEST FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PIPE LINE TO SERVE WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A question of mine, directed to him yesterday, the right hon. gentleman declined to answer on the ground that the basis of the question contained information of which he was not aware. There were two items of information in the question: one, that there was an adequate supply of natural gas in Alberta; and, two, that there were private interests prepared to build a pipe line to Winnipeg. I presume the minister does not wish to maintain that he is unaware—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member be kind enough to put his question?

Mr. Trainor: The question is, Mr. Speaker, if I may presume to enlighten the minister—

Mr. Knowles: That is not in order in this parliament.

Mr. Trainor: —there was a company known as the Western Pipe Lines that applied to him for a permit—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Trainor: So far as I know, the principals of that company are not dead yet, and I am sure they would be prepared to build this pipe line.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Fleming.]

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR DATE OF FINAL PAYMENT ON 1953-54 POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to say whether the final payment on the 1953-54 pool will be announced before the Easter holiday? Is he in a position as yet to say what the total amount for distribution will be?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was looking into that question not later than yesterday. I doubt whether we shall have the figures by adjournment time. However, they will be put out by the wheat board as soon as they are available. I do not know what they are.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How soon?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): In three or four weeks' time, probably.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the secretary of state of the United States landed at Uplands airport a little over two weeks ago, one of the first statements made by him was of great interest to me. He was reported in the press as follows:

In his brief statement at the Canadian airport, Mr. Dulles referred to Canada as "a Pacific power" and said he looked forward to talks with Canadian ministers during his two-day visit.

Some of us have been trying to emphasize that fact for several years, and yet it must have come as a surprise to many hon. members that the United States secretary of state would make a statement of that kind. Of course, it is very true; Canada is, and has been for some years, one of the leading Pacific powers. Today the greatest threat to civilization is in the Pacific.

I propose to speak this afternoon as one of those Canadians, living west of the Rockies, whose outlook is to the Pacific, and to those nations which lie around that great ocean. After all, Canada is in the north Pacific where there has been actual armed aggression for nearly five years, starting with the North Korea attack on South Korea in June of 1950. Now, we have in Korea an uneasy truce which has been broken by North Korea and by the red Chinese on more than one occasion. I need only remind Your Honour that eleven United States airmen are still being held by the red Chinese in violation of the terms of that truce agreement. Our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) indicated in this house on March 22 the nature of aggression by red China. The minister was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about a proposal by the United States that certain clauses of the Korean armistice agreement should be denounced. This is what the minister had to say, as reported on page 2250 of Hansard:

> That situation is a difficult one because of violations by the North Korean government of article 13D of the armistice agreement which prohibits the importation into Korea of military equipment and because of the inability of the neutral nations supervisory commission set up by the United Nations, which has two communist members out of four, to take effective action to control such imports. Proof of the violation of this article was indicated on February 5 when communist jet planes attacked a United States aircraft. These jet planes were based on North Korea, though there had been no jet planes based on North Korea before the armistice.

In addition to the fact that there have been these breaches of the armistice agreement we know that once the armistice had been negotiated the red Chinese turned their attention to Indo-China and in due course took over the northern part of Viet Nam. We now have aggression and threats against Formosa. At the moment the red Chinese are exceedingly truculent and I have verification of that fact by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who spoke on Thursday last in this debate. I quote from page 2341 of Hansard of March 24 as follows:

> And so we cannot ignore in this connection the communist intention, loudly and frequently proclaimed, to attack and occupy Formosa and the islands.

I would point out that in the Pacific area there is no protective fence such as we have in the Atlantic in the form of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The only agreements for maintaining peace in the Pacific consist of several bilateral treaties between the United States and other countries, one with Japan, another with South Korea, the third with nationalist China and a fourth with the Philippines. In addition there is the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, the member nations of which are the three Asiatic nations of the Philippines, Thailand and Pakistan; also our sister commonwealth nations of Australia and New Zealand; and France, the United Kingdom and the United States. Finally, there is the tripartite treaty between the United States, Australia and New Zealand, which as hon. members know is called the ANZUS treaty.

These various nations to which I have just referred have established a line of defence which includes the Aleutian islands, which stretch out for several hundred miles west of the mainland of Alaska, Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines, southeast Asia, Australia and New Zealand. This line of defence has been in existence for some time and it is the line of defence nearest to communist China.

This brings me to the question of Formosa. In June, 1950, when North Korea started the aggression against the republic of Korea the United States seventh fleet was ordered to protect Formosa from communist invasion. This year we have had threats by the communists that they were going to take Formosa. On January 24, President Eisenhower delivered his famous message to the United States congress and I should like to read the pertinent paragraphs of that message dealing with the importance of Formosa. The President had this to say:

> In unfriendly hands, Formosa and the Pescadores would seriously dislocate the existing, even if unstable, balance of moral, economic and military forces upon which the peace of the Pacific depends. It would create a breach in the island chain of the western Pacific that constitutes, for the United States and other free nations, the geographical backbone of their security structure in that ocean. In addition, this breach would interrupt north-south communications between other important elements of that barrier, and damage the economic life of countries friendly to us.
> The United States and the friendly government of the republic of China, and indeed all the free nations, have a common interest that Formosa and the Pescadores should not fall into the control of aggressive communist forces.

That was a clear-cut declaration by the President of the United States, a declaration which I believe accurately reflects the opinion of the American people.

What about Canada? The following day, on January 25, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) for the views of the Canadian government on this question of Formosa. I do not intend to refer to the statement made by the minister in reply to that question, but when he had finished I asked a supplementary question, to be found on page 499 of Hansard and which reads:

> May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a further question? Does the Canadian government take the stand, or does it not, that Formosa is in the first line of defence for Canada's west coast?

Here is the minister's answer which I suggest is rather surprising:

That also is another question dealing with far-reaching matters of strategy on which I would hesitate to express an opinion at this moment.

The other day when he delivered the opening speech in this debate the minister made another statement about Formosa, to be found on page 2342 of Hansard. He said:

—we have to recognize that in dangerous times like these positions which are demonstrably of tactical or strategic advantage in the struggle with communist aggression or imperialism cannot likely be abandoned in the face of communist threats by those who hold them.

Then he went on to make this significant statement:

Formosa is considered by many to be one such important position.

No attempt to say what he thought or what the Canadian government thought, merely the most indefinite statement that Formosa is considered by many to be one such important position.

When the minister speaks he sometimes reminds me of an incident which occurred in a Vancouver court a number of years ago when a Chinese witness was under interrogation by a counsel through an interpreter. The counsel put a question to the interpreter and then there followed about 15 minutes of dialogue between the interpreter and the witness. Finally the counsel became desperate and could wait no longer. He said, "Well, well, what does he say?" And the answer came back, "He says yes".

Now, there is one big difference between the witness in that incident and the minister, in that one frequently can never be certain whether the minister says yes or no.

This Formosa policy of the government is extremely indefinite and I submit that the Canadian people are entitled to have an answer to the question which I asked on January 25. In other words, does the Canadian government take the stand, or does it not, that Formosa is in the first line of defence for Canada's west coast?

I believe that Formosa is in fact in the first line of defence for Canada just as it is for the United States. Canada is much nearer to Asia than is the United States, apart, of course, from Alaska. Canada is on the route from Siberia which, as we know, is Russia in Asia, to the United States. During the war many Russian airmen flew United States lend-lease planes from Edmonton up through the northeastern corner of British Columbia, across the Yukon and Alaska over the Bering strait to Siberia. Canada is nearer by sea to Siberia and red China than is the United States, apart from Alaska. The Russians have a great submarine fleet. If there should ever be submarine attacks across the Pacific ocean the Canadian coast would be a closer target than the coast of Washington, Oregon or California.

I point out to hon. members what happened during the second war. The day after Japan struck at Pearl Harbor we had an air alarm in Vancouver and the entire city was blacked out. It was believed that Japanese planes were attacking that city and, as a matter of fact, Canada had on her coast at that time as many planes as could be carried on one Japanese aircraft carrier and most of the Canadian planes were obsolescent. Later we had an attack by a Japanese submarine on the west coast of Vancouver island. Then we had Kiska in the Aleutians seized by the Japanese and an attempt was apparently made to attack Dutch Harbor which was the next United States air base to the east. This was supposed to have been prevented only because the United States air force flew out beyond the Japanese ships and then flew back in at them, with the result that the Japanese thought there was a United States force in the rear.

On the west coast of Canada during the last war—less than ten years ago—we had two Canadian divisions, one to protect Vancouver island and the other to protect Prince Rupert. We had an armoured train operating on the Canadian National Railways from Prince Rupert for 100 miles inland up the Skeena river to Terrace. On the west coast we know what it means to have no defence line for Canada off the Asiatic coast. Now, in 1955, Canada is a prime target. Today this country is worrying about continental defence and quite rightly so. Canada and the United States are prime targets at the present time.

I remind hon. members that the policy of Canada has always been to defend herself as far as possible from her own shores, and that policy is more important today than it has ever been before both in the Atlantic and the Pacific. An attack on the west coast or by air through Alaska would be very unlikely while Japan, Formosa and the Philippines are held by the free nations. On the other hand, if Formosa is allowed to fall or is given to red China, as some of the members of this house on my left seem to advocate, then the first line of defence for Canada has been broken.

Therefore I repeat that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should give the Canadian people an answer to my question about Formosa when he closes this debate. The people of Canada are entitled to leadership on that question.

President Eisenhower has given leadership. In his message to congress delivered on January 24 of this year he gave red China fair warning that the Americans would fight to protect Formosa. In giving them that warning he left himself room for bargaining with regard to the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu. I quote again from his message. He said:

> Moreover, we must be alert to any concentration or employment of Chinese communist forces obviously undertaken to facilitate attack upon Formosa, and be prepared to take appropriate military action.
> I do not suggest that the United States enlarge its defensive obligations beyond Formosa and the Pescadores as provided by the treaty now awaiting ratification. But unhappily, the danger of armed attack directed against that area compels us to take into account closely related localities and actions which, under current conditions, might determine the failure or the success of such an attack.

Later he continued:

> In the interest of peace, therefore, the United States must remove any doubt regarding our readiness to fight, if necessary, to preserve the vital stake of the free world in a free Formosa, and to engage in whatever operations may be required to carry out that purpose.

The president went further; he said they would welcome action by the United Nations. He was very careful to make that clear in his message. He said:

> Clearly, this existing and developing situation poses a serious danger to the security of our country and of the entire Pacific area and indeed to the peace of the world. We believe that the situation is one for appropriate action of the United Nations under its charter, for the purpose of ending the present hostilities in that area. We would welcome assumption of such jurisdiction by that body.

And again he said:

> Again I say that we would welcome action by the United Nations which might, in fact, bring an end to the active hostilities in the area. This critical situation has been created by the choice of the Chinese communists, not by us. Their offensive military intent has been flaunted to the whole world by words and by deeds. Just as they created the situation, so they can end it if they so choose.

Not only did he do that but he has restrained nationalist China by making them vacate the Tachen and Nankishen islands. In addition he went to congress for approval of his policy in the very finest parliamentary tradition and he received overwhelming support—practically unanimous support—from the congress of the United States.

When I hear attacks made on the United States in this house I wonder if those who are making them have read this resolution passed by congress. It reads:

> Whereas the primary purpose of the United States, in its relations with all other nations, is to develop and sustain a just and enduring peace for all; and
> Whereas certain territories in the west Pacific under the jurisdiction of the Republic of China are now under armed attack, and threats and declarations have been and are being made by the Chinese communists that such armed attack is in aid of and in preparation for armed attack on Formosa and the Pescadores,
>
> Whereas such armed attack if continued would gravely endanger the peace and security of the west Pacific area and particularly of Formosa and the Pescadores; and
> Whereas the secure possession by friendly governments of the western Pacific island chain, of which Formosa is a part, is essential to the vital interests of the United States and all friendly nations in or bordering upon the Pacific ocean; . . .

And then follows a recital of the treaty between the United States and nationalist China, followed by this resolution:

> Resolved . . . that the President of the United States be and he hereby is authorized to employ the armed forces of the United States as he deems necessary for the specific purpose of securing and protecting Formosa and the Pescadores against armed attack, this authority to include the securing and protection of such related positions and territories of that area now in friendly hands—

The President is not given any authority to attack lands now held by the Chinese. The remainder of the resolution reads as follows:

> —and the taking of such other measures as he judges to be required or appropriate in assuring the defence of Formosa and the Pescadores.

Then follows the final paragraph:

> This resolution shall expire when the President shall determine that the peace and security of the area is reasonably assured by international conditions created by action of the United Nations or otherwise, and shall so report to congress.

I think we should take note that there has been no attack since this declaration was made or since this resolution was passed by the United States congress and I doubt very much whether there will be one. In any event the decision rests with President Eisenhower personally. We know him. We have seen him and heard him right here in this chamber. We know President Eisenhower's record. We know his character. We know that his aim is peace. There is no member in this house who can get to his feet and say honestly that President Eisenhower is not a man of peace.

For myself, I am prepared to leave this extremely difficult decision to President Eisenhower. I do not want to be accused of having become pro-American or anything of that kind. I come of United Empire Loyalist stock, and you are not likely to see any Canadians of that descent taking an attitude that is too much pro-American. In fact, in 1947 I voted against my party and with the C.C.F. on the bill which became the Visiting Forces (U.S.A.) Act, which was giving the United States forces in this country certain rights over their troops. I must admit that I did not vote against it for the same reason as did the C.C.F. but still I voted against it.

On this question the Canadian government seems to disagree with President Eisenhower's plan for elbow room for giving himself room in which to bargain. As reported at page 2342 of Hansard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said:

> It is true that some members of that coalition, including Canada, cannot subscribe to all aspects of United States policy in this Asian area, especially in regard to the coastal islands.

That was a sort of half-clear statement of government policy. But I ask the minister, when he closes this debate, to answer this question: Is it the belief of the Canadian government that the offshore islands, Quemoy and Matsu, should be handed over to red China in the hope of inducing the communists to stop fighting, even though the red Chinese are still demanding Formosa itself and show not the slightest indication of any other intention but to try to seize Formosa?

I point out that the United States is not asking Canada for any help. To hear some speeches made here, one might think that the Americans were wanting us to do any fighting for them that might arise or might begin as a result of this policy; but they are not asking Canada for any help. I point out further that if they turn these islands over to the red Chinese, it might break the morale of the national Chinese army. Do not forget that in that army there are thousands of troops who deliberately chose freedom as against going back to red China, although they were subjected to every kind of pressure in order to try to persuade them to go back to the communist army. More serious still, it might destroy the confidence of the Asian allies of the free countries in their intentions. In addition, of course, it might hamper the defence of Formosa. This second question I have placed before the minister today should be answered when he closes the debate. I repeat that the Canadian people are entitled to an answer.

This brings me to a third and broader question, and it is this. Does the government believe or does it not that in the Pacific communist aggression can be stopped by giving up territory—and that, of course, means giving up people as well—which is what was done in northern Viet Nam? Or putting the question in another way, does the Canadian government believe or does it not that in the Pacific a stand must be taken at some point by some nation or group of nations? For instance, will the minister tell us whether the Canadian government believes that the British should give up Hong Kong? That question was raised in the British house a few days ago, and we all know the prompt and indignant answer given by Sir Winston Churchill to the effect that Britain had no intention of giving up Hong Kong. What does the Canadian government think about that question?

Let us recall what we have seen in Korea and in Indo-China. Let us recall—and all too often people in the free countries seem to forget this—that the communists have followed consistently a policy of fighting or threatening to fight, then getting what they want by negotiation, and then starting all over again. We know or should know by now that peace can never be gained by appeasing an aggressor any more than a bully can be handled by giving in to him. On February 16 Secretary of State Dulles put the situation clearly when he said this:

> It should not . . . be carelessly assumed that peace and security will be promoted merely by the non-communist nations indefinitely granting one-sided concessions to the communist nations . . .
> If the non-communist Asians ever come to feel that their western allies are disposed to retreat whenever communism threatens the peace, then the entire area could quickly become indefensible.

In my opinion, appeasement can end only in communist conquest. Appeasement is contrary to the character of the Canadian people. This nation was not built by leaders who believed in appeasement, and this nation will not achieve its true destiny by following any policies of appeasement. A firm stand has been taken in Europe. At this very session this house put Canada firmly behind the rearmament of Germany. If any step could have been expected to antagonize the Russians and to lead to war, that was such a step. Yet this parliament took it. Now, some steps must be taken in Asia to stop aggression in that area of the world.

Finally, I have a fourth question for the minister. Will the Canadian government work for and advocate a protective grouping of the nations of the Pacific such as exists in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I have raised this question on different occasions in the house, and the Conservative party has taken this stand, that there should be a security pact of the free nations in the Pacific area. I should like to know now from the Secretary of State for External Affairs where the government stands on this question. Such a protective grouping would be the most effective way of stopping communist aggression. If it were taken, Canada would have a voice in the policies that are adopted, instead of being in the position in which she is now, of being bound by the decisions made by others. Furthermore, Canada would benefit greatly in a material way if there were a grouping, not only for protection but also for the promotion of trade and friendly intercourse between the nations who were parties to any such pact.

In the past, the government attitude on this question has not been very helpful. Canada would have nothing to do with the ANZUS treaty. I was told Canada had not been invited to join the United States, Australia and New Zealand. Then, when I asked whether Canada wanted to be invited or had ever intimated she wanted to be invited, I was met by a stony stare or a pleasant smile. I could never get an answer to that question. I believe that if Canada had asked to become a party to that treaty, she could have been. Certainly the Canadians who live on the west coast believe it is of the utmost importance that our ties with Australia and New Zealand be kept as close as possible.

The government attitude with regard to the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization also has not been one of very much enthusiasm. There may be more reason for that because most of the nations, or at least some of the nations in that organization, quite rightly appear remote from the northern Pacific. However, I am afraid the government has not been very alert to things that have been happening in the Pacific. It is far more interested in things going on across the Atlantic in Europe, and there is also some reason for that, of course, because most of our people stem from European stock.

However, I believe the Canadian government has failed and is failing today to give the Canadian people leadership in facing Pacific problems. I repeat my request of the minister, that when he closes this debate he give the house an answer to the four questions I have placed before him. I believe answers to those questions will help Canadians clarify their thinking on Pacific problems, and that of course is of the utmost importance in a democratic nation.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): In parliament and out of parliament, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) delivers a great many speeches. He is kind enough to send me copies of those speeches. Most of them are very good; some of them are not so good and others are very bad, in my opinion. I am sure the minister will excuse me if I cannot subscribe to the theory of infallibility which seems to be accepted by so many government supporters. Actually, I do not believe the minister does require so many bouquets as he receives.

I should like to say, however, that I think the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs need not take an inferior position to his opposite number in either the United States or the United Kingdom. One of the misfortunes of Canada during my lifetime has been that we have suffered from an inferiority complex for so many years. We allowed Westminster to formulate our foreign policies, and more recently we seem prepared to allow Mr. Dulles to decide what is good and what is not good for Canada.

I have a copy of the minister's speech at the Geneva conference in May, 1954. I feel that this is one of the speeches the minister delivered that will be remembered for a long time. The information I received in Europe last summer was that the minister, and the Canadian delegation, deserved the major credit for achieving the cease-fire in Korea and preventing the war spreading to Indo-China. The minister having taken a firm stand on that occasion, I wish he would place the Canadian point of view more firmly on a great many other occasions. Speaking on the radio on March 6, in connection with education week, he delivered a speech on education, foreign policy and the hydrogen bomb. This was another very valuable contribution made to the appreciation of world problems. Regarding the hydrogen bomb he said:

> If one of these thermonuclear weapons burst near the surface of Ottawa, it would, by its blast and heat, not only obliterate this city, but through the fall-out effect of radioactive material, it would probably gravely endanger the lives of all people exposed in Montreal and its vicinity as well; so contaminate that city that it would have to be evacuated. If the winds, including those up to 80,000 feet above the earth were going faster than usual, the area of lethal contamination might be much larger. . . .
> So we must face the practical certainty that if any general war is allowed to begin, it would become nuclear war, and both sides would have to face the catastrophic consequences. Surely, any creature capable of reason must prefer the present situation, however unsatisfactory, to such consequences. Surely, too, both sides would prefer to tolerate the uncertainties of present-day life to the certainties of nuclear war.

Then later on the minister said:

> Our method is peaceful persuasion and perhaps we are approaching a juncture in history when violence might seem less attractive to its devotees than discussion and agreement. We must work on in that hope; never give up.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, both the speeches at Geneva and his radio address were very useful contributions to a better understanding. I come now to his address on Canadian-United States relations in Toronto, March 14. Unfortunately, in this address he put on the Dulles record with all its harsh tones. His criticism of Russia, I am sure, would be very pleasing to Mr. Dulles; but the suggestion that Canada is prepared to let the United States decide whether war in Formosa is of vital concern to Canada, whether the defence of Quemoy and the Matsu islands is essential to our defence, is a question concerning which the minister, both in his Toronto address, and in his speech here a week ago yesterday, did not do justice to the thinking of the Canadian people.

He mentioned in his speech on March 24, as reported at page 2343 of Hansard:

> It is inconceivable to Canadians, it is inconceivable certainly to me, that the United States would ever initiate an aggressive war. It is also inconceivable that Canada would ever take part in such a war.
>
> The second reason, as I see it, is that the only aggressive force that threatens us today, or that could commit a major aggression, is communist imperialism. Does anybody believe that we could or should keep out of an all-out struggle precipitated by communist aggressive power which, if victorious, would end everything that makes for free and decent existence?

This is one of his blasts against communism in Russia and China. And he says:

> It would be impossible, in my view, for either the United States or Canada to be neutral if the people of the other country were engaged in a major war in which their very existence as a people was at stake.

The minister would no doubt argue that if war over Quemoy and Matsu should develop, and if the United States were getting the worst of it, and if China did invade the United States and it appeared as though that country was going to be defeated decisively, we in Canada would not stand by. I think that is very far-fetched, to say the least. I think the Canadian people just cannot be sold on the idea that Quemoy, at the mouth of one of China's main harbours, and less than five miles from the mainland, is necessary to the defence of the United States.

At a round table conference in Toronto over the week end I might say there happened to be eight Americans and one Canadian discussing matters of international concern. This would seem to indicate that those who arranged the conference seemed to think that probably Canadians did not have valid opinions on these questions. But when the question of China, Formosa and the offshore islands was under discussion, an American, who was defending the Dulles policy in the area, was asked this question: How far is Quemoy from the mainland and how far from San Francisco? His reply was that it was something less than five miles from the mainland, and 12,000 miles from San Francisco. I think he was out somewhat in the distance from San Francisco. Anyway, we know it is a long distance.

Anybody on this side of the Pacific who argues that the defence of these islands is necessary either for the defence of the United States or for the defence of Canada, must have a pretty vivid imagination.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

The Ottawa Citizen of February 2 carried a story from Hong Kong written by Homer Bigart of the New York Herald Tribune service suggesting that, without exception, top officials of the British crown colony, both civilian and military, think the United States would be foolish to fight for Quemoy and Matsu. From a purely military point of view, these offshore islands just are not worth fighting for, was the comment this correspondent heard over and over again.

Then, in one of his week-end reviews, a few weeks ago, Mr. J. B. McGeachy said something about the history of Formosa, and drew our attention to the fact that this area has belonged to China for a long time. I have done a little reading about the history of the area, and find that over 2,000 years ago Formosa was part of China. Then, a hundred years before this continent was discovered by Christopher Columbus, Formosa had an official governor general, or one in some similar office, looking after its affairs on behalf of China.

I think it is unreasonable for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to suggest that Canadians cannot make up their minds, and that this parliament cannot decide on its own account whether or not the defence of these islands would be necessary for the defence of Canada.

I suggest that he should be on the side of J. B. McGeachy. And then, of course, along with this very controversial question is that of recognizing communist China. Since Great Britain has recognized her, and since it has been suggested that the United Nations should try to get communist and nationalist China around a conference table, I think it would be a great help if the Canadian government would now come out in support of the recognition of communist China.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), speaking at Seoul on March 8 last year, is reported by Associated Press as saying:

> I do feel that some day we are going to have to be realistic. We are going to have to admit the present government of China is the government the people want.

And Clement Attlee, former prime minister of Great Britain, speaking at Margate, at the Labour conference said:

> It is absolutely ridiculous not to recognize what is the effective government of China. And that government is not the regime of Chiang Kai-shek.

And Premier Nehru of India has gone on record in this fashion:

> There will always be trouble in Asia and elsewhere until communist China is recognized in the United Nations.

And foreign minister T. Clifton Webb of New Zealand urged the admission of communist China to the United Nations.

Someone was good enough to send me a clipping from the Vancouver Sun headed "Mather's Nightcap", written by Barry Mather. It bears the subheading "Looking Backward and Sideways at the 4th of July", and the dispatch from Chungking states:

> The Chinese government today flatly rejected a French proposal, that the Great Powers recognize Rebel America. The Chinese Foreign Office stated: "China is unalterably opposed to the recognition of a subversive and revolutionary regime which has gained power through force and violence."

And in the same article a dispatch from Upper Canada bearing the notation "With the liberation army, by our own military correspondent" states:

> A top-level spokesman for General Johnston's headquarters told the press today that the rebel leader, Washington, and his followers have been "completely out-manœuvred." "By withdrawing steadily to the north," he said, "we have lured the bulk of the rebels after us. Their line is now so extended that surrender is expected within a few days."

And then in the same article this dispatch from Moscow:

> The Russian ambassador to Britain, Boris Shudemov, called today on His Majesty, George III, and extended, on behalf of the Russian government, "full assurances of good will" in connection with Britain's speedy action to put down an attempted leftist-led revolt in the Americas.

So much for Formosa and China. I now come to the diplomatic front. As I indicated earlier, I think the minister's remarks this afternoon were most unfortunate in a world with so many tensions. He accused the Russians of using offensive language and, from his lofty pinnacle, discussed a proposal which has come to him. I wonder what he thinks the reaction would be if someone asked him to dinner and, before deciding whether he would accept the invitation or not, he expressed his views with as much feeling and as much heat as he did this afternoon regarding the shortcomings of his prospective host, and said that later on he would consider it.

I notice in the press that the minister was on television last night. I am told that he is a very personable person on television. Although he has had information regarding this matter for some time, I understand that he muffed very badly the question of this invitation to Russia.

The hon. member for Kamloops was asked a similar question when he was on television some time ago.

Mr. Studer: The hon. member was on television recently.

Mr. Nicholson: Yes, I was on television but not on press conference. I thought that the question asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) might have received a more courteous reply. The minister might have said: "Yes, certainly we have received the information; we shall give most careful consideration to it."

At this stage I wish to repeat the suggestion I made a year ago when a similar debate took place. At that time I thought that a useful purpose would be served by Canada taking the initiative in proposing a visit with a view to having a better understanding, and if I recall correctly I suggested that the delegation should be led by His Honour the Speaker and should include the minister, the Leader of the Opposition, our own leader, the leader of the Social Credit party, one of the women from the Conservative group and the only woman member on the government side. I repeat that suggestion at this time. I might say that it is one of the few suggestions I have made since coming to parliament that brought me a great many letters and quite a number of editorial comments. There were very few critical comments as a result of that suggestion. A great many people seemed to think that a useful purpose would be served. At this time I would suggest that the Prime Minister also be included in the delegation.

I hold in my hand a souvenir of the visit of the Prime Minister of Canada to India. I do not think there is anyone in the world who would expect that if the Prime Minister went to Russia he would return as an avowed communist. I am sure that those who know the Leader of the Opposition would not have any worry about his changing his mind if he should pay a visit to Russia. I submit that if a multimillionaire like William Randolph Hearst could risk his reputation by going to Russia when the Formosa crisis was at its height and could risk his life in that country, this land of freedom which is surrounded by two giants, one to the north and the other to the south, might well consider sending a delegation.

The Nation had a story in its issue of March 12, mentioning that Mr. Hearst on his return was quite favourably impressed with some of the things he saw. He was convinced that the present leaders were:

> —not possessed with the madness that drove Hitler to bring Germany down in ruins nor by the recklessness that led Mussolini to tie Italy's kite to the shooting war of nazidom's short-lived conquest.

Mr. Hearst, speaking to the Press Club in New York on his return, said that Mr. Khrushchev mentioned to him in the Kremlin before he left that if he got into trouble with Senator McCarthy on his return he might call on Mr. Khrushchev to testify that during his stay in Russia he was a loyal and capable spokesman for the capitalist point of view.

Just prior to going to press the Nation telephoned Mr. Hearst and asked him a few questions. He assured the Nation that his visit was prompted by a desire to get a first-hand glimpse of the country and the people of Moscow; secondly, that he did not receive any prior suggestion or intimation from the Russians directly or indirectly that he would be welcome. And of course they did not bother asking the question whether he had any subversive interest whatever. He explained that within a week after his request had been made to the Soviet embassy in Washington he had received the necessary visas for himself and his two associates. He felt that the Formosa situation was sufficiently important to warrant his visit. He pointed out that his interviews were reported accurately and fully by the Soviet press. He mentioned a discussion with General Zhukov. General Zhukov was asked whether he had been invited by General Eisenhower to visit the United States and he replied:

> Yes, General Eisenhower invited me to the United States on two occasions.

He was asked whether he would go and he replied:

> I have received no invitation so far, and I think that the state of relations between our countries just now does not favour such a visit. Neither the American nor the Soviet people would understand it if Marshal Zhukov were to go to America in the present state of relations between the U.S.S.R. and the United States. I sincerely desire better relations betwen our two countries. I should like to visit the United States, and would do so with pleasure if relations improved.

Mr. Martin: What document is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. Nicholson: I am reading from a Soviet news bulletin which I am sure the minister receives through the mail. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs will indicate that it is an improper bulletin—

Mr. Pearson: Quite proper.

Mr. Nicholson: It comes through the mail and is published by the press office of the U.S.S.R. embassy at 354 Stewart street, Ottawa. Does the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicate that it is not a proper bulletin to read from? I might say that Mr. Hearst has never questioned the accuracy of the reported interviews that he had with Zhukov and other top people; I might say, incidentally, at this time that at a press conference in Washington, President Eisenhower was asked a question regarding his friendship with General Zhukov. He replied that they were very good friends during their stay in Germany. He was asked whether he had not invited General Zhukov to Washington and he replied that he had. He was then asked whether he would extend that invitation now and he said that he would have to consult his advisers. A week later, after he had consulted his advisers, he said he could not extend the invitation now, which is a great pity.

I think those two generals who had to face so many problems in Germany in the years after the war should have a chance to come together and discuss what they might do at this particular time.

A dispatch from Washington by James Reston, a New York Times correspondent, mentioned that the policies that are being followed in the United States now create a great many problems for the people who should be their friends.

I now come to another section that I think is very important. While the Canadian people and the people of the world are agreed that the United Nations should be doing a worth-while job, the specialized agencies are not getting the assistance they deserve and should have. The Atlantic charter outlines some of the goals that we set for ourselves in the post-war years. I would like to remind hon. members that this was the objective that was set for us back in August, 1941. We wanted to see that people all over the world were able to have their full share of the things that were available so that there should not be hunger, poverty and disease in so many parts of the world. Well, the United Nations has set up machinery so that we now have fairly accurate information regarding the problems that exist in the world. I am not satisfied with the machinery that the minister has, first of all, to make information available to members of parliament and to the public.

A year ago when I was getting ready for my speech I telephoned the information section of the minister's office to find out specifically something about the work that is being done by FAO, WHO, UNESCO, UNICEF and the technical assistance branch. I was referred to the Department of National Health and Welfare which has a very good information service. I phoned there but I was told that I would have to go to external affairs for information about WHO.

Mr. Martin: You should have called the minister.

Mr. Nicholson: I realize the minister has a great deal of information available and has also a most efficient staff, but I wanted information as to what was going on in the various departments. I got a run-around from the various government departments, agriculture, health and welfare and trade and commerce.

Since then I have been to headquarters of WHO in Geneva and FAO in Rome and have discussed this problem with them. They explained that they can provide information when requested, but unless a government requests it they do not dig it up. They told me that if I made my requests through the regular channels I would get the information in due course. On my return I asked the Department of Agriculture to get the information regarding two of my friends who are well known to everybody from Saskatchewan, Dr. J. B. Harrington of the field husbandry department of the university and Professor Hardy who was formerly head of the agricultural engineering division.

Dr. Harrington has had two very interesting assignments in Egypt and India. At his own expense he took some very good coloured pictures and since his refturn he has held many meetings in Saskatchewan on his own time telling service clubs and church organizations and any who were interested something about the problems and the solutions.

I thought that some department in Ottawa should have information that there was such a person as Dr. Harrington, where he had gone to, what he had done and that they would be interested in having his story told to the Canadian people. No one seems to worry about this particular problem.

We are spending some money on these agencies. We are going to spend $323,000 on FAO this year; $289,000 on WHO; $500,000 on UNICEF and $267,000 on UNESCO—we are down a bit there—and $850,000 on technical assistance. Mr. Harold Wilson in "The War on World Poverty" tells us something about the income problem that has to be faced. We are told that in Indonesia the national income is $25 per person per year; in China it is $27 and in South Korea $35. Then when you come to countries like the United States you find they have the highest income, $1,453; Canada is next with $870; then comes New Zealand with $856 and Switzerland with $849. Those figures were taken a few years ago and at the present time we are up to over $1,000 in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What year?

Mr. Nicholson: These are some United Nations figures for 1949. It is now recognized that we cannot expect to continue to live in a world where two-thirds of the people have the sort of income that the people have in India, China, Korea and Burma, less than $50 a year, while one-third of the people living in countries such as this have incomes of upwards of $1,000 per person. Maybe years ago we could argue that it was no concern of ours how people lived in other parts of the world, but radio, television and modern forms of communication have made our world so small that if we have two-thirds of its people living under conditions such as these we are bound to have trouble.

Dr. de Castro in "The Geography of Hunger" deals with this problem. Dr. de Castro who is chairman of FAO, was away from Rome while we were there but it was suggested that his book would give us all the information we wanted to get from Dr. de Castro. I hope that hon. members will find time to read this most excellent production. In his foreword to the book Sir John Boyd Orr points out:

> Yet hunger has been from time to time the most dangerous force in politics. It was hunger which precipitated the French revolution. A mob of women from the slums of Paris marched to the parliament house demanding bread. The politicians fled. The women, joined by the men, then marched to the Bastille. The fall of the Bastille was the death knell of the feudal system in France, and the beginning of a new era in European politics. The revolutionary movement in the "hungry forties" of the nineteenth century was due to the same cause. The Chartist mob in England cried "Bread or blood". With the free import of cheap food the revolutionary spirit in England evaporated.

Dr. de Castro describes some of the conditions in his own country of Brazil, but it will be noted that he covers pretty well the whole world. I think he would prefer it if I used some of his references to his own country. He recalls a foreigner who was visiting Brazil and who was shocked with the living conditions in a country where nature had been so kind. The visitor said to one of the local people:

> Don't beans grow in this country?
> No, senhor.
> Rice?
> No, senhor.
> Some fruit or other?
> No, senhor.

The foreigner was puzzled to know why this was so when trees and everything else seemed to look so healthy. He could not understand why these things would not grow, so he asked the native if he had planted some of these things to see if they would not grow. The native's eyes lighted up and he said, "Ah! Plantando . . . da". That is, "Of course they will grow if you plant them." Two-thirds of the world's people never have enough to eat, nor do they have the know-how to cultivate their land. Dr. de Castro points out:

> It is estimated that at least 25 per cent of South America could be cultivated for one purpose or another, but the land in use at the present time does not exceed 5 per cent of the total area.

If only 5 per cent out of a possible 25 per cent is being cultivated it is not surprising that the people in those areas are not getting their fair share of the world's food.

I see that my time is running out but I appeal again to the minister to ask his colleagues to permit him to set up an information service covering the work of the United Nations so there can be made available to members of parliament, the press and radio, up to date information regarding the problems being faced by these specialized agencies.

Two of the ministers attended the Danny Kaye picture which was made available by Paramount the other night entitled "Assignment Children". Mrs. Sinclair reminded us that we have contributed $500,000 toward the work of UNICEF, but one should realize that that works out to only three cents per person as compared with $58.81 for our liquor bill and $30.65 for our tobacco bill. When that is realized I think it will be conceded that we are falling down in our information branch getting across to the Canadian people the proportions of these world problems. The people at headquarters in Geneva, Paris and Rome are frustrated because governments are not making ample funds available to them with which to do a worth-while job. I am sure the minister will give us more information, and that his colleagues will in turn make it possible for him to have additional funds in order that Canada might give leadership in this important work in the troubled world in which we live.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on external affairs, I realize of course that we are debating something that is not just of local importance but something that has world-wide implications. As we are considering that, we are reminded of the fact that in his speech the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) referred to the place that Canada now holds in the councils of the world, the responsibility that is hers because of the position in which she finds herself and also that in the foreseeable future he did not see any lessening of that tremendous responsibility.

We are inclined to think of external affairs as something that can be understood by the great majority of Canadians, but apart from just hearing a few references such as Indo-China, Korea, and Formosa and some other places, I am sure that a great many of our Canadian people have little understanding of the world situation at the present time. Even we who are privileged to sit in this chamber must depend upon the sketchy pieces of information which are given to us from time to time and we find it extremely difficult to arrive at conclusions that we feel are right in the light of the great world conditions that exist at the present time.

In taking part in this debate I am not attempting to masquerade as an expert in these affairs at all, but for a considerable number of years I have been interested in human relations and so I find this area of parliamentary responsibility of special interest to me.

It was my privilege last fall to attend the United Nations general assembly as a parliamentary observer and although that experience may have become rather commonplace to those who attend year after year I must say I found it of exceptional interest. As I listened to the debates in the various committees and also in the plenary sessions I endeavoured to form a mental picture of world conditions at the present time. In endeavouring to assess the value that was placed upon the United Nations Organization by the various delegates I found a rather wide divergence of opinion as to its effectiveness in the world of today. Some people seemed to be of the opinion that with the new atomic era into which we have been so unceremoniously ushered the United Nations has to a greater or lesser degree outlived its usefulness. There are others who felt that the work of the United Nations was worth while in some respects but in many other respects it had failed to measure up to the expectations of the founders of that great organization. I found that others were hoping against hope that the United Nations Organization would be adequate for the challenge of this new age in which we find ourselves. They thought that if anything would accomplish the purposes and objectives for which we are striving, the United Nations would be the medium by which they would be realized. We are hoping, of course, and we are trusting, that through work of the United Nations and through the program it is carrying on something really worth while will be contributed to the welfare of the world.

Although I was interested in all the committees I must say I spent most of the time at my disposal sitting in at the first committee. It seemed as though I was especially drawn to that committee possibly because I knew that the question of disarmament was one of the greatest problems that faced the statesmen of our world today. The agenda for that first committee, as it appeared in the journal of the United Nations, was as follows:

1. The regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments: report of the disarmament commission.

2. Conclusion of an international convention (treaty) on the reduction of armaments and the prohibition of atomic, hydrogen and other weapons of mass destruction.

The debate in this committee was very extensive with most of the members participating. Sitting on the sidelines, it seemed to me that the smaller nations appeared to think of the world political struggle as a battle of giants but in addition to that they felt there was a real danger that in the struggle they themselves would be trampled to death. As they had a perfect right to be, they were very vocal in their pronouncements and emphasized the importance and the necessity for these giants to resolve their differences, to call a halt to the gigantic armament race and begin to plan for an era of peace and progress.

During the time I was privileged to be there the outstanding event in that committee was the submission by the Canadian delegation of the draft resolution on disarmament. I have a copy of the famous Soviet news bulletin to which the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) referred It is not perhaps the same issue but it is the same publication. Although I have been tempted to digress somewhat and to reply to some of the statements that he made, I am not going to yield to that temptation. However, in this particular publication of Friday, March 11, 1955, it speaks of the ninth session of the general assembly held in September. I am afraid one would gather from reading the bulletin that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who was the acting head of the delegation at that time, did not have very much to do with the proceedings. Judging from this report it appears that the Soviet union made all the statements and proposals and then the committee simply fell in line and adopted them. However, this particular resolution called for further efforts to be made to reach an agreement on proposals to be embodied in a draft international disarmament convention providing for, as I have already intimated, the regulation, limitation and reduction of all armed forces and conventional armaments, prohibition of the use and manufacture of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, and the establishment of controls adequate to ensure that no state would have cause to fear that its security was in danger. It also suggested, among other things, that the disarmament commission reconvene the subcommittee to continue its work in this regard. We are given to understand, of course, that this committee is in session at the present time.

