HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 11, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication informing me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely:

Of Hon. Jean Lesage, member for the electoral district of Montmagny-L'Islet, by resignation.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the chief electoral officer for a new writ of election for the electoral district.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL DEFENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF SURVEY TO BE CONDUCTED BY LIEUTENANT GENERAL GRAHAM

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to announce that Lieutenant General Howard D. Graham, following his retirement on August 31 from the post of chief of the general staff of the Canadian army, as announced by my colleague the Minister of National Defence, has agreed to undertake on behalf of the government a comprehensive survey of all aspects of Canada's civil defence policy and program.

I might say that in the view of the government the need for a thorough reappraisal of current policies and programs at this time is underlined by the changing nature of the threat which confronts civil defence in this and in other countries. In the post-war decade, 1948-1958, during which civil defence has been active, the scale of attack has shifted from atomic to hydrogen weapons. For the years immediately ahead, civil defence faces the need to re-examine present plans and assumptions, based largely on hydrogen weapons, in order to make sure that they take sufficient account of the new threat posed by the intercontinental ballistic missile.

It is expected that General Graham's survey will require him to visit various provinces of Canada in order to see for himself what progress in civil defence is being made at provincial and local levels. In this he will be expected to consult with provincial and municipal leaders, as well as those familiar with civil defence policies at the national level.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if General Graham's assignment will include a recommendation regarding the sharing of cost by the three levels of government, or will he just recommend to the minister proposals for reorganization of civil defence?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would expect that General Graham would probably study that angle of the problem.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister suggest to General Graham that when he visits the municipal civil defence authorities he would be well advised to get in touch as much as possible with the persons who have been interested in civil defence, the rank and file. I think it would be of great value to him if he did so and that he would have a better understanding of their needs, requirements and dissatisfactions.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to pass on that suggestion to General Graham.

STARRED QUESTION

IMPORTS OF U.K. PRODUCTS ASSEMBLED IN U.S.

Question No. 11—Mr. Cardin:

1. What was the total amount of Canadian dollars paid to the United States in 1956 for imports of farm tractors manufactured in the United Kingdom and assembled in the United States?

2. Was this amount taken into consideration by the dominion bureau of statistics when compiling its figures regarding the Canadian trade deficit with the United States?

3. Are other products manufactured in the United Kingdom and imported into Canada from the United States? If so, what items?

4. Has the government taken any steps to encourage British companies to assemble farm tractors and other British products in Canada rather than in the United States? If so, with what results?

Orders for Returns

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This question, Mr. Speaker, is a refurbished edition of the one asked by the hon. gentleman last session on January 29, 1958. My answer on that occasion will be the one I give now. It is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, no records such as are asked for by the hon. member are kept, and the information is not easily obtainable as it involves tracing the country of origin of components in manufactured articles coming from the United States.

That answers the first, second and third parts of the question. As to the fourth part may I say this. British companies are free to establish branches in Canada, are encouraged to do so and have done so in large numbers. The recent United Kingdom trade mission to this country had that as one of its objectives.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, questions numbered 19, 30, 39, 46, 48, 50, 51, 57, 69, and 71 should be changed to orders for returns.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I just point out that these questions come after orders of the day and really are not on the order paper.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Laurier will look at the bottom of page 3 of the order paper he will find that it is at this stage that the opportunity is given for making questions orders for returns.

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I was not alert.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Question No. 69—Mr. McIlraith:

What were the names of advertising firms employed by each department of the government, (a) on April 1, 1957; (b) on April 1, 1958?

FEDERAL STEPS TO CURTAIL TRAFFIC DEATHS

Question No. 71—Mr. Houck:

1. How many persons have died in Canada during the year 1957, as a result of automobile and highway traffic accidents?

2. Has the federal government collected any information as to plans or programs designed to curtail loss of life from automobile or highway traffic accidents?

3. Has the federal government taken any steps to distribute such information or has it taken any such steps to assist in curtailing loss of life?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BEAUCE FLOOD, QUEBEC

Motion No. 10—Mr. Racine:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the town of Beauceville, and any person or persons, and the federal government, concerning the flooding of the Chaudiere river, last December.

Motion agreed to.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE—STUDY OF FACILITIES REQUIRED

Motion No. 12—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of the study or survey made by the Department of Public Works, or any official thereof, of facilities required at ports and harbours along the great lakes-St. Lawrence route, arising out of the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway and the opening of this route to 27-foot navigation in 1959, and more particularly of improvements to harbour and river works at such ports.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this motion calls for the production of reports which are made by officers of my department to more senior officers in that department, and as such I believe they are privileged and should not be produced.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the reason for this motion is because of a discussion which took place during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Public Works. I would like to quote from page 930 of Hansard for June 6, 1958, as follows:

I simply wanted to bring to his attention—

That is to the attention of the minister.

—the fact that he should deal with all ports in the same manner, and in order to do that it seems to me that the best way is to have a survey or study made.

A little further on the minister intervened as follows:

It has already been done for practically all the ports.

To which I replied:

I am glad it has. If it has, I hope the results will be available to those of us on this side of the house—

It seems to me that it would be useful if these surveys of ports which are made could be given to the house so we would have some information and some knowledge of what improvements are contemplated at such ports.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, these investigations are made by the officials of the department in the course of their duties, and we cannot disclose confidential reports of this kind. If this were to be done in the course of administration we would get into an impossible position. I have in my hand Bourinot's fourth edition, page 251, which reads as follows:

The practice of asking for reports from officers, addressed to particular departments of the executive government, is considered to be open to serious objection. As to "confidential documents" passing between officers of a department, Mr. Speaker Peel observes: "They are not necessarily laid on the table of the house, especially if the minister declares that they are of a confidential character."

The reports for which the hon. member for Laurier is asking are of a confidential character, and I suggest they should not be produced.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, if I may have a further word on this subject, the hon. gentleman did not say during the course of the discussion that the reports were confidential. He does state that now, but all I am saying at this juncture is that the position he takes is entirely different from that which he took when he sat on this side of the house and demanded the production of similar documents.

Mr. Green: On that point, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member can produce any statements in Hansard to back up what he has just said.

Mr. Chevrier: Hansard is replete with them.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This motion is not debatable. It is a motion for an order of the house to issue in respect of certain papers. It is not debatable, and the only course is to accept or reject the motion. I am advised by the Clerk that that is the method of disposing of such a motion as this. I ask, then, whether it is the pleasure of the house to adopt the same motion.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

TRADE

URANIUM—REQUEST FOR NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he will consider initiating or pressing for the initiation of bilateral conversations with the Japanese government which would make possible the sale of Canadian uranium to that country, and thereby prevent the loss of this market to uranium producers in other countries.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to discuss that question with my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is also interested.

FISHERIES

REPORTED REGULATION OF NET SIZE ON DRAGGERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. According to yesterday's press, regulations now make it unlawful for Canadian deep sea fishermen to carry both large and small nets on their draggers. Nets must now be one size or the other, with penalties for infringement ranging up to $1,000, or imprisonment, or both.

Will the minister advise how this regulation will be enforced upon foreign shipping fishing on Canada's banks off the east coast of Newfoundland, or does this only apply to Canadian fishing draggers?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I think it is superfluous for me to say that this government has no jurisdiction over foreign vessels fishing on the high seas. However, there is a convention among most of the countries interested in fishing in the northwest Atlantic, the international convention for the northwest Atlantic fisheries, and the countries who subscribe to it set up by mutual agreement certain regulations as to net sizes and other conservation measures. The various countries concerned take the responsibility for enforcing these regulations as far as their nationals are concerned.

I am answering this question off the cuff, and if my information is not complete, or is incorrect, I will add to the answer tomorrow.

FINANCE

LUMBER—REPRESENTATIONS AGAINST TARIFF INCREASE ON SOFTWOOD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with due decorum I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister received a protest from the British Columbia lumber manufacturers' association, supported by the British Columbia interior lumber manufacturers' association, against a recent decision of the Canadian tariff board in appeal No. 446, which results in an increase in duty on softwood lumber imported into Canada from the United States from 7½ per cent to 20 per cent?

In view of the serious repercussions this decision will have on the lumber industry in British Columbia—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked his question. He is now, apparently, about to make a statement on the subject.

Mr. Herridge: I am just going to ask the question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister consider an immediate investigation into the situation and take action in the best interests of the lumber industry and the employees concerned?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, representations, as I think they should be called rather than protests, have been received from the association with reference to this particular decision of the tariff board, and the matter is receiving very close study.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ICELAND—EXTENSION OF FISHING LIMITS FOR FOREIGN TRAWLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the recent threat by the Danish islands in the north Atlantic to follow the example of Iceland and extend their fishing limits to 12 miles, can the minister advise the house if the Canadian government recognizes the extension of the fishing limit to a 12-mile width of waters off their coasts, as announced by the government of Iceland?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will accept that question as notice.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which the minister may also take as notice. In view of the statement made in Halifax on Sunday, June 8, by the Minister of Fisheries to the effect that Canada would try to obtain a compromise arrangement concerning the 12-mile fishing limit at the next conference on the law of the sea, can the minister advise the house if the government has altered its so-called firm stand on a 12-mile limit to a compromise position on future negotiations?

RUSSIA—OPERATION OF SHIPS OFF NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister comment on the presence of Soviet ships operating off the banks of Newfoundland in a manner calculated to give rise to suspicion and anxiety on the part of the people of Newfoundland?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. My colleague the Minister of National Defence has graciously undertaken to answer it.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported to me that Soviet vessels have been operating off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. These ships have been operating outside of Canadian territorial waters. I am sure the hon. member for Trinity-Conception noticed, as I did, the statement of the Russian minister of fisheries made in Halifax the other day to the effect that these Russian ships were carrying out scientific surveys of fish migrations in the area. I would suggest that the residents of Newfoundland should not be unduly exercised by this fishy business, as the area is patrolled by the Royal Canadian Navy and Royal Canadian Air Force.

[Later:]

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence arising out of the reply he gave to the hon. member for Trinity-Conception. Would the minister take steps to verify reports that these Russian trawlers operating on the banks of Newfoundland are totally blacked out at night and do not carry even the ordinary navigation lights, thereby constituting a menace to shipping operating on the banks? If the reports are verified, would he inquire as to why such a practice would be necessary for ships that are engaged merely in tracking fish migration?

Mr. Pearkes: I would be pleased to get a report on that matter.

LAOS, CAMBODIA, VIET NAM—STATEMENT ON STATUS OF CONTROL COMMISSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East asked me a question concerning the status of the international commissions in Laos, Cambodia and Viet Nam. With respect to the part of the question concerning Laos, may I say that in November, 1957, an agreement was reached between the royal Laotian government and the dissident Pathet Lao. This agreement provided for integration of the Pathet Lao into the Laotian national community and also provided for supplementary elections to be held in a few months' time to give representation in the national assembly to the Pathet Lao. These elections were held on May 4, 1958.

During the past two months the royal Laotian government has twice requested the international commission to leave Laos after the May 4 elections. It expressed the view that these elections represented the final stage of the political settlement provided for in the cease-fire agreement on Laos which was signed at Geneva in 1954.

It is also the Canadian government's view that, with the achievement of a political settlement in Laos and with the fulfilment of the terms of the cease-fire agreement, the tasks of the international commission for supervision and control have come to an end. The Canadian government considers that the indefinite extension of international agencies of this kind after their tasks have been completed will tend to bring the whole concept of international supervision into disrepute.

For this general reason, and in support of a request of the royal Laotian government, the Canadian delegation to the international commission was instructed to introduce a resolution calling for the dissolution of the commission. The Indian and Polish delegations are opposed to dissolution, and as yet no final solution has been reached.

Inquiries of the Ministry

With respect to the international commission in Viet Nam, the Canadian government considers that since a political settlement has not yet been reached in that country, the commission there still has a task to perform. We are therefore anxious to continue our participation in the work of that commission and thereby contribute to the peace and stability of that area.

With respect to Cambodia, more than two years ago, as the hon. member no doubt recalls, the Canadian delegation to the commission in Cambodia tabled a resolution calling for the dissolution of that commission which, in the opinion of the Canadian government, had completed its task. However, because this resolution was not supported by the Indian and Polish delegations but particularly, I am informed, because the royal Cambodian government requested the commission to remain, no further action was taken at that time or has since been taken.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if, in view of the situation in Cambodia which he has just described, he does not think a further attempt should be made toward the dissolution of the commission in that country? Perhaps he would be prepared to look at the matter and give us a statement later.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in reply, I should like to see the Laos situation dealt with first, but I will look into it.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVED SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport which perhaps could be taken as notice in his absence and answered when he returns. Has the Department of Transport received a report from Canadian Pacific Steamships relative to the operation of steamships between the mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver island to the effect that a more efficient and faster service between the two points is possible? If so, what plan does the department have for the institution of such a service?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice and see that it is brought to the attention of the minister concerned.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ST. JOHNS, QUE.—REPORTED CESSATION OF OPERATIONS OF SINGER SEWING MACHINE COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour. I regret that I did not have an opportunity to give the hon. lady notice of my intention to ask this question. Is the minister aware that the Singer Sewing Machine Company of St. Johns, Quebec, has closed down its operations, and that as a result many persons are out of work? Has she any comment to make as to the reasons for the closing down of this plant?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that information has not come to my desk as yet, but I rather fancy that would be under provincial jurisdiction, would it not?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT ON BENEFIT PAYMENT FIGURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer a question which was asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on June 2, as recorded at page 725 of Hansard. The unemployment insurance commission has just completed a special survey made throughout Canada to obtain the number of active claimants for unemployment insurance benefits as of May 31, 1958. The total number of active claimants at that date was 550,959. Of this total there were 367,942 claimants for regular benefits and 183,017 claimants for seasonal benefits. These figures, I might add, compare with a total of 722,252 active claimants on April 30, 1958, comprising 495,382 regular benefit claimants and 226,870 seasonal benefit claimants.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as he will recall, asked for the number of persons receiving benefits. Because of the varying frequency of payments—some weekly, some bi-monthly and some even less frequently in more remote areas—and because of the continuing turnover of those receiving benefit, it is much more difficult to obtain an accurate estimate of those receiving benefit than of those claiming benefit. Accordingly the figures assembled cover, as I have said, the numbers actively claiming benefits as at May 31, 1958.