This resolution was first submitted as a Canadian resolution and it later appeared with some amendments under the co-sponsorship of Canada, the United States, the U.S.S.R., France and Great Britain.

I have said this before, Mr. Speaker, but I repeat that great credit is due the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was acting head of the delegation at that time, for the way in which he carried through that series of delicate negotiations with Mr. Vishinsky and the other powers in order to achieve agreement on the details of the draft resolution.

Without indulging in flattery I think I can say that the stature of Canada has been enhanced and her influence broadened through the course that was pursued on that occasion. At the assembly, and on different occasions since then, it was stated that the soviets did advance from their previously adamant position with respect to these particular issues. I remember the restrained optimism with which the news of the soviet co-sponsorship was received by the committee. There were, of course, very few who were prepared to accept the agreement as indicating a reversal of the previously held positions but most, if not all, felt that there was some softening of the soviets' attitude and that it was to be accepted that for some reason, understood or not understood, the way for further negotiation was opened.

Mr. Speaker, these events are now in the past. But the important question is this: What prospect does the future hold for the implementation of the desirable objectives outlined in the draft resolution? I think there is one thing that we should remember in spite of much that has been said to the contrary and that is that the long-range soviet policy remains unchanged. An article taken from the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 21, 1955, by Edward Crankshaw, reads as follows:

> The communist drive toward world revolution is with us again, openly and harshly, and conditioning the actions of the new rulers of Russia.
> Any doubt about the ideological background to the personal struggle in Moscow between former Premier Georgi Malenkov and party secretary Nikita Khrushchev are dispelled by an important policy statement in the January issue of the Soviet communist party journal Communist.
> The article is called "The Strategy and Tactics of Leninism" and it restates the old bolshevik aim of world revolution more categorically and candidly than at any time for the past 30 years.

Those are just two brief paragraphs from that article. There has been a great deal of talk about coexistence. Speaking personally, I think all the talk about coexistence is just a blind to cover up the continuing plans for subversion, infiltration and aggression. The delegates at the United Nations expressed alarm—in spite of the vehement denial of the soviet delegation—that the U.S.S.R. was exporting revolution. I say the delegates expressed alarm at the continued advance and the continued campaign being carried on in their own countries in an endeavour to overthrow the properly constituted governments of their countries and to bring them into line with the communist ideologies. I think that Korea and Indo-China are examples of what to expect as Russian imperialism continues its drive towards the ultimate objective of world domination. There is absolutely nothing to suggest that the "leopard has changed his spots" or to convince the world that the soviets are desirous of peaceful coexistence, but there is everything to prove that, as quickly as possible—yet as slowly as necessary—communism is seeking to bring nation after nation, and groups of nations, under its power.

As we think of the continued plans of communism, and as we consider their objectives, our attention is called to the suggestions that have been ventured by some nations with respect to our own program of atomic development and arms build-up wherein they have said that regardless of what soviet Russia does the western powers should take the lead and destroy all atomic weapons, and should prohibit their use. I think that suggestion is ridiculous. On the contrary, any proposed reduction, any suggested prohibition or any contemplated relaxation should take place only when there is foolproof assurance that it will not jeopardize our position with respect to self-defence and the ability to safeguard the welfare of the free nations of the world. As long as soviet long-range policies remain unchanged, there must be no let-up in our military preparedness program.

We welcome any sincere and straightforward negotiations to rid the world of threat of war, and any plan to ease the peoples of the world of the intolerable financial load of defence expenditures, but there must be no more retreat or compromise in the face of the diabolical menace of world communism. Any negotiations must see to it that the balance of strength does not pass from the free world to the side of Russian imperialism.

Perhaps it is superfluous to offer advice to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) but, Mr. Minister, we exhort you to be on guard as you have been in the past, lest expediency or desperate desire for peace, shared by us all, might tempt you to compromise or to follow the program of appeasement.

First of all, the first committee at the United Nations was to deal with the matter of the prohibition of nuclear weapons. We have all read of the fearsome power of atomic and hydrogen weapons. We have had pictures in the papers and broadcasts over the radio with respect to the destructive power of these new weapons. I do not think any one of us is in the dark with regard to the terrible potentiality of the atomic and the hydrogen bombs. Another matter was the reduction in conventional armaments. I am not going to dwell on that matter. The third was the control body to be set up in order to see that any plan and the proposals or regulations of any plan were fully recognized and observed by the respective nations. As reported in Time magazine of March 14, 1955, Sir Winston Churchill said:

> "What ought we to do? . . . It does not matter so much to old people; they are going soon anyway, but I find it poignant to look at youth in all its activity and ardour and, most of all, to watch little children playing their merry games, and wonder what would lie before them if God wearied of mankind.
> Disarmament would be the best solution, said Churchill. "But facts are stubborn things, and one of the stubbornest is the soviet government refuses to accept any practical system of international inspection".

I am sure this afternoon we all agree that disarmament is desirable. We would like to see it accomplished. I think President Eisenhower recognized the desirability of that when he appointed a secretary to head up a disarmament department. There are many complications, as was pointed out just recently in an article in the newspapers. It spoke of the difficulties that confront us in any program of disarmament, such as, first, the accumulation of the stockpiles of atomic weapons; second, the small atomic weapons that we now have at our disposal; third, the problem of adequate control.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the world conditions, with the constant threat that is before us and the absence of any great ray of light and hope, that we can do nothing less than maintain our military preparedness until such time as that control organ can be set up and we can be assured it will work adequately and effectively in seeing to it that the nations observe any plan for disarmament.

I think there is something else we have to do in the face of world conditions. We must recognize our responsibility with respect to the need of many nations for technical and material assistance. This has been referred to, and after all I have said about the necessity for military preparedness I must say that this, as well, is a matter of great importance. We do appreciate the programs that are now being carried on with respect to technical and material assistance to other nations, and we are reminded of the work of the United Nations technical assistance program with the contributions that are made to that particular fund. We have been reminded the last several weeks of the contribution made through the Colombo plan to the nations of southeast Asia, and how Canada has increased her contribution by $1 million. We do appreciate what has been done and what is being done.

But I submit that there is a great deal more we could do, and should do, in order to discharge our moral obligation to the peoples of the world. The need is still with us. Starvation is still rampant in some sections of our world; malnutrition abounds, yet we have the ability to meet these needs in such a wonderful way. We have surpluses that are causing us embarrassment. We have a tremendous productive capacity in our nation, and it would seem to me that we could do more and we should do more with respect to material and technical assistance to other nations of the world. It is a moral obligation that we have. Not only is it a moral obligation, but I believe self-defence requires that we do something to alleviate the distress of other nations. We cannot forever stand idly by when we have so much and they have so little. We must do our utmost to evidence our concern for, and our interest in, the welfare of other people.

The third thing I believe we must do is to carry on at every opportunity negotiations for the settlement of international problems. Now, I realize to a very small degree the problems that confront us when we talk about negotiations. Nevertheless, as has been mentioned today and on other occasions, I do not believe we can allow any opportunity to pass by that promises, in any degree whatever, to lessen international tension and maintain the peace in our world.

Another matter to which I wish to refer this afternoon, and perhaps this is a little out of the ordinary, is that as we think of the menace of communism we must realize the necessity for a strong moral and spiritual foundation. Think back into history, and not too far back, and we can recall occasions when we faced emergencies. There were crises. We all remember how our sovereign called us to prayer. We did not think that was strange. But somehow it seems rather strange to introduce suggestions like these into a debate such as we are having today. It may be that we are just unconsciously by-passing some of the important truths in this respect; but I believe, as I have said, that if we are going to face the problem that confronts us and present an adequate defence against communism while preserving our own freedoms and liberties, we must build our house upon strong moral and spiritual foundations.

The battle now is not just for territory; it is for national advantage. Some have said it is for the minds of men, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it is more than that. It is for the very souls of men. It is the conflict of the ages, if you please; right against wrong, truth against error, freedom against slavery, light against darkness, God against Satan. I introduce this theme into a debate on external affairs because we must recognize the essentiality of moral and spiritual resources in our endeavours to maintain our own security and in the defence of the free nations of the world.

I have a clipping taken from the Montreal Gazette of March 18, 1955, and I should like to give several brief paragraphs from it:

> Ostensibly, the communist attack is on capitalism; in fact, it threatens the moral foundations of society.
>
> Communism is not merely materialistic and atheistic, it is anti-moral. Its basic doctrines are the negation of morality. Its theorists ridicule all the moral codes that mankind has so laboriously built up.
>
> Communists teach that moral codes grow out of economic systems. That belief alone would destroy society. It would lead to the fatal falsehood that morality does not have to be taught. Morality has to be taught—and it has to be taught anew to every generation.

And another paragraph:

> But that is not the worst of it. The communists' doctrine of the class war leads them to adopt a code of ethics that is the precise opposite of what all the great religious and moral systems of the world have agreed in calling good.

And that, Mr. Speaker, is why I say if we are going to combat communism we must not depend only upon weapons, no matter how destructive they may be. We must not depend only upon technical and material assistance to the underdeveloped nations of the world. We must build sure foundations in our nation that will make us strong to challenge evil in our day and generation.

Mr. Paul S. Peak, advertising and public relations manager of the Imperial Bank of Canada, addressing a meeting of the advertising and sales executives club of Montreal had this to say, when speaking of the choice given citizens of the free world, with the high standard of living they enjoy:

> Such freedom, Mr. Peak said, needed absolute honesty, purity, unselfishness and love.
> "There is one ideology which can beat the ideology of the totalitarian state," he said. "It is freedom to choose. We must choose to be governed by God or we will condemn ourselves to be ruled by tyrants.
> I would like to see a little more emphasis on the spiritual wealth of the nation".

Empires in the past have perished not at the hands of invading armies but because of moral and spiritual deterioration and disintegration within. The great powers are not the atomic bombs, with all their tremendous power potential. The greatest powers in the world are righteousness, faith in God and prayer.

I should like to quote from Time magazine of February 28, 1955. This article quotes the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I think these words are very true. He said:

> We have gone from the iron to the uranium age, from the horse and buggy to the jet . . . Seventy-three years ago they hadn't heard of atom or jet. They had time to enjoy a sunset . . . They were more secure morally. This moral insecurity of ours means that men are turning to strange gods. Communism is the worst of these false gods. It is the black mass of our time, with its insistent, insidious appeal to the twisted, the frustrated, the perverted and the distressed. Nor will it be destroyed by material means alone, by bread or bayonets or circuses. It must be opposed by a strong moral belief, by a moral purpose which shows itself in service and sacrifice both in the individual and the nation.

Again I say I am in full agreement with these words attributed to the minister. I appreciate the wariness with which the Secretary of State for External Affairs views any and all proposals emanating from the Soviet union.

In closing let me say this: We do not want to miss any opportunity which may present itself to move toward the easing of international tension and the maintenance of peace. On the other hand we do not want to find ourselves in the position of being helpless in the face of communist intrigue and expansion.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate we have had presented a considerable variety of shades of opinion as to what should be the position and course of action of this country with regard to the various areas of international tension, and particularly of course with regard to the most potentially explosive of them all at the present time—Formosa, and the islands adjacent to the Chinese mainland.

Here the discussion necessarily resolves itself largely into a consideration of our attitude, wether it is to be approval or disapproval, support or otherwise, in relation to the policy of the United States in this area. It is not my primary purpose in joining in this debate to enlarge upon this particular question. My primary purpose is to make a few remarks about the United Nations. However, in view of all that has been said about the situation—and I have followed the debate with some attention—I wish to say that of the views I have heard expressed regarding the Formosa crisis, and certainly it is no less than a crisis, those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to my mind commend themselves as outlining the only rational and realistic position Canada could take under existing circumstances.

It seems to me that hon. members who have offered opinions differing from or contrary to those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are veering too far in either one direction or the other. Certainly I fully agree that it is not compatible with our status of independent nationhood and with our increasing stature in the world—and I think I may be pardoned for beating the patriotic drum to that extent—that we should merely play the role of, shall we say, the tail to the American comet or the 49th state of the union. I think that is probably accepted by every member in the house. I believe if we were to do that it would not be in the best interests of either ourselves or the United States. We have our own part to play. We have our own contribution to make to the cause of world peace as well as to many other matters of world import.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, it certainly seems to me that it is in the highest degree unrealistic for us to lose sight of the fact as, I fear, some hon. members who have preceded me in the debate have been inclined to do, that our fortunes and our destiny and our national safety, indeed our very existence, are inextricably bound up with the United States of America, the strongest champion in the whole free world.

If in our best judgment any phase or detail of foreign policy of the United States with regard to Formosa or, for that matter, any other centre of world danger, is likely to imperil rather than strengthen the security of the community of free nations, it may very well be not only our right as a sovereign state but also our duty as a responsible member of that community to offer the soundest possible criticism we can of that aspect of American policy, possibly even to the extent of proposing a different course of action which we think may better cope with the exigencies of the situation. If we do that we shall render finer service than by any blind and unreasoning adherence to whatever our ally may propose.

We have seen that American statesmanship —and in this respect it is no different from that of any other country, including our own; I hope I am not treading on any honourable toes when I say that—is not infallible. We know that the statesmanship of any country is liable to error. It is certainly not our part, as I said, to adhere to any policy of any nation if we consider it to be faulty or dangerous in its probable consequences. But risk alone, the risk involved in a policy, certainly cannot be the sole criterion since, as I think some hon. members said earlier in this debate, any policy that could be adopted to stem the tide of communism, except possibly one of abject appeasement, must necessarily involve a very weighty element of risk.

The present United States policy with regard to Formosa and the offshore islands is not necessarily, let us grant, the best one. It may be unsound; it may lead to an open clash in those waters, and it is well that we examine it with care rather than hurry to associate ourselves with it without giving it that degree of careful thought. But while red China shows no inclination whatever to even open negotiations for a peaceful settlement, is there any hon. member in this house who can propose a better alternative? I have not heard any proposed, and I doubt very much whether any can be proposed. We must never forget, Mr. Speaker, that our whole position in this world of democracy and communism is based upon a fundamental unity of aim and purpose as between ourselves and the United States. We are in complete and total agreement that the free world must be defended at all costs against the inroads of communism. Differences may arise and, as I said a moment ago, even the duty to differ may arise, concerning details or the best manner in which to achieve that aim and purpose. But if in some such instance a course of action pursued by our ally, though neither approved nor supported by ourselves, should bring in its wake the world holocaust, then what possible choice could we have? Could we stand aside in any major war involving the United States because it had been precipitated by what we regarded as mistaken United States policy in Formosan waters or elsewhere?

To me there is only one answer to such a question, and that is the one which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has already given. Indeed, it seems to me the question is fundamentally academic; for certainly the decision would not be one of our choice; it would immediately and forcibly be thrust upon us by the communist powers.

It is upon such reflections as these, Mr. Speaker, that I base my approval of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said in this debate concerning our position with regard to the present Formosa crisis. Above everything, of course, it is essential that we avoid any serious rifts in the united front against communism.

I should now like to turn to an aspect of the world situation which has not been greatly emphasized in this debate, namely the ultimate need to attain a lasting peace in the world rather than the immediate need to avert an imminent threat of war. That this debate should be primarily directed toward the latter consideration is, of course, existing circumstances being what they are, almost inevitable. The present division of the world into hostile camps practically prohibits, for the time being at least, any comprehensive policy for a universal and permanent settlement of differences. Even if the current moves toward disarmament meet with some measure of success, even if the North Atlantic treaty alliance provides a satisfactory level of armed strength in Europe, even if some form of truce—there does not seem to be any better possible settlement in sight at the present time—is arrived at in the Formosan strait, even if all this and more are accomplished, we shall still be far from an era of permanent peace.

All these things I have mentioned might be likened to the building of a shelter—it may very well be a strong shelter—against a storm; but certainly, Mr. Speaker, they will not themselves bring to the world the sunshine of perpetual peace. If a permanent solution is ever to be found it must be, I am convinced, by the creation or the development of some form of international organization working effectively and efficiently, representing all or substantially all the nations of the earth and eventually involving, no doubt, some degree at least of abandonment of the cherished principle of absolute national sovereignty.

Today, undoubtedly, that seems little more than a vain dream. Certainly its quick realization is no more than a vain dream today. But if we postulate that its ultimate attainment is impossible, then it is my belief that after all the days or the years or the decades of postponing the final disaster, total war must inevitably come upon us, or at least upon some future generation. The stakes are the highest humanity has ever played for. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that in my college days—and that was a relatively untroubled time, when hydrogen was chiefly known as a component of water—there was a very popular poem by Mr. T. S. Eliot entitled "The Hollow Men". The last two lines ran this way:

> This is the way the world ends
> Not with a bang but a whimper.

Today you might reverse that, because there is the very present danger that the world will end with a bang, and there will be very little of mankind left to whimper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but since it is five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE POLITICAL AFFILIATION OF CANDIDATES ON BALLOT PAPERS

The house resumed, from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Thomas for the second reading of Bill No. 185, to amend the Canada Elections Act (ballot papers).

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks that were made by the sponsor of this bill when he spoke on March 11 last. I think it would be appropriate for me to say a few words about the principle of this bill. When the hon. member moved second reading of the bill the other day he expressed the view that the purpose of this measure was to remove the confusion which in his opinion would result from the fact that at times there is more than one candidate with the same name running in the same constituency.

My first observation is that there are already in the act provisions which would dispel any such confusion. There is a considerable time between the issuance of the writs of election and polling day, and this would enable the electors to be told the exact identity of each candidate, what he stood for and the policies he would advocate if elected. The campaign is generally long enough and at times strenuous enough to afford to each candidate a full opportunity to make himself known to the electors to whom he is appealing for votes.

There is another provision in the act which requires a candidate to list not only his name but his occupation and place of residence on the ballot paper. I feel that is enough to dispel whatever confusion might be created by the existence of similar names on the ballot paper.

If there is confusion, as the hon. gentleman contends, my submission is that the proposals contained in this bill would not do much in the way of clarification or help in dispelling that confusion. In fact my view is that they would add to the confusion. May I state why I believe this would add to the confusion rather than clarify the issue.

The bill suggests that on each ballot paper would appear what is referred to as the political affiliations or interests of each candidate. I must admit that I cannot understand what is meant by those words. The hon. member for Greenwood thought perhaps it might refer to the occupation of the candidate. My view is that it cannot refer to that because the act already contains the provision that the occupation of the candidate must appear on the ballot paper.

What puzzles me even more is the procedure suggested in the bill under which the recognized leader of each political party or group would file with the returning officer a written direction indicating which candidates should appear on the ballot papers as representing the party he led. That of course would mean that there would have to be a recognized leader for each political group.

Mr. Thomas: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Pinard: I shall a little later. We have at the present time different groups and parties represented in this house. At the present time there may be no dispute as to who are the leaders of these political groups, but the time might come when the leadership of a political group was in dispute. This has not happened so far in our country, but we have seen where controversy has existed in other countries as to who is the leader of a political group.

Even though there may not be any difficulty about that and even though the recognized leader of a group could always be found to file this suggested written direction, greater confusion might be created if instead of having only a similarity of names you might have a similarity in the political affiliations of candidates. In other words you might have more than one candidate claiming to be a member of the same party, with the result that the so-called recognized leader would not know what to do.

If he made a choice and selected one candidate as being the candidate of his choice, that would be equivalent to declaring that the others were outcasts. In other words he would be deciding that so and so was the candidate for that political group and that no other could claim to represent it. I believe that ought to be determined by the electors themselves.

Mr. Knowles: Are you thinking of Ottawa East?

Mr. Pinard: Not necessarily. There might be occasions even in our own party where more than one candidate would claim to belong to our group. This might very well happen in the case of Social Credit candidates in Quebec, where a candidate might belong to l'union des électeurs and at the same time claim to belong to the Social Credit group. I do not know what the leader of the Social Credit group would do in that case. He might say that the Social Credit candidate whose name appeared on the ballot paper was their candidate and the candidate of l'union des électeurs was not.

Then what would happen if the recognized leader of a group refused to file a written direction of that kind? Would it then be left to the candidate to list his political affiliation on the ballot paper, and would it remain with the returning officer to pass judgment as to who should be considered as belonging to a certain political group? Then there are also the independents who would have to be considered.

Therefore I believe there are a number of reasons why this measure would add confusion rather than bringing about clarification of the issue. I would remind hon. members of what the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said when he spoke in the debate on March 11. The hon. member said that a member of parliament is not elected to represent a given political group or only the people of his own constituency. He is elected to represent all the population of Canada. His true allegiance is first to the people of this country and then to the political group to which he claims to belong.

I am not questioning at all the good motives of the hon. member, but I think what he proposes would not bring about anything in the way of clarification of whatever confusion he thinks occurs as the result of similar names appearing on the ballot papers, and for this reason I would oppose the legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words, and what I say will be in support of the proposal contained in the bill submitted by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Thomas). I have listened with interest to the arguments of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard) against the bill, but it seems to me that in part of what he has said he has been splitting hairs, and in part he has really missed the point. At the conclusion of his remarks he repeated the position taken by the hon. member for Quebec South on March 11.

No member is listened to in this house with greater interest than the hon. member for Quebec South; but although we listen with interest to what he says, it does not follow that we always agree with his point of view. I thoroughly disagree with what he said on March 11 when he said, as recorded at page 1959 of Hansard:

> If on the ballot paper itself an individual who proposes to become a member of parliament labelled himself, for the time during which he will be a member, as the supporter of such and such a party, it would be extremely difficult for him, both in conscience and in the view of his electors, to say that from now on he repudiates the pledge he made to his electors when he said he was a Liberal, a Conservative, a Social Crediter, or anything else you may mention.

I indicated by a question at that time what I wish to state further now. It seems to me rather inconsistent to argue that the name of the political party should not be printed on the ballot paper when one realizes that all the parties in this country, including the Liberal party of which the hon. member for Quebec South is a prominent member, most certainly advertise the names of their parties on their election literature. They make it crystal clear in their election literature at election time that they are seeking votes for their candidates as candidates of particular parties.

I have saved some of the literature which was put out in the election campaign of 1953 and I am going to quote some captions and slogans which appeared on some of the material in order to underline my point. Here is a leaflet which was put out in the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre. My hon. friend who is sitting here will well remember it. This leaflet reads:

> Vote to continue the tax rental agreements—
> Vote Liberal on August 10—
> In Winnipeg South Centre vote Hanks, A. W.

Similarly, I quote from another leaflet which was put out:

> For continued prosperity—

I am sure the unemployed will be interested in this.

> —and sane government, vote Liberal. In Winnipeg South Centre vote Hanks, A. W.

Here is a letter with a picture of a gentleman in the upper right hand corner, a gentleman many of us remember well, George A. Cruickshank, who was described in 1953 as the Liberal candidate for Fraser Valley federal riding. There is a line at the top of the letter which reads "Liberal headquarters"; no question at all but that the campaign for this candidate, as well as for the other gentleman whom I mentioned a moment ago, was a campaign to elect this man as a Liberal. I quote from another leaflet:

> To put your East York candidate on the winning team with Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent, vote Liberal—J. D. Thomas.

Well, this particular Thomas did not get here as his namesake who is sponsoring this bill did. He was presented to the electors not just as an individual by the name of J. D. Thomas. He was put forward as a Liberal. He happened to be beaten by another person whose postcard advertisement reads:

> Re-elect R. H. "Bob" McGregor—Progressive Conservative—York East.

Surely there is no question about it. All of us know that in the literature that is put out in our support at election time the name of the party is played up. Oh, I know there are times when this is not true. I have an example here which I shall not quote, but I will pass it over to my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill). This will refresh his memory of the fact that the name of the party was not played up in that leaflet. But now I shall quote from an advertisement which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of Tuesday, August 4, 1953. It is a large advertisement which contains a picture of the Prime Minister and the catch line is, "For a greater Canada—vote Liberal!" Then appear the names of the five Liberal candidates in the greater Winnipeg area.

I realize that once in a while the name "Liberal" was played down; for example, in this advertisement which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of Friday, July 31, 1953, where the catch line reads, "Vote St. Laurent!". The name "Liberal" also appears in that advertisement, but in very small type. There was no question about who the recognized Liberal leader was, although that seemed to be one of the problems worrying the Secretary of State. There was no question about it in that advertisement, nor was there any question but that each of the candidates whose names appeared there would be recognized as Liberal candidates and Liberal members if they were elected. As hon. members know, the four Liberals in the city of Winnipeg did not do so well in 1953. None of the four was elected.

I have here a newspaper clipping concerning that campaign, which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of July 29, 1953. It reports a statement made in the course of the campaign by a prominent member of this house, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). The dispatch is from Victoria, by Canadian Press, and it reads:

> I'm fighting my last battle, trade minister declares—Trade Minister Howe said Tuesday night, "I think this will be my last election," and that, "I want to make sure the Liberal party is strong when I leave it."

I could read more of this dispatch but I shall not take the time and it might appear as though I were trying to strike another note if I did. The fact remains, however, that he was pleading not just for C. D. Howe or Dr. Frank Fairey in whose support he was speaking to be elected, but he was seeking support for the Liberal party as such.

I have in my hand another document. This appears over the signature of a man whose name has been ringing in our ears a good deal this week. I refer to Mr. Duncan MacTavish. He is the gentleman who thinks members of parliament are mischievous boys indulging in free speech. I might say this is a document which was sent to the Canadian troops who were overseas at the time of the 1953 election. The Secretary of State may not have seen it, but it underscores the point made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin when he introduced the bill. On page 3 of this document in large red type the following appears:

> Liberal candidates—1953—candidats Libéraux

Then the candidates are listed in all the constituencies where there were Liberals throughout Canada. Also, in both English and French, in a box, appears this note:

> Attention
> In some electoral districts the names of the candidates are the same. It is important that you check the initials with the deputy returning officer's list of candidates and make sure you write in the correct name so that your ballot will be counted for the Liberal candidate if such is your wish.

I draw to the attention of the Secretary of State the fact that the president of the national Liberal federation, Duncan MacTavish, was worried about this very point during the election campaign of 1953 and went out of his way, presumably with party funds, to see to it that the information as to who were the Liberal candidates was made available to all the troops overseas.

Mr. Low: Which would indicate weakness.

Mr. Knowles: Very definitely. In the meantime, I am looking over this document to see whether or not it conformed to the law. Maybe it escapes my notice, but I do not see anything on here indicating who printed it. It was published, of course, by the national Liberal federation of Canada, but the name of the printer is not given.

An hon. Member: Is there any union label on it?

Mr. Knowles: There is no union label on it. If there were, you would know who printed it. But no, you cannot tell where this document was printed. I am rather shocked to discover this fact. When I got to my feet I had not realized that Duncan MacTavish would break the law of this country, but that is what he did, because section 71 of the Canada Elections Act requires—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member in his extremely interesting discourse, but I think he will agree with me that the question before the house is whether or not political affiliations should appear on a ballot paper, and not whether some document issued some years ago was or was not legal. Had the document been a ballot paper perhaps his discussion might have been in order. But I would ask the hon. member to come back to the bill.

Mr. Low: It is an extremely interesting discovery, nevertheless.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that had I, before I got to my feet, realized what I discovered while I was speaking, I would have said it much quicker and got ahead of your ruling. In any case, you will recognize that what I have been doing is answering arguments put forth by the hon. member for Quebec South and the Secretary of State, who claimed that it is somehow degrading to candidates for parliament to suggest that the name of the party they support should be put on the ballot. My point is that political parties at election time make great efforts to attach the name of the party to the candidate in all their election literature, whether that literature is legal or illegal; and if that is done, I submit that we should be consistent and have it on the ballot paper as well.

As to the other arguments raised by the Secretary of State just now, may I say that they were obviously a bit weak. He thought there was provision already to avoid confusion, and suggested that when there were candidates with the same name, their first names or initials would be different. Sometimes they are similar. He suggested that the addresses of candidates and their occupations were also a means of identification. As hon. members realize, that may not be sufficient identification for the purpose of people who go to the polls to vote.

As to the point raised by the Secretary of State in connection with the difficulty of determining candidates that a recognized leader recognizes as followers, surely he was splitting hairs. I think also he failed to recognize that in my hon. friend's bill there is provision, where this process is not carried through, for the returning officer to put on the ballot paper the political party name suggested in the nomination paper by the candidate himself. I do not think there is anything substantial in the arguments that have been advanced by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need say any more. Were I to take the time to do so I could quote further from some of the interesting documents on my desk which I saved from the last election. It is a fact that at election time, in election literature, every candidate goes out of his way and every party goes out of its way to connect the party name with the name of the candidate so the electors of the country will know which party they are supporting, and which political philosophy they are endorsing. If we do it in other respects, surely it is a good idea to put the name on the ballot paper as well. I remind hon. members that it is done already in two or three provinces, and I think nothing would be lost—indeed I think something might be gained—if we did it in federal elections, which is the principle of the bill now before us.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on this question. I find it difficult to understand the opposition expressed by the Secretary of State to the proposal that the political affiliation be shown along with the name of the candidate on the ballot paper. I am rather afraid that the Secretary of State has been raising obstacles that do not exist, and has been putting forward hypothetical instances which I greatly doubt would ever be experienced. We have had this system in the province of British Columbia for many years and it has worked out exceedingly well. There have not been all the complications—

An hon. Member: The system was brought in by the Liberals.

Mr. Winch: Yes, it was brought in by the Liberals. There have not been all the complications that have been raised this afternoon by the Secretary of State. Not only have the problems he has envisaged not come about, but it should be recognized that when the Liberals brought in this system in the province of British Columbia, it was for extremely good reasons.

What were those reasons? First of all, it was the belief in British Columbia—and I think it should be the belief here—that every person whose name appears on the voters' list has the right to cast his ballot and to make sure that he casts his ballot for the person for whom he wants to vote.

Let us not fool ourselves at all. There are thousands upon thousands in this dominion who want to vote, but they are divided into three categories. There are those who know the names of the candidates for whom they want to vote and who know the party to which he belongs and for which they want to vote. Then there are those who remember only the name of the candidate. That is all right, because his name is on the ballot paper. But everyone in this house knows quite well that there are countless thousands who, when they go to the polls, know the party for which they want to vote but who—and it occurs time after time—have forgotten the name of the candidate of that party.

Any of us who have worked in our campaign offices and our committee rooms on election day and the week before—and I think all of us have done so—know what happens. I think it is safe to say that out of every ten calls we get, either by phone or in person, nine will be for the purpose of inquiring what is the name of the candidate of such and such a party in such and such a constituency. That being the case—and we all know it is true—and because we all want the voter to have the right to vote for the actual person or the party for whom he wants to cast his vote, then why should we not, in the name of democracy, have on the ballot paper the political affiliation along with each name?

This system has worked exceedingly well in British Columbia, and I am sure it would work just as well in a federal election. The job is not too severe as far as the party leader is concerned. I had the honour of being party leader in the province of British Columbia for 14 years and under the authority of the act, as the recognized leader, I had the right to tell the returning officer who were the official candidates of the C.C.F. The Liberal premier had the same right, and he did on behalf of the Liberals exactly the same as I did on behalf of the C.C.F. There was no difficulty.

There is one other point I think should be noted, and that is the reason it is advisable to have this type of legislation. It is advisable in order that a person may be certain he is voting for the right candidate if there happens to be two who call themselves the official candidates of a certain party. Time after time in all parties, provincial and national, you have internal dissensions, disruptions and disputes, perhaps in one constituency or in two or three constituencies. The party know who is the official candidate, but somebody gets up on his own and says, "I am the official candidate"; yet he is not the man who was nominated and who the president says is the official candidate. It makes no difference whether it is the C.C.F. party, the Social Credit party, the Liberal party or the Conservative party. That is the sort of thing that happens.

The voter is entitled to know who is the official candidate of any party. It is not right that anyone else who wants to run for election should be able to falsely capitalize on the name of a political party when he is not the official candidate of that party. Of course he must have the right to run, but it is not right, fair or decent that he should be allowed to capitalize on the name of a political party. At the moment this can be done. There is nothing that can be done by a recognized party or by a recognized official candidate to prevent it.

We can very easily solve these problems and make certain that the voter is able to vote for the person and the party he wants, merely by accepting the proposal before us to have the party affiliation placed alongside the name of each candidate. I have said this has worked and is working in other parts of Canada. It could work just as efficiently in a federal election. I hope the Secretary of State will take a second look at his position on this matter and will remove his objections.

Mr. Pinard: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question?

Mr. Winch: Yes.

Mr. Pinard: Supposing there was more than one candidate claiming affiliation to the same political group in his nomination papers, what would happen? Would the confusion not be greater than otherwise?

Mr. Winch: No, because the recognized leader of the party must certainly know who is the official candidate, if all parties operate on a democratic basis, as I presume all in this house do.

Mr. Pinard: If he were to refuse to file the written direction referred to in the bill, what would happen?

Mr. Winch: I would say that could be taken care of easily by the fact that it should be illegal for a person to take a status to which he is not entitled.

Mr. Pinard: How would the electors know the recognized leader had filed a written direction, without having a chance to look at it? If it is done on nomination day, would the electors have to go to the returning officer's office to look at the papers to find out whether or not the written direction referred to had been filed?

Mr. Winch: When you file your nomination papers you indicate the party to which you claim affiliation. At the time of the nomination the recognized leader of the party notifies the returning officer in writing of the name of the official candidate, and that is accepted by the returning officer. If the leader does not accept his democratic right when you have this system, and does not file the name, then the returning officer can take it as it is submitted by the nominee. I doubt if there would be any political leader in Canada, if he had this right, who would not exercise it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I think the time has come when I have to point out to hon. members that we are not in committee. The minister had the right to ask the last speaker questions for the purpose of clarification, but I think that has been done. The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): As a matter of principle, I would have no objection to having the party affiliation affixed beside my name on a ballot paper. However, I am not quite as enthusiastic about this bill as some of my colleagues. We are all, of course, entitled to our opinions and I am going to express mine.

In the first place, I have some grave doubts as to the effectiveness of this bill to do what it seeks to do, and in the second place as to the propriety of one part of it. As to the effectiveness, I believe that if the objective is to make clear the political affiliation of the candidate in question, it would be reached more effectively and more properly by having an amendment to the form of the nomination paper itself, rather than to section 28 of the act. If you take the stand that wherever there is no written direction by the recognized leader of the party in question to the returning officer, then the name of the candidate and name of his party shall be as it appears on the nomination paper, then it is the nomination paper that should be the governing factor in this whole question. From that point of view I believe the objective would be achieved in a more proper manner if the nomination paper were amended. Speaking personally, I do not believe it is up to the party leader to designate who is the official candidate in any election.

I agree with the Secretary of State that this would lead to a great deal of confusion. You will note the bill states that the name of the political party or interest represented by a candidate shall be shown in the manner required by a written direction, if any, of the recognized leader of such party, and it shall be filed with the returning officer before five o'clock in the afternoon of nomination day. This amendment deals with the Canada Elections Act which governs all the territory from coast to coast. This provision cuts the time rather fine when he has to file this direction before five o'clock on nomination day. In many constituencies it is not clear who is the candidate until the official nomination day ends, and that is about two o'clock in the afternoon, if I recall correctly. The party leader is thus given three hours to decide who is the official candidate in each constituency from coast to coast. The leader has to know the name of the candidate and whether or not he represents the party.

I think that is the greatest weakness in the bill. It leaves the onus on the leader of the party to do what, in my opinion, is the duty of the candidate himself. After all, the candidate is duly nominated under the provisions of the act by a number of persons who sign his nomination papers. He accepts that nomination by placing his signature on the nomination papers before witnesses. In other words it is the candidate, together with those who affix their signatures to the nomination papers, who are responsible for that act. I do not think it is right to make anyone else responsible for that nomination. The people who are performing that act of offering the candidate to the electors should accept full responsibility for it. As I said at the outset, I have no objection whatever to having the party affiliation included on the ballot paper, but I feel it would be far more effective to provide for that on the nomination paper itself.

At the moment, all the nomination paper calls for is the names of the persons endorsing the candidate and the candidate's signature and his occupation. It would be a simple matter to provide an additional space on the nomination paper calling for the political affiliation of the candidate and leaving it optional to him to fill in that space or leave it vacant. As a matter of fact as I read the act, and I read it quite carefully, there is nothing which would prevent a candidate from stating his party affiliations in his nomination paper now. The act does not state that he must do so, but there is nothing to say he cannot do so.

Section 28 of the act, which this bill seeks to amend, states that the ballot paper shall contain the names, addresses and occupations of the candidates set out in the heading of the nomination papers. We see that the word "occupation" is not defined in the interpretation section of the act. With due regard for those who may have had more experience in legal matters than I have, from my own observation I feel there would be nothing illegal in a person stating his party affiliations in the space provided for "occupation". There would be nothing wrong if a candidate said that his occupation was "Liberal", and there is nothing in the act to say he could not do this. It would be perfectly legal.

I am not saying that this is the best way to arrive at the objective. It would be more orderly if, on the nomination paper, together with the space provided for the occupation, for purposes of greater identification there were a space for the party affiliation of a candidate who might wish so to designate himself.

In saying this I come back to the original proposition, that I believe it is the responsibility of those who sign the nomination papers sponsoring a candidate, and of the candidate signing the papers accepting nomination, to decide who the candidate is and what he represents. And I do not think it is right to ask any person outside that constituency to have anything whatsoever to say about either the affiliations or the qualifications of the candidate concerned.

If it happened that there were two candidates with similar names, similar initials and similar occupations, and there was a danger of confusion on the day of voting which, I believe, is one of the reasons advanced for this bill, then I would refer hon. members to section 28 (3) which states:

> Any candidate may, within one hour after the close of nominations, supply in writing to the returning officer any particulars of his address or occupation which he considers to have been insufficiently or inaccurately given in his nomination paper.

Then it goes on to say what shall be done. I have no doubt the purpose of this subsection was that if, on nomination day, a candidate were to learn that another candidate with identical name, initials and occupation was to be nominated, he would have the opportunity within one hour to make whatever changes might be necessary in the designation of his name and occupation so as to distinguish between himself and the other candidate, and thus avoid confusion.

That is the safeguard set out in the act, and I think it is well to keep it in mind. I believe the purpose of the bill—and I am using my own imagination, realizing that the sponsor will speak for himself—is to clarify the identification of the candidate concerned. It is the belief of those who have put the bill before the house that the addition of party affiliations would aid in this identification. If that is the objective, then I suggest the proper way to attain it would be to have the nomination paper amended to provide an opportunity for the candidate wishing to exercise that privilege to do so.

For that reason I am in line with the principle of the bill, although it is difficult to distinguish between principle and method. However, if the principle is that the candidate who wishes to do so may designate his party affiliation, then I am in favour of that principle. But if this bill goes to the appropriate committee it is my intention to seek an amendment to it, because I do feel the onus should not be placed upon a party leader but rather upon the candidate and those who sponsor his nomination.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am quite interested in this amendment, because it provides that all ballots shall be of the same description and that they shall contain the names, addresses, occupations, political affiliations or interests.

I remember reading, in the days when Mr. Mackenzie King was prime minister, his frequent references to interests. From time to time he referred to powerful financial groups or corporations as "interests". And I recollect once being in the gallery of the House of Commons as he read a list of members in the other place belonging to the Conservative party who were connected with what he called the "interests".

As I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre paying an appropriate tribute to Mr. Duncan MacTavish, I was wondering what would happen if we adopted this amendment, and whether by doing so we would not prevent his entering these halls and speaking to us here in parliament with the authority with which he spoke the other night when addressing the Liberal federation, when he said that members of parliament were doing harm to the country when they pointed out the conditions existing—

Mr. Winters: He did not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and when he also warned as to the danger to parliament of such a situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can now return to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will grasp immediately the significance of my remark when I refer you to the fact that if this amendment is passed from now on the political affiliations or interests of a candidate will have to be inserted. I was pointing out, in view of the fact that Mr. MacTavish is a director in 19 great corporations, as we read in the Ottawa Citizen of March 31, just how impossible such a ballot would be. As a matter of fact no ordinary ballot could possibly be devised to cover the interests of that gentleman in the corporations which have honoured him with directorates.

Mr. Knowles: Do you regard corporations as political interests?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It does not say "political interests." It says "political affiliations or interests". I am not in any way believing that the adjectival description would apply to the second word in the sentence, because it is disjunctive.

This shows the danger inherent in an amendment such as this which, as I said a while ago, would deny Mr. MacTavish the opportunity to speak in parliament as he spoke to the federation. On that ground I must say with due respect to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, who has introduced the amendment, that I shall have to oppose it. I know the hon. member introduced it before that magnificent speech was made to the Liberal federation and before the Ottawa Citizen pointed out the many interests of Mr. MacTavish. And, even yet, I believe that if we want him here, some consideration should be given by my hon. friend to an amendment which would remove that part of the description which, in the case in question, would result in a denial of that opportunity all Canadians ought to have to serve in the House of Commons.

Having said that, I must also add that I believe the political affiliations should not be on the ballot paper. If the word "interests" was there, and a man in Mr. MacTavish's position desired to enter parliament, the ballot paper would be very long indeed. Political affiliations—well, who would determine the political affiliations? Would it be the president of the association? Who would determine who was the official candidate and who was the unofficial candidate? All these things indicate the difficulties in the way.

I do not believe the other arguments advanced by the hon. member for Greenwood and others who have opposed this measure need to be repeated by me. They appeal to me. I think of the potential danger in that word "interests", and in parliament having the services of the gentleman I mentioned so that he would be able to read the lectures to parliament here that he now has to read outside.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Legare (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I would like to offer a few remarks. I will vote against implementation of this measure because I am convinced that it is far from being such as to clarify the issue at all. As a matter of fact I rather feel that in many cases it would have the very opposite effect.

I do not have to look very far for an illustration, no further, in fact, than the last election in my own constituency where there were three Liberal candidates. It has been suggested that the word "official" be added to the political affiliation. But suppose the party leader refused to designate his official choice? In that case all candidates would have the same political affiliation. For that reason I do not think the proposal is sound, and I will vote against it.

On three occasions I was called upon to act as returning officer in my own constituency, and never once did any voter suggest to me that the lack of any indication on the ballot as to political affiliation had given rise to any confusion whatever. I rather feel that adding it would only make for greater confusion. That is why I propose to vote against this proposal.

(Text):

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to assure the hon. member for Prince Albert that if his main objection is the fact that Mr. MacTavish could not get his name on the ballot, if this bill gets into committee we shall make the proper amendments to see that the gentleman may do so, either by cutting it down slightly or by making his particular ballot three times as wide.

One thing has been proven, and that is that there is no earthly reason why the political affiliations should not be put on the ballot paper. Not one logical reason has been put forward why this should not be done. The main arguments of the hon. member for Greenwood, the hon. member for Quebec South, and the hon. member for Prince Albert were these. We are gathered here as a group of friends tied to no political affiliation. We are elected as individuals; we sit in the house as individuals, and this should be an association of friends and not an association of political groups.

I quite agree that probably should be so. But let us not forget that after we are sent here—and I am not going into all the details of how we are elected on party tickets, which we are—we are segregated into political groups in this house. The seating plan gives the political affiliations of all hon. members. The list of members that is sent around to the offices by the queen's printer lists them all according to political affiliation. On the back pages of Hansard every Wednesday there appears an alphabetical list of the members of the House of Commons along with their constituencies, their addresses and their political affiliations. It does seem strange that if we are to sit in this house as not only members of parliament but as members of groups in the house, and if we are designated as such in official documents, we should not be elected on the strength of our political as well as our personal qualifications.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Thomas the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson:

That items numbered 92 to 111 inclusive of the main estimates, 1955-56, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, five o'clock found me speaking on the very real danger of utter destruction which confronts the world today. Since then we have had three hours' grace; we may have three years, or more for that matter; nonetheless the danger must be considered as of the very greatest imminence.

I had said also that in my view the only permanent solution was some effective form of world organization of nations. Therefore, without minimizing in the least the importance of those policies which are our only immediate available resource for safety, let us never lose hope that the future may bring, and bring in time, that effective form of international organization of which I speak and therewith the end of wars and rumours of wars and the possibility of war.

Today, as we all know, there is a form of international organization, the United Nations, which was created in that very hope and for that very purpose of ending war. What I have said largely and what I am about to say, is inspired by my interest in that organization. I was fortunate enough to have the opportunity to attend the general assembly of the United Nations in New York last fall as a parliamentary observer with the Canadian delegation. While there I acquired as much knowledge as I could of that organization and its functioning. I see in it a hope for mankind not otherwise discernible.

It may be that I have been reading the wrong newspapers, but I have been disturbed by what seems to me increasing cynicism and pessimism with regard to the United Nations. I suggest that this attitude has become all too common in newspaper editorials and articles, those potent purveyors of digested opinion by which it is inevitably fostered in the minds of thousands. To a considerable degree, though perhaps not so much in this country, it has appeared in the utterances of many public figures.

We have heard and read that the United Nations is dying and that it has become a mere debating society; that there are few united notions in the United Nations. We have even heard such derogatory references as UN windbags, costly impotence and so on. We do not have to run far to read or hear such journalistic and other comment of this kind. I think perhaps it has spread more in the United States, but I am afraid it has also spread to a considerable extent on this side of the boundary also.

Perhaps an attitude of pessimism has been encouraged by the fact that so far the United Nations has fallen woefully short of its primary objective of being an effective instrument of world peace. Certainly today our hope for national safety must largely repose elsewhere. It is true, of course, that many measures are being taken, NATO for instance, which come directly within the letter of the United Nations charter. But I must say that I have always had some difficulty in reconciling such alliances, at least on the military side, with the true spirit and ultimate purpose of that charter.

Of course it is usually easier to tear down than it is to build up, but apart from that I realize fully that such criticisms of the United Nations as I have mentioned are by no means baseless. They are founded on inescapable fact; as a matter of fact they even have their value in pointing out numerous weaknesses which are inherent in the organization as at present constituted and functioning.

In some aspects the United Nations does appear to be moribund. It is more noted for dispute than for agreement. Deadlock, usually achieved in important matters by the veto or threat of the veto, is a common result. There are windbags at the United Nations who often engage in endless and aimless debate. As a matter of fact I have endured their droning myself. I was able to go back to my chair quite frequently, shut my eyes, and think myself back in this very chamber. Of course none of us is perfect.

As a matter of fact I have wondered if back in the distant days of Simon de Montfort, at the news of the calling of the first English parliament, from which this House of Commons traces its proud lineage, the wiseacres of that day did not shake their heads and prophesy as many frustrations for that organization as now plague the United Nations, and if they did not mutter in their beards that it would not work. But at least they had no newspapers to write letters to in those times.

In any case, what is said in derogation of the United Nations has a solid if unpleasant basis of fact. Nor does the immediate prospect of greatly improving the effectiveness of the organization seem bright. Consider one matter, the admission of new members. With half the states of Europe and many of Asia, including the effective government of mainland China, on the outside and their entry barred by one faction or the other within, the United Nations is still far from being a representative world organization.

I have mentioned the effective government of mainland China. In case my meaning should be mistaken I wish to say at this juncture that I am certainly not advocating either the recognition or admission to the United Nations of the red Chinese government in its present mood. Certainly it could hardly qualify as peace-loving within the terms of the United Nations charter. I merely suggest that if a stable peace is to be attained some day we must hope that government will eventually qualify itself in this regard. For all I say, indeed, is with an eye to the future, and not even the immediate future.

As against all the problems and failures of the United Nations let us set up a not inconsiderable tally of solid accomplishment. Let us remember that if there are aimless talkers at the United Nations there are also men of vision. The organization provides a forum for the expression of world opinion. I do not think even Russia is entirely indifferent to world opinion. The United Nations has been a strong champion of human rights. Although it has not attained its fundamental purpose, the abolition of war, it has composed numerous local conflicts, any one of which might have led to a major outbreak. Palestine, Kashmir, Indonesia, Korea, Greece, Berlin; all these might be inscribed on the United Nations banner as victories in the cause of peace, even though as yet some of these victories cannot be considered complete.

Through the activities of the United Nations and its associated specialized agencies much has been done to raise the standards of health, sustenance and education among the depressed millions of the earth. Much too has been done to strengthen the economy of backward nations. Those of you who saw the picture "Assignment Children" recently shown here can better appreciate that phase of United Nations work which is portrayed. The program of atoms for peace, instituted under the auspices of the United Nations last year, may prove to be one of its major accomplishments in ameliorating the lot of humanity.

Paradoxically enough, Mr. Speaker, I think that if the organization had come into being with no object beyond its work in the fields of health, education, and social and economic welfare, there would today be a much keener appreciation of its worth and far less talk of its failure. However, although its work in these fields is a very real contribution to the cause of peace—for peace cannot be soundly based on poverty and wretchedness—the failure of the United Nations in its primary objective, the permanent removal of the shadow of war, not unnaturally overbalances all else. But even here a proper perspective must be maintained. What are the ten years of the United Nations' existence as against the age-old search for peace? Indeed, those who founded the organization considered that the first ten years would be experimental only, a time for trial and error. I may add that the American founders were by no means so oblivious to the likelihood of trouble with Russia as is often supposed.

At the end of ten years, therefore, there is in contemplation a thorough study of the United Nations charter with a view to effecting such changes and improvements as the experience of the decade may suggest. Whatever revisions may be made, we cannot suppose they will eliminate or avoid the present difficulty with which the organization contends; the cleavage and struggle between the world forces of democracy and communism. But I suggest that the likelihood of significant revisions emphasizes the fact that the organization is not static nor dormant, and that there is room for improvement and expansion; that what is now little more than the first draft of that buttress of peace which man aspires to build may yet develop into the complete structure. It is at least a hope, and to abandon it would be to my mind a counsel of despair, carrying the connotation that the horror of total war, soon or late, is inevitable.

I sincerely commend to this government, therefore, that it continue its policy of strong support of the United Nations organization, and endeavour in every way to increase its strength and prestige. In particular I should like to see an intensified program to disseminate knowledge of the United Nations and its functions more widely among the people of Canada. In the continued existence of the organization there lies at least some prospect of better things to come. But if the great experiment is allowed to fail, if the United Nations goes the way of the league of nations, it may well be a sign that man himself is far along the road to his own destruction.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this debate on external affairs is hardly the type of debate that many of us might have expected to be participating in when the war ended ten years ago. After one of the most decisive victories in all history there were few then who did not contemplate the possibility of long years of stability, long years of the kind of peace that had been earned by the sacrifice of so many young men and women, and older people as well, throughout the world.

We are confronted today with the dreadful reality that scarcely a day goes by without some new incident reminding us that we are living through a most precarious period of history, in which new forces are constantly forming to threaten the very survival of the system which we thought had been established with great security at the end of the last war.

At this time there are three places very much in our minds. These three places have been brought to our attention in the press and over the radio very frequently in these past few days. The first of these is Formosa, to which most of the discussion in this debate has been directed. The second is Viet Nam, where we see not only a division of forces as between communists and non-communists, but a tragic division within the ranks of the non-communists as well. Then, to remind us that this is a world in which trouble might appear at any point or place or time, we have learned today that at midnight last night the communists who supervise the highways leading into Berlin suddenly imposed taxes that were 10 and 12 times what they had been previously on trucks carrying vital supplies into that isolated city. We see the beginning of something that conceivably might create all the pressures and difficulties that were encountered at the time the airlift was needed some years ago.

Formosa has attracted our attention because we are told of the massing of forces there which might lead to a general outbreak. It seems to me that one of the things we should bear in mind in connection with what is taking place there is the fact that was emphasized by Sir Winston Churchill in the House of Commons at Westminster only a short time ago, and which was repeated again within the past few days by Sir Anthony Eden. The threat to Formosa is a threat which particularly involves the forces of the United States.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said in this debate, circumstances might well arise out of any general conflagration which began there that would involve us as well as other freedom-loving nations. Nevertheless there is a particular obligation of the United States in connection with Formosa, and we can perhaps take some comfort in the knowledge that the decisions that will be made there will be decisions entirely within the hands of the President of the United States. I am sure there is not an hon. member of this house, and there are few Canadians, who would not express confidence in the judgment, military knowledge and desire for peace of that great leader in this democratic world of ours.

That does not mean, however, that we should be expected to follow the lead of the United States on every occasion. They have made it clear that they do not expect that of us. I must say that certain recent events have at least given considerable reason for the belief that we have some reason to look with admiration and respect to the wise, cautious and farsighted course followed by the British government in dealing with international affairs. We do not of necessity follow any other government, but it has been pointed out to us that we live in times that no longer can be measured in terms of ordinary wars.

In this debate we are discussing—as we shall be doing in every debate on external affairs and defence, which are such closely related subjects—the survival of humanity itself; it is nothing less than that. It is hard yet for any of us to grasp the dreadful reality that it is now within the range of possibility that human beings could destroy life on this planet of ours by building and exploding a sufficient number of hydrogen bombs to contaminate the whole air about us for hundreds and perhaps thousands of years to come. It is like something out of a terrible nightmare, yet it is a reality.

This terrifying truth about the hydrogen bomb has produced in the minds of all too many people a form of hopeless fatalism which discourages positive action with regard to defence or those measures which seem to be essential for the preservation of our society. The picture is terrifying enough, Mr. Speaker. God forbid that we should ever lose hope for peace. God forbid that we should ever accept as inevitable the destruction that would follow the full use of all the explosive powers that have been created and built up within these past few years. God forbid that we should ever cease striving with all our strength to retain sanity and to preserve that peace that many of us here thought was so secure after the immense sacrifices of the last war.

The greatest living statesman—perhaps the greatest living human being; certainly the man with the longest knowledge of war and the possibilities of war based upon an infinite understanding of history—has given us hope even in these dreadful days. Only a short time ago, in the picturesque language he employed, Sir Winston Churchill held before us the possibility that peace and security might be the sturdy child of terror. At some point the power to destroy will be so great on both sides of the iron curtain that it does not matter much whether one side or the other has a little bit more of that power. If there is available enough power to destroy all the great centres of industry, of concentrated population and of transportation in the leading countries on either side, it does not make much difference if you have four or five times the number of bombs that would do that job. At some point we are going to reach a balance of terror. When that happens, much will depend upon the clarity of thinking of all people who are free to discuss, to talk and to think. Much will depend on the spirit of the free peoples. Much will depend upon their determination to preserve in any way they can a sensible, orderly life under that overhanging cloud.

A great many who are in this house tonight will remember vividly that in the early days of the last world war no person was allowed to move around London or the larger cities of Britain without a gas mask. I think the same thing was probably true in the other countries. There were in existence at that time terrible and extremely destructive gases. They were never used. The reasons for that fact may still be difficult to determine. I prefer to believe that neither side wished to begin destruction of that nature.

Those who were in London in the early days of the last war will remember that ghastly figures were given of the expected casualties when gas attacks came. They were not saying, "if gas attacks come"; they were talking about the casualties when gas attacks came. They did not come. That kind of warfare did not happen.

Conceivably this new kind of warfare might not happen. After all, the Russians are people strangely like ourselves in many ways, except in the political thinking of those who have control. They have the same number of bones in their bodies. They have two eyes, a mouth, a nose, and most of the ordinary responses; and they like to live. It is not likely that, without a good deal of consideration, they would precipitate a situation in which they would know that within hours destruction which would make Hiroshima and Nagasaki seem like child's play would suddenly be visited upon Moscow, Stalingrad, Leningrad and all the great cities and industrial centres of Russia.

Naturally we do not contemplate such a possibility with any satisfaction. One thing we all know is that such a war is not going to be started from our side of the iron curtain. It is not within the realm of possibility that the United States, Britain or any of the democratic countries is going to start a war of that kind. There is therefore hope; and while there is hope each one of us should be constantly considering ways and means by which the possibility of peace may be extended.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned the suggestion that has been made that there be an interchange of parliamentary representatives between the countries beyond the iron curtain and those on this side. Well, why not? After all, people sometimes forget that it was quite easy to travel in Russia some years ago. In fact, when we talk about the days of the czars as though stern conditions existed then which were relieved by the communists, it may be surprising to many people to learn that then there was no difficulty whatever in going to any ticket office here in Canada and buying transportation by boat and then by rail to anywhere in Russia. In fact you could cross Russia without a passport. Now no Russian can move from one town to another without a passport. It is not only people from outside who must have passports.

By all means let us hope that the opportunity to visit and see Russia will be extended. I should like to go back again, but under reasonable assurances. I have seen two of their jails, and I would prefer when I go back again that it be under appropriate arrangements that suggest the possibility of carrying on ordinary activities without interruptions of that kind. We must recognize that so far this is only a gesture. But if it should prove to be a reality, then I would hope that an appropriate number of the members of this house, which would be determined in the usual way, would visit Russia. I would hope they would have a chance to visit the Ukraine, which is a separate nation by declaration of Russia itself. I would hope they would have a chance to visit Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and the Baltic states, and see exactly what the conditions are there. If there is anybody who has any soft-hearted attitude toward communism, if he keeps his eyes open when he is there he will come back with no uncertainty as to what communism really is.

I would hope that Russians would come here. We give them a good deal of freedom as it is. We certainly give their agents plenty of freedom. By all means let them come. Let the contacts be extended. But let us not lower our guard at any time. Let us not be led into any false sense of security. Let us hope that by exchanges of this kind the possibility of real contacts, real understandings, a real exchange of ideas, might be increased. Today this, at best, would only be a beginning.

During this time we may live with a balance of terror there still will be the necessity for what we loosely describe as conventional forces. Let us not get carried away with any idea that because there is this immense power in existence it is not going to be necessary to have the kind of forces that can deal with difficulties that arise from time to time, such as that which occurred in Korea. After all, the attack on Korea came many long years after the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Yet that war was carried on without a single atomic weapon being used.

[Mr. Drew.]

I most earnestly hope that difficulties will not arise in the Formosa straits that will lead to a general conflagration in that area. I may be rash but nevertheless I have the hope that they would not lead to a world conflagration. They did not in Korea. I have very real doubts that the men in the Kremlin are going to invite that kind of destruction in Russia if China becomes involved in a local conflict of that nature, which only they will precipitate if its starts at all.

It is not my intention tonight to make extended remarks about Formosa or about Matsu and Quemoy, which have been under discussion. Nevertheless there are one or two things I should like to mention. I was intrigued by the emphasis placed on the distance from Quemoy and Matsu to the coast of the United States. This point was raised in the debate today, as though that proved outright that they were really not of much concern to the United States.

May I make it very clear that I am not going to engage in any speculation as to the strategic importance of those two islands; that is peculiarly the problem of the government of the United States at this moment. But the distance is not the test. Berlin is also a long way from here or from the east coast of the United States, as are a number of other places in which we are greatly interested.

One of the things which it seems to me would bring a greater sense of understanding among us all in discussing the situation at Formosa would be to stop talking about Chiang Kai-shek and comparing his qualities with those of Mao Tse-tung. I must admit that I find it difficult to understand from what source some of my friends to the immediate left have formed such a high impression of Mao Tse-tung. Without in any way comparing these two men, why not let us be quite clear about the fact that it is not Chiang Kai-shek the government of the United States is supporting. The government of the United States has decided that the island of Formosa and the Pescadores, at any rate, are part of a general defence line in the Pacific. They have not forgotten Pearl Harbor. They have not forgotten that at a time when the hitting power of aircraft was very limited compared with what it is today, for a time it seemed as though their whole west coast might be open to attack because of what happened at Pearl Harbor. They have decided that Formosa is an essential link in that chain of defence islands in the Pacific.

I think we would all keep our arguments on a much saner basis if we recognized that fact. I do not subscribe for one moment to all the terrible descriptions of Chiang Kai-shek that are put forward by my friends to the immediate left. In fact I doubt if they have evidence of some of the things they say. I have not seen it, and I doubt if they have. Most certainly there is no reason for any of us to believe in the interpretation they put on the actions of Mao Tse-tung, who has murdered millions of his own people. But let us remember that if Chiang Kai-shek were not there today and someone else were there, the United States seventh fleet would still be in the Formosa straits and United States aircraft would be on the air bases in Formosa, as they are at this time.

I welcome that. I welcome it for more than one reason. It is the reality of the situation. It is the reality of a situation in which the government of the United States says, without reservation, "We are going to take the appropriate steps to see that communist aggression moves no farther west into our own area". Also I welcome it for another reason. It seems to me that perhaps they will understand a little better the presence of British troops in Hong Kong and Singapore if they realize exactly why it is that they are in Formosa, and thus dispel any of the illusions that might otherwise surround that situation.

I mention this because I believe that frankness, appreciation of definition and clarity of purpose are the proved essentials of peace. I believe that horse trading and loose situations are the very things that invite trouble. I think that is what we learned at the beginning of the last war. And I would hope to see within some not too distant time a more precise definition of what the real defence line is in that area, and in other areas of the Pacific. I think we have very convincing reasons why that should be a very hopeful thing for us.

We must try to preserve peace in every way we can. But surely if history teaches one thing it is that we will not preserve peace by some form of horse trading with the communists now or at any other time. We can no more buy off Peking or the Kremlin than we were able to buy off Hitler in the days before September, 1939.

I think we have received great encouragement from a place which has come back into the press prominently in the last 48 hours, and which is not far removed from Formosa in terms of principle even though it is half way across the world. If there is one thing we can learn from what has happened in Berlin it is the importance of a clear definition of the boundary line and of the issue, and of what will happen if that division is not recognized. When we are sometimes told about the geographical location of certain places, and when it is argued that this place or that falls more logically into one area than another, let us remember that there is no more unreasonable situation in the world today, and I doubt if there ever was a more unreasonable situation, than that with which Berlin is confronted at this very moment.

There is a city with millions of people, a small island of freedom more than a hundred miles inside the Soviet zone. There does not seem to be any sense in it. They get all their supplies over two or three limited highways. There are three narrow air strips five miles wide which must be followed when flying in there. There are rail lines going there, passing through Soviet territory and supervised by the Russians. Yet Berlin has grown and prospered, and West Berlin today is a place of great vitality and confidence.

Why? Because of a very courageous decision, because of what seemed to be a very daring decision. The three western powers, Great Britain, France and the United States, said in simple, clear and unequivocal terms: West Berlin is part of West Germany; access to West Berlin is part of the survival of that city. No matter how irregular the boundaries may be—and they are very irregular between East and West Berlin—there are the boundaries; the moment those boundaries are threatened, that means war.

That was an ominous declaration. It was a declaration which aroused great concern at the time. There were British, French and American troops in that distant island of freedom, completely surrounded by Russian armour, Russian infantry and Russian aircraft. Yet there has been no attempt to change those boundaries. There was the blockade, when the airlift was suddenly brought into existence by the western powers to supply Berlin. Now we see this special tax measure as another attempt to interfere with transportation. But Berlin, with all the irregular boundaries passing through that city, remains as the junction point of two worlds, and West Berlin remains as an island of freedom. Never has there been a time, never, when the Russians could not have marched into that city within a comparatively few minutes. But they knew what that meant, and Berlin has remained free.

For that reason I suggest that appreciation of definition both as to boundaries, as to issues and as to consequences does assume tremendous importance in our efforts to preserve peace. I have mentioned Berlin as an illustration of why I hope we will have exact and precise definitions in the east.

Nevertheless we must remember that this is the responsibility of the United States. I for one do not believe that trouble there would bring about a general conflagration. I think we can therefore refrain from undue criticism of our friends in the United States in their efforts to deal with this particular problem. That does not mean we abandon any right to express our opinion, and I am expressing my own opinion once again. Preciseness of definition will be of maximum help.

I have used Berlin as an illustration, but let me refer to it in another way. Already there has been a debate in this house in regard to German rearmament. In that debate in this house as elsewhere there was heartburning, there were uncertainties, because it is not easy to forget that twice within the lifetime of most of us Germany has been the aggressor and that many in this house tonight bear on their bodies the marks of those struggles started by German militarism. Nor is it easy to forget the ghastly pages of history which contain the names of Dachau, Buchenwald and Belsen and those other horror camps which forever stand as a blight on the record of the German people, with all the great qualities they possess.

We made our decision. It was a right decision; it was the only decision which offered hope. It was the decision which the British people were called upon to make after the Napoleonic wars, when another dictator had visited destruction on the whole of Europe. History is useful as a guide. It is worth remembering that Napoleon was not regarded with any very friendly sentiments by the people of those nations into which his troops had entered in cold aggression. Whether it be in Madrid, in Vienna, in Prague, in Warsaw or in Moscow, there are memories of the aggression of that time.

When that war was over and Wellington was the head of the Grand Alliance, the very same arguments were put up to him. Never again must France be allowed to have arms with which to threaten the peace of Europe. It is worth remembering today that it was Wellington who said, "If France is to be a member of the society of Europe, then our purpose must be to gain the friendship of the people of France, and that can be done only if they are treated on terms of equality". It was his decision, accepted it is true by the government, and on the basis of that decision the greatest historic friendship of all time began when France and Britain marched side by side through the generations that followed.

Surely there is a lesson for us today. Yes, there were horrors and there were terrors imposed by the troops of Napoleon, not comparable, it is true, with the stories that came out of Germany and out of German-occupied countries in the last war, but bad enough. We have seen the lesson; we can hope there will be friendship of that kind, and that hope should be justified by the wonderful contribution made to the life of our country by people of German stock who have come here to live and who are among our very finest citizens. What better evidence could there be that there can be no such thing as some fundamental weakness in the German strain than the fact that the President of the United States, who today is the most powerful leader of the western world, came only a couple of generations removed, direct from Germany. These are the things that give us hope, but there are also reasons for concern.

Those things should be borne in mind. There was every reason for France to show some concern, as she did. It would be appropriate in this house, a few days after France has ratified those agreements, to express our admiration of the men who did ratify them under difficulties that we simply cannot understand. After all, there were reasons why it was difficult for France to agree, which were not before our eyes when this decision faced us.

Across the whole of France are tragic reminders of German invasion in 1870, in 1914 and in 1939. Anywhere you go from the North Sea to Belfort on the Swiss frontier, anywhere you go from the Pyrenees to the northern frontiers, anywhere you go from Brittany or from the famous beaches of Normandy, you see those cemeteries which day by day remind the people of France of what German aggression really meant. I marvel that they were able to gain support for those treaties. They have done it, and from this house could well go words of admiration, of hope and of great confidence in a country which, with all that evidence before it, with millions of graves of two world wars in their own soil, have joined in this great and challenging act of friendship. But they were conscious of the dangers. They were emphasized during the debates; nor should we forget them.

Part of those Paris treaties that take the place of the European defence community deal particularly with the unification of Germany. I wish to speak on that. Chancellor Adenauer has made it clear that his primary purpose is to bring about the unification of Germany. That is an understandable ambition. In the declarations approved at Paris it was clearly stated that this must be by peaceful means. Germany, under the signature of Chancellor Adenauer, undertakes that it will be by peaceful means, but Chancellor Adenauer will not be there forever. Therefore let us look at that situation for a moment.

What does unification mean? There is no doubt about the fact that it is constantly in the German mind. Just last week the Bundestag passed the appropriate measure to start rebuilding the Reichstag, which is not a hundred yards from the Soviet sector of Berlin, a fairly challenging gesture. It is intended to emphasize to the communists as well as to the west that Berlin is the capital of Germany. That is in their minds.

What happens when West Germany is rearmed? East Germany is substantially rearmed now. Is East Germany faithful to the communist cause? The answer is emphatically no. The answer to that question was given on June 17, 1953, when the food riots in Berlin sparked a series of outbursts in every city in Germany which amounted almost to open revolution. There was no integrated plan; it was a spontaneous outburst against communist control. I saw the official records of what had happened in those East German cities when I was in Berlin last August. I had no idea until I saw them that there had been great bloodshed in many cities, that tanks and armoured forces were required to put down the uprisings. That is how strongly the people felt.

I mention this because it may suggest what could happen when a rearmed East Germany and a rearmed West Germany stand side by side. Suppose something happened in East Germany which called for Russian intervention. Would a rearmed West Germany stand idly by? I do not need to answer that question. Or is it possible that the two forces might come together in some other way?

Many hon. members here will remember the ingenious device employed by von Rintelin in the first world war to destroy allied ships at sea. It was a small lead tube about the size of a cigar and contained two chemicals separated by a thin plate. The chemicals gradually ate into the plate and at a given time met and an explosion occurred. I do not think it is unfriendly to West Germany to suggest that it is tremendously important that we recognize this danger which in turn could carry the spark which would involve communist forces beyond. Now is the time to make sure there is a clear understanding and a clear definition as to how this is going to be done; that there is no uncertainty, and that there should be agreement that there must be allied staff officers so closely in association with the troops of West Germany that there could be no reallocation and redeployment of troops preparatory to any movement of that kind without the western powers being fully aware of that fact. These are realities; they are the kind of realities we must face if we are going to have peace.

When we talk about unification, just what do we mean? Is it unification of West Germany as we know it today and East Germany as we know it today? Most people think of it as the union of West Germany and East Germany which we see on the map, but the West Germans do not think of it as that. I wonder if it was sufficiently realized when a very important gesture was made last July to place Berlin in the German structure and members of the Bundesversammlung were flown into Berlin to elect their new president. The new president, Theodor Heuss, was elected in what is known as East Prussian hall. East Prussia is not in East Germany; East Prussia is well beyond the boundaries of East Germany.

In Berlin there are pictures which show the people there what they describe as the lost provinces. There are nine of them, but only three are in East Germany. I should think it would be important that we have a clear understanding of what they mean by unification, that there be a precision of definition because in any uncertainty about it there could be the makings of great trouble in the years ahead.

We have taken a bold and I believe necessary step in the western world in restoring sovereignty to West Germany, in assisting their rearmament, in extending the hand of friendship and widening the channels of trade. But let us not blind ourselves to those things which could cause difficulties in the years ahead unless they are understood and faced today.

I mention these because Canada with her 15 million people can never be suspected of aggressive intentions. Her voice can be heard. There is no government which is not willing and anxious to hear the opinions of the government and people of Canada in regard to matters of this kind. I would hope that perhaps we will contribute something to the understanding and solution of this problem, because I would be very sorry if in the years ahead we continued to be worried by uncertainties such as those which were associated with the Danzig corridor in years gone by, and other uncertainties of that kind. This must be done if we are to establish some sort of general stability in this period which we hope may be one of peace.

I leave my remarks in regard to the military situation there. I hope and pray that following the lessons of the past the good spirit of Germany may emerge triumphant in partnership with the west, and that we may contribute much to the fellowship and understanding which will bring them wholly into our partnership. But I am sure the firmness of that friendship and the hope of peace will depend upon our frankness in facing issues and in pointing out dangers before it is too late to discuss them in reasonable and understandable terms.

We are going to have a period of coexistence whether we like it or not. We are in a period of nuclear coexistence. It is going to involve a lot of thought, a lot of discussion and a lot of very earnest effort. In the desire to attain peace there is certainly complete agreement within this house. May I say to my friends to the immediate left that if by inference I have been critical of any statements they have made, I certainly do not question the fact that within this house there is complete unanimity in the desire to achieve peace by the means that seem best to those who put forward arguments in different forms.

If we attain some stability and can gain time, then much can happen that we cannot foresee today. There was nothing in the arithmetic of war in the summer of 1940 to show how victory was going to come to Britain. They stood firm. Time was on their side, and God in his infinite wisdom followed a course which brought victory. And I believe it was Divine guidance, because it was the decent thing that prevailed.

If we in the western world will stand firm today in acceptance of the principles to which we subscribed at San Francisco in 1945; if we are patient in our efforts to maintain peace by the collective strength of the western nations, and if we do not abandon principle for expediency, then I believe that in this balance of terror which nuclear coexistence has brought we may see the birth of a real and extending peace. Precise definitions, strict adherence to principles, with all the nations of the world committed to the same principles of freedom, with patience in carrying forward the cause of peace, may still offer hope in the face of this dreadful terror.

Mr. O. C. Trainor (Winnipeg South): My hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) in his speech this afternoon saw fit to castigate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for a rather mild criticism of Soviet statesmen. At the same time he utterly ignored the violent vituperation of Soviet statesmen against the western nations, in the Soviet equivalent of Billingsgate.

Mr. Nicholson: But the minister is a Christian.

Mr. Trainor: All right, but why ask for a different standard for the communists? After all, he is a world statesman; he should be compared with other statesmen.

Mr. Speaker, one of the more curious phenomena of a debate on foreign affairs in this house is the unanimity with which the C.C.F. party attacks the United States, engaging gleefully in the seemingly pointless pastime of plucking the eagle's tail feathers. I say this phenomenon is curious because at first sight there does not appear to be any logical explanation. However, on reflection two possible reasons present themselves.

In the first place the United States represents the antithesis of the socialist ideal. It violates with impunity every tenet of the socialist creed, and moreover has the extremely bad taste to enjoy conspicuous material success while doing so. It must be galling to devote all one's waking moments and even one's dreams to contemplating the glories of a socialist utopia only to find that one's next door neighbour already possesses everything one could have imagined in one's fondest dreams and more, without benefit of the socialist's magic wand and, what is worse, under the aegis of that hated system, free enterprise. To realize that while the whole world is perilously balanced on the verge of bankruptcy this hated exemplar of free enterprise is able to provide the billions required to arrest the plunge into chaos; to have to accept favours from one's ideological enemy is gall and wormwood indeed.

The second reason is less tangible and probably springs from a vague ideological sympathy with the communist world. This sympathy probably springs from the common ancestry of socialism and communism. It should never be forgotten that Karl Marx was one of the earliest exponents of the socialist dogma in the western world. It is true that the Fabians, to whom our C.C.F. brethren probably profess a spiritual affinity, rejected the cold logic of Marxian conclusions and preferred a watered down version, more palatable if less logical. Nevertheless there probably remains a certain fellow feeling for the Russian branch of the family, as misguided and rather crude fellows, to be sure, but still repositories of the original, if now perverted, socialist gospel.

It is therefore quite natural that the United States should be regarded as the reactionary enemy of all things revered by the socialists. On the other hand while there is a vociferous and, I believe, sincere condemnation of the totalitarian aspects of Russian communism, nevertheless, in so far as the communist party line reflects the ideal of socialism, which it does in some respects, it meets with approval and adherence from all socialists. This provides a plausible explanation, at least, as to why the C.C.F. party supports the cause of communist China and condemns the position of the United States in respect of the dispute over the status of Formosa.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in attempting to assess the role which Canada should assume in world affairs the primary and overriding consideration is full recognition of the general, central and elementary fact that the world, for the moment and for the foreseeable future, is divided into two hostile and irreconcilable camps. On the one hand we have a monolithic aggregation of power represented by the U.S.S.R. and the satellite countries, and opposed to it a bloc of the free nations of the world headed by the United States.

For practical purposes it has to be recognized that the United States possesses the only effective concentration of power in the free world capable of opposing the Soviet juggernaut. Consequently it is imperative in the interests of self-preservation that all the free nations, including Canada, give unstinted support to their real protector against the rapacity of Soviet imperialism. This does not mean a slavish obedience to United States domination in respect of over-all policy. We should reserve for ourselves freedom of expression through diplomatic channels on such matters as may involve our interests.

Throughout all this, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we must never lose sight of the one paramount consideration that the only effective force precenting communist world domination today is the United States of America. We must proceed on the assumption that the United States will not precipitate an atomic war, and on the equally certain assumption that if there was not a risk of effective retaliation the Soviet union would not hesitate to start such a war tomorrow. Truly, Mr. Speaker, we walk on the verge of the abyss, but I see no reason or no wisdom in the advice of those who would have us scorn the handrail.

In the world's continuing crisis the Eisenhower administration continues to exercise an admirable restraint, a refusal to be carried away by predictions either of inevitable war or of an easy peace. The communist enigma leaves us no choice but to prepare for the worst, but it does not commit us to accept the worst. We must not cease to explore whatever roads may lead us away from war. In this objective we can rest assured that we shall have the sincere and unqualified support of President Eisenhower. We should not allow ourselves to be misled by the vaporings of certain irresponsible sections of United States public opinion. Such men are dangerous, and we may thank God that United States foreign policy is based on saner counsels.

In the welter of speculation on Soviet intentions that is going on in the world today one recognizes as valid Sir Winston Churchill's description, that they are "a mystery wrapped in an enigma". In this welter of speculation by columnists and editorial writers only one clear lesson emerges, that of the futility of speculation where the totalitarian mind is concerned.

The confusion of the experts in this connotation is strikingly apparent. The disgrace of Malenkov and the emergence of Khrushchev —or perhaps Marshal Zhukov or even Marshal Bulganin—as the major contender for Stalin's power merely emphasizes the danger of making absolute predictions of what effects may follow from communist causes. Other experts argue that Khrushchev is already too old to establish himself as Russia's absolute ruler. They point out that it was Khrushchev who nominated Bulganin for the premiership. It was Beria who. only two years ago, nominated Malenkov for the same post. These facts, it is claimed, point to a continuing struggle for power, and consequently the danger that Russia will take serious risks of war has decreased.

Similar expert disagreements exist over the question of red China's intentions in the Formosa straits. As we have reason to know from experience, a totalitarian world is one in which words are divorced from meaning, in which war can mean peace and peace war, and in which the objective has been abolished by decree. Whether or not Peking's bellicose words mean actual bellicose intentions, or whether in the face of United States force a de facto cease-fire will be permitted to prevail, is something no one in the west really knows.

In this atmosphere of confusion what may Canada do to promote a modus vivendi between these tremendous conflicting forces? It seems to me that we would do well to promote the mobilization of the British commonwealth of nations as a moral force for peace. Of course, the commonwealth is ill-equipped to enter the lists in a struggle where naked power is the criterion of effectiveness. Nevertheless if the commonwealth could be organized to speak with effective unanimity in world councils the moral effect would be incalculable. Maybe this is but an idle dream; but if any member of the commonwealth is fitted to play the leading role in such a rapprochement, surely it is Canada.

In view of the march and countermarch of conflicting ideas across the world stage, what possible conclusions or at least tentative guides to action exist? There are, of course, the obvious conclusions, the ones that have become clichés. The west must keep up its guard; it must remain strong and firm; it must turn its back on appeasement. With those statements it is impossible to disagree, for if we should forget them we are lost. But they are not enough. They take no cognizance of the possibilities for settlement by negotiation, slender though they be. They are not flexible enough to take advantage of opportunities for easing world tensions as such opportunities may occur.

If one might be permitted to paraphrase slightly an old watchword, the western nations should trust in God, negotiate and keep their powder dry or, perhaps I should say, keep their atomic nuclei fissionable.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder whether my good neighbour would permit a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Trainor: Certainly.

Mr. Nicholson: Would he not agree that we must make up our minds very soon whether or not we are going to live in the same world with the communists? Would he not agree with his leader? Would he not agree that we should make a special effort to live in peace with them?

Mr. Ferguson: The Russians are trying to make up our minds for us. What is wrong with you. Don't be ridiculous.

Mr. Trainor: I would suggest to my hon. friend that the surest way of living in peace with the Russians is to make absolutely certain that we run no great risk if they attack us, by keeping strong.

Mr. A. M. Fraser (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should first of all like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the admirable exposition of policy which he presented to the house when he opened this debate. It was a most clear and comprehensive statement of the difficulties that face the free nations in the explosive area of the Far East.

I was particularly impressed by the skilful course which he charted through the shoals and shallows of the Formosa straits. If I may do so, Mr. Speaker, it is to the Formosan question that I should like to address my remarks tonight, and especially to the policy enunciated by the United States with reference to Formosa and the Pescadores. I do this because I think all hon. members will agree that that policy is fraught with all-important consequences not only for the United States but for this country, and indeed for all the free countries of the world. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has so clearly put it, United States policy on Formosa is of vital concern to Canada.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that in order to set forth this policy we should go back to the statement made by President Eisenhower in his message to congress of January 24 of this year. It was in that statement that this policy was clearly enunciated. We should note also, I think, that this policy regarding Formosa is based upon the defensive treaty of last December between the United States and the government of Chiang Kai-shek, a treaty which was ratified by the United States Senate on February 9 of this year.