STATEMENT ON MONTHLY STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to deal with the question concerning unemployment raised by the hon. member for Essex East yesterday, as recorded at page 900 of Hansard. The hon. member referred to the monthly labour force survey made by the dominion bureau of statistics. This survey is made regularly during the week following the middle of each month. It requires one week for enumeration and two to three weeks to process the information obtained. The results are made available in the press release on the employment situation issued jointly by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics around the twentieth of the following month. This was the practice, I might add, which was followed by the previous government, and it is being continued.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—U.S. LAW RESPECTING COMMAND OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would care to comment on a report from Washington which appears in the press today to the effect that United States law specifically forbids any foreigner, which includes a Canadian, to command American nuclear weapons; and that as virtually all United States squadrons are armed with nuclear-tip air to air missiles Air Marshal Slemon, deputy commander of NORAD, could exercise no authority or control over United States aircraft under that command.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that as the question appears to relate to a matter that is now under debate it could perhaps be more properly dealt with in the course of that debate.

HEALTH INSURANCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister consider tabling at an early date a copy of the agreement recently signed with the province of Newfoundland under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance. Has the government now agreed to grant the Saskatchewan government a loan for the hydro power works on the South Saskatchewan river project? If not, what are the chances of the South Saskatchewan river project being started this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of finance and assistance to the province in that direction is receiving consideration. The field of divergence between this government and the government of Saskatchewan is being narrowed, and my hope certainly is that we will be able to achieve a measure of agreement in connection with the question of finance which will enable a start to be made.

AIR TRANSPORT

T.C.A.—APPLICATION FOR FIFTH FREEDOM RIGHTS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I have already sent notice. Perhaps the acting minister will take notice of it. Has an application been made for fifth freedom rights on behalf of Trans-Canada Air Lines at United States airports, and is the government contemplating renegotiation of the air agreement between Canada and the United States this year?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I will take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker, and see that the minister is made aware of it.

HIGHWAYS

KENORA-MINAKI—INCLUSION IN ACCESS ROADS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of which I gave notice yesterday. Did the province of Ontario apply to have its road project between Kenora and Minaki recognized for a federal contribution under the access roads program to relieve winter unemployment announced by the minister last session? If so, can the minister say why work came to a halt soon after March 31?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the road in question was part of many requests by the government of Ontario to the federal government under the roads to resources program. There has been no agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government (a) as to the individual roads that will be part of a general agreement or (b) as to the general terms of the agreement between the two governments.

Mr. Benidickson: May I address a supplementary question. There have been some press reports concerning a new policy with respect to roads to resources. On January 7 during the last session of the house the minister asked permission to have printed as an appendix to Hansard his letter to the premiers—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Benidickson: —in which he made an offer with respect to access roads of a relatively smaller nature than is indicated in the press releases. Would he tell the house the new policy that has been offered to the provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am very glad to be able to correct any false impression of this nature. The original offer made on January 7 is still the same. The reaction of seven provinces has been enthusiastic and completely co-operative. The negotiations that are being carried on with the government of Ontario are very active both at the ministerial level and at the official level. As a matter of fact, the very fine mining and access roads program of the Ontario government has been an inspiration, I believe, to all provinces in the matter of opening up resource areas.

I think I have caught the main points of the hon. member's question. If not, I will answer further.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING ELECTION PROMISES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister agree with the words spoken by Professor D. W. Fox, the Ontario young Conservative, as reported in this morning's Gazette by Mr. Blakely, to the effect that the only thing one has to do to be elected to office is to make as many promises as one can?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am glad to see that my hon. friend is reading the proceedings of the young Conservative association. As an answer, I would suggest that he consult with his own leader, the Leader of the Opposition, who made many promises which did not prove as effectual as the prophecy made by the gentleman in question.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF NEXT MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a question, now that he has mentioned promises.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think most hon. members will recognize that the last question was not one which was properly introduced. Perhaps we can offset the reply, which was in the same category, and not carry it any farther.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a promise of another character. May I ask the Prime Minister if, as a result of his luncheon yesterday with the premier of Ontario, he is in a position to tell us now when the next dominion-provincial conference will take place?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to that question is simply this. I did not have luncheon yesterday with the premier of Ontario.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON CIVIL SERVANTS RECEIVING SALARIES WITHOUT PERFORMING DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): In reply to the inquiry by the hon. member for Kootenay West on Friday last concerning certain civil servants receiving their salaries without performing any duties, may I say that I was in touch with the civil service commission and was informed that the commission does not know of any such cases. I feel that the hon. member should be asked to supply the names of such civil servants and the departments in which they are employed, so that a further search can be made.

Mr. Herridge: I shall be quite willing to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—APPROVAL OF EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve an exchange of notes constituting an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America concerning the organization and operation of the North American air defence command (NORAD) signed at Washington May 12, 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, during the remainder of the time that I have available to me I shall continue to answer the various questions which were asked during the debate yesterday. The Leader of the Opposition asked for information as to the principles and procedures under which our air force will operate under this plan, that is the NORAD plan. He also asked various questions regarding the system of command.

The note on NORAD states quite clearly that the commander in chief, NORAD, will be responsible to the chiefs of staff committee of Canada and the joint chiefs of staff of the United States, who in turn are responsible to their respective governments. Then it goes on to say that he will operate within the concept of air defence approved by the appropriate authorities of the two governments, who will bear in mind the objectives for the defence of the Canadian-United States regions of NATO.

Then later in paragraph 6 it states:

The plans and procedures to be followed by NORAD in wartime shall be formulated and approved in peacetime by appropriate national authorities and shall be capable of rapid implementation in an emergency.

In paragraph 3 it defines "operational control". Since the Leader of the Opposition and I served during the first war this term "operational control" has been invented. It was not one we understood in those days long ago. I have therefore endeavoured, and perhaps it is wishful thinking, to put down in a very few sentences what I feel is the function of the headquarters of NORAD at Colorado Springs, both in peace and war. I hope I will not confuse the issue even further.

In peacetime the function will be to develop plans and procedures to be used in war. These plans and procedures would be agreed upon in peacetime and be ready for immediate use in an emergency. I might add that these plans are being worked out, modified and improved continuously. There is always a plan which could be put into effect, but that may only be a temporary plan awaiting further modification and ultimate approval, we hope, by the governments concerned.

These plans as submitted by the commander in chief of NORAD will be reviewed, amended and approved by the chiefs of staff of both countries. It will be a responsibility of the commander in chief of NORAD to formulate a general pattern of training and the general supervision of practice exercises in order to ensure the readiness of the forces and facilities which may be available to him in time of emergency.

In war it will be his responsibility to direct the air operations in accordance with the plans that have been agreed to in peacetime. Once the air battle is joined, NORAD will keep the subordinate commanders informed of the over-all air situation, and he will be in a position to reinforce threatened areas with any forces that might be available. He exercises that command, so far as Canada is concerned—again I have used the word "command", and I should have said operational control. He exercises that operational control through the headquarters of the air defence command of the R.C.A.F. at St. Hubert.

Perhaps a situation such as this might occur. Unidentified aircraft are located on the radar screen of the distant warning line. These aircraft are seen to be approaching Canada. It is then the responsibility of the officer commanding the air defence command of the R.C.A.F. to dispatch interceptors with the idea of identifying the planes. The radar screen, of course, could not give any definite identification. It would eventually be able to give some estimate of the number of tracks there were, or in other words the number of aircraft which were approaching Canada.

Assuming that these aircraft were a number of enemy aircraft and that they had been identified as such by the aircraft sent up by the officer commanding at St. Hubert, the officer commanding at St. Hubert would then direct interceptors to engage the enemy, once it had been established that these aircraft were of hostile intent. At the same time the information reached the officer commanding at St. Hubert the same information would have been passed to the commander in chief of NORAD. The commander in chief of NORAD might also be getting other radar recordings from other parts of the continent of North America. He would report those to the officer commanding the R.C.A.F. air defence force. If the number of hostile planes moving through Canadian air space approaching the various targets were more numerous than could be dealt with by the squadrons of the R.C.A.F. under the command of the air defence commander at St. Hubert, the commander in chief NORAD could and would send United States air force fighter squadrons to assist the R.C.A.F. in their task of intercepting these bombers.

I see several ways in which this assistance might be given. The commander in chief NORAD might instruct the officer commanding the R.C.A.F. at St. Hubert to direct all the Canadian planes against a certain group of hostile bombers which were attacking, let us say by way of illustration those which were moving down through the Mackenzie basin. As to another group which might at the same time be attacking across Labrador, the commander in chief at Colorado Springs could say that he would look after that group with United States air force squadrons.

In such instance the R.C.A.F. commander would direct those planes which were perhaps originally going to engage the bombers over Labrador to divert and go to the Mackenzie valley. It must be remembered that from the time the interceptor takes off from its airport until it actually becomes ready for engagement, it is under constant direction from the control system of the Pinetree line which is directing that aircraft, so that it approaches and changes its route according to the changes of route taken by the hostile planes. Hence it is in constant touch with command headquarters at St. Hubert.

Another situation might be such that the commander in chief of NORAD would say to the commander of the air defence command of the R.C.A.F. that NORAD would place a certain number of specified squadrons under the operational control of the commander of the air defence command at St. Hubert. In other words he would make available to the commander of the R.C.A.F. certain United States squadrons which could be employed as and how the commander of the R.C.A.F. saw fit.

That seems to me to be the sort of control which is exercised by the NORAD commander during an engagement. It should be appreciated that the R.C.A.F. squadrons are, as it were, front line troops. They are the first which would engage any hostile bombers coming over Canadian airways, and they would be assisted by the United States air force squadrons if the task before them was greater than they were able to carry out.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pearkes: Might I suggest that as a number of questions have been asked, I might be given an opportunity to answer the questions which were asked yesterday. Then if I have time I shall be only too pleased to endeavour to answer any others.

I do not know whether that statement has cleared up the situation but I have tried to explain it in as simple language as possible, in the way I see that operation being carried out.

Another question which was asked by the Leader of the Opposition was with regard to the effectiveness of NORAD. He asked me if I would deny certain press reports and rumours which had been spread indicating that perhaps in some quarters there was not at NORAD the degree of co-operation which is considered to be desirable.

Of course I am not in a position to report directly on the behaviour of the commanders of another country. However, I should like to report emphatically and definitely that when General Partridge was here he was loud in his praise of the ability, talents and conscientiousness of Air Marshal Slemon, who is his deputy there. Furthermore, Air Marshal Slemon spoke in enthusiastic terms with regard to the co-operation he had received from the various members of the staff at NORAD. He said that when General Partridge was away he was in supreme command, and his authority was recognized and accepted without question. He went on to say that he received full co-operation from the subordinates who would under those circumstances be under him.

I recall very clearly a remark he made. He said, "These are dedicated men who are working for the defence of the North American continent". He went on and used these particular words: "They no longer regard themselves either as Americans or Canadians, as army, air force, navy or marine officers. With that evidence I feel that it is possible for me to deny the suggestions which have been made that NORAD is not working effectively. If we have had reason to communicate with NORAD officially or with General Partridge on a more personal basis we have always received immediate and courteous replies. I have absolutely no reason to believe that NORAD is not functioning effectively.

The hon. member for Essex East asked whether it was not true that the United States will concentrate on missiles and that manned aircraft will be operated by Canadians only. Of course that is not true; the Americans are manning piloted aircraft today which, if an emergency arose, would be available to assist the Royal Canadian Air Force, and as far as I know it is the intention of the United States to continue to man piloted interceptors for a long time to come. They are, of course, carrying out work on research and actually have in operation certain missiles which would be available in a battle for the protection of the North American continent. Canada is also carrying out investigations and is training men in the use of missiles, which perhaps in the not too distant future may be required to supplement the defence of our country.

The hon. member for Essex East next asked if it were not true that the service chiefs could pull units out of NORAD when they saw fit. Again the answer is in the negative. As will be seen in the note it says that North American air defence command will include certain combat units and individuals as are specifically allocated by the two governments. No service chief can withdraw a unit which has been definitely allocated to a certain command by a government.

The next question was whether Canada will continue to contribute its air division to NATO forces in Europe. Of course we are going to continue to have those forces in Europe, and no doubt the house will recall that when the president of the West German republic was here recently the Prime Minister gave an emphatic promise that as long as Canadian forces were required in Europe they would remain there. At page 772 of Hansard for June 2, 1958, the Prime Minister used the following words:

> I wish to make it clear that whatever threats may be made against those nations which believe in the mission of NATO and the necessity for its continuance, Canada will maintain forces in Europe as long as international disquiet and justifiable fears require Canadian participation.

I merely quote that as the most recent statement on this subject, and I am sure the hon. member did not really believe it was likely that the Canadian government would withdraw those troops just because we were making an even greater effort to provide for the security of this continent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Withdraw or reduce.

Mr. Pearkes: Withdraw or reduce.

The next point with which I would like to deal is the question of timing. Suggestions have been made in this house that we should not have acted as we did last summer with respect to this headquarters, be it of a temporary or a permanent nature; and I always understood that it would be of a temporary nature until the formal notes had established it. I did not emphasize that position at the time; perhaps I should have done, but I took it for granted that it would be considered as a temporary appointment until such time as it was confirmed in the formal note.

The question was, should we have acted then or should we have waited until the formal note had been agreed to by both governments and had been discussed here in parliament? We did gain ten months because, as experience has shown, the formal note was only recently received and has been discussed in parliament yesterday and today at really the first opportunity which has been available during this session. The note was not ready during the last session of parliament. It may be said that it should have been done more quickly, but it was not done more quickly and I do not know how it could have been done more quickly.