As I see it, the immediate objective of that policy was to prevent Peking from attacking Formosa, and to draw a line across which red China was warned she would advance at her peril. But we lose sight too easily, I think, of the other side of the picture, the second aspect of this policy. This policy of the United States not only warns Peking but it restrains Chiang Kai-shek from attacking the Chinese mainland. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this policy, by which the United States has put communist China on notice, is predicated upon the belief that the loss of Formosa to Peking would be a great disaster. If we consider the matter for a moment I think the soundness of this view is irresistible.

From the strategic point of view Formosa forms a vital link in that Pacific chain of defences which stretches from the Aleutians to the Philippines, and if Formosa were lost that chain would be snapped. Australia and New Zealand, sister countries in the commonwealth, would be in peril and indeed a break-out of the communist forces into the wide expanse of the Pacific would become a real possibility. Second, from the psychological point of view the fall of Formosa would be a very harsh blow to the confidence which the peoples of Asia are placing in the pledged word and the military strength of the United States. It would in particular, I think, undermine the confidence of the Chinese who are living in other parts of Asia, outside the mainland of China, and outside Formosa; in southeast Asia, for example. Such then, as I see them, are the main features of this United States policy.

I would next like to discuss the two main lines of criticism which have been directed against this policy. With the first of these lines I am disposed to agree. This first ground of criticism is that the line which has been drawn by the United States is too blurred; it is not precise enough or definite enough, because it involves the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu as well as Formosa and the Pescadores, and because the United States has not definitely stated whether or not it will defend those two islands. Mr. Dulles, the secretary of state, has told us that they will not be defended as such, but they may be defended if the United States conceives that a red Chinese attack on them is a preliminary to an assault on Formosa and the Pescadores.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree with this view. I believe it would have been better if the line could have been drawn more definitely, more precisely. At the same time, however, I think we must try to understand the motives that lay behind the United States decision with regard to Quemoy and Matsu. As I see them, there may have been perhaps three reasons. The strategic reason, I think, was probably the least important of them. The position of these islands does, of course, enable a blockade to be maintained on Amoy and Foochow, and particularly enables supplies of jet fuel, for instance, coming by sea to be intercepted. This fact is of considerable importance, in view of the long haul across Asia from Russia, which is the only practical alternative.

More important, however, than the strategic reason is, I think, the diplomatic, the fact that the United States wanted to retain the freedom of manœuvre, to use these two islands as a lever as it were with which to obtain the future acceptance of a cease-fire in Formosa. It may be claimed if such a pledge were made by Peking it might afterwards be repudiated, but in that case, of course, Peking would appear before the world condemned as a violator of the pledge. Then the moral case of the United States would be unassailable.

So much, then, for the first criticism to which United States policy has been subjected, a criticism with which, as I have said, I have a measure of agreement. The second ground of criticism is one which I cannot endorse. This is the ground which says that President Eisenhower's message to congress and the policy which is based on it mean a threat of war and are a provocation to communist China. I cannot agree with that, Mr. Speaker. In this connection, I should like to quote two or three extracts from the speech delivered by the President to congress on January 24, as reported in the New York Times of January 25:

> The most important objective of our nation's foreign policy is to safeguard the security of the United States by establishing and procuring a just and honourable peace. In the western Pacific a situation is developing in the Formosa straits that seriously imperils the peace and our security.

Not a word there about aggression, but rather defence of the United States and security. He went on:

> In the interest of peace, therefore, the United States must remove any doubt regarding our readiness to fight if necessary to preserve the vital stake of the free world in a free Formosa, and to engage in whatever operations may be required to carry out that purpose.

Later in the same speech he added:

> Again I say that we would welcome action by the United Nations which might in fact bring an end to the active hostilities in the area. This critical situation has been created by the choice of the Chinese communists, not by us. Their offensive military intent has been flaunted to the whole world by words and by deeds. Just as they created the situation, so they can end it, if they so choose.

The policy expressed in those words was overwhelmingly endorsed by the congress, in the House of Representatives by a vote of 409 to 3 and in the Senate by a vote of 85 to 3. I think it is clear, Mr. Speaker, from these quotations from the message on which the United States policy was based that that policy is not intended to threaten war but to safeguard peace, that its object is not to defend Chiang Kai-shek but to defend the peace of the world.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that any attempt to identify this policy with the defence of the Chiang Kai-shek regime appears to me an extremely superficial estimate of the situation in the Far East. It has been argued in this house that the Chiang Kai-shek regime is rotten, and that by allying itself with that regime the United States is allying itself with a government that does not deserve to exist but should be banished into exile, and that therefore the United States is pursuing a wrong policy. But as has been expressed by other speakers in this debate, and more particularly this evening by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), no matter what government were on Formosa the United States seventh fleet would still be defending that island today; because it is the island, not the government, that is of the essence of the question.

So far as that goes, though I hold no brief for Chiang Kai-shek nor for his entourage; though I admit they are no plaster saints, yet they do not in my mind compare unfavourably with the Chinese in Peking. I would not like to live under either of these governments, but if I had to choose I think I would choose the regime of Chiang Kai-shek.

In what I have said I hope I have succeeded in showing that the intentions of the United States have not been aggressive. I believe the peaceful intentions of the United States have been convincingly demonstrated in recent months by several factors. First, let me recall to the house that the United States approved New Zealand's resolution in the United Nations security council, inviting Peking to discuss a cease-fire. The United States could have vetoed that invitation, but it did not do so. That invitation was allowed to go forward by Russia, as well. Yet on January 31 it was bluntly rejected by Peking.

Again, not only did the United States persuade Chiang Kai-shek to evacuate the Tachens and thereby relieve an explosive situation, but it actually provided its seventh fleet to help carry out that evacuation. Moreover, though subjected as we understand it to very strong pressure by the Chiang Kai-shek government, Mr. Dulles has steadfastly refused to comply with the repeated requests of Chiang Kai-shek to give an unconditional guarantee to defend Quemoy and Matsu as such—and I stress the words "as such". I believe also there are grounds for believing that Peking could have Quemoy and Matsu in return for a cease-fire, but up to now it has rejected all overtures for a cease-fire. There may even be indications also that the United States is moving—slowly, perhaps, but moving—toward acceptance of a two-Chinas principle.

Bearing all these things in mind I think we must agree that the United States, far from provoking war and far from taking an aggressive attitude, has gone out of its way to try to obtain a peaceful settlement of the Formosa question. In contrast, let us look at the attitude of Peking. First of all there was its rejection in very summary terms of the United Nations invitation to the cease-fire discussions. That rejection came on February 3. Likewise there was its intransigent reaction to diplomatic overtures which, we understand, have been carried out by the United Kingdom, by Mr. Nehru of India, and possibly also by Russia for a cease-fire in the Formosa straits.

We know, too, that the Chinese in Peking have been claiming that Chiang Kai-shek's withdrawal from the Tachens was a victory for them. And we are all too familiar with the repeated boasts emanating from Peking that the communist regime will take Formosa by the end of this year. Bellicose actions unfortunately are in keeping with the aggressive policy which Peking has been pursuing almost uninterruptedly since its intervention in the Korean conflict. Indeed, the Korean truce has been represented by Peking propaganda as a victory for communist arms. Likewise Peking has hailed the Geneva settlement of the Indo-Chinese war as a victory for herself.

It does seem, Mr. Speaker, that these successes, or pseudo-successes, have intoxicated the Chinese communists with perhaps an exalted idea of their armed might. This mood in which they find themselves is very dangerous, because when men are intoxicated it is very difficult to reason with them. That, I think, is one of the reasons the situation in the Formosa straits is so terribly dangerous. The peace-loving governments must redouble their efforts to avert an explosion, to persuade Peking to adopt a more reasonable, more receptive attitude.

I am all in favour of unremitting negotiation, no matter how unlikely success may seem. Negotiation must be continued because the alternative is too horrible to contemplate; but negotiation must be accompanied by preparedness. We must not relax our vigilance; we must not drop our guard. A clear line must be taken, must be drawn and must be maintained. But if war does come—please God it may not—over the Formosa question, then as I see it the war guilt will not be with Washington but with Peking.

Now, as I have said, every possible effort must be made to prevent such a war arising. The immediate task is to negotiate a cease-fire. This would provide a breathing space, and we understand that efforts are being made to that end now. But a breathing space, though it is well so far as it goes, does not go far enough. A long-range solution must be found. Perhaps a beginning could be made by the cession of Quemoy and Matsu in return for a pledge from Peking to keep hands off Formosa; but a long-range solution must be of larger scope and in all modesty—for I know, of course, that the best brains in the armed services of all the countries of the world are engaged in this problem at present—may I make a tentative suggestion that might perhaps be worth considering.

I think, first of all, that long-range solution must be based upon some form of neutralization of Formosa, perhaps under United Nations guarantee. At the present time, of course, Formosa is in effect neutralized but by the United States. A United Nations guarantee might be more pacific, less dangerous; but I cannot agree with those who would suggest that Chiang Kai-shek be exiled along with his 600,000 soldiers. It is a difficult thing to exile 600,000 men. I confess I do not know where they might go. I think the nationalists should be permitted to retain Formosa, at least for the time being, if under a United Nations guarantee. Eventually there might be the possibility of a plebiscite among Formosans themselves, not yet I think because I doubt very much whether they have reached the stage when they are capable of self-government, and to hand over a strategic island to the administration of inexperienced hands at such a dangerous juncture would be most imprudent. But eventually training might precede a plebiscite.

You will notice I have not mentioned a trusteeship, because a trusteeship would suggest grave practical difficulties. It is all very well to speak of United Nations trusteeship. Who is to be the trustee? Who is to administer the trusteeship? I confess I find it hard to see that there could be agreement on a trustee at the present time, and collective trusteeship would very probably lead to friction and disagreement among the trustees themselves. The old question would arise, quis custodiet ipsos custodes? Eventually, too, there might be the possibility of enabling communist China to give sufficient proof of her good intentions, of a change of heart and then the question of her admission to the United Nations might be reconsidered.

Together with these purely political suggestions, Mr. Speaker, there must of course, I fully agree, be the provision of economic and technical assistance along the lines of the Point Four program and the Colombo plan; and even more important, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out in his speech, there must be a wholehearted and sympathetic effort to encourage the peoples of southeast Asia and Formosa to develop democratic governments of their own under which they can live in peace and freedom. Only by these methods, military, political, economic and social, shall we be able to build up a true resistance to the onset of communism in the Far East. That must be done; otherwise, Mr. Speaker, the world balance of power might be upset, to the grave disadvantage of the freedom-loving nations.

If Formosa and southeast Asia were to fall under communism, either by invasion or by infiltration, then indeed the frontiers of freedom would be perilously narrowed.

On motion of Mr. Nesbitt the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: I am quite sure that hon. members would like to complete this debate before the Easter recess, as well as the other matters I announced the other night. Therefore, if there is any possibility that the debate on the resolution with respect to unemployment insurance may be completed on Monday, we shall go on with this debate on Monday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 4, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Fourth and fifth reports of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Cavers.

Mr. Speaker: As it is not intended to move concurrence in the report this day, is it agreed that the deputy clerk dispense with the reading of the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Third and final report of sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.—Mr. Cavers.

Mr. Speaker: The same observations apply in this case. Shall the deputy clerk dispense with the reading of the report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. F. L. Hanna (for Mr. Harrison) moved that the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Friday, April 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table copies in English and French of the white paper in connection with the budget for 1955-56. This procedure of tabling the white paper on the day before the budget was adopted three years ago and has, I believe, proved useful to hon. members.

If it meets with the approval of the house, I would move that it be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings so that hon. members will have an opportunity to study it before I deliver the budget speech tomorrow night.

50433—168

I would also ask the consent of the house to have it printed in tomorrow's Hansard, together with the budget speech.

Mr. Speaker: By leave, is this motion agreed to?

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

TEXTILES—NEW METHODS OF TREATMENT

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. Has the federal government, through the Department of Trade and Commerce or any of its departments, crown companies or agencies, studied the possibilities of assisting the textile industry by using radioactive substances?
2. If so, with what results to date?
3. Have any of the above departments, crown companies or government agencies experimented with textiles by treating same with silicons to tighten the weave and make cotton and wool durable?

Mr. Dickey:

1 and 2. While familiar with what has been done abroad, the national research council has not made any detailed study of the possibilities of assisting the textile industry by the use in Canada of radioactive substances.

3. Fairly widespread use is being made in Canadian textile mills of silicone finishes, especially on fabrics made from synthetics. The necessary research and development work on this problem has been done by the firms who manufacture silicone materials, and the details of their application and of the properties which they impart are matters of common knowledge to informed textile technicians.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT AIRCRAFT STORAGE

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Do Department of Transport aircraft pay the regular storage fees for aircraft stored at government civil airports?
2. If not, how is the cost of this storage defrayed?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. No. It is considered that if the department were to charge itself for services rendered to itself, this would involve unnecessary and useless bookkeeping.

2. Such charges, if made, would be included in the revenues of the department and also in the expenses of aircraft operation and maintenance under the main vote "Airways and airports, operation and maintenance".

Questions

NATO—MILITARY TRAINING IN CANADA

Mr. Knowles:

1. Since the establishment of NATO, how many persons from countries other than Canada have received or are now receiving training in Canada under the provisions of any NATO agreements or arrangements?
2. From what countries have such persons come, how many in each case, and how many in each year, since the establishment of NATO?
3. What is the total amount spent to date for the training of such persons, including transportation, maintenance or any other costs met by Canada?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 5,510 as at 28th February 1955.

2. The following nations are participating under NATO agreements: United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Italy, Norway, Turkey and Portugal. Figures of trainees by country by year cannot be given without the permission of each nation.

3. $271,695,990.15 to 28th February 1955, including the provision of necessary capital facilities.

DRAGGER TYPE VESSELS, MARITIME PROVINCES

2. What was the total amount paid under this regulation to fishermen of Gloucester county, New Brunswick, for the period mentioned in question No. 1?
3. What was the total number of vessels entitled to assistance during this same period and how many of these vessels were affected under section 55, subsection (3) of the Fisheries Act restricting their fishing operations to outside the 12-mile limit?

Mr. MacNaught:

1 and 2. See below.

2. If so, what are the hours of duty and the hourly rate of wages in each case?

[Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).]

How much was paid out by the annuities branch of the Department of Labour for advertising government annuities, on radio, newspapers, periodicals and any other medium for each of the years 1949 to 1953 inclusive?

Mr. Gregg:

T.C.A. FLIGHTS, MOOSE JAW

Mr. Thatcher:

1. Have representations been recently received by Trans-Canada Air Lines, asking for a daily flight into the city of Moose Jaw?
2. If so, has Trans-Canada Air Lines considered these representations?
3. Has the company decided to make such a daily flight?
4. If not, for what reason?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. No.

4. The matter is to be again reviewed following completion of delivery of Viscount aircraft now on order which may make available the DC-3 time necessary for such a stop.

FEED SCREENINGS

Mr. Howe (Wellington-Huron):

1. How many carloads of feed screenings were shipped into the province of Ontario during the year 1954?
2. What was the grade of each carload shipped?

Mr. Dickey:

1. 400.

2. Carloads of feed screenings shipped into Ontario

(a) to Fort William/Port Arthur graded as follows: 61 carloads; 1 carload; 205 carloads; 1 Feed screenings; 2 Feed screenings; Uncleaned screenings.

(b) to Ontario points other than Fort William/Port Arthur graded as follows: 126 carloads; 7 carloads; 1 Feed screenings; Uncleaned screenings.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. What aircraft are operated by the Department of Transport?
2. What services do these aircraft perform?
3. Are they used to transport government officials, and, if so, how many times has this occurred during the past?
4. Are they used to transport members of the government, and, if so, how many times has this occurred during the past fiscal year?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Twenty-four aircraft are operated by the Department of Transport and consist of:—Douglas DC-3 (2); Lockheed 10-A (2); Beechcraft C18-S (1); de Havilland DH-114 (1); Bell helicopter 47D-1 (3); Lockheed 18-08A (2); Lockheed 12-A (2); Beechcraft D18-S (6); de Havilland DHC-2 (5).

2. Calibration of aids to navigation; inspection and development of airways, air routes and airports; investigation of accidents in remote areas; training to maintain or improve the skill and technical knowledge of departmental personnel; transportation. Helicopters are used for ship to shore transportation, ice patrol and reconnaissance from government ships in northern waters, and to familiarize technical officers of the department with the operation and maintenance of this type of aircraft.

3. These aircraft are used continually for departmental and government work. It is not practicable to state how many times in the past they have been used to transport government officials because since the department was organized in 1936 there have been thousands of flights. Precise information as to the number would necessitate the examination at district headquarters in various parts of Canada of the log books of departmental aircraft, and it is believed that some earlier log books are no longer available.

4. Yes—126.

STEVENSON AIRPORT, WINNIPEG

Mr. Churchill:

1. Is the Stevenson airport area to be enlarged?
2. If so, by how much and in what direction?
3. What is the area of the airport?
4. Are the present runways of this airport to be extended?
5. What distance are the ends of the present runways from the boundary of this airport?
6. What is the clearance from the side of the present runways to the boundary of this airport?
7. Are new runways to be built at Stevenson airport? If so, where and of what length?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Yes.

2. 1,720 acres to the north and west now being acquired.

3. 2,100 acres excluding the extensions mentioned above.

4. Yes.

5. The distances of the ends of the present runways from the present boundaries of the airport are:—Runway end 13, 2,100′; Runway end 31, 2,100′; Runway end 18, 1,150′; Runway 36, 3,300′; Runway 07, 950′ (under construction); Runway 25, 850′ (under construction.)

6. The minimum distance from the centre line of any runway to the nearest airport boundary is 800′, and the maximum distance is, in certain places, about 6,000′.

7. Yes. One new runway will eventually parallel the existing runway 18-36, and be located 5,000′ to the west thereof, and another will parallel the present runway 13-31 and be 5,000′ to the northeast thereof. Construction of these runways to an over-all length of 10,000′ may eventually be needed.

ATOMIC RADIATION—RESEARCH

Mr. Enfield:

1. Is any research being carried out by the Department of National Health and Welfare regarding the harmful effect of atomic radiation on humans?

2. Is any research being done in respect to radiation effects in Canada resulting from atom bomb tests that have taken place in the United States of America?

3. Do researchers know anything about the genetic effect on humans of such radiation?

Mr. Martin:

1. Yes. Radioactivity, of course, is not a new phenomenon. Since life first appeared on this planet, living beings have been exposed to cosmic and natural radiation. Thus it is not an essentially new influence which is being considered, but an increase in the intensity of an influence which has never been entirely absent.

It was not until the discovery of radium and X-rays over half a century ago that the possibility emerged that some human beings would be exposed to greater amounts of radiation than naturally occur in the everyday environment. Since that time, scientists have shown a continuing concern for the possible harmful effects of uncontrolled radiation. A system of protection has slowly developed, as is manifest by the precautions observed in the use of X-ray and radioactive materials and in the regulations governing the use of isotopes in this country since the war.

Problems associated with radiation have engaged the attention of officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of a number of other government agencies for more than ten years.

[Mr. Langlois (Gaspe).]

Experience gained during this period enabled Canada to pioneer in developing a promising advance in the treatment of cancer—the cobalt 60 beam therapy unit—which has since brought new hope to thousands of cancer victims and has received world-wide recognition. Many industrial uses of radioisotopes have also been developed in Canada, ranging all the way from testing the welds on enormous metal castings to controlling the thickness of paper as it comes through the paper-making machines. These isotopes have also been made available to other countries.

As a result, Canadian scientists have gained firsthand experience in the study of radiation effects and the development of adequate safeguards against them. On March 14 of this year, a reply was tabled which outlined some of the activities carried out by the department for the safe handling of radioactive materials.

The interest of the department in radiation, however, predates these more recent developments by several years. For example, since 1951 the department has accepted responsibility for the supervision of the use of radioactive isotopes in university and hospital laboratories and in industrial operations.

In carrying out this responsibility, a film monitoring service is maintained for the protection of persons working with radioactive isotopes. Advice is also provided during the planning stages of radioisotope laboratories in order that arrangements can be worked out for the safe handling of radioactive materials and for the disposal of radioactive waste in such a manner that there will be no danger of contamination. In addition, it is planned to provide training courses emphasizing the safe use of radiation.

Anticipating an increasing use in this country of radioactive materials for industrial and medical purposes, arrangements were made some time ago to send a senior physicist of the department to the United Kingdom for special training.

There is at all times continuing consultation between the Department of National Health and Welfare and other government agencies such as the national research council, the defence research board, and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, having an interest in this field.

As a result of all this joint effort, there is every reason to believe that the measures taken in this country for the protection of those persons who are likely to be exposed to radioactive materials are fully as effective as those carried out anywhere.

2. Yes. This research is carried out, not with particular reference to experiments being undertaken in any one country, but with reference to the effects of radiation, from whatever source it may come, occurring in the different regions of Canada.

3. Yes. The biological effects of increased radiation may be divided into two categories —the somatic effects, or those which lead to disease in the exposed individual; and the genetic effects, or those which cause changes, usually adverse, in his descendants. Any somatic effects which might arise would affect only the generation irradiated but genetic effects would show up in future generations.

As to somatic effects, it is the opinion of medical scientists that the most important results might be an increase in the incidence of certain malignant conditions, but these usually result from much higher radiation exposures than those which are now being considered.

With regard to the genetic effects, it has been established by experiments on certain rapidly-breeding lower forms of life, such as bacteria, plants, insects and small mammals, that genetic changes can be produced by exposure to radiation.

It is pointed out by geneticists that the characteristics transmitted from parents to offspring are determined by the structure of the genes. Certain genes produce certain characteristics, such as the colour of the eyes and so on. A particular gene may also be related to a physical or mental defect. It so happens that genes are capable of mutating or changing and that all such mutations, being permanent, are carried on in later generations.

In the exposure of experimental animals to radiation, there has been observed an increase in the rate at which these mutations occur. Usually no harmful effect shows up until, at some future time, mating takes place between two animals carrying the same mutated gene. Since a study of genetic changes in humans would inevitably take several generations, the belief that radiation might cause genetic damage in humans is based mainly on the evidence that it does so in other forms of life.

In determining genetic effects on man there are two principal difficulties. First, most mutations will remain hidden until one individual receives the same mutated gene from both parents. Secondly, naturally occurring genes for recessive defects and abnormalities are already numerous in the population. Neither these naturally occurring mutant genes nor those that might be induced by radiation are likely to produce an effect in the children of the individuals carrying them unless the parents have received the same defect from a common ancestor.

In general, there has been much misunderstanding between the possible hazards to human health arising from weapon trials and those that would result from nuclear warfare, with the result that some of the more sensational statements made on this subject have been confusing.

Since there remain a number of unanswered questions in this field, there is a need for continuing research and investigation into the genetic problem. Increasingly large numbers of people are being exposed to increasing amounts of radiation because of the wider use of radioactive materials in industry, research and medicine. In addition, there has been a slight, though appreciable increase in radiation all over the world as a result of the weapon tests.

However, the best scientific evidence available, indicates that it is most unlikely that any significant genetic effect would result from the increased radioactivity that has occurred.

Canadian scientific experience in this connection is confirmed by that of research scientists in other countries. For example, in a statement in the British House of Commons on March 22 last, the minister of health, the Right Hon. Iain Macleod stressed these points:

(1) Radiation does produce genetic effects and the radioactivity of the planet has increased slightly as the result of nuclear bomb explosions.

(2) Present knowledge is insufficient to fix precisely the level of radioactivity above which genetic damage would significantly affect the well-being of populations.

(3) Research in genetic changes is necessarily and inevitably slow in producing conclusive results.

(4) It is extremely unlikely that the increase in radioactivity which has appeared up to the present will have any appreciable genetic effect.

While the genetic problem is exceedingly complex, the important factors are known and Canada possesses at the present time the scientific potential to carry on continuing investigations in this field. The Department of National Health and Welfare is pursuing research efforts with a view to the further development of a long-range program for the collection and study of human data that will aid in the assessment of this problem.

The department is carrying out a systematic and continuing examination of all evidence available in order to ascertain all of the facts in connection with increased radiation. As the program develops further, it will involve, among other things, the constant examination of a variety of materials to determine the level of potentially dangerous radioactivity.

In furthering this project, full advantage will continue to be taken of the experience of outstanding Canadian scientists who have a particular knowledge of this field and every effort will be made to co-ordinate this long-term study with Canada's over-all public health program.

The government is fully aware of the problems posed in the field of public health by atomic developments and will continue to take proper steps to assess progressively the possible hazard to human health of increased radiation background.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

STANLEY LOPTSON

Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all letters and communications received by the Minister of Trade and Commerce since the 15th of March, 1955, relating to the appointment of Mr. Stanley Loptson to the board of grain commissioners.

[Mr. Martin.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and/or the Minister of National Revenue, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke to me about this motion. I would ask to have it stand for today.

Mr. Speaker: No. 5 stands.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Department of National Revenue or the minister or any official of the said department, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said department.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must apologize. I now see there is a typographical error. The wording in motion No. 6 was intended to read, "Department of National Defence". In view of this typographical error, and as it takes the department by surprise, perhaps it would be better if this motion were to stand.

Mr. Speaker: No. 6 stands.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO MEETING WITH PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Is the Prime Minister arranging a meeting with the premier of Saskatchewan and some of his colleagues during their visit to Ottawa in connection with the federal-provincial meeting beginning April 26, to discuss the draft agreement regarding the proposed South Saskatchewan river dam, presented to the Saskatchewan government by the Minister of Agriculture last autumn and which was accepted, in principle, by the provincial government?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to the question as drawn I might perhaps, because there are some parts of it that I could not answer in an affirmative way, make a short negative answer, but I do not think that would be satisfactory. As a matter of fact the premier of Saskatchewan wrote to me last month to see if arrangements could be made for some of my colleagues and myself to meet with some of his colleagues and himself at the time of the preliminary federal-provincial meetings to discuss the proposed construction of the South Saskatchewan dam. In answer to Premier Douglas I quoted my reply to a question asked in the House of Commons on January 13 of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), concerning that subject as reported at page 134 of Hansard. That quotation was as follows:

> There has been no tenative agreement arrived at, Mr. Speaker, as the basis of a distribution of costs because there has not yet been any decision by the federal government that it could take the responsibility of recommending this project to parliament as one that would be in the national interests of Canada generally.

I advised Premier Douglas that that statement still represents the federal government's position as it stands, and that I did not think that, even if we were able to reach a tentative agreement as the basis of the distribution of costs of the project as a joint undertaking, that would enable us to make at the present time a decision one way or the other about the project, especially in view of the fact that we would be in the midst of discussions about the whole problem of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. I added that if he wished to have me and a small committee meet him and some of his colleagues immediately after our preliminary federal-provincial meeting, I would of course arrange one and would do my best to fit it in at a time that would suit his convenience.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT AS TO RESPONSIBILITY FOR EMPLOYABLE UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Will the Prime Minister indicate to the house whether or not it is the intention of the government to attempt to reach an agreement with the provinces at the April meeting regarding the responsibility for employable unemployed?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not like to say anything about what will be done at this preliminary meeting. It is a meeting of the ten provincial premiers with, I assume, some of their advisers and representatives of the federal government. Now, that will not be a conference that will be directed by the Prime Minister of Canada. It will be a conference of the heads of the ten provincial governments and the federal government. We are all interested in what will best serve the interests of Canadians, and I assume that we shall do our best to reach such decisions then, or at a later time, as will be in the best interests of Canada generally.

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): In connection with the dominion-provincial conference which is to be held later this month, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any agenda has been drawn up, or is it being conceived simply as a conference to frame an agenda for a later conference?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): It was conceived as a conference to frame an agenda for a later conference, but that is not exclusive. That was the tenor of the invitation to the provincial premiers, and the invitation was accepted without there being any indication as to whether or not any other matters would be raised.

Mr. Fleming: May I take it from the Prime Minister's answer that the government has no objection to discussing any question at this preliminary conference that may be raised there?

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh, the federal government would not take the position that it could refuse to discuss any question that any of the premiers wanted to discuss at that time. We are meeting as Canadian officials, and it would not be conducive to a satisfactory tenor of the discussions for the federal government to take any attitude that would be looked upon as unreasonable by any of those attending the conference.

Mr. Rowe: Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether there has been any communication between the premiers of the different provinces as to the agenda?

Mr. St. Laurent: That I could not say. There has been no communication with me about that, but I could not say whether as between each other there have been communications. I have not been so advised.

Mr. Rowe: No; I meant between the premiers of the different provinces and the Prime Minister of Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, to the best of my recollection of the terms of the answers received there has not been. I would not want to assert that there is no allusion to anything else in any one of those letters, because I would want to look at them again; but to the best of my recollection, as I received them, I have found no suggestion other than an acceptance to come to this preliminary meeting to arrange for the main conference.

Mr. Hees: May I ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any recommendations from provincial premiers that unemployment be discussed at this meeting?

Mr. St. Laurent: I could not make any firmer answer to the question than the one I have just made to the previous question that was just put to me.

TRADE

OIL—REPLY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the house in regard to the reply of the government of the United States in response to the communication read to this house some time ago asking that they reconsider the restriction on oil moving from Canada to the United States?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge we have not the permission of the United States to make that reply public, although we asked for it some ten days ago.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might add a word. As I understand it, one of the difficulties is that the United States government itself wishes to comment on and reply to the representations we have made. At the end of last week they asked for a delay until their reply to our representations had been drafted and submitted to us, when both documents could be tabled. I am not sure whether anything has happened this morning, but I shall be glad to look into it as soon as I get back to my office.

Mr. Drew: Without entering into a debate on the subject, may I point out that the house is adjourning for Easter the day after tomorrow, and since this subject is one which involves a principle of immense importance and may have a wider application than the movement of oil, I would hope it might be suggested that it would be appropriate to have this information before we adjourn on Wednesday.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BENEFIT RATES, ADJUST CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act and, inter alia,

(a) to increase benefit rates, as well as to provide for certain changes in the duration of both regular and seasonal benefits;

(b) to adjust the contributions, and to change contributions from a daily basis to a weekly earnings basis, and benefits from a daily to a weekly basis;

(c) to provide a graduated scale of allowable earnings in place of present provisions related to casual earnings and non-compensable days and,

(d) to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to give the committee this afternoon a fairly full explanation of what it is desired to accomplish under this resolution.

In introducing this resolution I make no apology for the fact that it is the second one under this heading recommended to this house in a period of less than 12 weeks. This measure today is by no means an afterthought of the one I presented in January. Instead, these and the January amendments are all one of the same piece. The reasons why I did not bring these forward in January were, first, that we wanted still more time to study the larger changes represented by this resolution before presenting them to the house. We wanted parliament to have ample opportunity for a full and detailed consideration of the proposed larger changes, after they came to this house. We wanted the item related to the improved supplementary benefits to go into effect in January so as to make its impact upon this winter's serious unemployment, which it has. So, in the light of those considerations, the only way I could see was to divide the task into two parts when seeking the necessary legislative approval. If and when the bill, based upon this resolution, receives royal assent, then the January amendment will have been absorbed and will be administered as part of the new consolidated act. As study on these matters was in progress I was curious to see what was in the minds of those who were here when the present act was passed through the various stages of this parliament.

I found it very interesting and, I think, useful reading. The first resolution, corresponding to the one we have here today was introduced by my predecessor, Hon. Norman McLarty on July 16, 1940.

I am going to quote from part of that resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a bill to enact a scheme of national unemployment insurance to be administered by a commission appointed by the governor in council, and to create an unemployment insurance fund from contributions from specified persons and from moneys provided by parliament for the payment of insurance benefits, to be administered by the commission . . .

That was the main part of the resolution. There are patches of Mr. McLarty's speech that I find of special interest:

> It has received in principle the approval of every section of this house. It has received the consent of every province in the dominion. It passed the parliament at Westminster within the last two weeks in less than nineteen minutes of debate.

Then further on:

> At the time the resolution was passed asking the parliament at Westminster to confer the necessary power to enact this legislation, we were at war. We are at war today; but I suggest that the particular occasion has not changed in so far as the desirability of this measure of social legislation is concerned.

I am sure it is very difficult for us today to put ourselves back into the dangerous atmosphere of that 16th day of July in 1940 when Mr. McLarty was talking about that first resolution. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said Friday evening:

> There was nothing in the arithmetic of war in the summer of 1940 to show how victory was going to come to Britain.

It is inspiring therefore to read how under the dangers of that summer this government with the unanimous backing of parliament was clearing the ground by amending the British North America Act and introducing a resolution that made possible what Mr. McLarty called "this measure of social legislation". I have read the debates of that day and there are enlightening passages. One is greatly tempted of course to quote at length but I shall refrain from doing so and read just a few extracts at random. Mr. McLarty said:

> The total number of workers in 1941 who will be under this act is 2,100,000.

The figure today is of course around 4,000,000. Then he went on to say:

> It is almost trite to suggest that an unemployment insurance measure does not exercise its full benefit at a time when employment is at a low level. Necessarily the fund which must be created can best be created in a period of high employment. On July 1 this year employment in this country was higher than it has ever been at any time in our history.

Hon. R. B. Hanson, then leader of the opposition and representing in this house the great constituency of York-Sunbury, is reported on page 1562 of Hansard as having said:

> This scheme must be on a sound actuarial basis, and we must have concrete evidence that such is the fact. It will not do to adopt any scheme or plan which is simply a device for transmitting money raised by general taxation or borrowing.

And again:

> There is a class of workers in this country who may be called "safe" employees. Perhaps that is not very well put. There are those in "safe" employment in this country who, under any scheme, if they are brought under the act . . . will be taxed for the benefit of those who are engaged in what might be termed the "exposed" positions.

Mr. Hanson here outlined the whole idea behind the insurance plan. Then the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) is reported at page 1658 of Hansard, still dealing with unemployment insurance, as saying:

> I have always supported it, not only on this occasion but every time it has been brought up in the house. As a matter of fact, as a member of organized labour of long standing I supported this principle long before it was accepted by many in this house. But to say that it is not a cure for all our social ills, and even to say it is not a cure for unemployment, is only stating a fact. There is something it does; as far as it goes it is a planned and orderly way of dealing with a social problem and to that extent I think it should have the approval of everyone who believes in dealing with these matters in an orderly, planned manner.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), speaking for the Social Credit party, is reported on page 1662 of Hansard as follows:

> I do not believe that our group will be found in opposition to this legislation. Broadly speaking, under the present economic setup, it will help to some extent to relieve unemployment so far as financing the unemployed is concerned.

I need not go on to repeat what was said about monetary policy. Finally I should like to give this summary by Mr. McLarty:

> The surest foundation on which to base democratic government is a happy and contented people. Nothing militates more against happiness and contentment than fear.

Then referring to the passing of the act he said:

> This done, it will be recorded of the present generation that . . . we were not unconscious of our duty and our obligation to promote the welfare and happiness of our own people.

That ends my quotations. All of this was under 15 years ago. Ever since then I am glad to say that this contributory social measure has retained the full support that it had in 1940 of all parties represented in this house. It was a new plan and new and difficult ground had to be broken, but whenever it became quite clear that it could be improved to meet more effectively the conditions experienced by our Canadian workers this government has recommended that such improvements be made.

So the present act was passed in its original form by parliament on August 7, 1940. The original measure set an upper limit on salaried workers coming under the plan of $2,000 and provided these benefits:

> A weekly maximum for a single person of $12.24 and for a person with a dependent a weekly maximum of $14.40.

I should like to indicate the principal changes which have been made and the years in which they were made. I refer to them because they were important changes. The Hon. Humphrey Mitchell in 1943 brought in changes that eased the conditions for requalifying in a second benefit period; raised the insurable limits for salaried workers from $2,000 to $2,400 a year; and brought under insurance all workers paid by the hour, day, piece or mile, regardless of the amount of yearly earnings.

In 1946 Mr. Mitchell again brought in changes which broadened the interpretation of a dependent; increased the allowable subsidiary earnings for claimants from $1 to $1.50 a day; and extended the coverage to seamen—both deep sea and inland waters.

In 1948 Mr. Mitchell brought in changes which added a higher contribution class and increased maximum weekly benefits to $14.40, single rate, and $18.30, dependency rate; again widened the definition of a dependent and raised the ceiling for salaried workers from $2,400 to $3,120 a year.

In 1950 during the illness of Mr. Mitchell these changes were brought in by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). They were important changes because they incorporated a completely new provision to help take care of the difficulties arising from our Canadian climate. The changes in 1950 added still further contribution classes and again increased maximum weekly benefit rates to $16.20, single rate, and $21, dependency rate; provided for supplementary benefit payments in the winter months, January 1 to March 31; raised the ceiling from $3,120 to $4,800; and extended coverage to the logging industry in all parts of Canada.

In 1952 I brought in changes which increased the maximum weekly benefits to $17.10, single rate, and $24, dependency rate, and reduced the waiting period from eight days to five days.

In 1953 I brought in changes which provided for continuing benefit payments to persons who become incapacitated after starting to receive unemployment benefits.

In January, 1955, changes were introduced which increased the duration of supplementary benefit payments and brought up the rates to the level of regular benefits; and now we are proposing further changes in the plan.

Mr. Chairman, in all the changes and amendments I have mentioned above, several objectives have constantly been kept in view. One of them is that the insurance plan shall be maintained on a sound actuarial basis; that both the employment and insurance phases of the plan shall be adapted to meet Canada's special conditions; that the bulk of contributions be paid by the two parties directly benefited—workers and management —with the taxpayers at large making the minority contribution and bearing administration costs; that higher benefits be provided a worker with a family, compared with those to the worker with no dependents; that the benefits designed to alleviate the hardships of unemployment should not be of a nature that would lessen the incentive to work when jobs are available; and that an important accompaniment of the plan is to help workers find suitable jobs through the national employment service, and management find suitable workers.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that Canada can take a good deal of satisfaction out of the effective way in which this plan has been working out for the benefit of Canadian workers. Since Mr. McLarty's time about an average of 3,500,000 workers have come under it. It has also been to the advantage of the 250,000 employers who participate in the act and it has also been of great advantage, to my mind, to all the rest of us.

Benefits from this plan, payable to the unemployed workers entitled to them, regardless of their other resources, have helped to maintain purchasing power and greater stability in local labour markets especially during periods of temporary unemployment.

They have taken some of the burden of relieving the unemployment costs of the municipalities and public welfare agencies.

This has been done by a method that preserves the self-respect of the worker, because when he is out of a job he gets a weekly benefit that is not charity but something he has helped pay for himself.

During the immediate past fiscal year, for the first 11 months some $210 million was paid in insurance benefit, with $35 million in February last.

All told, from the inception of the scheme to the end of February of this year insured workers have received almost one billion dollars.

The plan has done something more, and, of primary importance. It has made available, through the national employment service, facilities for enabling workers to find jobs and for employers to find workers.

This is a service that is free, that is available to insured and non-insured workers alike, and that is given without any discrimination because of race, colour, national origin, politics or religion.

From July 1941 to the present date the employment service helped to place nearly 14 million Canadian workers.

However, over the years the act in its present form has become somewhat complicated. Simplification has been needed that workers and employers might more readily understand its terms and that the administration by the commission might be facilitated.

Experience has shown that the amount of protection at present given to certain groups of workers is not enough.

This is particularly true of young workers who have not been in insured employment very long and of workers who are not able to secure steady employment.

Also, some benefit rates are no longer in line with earnings and they need to be raised.

The new seasonal benefits initiated in January last should be made to apply to future winter seasons.

There did appear to be the need of providing for a better income maintenance plan.

It is also desirable that the amount of work it puts upon employers should be kept to the minimum necessary, and that efficient and economical administration should be possible.

These objectives have been kept in view in the proposed revision of the legislation.

The most important changes concern the contributions and benefits.

The contribution rates and the basis on which they are paid have both been revised. At present, workers made their contributions to the fund on a daily rate basis.

In the lower wage brackets these rates are a considerably larger percentage of the worker's earnings than in the higher brackets.

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask permission to insert some tables in Hansard, if I have unanimous consent to do so, because it will be seen more clearly by hon. members if it is tabled.