Should we have waited? I would like to ask hon. members to consider the situation as it was last summer. Russia had refused to accept the resolution on disarmament or the limitation of arms which had been endorsed by a very large number of the western nations. Russia had walked out of the disarmament conference, and at that time had just launched its first earth satellite. There was a good deal of concern, not only on this continent but in Europe, and there was a speeding up of defensive arrangements.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to inform the minister his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that the hon. minister may proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall finish in just a sentence or so, Mr. Speaker. At that time there was great concern, and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom came out to discuss the international situation with the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada. I submit that it was only prudent for this government to press on as quickly as possible, have the two commanders concerned get together, set up their staffs and bring up to date a plan for the defence of this continent. It is my opinion that it would have been unwise to have delayed longer and to have waited, in the circumstances which existed in the world a year ago, until several months later when the formal notes might have been presented.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the hon. gentleman will agree there was no suggestion of that.

Mr. Pearkes: Certainly it was my understanding that the suggestion has been that we should not have moved as quickly as we did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one suggested that.

Mr. Pearkes: I am positive.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Your speech was the one that suggested it.

Mr. Pearkes: Well, I am saying that the world situation as it existed a year ago fully justified the government in taking that action, and I am delighted that we have had the benefit of ten months of very productive work at the headquarters of NORAD.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether before the minister takes his place he would be able to throw any light on the question I addressed to the Prime Minister on the orders of the day, regarding the inability of the Canadian deputy commander of NORAD to exercise any control or authority, operational or otherwise, over American squadrons carrying nuclear-tipped missiles?

Mr. Pearkes: I have not read the report. I have not had the opportunity of getting any advice from elsewhere, but I can only give the hon. gentleman my personal interpretation of what it might mean.

I do not regard the command of NORAD as having actual command over either United States or Canadian units. The actual exercise of executive command is carried out by subordinate commanders, the squadron leaders. My interpretation of the statement about which the Leader of the Opposition has informed the house today would be that the Americans consider that NORAD headquarters is given directional and operational control over the units of the United States air force which are commanded by American officers. I would interpret that statement as not affecting the position of Air Marshal Slemon, in that he is in the nature of being a senior officer at a very high command, and that he is giving direction to the officers in actual executive command of the various units. However, I should like to have the time to explore the situation and find out about it more definitely, because it has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this important debate I think it is now abundantly clear that the official opposition attitude in insisting that intergovernmental agreements or treaties be brought to the house and debated was the right one, and I am glad the Prime Minister, with his ear to the ground, took notice of that attitude, reversed a previous decision and granted us this discussion.

We have had the advantage in the last day or so of getting some answers to many of our questions. I will not be so unkind as to use the words which appeared in a Canadian Press dispatch under the dateline Ottawa, May 30 to the following effect: "The flow of conflicting statements on NORAD continued unabated today". At least we have had the advantage of hearing from the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, and that is all to the good.

I should like to make a few general statements and then ask what I hope will be a few pointed and intelligent questions to which I hope answers will be given in due course. It seems that in these days when new weapons and different tactics impose a reappraisal of our national defence plans there can be little argument against the contention that this country has a need for an effective defensive alliance. We can agree among ourselves that democratic governments seem to avoid making choices except when the danger is real and apparent, but the last two wars show that when survival is at stake nations, in spite of jealously guarding their sovereignty, can co-operate quickly, even though the burden may not be shared equitably by each nation. Canada is certainly one of the two NATO nations which have financed their own military needs and supplied effective aid to their NATO partners, and I say that Canada has exercised its sovereignty in a very mature way rather than surrendered it.

Canada has always been very careful to protect its independent status vis-à-vis her powerful and friendly next door neighbour to the south. In fact, to defend its sovereignty on Canadian soil Canada has been prepared to make expenditures for Canadian defence installations which it might scarcely have contemplated except for the urgent interest of the United States.

Now, what is the relative position of NORAD to NATO? Is there any legal connection between the two? The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that NORAD is simply an extension of the NATO pact, and that parliament approved the NATO pact years ago. Is there any legal connection between the two organizations? If there is, it seems to me that any legalistic connection between NORAD and NATO was nullified about two weeks ago when the secretary general of NATO, Mr. Spaak, said at a press conference in Ottawa:

> NORAD is not a part of NATO, although we are very interested in it. It is not under the command of NATO.

And when some correspondent questioned him further on the point and asked him whether he would wish it part of NATO, he replied:

> Nobody asked for that. It is quite another question. NORAD has never been referred to or discussed in NATO.

It seems to me, to summarize the situation, that NORAD reports only to Ottawa and to Washington, and that its tie with NATO is only an undertaking to keep NATO informed.

What is the actual situation? If I am right in my interpretation it seems that NORAD, through the standing military group, advises NATO only for the purposes of planning. Operationally NORAD is under direct United States and Canadian control, and only under their control. The commander in chief, General Partridge of the United States and his deputy, Air Marshal Slemon of the R.C.A.F., report to their governments jointly. General Partridge is responsible to both governments for any major decisions.

And so I come to my first question, which is this. In the absence of General Partridge —let us suppose he should be sick—does Air Marshal Slemon report to both governments, and is he responsible for any major decisions. It this the intention of the government of Canada? The NORAD agreement places the R.C.A.F. continental defence forces under American operational command in the event of war.

I have another question. Will the United States commander of NORAD have authority to order the R.C.A.F. to shoot down planes which the commander considers hostile, without first clearing his order with the Canadian government? To my way of thinking the most important single element in NATO's defensive strength, at least until this time, undoubtedly has been the United States strategic air force. Although NATO's defence forces would be meaningless without this deterrent in the background there has been no sharing by the United States of its responsibility for or control of this key military power.

What about the question of civilian control? The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that NORAD does not deny the "primacy of civilian authority". Section 1 of the agreement states that the two governments will approve "a concept of air defence". Section 6 of the agreement states:

> The plans and procedures to be followed by NORAD in wartime shall be formulated and approved in peacetime by appropriate national authorities and shall be capable of rapid implementation in an emergency.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs told parliament that the two governments had approved the detailed terms of reference, and those latter words are found in section 7 of the agreement; but he went on to say that in the interests of national security he could not disclose them. Paragraph 3, if I may call it so, of the preamble which appears on page 1 of the copy of the agreement which I have refers to "a demand for rapid decision to keep pace with the speed and tempo of technological developments" and says that, "to achieve effectiveness, defensive operations must commence as early as possible and enemy forces must be kept constantly engaged". I suppose the idea is to stop an enemy in the far north if that be possible.

The question that comes to my mind is this. In the event of attack would there be time for consultation before countermeasures were taken? Another question is, has General Partridge been given authority to shoot first and ask permission later from Washington and Ottawa? If so, where is this shown in the agreement?

According to the remarks made by the Minister of National Defence last evening no squadrons have yet been assigned or committed to NORAD; and I ask the question, if the agreement is to have any value, why not? Is the government holding back until parliament has approved this agreement? After all, up until a week ago the government had no intention of submitting the agreement to this house for discussion. Why is this? How can NORAD be effective without our participation? What is the purpose of this agreement if we do not participate?

When General Partridge, the commander in chief of NORAD, was in Ottawa some ten days ago no opportunity was given hon. members to hear his views in a closed session. When General Montgomery, General Norstad and General Gruenther came to Ottawa this opportunity was provided. Why the mystery? Why was no opportunity given hon. members to hear the views of General Partridge?

I think it is obvious that air defence for North America must be provided by the United States air force and the Royal Canadian Air Force, and not by NATO. It is quite understandable that the United States wants to keep NORAD outside the authority of NATO in the interests of military efficiency, rapid decision and speed of implementation. The government might consider sacrifices of national sovereignty for NATO's sake because Canada believes in collective security with several other nations such as those in NATO, but the government should carefully consider the surrender of any sovereignty in a two-way partnership with the United States. There is a great difference in power between the two countries, and this might in turn react to Canada's disadvantage in arriving at a joint NORAD decision.

I would like to know how much authority the Canadian government has conceded to the United States commander of NORAD. Speaking in the House of Commons on May 19 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the interests of national security prevented him revealing the terms of reference for General Partridge on which Ottawa and Washington had agreed. It might be better if these terms of reference were made public. I do not imagine they would startle the mentality of any enemy general considering what we may say in this debate, and it might be a good thing for Canadians to know where we stand in the whole picture of NORAD.

The question of sovereignty is important because it touches on our feelings as a developing nation. We have not had full sovereignty for so long that we can afford to give it away in bits and pieces. While the military realities are such that we depend on the United States, this should not obscure the fact that the forms of sovereignty need to be observed if we care to respect our own feelings of nationhood. We have new air problems with the United States, and it is important for us to again assert our sovereignty over the air, the water and the Arctic. In my opinion the Prime Minister should clarify that NORAD is a defensive and not an offensive mechanism.

Another important question I wish to ask is this. Can an armed United States bomber fly in Canadian air space on the way to the Soviet frontier without our specific consent? If the answer is yes then there must be an agreement with the United States, because NORAD does not cover this eventuality.

Basically speaking, political sovereignty today almost appears to be what the great powers tolerate. It is one thing to be part of a group of nations for the purpose of collective security and defence, and indeed we are happy to be part of NATO; but it is quite a different thing to enter into a bilateral agreement with our neighbour to the south in which we are only a junior partner. Although the United States is bound as the strong force to direct operations, the facts remain that Canada occupies the northern part of the North American continent, that Canada is now sandwiched in between two great powers, Russia and the United States, and that there is a possibility of our country becoming a second Belgium. Being in possession of our sovereignty we are the people with the say-so about our own territory. The United States would not tolerate any invasion of their sovereignty by us, and I think it is important that Washington remember that on the northern part of this continent it is a matter of Canadian sovereignty.

Actually it is extremely important for us to examine and demand the reasons for this joint NORAD policy. If I may say so, it would be very good for the people of the United States, too. We should see to it that the plans of both countries are reasonable. We have a contribution to make in that respect. Ultimately the larger burden of defence is on the United States, but we as Canadians have the right to expect that our views will be listened to concerning the risks the United States runs in the name of defence, for those risks may become our liabilities.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I should like first of all to make a comment or two on an interjection made yesterday by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) as shown on page 1022 of Hansard. In order to be correct I will read what he said in commenting upon the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). He used these words:

> —I do not mind his reading his speech, but when he reads a speech by the C.C.F. ghost writer, David Lewis, that is another question. And I see it is going to come in instalments. The other speakers are going to give David Lewis part two—

At that point apparently he was interrupted by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

An hon. Member: He meant Russ Bell.

Mr. Howard: I am not sure what he meant but that is what he said. If hon. members on the other side say things they do not mean, it is far beyond my ability to deal with them. Whether he meant Russ Bell or David Lewis is immaterial. Contrary to what he may be accustomed to in the Conservative party, we in the C.C.F. do not employ other people to write our speeches. He may consider that the reading of written speeches is a communicable disease but those of us over here have been inoculated with a vaccine of intelligence and hard work. Consequently every C.C.F. member who rises to speak in the house presents his own arguments as prepared by himself. We not only prepare our own speeches but we do not act like we are reading the script of a radio opera when we present them to the house. When we make our speeches we deliver them as well as we possibly can without sticking too closely to notes. I thought for a minute you were going to interrupt, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I was going to interrupt the hon. member and say that we are not discussing the method of giving speeches but the motion that is before the house.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you for your remarks but inasmuch as what I said was related to the debate I thought I would prepare the way by saying that neither David Lewis nor Russ Bell had anything to do with the preparation of this speech. However, I will say that I got a great deal of help in preparing my remarks, and whenever that happens I always give due credit to the individual or individuals who have assisted me. I am honest enough to admit it.

We are thankful for the opportunity to participate in a debate of this nature for the purpose of attempting to understand the implications and obligations of NORAD. In the discussions that have taken place in the house and outside it prior to this motion being presented it has been evident that there was a great deal of conflict in the minds of hon. members, newspaper men and the general public. There was a general state of confusion and bewilderment as to just what NORAD meant and how it would apply. There was no genuinely concrete understanding of NORAD, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) have at one time or another participated in contributing to the confusion that existed prior to the motion being presented.

We hoped that when the mover of the motion introduced it there would be some elucidation with respect to NORAD. We hope that if other government speakers participate in the debate there will be further elucidation on their part as to what NORAD means. I must say, however, that I was disappointed with the Prime Minister's remarks. The understanding we have now is not much better than we had before. I hope that this situation will be cleared up later in the debate. So far we have seen the understanding of NORAD degenerate from a paradoxical perplexity to a state of deliberate and apparently organized confusion. In my opinion the Prime Minister, with all the legalistic training he has at his command, did nothing but bewilder the house by attempting to stretch the NATO agreement to justify some previous statements. I do not intend to deal with that because I think that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), even though he does not have NORAD or SAC under his command, did quite an effective job in shooting the Prime Minister down in flames so far as this matter is concerned.

I come to something now that has been prepared for me by somebody else. I must confess I could not have prepared it myself because it is too contradictory. The ghost writers here are the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence and evidence of their kindness towards me can be found in Hansard of yesterday. I should like to make reference first to what is known as the plan of NORAD. On page 995 of Hansard for yesterday we find the Prime Minister had this to say:

> When you look at the plan, and when you see it again in detail in this report to which I have made reference, namely, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, 1957, you realize how difficult it is to understand why there should be so much said about a matter such as this.

On the same page he went on to say:

> —this agreement represents the culmination of negotiations carried on by the previous government.

The reference to culmination would indicate that this is the highest point to which these discussions led and that the agreement tabled by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is it. It can go no farther. It is all inclusive and all we have to do is look at it and we will understand completely what NORAD means. With reference to the action of the government shortly after taking office the Prime Minister went on to say, as found on page 995:

> When we took office the government came to the conclusion that this integration of operational control of our air defence was important and should no longer be delayed, and authorized the establishment of the joint NORAD headquarters on a provisional basis pending the working out of some detailed minor terms of agreement between our governments.

Obviously the agreement that has been tabled represents the detailed minor terms of agreement to which the Prime Minister made reference, the implication being that there are many more things to come, and in the light of what we have heard so far from the government benches there certainly is, in our opinion, quite a bit more to come. The Minister of National Defence also made some reference to this plan at page 1028 of Hansard for June 10, 1958. Apparently this was in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition:

> The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked whether there was a master plan drawn up during the two days when General Partridge was visiting Canada. Plans for the defence of this country—complicated plans such as those which must be eventually completed—cannot be drawn up in a few hours. I explained that they were preliminary discussions leading up to a plan which is continually being evolved.

We have the Prime Minister saying there is a plan. Then, we have him saying, no, there is no plan; these are just some minor details of the agreement. The Minister of National Defence said at one stage that there were a number of plans, and then said, no, there was not. He said we are still consulting about it and eventually we hope to have some sort of a plan. I do not know whether or not there is a plan, and I am sure many hon. members on the government benches are not too sure just where we stand on this particular issue. We would be in a much better position if the statements emanating from the government benches were consistent and not contradictory. We would have an idea of just where we are going on this particular item.

There is another reference to this plan that I should like to quote. At page 1029 of Hansard, the Minister of National Defence is apparently referring to a question by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and said:

> The hon. member who has just sat down wanted to know why we did not bring this note before the house last October. He gave the answer himself—the note had not been completed, it had not been worked out, and what is the use of bringing a half-baked scheme before parliament and taking up the time of the house before it is completed?

Apparently the reference was to some half-baked scheme the Liberal party had in mind but which had not reached a state of culmination yet, as the Prime Minister put it. If what we have before us is anything more than a half-baked scheme, then I do not know what it is. It is not only half-baked, it is still in the raw state. We are being asked to swallow this concoction without any idea what it is. We have the Prime Minister substantiating our claim it is a half-baked scheme, as the Minister of National Defence indicated to us it was.

Mr. Pallett: Certainly, the hon. member would recognize one.

Mr. Howard: I do not mind the interruptions if they are made loudly enough for us to hear.

Mr. Pallett: I merely submitted to the hon. member that he would be able to recognize any sort of half-baked scheme.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If the hon. member is asking a question he should ask the hon. member who has the floor whether or not he will accept the question.

Mr. Howard: At page 993 of Hansard, near the bottom of the page, we have the Prime Minister admitting that this document which was tabled by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is nothing more than a half-baked scheme because he said:

> Indeed, on March 11, 1957, 40 copies of a submission to the cabinet committee on defence were approved by the Minister of National Defence and forwarded to the secretary of the cabinet defence committee for inclusion on the agenda of the meeting of that committee to be held on Friday, March 15. No action was taken thereon. The agreement into which we have entered represents, in almost complete measure—when I say almost complete measure there are slight deviations in terminology and in routine matters—that which had been, to all intents and purposes, agreed upon by the former minister of national defence on behalf of the then government.

In March, 1957, this half-baked scheme had been prepared. There was a slight change in terminology, and then that self-same half-baked scheme is presented to this house for acceptance.

Let us get back to NORAD and NATO.

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Yes, you would like to do that I am sure.

An hon. Member: You wrote that part yourself.

Mr. Howard: My hearing aid must be turned down because I cannot hear these interruptions. If it is the intention of the government to have this half-baked scheme as part of NATO, which apparently they indicate is desirable, but other than in the straight reportorial fashion that NORAD reports to NATO—I do not know in what fashion they do that—then, we are going to give you every opportunity to make such an arrangement. Instead of the government asking us to buy a pig in a poke, which is what they are doing at the moment, we hope the government will exhibit sincerity—not that they have not done so in the past—by indicating support for the following amendment:

> That the motion be amended by adding thereto the following words:
> And in the opinion of this house consideration of the interests of collective security and the principles of the United Nations make it advisable for the government to give consideration to the taking of such steps as are necessary to integrate these agreements within the structure of NATO.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I do not believe this amendment is relative, but I should like permission of the house to leave that decision for Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard: Yes, that is agreed. I have completed my remarks.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of traversing the ground that was covered so completely and, may I say, so clearly by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) with respect to the question of the relationship of NORAD to NATO. I made a statement in this house on May 19 to the effect that I consider NORAD an amplification of and extension under NATO. I must say very faithfully that nothing I have heard in this debate has changed my mind with respect to the validity of that statement.

I must say very frankly that I was surprised, and indeed astonished, by the observations made in the debate last evening by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) when he brought into this house the name of Mr. Spaak. I regret very much that the name of this distinguished leader of the west, the secretary general of NATO, has been brought into this political debate. Wherein did the surprise and astonishment that I experienced arise? The Leader of the Opposition read from what he told us was a transcript taken from a tape recording of the press conference that Mr. Spaak held when he was here. The extract taken from that press conference and the observations of Mr. Spaak read as follows:

Q. Mr. Spaak, you said just now that NATO was—

I cannot make out the word.

—looking with interest at NORAD. Do you consider NORAD part of NATO?

A. No, it is not under the command of NATO.

Speaking for myself, as that was uttered by the Leader of the Opposition I was left with the impression that Mr. Spaak had said it was not part of NATO; but if you read as is printed in Hansard these words, "No, it is not under the command of NATO", that is something different from the impression that was left. Some of us did not have the opportunity to see the manuscript to which the Leader of the Opposition referred.

But now that the name of Mr. Spaak has been brought into this debate, I can say that he himself personally told me that he got rather mixed up in the press interview. He did make at least two subsequent statements that qualified the impression that was made in the press conference. I am confident that the Leader of the Opposition must have known of the qualification. I could refer to a meeting we both attended. Although Mr. Spaak made the qualification in French, I am sure the French of the Leader of the Opposition is better than mine but I understood that he was qualifying his statement on that particular occasion. But I go to the public press. I am reading an excerpt from a clipping from the Halifax Chronicle Herald that appeared on June 4. Mr. Spaak is quoted and the remarks are in quotation marks:

NORAD is not the direct concern of the NATO authorities in Paris as SACEUR, SACLANT and the Channel command are—

This government has never claimed that NORAD was a command of NATO. We agree with that statement. But then he goes on to say this:

—but the military plans of NORAD are known to the standing group and the military committee—

The two committees senior to NORAD under NATO, under the NATO council.

—through the Canada-U.S. regional planning group and studied there—

The Canada-United States regional planning group is an integral—as I said on May 19 in this house—or an integrated organization within NATO. It is organic and it has definite responsibilities under the NATO general organization. But I repeat that part again:

—but the military plans of NORAD are known to the standing group and the military committee through the Canada-U.S. regional planning group and studied there—

It is not just have been informed; not just have been reported—comments were made in the house on the word "informed"—they are studied there.

—thus supplying a base for co-ordination between the plans made by the supreme commanders directly under the standing group and the plans of NORAD.

Mr. Speaker, if they are studied in the standing group and they do not seem to fit into the general over-all defence plans and defensive plans, retaliatory plans of NATO, then there will be discussion of them with the members of the Canada-United States regional planning group. It is in this context therefore that NORAD's role in the general framework of the over-all defence of the North Atlantic treaty area can be justified. This particular group, the Canada-United States regional planning group, is made up of the chiefs of staff of the United States and the chiefs of staff of Canada or, to give them their technical titles or designations, the chiefs of staff committee of Canada and the joint chiefs of staff of the United States. That personnel is identical with the personnel of the group also mentioned in the note, the group to whose component parts the commander in chief of NORAD is responsible. Last evening the Leader of the Opposition stated that the commander in chief of NORAD would have a dual responsibility. I do not think of it in that way. He will be responsible to the joint chiefs of staff of the United States and, not or,—studying together, working together—the chiefs of staff committee of Canada.

I come back to this point that was referred to by the last speaker who said that he would like to be satisfied about political control. I am not going to repeat what I said in the house on May 19 when I traced the political responsibility of the commander in chief of NORAD. He reports to this joint group, the same personnel who are on this planning group, an organic part of NATO. Then they are responsible to their two governments. They must review such proposals and the governments will be bound to accept, and of course accept readily, the responsibility of examining the proposals that are put up to them coupled with recommendations and confirmation that those are militarily acceptable proposals. There is a line of political responsibility. Also the terms of reference which are mentioned in the note must be prepared with the concurrence of the governments. Also with respect to the plans or procedures—and those are strictly military, I am informed; I have not seen them—they must be acceptable to the national authorities.

The question with respect to sovereignty was raised this afternoon. I put the matter this way, Mr. Speaker. It is very simple. If I enter into a contract with, let us say, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), in so far as I restrict or limit my course of action to any particular degree, I am bound. If that is said to be loss of personal freedom, I would dispute that contention. I go to other treaties; I mention other treaties. I mention entering into a treaty involving abrogation or even surrender of sovereignty. I go to the North Atlantic Treaty which was approved, as we have been told on several occasions, in this house. I might be able to accept the proposition that there has perhaps been a temporary delegation of sovereignty. If that could be validated, then I would say it is undoubtedly justified, having regard to the military danger in which we find ourselves.

In his speech last night reference was made by the Leader of the Opposition to the question of consultation. He remarked that he was very happy to note that continuous consultation should take place. This was emphasized in the note between Canada and the United States. Over the years there has been set up machinery and procedures for consultation. The Leader of the Opposition would well know of the accuracy of that particular observation on my part. I agree with what has been said here that the establishment of NATO makes political consultation between the two countries much more necessary. And that is why we were happy in our negotations with the state department to find that they were eager—not only willing, but eager—to emphasize this point and this is evidence of continued and full co-operation. The emphasis is to be found in these words contained in the note as follows:

> The two governments consider that the establishment of integrated air defence arrangements of the nature described increases the importance of the fullest possible consultation between the two governments on all matters affecting the joint defence of North America, and that defence co-operation between them can be worked out on a mutually satisfactory basis only if such consultation is regularly and consistently undertaken.

I would say, however, that we do not propose to set up new machinery merely for the sake of doing so, but that if we find our present machinery—and I think now of the joint defence board and other organizations in addition to our normal diplomatic communications—is not sufficient to provide the proper machinery for consultation, then we will endeavour to improve what we have or will even look at the possibility of making changes.

Let me assure the house, as I did on May 19 last, that in both Ottawa and Washington there exists determination to ensure that such consultation will be carried out and that the procedures and methods of integration between our two countries, not only in respect of NORAD but also in respect of other facets of continental military defence, will be fully and frankly discussed.

This afternoon a question was raised with respect to the powers and responsibilities of the deputy commander in chief of NORAD. I have consulted with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), and he confirms the information I am about to give. I do think, incidentally, that this information is quite clear in the note; in the absence of the commander in chief the deputy commander will assume his powers and his responsibilities. It is stated very clearly in the note that in the absence of the commander in chief, NORAD, command passes to the deputy commander, and there are no reservations in this very positive and categorical statement.

As the Minister of National Defence indicated last night, the commander in chief, NORAD, has been away on many occasions and the minister stated today that the deputy commander, Air Vice Marshal Slemon, has been recognized by his colleagues as full commander on such occasions. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) last evening indicated that in his view NORAD really is not an agreement at all, and I would like to quote briefly from page 1027 of Hansard for June 10, as follows:

> The agreement is not an elaborate one; in fact it is not an agreement at all. The material before us does not represent an agreement, it represents an agreement to agree on something. It is no more than that.

In reply to that, I would say to this house that all one has to do is to read carefully the articles to be found on pages 3 and 4 of the note. I am not going to examine the details at this moment and thereby take up the time of the house but I would just mention that in articles 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6 we find the word "will" and we find the word "must", which is even stronger when used in that context.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East last evening and at that time I had on my desk a copy of the North Atlantic treaty. Here is the article which provides for the machinery for defence under NATO, and I am referring to page 13, including even the Canadian-United States regional planning group. Article 3 states as follows:

> In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

There is nothing there about SACLANT or committees or SACEUR or anything else, and indeed the note which has been presented to the house is much more specific and sets out much more detail than the proposals outlined in the North Atlantic treaty.

I would like to conclude by reminding the house that having regard to the organic nature of the Canadian-United States regional planning group and, with the same personnel as the joint chiefs of staff to whom the commander in chief of NORAD is responsible, I believe we can say that this is an amplification and an extension of NATO. I would like to express the hope that we will have a unanimous endorsation of this proposal by this house. The proposal embodied in the note provides for the effective defence of Canada under a single command which, it has been demonstrated to us by our military advisers, is much more effective as a means to meet the needs of the day and the possible dangers with which we may be faced where immediate action within minutes or even seconds, is of the utmost importance. The proposal also provides for the more effective co-ordination of the two air forces than had been possible up to August 1, 1957. I would also remind the house that the military authority under this proposal is subject to civilian control and that NORAD is part of the defences of which we find the apex in the strategic force and, in NATO, the defence of the west against possible nuclear war.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): And that, Mr. Speaker, is the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith), on perhaps one of the most important issues ever to come before this House of Commons. Here we have a treaty between Canada and the United States—a solitary foreign power—dealing fundamentally with the defence of Canada in the event of aggression and the placement of a major part of our armed forces under the ultimate control of that foreign power. And that is the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on this subject. It is almost inconceivable that that is all the Secretary of State for External Affairs has to tell this House of Commons.

Priority was given to trying to explain away a very definite statement made by Mr. Spaak. It was not quite fair in my estimation, at least, for the hon. gentleman, perhaps not intentionally, to cast a slur upon hon. members who may have quoted that esteemed authority. It is only correct that they should have quoted him, because, after all, he is the secretary general of NATO and perhaps the highest authority who could be quoted in the circumstances with respect to a treaty which, the government maintains, is an integral part of NATO itself.

I was most interested to read back on May 20 in various newspapers across the country a statement by a Canadian Press staff writer to the effect that the Canada-United States agreement on the air defence of North America must rank as one of the fuzziest international documents of recent times. That certainly was my impression at the time, and I know that everyone in this chamber had a heartfelt hope that when this matter finally came up for discussion the fuzziness would be cleared away and that a plain explanation would be given with regard to this treaty and the principles of its application.