The Chairman: Has the hon. minister leave to have the tables incorporated in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gregg: The tables follow:

Old Supplementary Benefit Rates (See "Weekly Benefit"—Table I)

(x) Prior to January 10, 1955, Old Supplementary Benefit rates were an average of about 70% of those shown in Columns under "x".

New Seasonal Benefit Rates (See "Weekly Benefit"—Tables I and II)

From January 10, 1955, till proposed Bill becomes law, New "Supplementary" Benefit rates are 100% of those shown in "x".
After the proposed Bill becomes law, New "Seasonal" Benefit rates will be 100% of those shown in "z".

It is proposed that future contributions be made on the basis of weekly rates of about 1 per cent of earnings, with a like amount contributed by employers.

There will be nine earnings classes and the scale of contributions will run from 16 to 60 cents a week. This just slightly exceeds 1 per cent of average earnings in every contribution class. It thus makes the contributions more equitable in that the rate of contribution as a percentage of earnings shows much less variation than the present scale. This will be seen more clearly by referring to the table I have just now tabled.

Generally speaking, the contribution payable by a worker will be lower than that now required for the corresponding earnings class. At the same time the regrouping of the contribution classes will provide additional classes in the higher earnings ranges, so that additional and higher rates of benefit will be available to workers in those earnings classes.

At present, the maximum contributory bracket is reached when a person earns $48 or more a week. The new scale provides for three further classes, which carry on up to earnings of $57 or more a week, as indicated in the tables.

The change from a daily to a weekly rate of contribution will help also to simplify the administration of the act. It will reduce the work involved for employers where contributions are made through the use of stamps, since six daily stamps will be replaced by one weekly stamp. The contributions will be based on earnings without reference to any specific number of days. The stamp placed in the book will represent the actual earnings in a week whether the period being worked be one or more days. If there is more than one employer in a week, two or more stamps will be placed in the weekly space up to the maximum contribution required of 60 cents from the worker and 60 cents from his employer. All the stamps acquired in a week will be counted as one week's contribution and the worker will be given credit for the total contributions made so far as benefit rate is concerned.

The benefit rate will be determined by the average rate of contributions in the last 30 contributory weeks. Where the earnings in a week are in a very low range provision is made for crediting only half of a stamp, to avoid penalizing a claimant by lowering his average weekly contribution rate unduly. The present insurance book and contribution records will be retained with suitable modifications to fit in with the revised proposals previously outlined.

As to the benefit features, there are several material changes. I give, first, the reasons for them. Experience has made it clear that the present act does not give sufficient protection to workers who are just entering insurable employment and those who by force of circumstance are not able to find steady work. At the same time it provides longer protection than is required for the vast majority of workers. We have found that although about one-third of all those establishing benefit rights are entitled to 180 days or more under the present act, only about one-twentieth actually draw benefits for a period longer than 180 days. Many of these one-twentieth are married women and elderly people for whom alternative social security programs would seem to be more appropriate.

We feel that it is particularly important to provide better protection for young people just entering insurable employment and for those workers who can do little more than meet the minimum contribution requirements because of the effect, for instance, of seniority clauses in collective agreements. These clauses mean that when lay-offs do occur, substantially the same group of workers lose their jobs each time, thus interrupting the build-up in their contributions and reducing their benefit entitlement. In other words, the very workers who have needed protection the most have often found their opportunity to earn it is severely limited through no fault of their own.

For these reasons, we are proposing that the benefit formula be changed so that a greater amount of protection is made available to workers who have not been able to find steady work. The present formula provides a minimum of 6 weeks' benefit and a maximum of 51 weeks' benefit, depending on the length of time for which an insured person has contributed. To qualify for the minimum of 6 weeks a worker must have made, in the two years preceding his claim, 180 daily contributions, or the equivalent of 30 weeks' contributions.

The new benefit formula will provide a minimum of 15 weeks of benefit, instead of 6, for all workers who have made 30 weekly contributions in the two years preceding a claim for benefits. It will be possible for workers to earn additional weeks of benefit by additional contributions on the basis of one week's benefit for two weeks' contributions that have been made within the two years prior to the claim.

The maximum regular benefit will be 30 weeks. For the increased number of workers who will now qualify also for seasonal benefits the maximum total of regular plus seasonal benefits will be 45 weeks. I will outline the seasonal benefits later. I might indicate here, Mr. Chairman, that the reason the name "seasonal" is proposed instead of "supplementary" is because it was felt it was a better name for the benefits referred to.

Approximately 95 per cent of all claimants now draw less than 30 weeks' benefit. The new benefit formula will therefore take care of the great majority of persons who ordinarily work in insurable employment. At the same time it will provide much greater protection to those who do not have long and steady employment by lowering the maximum entitlement available, which has been made use of by only a small number of workers, and by increasing substantially the minimum amount of benefit available. The total effect of this change is to redistribute the amount of protection so that a greater proportion of it can actually be taken advantage of by insured workers who become unemployed.

The actuaries have estimated that, if these provisions had been in effect a year ago, the net result of lowering the maximum and increasing the minimum entitlement as now proposed would have been an increase in the number of benefit days available to claimants of approximately 4½ million, or an increase of about 6 per cent. The changes as a whole will mean that fewer claimants will exhaust their benefit before finding work. In the past the majority of workers using up all their benefit rights were those whose entitlement was less than 15 weeks. The new act will in practice give greater protection to a greater number of workers and will tend to concentrate that benefit where it is most needed.

At this point I should like to say, however, that we were concerned as to the existing equity of those workers who are under the present plan in making the proposal that the duration of the maximum regular benefit be cut from 51 to 30 weeks. To take care of that matter we are here proposing the following. In view of the reduction of the maximum duration of regular benefit from 51 to 30 weeks, it is felt desirable to provide for a transitional period during which those who have accumulated credits under the present act might be eligible for more than the maximum of 30 weeks of regular benefits under the present proposal. Although the new act will provide better protection for the great majority of workers, we have felt it is important to ensure that no one loses any equity which a presently insured worker may have built up over the years under the present act prior to these amendments. This objective will be accomplished by providing for a transitional period of three years from the time the new act comes into force.

During these three years, all workers who exhaust the benefits available to them in their first benefit year under the new act will have their contribution record re-examined to determine whether or not they might have received more benefits under the old act. In the great majority of cases they will already have exceeded the amount of benefit protection they would have received under the old act. However, if it is found that they would have received more protection under the old act they will then be given the additional benefit coming to them on the old basis. In this way no worker will lose any equity which he may have built up over the years, while the great majority will receive a much greater protection under the new arrangement.

The adoption of a weekly contribution basis rather than a daily one will make it easier for workers to build up contribution rights, particularly if they are forced to accept short-time employment. For example, if a person ordinarily working on a five-day week goes on short time of four days a week, under the daily stamp system he would receive four daily stamps for his week's work rather than one weekly stamp. That meant that, if the short-time condition lasted for three months, under the old daily plan he would be credited with 52 days or 8½ weeks. Under the new weekly plan he will be credited with 13 weeks.

In order to requalify after a benefit period has terminated, a claimant will have to acquire additional credits by building up eight weeks of contributions in insurable employment since the commencement of his previous claim, and have at least 30 contribution weeks in the previous two years. Contribution weeks more than a year old at the time of a subsequent claim, if they have already been used on a previous claim, cannot be used a second time to qualify either for rate or duration.

With respect to benefits, we are proposing to increase the weekly benefit rates. The new maximum for a person with a dependent will be $30 per week in place of the present $24 per week, and for a single person it will be $23 per week instead of $17.10. The scale from there down is shown in the tables which I have filed. When the act first came into operation the scale of benefit rates was designed to preserve a certain relationship between the ordinary rate of earnings and the benefit payable. This relationship has been impaired as a result of the rise in wage rates and, as a large number of insured persons have moved into the top benefit class, the ratio of benefit to average earnings has dropped considerably. By a revision of the earnings classes it is intended to restore the proper relationship between benefit and ordinary earnings, so that this will not result in over-insurance in the lower earnings ranges or in under-insurance in the upper earnings ranges. This is shown in the tables.

Another very important feature is the provision of what will now be known as seasonal benefits. These seasonal benefits will replace the supplementary benefits in the present act, and will incorporate substantially the changes recently made during this session. It is proposed that seasonal benefits be available to the same two classes of workers as at present, namely, those who exhaust their regular benefits after April 15 of any year, and those who do not have sufficient contributions to qualify for regular benefit but have made 15 weekly contributions subsequent to March 31 preceding their claim. Like the supplementary benefits, these seasonal benefits will be available from January 1 to April 15 of each year. They will provide the full rate of benefit for 15 weeks in the case of those who exhaust their benefit rights and for from 10, formerly 3, to 15, formerly 6, weeks in the case of those who have at least 15 but not 30 weeks of contributions.

The protection offered by these seasonal benefits is the same and in some instances better than that now available from supplementary benefits after the amendments made last January. The present method of paying benefit on a daily basis, under the act as it now stands, is involved and leads to a number of difficulties where holidays and short-time employment are concerned, particularly where some claimants are on a five-day week and others are on a six-day week. In addition, the provision that the first day of unemployment shall be non-compensable and also the provision with regard to earnings from subsidiary employment are misunderstood by claimants and, I might add, by a great many other people. To overcome this, the new plan proposes that the non-compensable day be eliminated and that claimants be allowed to earn a specified amount during a claim week without reducing their benefit. Earnings above this amount will be deducted from the benefit payable.

It will be immaterial whether the allowable earnings are from subsidiary employment carried on outside of the claimant's usual hours of work or from any other type of employment. This new provision will simplify the computation of benefit and will provide a greater measure of protection to workers who can find casual employment or who are working short time. It is not proposed to make any change in the effect of the waiting period, but a minor change is proposed. The waiting period at the beginning of a benefit year can now be deferred to a later date in order to prevent hardship when a new benefit year commences after a claimant has been unemployed for some time. It is now proposed that the waiting period in such cases be waived entirely, if this has not already been done within the preceding year.

A number of other amendments of a minor character and a general rearrangement and consolidation will be found in the bill. It will be complete in itself, incorporating all the required sections of the existing act whether amended or unamended. I shall ask that the bill be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations after second reading.

When the unemployment insurance advisory committee met on December 14 last to review the amendments regarding seasonal benefits, it was of course necessary for the committee to have before it the views regarding this general revision as they were then held. Later when plans had further crystallized to the point where they were nearly the same as the amendments now proposed, a further meeting of the advisory committee was held on February 15. In order to review these final recommendations, as reflected in the actual bill, the committee has called a further meeting for tomorrow, April 5.

I think it would be in order on this occasion for me, as the minister responsible for the time being to the government and to parliament for reporting on the operations of the unemployment insurance commission, to say a word or two about those who are responsible for the carrying out of the will of parliament in the administration of this legislation. The commission is a semi-autonomous federal government agency. It is proposed that its status in this regard shall remain unchanged. It is an agency with large, far-flung central, regional and local offices whose workers have a very intimate contact with the lives of fellow workers in private industry throughout the country. After the first of the year the unemployment insurance commission workers were called upon to superimpose the new seasonal benefits upon their administrative machinery. This was done without hitch or fuss and with no delay in service to their customers. Both employment and insurance workers in those offices have now just passed a peak work load that has had more stresses and strains this winter than at any time in the past.

Mistakes have been made and I know that complaints have been received by hon. members. Yet with all that a great deal of evidence has come to me this winter to indicate that our staff has been coping with the situation in most commendable fashion. Further, in spite of the pressures they have continued to apply the provisions and the benefits of the act with the whole accent constantly placed on the factor of human need. For that I wish to express appreciation this afternoon.

It will be apparent from what I have said, Mr. Chairman, that what the government is here proposing is not merely a series of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is something much more fundamental than that. We are undertaking, in fact, the most far-reaching revisions of our unemployment insurance program that have been attempted in the decade and a half of its existence during the course of the seven times the legislation has been reviewed by the house.

The act since 1940 has served as the steady bulwark of protection in times of unemployment for an average of 3,500,000 Canadian workers and their families. During this time, it has proved a flexible and effective federal instrument of social security. This was the first of the comprehensive nation-wide social security measures which marked, in the post-depression years, the emergence of a new sense of social responsibility on the part of the Canadian people.

Born out of the suffering and the hardship of the great depression, the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 established a new dimension of social statesmanship to which all our subsequent social legislation—family allowances, the new veterans charter, old age security, the national health program, rehabilitation of civilian disabled, have faithfully conformed. It was the passage of the Unemployment Insurance Act which enabled my predecessor, who introduced it, and all his fellow countrymen, for the first time to speak of "a Canadian social security program".

The system which has developed from those first beginnings owes much to the pioneering spirit of those who brought in this enactment. In a very special sense it has been called a twentieth century bill of rights for the Canadian worker.

What we are doing today, in the new legislation which I have the honour to introduce, is adding a worthy addition to the steadily-growing structure of social security that we have been building in Canada. Approval of these proposals will go far to provide an answer to the problems of the large number of our workers who undergo short periods of unemployment such as has been experienced these past few winters.

I have every confidence that on the basis of this sound foundation, supplemented by whatever additional measures will be worked out in the forthcoming co-operative discussions with the provinces, the Canadian wage earner will be able to look forward with confidence to a new era of incentive, security and opportunity better than anything that he has yet known.

I commend this resolution to the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: It has been indicated that the hon. member for Fort William wishes to ask the minister a question.

Mr. McIvor: I was wondering if it would be possible for us to have this bill to take with us during the recess, as it is most important that we should have time to study it.

Mr. Gregg: The bill is ready. What the hon. member suggests, of course, will depend upon the discussion taking place in the house.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I must say I had not intended to go in any detail into the history of the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, inasmuch as the minister has made quite a point of tracing back the origin of the act of 1940, and inasmuch as at the close of his remarks today he has referred to this act as the first, to use his words, of the comprehensive nation-wide security measures—and there was much more in the same vein—I feel it would not be proper for us to proceed with the discussion of this measure without bearing in mind that it was on February 12, 1935, that the late R. B. Bennett, who was then prime minister of Canada, introduced to the House of Commons the first unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Croll: Which the courts disallowed.

Mrs. Fairclough: Which the courts disallowed, as the hon. member for Spadina has said, and quite rightly. And why? Because the Liberal government which followed the government of Mr. Bennett in that same year made it a point, as one of its first items of business, to throw that act to the courts, in the hope that it would be disallowed, instead of seeking the co-operation of the provinces.

Mr. Garson: Is this an attack on the courts?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, this is an answer to some of the truck that has been thrown into the debates in the House of Commons for many years. Certainly since my entry to the house I have had to listen to it; and I am not going to listen to that sort of stuff any longer.

I suppose there is rarely a piece of legislation introduced that does not have some flaws in it. Granted that, at the time the legislation was brought down, it probably did not have the support it should have had from the provinces, still it would have been a simple matter to have obtained that support, had the government so wished. But the government did not.

Mr. Hees: They did not wish it.

Mrs. Fairclough: They did not wish it to have any support, and they made no effort to get the support of the provinces. And so, rather than implement a piece of legislation brought in by a Conservative government, the Liberal government of Mr. King sought to destroy that legislation and, indeed, succeeded in destroying it, although six years later, having delayed the protection which was due to the workers of this country for that period of time, the Liberal government then brought in what was basically the same legislation.

Now, in 15 years conditions change.

An hon. Member: Under a Liberal government.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): They change for the worse.

Mrs. Fairclough: I might add they also changed after 1921. But memories are short. I remember back to 1921. I was one of those out of work in 1921, as I was in 1931.

Mr. Martin: When the hon. member says that, she disillusions us.

Mr. Hees: She must have been only a kid.

Mr. Knowles: She was a little girl then.

Mrs. Fairclough: Anyone who comes to the House of Commons has no right to have any illusions.

As I was about to say, there have been many changes since this act came into force in 1940. Wage rates have doubled. Hours of work in some instances have been almost cut in half. Certainly several of the provinces have introduced legislation respecting maximum hours of work, and labour itself has negotiated for an even shorter work week than that dictated in much of the legislation on the provincial statute books.

All this has created an entirely different labour picture from that in effect in 1940. In 1940 and 1941, when this act began to operate, the economic conditions in the country were entirely different. As the minister said, when quoting Mr. McLarty, we were in the midst of war. It is to be expected that over the years coverage would be extended, and that there would be changes in the act. The official opposition has supported the government in respect of most of those changes, and has even made suggestions for what it considered to be a broadening of the provisions of the act.

In the meantime the fund has grown steadily. Within the last nine years it has more than trebled. In the thirteenth annual report of the commission I find that on March 31, 1945, the fund stood at $268 million. On March 31, 1954, one year ago, the amount in the fund was $881,225,000. The latest figures which are available, namely those of February 28, just a little over a month ago, show that the fund stands at $869 million, which is slightly below the amount at which it stood on March 31, a year ago. There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Chairman, that when the figures are available at the end of the current year they will show that the fund is lower than that because the calls which have been made upon it have been particularly heavy this year. However, in spite of this reduction it is a fact that the fund is still running in the neighbourhood of $900 million. This in itself is a sign that the plans which were laid and the alterations which have been made in the act over the years have in no way injured the fund, and we now ask ourselves whether it is too large.

After what we have been through this year, I do not think many of us would want to see it depleted, but we certainly do not think it was ever contemplated that the fund would reach unwieldy proportions. In each instance, when the minister has brought suggestions to the house for alterations in contributions—I recall when the supplementary benefits were put into effect and when the one cent a day increase was brought in—we all thought that the supplementary benefits would eat up the additional contribution, and probably the payment of the supplementary benefits would deplete the fund in spite of the additional contributions made to it. That did not prove to be the case, and time went on. As I said, we now have a fund of approximately $900 million. This brings up the problem of just where we are going and whether the workers of this country have the coverage to which they are entitled. There are still several classes of workers who are not covered, and some of those classes have repeatedly asked for coverage. I am not going to try to deal with them all. I should like to mention one in particular, namely, the coverage to be afforded to fishermen.

In January of this year, when the former amendments to the act were under consideration, to which the minister referred, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich made a plea for fishermen and men who are connected with the fishing industry. He referred to tradesmen who were employed by fishing companies and who were in employment which is deemed insurable. I think I could do no better than to read this short description which he gave, when he said, as reported at page 77 of Hansard:

> There are certain companies which are engaged in the fishing industry and which employ a large number of men who are not actual fishermen in that they are not employed in the catching of fish but they are connected with the lifting of fish from various fish traps which are established legally in the strait of Juan de Fuca. I refer particularly to men who are employed in such companies as the Sooke Harbour Fishing and Packing Company as pile drivers, and men who are employed in the repair of the leads which guide the fish into their traps. These men are not fishermen in the ordinary sense of the word. They do not go out in boats to catch fish. They are employed in the fishing industry, but they are very definitely tradesmen of another classification.

The hon. member was speaking of fishermen in general and of tradesmen employed in the fishing industry as well. I would think, Mr. Chairman, that no one who knows anything about the problem of fishermen being considered eligible for unemployment insurance will minimize the complications which are involved in finding a basis, under the act as it now stands, by which assessments to the equivalent of the contributions of wage earners and employers could be collected from fishermen. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, as I quoted, described some of the anomalies that exist on the west coast. It is also a fact that the west coast fishing is very well organized. There should be no difficulty, I would think, in producing a formula for coverage of employees in that industry. Likewise, in Ontario, fishermen have become well organized in associations and co-operative marketing and I would think that they could quickly rally to any realistic requirement that would enable them to contribute and benefit from the unemployment insurance fund. Everyone knows of the large and successful Quebec united fishermen's co-operative, which could readily bring about the means of enabling fishermen and the buyers of the products of their labour to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund so that the fishermen could reap the benefits therefrom. I do not think there is any doubt that the organized fisheries industry, the strong co-operatives and the private corporations which exist in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick could quickly agree to meet the requirements of regulations designed to enable the fishermen to gain the benefits of unemployment insurance. Nova Scotia has never been backward in reaching out and claiming just deserts for her sons, and I am sure that the industry in that province likewise could be quickly organized to participate in this scheme.

The production of the labour of by far the majority of the fishermen in Newfoundland, I understand, is marketed under the administrative direction of the federal government fisheries board, and it has contracts with an exporting organization of dry salted fish known as the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited, better known to us as NAFEL. Between this federal government board and the exporting agency, I would think that the administration machinery is available through which to implement an assessment on the product of the labours of fishermen in that province as a means of admitting them to eligibility under the unemployment insurance scheme.

With respect to Newfoundland in particular, Mr. Chairman, I think a great many promises were made during the election campaign of 1953, which I hope the minister is now prepared to fulfil within the framework of the revised Unemployment Insurance Act. It is advisable that the coverage for unemployment insurance should be as wide as possible, and should embrace as many categories of workers as possible. I am not without some knowledge of the difficulties that appear in certain classifications, and I realize that some of our workers might never find it possible to participate in this scheme. But on the other hand there are some, such as those I have just mentioned, who, with a little ingenuity on the part of the government, could be included in both the contributions to and benefits from unemployment insurance.

The labour force, as reported on February 19, was 5,391,000. According to the report of the unemployment insurance commission, to which I referred a few minutes ago dated March 31, 1954, the coverage of paid workers was 61·6 per cent. Surely, Mr. Chairman, in a country as broad as Canada, which the labour department and the unemployment insurance commission have reputedly so well organized, a larger percentage of the labour force could be included, now that the foundation has been laid, now that 15 years have gone by and various amendments have been made to the act from time to time.

I call upon the minister when he is discussing this bill with the advisory committee, which I think he said would be tomorrow, to discuss this phase also because it would seem to me that in the time which has elapsed since the last survey was made, of the fishing industry for instance, some four years ago, the advisory committee must have more information available.

Then with reference to the amendments to the act in general: In January when this was first mentioned in the speech from the throne a number of articles appeared in the newspapers, I think mostly Canadian Press dispatches, which sought to guess at the type of amendment which would be forthcoming. The main guess at that time was that the recording of contributions by stamps in books of employees would be discontinued and a method substituted of a 1 per cent deduction matched by the employer, the employer to remit these funds monthly to the unemployment insurance commission.

But as time went on we heard no more about that. Now the minister is bringing down his bill and has made his announcement with reference to the changes. I noticed that two or three days ago the newspapers had pretty much the same material which the minister gave to us today and it became apparent that rather than have a 1 per cent levy the stamp system would be retained although in a more easily handled way. I must say that now that this report has been corroborated by the minister it is apparent from some of the changes he has mentioned that they will undoubtedly smooth out some of the administrative difficulties, not only from the point of view of the department but at the employer level as well.

There is no doubt that the perforated stamp system in use was a complicated method of recording the days worked and frequently resulted in the elimination from the benefits, or the disqualification from benefits, of employees who had worked as much as 175 of the 180 days within the required period of eligibility. Some of these people found that rather hard to take.

As I understand the new scheme, there will be a weekly stamp and a requirement of 30 weeks of contributions rather than 180 days. It will be possible for an employee to benefit if he has had any work at all in the 30 weeks regardless of whether it is one day or five days. I think that that is all to the good.

Some of the other amendments which are suggested, I take it, will reduce the rate of contribution for those in the lower wage brackets and provide benefits at a higher rate for those workers in the higher wage brackets. All of which is likewise to the good.

Whether the average which has been struck by the department will prove to be sufficiently high remains to be seen. I realize the difficulties under which the department must labour in trying to strike a balance which will provide sufficient benefits for the employee without making work completely unattractive to those who consider that receiving benefits is better than working. I think that those are definitely in the minority, that most of the workers in this country would prefer to work at their regular jobs no matter what the benefits were.

There are some things about the references which have been made that concern me. I am very much concerned about the reason for the curtailment in the number of benefit days whereby the maximum is reduced from 51 weeks to 30 weeks. I realize that the minister has said that during the transition period care will be taken to see that a worker who has built up a reserve will not suffer. However, this is going to go on for some time and the day will come when people who are retired either voluntarily or compulsorily will find that they cannot claim the benefits which they have built up over many years of working.

Certain it is that many people in industry today are compelled to give up their jobs to younger workers at as early an age as 60 years, with 65 years being the popular age. We talk about the benefits which have been made available to workers and we do a lot of bragging about our old age security scheme and our old age security program which are in effect in Canada, but it seems to me that there is a wide gap between the age at which a man may be forced to retire and the age at which old age security payments would become available to him. In those intervening years one thing which has helped the average worker in forced retirement has been these 51 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits.

It is all very well to assume that these benefits are not in effect insurance benefits but are a sort of pension for these workers who have been retired, but I maintain that regardless of the reason for the severance from employment, a man who has contributed for many years to unemployment insurance is entitled to the full benefits. The fact that his severance from employment is due to an industrial ruling which throws out of work all people over a certain age in a given plant should not mean that he will not receive the benefit of the contributions which he has made over the years.

This thing will hit those very people who have been the backbone of the unemployment insurance scheme, that is those people with steady jobs who work along day after day, week after week and year after year without any hope of benefiting because they never expect to be unemployed. True enough, their first unemployment is when they are forced to retire. Many of these people are capable of taking employment. They go to the unemployment insurance office and register for employment but there is none available because of their age.

It would appear that in these amendments it is proposed to cut down their benefits from the 51 weeks which were available to them previously to 30 weeks. If I am to understand that, from what I heard the minister say and from what I have read in the newspapers, then we will oppose it because it is not proper that these people should be refused benefits at the very time when they need the benefits to which they have contributed for many years.

I should now like to say a few words with respect to allowable earnings. I was interested in the minister's remarks. I hope that in the regulations governing this amendment the worker will be permitted to glean his allowable earnings from whatever source he pleases. That was the construction that I put upon the remarks made by the minister. It has certainly been the case heretofore that if the worker had employment which paid him $2 a day he forfeited $4 of unemployment insurance benefits which is little enough incentive to work.

I know of one man who obtained night employment which paid him $16 a week and because of that he lost his unemployment insurance benefits of $24 a week. The only solution was for him to work for less money. Eventually he decided to retain the same job but suggested to his employer that instead of being paid $16 a week he should be paid $10 and this was done. By reason of having the earnings derived from his subsidiary employment reduced to less than two-thirds of their value he was able to retain his unemployment insurance benefits. The alternative course would have been for him to stay at home, not work at all and collect the $24 on which he could not live anyway.

One of the outcomes of this system was demonstrated in Hamilton last week. We had a snowstorm—not as severe a storm as we had in Ottawa, but quite a heavy snowstorm—and it was impossible to obtain the men who were needed for snow shovelling because if they took this type of work, which they knew would last only for a few days, their position with regard to unemployment insurance benefits would be jeopardized. It is a foolish law which inflicts conditions like that upon men who are otherwise willing to work. I do not think it should be necessary for a worker to be confined to subsidiary employment. If he can obtain a little employment in his regular field I think he should be permitted to take it. I hope that the minister has borne that in mind when bringing in the amendments and that provision for this will be made in the revised act.

We had something to say earlier this session, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the terminal date for payment of supplementary benefits. The minister has now made some remarks which would indicate that the term "supplementary benefits" is to be removed from the act and that we will still have the supplementary benefits but under a different name; a case of a rose by any other name, I suppose.

I should like to speak for a moment about the need for extending not the benefits themselves but the period of the payment of those benefits. April 15 is practically upon us now and while the sun has been shining for a few days and the snow is melting, the type of work which is available to many of these men has not yet opened up. We had the same situation last year; it is not a new situation. It would seem to me that rather than placing in the act a specific terminal date there should be some flexibility to the termination of the supplementary benefits, or by whatever name you may call them.

In certain parts of Ontario where the weather does not open up as quickly as it does in southern Ontario it might be necessary to extend the supplementary benefits even to the 1st of June, but whenever conditions demand it I believe there should be sufficient provision under the act for taking care of these people, even if it has to be done by regions. It might be that rules would have to be laid down according to the weather which is encountered in the various parts of Canada.

A few days ago an hon. member of this house asked the minister if any consideration had been given to the extension of the date for this year and his reply, as I remember it, was that the government had not yet decided. There are many problems which need to be solved and which are brought up by speakers in this house in various debates from time to time. There is the problem of the young people who enter the labour force and are unable to secure work; or, if they secure work, who work for a short time and then are unemployed and have insufficient contributions to qualify for unemployment insurance. I know the minister has made reference to that in his remarks and has said that the new regulations which he proposes to bring in will help cure that situation. Whether or not the new regulations will be broad enough to take care of this situation remains to be seen and it will be interesting to see precisely what he has in mind. There is also the matter of immigrants who come to this country, who work for a while and are then thrown out of employment before they have made sufficient contributions to qualify for benefits. I am sure the minister is aware that it has been a matter of contention in various parts of the country as to who is responsible for these people and whether they should be looked after by the unemployment insurance commission or whether they should be a charge on the department of immigration. If the minister is not aware of the fact, I think he would be interested in knowing that there are several different opinions on that score. In some centres the immigration department takes charge of these people quite gladly and in others they wash their hands of them and say they can do nothing for them. Whether this means that the two departments should get together and formulate a policy concerning these specific workers as a matter for government consideration I do not know, but I commend it to the minister for his consideration.

There are those workers, Mr. Chairman, who are taken ill or who suffer disability between the time of their severance from employment and the date on which they apply for benefits. This too creates an anomaly since the worker who is taken ill subsequent to receipt of the benefits has been taken care of now for a couple of years or so.

I had one case not long ago when a man called me up and said that he had been laid off on a Friday night for an interminable period, or so he was led to believe. On Saturday, of course, the unemployment insurance offices were closed, and Monday was a statutory holiday. On Monday he took his family out and succeeded in injuring himself; he broke his arm. Therefore he was declared ineligible for benefits by the unemployment insurance commission. Well, it is quite possible that these things happen particularly on a long week end. The papers are full of stories about the number of accidents which occur during the course of a long week end. However, if some of these unfortunate people are in the position of having been laid off on the previous Friday then they are automatically disqualified for benefits. This is another matter which I think the minister has had under consideration and is rectifying in the current bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that the minister would be very disappointed if I did not mention once again in my remarks on any unemployment insurance measure the matter of regulation 5A(1). I could not let this opportunity go by without assuring the minister and the house that whenever there is a debate at any time on unemployment insurance you will hear about it until it has been removed. This clause was not put into effect until 1950 and it affects only married women. I have followed the questions which have been asked because they are published in some of the trade magazines. It is amazing how frequently there is a question asked with reference to the circumstances under which a married woman can qualify for unemployment insurance. I picked this one out because it is typical. The question which was asked, and which I understand is answered by some official of the department, is this:

Why am I disqualified for not having 60 contributions since marriage when I worked six months after I was married?

The answer was:

The regulation says that you must have 60 contributions since your marriage if you were unemployed at the time you were married. On the other hand, if you continued to work after you were married, you must have 60 contributions after your first separation from employment following your marriage.

Of course, I suppose the answer to that is that anyone contemplating marriage should just quit her job and say, "I am now unemployed", and then immediately after marriage go back to work; in two months of work after having resumed her position she could qualify. I suppose these people never thought of that. I throw it out to them as a suggestion.

I would not feel so strongly about this particular regulation if it were not for the fact that it is the only one of which I know which is definitely discriminatory against one class of worker. The minister knows as well as I do of various classes of workers who at times make a run on the unemployment insurance fund. They find out that they can have a couple of weeks of holidays. If they handle it discreetly it will be made to appear that they have been laid off for lack of work. Then having received their benefits, after a while when they have had a little holiday, they can go back to their employment again.

That is something that has happened not once but several times. I am sure the minister is perfectly well aware of the classes of employment in which it occurs. Yet this one group of workers is the only one which is mentioned in the regulations, to my knowledge, or which has a definite regulation governing the matter of availability for employment. I urge the minister once more to have it removed. I think it is ridiculous. I do not know why it was ever put in there in the first place except that, having had some instances of married women claiming unemployment insurance where probably it was thought they had no intention of rejoining the labour force, it was felt that this regulation would stop the practice to which I have referred. I might say that I have much the same sort of feeling with reference to the proposed amendment to the act of which I spoke a few moments ago with reference to those people who are retiring from industrial work through no fault of their own. If that is the case, I intend to oppose that amendment as well. I ask the minister now, when he is making amendments to the act, to see that this regulation 5A (1) is taken out of the regulations.

While we talk about unemployment insurance and while we try to build up the fund to take care of emergencies which arise in the industrial life of this country, it seems to me that we cannot allow to pass the opportunity to examine slightly the causes of unemployment. I have no intention of taking up the time of the committee by going fully into this matter in which I am keenly interested but I want to say just this.

We hear quite a bit of talk about proposals which are being put forward more and more by union members for what is called a guaranteed annual wage, guaranteed employment and various other names. I would suggest that there is hardly an industrialist in this country who would not be delighted to have his plant work 52 weeks of the year and to have all his employees employed 52 weeks in the year. In my estimation, industry is ready and willing to co-operate in the matter of year-round work, but the situation is not entirely in their hands. I ask the committee to consider for a moment this situation. If one industrialist attempts to spread employment he places himself economically in a position where he is unable to compete with his rivals in the same line of business. He may say, "I can cure this matter; I can call in my competitors and we can agree that we will take a certain line of action which, true enough, may raise our costs a little bit but it will give to these people employment for a full period each year." Then what happens to him?

He calls in his competitors. They confer together. They are willing to adopt the same system that he is willing to adopt in order to give steady employment. Then the Minister of Justice steps in and says, "You cannot do this. You have connived together to raise the price of your product and therefore you are guilty under the Combines Investigation Act". So he is left right back where he started, except that he may have had a nice fat fine slapped on him also.

Clearly, Mr. Chairman, it is a problem in co-operative action between industry and government. Surely we can give to industry some of the benefit of the doubt that they take this action with good intent and for a purpose of supplying work for their employees. Surely the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Justice and any other members of the cabinet who may be interested can get together and try to find some way of solving this employment problem. I submit to this committee, Mr. Chairman, that it is a problem which can be solved. Before this bill has been approved by the house I trust that all these things I have mentioned and many others will have had full and proper consideration not only by the standing committee on industrial relations but also by every member of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, to the extent that the bill forecast by this resolution makes provision for some real improvements in the Unemployment Insurance Act, we welcome it. We also welcome the fact that it is the intention to refer the bill, after it has had second reading, to the standing committee on industrial relations so that it can be thoroughly examined by the members of that committee. The committee has the power to send for persons, papers and records and I am sure that it will exercise that authority.

In thinking of what I would say, Mr. Chairman, I have decided to pattern my remarks after those of the minister, in this sense. As I see it, he dealt with the subject under three headings. In other words, like Gaul, his speech was divided into three parts. The hon. member for Hamilton West seemed to feel that all the gall was in the third part. In the first part of his speech the minister gave us something of the history of the enactment of this legislation in 1940. In the second part of his speech he outlined the changes being proposed in the bill to be based on this resolution. In the third part of his speech he asked us to see this resolution in the context of a reputed over-all Liberal social security program. It was there that the hon. member for Hamilton West felt that the gall came into the third part of the speech. However, I shall have something to say about that matter when I reach that portion of my own remarks.

The minister started off by saying he had found it extremely interesting to go through the debates of 1940. It so happens I spent the week end doing the same thing. I found it interesting to read the debates not only on the resolution and the bill respecting unemployment insurance itself but also on the motion for an address to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act to make unemployment insurance possible. I found in the course of my reading that Mr. King had strongly recommended to members of the house that they peruse sessional paper No. 152, tabled on June 25, 1940, which contains the correspondence between the federal government and the provincial premiers leading up to the general agreement that the British North America Act might be amended so as to write unemployment insurance into the British North America Act as class 2A of section 91.

What interested me particularly as I read the debates of 1940 was that there seemed to be more attention paid to the constitutional aspect of the matter, more attention paid to the question as to whose was the responsibility for unemployment insurance, than there was to the actual details of the bill itself. The hon. member for Hamilton West has drawn attention to the fact that the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 was not the first one presented to parliament but rather that there had been one introduced in 1935 by Mr. Bennett which had been referred by the succeeding Liberal government to the Supreme Court of Canada and then to the judicial committee of the privy council. Incidentally—

Mr. Fleming: They did not try to uphold it either.

Mr. Knowles: Incidentally—

Mr. Martin: You know they could not possibly.

Mr. Fleming: They did not try. The King government did not make any effort.

Mr. Knowles: Incidentally, for the third time—

Mr. Hees: Dirty Liberals.

Mr. Knowles: —since the hon. member for Hamilton West has suggested that the history of this act should go back beyond 1940 I suggest it should go back considerably beyond 1935. As a matter of fact it was during and after world war I that the trade union movement of this country first began to advocate and call for the enactment of unemployment insurance. I suppose it was not unnatural, in view of the popularity which the labour people of the country were giving to this idea in those years, that the Liberal party at its famous 1919 convention included in its platform a plank calling for unemployment insurance. Of course the fact that it was written into the platform in 1919 did not mean it was to be brought into effect overnight, any more than the health insurance which is talked about by my hon. friend across the way, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but at least unemployment insurance was achieved in 21 years.

In the meantime, as hon. members will recall, the matter was discussed in the House of Commons a great deal, frequently on the initiative of my predecessor, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth. Hon. members will recall the very famous exchange of letters in the year 1926 that had to do with old age pensions. At least, hon. members will remember mainly the old age pension part of that correspondence between Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps on the one hand and Mr. King and the other party leaders on the other. I remind hon. members that old age pensions were only one subject of that famous letter and of Mr. King's reply. Concern for the unemployed was the other subject. Likewise, in 1928, and very largely because of the pressure exerted in parliament by Mr. Woodsworth and others associated with him, the select committee on industrial and international relations was given this instruction:

That in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

That committee made a report approving in principle of unemployment insurance but drawing attention to certain constitutional difficulties. The matter came up again in 1929. That would be ten years after it was written into the Liberal platform in 1919. Mr. King still stalled on the ground that there seemed to be some problem of a constitutional nature. Hon. members are aware of what happened from then on. Mr. King did nothing while he was in power up until 1930, but in 1933, while in opposition, he pledged that if the Liberal party came back into power after the next election they would take the necessary steps and conduct the necessary negotiations with the provinces to bring about a nation-wide scheme of unemployment insurance. Then there followed Mr. Bennett's legislation of 1935 which, as has already been said, was referred to the courts in 1936 and declared ultra vires both by the Supreme Court of Canada and by the judicial committee of the privy council.

In 1940 the act which is now on the statute books was brought in. Before it was brought in there was a resolution, which was debated in the house on June 25, 1940, calling for an address to Westminster so that the British North America Act might be amended. As I say, that debate was extremely interesting and some of the arguments advanced during its course carried over into the debate on the unemployment insurance legislation itself. I found particularly interesting the position taken by Mr. King, by Mr. McLarty, who was then the minister of labour, and by Mr. Lapointe, who was then the minister of justice. All three of these late gentlemen figured very prominently in these debates.

They made the contention very strongly that what they were seeking was not just a clarification of a somewhat ambiguous position. They did not go for the idea that there was any uncertainty, that maybe unemployment was a provincial matter, maybe it was a federal matter, maybe it was half and half. No, they took the position that as from 1867, as from the adoption of the British North America Act, unemployment had clearly been a provincial matter. They did not argue with that at all but they took the position, and Mr. King said this particularly on second reading of the bill, that Canada had moved a long way since 1867 and that in 1940 the time had come to make a clear-cut and definitive change. The time had come to say that industrial and economic conditions were such that we had to transfer concern over unemployment and responsibility for dealing with it from the provinces to the federal parliament.

Mr. King insisted that the federal parliament had the right to request Westminster to change the British North America Act without getting the consent of all the provinces, but at the same time he said, "This matter is so important I think we should get that consent." One of the reasons he gave for the considerable delay in connection with the matter was that it took time to get the consent of all the then nine provincial governments of Canada. He made a great deal out of that in the debate both on the resolution respecting the amendment to the constitution and in the debate on the legislation itself. Through all of this runs the theme that parliament was being asked to make a specific change, to transfer to the field of federal authority what had clearly been a provincial responsibility under the British North America Act from 1867 down to 1940. Without getting into the argument that went on here a while ago between my Conservative friends to the right and the Liberals across the way, I think even my friends to the right would agree it is a good idea that the British North America Act was amended and that it is now clear beyond any doubt that the responsibility for insuring against unemployment is a federal matter.