Mr. Speaker, one can only speak for oneself, but I wish to state that in my estimation the entire situation still seems to be in a welter of confusion and contradiction; even the statements made by hon. members on the government side during this debate have done nothing to clear up the discrepancies. I cannot reconcile the statements made in the past by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). They have not yet been explained. Government speakers have been endeavouring to argue—or make it clear as far as they can, I suppose—that NORAD is an emanation of NATO and that political approval of NORAD therefore flows directly from approval of NATO. The Prime Minister had this to say on December 21, as reported page 2721 of Hansard:

> I want to re-emphasize what I pointed out there, and it was accepted as a fact, that these integrated forces are an integral part of the NATO military structure in the Canada-United States region.

It was not so many days after the Prime Minister made that statement that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), on January 4, asked a question of the Minister of National Defence which is to be found on page 2865 of Hansard of that date. He asked a question as follows:

> Is it the intention of the government, when agreement has been reached with the United States on the political arrangements covering the defence organization, to submit that political agreement to the NATO council for discussion with the NATO partners in the hope, perhaps, that an agreement of this kind can be made an integral part of the NATO organization?

To that question the Minister of National Defence made the reply to be found on page 2866 of Hansard, and he said:

> That matter would, of course, have to be discussed with the United States. I cannot make any firm commitment. I can only express a personal opinion which it would not be wise for me to express here. It would have to be discussed, as the hon. gentleman knows, with the United States.

So, Mr. Speaker, here we have the Prime Minister stating that NORAD was an integral part of NATO, and then we have the Minister of National Defence saying he could not say whether it was or not without discussing it with the United States. That contradiction has not yet been cleared up, either yesterday or today. As a matter of fact, the only definite statement we have on the subject whatsoever—and I say this though it may hurt the feelings of the Secretary of State for External Affairs—is the clear-cut statement made by Mr. Spaak as quoted verbatim by the Leader of the Opposition last evening.

Now, let us turn directly to the formal notes with which we are actually dealing. What does this document say?

It says this:

> In view of the foregoing considerations and on the basis of the experience gained in the operation on an interim basis of the North American air defence command, my government proposes that the following principles should govern the future organization and operation of the North American air defence command.
> (1) The commander-in-chief NORAD will be responsible to the chiefs of staff committee of Canada and the joint chiefs of staff of the United States, who in turn are responsible to their respective governments.

Where is NATO there? NATO is just not there at all. The formal note continues and says, in paragraph 2:

> The North American air defence command will include such combat units and individuals as are specifically allocated to it by the two governments.

Let us review that very briefly: "In view of the foregoing considerations and on the basis of the experience gained in the operation of the North American air defence command" I would have thought that the Minister of National Defence or, at least, the Prime Minister, would have told us just what experience was gained in the operation on an interim basis of the North American air defence command, because we were told last night at about a quarter to ten by the Minister of National Defence that no Canadian squadrons have yet been allocated to NORAD, and I have yet to read anywhere that the United States has allocated any to NORAD either. It would be interesting to know that too. But on the basis of what we do know with regard to our own country, namely that no squadrons have been allocated to NORAD, just what is the experience that has been gained in the operation which has convinced the government that there should now be this Canada-United States agreement as has been outlined and as is now before us for consideration?

I say, "for consideration" and not for ratification because there is already a signed treaty in existence between the two governments. This brings to mind another point which I think is worthy of the utmost consideration, and that is that a treaty between Canada and the United States of this nature is most certainly a matter of external relations and is, surely, just the type of subject which we have established a standing committee on external affairs to consider. I am amazed that on a foreign relations question of this importance and nature action of this sort should not have been taken. As I have said, on the basis of the exchange as outlined in the formal notes I can find nothing which would constitute NORAD as an integral part of NATO.

I was interested when the Secretary of State for External Affairs just a few moments ago stood in his place holding in his hand a little blue booklet called "North Atlantic Treaty Organization". I presume it is exactly the same one I have, published in Paris in 1957 by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under the authority of the information division. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to one page of that booklet and said that there was to be found conclusive evidence of our tie-in with NATO. It does not do any such thing.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I never used that document for that purpose.

Mr. Winch: It certainly sounded that way. Far be it from me to question what the minister intended to convey. I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members of this house and particularly the Secretary of State for External Affairs just what is the meaning and position of NATO and for that purpose I am going to quote from page 5 of this booklet under a section headed, "Why the Treaty was Signed". It states:

> The North Atlantic Treaty, signed in Washington on 4 April, 1949, arose from a community of interest long visible in the history of the west, but never before given such clear recognition and expression in time of peace. Today, the North Atlantic no longer represents a vast barrier separating two continents, but the inland sea of a closely-linked community. Its seaways and adjoining waters serve a group of nations which have been nurtured in common traditions and which share a common respect for the rule of law, and individual liberty . . .
> Now, for the first time, they pooled their resources for collective defence before aggression started, in the hope and conviction that in this way they would preserve peace.

May I interject at this point to explain what the words "pooled their resources for collective defence" mean to this group. Hon. members of this party over the years have emphasized the need for collective security and collective defence and at all times supported measures calling for these things but when we use the word "collective" that is exactly what we mean, the pooling in one collective security organization and not individual nations entering into collective security agreements when they choose and remaining outside when they wish to do so. We believe in true collective security. I continue quoting from page 5:

> The treaty could not have come into existence without a major change in the policies of some of its signatories, and yet it was signed by 12 widely spread nations, varying in size and importance from the United States to Luxembourg and representing two continents. North America was represented by the United States and Canada.

In what way do the United States and Canada tie in? We can find that too, because on page 21 we read:

> The council then proceeded to establish a defence committee, composed ordinarily of defence ministers, and charged with the task of drawing up unified defence plans for the north Atlantic area. It suggested specifically that the military part of the organization should include a military committee and certain regional planning groups.

May I emphasize the following comment:

> The regional planning groups were instructed 'to develop and recommend to the military committee, through the standing group, plans for the defence of the region".

In that same paragraph of the booklet Canada and the United States are indicated as one region and as such they were instructed to develop and recommend to the military committee through the standing group plans for the defence of the region. On page 47 of the report under the heading "Canada-United States Regional Planning Group" we read:

> This planning group, which covers the North American area, develops and recommends to the military committee, through the standing group, plans for the defence of the Canada-United States region.

Throughout this entire official document of NATO it is understood that Canada and the United States as a regional planning group are to develop and recommend to the military committee of NATO the over-all defence plans and according to my interpretation NATO exercises supreme authority.

On the last page of this booklet there appears a graph which shows the chain of command from the supreme allied commander Atlantic right down through to our own air force and navy on the Atlantic coast. It is a graph very much different from the one supplied to the hon. members of the estimates committee yesterday by the Minister of National Defence.

As I said, we in this group have always supported to the fullest extent the concept of collective security and collective defence but we are still in the dark as to the direct relationship in conformity with NATO that exists as a result of the introduction of the NORAD treaty agreement with the United States. We strongly feel we have not been given the information which as members of the House of Commons we are entitled to receive which would give us a satisfactory understanding of the situation. There is still too much confusion and contradiction. I have already mentioned one example of the squadron control.

I suppose we cannot challenge the statement of the Minister of National Defence to the effect that the strategic air command planes of the United States air force do not fly over or from Canada and yet on the same day that statement was made the Prime Minister announced that permission had now been granted for the establishment of tanker refuelling stations in Canada. There may be a logical explanation but we have not heard it yet as to why the United States should want to establish tanker refuelling stations in Canada if United States planes are not flying over or from Canada.

There are many questions which have not been satisfactorily answered. Several contradictions have not been reconciled. The confusion has not been cleared away. I do not think hon. members of this house should be expected to reach a decision on this matter until such time as the confusion has been eliminated and the conflicting statements of ministers of the present government have been reconciled and until we have been taken into the confidence of the government as completely as possible within security provisions to enable us to appreciate the necessity for this action and be convinced that this is a direct part of the NATO command.

Mr. Speaker: May I take this opportunity to deal with the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) and seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) while the Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea) was in the chair. The Acting Speaker expressed the view that the amendment was probably irrelevant but reserved decision. I concur in the view he tentatively expressed as to the irrelevance of the proposed motion which I think is apparent from a consideration of the motion itself which calls for two things; first, that it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the agreement and, second, that this house do approve the agreement. That is all that the motion puts forward. In effect, if the motion is affirmed it will approve the agreement and if it is negatived it will disapprove the agreement. If the amendment has the effect of denying the motion it is unnecessary and irrelevant because those members who wish to disapprove the agreement have only to vote against the motion as it stands.

If the amendment adds something to the motion in a positive way it is a declaration of principle in these terms, that it is advisable for the government to give consideration to the taking of such steps as are necessary to integrate these agreements within the structure of NATO. Assuming that the amendment and the motion were accepted you would have the agreement approved but you would have added to it a declaration of this independent principle which is not related to the motion nor is it necessary for the decision of the motion in question.

That view is reinforced by a consideration of the limited number of cases where it is possible to introduce a principle by way of an amendment. There are only three or four cases. A very similar matter was considered by the Speaker in 1932 as set out on page 48 of the Journals of the house for October 20, 1932. If I may, I should like to read the relevant portions to indicate the limitations that all members are under in an attempt to add a principle to a motion of this kind. The Speaker of that time said:

There is no doubt in my mind that under standing order 48—

Which is now 44.

—this motion can be amended. The original motion before the house approves the trade agreement entered into at Ottawa 20th August, 1932, between representatives of the government of Canada and of the government of the United Kingdom. The amendment proposed both approves and disapproves of the agreement. It is out of order for the following reasons.

Then the Speaker deals with paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the proposed amendment which I do not need to cite and goes on to deal with paragraphs 4 and 5 about which he says:

Paragraphs 4 and 5 affirm general principles which cannot be moved as amendments to motions of this sort but which could be moved on other occasions.

For example, a motion clearly could be brought forward for the purposes of this amendment but it would have to be on notice and as an independent motion. I continue with the quotation:

May, Bourinot and Redlich indicate that the only motions upon which amendments declaratory of principle may be moved are motions for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, motions to go into committee of ways and means and supply and for the second reading of public bills.

Then he cites the references in these three authorities. On these grounds I must declare the amendment to be out of order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the house reads as follows:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve an exchange of notes constituting an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America concerning the organization and operation of the North American air defence command (NORAD) signed at Washington May 12, 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

In moving this resolution, the Prime Minister forces us to approve of principles which we have long recognized as necessary for the defence of our country and that of North America.

On the other hand, so many objections were raised by the various speakers in this debate, that we are wondering whether, in fact, it is fair to ask parliament to approve of an agreement so lacking in clarity as that which was signed on May 12 by the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. Robertson, and by the Hon. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State for the United States.

However, this discussion will have enabled us to see a second side to the Prime Minister of Canada whom we have heard in the past invariably advocate, in grandiloquent statements, respect for the rights of parliament and rebuke the government of the day, in and out of season, for not respecting the rights of parliament and of hon. members. If he has come forward with this resolution at this time, it is not however of his own volition, but because he was forced into it by repeated demands of the opposition which required that this matter be submitted to parliamentary approval. We know also that since last October, the Liberal party and the C.C.F. had requested that the government acquaint the house with the discussions which were taking place regarding North American defence. This request was always refused on the ground that the agreement had not proceeded far enough as yet. Moreover the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) had said: "How can this matter be brought before the house when there is nothing final or complete about it?"

Nevertheless, this year when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) spoke about the agreement he did state categorically, at least originally, that in his opinion NORAD was an integral part of NATO and that, therefore, there seemed to be no necessity to have it discussed by parliament since it was merely an extension of something which had already been accepted and existed at that time. The Leader of the Opposition, and several other opposition members, rose to insist on an opportunity being offered hon. members to discuss this agreement signed on May 12 in Washington. It was only as a result of that insistence that the Prime Minister rose to say that we were to be given the opportunity of discussing it, and that we were to have before us a resolution which would provide for a complete and useful discussion.

At the time we began to study this resolution, we already knew that there was a great deal of confusion about it. Yet, with each of our hon. friends opposite rising in an attempt to clarify the situation, it grows murkier than ever.

There is no doubt that the United States and Canada have been on friendly terms for a long time. In fact, even if at times there have been causes of friction, Canada and the United States have been living in peace side by side since 1813. This is evidence of the fact that we are old-time friends of the United States but it does not mean that we should give up our personality as a nation and that we should not be considered as an autonomous country with rights of its own.

I believe that, according to the agreement signed on May 12, we are surrendering part of our sovereignty. As the Leader of the Opposition so aptly put it, there is nothing in this that compares with the sacrifices we are making for NATO. Several countries of the world have agreed in the face of danger to sacrifice part of their sovereignty for the common good. Is this agreement between the United States and Canada identical with the NATO agreement? NATO is made up of several countries whereas in this case there are only two countries making decisions outside of NATO. Regardless of what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of National Defence, this agreement is quite distinct from NATO, because the Secretary General of NATO, who was in Ottawa recently, admitted that NORAD is not part of NATO, that he had not heard of it, that it had not been discussed beforehand and that it was an experiment being looked at with interest by NATO. However, there was no statement from this international authority to indicate that it is indeed part and parcel of NATO.

On the other hand, here is what I read in the introductory paragraphs of the letter sent by Mr. Robertson to Mr. John Foster Dulles:

> The Canada-United States region is an integral part of the NATO area.

So far, we are all agreed; no one denies that the United States and Canada are members of NATO in so far as the defence of our common good is concerned.

> In support of the strategic objectives established in NATO for the Canada-United States region and in accordance with the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty—

Please note that there is no mention of "strategic objectives established by NORAD", nor of "strategic objectives established by the Minister of National Defence of Canada and the Secretary of State of the United States", but there is mention of the "strategic objectives established in NATO." Up to this point, NATO had not been consulted and had not been informed of what Canada and the United States were to decide...

> —for the Canada-United States region and in accordance with the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty, our two governments have, by establishing the North American Air Defence Command, recognized the desirability of integrating headquarters exercising operational control over assigned air defence forces.

Now, I do not see here any likeness, no comparison with the treaty binding the NATO nations. Besides, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) while making his comparisons, pointed out many details proving that the agreement which we have entered into with the United States is certainly not one that falls within the framework of NATO.

I note in the preamble of the articles of the agreement the following:

> In view of the foregoing considerations and on the basis of the experience gained in the operation on an interim basis of the North American air defence command, my government proposes that the following principles should govern the future organization and operations of the North American air defence command.

However, in the preamble immediately preceding the agreement which was signed, there is absolutely no reference to NATO. Yet we were given as an excuse that this agreement should not be submitted to parliament because it did form part of the NATO concept.

Well, if the right hon. Prime Minister were still in the opposition, I wonder whether his approach of the matter would have been the same. Those who have been members of this house since at least 1953 will recall the many times when the present Prime Minister rose in criticism of the former government's attitude, which, however, was very much broader than the present administration's, for no statement, no international agreement was ever made or signed without being first submitted to this house.

We are now before an accomplished fact. The fact is that we have signed an agreement. It is an agreement which was entered into without parliament having had the opportunity of looking at it, and since yesterday, members of the opposition have been asking many questions that have yet to be answered, which proves that there are still many details to be clarified.

This agreement should have been submitted to this house many weeks or months ago. This government would thus have introduced something much more intelligible, not to say intelligent.

We have been asking numerous questions since yesterday and no definite answer has yet been forthcoming. I have read rather carefully the answer which the Minister of National Defence tried to give yesterday to the different questions but, in spite of all my efforts and good will, I could find no clarification. He merely repeated the questions which had been asked and, in what seemed unending verbiage, he gave explanations which instead of clarifying the situation made it more confused. I would be inclined to repeat the speech he made; it would be enough to show that the minister did not dare answer.

However, a question has been asked by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to which no answer has been given either by the Minister of National Defence or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The hon. member asked whether, in the absence of the supreme commander, General Partridge, the Canadian commander, his deputy, would have the same authority as General Partridge, under section 3 of the agreement, to give orders to American troops and squadrons without consulting the American government. If he has not, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have not answered that question and I even wonder whether the Prime Minister, in his final reply, will be able to answer it.

At first we heard that, because the situation was not clear, this question could not be discussed before being submitted to the American government, but I wonder whether the American government would answer in that way before the question had been submitted to the Canadian government.

Mr. Speaker, I see my time is running out and I would not like to take up too much of the time of the house, but I would have liked to have at least 40 minutes. . . . (Applause). I take it that this applause expresses the wish that I sit down, because when the remarks made do not hurt anyone, hon. members seem to be rather indifferent but when they are not indifferent, it means that they are being hurt.

Mr. Speaker, why were we promised at the last session that the agreement would be submitted to the house before it was signed, and why does the government refuse to submit it this year? Why was the agreement signed before being submitted to the approval of the house? Has the government reached the point where it believes itself made up of supermen, who cannot be wrong?

The discussion which has been going on since yesterday, the remarks of my leader, the Leader of the Opposition and those of the hon. member for Essex East, the numerous questions asked by these two members and by members of the C.C.F. party, to which no answer has been given, show that there is still much confusion, that the question is not clear, that it has not been clarified and might never be.

I hope that, from now on, whenever this government signs an agreement with another country, it will at least have the decency to ask the opinion of members of this house, to whatever party they belong, so that the government may be enlightened and may proceed more efficiently in the future.

(Text):

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the house listened with much interest yesterday to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the NORAD resolution. We were a little bit surprised that on a matter as important as is this subject he should have introduced a political note here and there. I rather regretted it. At the beginning of his remarks, as recorded at page 992 of Hansard, he said this:

> I do not intend to enter into anything of a controversial nature in making this presentation,—

For many years now, as far as foreign policy is concerned or at least in so far as foreign policy relates to matters of national defence is concerned, we have had in Canada fairly unanimous support of one policy on the part of most sections of the Canadian people.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask the hon. member a question? If that is so, is your group going to vote for this measure?

Mr. Regier: I should like to advise the hon. member to await the event. If he will listen to what I have to say, near the end of my remarks I believe he will have the answer; and the onus will be placed on the Prime Minister of Canada. It will not be upon us.

We regret that in what may be a matter involving life and death for many of our people and indeed for hundreds of millions of the world's people the Prime Minister should have injected political notes and overtones. We feel that he was not doing the cause any good when he resorted to that procedure. We were awaiting with considerable anticipation the speeches that we thought were to be given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) because they are the two members of the cabinet who are most directly involved, being responsible for matters of this kind.

After the election we heard that our Secretary of State for External Affairs had made a trip down to Washington in order, according to press reports, to receive a briefing on what was happening in the world today; and we heard, according to other press reports, that General Partridge appeared in Ottawa not so long ago to give our Minister of National Defence a briefing on what was happening in defence matters in the western world. The people of Canada were hoping that their first major speeches in this house on defence matters would provide much of the information that they had gleaned—and in the opinion of many, that they apparently had to glean—rather regrettably, in another country or from the nationals of another country. We had hoped that they would have been adequately informed by the senior officials of their own departments and would not have had to be briefed by United States officialdom.

We maintain that there is nothing that is as harmful to our defence as is a misinformed or uninformed Canadian public. One of our strongest weapons of defence is the conviction of our own people that everything that can possibly be done in these matters is being done. However, after listening to the debate yesterday and today—and I am sure the people of Canada upon reading Hansard will have to agree with me—I feel that very little has been done to inform our public. Our public will be as confused as are many members of this house; and many of us have no hesitation in admitting that we are very much confused indeed.

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) some time ago described this whole problem of NORAD as Canada's greatest crossword puzzle. After two days of debate, it appears that not only is it a crossword puzzle but that in the interval several of the essential pieces of that crossword puzzle have been lost, and there does not seem to be any hope that the pattern can be established. The intent of my remarks today is to make, on behalf of this group, one final appeal to the Prime Minister to clear up so many of the uncertainties which have existed in the past and which exist today to a greater extent than ever.

The Prime Minister gave one version yesterday. He attempted to build a nice little nest. We were hoping for a nest of security into which all of us might climb, as we have so often done on other occasions in the history of the Canadian parliament. However, that nest has been considerably fouled up by the several speeches that have been made. As recorded at page 995 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> For this purpose the agreement puts these forces under the operation of a single joint headquarters, of which the senior official is a United States air force general and his deputy is a Canadian air marshal.

He refers here to the agreement putting these forces under the operation of this joint headquarters. Yet the Minister of National Defence indicated very clearly that there may well not be any forces. Hence we are left in the dark on that score. As reported on the same page of Hansard, in referring to his meeting with General Partridge the Prime Minister said this:

> We reviewed as well their problems and the plans they formulated to meet the changing circumstances,—

I should like to ask the Prime Minister this question. Who formulated the plans? Then, of course, to that confusion we have added the confusion of the Minister of National Defence who indicated that there may not be any plans since he said that plans cannot be formulated in a matter of a few days and that there is nothing more now than there has always been, namely continuous consultation. I presume he was going back as far as the Ogdensburg agreement when he referred to continuous consultation. However, we are then told by the Prime Minister that the plan is for maximum effectiveness on a moment's notice.

Surely, if there are no forces, if it is only a matter of consultation, how can we take the Prime Minister at his word when he refers to "maximum effectiveness" and "on a moment's notice" and "under the command of a single joint board"? The Prime Minister adds to the confusion when later on he says that this command will have powers which he describes and on page 996 of Hansard of June 10 he says:

> I have seen these commanders, I was impressed with them, and I feel that the Canadian people and the people of the United States can have confidence in them. Over and over again they underlined the fact that the role of NORAD is defence, not attack; that its objective is defensive, not aggressive. It will not and cannot start wars. It can come into action only if potential aggressors are over our territory.

And yet in another place he says "it contains as well the powers to retaliate against aggressors".

I find it hard to reconcile those two statements. He assures us that he has met these commanders and we should have every confidence in them, that the role of NORAD is defence and not attack and its objective is defensive, not aggressive; that it can go into action only if potential aggressors are over our territory and at the same time he says it contains as well the power to retaliate against aggressors. For a defensive force to be able to retaliate requires a little more than simply powers of a defensive nature.

There has been further confusion with respect to the planes of the strategic air command. We were assured as long ago as 1957 that a large portion of the planes attached to SAC were continuously airborne in order to be ready to implement our policy of instant retaliation as our major contribution to the so-called deterrent to war, and yet we were assured by the Minister of National Defence that except in special circumstances none of these planes is in Canadian skies. For many months, in fact as much as half a year, we were assured that if they were over Canadian territory they were, except under special circumstances, not equipped with nuclear weapons, and many of us were wondering what was the purpose of having these planes in the air if they were not ready to start retaliatory action which might be needed at a moment's notice. What was the purpose of it?

However, we now have the situation where, possibly to further clarify the matter, we are assured that they are avoiding flying under ordinary conditions in their routine flights over Canadian territory, and I repeat the question put by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch): Why do they want refueling bases if they are not to be found over Canadian territory?

I would like to refer for a moment to the proposal put forth some days ago when the Prime Minister, in his efforts to be political in this matter, was attempting to bait the opposition into opposing the NORAD agreement and when he made reference to continental defence. I have with me a copy of the Ogdensburg agreement which, I believe, was the first conscious effort at providing for continental defence. This was read into the record by the late prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, on November 12, 1940. Mr. King read as follows:

[Mr. Regier.]

The Prime Minister and the President have discussed the mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.

It has been agreed that a permanent joint board on defence shall be set up at once by the two countries.

This permanent joint board on defence shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material.

It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.

The permanent joint board on defence will consist of four or five members from each country, most of them from the services. It will meet shortly.

That was an advisory committee set up to study the mutual problems of defence and to then make appropriate recommendations to their respective governments in respect of such action as might be considered necessary. That was an altogether different matter from the NORAD agreement now before us. I very much regret that we were not given the chance to take a close analytical look at this agreement, that we were not able to consider it in committee, even in a committee on external affairs meeting in camera. We have not been assured that this is going to be done.

We are rather concerned, as was so ably pointed out by the hon. member for Kootenay West, that in our opinion there seems to be—and I want to be fair—a departure from the principle of NATO. NATO was an organization formed wherein some 16 countries agreed that an attack on one was an attack on all. We now have a new arrangement whereby two countries, or possibly even one country—and I am not sure whether under the NORAD agreement this is not possible—one country alone may engage in warfare without consultation with the 14 or 15 NATO allies.

An indication was given by the Prime Minister that NORAD was not a diminution of Canadian sovereignty. We do not, however, need to fool ourselves. Every time we sign an international agreement we relinquish Canadian sovereignty. That is the sole purpose of affixing our signature to such an agreement. We have never been really disturbed or alarmed at the prospect of relinquishing Canadian sovereignty provided such sovereignty was relinquished to a world-wide organization devoted to the cause of peace, such as the United Nations, or previously to the League of Nations, or even to a group of nations having ideals very similar to our own and who have decided to band together for reasons of collective security.

Much confusion still exists as to who gives the orders. We were at one time given to understand in this house that the decision would be made at Colorado Springs. Our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) made much of the fact that he could get into contact with Colorado Springs within 40 seconds. I wonder whether this also applies to the possibility of his attending a political meeting in a little red school house somewhere in northern British Columbia—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Regier: —or I am hoping that, like the rest of us, he will be able to take a holiday. Will the 40-second phone call rule also apply to him if he is out on the golf links somewhere? We recall also that St. Hubert is involved and our own command in Canada is concerned and would also be consulted.

I am very pleased that the Prime Minister introduced the subject of the rules of engagement as they were first issued in 1951. I think the Canadian people ought to be told, and can safely be told, that the orders have already been issued. I do not think we should try to hide that from the Canadian people. The officers commanding all branches of our armed forces have already received orders governing their action in every conceivable eventuality, and for us to pretend there is going to be wide consultation among civilian authorities in the case of an emergency is clearly a lot of eyewash intended to lull the people of Canada into a false sense of security. I would go so far as to say that all NATO area commanders have already received their orders and it is rather foolish for us to be threshing straw and attempting to define who is responsible for giving the order which would have to be given at whatever might be the crucial moment.

I particularly regret this desertion of the principle of collective security in favour of an agreement with one other nation. It completely changes the concept of collective defence. I believe that all our allies in western Europe have for some time felt uneasy at the desertion of the traditional policy of NATO. When NATO was founded we told the Soviet union that one foot on the soil of any one of us would mean instant retaliation. Now, the nations of Europe have been told this no longer applies, that they are expendable and that an invader will be allowed to swallow them up inch by inch and yard by yard.

An hon. Member: Sheer nonsense. They will be disturbed if they hear your speech.

Mr. Regier: Hon. members can shout "sheer nonsense" all they like but I know that the policy of the United States is continental defence first and western Europe defence second.

Mr. Nesbitt: How do you know that?

Mr. Regier: All their actions over the past several years have tended in that direction, and there is great concern among all the allied NATO countries in Europe. There is a feeling that this concept of limited warfare in which as much as a whole European nation could be involved has now been accepted in North America, and I do not think the people of Europe are going to feel very happy when they hear that Canada and the United States are now making arrangements of their own. They feel that we will help them along, supply them with missile bases, give them missiles, even with atomic warheads and so on, but that if the fatal day should arrive we would not necessarily abide by our NATO undertaking that an attack on the territory of any one power is to be regarded as an attack on the territory of all.

I am sure the Prime Minister is hoping for the unanimous agreement of this house with regard to the NORAD resolution. However, we would like him to explain to us how this agreement hastens the day when we will have an international police force; we would like him to explain how it strengthens NATO; we would like him to tell us what satisfaction our European allies will receive from the existence of the NORAD arrangement. We want to know where the NORAD agreement is in force, who gives the commands. What does the Prime Minister mean when he refers to new and further developments? Is he hinting at some great expansion in defence expenditure when he refers to NORAD? We are not yet clear as to where SAC planes are in the air. If they are not in Canadian skies—and we occupy more than half of the northern hemisphere —where are they? And we are not yet satisfied with regard to their carrying nuclear weapons. Yet if they are not loaded with nuclear weapons what is the purpose of having them in the air at all?