One of the points Mr. Lapointe made in the debate on the resolution addressed to Westminster was that no unemployment insurance act, no matter how well drafted, could be perfect for all time, and that amendments would have to be made as time went on. So he insisted that if any attempt were made to establish unemployment insurance on the basis of consent as between the provinces on the one hand and the federal government on the other, or if any attempt were made to establish such legislation on a concurrent basis, then certainly difficulties would be encountered just as soon as any amendments had to be made to the legislation. He indicated it was not enough just to get concurrence; you would have to hold that concurrence through future years. Therefore it was imperative that the matter be transferred once and for all to the federal authority.

I take no exception to the position taken by Mr. Lapointe, by Mr. King and Mr. McLarty in that debate, but I think the government should recognize what flows from the decision made at that time. All the provinces agreed. In due course the resolution passed this House of Commons and the other place unanimously. I think some reference was made in the debate later on to the fact that it took only 19 minutes for Westminster to agree to the requested amendment to the British North America Act. In other words it was agreed all round that unemployment insurance is clearly and exclusively a federal matter. I submit it flows from that that the federal authority is the one that has the responsibility to insure against unemployment, not only by means of a particular statute that might be called the Unemployment Insurance Act but by whatever means are necessary to see to it that unemployment is minimized, or that the suffering which flows from unemployment is mitigated so far as those who are unemployed are concerned.

So I submit that what Mr. King said in the debate on this matter in 1940 is even truer today. He said in 1940 that we had come a long way since 1867 in the economic and industrial conditions of this nation, and that we had to make a change. Well, the change was made. And we have come a long way since 1940, Mr. Chairman. We used to hear the words "technological improvement" and "technological advances". Those words have now been replaced more or less by the new word "automation". To some extent it may be the same thing, but at a much higher speed. It may be that the difference is so great that it is one of kind rather than of degree.

In any event I suggest that in 1955 the problem of unemployment has become as much greater than it was in 1940 than that of 1940 was greater than the problem of 1867. There is no constitutional argument any more. The Liberals made sure of that. They said they had to be sure of it, and that there had to be no argument about it in future. It is all there, particularly in the words of Mr. Lapointe and Mr. King on June 25, 1940. All right, they have the authority; they have the responsibility. I am talking about the federal government, these same Liberals who sit across the way today. And I submit there flows from what was done in 1940 that this federal government now has complete responsibility for the problems that arise from unemployment.

We are glad to have a bill like this brought in at the present time, containing the improvements indicated by the Minister of Labour. But I suggest that under that heading of unemployment insurance, which I prefer to put in its other form as insurance against unemployment, the federal government has a responsibility which calls for far more than is presented to us in the legislation laid before us today.

Mr. Martin: I am sure my hon. friend will agree that that may or may not be the case. We will not argue that at the moment. But there is no question that the amendment obtained in 1940 was to enable the federal government to pass a measure which would permit it to require contributions from various groups for the purpose of bringing into being the Unemployment Insurance Act. And that was all that measure did. The question my hon. friend is now arguing is apart from the point altogether, although admittedly it is a very important question.

Mr. Knowles: There goes the orderly arrangement of my speech, in the three parts I suggested when I started. I shall have to change it around because of that interruption by the minister, but I don't mind. I was saving this for later on in my remarks. However, the interjection by the Minister of National Health and Welfare prompts me to turn to Hansard of July 19, 1940, to read some things he said that day when he was just an ordinary private member, sitting as the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Dickey: Nothing "ordinary".

Mr. Knowles: I agree. He was an extraordinary private member.

Mr. Hees: They used to call him the Essex flash.

Mr. Knowles: Incidentally, since I have referred to the hon. member who is now Minister of National Health and Welfare, and since what he had to say on that occasion had to do with unemployment insurance—and that is the subject now before us—perhaps I should go into two or three of the points he made. He of course supported the legislation, and claimed some paternity for it. That is not unlike the minister today. But he also was quite upset about the remarks of the then leader of the opposition, the late Mr. Hanson, to the effect that the plan did not look to him to be actuarially sound. The Minister of Labour quoted today from Mr. Hanson's remarks. I was wishing he would go on and quote what the then member for Essex East had to say in reply to Mr. Hanson on that point.

Mr. Martin: One great man at a time.

Mr. Knowles: I pause for a moment to make sure the Hansard reporter heard that. I turn to page 1777 of Hansard of July 9, 1940, where the then member for Essex East had this to say:

No unemployment insurance scheme in any part of the world has yet been able to operate without calling from time to time upon the national exchequer for further assistance, and for us to assume today that there will in the course of time be no further demands upon the treasury is, I think, not to face realities.

Mr. Martin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: And he went on to say:

If by "actuarially sound" is meant that we shall seek to establish a measure which will be actuarially sound in the sense that life insurance is, that is impossible in unemployment insurance because the nature of the risk in life insurance is altogether different from the nature of the risk in unemployment insurance. While it is laudable to try to make unemployment insurance actuarially sound, we must not be unmindful of the fact that it is impossible really to make it actuarially sound.

In other words the then member for Essex East—and I commend him for it—was more concerned about getting this legislation through and getting coverage against unemployment than he was in its actuarial soundness. So far as he was concerned the treasury was still there to dip into, if necessary, to make sure this coverage would be provided.

Mr. Fleming: He is the big dipper.

Mr. Knowles: I shall quote this statement to him again one of these days, when we are trying to get him to bring in health insurance.

Mr. Martin: Will you help me if I do?

Mr. Knowles: Help you? We are pushing you. The quotation to which I am now going to refer relates particularly to what the minister said a moment ago as to whether or not I had the right to contend that insurance against unemployment called for something more than just a specific unemployment insurance bill. This was in the debate on the resolution preceding the unemployment insurance bill itself, when the then extraordinary member for Essex East had this to say:

...unemployment insurance in itself is not sufficient—

I am waiting for the minister to say "Hear, hear".

Mr. Martin: No one in his good senses would disagree with that statement.

Mr. Knowles: Fine.

I continue:

—unemployment insurance in itself is not sufficient to meet the needs presented by a situation of that sort and must be related to the question of unemployment relief, to the question of the rehabilitation of labour—

Mr. Martin: That is right.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says that is right.

Mr. Martin: I said that no one in his good senses takes issue with my hon. friend.

Mr. Nowlan: The minister is not sure what is coming next.

Mr. Knowles: I continue:

—and to such questions as national health insurance and the like.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Therefore, Mr. Chairman, my authority for suggesting that insurance against unemployment as a federal responsibility calls for more than just an unemployment insurance act at this point is none other than the then extraordinary member for Essex East, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin: You could not go to a better authority, I guess.

Mr. Nowlan: A shrinking violet.

Mr. Winch: We now pause for station identification.

Mr. Knowles: I do not know what the minister will say when I tell him I am now going to turn to another authority in the person of the late Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. Martin: There are hierarchies, you know.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. King, in debating this matter, said at page 1116 of Hansard of June 25, 1940:

I might perhaps be permitted to say a word or two concerning the attitude of the Liberal party towards unemployment insurance. In so doing I should like to go as far back as the time when I had the honour of being chosen the leader of my party. I refer to the national Liberal convention which was held in 1919. At that convention a resolution was passed endorsing social legislation as part of the Liberal policy.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): That was only a chart.

Mr. Mackenzie King picked up that retort and then finally got down to the point where he said:

The resolution passed in 1919 was expressed in the following words:

"In so far as it may be practicable, having regard to Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness,—

I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare nodding his head. I continue:

—dependence, old age, and other disability should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces."

Mr. King went on to say:

When the Liberal administration came into office in 1921 we indicated our hope that while we were in office we might soon be in a position to enact some measure of social insurance.

Mr. Nowlan: Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.

Mr. Knowles: That was Mr. King. He said in 1940, when the house was dealing with unemployment insurance, that this was part of the Liberal government's chart for an over-all social insurance program. Perhaps I should read one more sentence from the late and great Mr. King.

It took time to gain that end.

Some others who took part in that debate are still with us. I refer in particular to my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and my colleague the present member for Vancouver-Kingsway, or for Vancouver East as he was then. They had contended that at a time when parliament was asking Westminster to amend the British North America Act to include the authority for unemployment insurance, parliament should go further and ask for authority for social insurance. Mr. King felt he had to make some reply to what my leader and my colleague said, and this was it. At page 1118 of Hansard of June 25, 1940, he had this to say:

As the correspondence will show, one of the circumstances which enabled us to get the approval of all the provinces was the fact that we were asking for only one amendment, specifically related to unemployment insurance. I imagine the provinces have felt that they would like to wait and see just how that amendment works out before they give their consent to amendments of wider scope.

There is a typical Liberal approach. In 1919 you lay down an over-all program for old age pensions, for unemployment insurance, for sickness insurance and all those other social benefits. You bring it in step by step, very slowly. In 1940 you face the fact that to go any further you need an amendment to the British North America Act; but no, you do not ask for an adequate amendment to cover the whole field, you just ask for one point and leave it to the provinces to tell you later on whether they are satisfied. Well, we have had 15 years since that time, and still no suggestion comes from the other side that if it is necessary to obtain another amendment to the constitution to make possible a nation-wide program of health insurance, that anything along that line is being done, despite the fact that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare himself said in July of 1940 that unemployment insurance is not enough, but that we must have other measures including health insurance.

Perhaps in what I have said, Mr. Chairman—and I thank or blame the Minister of National Health and Welfare if this speech is not set in the three water-tight compartments that I intended it should be at the start—I have been dealing with history and the gall of the Minister of Labour all mixed up together. But I think the history of this matter is interesting, and I would hope that hon. members might be prompted to read some of the history behind this legislation; for it does make it crystal clear that what this Liberal government wanted was a clearly defined, unanswerable, unassailable authority for unemployment insurance. I submit that if this government has taken that authority by getting an amendment to the British North America Act, there goes with that authority the federal responsibility to deal with the whole problem of unemployment, including full responsibility for the employable unemployed, whether covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act or not.

Incidentally, one of the arguments put to the provinces when they were asked to agree to the amendment to the British North America Act was that it would save them money in terms of unemployment relief. Here, for example, is a paragraph from Mr. King's letter to Hon. Adelard Godbout, premier of Quebec, written on January 16, 1940. This is contained in sessional paper No. 152, tabled on Tuesday, June 25, 1940. Mr. King said this:

In asking for the view of the Quebec government, at your early convenience, I should perhaps add that the establishment of a national scheme of unemployment insurance should, it is anticipated,—

No one can doubt that this is Mr. King's language. I continue:

—have the effect, once the scheme is in full operation, of reducing substantially the financial burden which now falls on the provinces for the provision of unemployment relief.

Mr. King made that point in every letter which he wrote to an industrial province. I point out—to his credit—that the letters he sent to the various premiers were not carbon copies of the same letter, but they were written in the light of the circumstances in each of the provinces. Well, that was part of the bargain; that was part of the arrangement that was made with the provinces in 1940. The federal government said, "You give us this authority and we shall be lifting the load from the provinces so far as unemployment is concerned".

I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that in effect what has happened is that the federal government has taken over the responsibility for the easier part of the unemployment problem, that part that can be insured against, the part that can be covered by contributions, but the federal government left with the provinces the residual part of the problem, the hard core. I submit that is most unfair, and that it is not in keeping with the spirit of what was done in 1940 when the federal government insisted upon and got for the parliament of Canada full control over unemployment insurance or as I put it, and I think justifiably, insuring against unemployment. I submit that as this problem becomes greater in these days of automation we have to have a great deal more than is contained either in the legislation we have had thus far or in the proposals brought forward today by the minister.

Some of the possible angles of approach have been indicated already by the hon. member for Hamilton West, although she did not align herself too closely with one I have in mind, namely the guaranteed annual wage. The guaranteed annual wage has to come; and while it is a debatable point whether it should be enmeshed with the Unemployment Insurance Act or provided in some other way, it has to come just as surely as night follows day.

I know there are those who will reply that you cannot do that without encouraging people to look for the day when they can receive an income without working, but let me read to the minister some words that he uttered on a certain occasion. I have in my hand a booklet entitled "Employer-Employee Relations Conference, eighty-first annual general meeting Canadian Manufacturers Association, Royal York hotel, Toronto, May 28th, 29th and 30th, 1952." One of the guest speakers on that occasion was the Minister of Labour. The minister made quite a speech, and on page 5 of this printed report he was dealing with the problem of seasonal unemployment. He was pointing out to the manufacturers association that it would be in their interests as well as in the interests of everyone else if seasonal unemployment could be minimized. He had this to say:

> There are also business costs involved which could be avoided through a greater degree of employment stability. In many firms when operations are seasonally curtailed there are, as you know, continuing overhead charges. Such fixed charges include taxes, rent, insurance, depreciation and maintenance of equipment. The salaries of executives have to be maintained and it is often not feasible to discharge salesmen at such times. The office staff is usually kept on at something approaching its normal strength.

If there is a fundamental point at which we in this group have an approach that is different from the approach of other groups in the house it is right there. The Minister of Labour is not unique in this, because he speaks the mind of a great many hon. members of this house in other parties who accept it as axiomatic that of course the salaries of executives have to be maintained and that it is difficult to discharge salesmen, and indeed that you must maintain office staffs the year around. It is accepted as axiomatic that fixed business charges such as taxes, rent, insurance, depreciation and maintenance of equipment have to be met, but the attitude of the Minister of Labour and of many hon. members of this house stops there. I am not taking this out of its context so far as the minister's speech is concerned, because he goes on to another subject in the very next sentence.

Our contention is that the worker has just as much right to year round maintenance as has equipment. Our contention is that the worker has just as much right to a guaranteed annual wage as has the executive or any other of the highly-placed people in business and in industry. As I say, this is the point about which we feel most strongly and where there seems to be a difference of approach between us and other sections of this house.

But I say to the minister and to the government that they are going to have to do something about this question of a guaranteed annual wage. I say to them that philosophically and socially it is sound and justified, and I say to them as well that a facing up to the guaranteed annual wage is called for under section 91, class 2A of the British North America Act, which gives the federal government authority to insure against unemployment.

There are other things that can be done. A shorter work week will have to come. It is also becoming more and more evident that as automation progresses, just as was the case or should have been the case with technological advances, its benefits must be distributed among the community as a whole. That is where we come in with wider social security legislation such as health insurance as suggested by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in 1940, and all the other proposals that can be enacted to distribute among all our people the advantages of an industrial age that has moved on to the point where under automation can now produce goods and services to an unlimited extent.

I call upon this house to face this matter in its broader terms, to face the tremendous issue that we are up against in this day and age. It is akin to the industrial revolution brought about by the introduction of steam power. There lies ahead of us either economic dislocation and misery if these problems are not solved, or what might be called a golden age for our people if we can see in the conditions which now face us a chance to distribute among all our people the advantages of the great wealth of goods and services we are now able to produce.

I should like to say a few words about some of the details outlined by the minister in his remarks. I refer to the detailed changes that he says will be made by this bill. First of all I am glad to note that we are to be given not just a bill to amend the act here and there, but rather a complete consolidation of the act. So many changes have been made since 1940 that it is desirable there should be a new act with all the legislation in one place.

We welcome the increase in the benefits. Also, I think it is a good move that the contributions and benefits are to be on a weekly rather than a daily basis. Likewise I think it is a good move that the amount which a person on unemployment insurance benefits can earn is being put on a weekly rather than a daily basis. Most of us know of many cases where there seemed to be unfairness because of the application of this provision.

I welcome the fact that the minimum number of weeks for which benefits may be drawn is to be increased from 6 to 15, but there is a question in my mind regarding the reduction of the maximum from 51 to 30 weeks. I shall not press the point now, but I will wait until there is a chance for questions to be answered. However, that does seem to be quite a substantial reduction. The minister has pointed out that by the addition of 15 weeks of supplementary benefits the 30 weeks could become 45, but if I correctly understood what he said it would seem that that would follow only if the 15 weeks came in a period of the year when supplementary benefits are payable. That being the case, it seems to me that we are going to have to look into that question, either in committee of the whole when dealing with the resolution or when the bill is before the standing committee on industrial relations.

I want to join with the hon. member for Hamilton West in urging that something yet be done about the discrimination against married women. She pointed out correctly that this did not come into effect in 1950. As hon. members will recall, when an amendment was made to the act in February, 1950, there were a number of provisions in the bill that we had been crying for at the time, but some that we had not asked for were also tucked in. Some of them, if I may say so, turned out to be "jokers". Some were provisions the significance of which we did not really grasp at the time. One was an amendment to the act making it possible for the commission to pass regulations dealing particularly with married women. It was under that provision which was put through the house in February, 1950, that later all the damage was done by regulation 5A. I recognize, because I have had the opportunity of discussing the matter with—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry but I am afraid I must advise the hon. member that he has exceeded his 40 minutes.

Mr. Knowles: All right, Mr. Chairman, I shall sit down and come back at it later. The minister knows what I think on that as well as on the other points that have been raised. Such improvements as are forecast by this resolution are welcome; but as the Minister of National Health and Welfare said in 1940, there is a long way to go yet in dealing with this tremendous problem of unemployment.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, in my first words I would like to compliment the minister for doing something I had hoped a great many other ministers might have done when they were delivering complicated statements preceding the introduction of bills in this house. I received from the minister an advance copy of what he was going to say, so while he gave his statement I was able to follow it page by page and mark those passages which should receive emphasis and which I should stow away in my mind. I think it is an excellent idea, and I express the hope that some of the minister's colleagues will follow his example when making statements in the house in future, particularly with reference to technical legislation of the kind we are now considering.

I am always grateful—and I am sure I speak for my colleagues—when I see the government bring in improvements to existing laws, particularly those laws which have to do with human welfare. It may be argued, of course, that all laws are of that nature, but I will pinpoint it a little more specifically by saying legislation concerning social welfare, providing the laws are based on sound principles.

The bill that is to be introduced after this resolution has been approved promises to be one which will make a number of commendable improvements in the unemployment insurance law. I was not here when the act was passed by this house in 1940, but if I had been here I feel sure that I would have supported it. I was at that time in the Alberta legislature, and I there supported the granting of provincial consent which was required before the present federal act could be passed by this parliament and made law.

For this reason I say I am quite certain I would have supported the act, perhaps making some criticisms of it. However, the Social Credit group in this house did support the bill in 1940, and we support it now.

Over the years we have felt that changing conditions and a broader understanding of the problem have made changes in the first legislation most necessary. We have felt all along that unemployment insurance is not enough by itself to provide what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to as insurance against unemployment. I believe that my colleagues in the house pointed out that fact in 1940 when the Unemployment Insurance Act was being considered. We have always been most concerned about changes in our whole economic policy that would be effective insurance against unemployment.

When I see unemployment insurance legislation brought into this house at any time, whether or not it is designed to improve the existing law, I feel that the government is demonstrating a lack of faith in its own economic policies. Unemployment insurance, Mr. Chairman, is simply a pair of crutches to me, rather than a good healthy body. We would prefer, of course, to see a sound condition in the economic policies which would make it possible for us to get along without crutches. I think everybody would agree with this. We are glad, however, that the unemployment insurance legislation is on the books, and we say so because the government is not living up to the promises it made to the people.

In 1945, when I took part in my first election in the federal field, billboards from one end of the country to the other were plastered with huge signs that promised jobs for everyone if the people would vote Liberal. I think everyone in this house remembers that slogan; if the people would only vote Liberal there would be jobs for everyone. Well, the people did vote Liberal in 1945, in 1949 and again in 1953, and I ask you to seriously consider whether or not they got what they were promised. I do not have to make accusations; my hon. friends on the other side of the house, if they will just think about it honestly, will realize that the people did not get what they were promised.

What did they get? Unemployment insurance. That does not provide insurance against unemployment at all but is merely a palliative to bolster up an ailing economic structure. Whenever you see such legislation placed on the books or being used it is a sign of economic illness. What we are considering today is a medicine which the government hopes will cure the ailment. We have not been given a prescription telling us how to build a sound, healthy body. It is unfortunate that we do have unemployment developing. Of course it is fortunate that we have an unemployment insurance program to help in some measure at least when unemployment presents itself, and so we welcome the changes and improvements promised in the legislation which is to follow this resolution.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre mentioned the necessity of facing up to the situation particularly in regard to the requirement of labour generally for an annual wage. I think he referred to a guaranteed annual wage. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this country must soon face up to the question of a guaranteed annual wage, because it is going to become a most important issue much sooner than is thought by many people. I believe we have to give it serious consideration and think the matter through, rather than being guided solely by our emotions in respect to it.

I do not know just how in the world those who are promoting the idea of a guaranteed annual wage think it can be paid without a serious increase in the cost of production. I cannot quite follow how they propose it can be done without creating a serious increase in the cost of production which will have to be borne by a comparatively small proportion of the population of the country for the benefit of others. If the guaranteed annual wage program could achieve benefits across the board for the whole of the Canadian population and guarantee them some stability of income, then I could quite understand how everyone with a heart and a social conscience could go for it.

Mr. Knowles: Did you not regard your national dividend as of benefit to everyone?

Mr. Low: Oh, definitely, but what I am getting at is this. No one has yet put forward a proposal with respect to a guaranteed annual wage that takes the weight off the single industry in which the people are engaged who are to get the guarantee. That is the trouble. That is why it is so vastly different from the proposals we have made with regard to a national dividend.

Here is the next important point. A guaranteed annual wage program does not do anything but cause a redistribution of wealth which, if carried to its extreme, would reduce everybody to the same level of poverty. It does not increase by one red cent the purchasing power available to the people of the country. If we are to guarantee the workers of our country an annual income—something I am all in favour of—it seems to me that what we must have is a program that goes far deeper than merely a redistribution of the insufficient purchasing power that is at present in existence. That is why we are asking that this whole matter be clarified most carefully. We are not taking our stand against it for the moment, but we are giving it study.

I warn members of the committee that within the next few months they are going to be obliged to face up to this whole matter of a guaranteed annual wage as a solution for what my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre describes as the serious situation in which many workers find themselves today where they are asked to be on call for employment when the employers in the industries need them, but to be content to remain without income for the balance of the year. That is the problem and we shall have to face it. But whether the guaranteed annual wage is the answer I certainly am not prepared to say.

The unemployment insurance program, amendments to which we are considering today, is a technique which is based on redistribution of wealth as a means of stabilizing our economy. We in the Social Credit group supported the original unemployment insurance program because we realized that it would go to a certain extent, at any rate, in providing stability for an economy. It seems clear that the experience over the years would indicate that some redistribution of wealth is necessary if it is moderately applied. But as I have already pointed out, to carry it too far would not bolster up an ailing economy but would actually tend to destroy it by its own weight, and that is the kind of thing we must be careful about.

I think our experience over a period of 14 years shows that redistribution by itself does not go far toward stabilization. If it did we would not be having the trouble we are having today with unemployment. All the things that have been introduced into our economy since the end of the war in 1945 have not gone too far toward stabilizing the economy. Most of the measures have been based on the redistribution of wealth already in existence. Our experience with them should have proved by now that what we must find is some more fundamental solution that may take into consideration a certain amount of redistribution of wealth, but based upon the important principle that when we go all out and produce the abundance that we can produce in this country, we must have a means of distributing that wealth so our people can use it.

We must develop the local market, because this Canadian market is by far the most important one we have for the goods we can produce. We must introduce measures that will make it possible for the consumers in this country to buy and use the goods we can produce. Otherwise we are going to get ourselves constantly into trade difficulties, unemployment difficulties and all manner of other difficulties.

We must get down to much more fundamental principles than merely the superficial redistribution of wealth. Redistribution of purchasing power is what it really becomes. When there is not enough of it, what good does it do in the long run merely to redistribute it? Let us see that there is enough in the first place so that our production can be bought and used by our people if they want it. Then if it becomes necessary to do some redistributing, let us do it on that modest scale that will not destroy our economy and press it down under the sheer weight of a thing that is superficial and impossible.

Since this legislation is to be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations it is not necessary for me to go into detail with respect to the proposals outlined by the minister in his admirable statement today. I merely say that we reserve our opinion on some of these specific matters—in fact, on all of them—until the bill is brought in and we have had a chance to study it in committee. Suffice it to say at the moment that we are glad to see these amendments being brought in. We compliment the minister on his forethought. I think he has gone a long way to improve this act. We shall give him support on every one of those provisions in the bill that we find to be good.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, this resolution proposing the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act supersedes a notice of motion that appears on the order paper today under my name but which I intend later to ask to have withdrawn. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to increase the regular and supplementary benefits to single and married unemployed workers.

In the Welland area there is a good deal of heavy industry, and over the last year and a half or more there has been considerable unemployment. Such highly responsible people as the heads of municipalities, heads of labour unions and others have made representations to me as to the inadequacy of the payments under the Unemployment Insurance Act. From going about among the unemployed in the practice of medicine, I would say that my observations bear out the fairness of these representations.

I should like to thank the Minister of Labour who, on behalf of the government, earlier this year introduced the amendment by which the supplementary benefits, now called seasonal benefits, were increased. This amendment has already become law and these increased payments are helping many unemployed employables get through the winter months when it is difficult to obtain employment. These further proposed revisions of the act will tend to simplify it. Many features of the act were difficult to understand, and I would think anybody who tried to figure them out would find that. Calculations were involved, and some who drew benefits were never convinced that they received their fair share of those benefits.

I am glad to know also that it will be easier to qualify under the act, and that some who have been in the labour force a shorter time than heretofore will qualify when they are not employed.

As under the present arrangement, workers are put into different categories in accordance with their weekly earnings. Contributions and benefits bear a much more direct relationship to the different ranges of earnings, and there is an increase of benefits mostly in the upper and lower income groups. I was glad to hear the minister say that no worker would lose any equity in the fund.

I notice that in the lower and upper income groups, for example, the benefits are increased by 25 per cent. It is proposed that these benefits should be paid for a maximum of 30 weeks. I saw figures some time ago which indicated that 90 per cent of all claimants drew benefits for 20 weeks or less. The 30 weeks' duration of payment of benefits would cover a very high percentage. I think the minister said today it would cover 95 per cent. A certain number of those falling within the small percentage of cases where 30 weeks was not a sufficient period of time would get supplementary benefits. It is pretty hard to figure how the supplementary benefits would work out, but I understand that in any 12-month period it is possible for workmen to draw up to 45 weeks' benefits.

I realize that the main principles are laid down in the legislation and that the commission will have power to make regulations to deal with procedures and details of administration. I hope these regulations will be sufficiently generous to include some of the borderline cases where it has been impossible to qualify under the act. I realize that most Canadians prefer gainful employment to idleness and drawing unemployment insurance. I also realize that unemployment as such does not come within the scope of discussion of these amendments.

The Unemployment Insurance Act has proven to be excellent legislation and is suitably adapted to the purpose for which it was intended, but like most legislation it needs to be amended from time to time to meet the needs of our people. It helps the workman to bridge the gap between periods of employment. This is of great benefit to the community in which he lives because he can continue to buy the necessities of life, thus helping the economy not only of his own community but of Canada as a whole.

I find many misconceptions in the minds of the people about the act. Many are of the opinion that only the workmen contribute to the fund and that the government contributes nothing, when in fact the government contributes 20 per cent and the employers and employees 40 per cent each. The government administers the fund through the Department of Labour, and when this cost is taken into consideration we find that the government actually contributes about one-third and the other two-thirds is shared equally between the employers and employees. I presume the same ratio will be closely approximated under these new amendments.

From observation I would say that the benefits have worked well in cases of short periods of unemployment, but when these periods have exceeded two months most of the unemployed have found it difficult to make ends meet. As I said before, the new schedule of unemployment benefits bears a more definite relationship to earnings, and for most ranges of pay the benefits are definitely and substantially increased. This will be of great assistance in helping the eligible unemployed to meet the ordinary costs of living.

When a worker has used up his benefit days it has often been difficult for him to qualify for the winter supplementary benefits under the act, either because he has been unable to obtain work or when he has obtained work it has been in non-insurable employment such as agriculture. As an example, such employment as temporary work on a farm, the picking of fruit in the early and late summer months, has aided the worker in keeping his family during these months but has failed to build up any benefit days which might help him to qualify for seasonal benefits during the winter months. I know it would be most difficult to include all lines of work and class them as insurable, but I cannot help think that a worker doing any such worth-while work is contributing as fully to the economy of Canada as if employed in insurable work.

The maximum benefit paid to a married man at the present time is $24 a week, and this is to be increased to $30 a week. A family had great difficulty in getting by on the $24 because of certain fixed charges they had to meet. First of all there is housing. Rents are high, and whether the worker pays rent or monthly payments toward mortgage retirement, taxes and insurance, it takes quite a sizeable amount from his $24 a week.

Then there are fixed and often increasing amounts to pay for services such as water and light. In Ontario, for example, the hydro-electric power commission has increased the cost of hydro power because of expansion and frequency change-over. Then we have the fixed costs for heating. I realize of course that in the case of families with children they are greatly assisted by family allowances made available by the government, but these amounts are often used entirely to meet the extra costs incidental to children attending school such as the buying of books, extra clothing, etc.

The point is that when the family budget is tight the amount available for the purchase of food is inevitably cut down. I am free to admit that some of the more inexpensive foods are more healthful and nutritious. On the other hand we must see that our people, and especially our children, have a well-balanced, nutritious diet for maximum health.

There are certain aspects of unemployment where the unemployment benefits do not meet all the needs of the family. In most provinces—and this is true in Ontario—medical and hospital insurance soon lapses and any sickness in the worker's family requiring hospitalization means that the municipality and the province must assume the cost. These costs have been going up markedly in the last year or two in certain areas of unemployment.

Then we have the problem of older workers, and by "older workers" I mean those beyond 40 or 45 years of age who find it difficult to get insurable employment. Because of the pension plans in various plants it is not economical to give employment to men over these ages. Many of these pension plans have been in operation a comparatively short time, with the result that those who have retired or are now retiring are receiving comparatively small pensions. I am convinced that it is wrong to retire anyone because he has reached a certain chronological age, whether in government or in industry. Those who are unfit retire of necessity, while the others who are fit and well able to carry on would be much happier and more contented if they were allowed to work beyond a certain arbitrary retiring age.

I have observed many of these people. Some of them whose main interest in life was their work develop a moroseness, a sort of chronic mental illness which is soon followed by a physical breakdown. We should remember that some of the best contributions to the welfare of mankind have been made by those who have reached an age beyond our arbitrary retiring ages. Certainly I have seen many good workmen who were more than 60 or 65 years of age. In that regard, it should be noted that in some plants the retiring age is as low as 60. Our high standards of living and advancements in medical science are responsible for gradually increasing the proportion of the older age groups in our population; and unless we keep them productive we are creating a social problem. This means that we have an ever-increasing number of people living off our working class who, after all, create our wealth and pay the bulk of our taxes.

It should be within our ingenuity to devise ways and means of enabling these older workers to continue at work if they wish and can do so. In this way we would be helping the economy of our country and the mental outlook of these people. The real victims and sufferers in a state of unemployment are those able-bodied workers who, for one reason or another, are not eligible for any unemployment insurance. We have help for those who are unable to work but no organized public assistance for those we class as the employable unemployed.

This is the one serious gap in our social security services, and it has existed since 1940, since the enactment of the Unemployment Insurance Act. The provinces for the most part ceased to contribute to the cost of municipal relief, except for the unemployable persons.

In Canada, because of our climate, I think we are bound always to have some seasonal unemployment. I think, too, that in our free enterprise system—in fact in any system—it would be impossible always to eliminate the ups and downs in employment. Part of our economy, indeed part of the economy under any system, depends upon world commerce; and this will vary with the vagaries of nature, the scarcity and abundance of crops.

I am much in favour of the changes set out in this legislation—these increased payments—and I think they will be well received. I do think, if I had any criticism of the bill, that the payments in relation to the seasonal benefits are too rigid. April 15 is close at hand, and we are bound to have considerable unemployment when these benefits are terminated. I would like to see power given to the governor in council to extend the seasonal benefits for a limited time, when conditions warrant.

Tomorrow night the Minister of Finance will present his first budget and I am sure many hon. members, like myself, hope for certain changes. Whether we get our wishes or not I feel he will bring in a budget consistent with good government and our obligations in this uncertain world, and at the same time try to cut down the need for unemployment insurance. In this we wish him every success.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I was greatly worried when the minister spoke a little while ago, because I thought we were going to have an accident. I thought he was going to break his wrist patting the government on the back for its activities in connection with unemployment insurance.

One would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that this unemployment insurance was the gift of the government to those who are unemployed. There has been no recognition of the fact that the employee contributes 40 per cent and the employer 40 per cent, and that the government's contribution is only 20 per cent. Listening to the minister, one would have thought nothing had ever been done by way of unemployment insurance, outside of what this government has done.

I was very pleased indeed to hear the charming member for Hamilton West in her own inimitable fashion set the government right on this question as to who introduced unemployment insurance. It was the Conservative party. And who was it that killed it successfully for six years? It was the Liberal party. It was good to hear the truth come out at last because, as we know, truth will out; and I am glad it did.

Hearing the minister speak on behalf of the government and tell about the wonderful things he imagined they had done in this field, I was reminded of a story about a Texan who went out to Australia. You know, in Texas they claim everything is bigger and better, just as this government claim things are bigger and better under a government of the Liberal party, and just as the government claim that anything worth while that has been done has always been done bigger and better by them. Well, this fellow went out to Australia and was being shown around a sheep ranch. Things are really big out in Australia but no matter what he was shown he would say, "Oh, buddy, that ain't nothin'. It's bigger and better in Texas." Finally the chap who was showing the Texan around was getting a little fed up when, just at that moment, a kangaroo went whizzing by, nearly knocking the Texan down. He jumped back and said, "My Lord, what was that?" The fellow from Australia said, "Oh, don't you have grasshoppers in Texas?"

That is exactly the kind of thing that happens here. We hear it said by those who support the government that nothing ever happens that the Liberal party did not introduce. Of course the Liberal government need not get mixed up about what a kangaroo looks like, because they have Jumping Jack with them every day. He is right there before their very eyes.

Mr. Weir: When do we laugh?

Mr. Hees: Everybody else has.

This act is certainly a great improvement for those who are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, but what I want to know is what is going to happen to those tens of thousands of people who on April 16 find themselves with no jobs and no unemployment insurance; with no entitlement and no benefits, either regular or supplementary.

When unemployment insurance was debated earlier in the session, the minister and the government assured us that by April 15 everything would be in good shape, and there would be no unemployment. When I asked the minister about it he said, "Oh, well, there will be very little unemployment at that time", and just passed it off in that way.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we all know that unemployment has not decreased, because the last figure was greater than the one before, and I should think the next one will be even greater still. As the hon. member for Welland has just said, April 16 is close at hand, and there will be a great number of people out of jobs and with no entitlement at that time. After that date, great numbers will be going to unemployment insurance offices; but they will simply be told, "Sorry, chum; there is nothing for you. After all, you have to remember that there really is no unemployment. The minister has said that it is only 'seasonal and regional'. Therefore we cannot give you any unemployment insurance."

So he will go home to his wife and say, "Sorry, dear; I can't give you any money to buy food and clothing. We can't get coal or pay the doctor's bill because, after all, the government says unemployment is only seasonal and regional, and there is nothing to worry about." And those people are going to get hungrier and colder and wetter and sicker; but so far as the government is concerned, it will not bother in the slightest degree because, after all, "This thing really is not unemployment", they say; "this is just something that is a passing phase."

The government think there are not enough people involved to embarrass them at election time. Therefore they are perfectly happy to cut these people off without even a thought, and leave them alone to figure out some way of paying their bills and buying food and clothing. I ask the minister and the government to view this matter from a humanitarian point of view, not just from that of dollars and cents; of columns of figures; or of lists of voters at election time. This is something which involves human life and human suffering. Today there are more than half a million people unemployed. We have 12 days to go to April 16. There are going to be just about as many unemployed at that time. Tens of thousands will have their unemployment benefits cut off at that time. Human suffering in this country is going to increase many times because of the action the government plans to take.

I urge the minister, solemnly and earnestly, to reconsider the decision to cut off unemployment supplementary benefits on April 15. As the hon. member for Hamilton West urged when this matter came up earlier in the session, these supplementary benefits should be extended to at least May 15. In view of the fact that unemployment has not decreased, that the figures are getting higher every month—we have had the second postwar peak in succession—it is obvious that there is going to be great human suffering if the government carries out its present plan. I urge the minister to reconsider. I hope before this resolution passes he will tell us that the government intends to do that, and in addition to extend the supplementary benefits to at least May 15.

I would ask the government seriously to consider starting these benefits again about November 1 if unemployment again appears to pose a serious threat, as it did last fall. If it appears next fall that unemployment will approach serious dimensions I ask the minister to look at this thing from the humanitarian point of view, and to realize that human suffering cannot be allowed to exist in the proportions in which it will exist after April 15 if something is not done.

Mr. Gregg: In view of what my hon. friend has said may I ask him whether he believes that this fund should remain actuarially sound or whether it should be converted into a relief measure, which is inherent in what he said a moment ago?

Mr. Hees: If—

Mr. Gregg: It is very important.

Mr. Hees: It is extremely important.

Mr. Weir: As a businessman, what would you say?

Mr. Hees: Right at this moment we have almost a billion dollar surplus in this fund.

Mr. Sinclair: Surplus or reserve?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: One or the other; it is there. It is money that has been put in, 40 per cent by the employer and 40 per cent by the employee. It is there, ready to be used to meet this very great need. I say that at the present time the government should extend supplementary benefits to at least May 15, and if necessary longer than that. When this government calls together the conference on April 26 to discuss the agenda for a later dominion-provincial conference, it should discuss with the provinces the basis on which relief that is necessary in the future should be shared by the dominion, the provinces, and the municipalities.

I have suggested that we go back to the 40-40-20 basis that was used between 1939 and 1941, and work out a proposition with the provinces so that when people are unemployed through no fault of their own, and find that they have no entitlement to unemployment insurance benefits, they do not suffer actual hardship in the form of hunger, cold, lack of clothing and lack of shelter. That is my suggestion to the minister and to the government.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): I have no intention of drawing the fire of the hon. member for Hamilton West, because I certainly am not anxious to have the wrath of my charming and vivacious friend, as she has been termed, brought upon myself.

The government should be commended for the procedure taken in bringing in these amendments to a worthy act. It was most generous of the minister to refer in such a kindly way to my predecessor, the late Hon. Norman McLarty, who did a great deal to see that the original act was brought into effect. Hon. Norman McLarty represented the constituency of Essex West from 1935 to 1945 when, because of ill health, he had to withdraw.

The history of the Unemployment Insurance Act has been put on the record by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and that record, of course, will speak for itself. At this time I do not think that history is of too much importance except from the purely partisan point of view, particularly as to who did or did not do certain things at certain times. We are very grateful that we have this act, and we trust that it will continue in effect and that beneficial improvements will be made to it from time to time.

The constituency of Essex West, which I represent, is composed chiefly of the city of Windsor and one suburban township, and is very much interested in this bill. In that area we are a sort of mecca or focal point for labour. Labour is drawn to that area by high wages. That high wage rate has been in effect for some time, and we have had ever-rising rates for many years. Then we are in close proximity to the city of Detroit, which is a large industrial United States city. In fact the city of Detroit, as I have so often said in this house, is on three sides of the constituency which I represent.

In the city of Windsor and within a radius of 50 miles, we have 2,500,000 people or more. There is a very high wage rate in that area and a very highly industrialized population. The climatic conditions of that area are easier and less rigorous than in other parts of Canada, with the result that a great many labour people throughout Canada are most anxious to live in my constituency or in close proximity to it, or generally in that part of the country. However, it does present problems to the municipalities. Apart from industrial strife and pointing the way to industrial improvements throughout the whole country, there are problems caused by the influx of labour. These are felt very much by the municipal authorities, and confront them day by day.

If I may quote a few figures, in 1954 the city of Windsor, in co-operation with the province of Ontario, appropriated $193,273 for relief purposes. Of course that was under provincial legislation; but it so happened that in that year moneys in the amount of $250,069.82 were spent, leaving a deficit of $56,796.82. The policy of the city of Windsor has been to assist heads of families, and heads of families alone, where there is dire need. Of course if a person is an unemployed employable and has exhausted his benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act the city does what it can to find him a job and assist his family. But they assist merely in the way of providing the bare necessities of food and fuel.