Speaking for myself I should like the Prime Minister to explain how the NORAD agreement is in line with the statement he made in Edmonton as reported by the Canadian Press, as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker says leaders of the free world must have a positive and vital program in the race for men's minds instead of employing a negative and defensive policy designed to answer soviet propaganda.

I hope the Prime Minister will explain how that ideal of his, which I am sure all of us share, and which we think is most urgent and vital today is being assisted by the NORAD agreement. We feel that the NORAD agreement may well be a danger to peace and render a disservice to western Europe unless we receive satisfactory replies to the questions we have asked, and we feel we can have no confidence in the confusing answers which the two senior ministers have given. We expect the Prime Minister himself to clear up these misunderstandings. This movement has always been in support of collective security.

Mr. Nesbitt: How about German rearmament?

Mr. Regier: It has always hesitated to do anything that might endanger the peace of the world or the safety of our country and in answer to the hon. member for Oxford I may say that in the last parliament the C.C.F. section had a higher proportion of veterans in its ranks than any other section of the house. We are asking these things in all sincerity and we expect our Prime Minister to answer them.

Mr. Speaker: If the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that I would have been allowed sufficient time before the adjournment hour today to have dealt with the many arguments that have been advanced, but this now appears to be impossible having regard to the fact that only ten minutes remain and it is necessary for me to leave very shortly in order to meet the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom who commences his visit with us this evening.

However, in a few moments I will deal with one or two matters that have been raised. I have listened to the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I am one of those who through the years have had a regard for my friends opposite, and when they speak with sincerity, whether I agree with them or not, they do uphold the principles of parliament. The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat spoke with great vehemence and because I have known him through the years I can also add that he spoke with sincerity and I pay tribute to him in that regard.

To my hon. friends of the C.C.F. may I say that to a major extent they all endeavoured at the beginning of their arguments, including the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), to suggest that because NORAD was not connected with NATO and might have a weakening effect on NATO action therefore should be taken to bring it under NATO control completely and directly. All the hon. gentlemen of that group who spoke on this matter are from the province of British Columbia and all based their arguments on that ground. To that end they moved an amendment in these words:

> That the motion be amended by adding thereto the following words:
> And in the opinion of this house consideration of the interests of collective security and the principles of the United Nations make it advisable for the government to give consideration to the taking of such steps as are necessary to integrate these agreements within the structure of NATO.

That was their view but it strikes me as passing strange that on June 2, 1958, at their convention in the province of British Columbia, the British Columbia C.C.F. party went on record as being opposed to NATO, urging Canada's withdrawal from it and finding collective security through the United Nations. A report to this effect is contained in the Vancouver Province of Monday, June 2, 1958. Apparently they have the best of two worlds: they have adopted one policy for their party in British Columbia from which most of them come and another policy in the House of Commons when they are speaking to the Canadian people as a whole.

A former outstanding member of this house who represented the constituency of Nanaimo, Mr. Colin Cameron, spoke on that occasion to the convention and as reported in the newspaper article to which I have referred said:

> It is an open secret in Ottawa that from a military point of view NATO is down the drain. Proof that it is down the drain comes from the United States consistent refusal to place under it the American strategic air command.

Mr. Cameron went on to say this:

> NATO has proved to be the major stumbling block to settlement in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of inconsistency, ambiguity and confusion that arouses the doubts to which my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) referred. Where is the consistency? My hon. friends of the C.C.F. have spoken long and volubly of their deep affection for NATO but even before they rose to speak in this house the organization that speaks for them officially from the province of British Columbia went on record as saying, "Do away with NATO".

Now we come to the Liberal attitude. My hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition spoke about doubts, ambiguities, confusion and contradiction. I say it is dangerous for any political party to arouse fears in the hearts of people. My hon. friend and those associated with him endeavoured to do that during the recent election campaign. They said to the people of Canada all the things they have said in this house in the last 24 hours. They indulged in what my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition likes to refer to on occasion as "agitated exaggeration" but the Canadian people would not be stampeded by the kind of fears that he and those associated with him endeavoured to plant in their hearts.

As my hon. friend continued his course of seeking to plant doubt and confusion during the campaign he finally brought forth the most amazing thought of all when he contended in so far as trade with the United States is concerned that we must naturally protect our interests without their being prejudiced by United States policy; that we must, for instance, make it quite clear that the United States cannot expect the full and complete co-operation in continental defence which is desirable if she treats us unfairly in her tariff and trade policies.

Mr Speaker, I spoke with restraint when I introduced this matter but now I am tempted to speak more strongly. One would never have expected that my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition would suggest that we should attempt to use Canadian trade as a weapon in respect of continental defence by saying to the United States, in effect, that it will be without a partner in the preservation and assurance of our joint defence unless that country does what Canada wants it to do.

All during the campaign the Leader of the Opposition attempted to arouse doubt, fear and uncertainty in the minds of Canadians with respect to air defence. I have many clippings here. One article appeared in the Ottawa Journal on February 22, 1958, under the heading, "Raps Lack of Pact with United States". Reporting on a speech made by that hon. gentleman in London, Ontario, the article states in part:

> He concentrated his main evening attack on the government's handling of the North American air defence setup, a move undertaken, he said, without any firm agreement between the two countries and without the prior consent of parliament.
> He didn't criticize the fact that the Canadian-American air defence had been integrated—it was the only way to defend the continent against attack—but attacked the action of the government to agree to the setup without a pact.

In an article in the Toronto Star of March 21, 1958, under the heading, "United States Missile Bases Soon Not Needed in Canada" the Leader of the Opposition is reported as having said at Blind River:

> Liberal leader Lester Pearson gave qualified approval last night to the idea of U.S. bases in Canada for intercontinental ballistic missiles. But he made it clear he did not favour such bases until more attempts had been made to reach an agreement with Russia and had failed.

The Windsor Star of February 15, 1958, reports the hon. gentleman as having said in Toronto:

> —the Progressive Conservative government has given the United States "far-reaching control" over Canada's air force without first completing a political agreement to restrict the measure of that control.

He went on to speak of the dangers to the Canadian people. The hon. gentleman went across the nation with the same arguments that he used last evening.

Mr. Pearson: Why do you not answer them?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker I know my answer to that type of attitude and I know my hon. friend will agree with me because he has said it on a number of occasions. It is necessary to realize in the world in which we live that action has to be taken defensively. I believe in the necessity for a positive and imaginative policy such as the hon. gentleman spoke of a moment ago in his concluding remarks but while advancing that policy we must above everything else maintain our defences. That particularly applies to us in North America because we are perhaps more vulnerable than any other portion of the world at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) but it is now six o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Prime Minister have the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can answer these arguments in five minutes because I wish to go into some detail. I have waited here today to take part in this debate and I do not intend criticism in saying that but in order to cover this matter fully, having regard to the haze that has been cast over this subject by the opposition, which haze was first created as a smokescreen during the recent campaign, I think it would be desirable for me to take some time in order to complete my arguments.

On motion of Mr. Diefenbaker the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business is for tomorrow? I take it it is private members' day but would the leader tell us what the government intends to do on Friday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is private members' day. On Friday we shall conclude this debate and then go on with the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 12, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

First report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. White.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHANGE IN HOURS OF SITTING ON JUNE 13—VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That, when this house adjourns on Thursday, June 12, it stand adjourned until 11.30 a.m., Friday, June 13.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps while this matter is in our minds I might remind hon. members that there is a reception this afternoon to meet the Right Hon. Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in the railway committee room at 5.30 p.m. It is a reception given by the Speakers jointly. Presumably senators will adjourn earlier and be there by 5.30 so there will be free passage for the members at six o'clock. While on that subject, I might say this. Does the Prime Minister intend to say anything about tomorrow's proceedings?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The adjournment asked for, of course, is designed to make possible the appearance within this chamber of Right Hon. Mr. Macmillan where he will deliver a speech to both houses of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Just to complete the matter may I say this. The reception this afternoon is for the members and unfortunately does not include their wives. It is for the members of both houses and the press gallery plus some members of our visitor's party. I think you have all been advised that tomorrow the bell will be rung shortly before ten o'clock. I have taken the liberty of authorizing that the bell be rung, although it is not a session of the house, at ten or twelve minutes to ten. Both houses will assemble then to hear our distinguished guest.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC—APPLICATION TO HOSPITAL PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, or in his absence to the Acting Minister of Labour. Are the hospital administrators and employees subject to the Unemployment Insurance Act? Does this apply even in the province of Quebec and, if not, why not?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, employees in a hospital not operated for gain are not insurable except in the case of those persons employed on a temporary or casual basis, such as in construction, renovation or repair workers. However, any hospital may, at its option and with the consent of the unemployment insurance commission, insure any designated group of employees it wishes; that is an optional arrangement.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—REQUEST FOR HEARINGS IN THE KOOTENAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with high hopes and great expectations I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that present plans do not provide for the Borden commission holding hearings in the Kootenays; in view of the great importance to Canada's economy of the development of the Columbia and Kootenay rivers, and in view of the local desire for hearings to be held in the Kootenay area, would the Prime Minister inform the house if arrangements can be made to meet the wishes of the Kootenay people, who are anxious to make a contribution to the fund of ideas and facts being collected by the commission?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not receive notice of this question but I think I can answer it. The commission has held sittings in British Columbia and in Alberta, and I do not know what further arrangements the commission has in mind with respect to extending its sittings in the province of British Columbia. It is regrettable that the interest of the people of the Kootenay area was not made known to the commission at an earlier date. At least if it was I have no knowledge of that fact. I will, however, communicate with the chairman with a view to ascertaining whether the laudable and desirable end which the hon. gentleman seeks to achieve may yet be made possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

REPORTED VISIT TO CANADA OF MISSION FROM COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he could comment on a report that a mission from communist China is now in this country and has been holding discussions with the Canadian wheat board, and will have discussions with officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce on the question of trade with China?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My understanding, Mr. Speaker, is that there are two representatives of communist China in this country endeavouring to enlarge trade between our two countries. I have had no direct word with the wheat board with regard to whether these representatives have actually met with the board. I will, however, be meeting with the board, I hope in a day or two, and will ask what, if anything, has transpired.

My understanding at the moment is that another cargo of wheat was sold to mainland China as a result of the visit of these representatives of communist China, who may be meeting with other people throughout the country with the general objective of encouraging trade between our two countries.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON DROWNING OF FIVE MEMBERS OF FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on June 10 last the hon. member for Vancouver East asked me if I could give the house any information regarding the tragic drowning of five members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police while on patrol duty on lake Simcoe. Because of the unusual nature of this tragedy and because of the widespread concern it has aroused, perhaps hon. members might wish me to make a full statement at this time. Precisely what happened when this terrible accident occurred we may never be able to say, as there were no survivors, but I shall give the house such facts as we have been able to ascertain.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police has a responsibility for the enforcement of federal statutes which includes enforcement of the Indian Act, the Excise Act and the Canada Shipping Act. Work relating to these acts has frequently taken patrols of the force into the lake Simcoe area and, indeed, there is a regular detachment at Orillia. Georgina island, which lies at the southern end of the lake, is an Indian reserve. It has been necessary to have patrols visit this island from time to time, as well as the adjoining stretch of mainland from Jacksons point to Virginia beach.

These patrols have had to deal with complaints and information reaching the force as to violations of the federal acts I have mentioned, and particularly as to instances of drunkenness and public disorder. I do not want to give the impression that serious disorders have occurred, but circumstances have called for the attention of police patrols, and the size of the patrol in each case is dictated by the circumstances. Such patrols have, of necessity, to be made either by day or by night.

On Saturday evening, June 7, 1958, Corporal H. M. Smart, who was stationed in Toronto but who had a general responsibility for overseeing the work in the lake Simcoe area, took five constables with him from Toronto and proceeded to Beaverton. There he met Constable Farough and Constable Perry of the Orillia detachment, who had travelled to this point by car, bringing with them the patrol boat on a trailer. Some work was carried out in the Beaverton-Sutton area and, indeed, four arrests under the Indian Act were made early in the evening.

Later Corporal Smart, taking with him in the patrol boat Constables Farough and Perry of the Orillia detachment, and Constables Melynchuk and Ransom from Toronto, left the mainland and headed for Georgina island. He left Constables McDonald, Kilcup and Smith from Toronto behind in the police car, the intention being that they would later meet the party on its return from the island, in the meantime carrying out certain duties on the mainland. There was a portable radio in the patrol boat and a radio in the police car.

After some hours without any kind of contact whatever from Corporal Smart and his party in the patrol boat, Constables McDonald and Kilcup drove back toward Virginia beach from Jacksons point, watching for some sign of the boat, thinking that its radio might have gone dead and that it might have reached the mainland at some unarranged point. They had no success and eventually arrived at Virginia beach, where they met another member of the force, Constable Legere, working in another patrol boat. Constable Legere, when he heard that Corporal Smart and party were overdue, became concerned, feeling that they might have run into some unexpected difficulty in carrying out their work on the island. He therefore went across to the island in his own boat, and there found that Corporal Smart and his party had never arrived. It was then realized that some serious accident must have occurred.

At about 9.30 a.m. Sunday, June 8, Mr. Donald Thompson of Foxden road, Don Mills, noticed the patrol boat floating partly submerged and pushed it ashore at Georgina island, where it was shortly thereafter spotted and examined by members of the R.C.M.P.

The boat is a 14-ft. Peterborough "Venus", purchased by the police in August, 1957, and equipped with a 35 horsepower Johnson outboard motor. When found the motor was still attached but the windshield on the boat had been broken, and the walkie-talkie radio, seat backs, and other equipment were missing. The spotlight had been torn clear of the deck but was still dangling by its wires. I should add that the boat carried two life jackets, four life cushions and a fire extinguisher, all of the approved type, equipment specified in the small boat regulations. The manufacturers rate the boat's maximum load as 975 pounds and the craft is designed to carry a 35 horsepower outboard motor. The total weight carried on this fatal night was within the maximum figure referred to.

On Sunday afternoon the body of Corporal Smart was found in the water in the general area where the boat was first sighted, which was about two miles from the shore of the northwest point of Georgina island. The body had on a life jacket and this apparently had kept it afloat. The bodies of the other men have not as yet been found and the search is continuing. An inquest is under way.

One life jacket and four life cushions were later found floating in the general area where the boat was recovered. The water at this point is deep, and on the night in question the water temperature was about 52 degrees on the surface and 47 degrees a few feet down. There were intermittent squalls during the night. When the patrol left the mainland the weather was fair and the water reasonably smooth in the area from which the boat set out.

As I stated earlier, we can only conjecture what happened when these men lost their lives. We do know, however, that Corporal Smart was an experienced and thoroughly responsible non-commissioned officer who knew the district well, while Constable Farough, the man operating the boat, was a competent boatman and had handled an identical boat all last season in that particular area without any difficulty. The duty being carried out was a normal one and of a nature where the detailed arrangements are left to the N.C.O. in charge. We can only conjecture that one of the squalls caught the boat suddenly, perhaps broadside, and threw the men into the water without warning. It would seem that Corporal Smart managed to grab a life jacket, while the other men did not, or that if they did, they were unable to retain them after the accident took place.

There has been some suggestion that the men may have been handicapped when they were thrown into the water by the R.C.M.P. uniform of breeches and boots. Actually the regulations of the force require that members on air or water patrols dress in loose trousers and low boots, and this is the type of uniform Corporal Smart and his men were wearing on the night the patrol was made.

Constables Farough, Perry and Ransom had each been awarded the bronze medallion of the Royal Life Saving Society for swimming and lifesaving ability. Corporal Smart had been active in various sports and was a cubmaster and scoutmaster. He also had taken swimming instruction during his course of training.

I think I should add a word of thanks for the spontaneous assistance given—and which is still being given—by the people of the area from the time it was learned that the patrol was missing, and for the unlimited co-operation afforded by the township police, the Sutton police, the Ontario provincial police, the Ontario department of lands and forests, and the R.C.A.F. search and rescue service. I should also like to mention the offer of the four men who had earlier that evening, June 7, been arrested by Corporal Smart and his men. These four men, when they learned of the situation on Sunday morning, as they know the area well, begged to be released so they could take part in the search. Arrangements to this end were made and their offer was gratefully accepted.

Hon. members will, I know, wish to join me in expressing to the next of kin and families of the deceased men the heartfelt sympathy of this house in the loss they have sustained through the tragic death of their loved ones in the course of the discharge of their duty.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

H.M.C.S. "CORNWALLIS"—INQUIRY AS TO TAXATION OF RESIDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence or to the Minister of Justice. I do not know exactly to whom my question should be directed, but I sent notice this morning of my intention to ask it.

On June 1 the county of Annapolis, Nova Scotia, issued tax bills for poll and property tax against all resident members of the H.M.C.S. Cornwallis naval base, threatening collection, with all the rigours of the law, if not paid by July 1.

The question is, has the county of Annapolis the right to impose such a tax on members of a crew temporarily stationed in the port?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of his question. No provincial, municipal or county property taxes can be collected on property of the crown in the right of Canada. In so far as poll taxes are concerned, members of the service resident in a given area are subject to this tax if such a tax is approved by the province. Any such individual, however, has a right to appeal to the qualified courts if he considers himself not to be a resident and therefore not subject to this tax.

NORAD—STATEMENT AS TO U.S. LAW RESPECTING COMMAND OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked a question regarding the authority and control over United States aircraft which might be exercised by the deputy commander of NORAD. I have been in contact by telephone today with General Partridge, and I can inform the house that United States authorities have concurred in the interim arrangements for the appointment of Air Marshal Slemon as a deputy commander of NORAD, and no limitations or restrictions of any nature have been placed on the exercise of operational control by Air Marshal Slemon in the absence of General Partridge. Therefore Air Marshal Slemon exercises the same operational control over the forces assigned to NORAD as that of General Partridge.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO SHARING OF TAX REVENUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister whether he has received any communication from the premier of Saskatchewan since March 31 regarding the federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements and, if there is any such correspondence, if it could be tabled?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the question and if there is correspondence it will be tabled.

[Mr. Caron.]

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT OF FIRST INSTALMENT TO PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet may I ask the Minister of Finance if he is now in a position to answer the question which I interrupted him to ask when he was speaking the other day, about the first instalment under the tax-sharing arrangements paid at the end of the month of April to the various provinces, which information he said he would be willing to give.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have the information asked for by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a moment ago. The payments made to the provinces pursuant to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act for April and May are as follows: Newfoundland, $2,027,000; Prince Edward Island, $554,000; Nova Scotia, $2,936,000; New Brunswick, $2,484,000; Quebec, $4,102,000; Ontario, $7,655,000; Manitoba, $2,831,000; Saskatchewan, $2,894,000; Alberta, $3,818,000; British Columbia, $5,267,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I did not quite catch what these figures were for.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For each month; these amounts were paid for the month of April and the same amounts were paid for the month of May.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did they include payments under the Atlantic provinces grants or merely the tax-sharing?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My assumption is that they are included. I thought the question of my hon. friend, which this table was designed to answer, was broad enough to include that but I will check on that point.

AIR TRANSPORT

T.C.A.—STATEMENT ON APPLICATION FOR FIFTH FREEDOM RIGHTS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Laurier asked if an application had been made for fifth freedom rights on behalf of Trans-Canada Air Lines at United States airports, and whether renegotiation of the air agreement between Canada and the United States is contemplated this year.

As to the first part of the question, I am advised that no application has been made for fifth freedom rights by Trans-Canada Air Lines at United States airports.

In regard to the latter part, there have been informal discussions between Canadian and United States government representatives but these discussions have not yet led to any final agreement.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED POSSIBILITY OF IMPROVED SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena made the following inquiry on the orders of the day:

Has the Department of Transport received a report from Canadian Pacific Steamships relative to the operation of steamships between the mainland of British Columbia and Vancouver island to the effect that a more efficient and faster service between the two points is possible? If so, what plan does the department have for the institution of such a service?

In reply I may say I am advised that no such report has been received in the department.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—STATEMENT ON OPERATION OF SHIPS OFF NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, may I answer the question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, regarding the operations of Russian trawlers on or near the Grand Banks of Newfoundland. No reports have been received by the Canadian maritime commander, Atlantic, which would indicate that Russian trawlers operating in the Grand Banks area are not observing the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea.

ICELAND—STATEMENT ON EXTENSION OF FISHING LIMITS FOR FOREIGN TRAWLERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester addressed this question to me:

In view of the recent threat by the Danish islands in the north Atlantic to follow the example of Iceland and extend their fishing limits to 12 miles, can the minister advise the house if the Canadian government recognizes the extension of the fishing limits to a 12-mile width of waters off their coasts, as announced by the government of Iceland?

Since this question, Mr. Speaker, is predicated on the assumption that Iceland has now formally extended its fishing limits to 12 miles, I must point out that there has been no extension by the Icelandic government of its fisheries limits. The only definite announcement that has been made in this respect by the Icelandic government is that it has expressed its intention to establish such a zone on September 1, so I cannot answer the hon. member's hypothetical question.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs answer the second question which I addressed to him yesterday, and which is recorded on page 1037 of Hansard? It is based on a statement made in Halifax on Sunday last and reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of Monday, June 9, to the effect that Canada would try to obtain a compromise arrangement concerning the 12-mile fishing limit at the next conference on the law of the sea?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Since this question is apparently based on an interview with me perhaps I should answer it. It is evident from the news story that a misconstruction was inadvertently put on a reply which I made to a question.

The misunderstanding probably arose from the fact that I was asked if, in my opinion, any conference on the law of the sea in the near future might have a hope of reaching an agreement. I expressed the belief that there was a wide divergence of opinion and considerable conflict of interest on this question, and that agreement could only be reached as a result of compromise. I made no statement which was intended to indicate in any way what Canada's position would be or what Canada might attempt to obtain at any future conference on the law of the sea.

HARBOURS

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can ask the Minister of Public Works if it would be possible for him to table the correspondence he has had with Sir Brian Dunfield, Harvey and Company, and with certain other persons in St. John's regarding the harbour development, so that it would be available to hon. members when his estimates are next before the house?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think it will be possible to table the correspondence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Minister of Justice inform the house whether or not a reported statement made by the attorney general of Ontario is correct that eight new judicial appointments will be made in the province of Ontario? If that statement is correct, can the minister indicate whether they are all to be county court appointments or whether some of them will be appointments to the supreme court of Ontario?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): It is my recollection that at its last session the Ontario legislature passed legislation authorizing the appointment of two additional judges to the trial division of the supreme court of Ontario, and six additional county court judges.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if it is the intention of the federal government to comply with that legislation, and if so will necessary legislation be introduced this session?

Mr. Fulton: It is hoped that it will be possible to deal with that at this session, yes.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED ARREST OF MAN ON TICKET OF LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I should like to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East on June 10. He asked whether my attention had been drawn to a news report that a person convicted as an habitual criminal, and released on ticket of leave, was arrested by the R.C.M.P. under instructions from the remission service, without any charge being laid or opportunity given to that person to learn of the charge or to present a defence.

The hon. member then asked:

Will the minister advise the house if the law of Canada or the administration of the justice department permits a person to be found guilty and reimprisoned without knowledge of the charge or an opportunity to present a defence?

In answer I would say that the Ticket of Leave Act authorizes the governor general, on the advice of the appropriate minister of the crown, to grant to any person under sentence of imprisonment a licence to be at large in Canada during such portion of his term of imprisonment and upon such conditions in all respects as to the governor general may seem fit. The governor general is authorized also from time to time to revoke any licence so granted.

Where an inmate is released on licence under the Ticket of Leave Act he is expected to comply with the conditions of his licence and to live a law-abiding life. The authority to revoke a licence is exercised where the remission service has reason to believe that a licensee is not complying with the conditions of his licence or is not leading a law-abiding life. This is essential for the protection of the public.

Where a licence is revoked no new charge is laid against the licensee, nor is he sentenced to any new term of imprisonment. The warrant that is issued for his apprehension requires him to be brought before a magistrate and requires the magistrate to commit him to the institution from which he was released on licence, there to continue to serve the balance of the sentence that he was serving when he was released on licence.

TRANSPORT

STATEMENT ON ALLEGED USE OF FOREIGN PILOTS WITHOUT CLEARING CUSTOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he has an answer to the question I addressed to him the other day concerning the practice of customs officials with regard to the pilots of foreign ships on the great lakes.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have not an answer prepared in that regard, but in general the practice of the department, in furtherance of the legislation made in that behalf, has permitted pilots, as well as shipping masters operating on the great lakes, to leave their ships from time to time, regardless of the hour of the day or night at which the ship might be calling at the port.

The reason for this is obvious. Very often the ships do call at a time when customs officers are not available and this permission, this right if you like to call it that, has been accorded to pilotage officers for many many years. It is a right to which is attached very substantial penalties if any violation of the law occurs. The honour system is applied, to some extent, with respect to pilots, but if the honour system should be violated in any way there are substantial pecuniary penalties imposed on the pilots and they also forfeit their licences.

From time to time this may cause some difficulties, in circumstances such as those mentioned by the hon. member, when there is some conflict between groups in this particular area. Certainly if the law is to be applied, it has to be applied to all pilots. I would not think it would be a very happy situation if the law were changed so as to require pilots to only come ashore at times when customs officers were available. This would be a distinct departure from the practice which has prevailed throughout the years, and one which I doubt would be welcomed by the hon. member or by the great number of men who would be affected.

The department is watching the situation carefully. If any reason occurs for a change —and it might—then a change will be brought in by means of appropriate regulations or by legislation. Of course it will have to be applied to all pilots, from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast, and not just to those in any one area.

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TAXATION OF WHARVES AND BOAT HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I apologize for not giving him notice, but it has just come to mind. In view of the urgent importance of this matter to some of my constituents, could the minister inform me when he will be able to give me an answer to the question I asked with respect to provincial taxation on wharves and boat houses, which was asked on May 22?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I thought I might be able to give a reply right now. I hope to be able to do so tomorrow when I have relocated my notes.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED DENIAL OF ENTRY TO CANADA OF DUTCH FAMILY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration now in a position to answer the question I asked some time ago about the Dutch family in Halifax?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am afraid not satisfactorily. We have been trying without success to locate the son who is in Vancouver somewhere. Unfortunately he has moved about three times and left no forwarding address at any time. Although we have been trying hard we have not located him as yet.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING REDUCTIONS IN RAIL SERVICE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-11, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that the board of transport commissioners may, at the request of the interested municipality or municipalities, deal with any proposed reduction of service by any of the railways. My bringing this bill before the house was occasioned by recent action of the Canadian Pacific Railway in my constituency and in southeastern British Columbia generally. Before this debate is over I trust that I will be receiving the strong support of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. McFarlane) and the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary (Mr. Pugh) because I have been informed that a good number of their constituents are also greatly interested in this question.

The action which caused the concern in our district and which has resulted in my introducing this bill is first, the reduction of the service on the Kettle valley railroad by the Canadian Pacific Railway from a standard train service to the present Budd car service; and second, the curtailment to twice weekly of the service between Nelson and Penticton. That is the basis of the discontent that exists in the area at the present time.

So far as my constituency is concerned there is a unanimous protest against this action of the company. It includes members of all parties. That is why I rise to speak with such high hopes and great anticipation with respect to the final disposition of this bill. This afternoon I can truthfully say that I am speaking for thousands of persons who are members of all parties in my constituency and a good many others in the adjoining constituencies. These protests have been evidenced by meetings of chambers of commerce, trade unions, farmers' institutes and municipal councils to deal particularly with the reduction of service that I am going to mention this afternoon.

To indicate the type of protest that is being made at this time as far as chambers of commerce are concerned, here is a letter from Trail addressed to the vice president of the C.P.R. at Vancouver:

Dear Sir