In 1954 there was paid out by the city of Windsor a total of $40,768.74 for which they had appropriated $10,000, leaving a deficit of some $30,768.74. Therefore we are most grateful for the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Act, when we stop to consider that at times there have been some 11,000 or 12,000 people registered as unemployed in our local office.

The community welfare council of Windsor has been studying this matter and has made recommendations to the minister. I noted that the minister stated that the benefits under the act are to be increased. The welfare council has recommended that they be increased to $35 a week for married men and $24 a week for single men. I think an increase of 25 per cent is most generous, and will go a long way in solving some of the problems and reducing the fear which besets a great many people.

We must realize at all times that the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to relieve the fear of unemployment. It is insurance against unemployment, just the same as the fire insurance we place on a house we may own. We pay our premiums and we know exactly what we are going to get if the property should be totally destroyed by fire. This is not a dole; this is not a subsidy for employment; we must keep constantly in mind that it is insurance which we have paid for and that the benefits are ours by right.

Generally speaking the labour unions and industry in my community are most anxious that there be an increase. Times have changed since 1940, when the act was first brought in. At that time the cost of living was not so high but wages also were not so high. The dollar of that time would probably be worth something like 60 cents today. So the unions and industry are united, I believe, in requesting that there be an increased contribution by both which would result in higher benefits to the unemployed. I think the recommendation made by the minister of $30 per week for married men is most desirable.

We should keep in mind also that while wages have gone up considerably, the cost of living has increased. I am not sure from what the minister said just what maximum will be allowed as income and what the average contribution will be, but I am sure all this will be taken into consideration so that larger allowances may be provided.

There is great objection to the present provisions of the act in my constituency, where the principal industry is the automobile industry. An employee may be working seven days a week for a time; and then when things become slack he may go on a three-day week or have to find other employment. I think the method of making contributions under this act should be overhauled. As I remember, the minister stated that there was some thought of changing that, and I am in accord with what he had to say.

Before I conclude I should like to say just one word in connection with the point brought up by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that automation in industry is becoming more popular. I think that is a good thing. The Ford Motor Company of Canada has recently spent many millions of dollars in converting the plant at Windsor to one which is largely automatic. With the coming of automation and the bringing in of machines to do the work which man's hands have done in the past, the worker will have to possess greater skill. That means that if the worker has not applied himself to acquiring the necessary skill his chances of being unemployed are much greater.

I urge upon all young people who are thinking of going into industry that they take advantage of the facilities provided not only by the provincial governments and the municipalities but by the federal government, which gives assistance under the vocational training plan carried on under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour. In this machine age, in this automatic age, in this atomic age which is coming we will need the most highly skilled technicians.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, when I read the resolution that we are now debating I was somewhat at a loss to know just how we should regard this new amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act. A remark the minister made just before we adjourned for supper left me still in some doubt when he challenged the hon. member for Broadview as to whether he considered that the Unemployment Insurance Act was to be regarded as a relief measure, or whether he wished it to be an actuarially sound fund.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether it really is or ever has been actually an actuarially sound fund—that is, a fund a professional actuary would tell us was sound—because we have had to dig into the public treasury periodically. More important still, we all know that if the necessity arises we are going to dig into it again. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the very fact this act is now being amended in this way is an indication that in the government's mind it is meant to do perhaps something more than the original Unemployment Insurance Act was intended to do because—mark this, Mr. Chairman—it has been brought in this year when, for the first time since 1940, the Canadian economy has taken a downward turn, the first time that unemployment has become a really serious, dangerous economic problem.

If the amendments to the act were merely designed to make it a more generous and effective measure for the relief of occasional unemployment, then one is forced to wonder just why the government did not do this last year or the year before, when the Canadian economy was in a much better position than it is now to carry this load. Therefore I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the government itself has really not quite made up its mind what the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act is to be.

It may be, of course, that the government is still hoping that before the provisions of this new amendment fail to cope with the situation, the unemployment situation will have improved to the extent that we can go back to the sort of position we occupied last year and the year before. However, I have the idea that in the back of their minds they know that the machinery of the Unemployment Insurance Act may have to be used in the fairly near future for a rather different purpose than its original intention; that is, to cope with a growing problem of, if not permanent at least very long lived, unemployment.

For that reason I think the suggestion made this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is one that should merit considerable inspection on the part of the government. If they are going to use the act as a measure to deal with more or less permanent unemployment, then eventually the government will have to establish some sort of machinery that will provide an annual guaranteed wage for Canadian workers. I think that is really the point we have come to in our thinking today, and that is a very long way from what our thinking was a few years ago. We appear to have reached the point now where most people are prepared to admit that any Canadian citizen who is able and willing to work is entitled to his livelihood, and that if he cannot get his livelihood by means of employment in industry then the community as a whole has to come to the rescue. I suggest that is one of the uses to which this unemployment insurance legislation will eventually be put.

It is perfectly true, as the hon. leader of the Social Credit group said this afternoon, that a guaranteed annual wage will constitute a redistribution of wealth. I was rather puzzled and wondered just why he considered that was a much more superficial thing to do than to inflate the currency and distribute the diluted mixture—

Mr. Blackmore: He did not advocate inflating the currency; get the record straight.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Well, it is over 30 years ago, Mr. Chairman, that a friend of mine put in my hands a book by the late Major Douglas, which I studied with a great deal of care. In spite of the fact that Major Douglas is English, it left something to be desired. Aside from the fact that his economic theories had some fundamental flaws it was perfectly obvious from reading the A plus B theorem which I studied very carefully that in the final analysis the Social Credit theory is bluntly and plainly one of inflation—

Mr. Blackmore: Reflation, not inflation; there is a difference.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Well, "flation" anyway; "re" or "in", it is "flation" anyway. The difference amounts to this, Mr. Chairman, that rather than redistribute the wealth as suggested by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, our friends to the left here would rather increase the number of tickets for the available wealth, divide those up, and hope by some mysterious means to increase the real wealth coming to each member of society. I think the redistribution of wealth as proposed by the guaranteed annual wage is something we are going to have to face very soon.

As I said the other night on the air, I consider that the present unemployment situation is fundamentally much more ominous and serious than the problem we faced during the thirties, because at that time we were faced with a broken-down economic machine. Factories were closed down, goods were not being produced, services were not being provided and in that situation there was little cause for wonder at continual and rising unemployment. But today we have a very different situation and I submit, Mr. Chairman, it is much more dangerous and ominous. It is a situation in which our economic machine is running almost at full tilt, yet we have discarded some 600,000 of our working population, have pushed them right outside the fence.

As evidence that we have done this and that the government recognizes it, we have this resolution before us tonight. That can be the only explanation. I am not quarrelling with it but I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that it is an inadequate means of dealing with a serious and, as far as one can see, virtually permanent situation unless we introduce something in the nature of the guaranteed annual wage with its consequent redistribution of wealth. So while I am delighted to be able to support this measure, I think it is only right that the people of Canada should not be deluded into thinking it is a serious and effective means of coping with a problem that everybody except the government recognizes is the most serious we have faced since the end of the war.

We shall, of course, examine the details of the bill when it comes before us and endeavour to have it widened a little more than it is at present. Fundamentally, however, the government eventually is going to face the necessity of finding some means of providing a means of livelihood for those who have been discarded from our productive machine due to the methods by which we produce and distribute goods.

The suggestion of the minister that this is an actuarially sound insurance fund is, in my opinion, really whistling in the dark. While it is possible to present a facade of actuarial soundness by means of putting in a little bit more from the treasury, it is really rather a clumsy method of using this machinery to cope with a problem that this legislation was never intended to cope with.

I hope the government is not going to be satisfied to rest on its oars—and small oars they are; they are hardly more than little paddles—with what they produce in this resolution, but will start to cope with this problem that is going to cause the Minister of Labour continual and increasing headaches in the months to come.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to yield to the temptation tonight to get into a debate about Social Credit. I am saving my speech on Social Credit for a more suitable occasion. I am afraid that if anybody mentioned Social Credit too much we would have my good friend the hon. member for Lethbridge keeping us here all night and we would never get any Easter holidays.

Mr. Blackmore: Right you are.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): We still rise at ten o'clock.

Mr. Philpott: I am a bit sorry that the hon. member for Hamilton West is not in her seat at the moment. If she were I think I might have some remarks to make about the historical background of unemployment insurance. The first time I aspired to parliamentary office was in the constituency of Hamilton West in the year 1931. Believe me, just to espouse unemployment insurance, as I then did, was to be considered extremely radical indeed or even red.

I am also a bit sorry that the hon. member for Broadview is not in his seat, because when I heard him speak today, weeping such copious tears with a smile from ear to ear, I could not help thinking of the song by that fellow who used to sing over the radio. You could not tell whether he was crying or laughing. The words of the song—I wept at your wedding—were to this effect: Your father was crying, your mother was crying and I was crying, too; and it ends up in a great burst of laughter.

Tonight for a few moments I want to deal with some of the serious points having to do with the unemployment insurance picture. Of all the social welfare measures that have been introduced in Canada in the past generation I think this is probably the most useful one to the most people. It has been a tremendous success. All the calculations on which it was based have been proved by experience to be too conservative. We had a longer period of sustained prosperity than even the most optimistic experts had predicted. The result is that today we have in the fund a reserve, a surplus or whatever you want to call it, which is much greater than any of the statisticians could have calculated in advance.

I am heartily in support of the minister's proposal to increase the benefits. I think certain other improvements in this act could be considered as time goes on. I for one have never been able to see the justice or the common sense of striking off the rolls at the time she becomes pregnant a married woman who is employed and needs employment. I think one of the changes we could consider in the act—if not now, certainly in future years—is to provide that where a woman is working and needs work, her benefits should be allowed during her period of pregnancy just as they would be allowed for any other type of involuntary unemployment.

Tonight for a minute or two I want to speak about what seems to me the greatest weakness in our whole unemployment compensation system in Canada. This name, of course, as we all realize, is a misnomer. As the hon. member for Peace River, the leader of the Social Credit group, pointed out today this is not really unemployment insurance; it is unemployment compensation. Of course we all know that this government would not survive and—if we want to take a long-range view—for that matter the whole western system of democracy as we now have it certainly would not survive unless this problem of chronic and large-scale unemployment were solved. I think we can all take that statement for granted, and no one has ever said it better or more to the point than did our Prime Minister who sits on our front benches today.

An hon. Member: What is he going to do?

Mr. Philpott: We will know partly what he is going to do tomorrow night, when the budget comes down, because that will be the first instalment.

Tonight I am going to talk about what seems to me to be really the greatest weakness in our unemployment compensation system in Canada today, and it is this. Those who need unemployment compensation most have no coverage whatsoever. I thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a most important and, I may say, surprising revelation today when he was quoting and trying to score a point against the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when he read those quotations from the speeches and the letters of the late prime minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out that the prime minister of the day in 1940 had written to all of the provinces individually telling them that he was sure the Unemployment Insurance Act that was then being instituted would greatly reduce their burden of relief for the unemployed. I was just sorry that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had not brought that fact out a few weeks earlier, because for weeks and even months past we have heard ad nauseam the contention that the total responsibility rests with the federal government.

An hon. Member: Does it not?

Mr. Philpott: The constitutional position now is that the legal responsibility for the care of unemployed employables who are not entitled to any unemployment compensation definitely rests with the provinces.

Mr. Regier: You know better than that.

Mr. Philpott: I for one wish to urge that at the dominion-provincial conference of this year we eliminate this greatest weak spot in our whole unemployment compensation system. Tonight I am not going to venture to suggest how these unemployed employables could be covered but I urge every government in Canada—not only the federal government but every provincial government—to bring this subject to a decision, to quit this business of passing the responsibility from one to another, to come to a firm decision so that never again at any time in the future could there be any doubt as to what happens; so that everybody in this great Dominion of Canada may be sure that he does not have either to starve or to steal.

The least we can do in times of temporary unemployment, even as serious as we have had this winter and last winter, is to see that everybody in Canada who is not covered by regular unemployment insurance, as set up in this act which is now being made more generous, gets adequate assistance on an agreed in advance formula that shares the burden fairly among the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, so that never again shall any unemployed man or woman in this whole Dominion of Canada have to go around from pillar to post wondering where his or her livelihood is to come from the next day or week.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I do not feel at all qualified to talk about the technical aspects of the proposed changes in this act. As a matter of fact I feel that few are in that happy position. On the other hand, there are few who have not been affected in some way or other by this legislation in the last 14 or 15 years.

First of all, though I do not think hon. members to your right, Mr. Chairman, would wish it, I think we should dispel the growing feeling among the public that the changes suggested by the minister are going to be the answer to the very serious unemployment problem which faces us. I certainly get the feeling that the propaganda machine has been hard at work. I listened to the radio last night, and I am sure the newscast I heard would lead the unemployed to believe that parliament was embarking today on a program that would end unemployment forthwith.

Of course nothing could be further from the truth. First, it would seem that those whose need is greatest can expect little help. Those whose needs are less, and I admit there are few who need less and not more, those whose earnings might have allowed them to accumulate some savings, will gain more. I do think the major changes might have been directed toward helping those whose needs are greatest.

In addition, I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West that we should strenuously oppose restrictions on the rights of those who qualify for retirement under the age rulings in effect in certain industries, and who at present receive benefits for a period of 51 weeks. It is a wonderful help in the stress of transition for older workers. It enables them to adjust to a new setting, to get that cottage in the country, and personally I know of several who have done so. It enables them to settle down without drastic financial shock in moving from a good paying job to a nominal and sometimes inadequate pension.

I realize that unemployment benefits are in no way to be considered as a pension, nor should they be because as far as these people are concerned in nine cases out of ten the national employment service is unable to place older workers who retire at 65 and sometimes at 60. It should be remembered that these older workers cannot get the old age pension until they are 70 years of age. I definitely believe that there should be no cutting down of the 51-week benefit period for this class of recipients. We should be striving with all our power to make the declining years of our elders as pleasant and comfortable as possible.

Another point causes me some concern. It has to do with the requalification requirements. With conditions as they are this spring, I think it can be a very serious matter. I understand that a claimant will have to acquire credit for eight additional weeks in insurable employment since the commencement of his previous benefit year, must have at least 30 contribution weeks in the previous two years, and that contribution weeks more than a year old at the time of a subsequent claim cannot be used a second time to qualify either for rate or duration.

This requirement may have a very serious effect this year. It appears that we may carry a large group of unemployed right through the summer. If improvement is not noted soon, and it is a very big "if", there may be countless unemployed who will be unable to get eight weeks' credit before another autumn slack period closes down on them again. What then? They are out of luck, no matter how long they and their employers may have been contributing to this plan.

That brings me to my final point. It appears that anxiety to maintain individual equities in this scheme makes the whole program of restricted benefit. I think ordinary employers and employees have an entirely different conception of the function of the act than the technicians who draft the legislation. The ordinary layman, whether he be employer or employee, has provided the hard-earned dollars that have gone into the scheme, and it is mostly their money and not the government's. They have provided the money thinking that while they are working they are providing for those who are not, and securing their own future, feeling that if misfortune should strike them someone else will be working to provide for their help. That is, I believe, the basic thinking behind the ordinary insurance scheme, but not so here.

In order to provide effective relief I believe we will have to shake off the shackles of the individual equity requirements. The fund has plenty of money in it. I do not think it is necessary to provide additional help from the public purse, but the fund must be made an effective instrument in order that all those who need help may get it. If we do not make it so, then I think both employer and employee can allege that their money has been taken from them under false pretences.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister this afternoon when he outlined the proposed amendments to the act. Ordinarily on a resolution like this we would not try to go into the details of the legislation, but in this instance we have before us the statement of the minister. He opened up the act pretty wide and went into many of its ramifications.

I suppose it is a good thing to do it at this time because we will be recessing in a couple of days, and the minister probably wanted to give members an opportunity to discuss the matter fully before leaving.

I also listened to many of the other speeches. When the act was passed in 1940 I was a member of the house and I had the pleasure of taking part in the discussions, criticizing and trying to bring about certain amendments. I remember quite well the effort put forth by chambers of commerce, boards of trade, trust companies and others in this country. They put on a lobby in and around the house to prevent the passage of the Unemployment Insurance Act at that time. I remember many people coming to me and, mind you, these were the representatives of the captains of industry who have unemployment on their hands today. They did not want the act passed. They did not want the national employment agencies, and they do not want them now. I have no illusions about where these people stand so far as legislation of this kind is concerned.

Opposition at that time came from many directions. I remember some of those people saying to me that it was not the time to do it. It never is the time to pass social security legislation. They said that we were entering a war, that the financing of that war was going to be a terrific problem to the Canadian people, and this type of legislation would bankrupt the country.

I think the government, particularly the prime minister, showed a good deal of good judgment and courage when the act was introduced. The attitude taken was that if there was any time to embark upon legislation of this kind, that was the time to do it—during the war—because there would be full employment. We know there never is unemployment during wartime. It was felt that the war would last for some time and everybody would be working and contributing to the fund, so that it could be built up to serve as a kind of shock absorber when the war was over. Well, that is what happened.

As the minister indicated this afternoon, there is in the fund at the present time over $900 million, and about $1 billion has been paid out in benefits. It seems to me this is a pretty good illustration of the soundness of the economic and social judgment of those who were responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Act. It worked, despite the prophecies of bankruptcy that were made at the time.

I listened to the minister's outline of what he proposes to do and, so far as it goes, I can see nothing wrong with it. He is going to lift the rates from $24 to $30 for recipients with dependents, and he will step up the rate of $17.10 to $23 for those without dependents. That is all very fine for those who have benefit rights. If one is unemployed and has the right to receive benefits, then he will profit by this change. But I would remind the minister that those who need help at this time are the thousands of people across Canada, some of whom have been unemployed for the last two years, who have exhausted their rights to regular and supplementary benefits. They find themselves outside, and they have nowhere to turn.

I suggest to the minister that in some sections of the country there is unemployment to the extent of 100 per cent, and that the industries that formerly employed these people are no longer operating. This is true in many of the textile centres, and it is also true in several coal sections of Nova Scotia. These are the people for whom I thought the minister would do something when amending the act.

While I agree with these increased payments, I say those persons who are not getting anything are the ones who should have received first consideration. The difference between $24 and $30 is not going to make anyone rich. If a man has a family it will not put much more food in his house. If benefits, even to the extent of $24, had been extended to persons in that position until they were gainfully employed again, at least it would have put something into their homes and would have assured a means of livelihood for the families of men in this position. At the present time, however, they have nothing.

I have in my hand a telegram sent to the leaders of the different parties in the House of Commons on behalf of the Pictou county industrial development committee. It is signed by Mr. A. M. MacIntosh and comes from New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. I shall not read it but it says, in effect, that in the area of Pictou county the mine at Westville went out of production, and that 400 or 500 miners and their families at that point are totally unemployed and have no means of employment.

I realize the minister is doing something; I give him credit for that. He is trying to retrain some of the miners for other jobs in other areas, if they can find jobs when they are retrained. The minister knows, too, that the Allan shaft at Stellarton, within a few miles of Westville, went out of commission and about 1,400 employees have been thrown out of work. That whole area is completely and totally unemployed.

The telegram points out that in that area, affecting the towns of New Glasgow, Stellarton and Westville, over 1,500 people are receiving benefits, and that those benefits will run out by the 18th of this month. At that point there are 1,500 people who will not have anything after the date I have mentioned, and there is nowhere they can go to find employment.

A few days ago I sat in on the committee on railways and shipping and Trans-Canada Air Lines, and noticed in the capital budget of the Canadian National Railways that huge sums of money were spent and are going to be spent in the building of railway cars, sleepers and freight cars. In the Pictou area, about which I have been talking, there is a large and efficient plant that could build freight cars or sleeping cars or, for that matter, any other type of rolling stock used by the railways. I do not think orders to any extent are placed in that area, but I am wondering if in his spare time the minister might get in touch with his colleague the Minister of Transport to find out if something can be done which would benefit the 1,500 people in this Pictou area. I would ask him to get some orders for the company at Trenton to stimulate the area and create some employment. I leave this with the minister, but mention it only to show him that, while what he is doing is all right for those who have the right to benefits, it does not help those who are totally unemployed.

I do not think it is useful to quibble about responsibility in this matter. Whether we are in the municipalities, in the legislatures or in the House of Commons, as human beings and Canadian citizens it is our duty to do everything we can to see that other citizens in Canada are given at least food, clothing and shelter. In this matter we have hidden far too long behind the British North America Act, particularly in the matter of unemployment insurance, and we are trying to hide behind it again and place the responsibility for employable unemployed on the municipality. Under a constitutional interpretation that is where it is today.

After listening to conferences of mayors across this country for the last five or ten years everyone in the House of Commons knows that practically every municipality in the country is bankrupt. They have no means of taxation except against property. And in every part of the country, in every municipality, the property tax is as high as they dare put it; because if we keep on shoving up municipal taxation we will not find many people willing to buy houses and get their roots into the ground. It would be better for them to rent so they could walk out when they like, rather than take the responsibility of full citizenship.

We have taken the right to enact a measure for unemployment insurance. We went over to Westminster and, upon returning, we said, "We have this right." But we have not exercised it; or if it has been exercised, then only to a limited degree. The government has said that it is going to cover a select group in the country and insure them because it is sure most of that group will not be unemployed. The way the fund has grown is a good indication of the truth of my statement.

Let us for a moment consider the railway workers who are steadily employed and who are more or less in sheltered employment. They pay into this fund, but not many of them will get anything out of it. We have covered other industries from which we are reasonably sure there will be continuing contributions. But we have dealt out large numbers of people, those who are called the seasonal unemployed, or the regional unemployed. In many instances the unemployment across the country has lasted long enough to exhaust not only their regular benefits but their supplementaries as well.

I want to tell some hon. members who think this is just a passing phase that in my judgment it is not. The war is over. I hope we shall never see another one, but don't forget that between wars we have always had this static unemployment problem. I can remember it since I was 12 years of age, when there were no cushions against it and it was pretty tough. I can remember the period between 1914 and 1939 when we were down in the depths of the depression struggling and could not get out of it until another war came along, and then we had full employment. While we are praying for peace let us make the necessary preparations, through legislation, to utilize the money and the forces that we mobilize for war by guaranteeing our people at least sufficient to clothe, house and shelter them.

I hear many people talking in this house about building up backward nations. Build them up; but you must realize that as you build up the backward countries to which you are exporting today, they will become exporters. Take India. A few years from now India will be self-sufficient in many things, and we shall not be able to sell her anything. As we build up and raise the standards of these countries to which we are shipping our surpluses today we are putting ourselves in the position, unless we change our tactics, where we shall have surpluses on our shelves and nobody to use them, if we are not prepared to distribute them. That is the kind of world we must look forward to. If we are to have peace in the world and war no longer as the solution of our difficulties or an alternative to unemployment, these are some of the things we have to think about.

I would suggest even yet that the minister's department should give serious consideration, if not under the regular act, to the emergency measures they are prepared to take to lift the load of the employable unemployed off the municipalities, because the municipalities cannot carry it. Many of the provinces cannot carry it without assistance. It is time we got down to business and began to get away from the idea of trying to hide behind constitutions that were written in 1867, and realized our responsibilities to our fellow men as citizens of this country.

It is a sad commentary on human affairs that many of us in this house have seen two wars come and go, and we see the same conditions piling up again when there is no war. Surely we should have learned some lesson from the last two wars. If we can send billions to NATO and millions to the outside world it is pretty nearly time we began to stop talking about unemployment in Canada and began to look after our own people in so far as food, clothing and shelter are concerned.

I should like to bring another specific matter to the attention of the minister. It has to do with the waiting period. I believe the waiting period of five days should be wiped out. The unemployed paid for the five days. They insured themselves against that unemployment. It is insurance they bought and paid for; at least those who are eligible for it did so. They insured themselves against total unemployment, and in those five days they were totally unemployed.

Let me show the minister how it works in some instances. It is not so bad if a person had four or five years' steady employment and then became unemployed. The five-day waiting period is not such a bother in that case. The minister will recall that I have written to him on several occasions on this matter. I have received telegrams and letters from nearly all the mine workers' local unions in Nova Scotia.

From the month of November to April 15 there is no shipping up the St. Lawrence. The insurance is lifted in November and shipping stops. For the last couple of years practically all the mines in Nova Scotia have been working three days a week from November to April 15. The men are 50 per cent unemployed. They cannot draw unemployment insurance because of the five-day waiting period.

This is how the thing works. You are idle for three days this week. You cannot establish a claim because you are not idle five days. You go to work next week and you work three days, but those three days cannot be charged back to the previous week. You have to establish five days consecutively, unbroken. Despite the fact that the men are idle 50 per cent of the time they cannot establish a claim under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I have written the minister about it; we have talked about it. The last letter I had from him was dated February 15. I sent him a long memorandum that I had received from the executive board of the union to see if something could not be done to iron out the difficulty. The minister said he was checking with the commission to see if the establishment of what we wanted would upset the actuarial plan of the fund. I have not heard any more about it since, but in view of the fact that it has been an active matter for the last couple of months I thought something might have been done under the act with regard to the five waiting days.

If you cannot wipe out the five-day waiting period altogether some regulation should be drawn up to give a special dispensation with respect to the five-day waiting period in such instances as these, or you could make an arrangement under which the three days of this week and the three days of next week could be put together in the two weeks and then the worker would be entitled to at least one day's unemployment insurance. Then, having established their five waiting days, they would not have to re-establish the five waiting days with respect to any unemployment after that. Their claim would be established and they could carry on from there. It is a tangled proposition. It does not happen in all industries though it does happen in some, particularly in the coal mining districts where they have to ship by water.

We shall bring this matter up in committee. The minister can take a look at this again with his officials and be prepared to give us an answer in committee as to whether the suggestions made by the unions are practical or otherwise. I leave it there until the committee is in session.

May I say a word with respect to the national employment offices. There is no doubt about the value of the work they have done. As the minister indicated this afternoon, they have helped in placing some 14 million people in employment since they were established. That is a big thing in itself. There have been a lot of changes in the act and a lot of extra work has developed since the offices were set up. I am not so sure that in some of the sections of the country that I know the staff the minister has in these offices is adequate to take care of the job they have to do. The space in some of the offices certainly is not all that is desired. The minister should take a look at them right across the country, because when these offices were established it was pretty much a matter of collecting funds, meeting a few people and sending them out to work. Everyone was looking for people to work at that time.

During the past four or five years a terrific load has been placed on the national employment offices that was not anticipated when they were set up. That is particularly true with respect to space and personnel. I have seen them working night and day in my own area when the coal company decided overnight to place a directive on the radio saying that 1,600 men were to be thrown in the discard tomorrow in a certain area. That is all the notice we get. Then, of course, those offices had to handle those people and try to get them registered and their claims sorted out.

I think you should take a look at the offices. I think a lot of the personnel are greatly underpaid. You have good men in these offices who could get better jobs somewhere else with the qualifications they have. I think you should take a look at their salary ranges. I know some of them who are working for rather small wages when you realize the work they have to do and the responsibility they have to assume.

The manager or the supervisor of employment at these offices takes considerable responsibility and does not get very much help from the big organizations. I am sure that General Motors, Dominion Steel and Coal, Canada Packers and the rest of these fellows do not patronize these offices for their requirements. They run their own show. I think if these offices were accepted for the purposes they were intended to fill and could do the kind of job that was done during the war you would have a much better employment picture in most communities. The national employment offices could question personnel and make out cards listing their qualifications. Then if these industrialists would send in their employment requirements they could at least pick out the right people and put them in the right grooves. But they want to run their own show, with the result that you have a pretty conflicting employment situation in the compact communities where you have large industries. You have two sets of offices trying to deal with the same problem.

As I said in the beginning, most of these people do not want national employment offices anyway. They want to run their own show. When they run it into the ground the only thing they want from the government is subsidies. They get themselves in the hole and then they say that if they are given $65 million they will be able to carry on. But they say to the government, "You cannot tell me whom to hire; you have no right to tell me anything." I suggest that the minister take a look at these offices with special reference to space and personnel, to see if they are being overloaded at the present time. My own experience is that they are badly overloaded, and more people could be used to good advantage.

Then a word with regard to regulation 5A under section 35 of the act. This is my particular baby, as I suppose I have done more hollering and written more letters in the last five years about it than anyone else in the house. I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West; regulation 5A should be taken out of the act. It is not a regulation, it is a bear trap for married women. I would not mind if it were applied as it was intended to be applied, but here is what happens.

Say a girl is working for the telephone company—I run into a lot of them—and she knows nothing about this regulation. She intends to get married, and her vacation is coming up. A good time to get married and have a honeymoon is during your vacation. She intends to come back to work. She goes and gets married, comes back and works for a few months and finds that nature has played her a trick and she has to stop working. She may have paid unemployment insurance for ten years, and naturally expects that she will get the benefits. But when she makes her application the manager tells her that she cannot get unemployment insurance, that getting married or the result of marriage is not a reason for being unemployed. She is told that she will have to come back to work for 90 days in insurable employment, and then she can obtain unemployment insurance.

I have known of cases where a girl got married, went back to work and worked for three years. Then she stopped work or was let out. I know of several who were let out. When they applied for unemployment insurance the manager told them they could not get it as they had been married three years ago and this was their first job separation. He told them they could not get unemployment insurance unless they went back to work for 90 days in insurable employment. A woman may work three years after marriage, but she cannot get benefits because of regulation 5A. This forces a woman who is going to get married to leave her employment for that purpose, then reapply for employment which she may never get.

This makes for dishonesty, because if an employer will say the girl had been let out because he has a policy against employing married women she can get the benefits under those circumstances. But her employers must lie for her. Or he can say that there was not enough work and they had to let her out. She would then get her unemployment insurance. But if he tells the truth and she tells the truth she is penalized by being refused the benefits of unemployment insurance.

I suggest to the minister that before he finalizes the bill before the committee he lift out regulation 5A. There is no redress from it. I have handled two test cases. I went before the board of referees, but before you can make an appeal to the umpire here in Ottawa you must get a split decision by the board. You have to break the board in two, and I did that twice. I brought the cases right through to the umpire, but it was no use. There is no way around this bear trap, so I suggest that it should just be lifted out and put out of the way. Section 35 as it is without regulation 5A is all right, but in my judgment 5A is all wrong.

I should like to say a few words about the problem of employment as related to technological advances. Automation is the new word now. They always get a smokescreen. If you used the word automation through the country the average worker would think you were talking about one of these little tin men you make run around with electronics. This is merely technological advance. In plain and simple language it means that the machine is replacing man.

When I hear people say that a large public works program is needed my mind goes back to the Canso causeway. The prediction in 1952 was that this would employ 1,500 people and take three years to build. Well, it took 262 people 18 months to do that job with the machinery that was employed. The St. Lawrence seaway is visualized as providing employment for thousands and thousands of people, but just wait until they get at it. With the equipment they have available today they will dig that seaway with so few people in such a short space of time that you will think it was always there. That is not the answer. Public works are simply a palliative or a stop-gap; they may help in some communities, but they do not provide the answer to unemployment.

You say that we cannot stop progress. That is fine, but I do not consider it progress when you are placing thousands and thousands of people permanently in a position where they cannot provide a living for themselves. The figures which are placed on the right side of the balance sheet by the use of equipment in my judgment do not represent the kind of progress we need in this country.

We have to answer this question. If we are going to perfect machinery which is to take the place of man then we must answer the question whether man is going to be the servant of the machine or the machine the servant of man. That is the question we have to answer. The answer to date has been that man is going to be the servant of the machine, but the fact is that there will be a small number of privileged few who will amass great fortunes for themselves and in doing so bring about poverty and misery and degradation for the many.

In the final analysis that is what this question of unemployment boils down to. There are things we can do about it and there are things we will have to do about it. Don't forget that we are always talking about our way of life. Our way of life is the way the average person lives. A fellow who is unemployed who looks at his family starving is not going to take kindly to all this talk about the British North America Act and technological advances and automation and all that sort of stuff. That is not going to satisfy him. If he is hungry he will want something to eat, and he will likely accept any kind of proposition which guarantees that he will get something to eat.

I think Canada and the United States must begin to consider the production we now have and our potential production which will be increased because of the terrific advances we are making in equipment and machinery. We must consider what we are going to do with it, how we will use it and what we will do with our surpluses. We have to start thinking about the establishment of the six-hour day and the reorganization of our working forces across the country to make more employment for more people in order to give those who are working and producing and paying taxes a little more leisure. I think if we were working in a mine, a steel plant or a factory, where one is required to drive at top speed, we would agree that six hours in one of those places is long enough. A little more time should be spent in the sunshine, or in reading or recreation.

More people must be given work. That is the only way we can give the average citizen a share in the progress we are making in the field of automation or technological progress. There is no other way of doing it, and we have to start thinking about it.

I think the guaranteed annual wage is something that has to be taken into consideration. I said that in this house six years ago, long before they began to talk about it in the United States. I said that people who have employment have as much right to a guarantee that they are going to eat seven days a week as the managerial staff and the white-collar staff. The latter have it now. All civil servants have it. Anyone who works for the government has a guaranteed wage, sick leave arrangements and all those things.

In asking for a guaranteed annual wage industry is merely asking for something that is already established in many sections of our society, and I do not think anyone who takes that position is being unreasonable because in the final analysis the fishermen, the miners, the farmers and the workers produce the wealth of the entire country. The others are service organizations and a necessary part of organized society, but without the primary producers there would be no need for managerial or white-collar staffs, or anything else.

I have never forgotten one statement Abraham Lincoln made in his day on that particular subject. He agreed that capital had a right to a return on its investment, but he said that labour had a prior right because labour came first and if it were not for labour there would be no capital. That was the position he took, and I think his statement is equally true today. In my judgment the implementation of the principle he enunciated at that time can be brought about only by the guaranteed annual wage.

Probably there are dangers for the worker in the guaranteed annual wage in that he becomes a partner in the industry and is tied to the bondholders and stockholders and must go along with the industry. However, it might be the instrument that would prevent many of the upheavals which occur every year or two in the renegotiation of contracts; it could serve that purpose. A lot of union men would not like the workers to tie themselves to industry in that way, but I am glad to see that a man like Walter Reuther in the United States is supporting it very strongly, and a certain section of the Canadian unions is also doing so.

I think it would be well for the minister, perhaps through an interdepartmental committee, to look at the question of the six-hour day and the guaranteed annual wage, and to do some research on it; because it has to come and it will come and we should bring it about in a sensible, organized way based on good solid research, as was done when the Unemployment Insurance Act was created.

Another thing which I think the department should be thinking about in the field of social security is a national retirement allowance. I have said that in this house a good many times. The types of industrial pension which we have today are a means by which we throw away a good many millions of dollars. Every industry whether big or small has its own little pension plan under our present system, and none of them is adequate. The pittance they pay means very little at the end of the trail and although hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in them I think they serve little purpose.

I said a long time ago that there is only one way we can adequately cover the people of this country with a retiring allowance, and that is by the means used in establishing the old age security fund. If it is negotiated with those who are affected I am convinced they will turn over the funds they have invested today and use them as the basis for a national retiring allowance, and then everybody can be covered by taxation. It might cost 6 per cent, which is the average percentage of my income contributed during the time I am working, to give me a retiring allowance of $100 or $125 a month. I think every worker in this country would be prepared to pay it. It could be put in the hands of a branch like the annuities branch, people who are competent and capable of handling that type of thing. Then when I reached age 65 I would retire and would have the guarantee of the government behind me. I would receive my cheque regularly, just as pension cheques and family allowance cheques are distributed regularly. That would represent real security and it is the only way we can adequately cover the people of this country.

I have made that statement several times in past sessions, and as a result I have received a great many letters from small industrialists in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and other sections of the country. Their letters told me to keep on pushing for that kind of allowance because they felt I was on the right track. They said that they as small industries find themselves in the position that they cannot offer the kind of pensions offered by large companies. They said they would like to protect their workers but cannot, but under the scheme I advocated they could contribute through taxation and cover their workers in the way they would like to do it. They said this would bring uniformity right across the country, and everyone would know they had a guarantee with regard to retiring allowances.

As it is today the pensions established in industry are only as secure as the balance sheet of the industry, and many of them are going into liquidation after workers have paid into the plan for years. When the company fails and there are a lot of men approaching retiring age there is nothing for the men and they receive no return on their contribution. I have seen it happen in industries close to where I live. That is another matter the department should take a look at.

If we are going to retain the kind of society we have, then we have to start doing that kind of thing. We cannot continue as we have for the last two generations, when we had unemployment, misery, poverty and no future for the youth of the country who were the lost generation between the last two wars, riding box cars from coast to coast. No one assumed responsibility for them. We cannot carry on like that any further.

Many promises were made after the last war, but we are on the same trail we were on in 1939, prior to the second world war. We cannot go on like that. We have to start measuring up and introducing social changes. War is no longer going to be an alternative in this country or in the United States in relation to the question of decent living standards.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said more than I intended to say. I could continue to talk for hours on this particular subject, but I shall allow my case to rest there.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I listened with keen interest to the talk given by the Minister of Labour this afternoon. I noticed one sentence in which he said that this amendment and the implications thereof were all of one and the same piece. To me that was a rather significant sentence. He says it is all of one and the same piece; it is all inadequate and all of the same inadequacy. I noticed another sentence of his that I thought was rather significant, when he said "We must not lessen the incentive to work if work is available". That sentence reminded me of the many insinuations I have heard to the effect that there are a number of people who love to see a large number of unemployed. To them a large number of unemployed means that they are able to keep labour in its place, as they see it.

Mr. Gregg: Will the hon. member tell me the words I used that would lead him to believe that I said I was glad to see a large number of unemployed?

Mr. Regier: I am sorry, but I did not mean to say that. As far as I remember the words they were that we must not lessen the incentive to work if work is available. If the minister would like to deny that sentence, I shall be most happy to hear him.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I come back to my statement that this Liberal government—and I think a Conservative government would feel the same way about it—are most happy to see a large number of unemployed available to those who are engaged in the business of hiring labour.

Then I noticed another qualification he made, when he said that any amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act must be suitable to Canadian needs. I go on to a further point of his which I do not think is unrelated. He said the fund must remain actuarially sound. I am just wondering whether the opinion of the Liberal government that the fund must remain actuarially sound is in the light of its being suitable to Canadian needs. I should like to emphasize the word "needs", because I do not think the matter of our unemployment insurance fund remaining actuarially sound is necessarily in line with Canadian needs.

I was greatly pleased to note that the minister gave some attention to the fact that married women at times were causing an unnecessary drain on the unemployment insurance fund. I agree with him wholeheartedly in this matter. I feel that it is the height of stupidity to allow what goes on today. I was one of the members of the House of Commons who first insisted on the right of a married woman to employment. However, I hope I am not one of the first members in this chamber to realize also that a married woman does not need the benefits of the unemployment insurance fund if there is a member of the household who is in receipt of a regular wage.

Then I noticed the note on which the minister concluded, and to me this was the crowning glory of it all. He spoke of a Canadian social security program and said that these amendments amounted to a twentieth century program of the workers' rights. I regret that I was unable to wait until I had received a copy of Hansard in order to verify what the minister actually had said. However, if he feels that these amendments amount to a twentieth century program of the workers' rights, I am afraid he is about 100 years behind the times in his conception of what are the workers' rights in the modern world of today.

In considering amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act I realize that I may be a little unorthodox in this chamber. However, I feel that the various classes of unemployment insurance benefits are completely unrealistic. The very fact that we should have the rich unemployed and the poor unemployed is to me antagonistic. When we see a married man who is unemployed going up to the desk to receive his unemployment insurance benefit and receiving $30 a week and then see the next man, who maybe has an even larger family than the man who received $30, receiving less than $30—let us say possibly $18 a week—to me it is wrong. Let us not have the rich poor and the poor poor. Unemployment insurance was meant as a measure to help people get the bare necessities when they were out of work and not in receipt of a regular wage. I do not think we should make a class distinction at this stage of the game.

The other fault I find with our act is the duration of the period during which a man is entitled to unemployment insurance. I feel that unemployment insurance payments should be payable to a man until work is found. I know this suggestion may not agree with some of the recommendations of some of our major labour unions. However, I feel that at the forthcoming meeting of the Prime Minister of Canada with the ten premiers of the various provinces one of the finest things he might do would be to offer to amend our Unemployment Insurance Act so that unemployment insurance benefits will be payable to any employable unemployed until such time as work is found, irrespective of the number of contributions he may have made. I realize that this is an extension of the idea of supplementary payments. However, I believe it is one way of implementing the pledge given in 1945.

I should like to refer now, and I mentioned it a year ago, to the high overhead cost of social security in Canada as a result of the methods that are followed. In my view the overhead cost with respect to social security is away beyond all reason. I think the method of collection is needlessly expensive. The cost of unemployment insurance is carried by the working people of Canada. Most of the working people of our nation pay income taxes. I think a lot of money might be saved if we did away completely with the cumbersome system of unemployment insurance stamps, which is a burden to both employer and employee, and included the amounts payable in income tax payments. In that way we would be able to save a lot of money for the people of Canada.

Then I have also often wondered about this phase of unemployment insurance. A person registers for unemployment insurance and goes through a more or less mechanical procedure. If there is a vacancy the person is recommended and is asked to apply for the job. I feel a lot of help could be rendered to the unemployed and the nation at large if some advice were given in the matter of employment. I sometimes think that the people who administer the employment offices do not have the necessary training in psychology and otherwise to advise people properly so they may find suitable employment. I think a great deal can be done by the department in that field.

The guaranteed annual wage has also been mentioned. We are told that the employer pays 40 per cent of unemployment insurance premiums, the employee pays 40 per cent and the government pays the remainder. I fail to see the logic of making the employer responsible at all. If we are going to hold the employer responsible, then why pick on 40 per cent? Why is it not 5 per cent or 80 per cent? I ask the minister to consider seriously to what extent and in what respect the employer is really responsible for unemployment insurance. I do not think there is any logic in the present arrangement. Coming back to the question of the guaranteed annual wage, I think employers in some industries might be held responsible to some degree, and the government to some extent might also go a long way toward helping the employer assume his responsibility.

I come from the lower mainland of British Columbia. We have there, for example, a construction industry. The minimum wage of the carpenters' union is about $2.25 an hour. I would say that if you should offer any union carpenter of the lower mainland $1.75 an hour and year-round employment he would be most happy to accept it. The matter of financing is involved, and I agree that small enterprisers are not able to meet the expense. However, at the beginning of November the larger industries could have a large number of homes walled in and roofed which the men could spend the winter months finishing. I submit that the guaranteed annual wage is not as far-fetched as many people might imagine it to be. I think it would actually lower the cost of production rather than increase it, as the hon. member for Peace River insinuated this afternoon. If seasonable unemployment is one of our major difficulties I believe some thought might be given to the seasonal employer and how the government might help him to become a year-round employer.

There is one other matter respecting unemployment insurance to which I have given some thought. The other night I saw a pamphlet put out by the Blue Cross health insurance organization, and I noticed that it contained various limitations. There were limitations of $100 for this, $400 for this, $300 for this, $150 for this, and so on. I submit that the average workingman does not need insurance to cover him to the extent of $100, $200, or even $400. What he needs by way of health insurance is coverage that will take care of the bill for $1,500 or $3,000 with which he may be faced.

Relating that to the matter of unemployment insurance, the average workingman receiving $300 a month or more does not need insurance to cover him for one month or three months. I submit what he needs is insurance that will cover him for one year, two years or three years. When we come to the regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act we find that the workingman does not have any insurance against the situation for which he needs insurance. He has insurance for one month and, if I understood the minister correctly, up to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 11 months, but he does not have insurance to take care of the situation for which he really needs insurance. It is just the same as in the field of health, and all the private health and hospital insurance schemes are alike in this regard. They will not give you insurance to cover the situation for which you really need insurance. They will only insure you to a limited extent. So too the government of Canada only provides insurance for the unemployed for a limited period, a period during which they might easily get by on their own.

I regret the continued demands for eliminating this waiting period or that waiting period. The unemployed people of Canada need insurance for something for which the government is unwilling to give them insurance. They need insurance to cover long-term unemployment. If the minister thinks this does not apply to the average worker, may I say that it certainly does apply to the unemployed worker once he has reached the age of 40 or over, or even 35 or over.

We have had unemployment insurance for some time now, and it is about time we revised our attitude toward it. First of all, we do not want insurance; we want employment. We want employment at decent wages. And second, if we have unemployment insurance. then we want to have it payable not until the benefits expire but until employment is again found for us.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the hour is getting late and I am not going to speak at length. I must say I listened with interest to the minister's statement on this resolution. However, it is usually my practice to read such statements so I am quite clear on what has been said.

I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Cape Breton South have placed the position of this group clearly before the committee. I did enjoy the historical review of the evolution of unemployment legislation given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. While he was giving it I was inclined to think in terms of the past, and my thoughts went back 50 years and to the tortuous path the federal government has taken in accepting the responsibility for labour legislation.

In the early days of this century the federal government accepted certain responsibility in connection with legislation for unions, as applying to workers within the provinces. Then in 1903 a royal commission was set up by the federal government to investigate strikes and serious labour troubles occurring in the gold mining and hard rock mining industries of British Columbia, as well as among carpenters and workers on the railways. That commission went to British Columbia and after some months made a report to the House of Commons. I might add that the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King was secretary to that commission. The concluding paragraph of the commission's report, it seems to me, does indicate the great improvement in our outlook toward labour problems. The concluding paragraph of this report, which dealt with industrial disputes in the province of British Columbia, is in these words:

> At the same time we feel quite free to admit that, while much good can be accomplished by wise legislation, the labour problem, so-called, is incapable of final solution, and that it will be with us as long as human nature remains what it is, and present civilization endures.

I think there is a very different outlook today toward labour problems, and since that time we have made a great deal of progress. In this report, which was presented to the House of Commons, the commissioners recommended that labour disputes in British Columbia go before the exchequer court and be dealt with there.

This calls to mind an early experience of the former prime minister in my constituency. He was sent out there, as deputy minister, to act as conciliation officer in a dispute between the western federation of miners and certain mining companies in Rossland, British Columbia. I remember reading in the newspapers about his trip. I thought the Rossland paper stated the situation rather well when, adopting the crisp form of news reporting followed by those early weekly papers, it said:

> A roly-poly man with a cherubic face, in a bowler hat, riding a scraggy nag arrived in Rossland. He was the deputy minister of labour, Mr. Mackenzie King.

This would seem to indicate that at that time the federal government accepted some responsibility for labour problems involving men who were not employed in national industries.

Then we have seen, in the lapse of years, a change in the situation. It has been found necessary to change the constitution before the workingmen of Canada could get unemployment insurance. Possibly the minister will be able to explain the reason for this changed situation. This change became even more interesting to me because of the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I should like now to place before the minister certain anomalies I have found in the act, in my experience. A good many persons have brought the matter to my attention, and I shall bring it before the House of Commons. I refer to the position of men who work in forestry in British Columbia. These men are found in quite large numbers in the central part of the province, and I presume there are many of them in other parts. They go out on duties such as surveys, or felling snags, or burning brush, or slashing, or any other work required in the conservation of timber. While the cooks in the camp who cook for them, or the carpenters who build their camps, or the men who build the trails for the various roads are covered by unemployment insurance, those men who work at felling the timber, cutting the logs, slashing the brush or burning it are not covered by the act.

In this connection I wish to read a letter which outlines clearly what I have in mind. Before doing so, however, let me pay tribute to the local management of the national employment service in my district, particularly in recent years. The manager there has done excellent work in visiting small communities and attending meetings of the Legion, trade unions, various institutes or lumbermen's organizations, and has taken great pains to explain the regulations and how applications should be sent in. These visits have been most helpful and have cut down the loss of time that formerly occurred because forms were filled out improperly because those who filled them out did not understand the regulations and the procedure.

The letter I have before me was written by the manager of the local employment office in reply to a young man who had worked during the summer at cutting logs and felling trees, who eventually became unemployed and expected to receive unemployment insurance. This was the letter he received:

Dear Sir:

We refer to your letter of January 25, 1954.

We regret the delay in answering your letter. The delay was due to the fact that we requested an official ruling from Ottawa in respect to your case.

This, may I say, is only one case of a good many.

As we previously stated to you, your employment with the B.C. forest service was considered as employment in forestry, and therefore not insurable.

For your information, we quote an extract from the letter received from Ottawa:

"As you have told Mr. Rogers, employment in forestry is not one of the employments at present covered by the act. It is specified as an excepted employment in part II of the schedule to the act. The expression 'employment in forestry' is interpreted as meaning the cultivation of forests, the management of growing timber and the prevention of forest fires. To ensure uniformity of interpretation throughout the province, we have determined with the concurrence of the British Columbia forest service the classes of employees of this department who are to be insured and those who should not be insured. Thus clerical staff, research workers, draftsmen, truck and tractor operators, mechanics, carpenters, dispatchers, and scalers are insured because they are not directly engaged in forestry work."

In my opinion this is a most hair-splitting decision. It continues:

"On the other hand, foresters, lookout men, rangers, patrolmen, cruisers, fire suppression crewmen, and those engaged in tree planting and clearing brush, etc., are, of course, not insured as this work is actual forestry.

Mr. Rogers and his crew were engaged in clearing brush after logging operations. This is an operation classed as forestry and the employment was not insurable. Cooks, like carpenters and mechanics, are not engaged in a forestry occupation. They are tradesmen engaged in their own trade and are properly insured."

In view of the above information, we feel that your standing in respect to unemployment insurance coverage should be quite clear.

I bring that to the minister's attention because it does work a hardship on a good number of men, and the very men who do the casual work. The men who are covered are, on the whole, year-round employees of the forestry service of British Columbia; but the men who are hired in the summertime to go out and clear up the debris to prevent fires, and who in some cases do the slashing and tree-top lopping of timber in areas in which private operators had been working, do work identical with that which is being done by men who work in the woods. Under the present regulations under the act they are not covered. I bring this to the minister's attention because it does work a hardship on a good number of men who are employed in that work for possibly eight or ten months every year and are then laid off; whereas most of those who are employed throughout the year are covered by the act.

I ask the minister to look into the question because there is an absurdity in the definition or application of the word "forestry".

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, in listening to this very interesting debate I realize that the hon. member for Cape Breton South and

I are the only two of those who have spoken who were here in 1940 when the legislation was passed, though quite a number of other hon. members on both sides of the house were here at that time.

Hon. members who were here then will recall that June 25, 1940, was a pretty black day. The Germans had overrun the low countries and France, and everyone was quite worried about the future. However, the government of the day, anxious to get the very best from Canada's working force, felt that unemployment insurance should be made law. While members of all parties gave enthusiastic support to this legislation, yet it is obvious from the present problem that confronts Canada that this proposal is not adequate. I am sure no one is going to oppose it, but if this is the government's major answer to Canada's present unemployment problem, it just is not good enough.

The hon. member for Vancouver South suggested that the provinces have a real interest and responsibility in this field. I would like to remind the house that on June 25, 1940, the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, in introducing the resolution that asked Westminster to change the British North America Act, said, as reported at page 1109 of Hansard:

> And whereas, if a uniform and effective system of compulsory unemployment insurance is to be adopted throughout Canada, it will be necessary to amend the British North America Act, 1867, to enable the parliament of Canada to enact the necessary legislation;—

In due course section 91 of the British North America Act was amended by adding thereto as class 2A the following:

> 2A. Unemployment insurance.

Section 91 of the British North America Act reads—I shall not read the whole paragraph—

> —and for greater certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—

Then it gives a list of 29 fields such as the following: postal service, the census and statistics and, of course, unemployment insurance. As it stands now, under the British North America Act no province would be permitted to pass unemployment insurance legislation even if such province had the funds, and I think it is pretty obvious that since the provinces and the municipalities get such a small share of the taxpayer's dollar to spend they would not be able to undertake the responsibility of dealing with the unemployment situation we now have in Canada.

In another debate the hon. member for Saskatoon said something about the leakage that is involved in connection with public works projects. For example, if the government of Saskatchewan were to undertake the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam, we shall say at a cost of $100 million, not more than $25 million of the total would be of any assistance to the province of Saskatchewan in providing work with wages or business for the business organizations of that province. About half the amount would benefit other provinces of Canada, and almost 25 per cent of the total would benefit places other than Canada. Since the country in which we live is dependent upon each section, I think it was quite right that in 1940 we should have changed the British North America Act to make it perfectly clear that the federal government should have the responsibility for dealing with the problem of unemployment.

Several of my colleagues have referred to the guaranteed annual income. Tomorrow night the Minister of Finance is going to bring down the budget, which is looked forward to with a great deal of interest. Representations have been made to the minister that he reduce the income tax. I for one have never made such representations to him, and indeed I have said there are a great many more people in Canada who are worrying because they cannot pay income tax than are worrying because the income tax is too high.

Those who are paying income tax are granted certain exemptions. A single person has an exemption of $1,000 and a married person of $2,000. Since we have accepted that principle for so many years we should also accept the principle that every person in Canada should have a guaranteed income, that no one should have to live on less than a certain amount. I am not going to say what that amount should be, but if we are to have for income tax purposes an exemption of $2,000 for married persons and $1,000 for single persons, we should decide that the economy of Canada will stand an income for every person of the country.

The automobile industry has been mentioned. Walter Reuther, of the United Automobile Workers, emphasized in Cleveland the other day that the industry should be prepared to guarantee an annual income to everyone in the automobile industry. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the general manager, all directors, the sales staff, and all the office workers in that industry now have a guaranteed annual income. I submit that the machinists and the mechanics who do the work in the factories, and are just as necessary to produce automobiles as are the officials, should have a guaranteed annual income provided by this industry as a part of the cost of producing automobiles.

In the white paper today the Minister of Finance mentioned that last year the gross national product was worth around $24 billion. If my arithmetic is correct that works out to about $1,600 for every man, woman and child in the country. We can face the fact that we can increase this amount or we can decrease it. We can increase the $24 billion by making it possible for every able-bodied person in Canada to perform some useful work. I submit that while the Minister of Labour has not been charged with this responsibility so far, he should ask his colleagues to give him the wider powers and the necessary funds so he can bring in legislation in order that the 600,000 people who are now in the ranks of the unemployed might look forward to finding a chance to do some creative work.

It is as plain as a, b, c. If the 600,000 people are given a chance to do creative work the gross national product next year will be a good deal higher than the $24 billion mentioned by the Minister of Finance. On the radio the other night the hon. member for Nanaimo mentioned that the gross national product was down about $600 million as a result of the failure of the wheat crop in the prairie provinces. That factor is having a very direct effect on the unemployment problem. Farmers who lost their crops last year or those who have not been able to sell their crops are not included in the 600,000 in the ranks of the unemployed, but many of those farmers are in a position where they are denied the privilege of buying their fair share of the goods available in Canada. I submit that the municipal and provincial authorities cannot cope with this problem, but in my opinion the federal government can deal with the problem of the farm population receiving $600 million less in the way of purchasing power.

The Deputy Chairman: I have been following this debate all day and have been making what I consider a rather determined effort not to curtail the discussion of every aspect of unemployment insurance, including a great many aspects of unemployment. But I am afraid I must come to the conclusion that a guaranteed annual wage or other provisions whereby a shortage of farm income on the prairies can be corrected by federal government action cannot be said to come within the purview of this resolution, which states that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act. I particularly do not want to curtail the hon. member after having allowed other hon. members to discuss a guaranteed annual wage and so on, but I am strongly of the opinion that the hon. member who now has the floor has really gone beyond the Unemployment Insurance Act, and I think he will have very little difficulty coming back to it.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I had finished with that and I am going to conclude promptly. In conclusion I would like to remind the cabinet particularly that when this legislation was passed originally the then minister of finance announced the theory that whatever is physically possible will be made financially possible. That was a sound financial theory, and it is equally sound today.

The Deputy Chairman: I do ask the hon. member to co-operate. We really are not discussing the general outlines of financial systems; we are discussing whether it is expedient to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act. I would ask the hon. member to help to keep the discussion somewhere on the track.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I am concluding. I think the minister should recommend to the committee that necessary amendments be made to the legislation so he can deal with the problem of the other people who are unemployed but who are not going to be covered by this legislation.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I assure you that I am going to speak to the motion now before us as to the advisability of amending and consolidating the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am certain in my own mind that practically all the workers in Canada will welcome the progressive amendments which were outlined to this committee this afternoon and which will be included in the bill the minister proposes to bring in to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act.

However, in listening to the minister this afternoon I must admit that I was somewhat puzzled by certain phases of his explanation as to the policies and amendments he had in mind. As we are in committee stage on the resolution I would like to deal with about three of those phases which are giving me some puzzlement and which I think most definitely should be clarified before we have the actual introduction and second reading of the bill, in order that the Minister of Labour can give us a clearer understanding and explanation as to the motives and purposes behind the three phases which I desire to discuss.

As there are three phases which I want to talk about I should like to call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall take as the first item No. 5, consideration of amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 4, to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas. I understand that these are very minor amendments and so far as I am aware there is no objection to them in the house and we could dispose of the bill almost at once. Then we shall continue with this debate; then take the adjourned debate on the motion to go into supply, and then the adjourned debate on the motion with respect to the reference of external affairs items to the special committee. I would hope that we can conclude all these items of business before we adjourn on Wednesday evening.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 5, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

SIR WINSTON CHURCHILL

EXPRESSION OF TRIBUTES ON OCCASION OF RETIREMENT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the following announcement from London reached Canada just about an hour ago:

> The Right Honourable Sir Winston Churchill had an audience of the Queen this evening and tendered his resignation as Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury, which Her Majesty was graciously pleased to accept.

I know that the thoughts of all hon. members, as indeed those of our fellow Canadians, are turned at this moment toward that very great statesman of our time. His decision to seek Her Majesty's acceptance of his resignation will be received with mixed feelings. All of us know that no one more richly deserves a respite from the overpowering public responsibility that high office imposes. But we shall miss a leadership which for so many years—and especially in the anxious days of war—has inspired and encouraged the people of the commonwealth of nations and indeed the whole free world.

Sir Winston, during his 80 years of restless activity, has played many parts. Few figures in history have compressed so many careers in a single life span. He has been soldier, author, painter, lecturer, journalist and statesman, and he has won recognition in all. But on this occasion peace-loving people throughout the world remember first with deepest gratitude his unequalled contribution to the cause of human freedom and peace. They recall especially that time of great adversity, when the commonwealth stood alone against the forces of nazism, and democracy was in such grave peril—how his actions and his words inspired in us then courage and hope—those qualities which were so desperately needed.

Referring to that struggle, on his 80th birthday, he said:

> I have never accepted what many people have kindly said, namely, that I inspired the nation. Their will was resolute and remorseless, and it proved unconquerable . . . It was the nation and the race dwelling all round the globe that had the lion's heart; I had the luck to be called upon to give the 'roar'.

We all realize that Sir Winston's contribution was infinitely beyond what his modesty would allow him to admit, and we all agree that his "roar" was one of the greatest and most memorable sounds ever to come from a human throat.

With victory won, Sir Winston could have retired secure in the knowledge that he had accomplished more in his lifetime, on behalf of his fellow men, than most men are called to do. But the restless Elizabethan spirit which possessed him, and his deep sense of public service, would not permit him even the briefest respite. He continued to devote his great talents and energies, both in opposition and in government, to the problems confronting his nation and to the cause of peace which had been so dearly won.

Canadians have been privileged to greet this great world leader many times. But I do not suppose any visit gave us greater joy than the one he made here last summer; for we were able to see for ourselves how completely he had recovered from his grave illness of two years ago. The citizens of Ottawa who lined the streets of this city during that visit will recall with warm delight how, in order to better exchange greetings with them, he climbed up on the back seat of the convertible automobile and gave them his famous victory sign.

Two months ago I had the privilege of attending the last prime ministers' conference with Sir Winston as chairman. He was immensely proud of our great commonwealth of nations, and I do not think any occasion pleased him more than to have the commonwealth leaders assembled in London to discuss the many problems confronting our association and the world at large. I know each of us there was filled with admiration and respect for the manner in which he conducted our discussions and for the brilliant analysis he gave us of the problems before us.

As Sir Winston Churchill steps down from the post of prime minister of Great Britain, I am sure that all Canadians will extend to him their most affectionate and grateful greetings and offer their sincere prayer that he and Lady Churchill may enjoy many more years of health and happiness together.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think that most of us here today have an uneasy feeling that the end of a great period of parliamentary history has now appeared before our eyes. However, it would be wrong to suggest that the resignation of Sir Winston Churchill changes substantially the great institutions with which he has been associated for more than half a century. Of course the first impression is one of immense loss in the departure from the active parliamentary scene of the greatest parliamentarian of all time.

For fifteen years he has been the authentic leader of the free world. For fifteen years it has been his voice that has given expression to the hopes and aspirations and fortitude of people who have seen much that they cherished disappear, but have found comfort in his unwavering faith in the religious background of our life and in the strength of democracy itself to survive every change that may come.

It is a long time since the desperate days of 1940 when Britain stood alone—not alone, in fact, because there was the whole commonwealth ranged at her side, but alone in the immediate presence of the enemy. At that time words were spoken which must to many have seemed almost empty expressions of a faith that could hardly be supported by the dreadful arithmetic of war.

We will always remember how with that buoyant humour, never diminishing even in the most ominous hours, he came here to make a speech which will remain on the pages of the history of all countries which love freedom. He reminded his hearers that he had been told that if Britain fought on, separated from the nazi hordes by only a little more than 20 miles, her neck would be wrung like the neck of a chicken. There is no one here who will forget the way in which he gave his answer, the pause in his remarks when he said, "Some chicken, some neck."

It was his ability then, and in the troubled years which followed, to convey his meaning in the simple colloquial terms of the people who bear the brunt of every struggle, terms which appealed to people everywhere, because the words he used were understood in every language whatever it might be.

One of the great things about his life has been his close association at all times with the United States. Along with the great speeches that were made here in Ottawa to the people of Canada are those memorable speeches which he made in Washington. He appealed to the spirit and confidence of people with the same historic background in a way that no other man could have done. He said that if conditions had been reversed, if instead of his mother being the American member of the family it had been his father, he might have got into congress on his own.

That brought him very close to the hearts of the people of the United States. I feel sure that at this hour throughout the whole United States there is the same feeling of affection, the same feeling of respect and admiration which we cherish here, because the respect for Sir Winston Churchill and all he represents is something that is limited by no international boundary but is a common heritage of free people everywhere for all time.

His boldness in the face of immense difficulties, his challenge to the enemy who thought they were certain to prevail, rallied his own people and gave them courage and strength. It is true, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has pointed out, that he sought to play down his own part. He sought to give the impression that he had merely been the interpreter of the sentiment of the people of Britain and of the commonwealth at that time. Thank God we had such an interpreter at that hour. There might have been others who with less certain voice would not have aroused the same response.

The simple fact is that no other man in history has occupied so many roles with such distinction as has Sir Winston Churchill. He is the greatest statesman of all time and I am confident that history will declare that fact. I remember that in his own book on his early life, written long before there seemed any possibility that he might occupy such a role, he spoke of the fact that seldom had a great leader in war been a great leader in peace. He then went on to make a statement the accuracy of which some of my medical friends challenge. He said that the brain is divided into two parts, of which one controls military affairs and the other deals with problems of peace, and for that reason very rarely has one man been able to be successful in both fields. Then long before he occupied a position of any substantial importance he said, "Who knows but that I may prove the exception to the rule?"

Whether his description of the brain was accurate or not, and there are those here who are more competent to express an opinion on that than I am, the fact remains that he emerged from the years of great war leadership; he tasted defeat without bitterness; he returned to power without boasting, and he has proved himself almost as great a leader in peace as in war. In fact I hesitate to place any reservation on his peacetime achievements because I have the impression that when the history of these times is written it may well be told that almost as great as his contribution to the freedom of the world in 1940 was his contribution to the unity of the western world at the time when disharmony seemed to prevail after the collapse of EDC last summer. I think it will be found that his immense prestige brought together nations which seemed then to be drawing apart, and that the growing unity of western Europe is a tribute to the manner in which he was able to speak to the leaders of other nations and bring them together at that time.

Fortunately we are not here to mourn him; on the contrary he is very much alive. The news reports we have received today state that he enjoyed a pleasant evening last night surrounded by his immediate friends and honoured by the presence of the Queen to whom he has rendered such magnificent service. How fitting it was that on his last day in office he should be host, with Lady Churchill, to the Queen whom he served so well; this remarkable man who had the unique opportunity to serve Queen Victoria, her son King Edward VII, King George V, King George VI and now the new and young Queen Elizabeth II. What an unparalleled service that has been to the institution of monarchy in which he so strongly believes. He is still very much alive and I prefer to believe that instead of this being, by any manner of means, the end of his activities we shall probably see this as the beginning of a new period of adventure which will greatly help all of us.

He now goes out, free from any suggestion of partisan political association, as the elder statesman not only of Britain but of all free nations. He enters that new period of adventure with a spirit of youth which he has expressed so well even during recent weeks. When I learned just a short time ago that his resignation was official—and most of us thought it would not be official for at least a few hours yet—I was reminded of these lines of Oliver Wendell Holmes, which it seems to me apply to him so aptly at this time:

> Call him not old, whose visionary brain
> Holds o'er the past its undivided reign.
> For him in vain the envious seasons roll
> Who bears eternal Summer in his soul.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those associated with me I wish to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in the moving tributes they have paid on the occasion of the resignation of the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill.

On occasions like this, one is tempted to look down the long avenue of time at the history of the institution of parliament which we share in common with the people of Britain and other parts of the commonwealth, and perhaps to appraise those who are in power and exercising influence within that institution. When I heard that Sir Winston Churchill had resigned I looked back and could think of no prime minister in British history who occupies a higher place in the affections of the British people, the Canadian people and indeed of the world than Sir Winston Churchill. The only name I can think of that can be placed beside that of Sir Winston Churchill is that of William Pitt the Elder, the great Earl of Chatham. He laid in large part the foundation of this commonwealth or of the British Empire, as it was called then, and Churchill in his time has been one of the architects of the modern commonwealth.

What a long span of history that is. No man, I think, has better expressed the ideals and the determinations of the democratic peoples of the world than has Churchill. I, of course, can look back to a time when Churchill was prominent in public life in the early part of this century as a pungent spokesman for the Liberal party. I remember him as an outstanding leader of the British commonwealth during the first war in the coalition government. I of course remember him later on sitting as an independent member in the British House of Commons, and now we realize that he has won the admiration and support of many people who have disagreed with him on occasion throughout the years.

When it came to the formation of that wartime government in 1940, despite the fact that many people had bitterly opposed many of his views, the Labour party said, "We will serve under Churchill, and under none other will we serve." And so today, as the curtain of public life is rung down as far as the prime ministership of Britain is concerned, one can only say that whether or not one agrees with the political philosophy which governs the party views of Sir Winston Churchill, I believe it is the glory of democracy, of this commonwealth and of this institution that on occasions like this we can all admire and pay tribute to the great services rendered by a statesman to the people of his day and his generation, whether or not one agrees with all his views.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that this parliament pauses to pay tribute to a man or a woman who is still living. This therefore marks a very interesting precedent in my experience in this house. I am very glad to join with those who have spoken this afternoon to pay tribute to a man who has earned the place he now holds in the affections of everyone. I suppose it is because Sir Winston Churchill is such an amazing man that we are doing what we are doing today, breaking new ground. This man has aroused the imagination and the admiration of free people in all parts of the world. Churchill surely represents the very best in British statesmanship, and for that reason he is looked to for advice, counsel and guidance, and this has been true for many years.

It is to be regretted that Churchill was not able to realize his dream of peace throughout the world while he was still in office. I imagine he would like to have stayed in office until he did realize his dream, but perhaps in his new-found retirement he might still be able to contribute something to the achievement of peace.

Sir Winston Churchill has earned the gratitude of many millions of people in all lands for his great services to humanity in many fields. I sincerely hope that he will have as many years as he might desire in which to enjoy his retirement, free from the responsibilities of office. And if he wishes to continue to represent his old constituency in the House of Commons I hope he will have that privilege, too.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 307, respecting the Fredericton & Grand Lake Coal & Railway Company.—Mr. Murphy (Westmorland).

TRADE

GATT—AVAILABILITY AND PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, on March 31 the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce what arrangements are being made for printing the documents pertaining to GATT which the minister tabled on March 28. We have now received from Geneva a limited number of copies of these documents bound together in a more convenient form. This includes all the documents tabled by the minister on March 28, except the declaration on the continued application of the tariff schedules. I now wish to lay on the table a copy in English and in French of this publication. This declaration referred to is not included in the documents I have tabled because it is simply one of a series of declarations affecting the GATT tariff schedules.

The documents now available in this printed form relate directly to the revision of the general agreement itself and the proposed organization for trade co-operation. Copies of these documents, and of the declaration on tariff schedules, may be obtained from the Clerk of the house.

[Mr. Low.]

The government is now giving consideration to arrangements for making available in printed form an edition of the GATT, which will make clear the nature of the general agreement as it emerged from the review session, the character of the proposed organization on trade co-operation and the significance of the declaration on continued application of tariff schedules.

OIL—REPLY OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RESTRICTIONS ON IMPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce particularly in view of the fact that we have joined in wishing him happy landings in the flight he is to make. Because in this matter he represents Canada, our good wishes go with him in the trip he is making. But I still would hope that before he leaves he will have obtained the ordinary privilege that is usually available of giving publicity to the other side of the communication which was made to this house. I would point out that the minister thought we should know about our communication to the government of the United States. I would hope that before we leave tomorrow we shall know what the answer is which has been in the hands of the government now for some time.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think I can turn over my responsibilities in this connection to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I am sure he is anxious, as are we all, to make public the reply. But international courtesy requires that we obtain the consent of the government of the United States. I think perhaps the reason for the delay may be that the subject matter of the exchange is a matter of controversy in the congress of the United States at the present time. I am suggesting that as my own idea of the reason for the delay. But I can assure my hon. friend that he can rely on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make the reply public as soon as permission can be obtained.

Mr. Coldwell: May I suggest to the minister that he exercise a little pressure on the United States in the same way that the United States exercised pressure recently on another government in connection with the publication of the Yalta papers.

Mr. Pearson: Possibly I might say a word on that point, because I do not think the government of the United States is at fault. When the note on this matter, which was tabled in the house, was received by the United States government we were informed that they would wish to make a reply to it in due course. They did give us their reaction to that note orally but we have not yet received the formal written reply. We have been pressing them very hard to get it and have indicated that we would like to have it before parliament rises. Until we get the formal written reply there is, of course, nothing that can be tabled here, and they have assured us they will do their best to furnish it before parliament rises.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that this is the first occasion we have been informed it was only an oral reply. I wish to make it quite clear that there should be no discourtesy on the part of our government with regard to a matter of this kind or of any other kind in its dealings with the government of the United States. I was under the impression that there had been the ordinary formal reply and that it was merely a case of release. That was the way it appeared from what was said in the house. The extent to which I have pressed this point was related to my understanding that the formal reply had been received and that it was merely a case of securing permission to have it released. I repeat, however, that, subject to the courtesies which I hope will always be extended in the widest measure possible in dealings with the government of the United States, the people of this country will be interested in knowing what is being done with regard to a matter that has implications going far beyond the subject matter in this case which happens to be the movement of oil across our boundaries.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REFERENCE TO LETTER RECEIVED FROM PREMIER OF SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in order to give a more positive answer than I was able to give yesterday, when I did not have the correspondence before me, to the questions asked by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) as to whether there was any suggestion from the provincial premiers about the agenda for the preliminary meeting in April, may I say that I have re-examined the correspondence and find that when we were having this correspondence and trying to arrange a date that would suit everyone, there was a letter from the premier of Saskatchewan dated March 10 in which there is this paragraph:

Inquiries of the Ministry

Press reports emanating from Ottawa have indicated that there might be some discussion of the unemployment problem at the proposed preliminary meeting in April. I think most of the provinces would welcome an opportunity of discussing this question at the preliminary meeting rather than waiting for the federal-provincial conference which is to be held later in the year.

NATURAL GAS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the speculation which is naturally appearing in the columns of the press throughout the country with regard to an extremely important matter of concern to all Canadians, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him if he would consider the advisability of having a comprehensive statement made by the government before we rise tomorrow informing the house as to what the situation actually is with regard to the use of gas from Alberta. The subject has been under discussion. It is one of concern to all Canadians. There are many in western Canada particularly who are anxious to see some action with regard to this matter. All Canadians want to know what is likely to happen with regard to something that was placed before the house in a clear and emphatic manner and dealt with on that basis a year ago.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing new that I could place before the house at this time. The gentlemen who are interested in the establishment of a pipe line in Canada to bring the gas from the west to the east are, I understand, still persisting in their efforts to work out arrangements for the private financing of that project. The government's policy with respect to gas is unchanged and remains such as was stated on March 13, 1953.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER RELATIONSHIPS OF GOVERNMENT WITH OTTAWA AND NEIGHBOURING MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the urgency of reviewing policies in connection with the capital plan and perhaps more particularly, may I say, the development of the Gatineau national park, when is the joint committee of both houses, suggested in the speech from the throne, to be set up to examine the financial and other relationships of the government and the federal district commission with the city of Ottawa and the neighbouring municipalities? I also have in mind, of course, the province of Quebec in which a large part of the park is situated.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): At the beginning of the session it was announced that we would ask Their Honours in the other place to join with us in a joint committee on this particular subject. As a matter of fact, however—and I think the house will agree with me in this statement—there has been a considerable amount of committee work in the house so far, and we thought that until it was completed or at least until a considerable part of it was completed, we would not be able to go forward with this committee out of consideration for members who would want to serve on it. After the Easter recess we shall have another look at the matter in order to see whether we can fit it into the program later on this session.

Mr. Coldwell: The idea has not been abandoned?

Mr. Harris: By no means.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BOSTON—INQUIRY AS TO MAINTENANCE OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house whether any submissions or recommendations have been made to him or to his department with respect to the maintenance or re-establishment of the Boston-Yarmouth steamship service which is threatened with permanent suspension? Can the minister tell us what action if any will be taken in that direction?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a freight steamship service between Yarmouth and Boston which operates from late September to late June. Last year Eastern Steamships Limited, an American company, operated a passenger and cargo service during the summer months. Press reports indicate that the government of Nova Scotia has been discussing a renewal of this service for the coming season. I have no knowledge of these discussions, of the provincial government's actions on this matter or of the American company's intentions. I should like to add that no representations have been made to me or to the Department of Transport.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DETERMINATION OF RADIOACTIVE PRECIPITATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of the statement he placed on the record yesterday in answer to certain order paper questions by the hon. member for York-Scarborough? Do the studies made thus far by the minister's department indicate whether or not the hydrogen and atomic bomb tests already conducted have raised the level of radioactivity to the point of danger to human life?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My hon. friend did not give me any notice of his intention to ask this question, which concerns a matter of very great importance. I would think we had already dealt with the matter in the answer tabled yesterday, but I should like to take the matter under consideration and give the hon. member an answer later.

POWER, FLUIDS AND GAS

LICENSING CONTROL OVER EXPORTATION OF ELECTRIC POWER AND FLUIDS, AND IMPORTATION OF GAS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 4, to regulate the exportation of power and fluids and the importation of gas.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BENEFIT RATES, ADJUST CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, April 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend and consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act and, inter alia,

(a) to increase benefit rates, as well as to provide for certain changes in the duration of both regular and seasonal benefits;

(b) to adjust the contributions, and to change contributions from a daily basis to a weekly earnings basis, and benefits from a daily to a weekly basis;

(c) to provide a graduated scale of allowable earnings in place of present provisions related to casual earnings and non-compensable days and,

(d) to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, when the house rose at ten o'clock last evening I was saying that I, and I think all members of the house, welcomed the recommendations of the minister as outlined by him and that I felt sure organized labour throughout Canada would also welcome them although perhaps it would be somewhat regretful that he had not gone a little further. I also pointed out that I had followed very closely the entire speech of the Minister of Labour and that I appreciated very much what I term his outline of policy before he went into the details of the bill amending and consolidating the act which he proposes to bring before the house after this motion is carried. As far as certain aspects are concerned, I found it somewhat puzzling to try to tie together his policy statement and the motivation outlined by the minister with some of the details he gave following his outline of policy.

In order to make my position clear I should like to refer to what I term the policy outline as given by the minister and quote three paragraphs found on page 2663 of yesterday's Hansard. The minister said:

> It will be apparent from what I have said, Mr. Chairman, that what the government is here proposing is not merely a series of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is something much more fundamental than that. We are undertaking, in fact, the most far-reaching revision of our unemployment insurance program that have been attempted in the decade and a half of its existence during the course of the seven times the legislation has been reviewed by the house.

Again, he said:

> Born out of the suffering and the hardship of the great depression, the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 established a new dimension of social statesmanship to which all our subsequent social legislation—family allowances, the new veterans charter, old age security, the national health program, rehabilitation of civilian disabled, have faithfully conformed. It was the passage of the Unemployment Insurance Act which enabled my predecessor, who introduced it, and all his fellow countrymen, for the first time to speak of "a Canadian social security program".

One more quotation:

> What we are doing today, in the new legislation which I have the honour to introduce, is adding a worthy addition to the steadily growing structure of social security that we have been building in Canada.

I am certain that no one in the house or, as a matter of fact, in Canada, will question the principle and the motivation as outlined in those words of the Minister of Labour. My puzzlement arises from the fact that in his outlining of the details he did not, in my humble estimation, carry through in the way we had a right to expect in view of the magnificent principles and objectives outlined by him in his policy statement. If this proposal of the minister is to be a great advance in the over-all security program of the people of Canada, I think it automatically and axiomatically follows that it should mean not only an increase in benefits to a certain group but should also definitely mean no retreat from any security measures already in effect under the legislation. In addition, it should also mean an extension so as to give greater coverage than that which has been in effect under the act up to the present time. Therefore I look forward, may I say, to a clarification of some of the details as outlined by the minister in the light of his very excellent policy pronouncements.

In his outline the Minister of Labour told us that up until now 95 per cent of all the claimants have drawn less than 30 weeks benefits. I take it, sir, it is because of that, and one or two other factors, that a change is being made to reduce the maximum payments from 51 weeks down to 30 weeks. It may not seem of major importance, but in principle I think it is. The details given to us on this matter by the minister actually mean that according to the experience of the unemployment insurance commission over the many years, 5 per cent are going to lose a security coverage which they previously had. I believe that is an important matter. The minister made a statement on this question, and I quote from page 2261 of Hansard for April 4, 1955:

> Many of these one-twentieth are married woman and elderly people for whom alternative social security programs would seem to be more appropriate.

If this is an extension of Canada's security program, I am puzzled that we should have it suggested by the minister that 5 per cent are going to lose security.

Mr. Gregg: I am sure my hon. friend will not mind if I interrupt. I said that none of those presently insured need lose any of their equity. I am sure the hon. member, if he referred to the centre portion of page 2661 of Hansard, will see that I made that perfectly clear. Those who are insured at this time can receive the same benefit as though this change had not been made.

Mr. Winch: That is quite correct, Mr. Chairman. If I understand the minister, he is referring to the fact that provision is being made over a period of three years, and that is correct. I am speaking of the principle of the thing, because I presume the government is now introducing their ideas, and their amendments, as they conceive them for at least some time to come. Although the minister has quite correctly stated that those who are now making certain payments under the old act would have the right to certain benefits, he is at the same time laying down a principle which means in effect that beyond that period, or if they are not now qualified, there will be a reduction of 5 per cent in those who are covered. I believe the minister understands my point concerning this principle.

What I am saying is correct. It is a retreat from the principle that has been established up until now. I fail to see by what miracle or legerdemain that 5 per cent, or an individual if you want to put it that way, can be expected to find a job in 30 weeks when they have not been able to find one in 51 weeks. I feel that is a reasonable and logical question.

I want to refer to the statement of the minister which I just quoted from page 2661 of Hansard:
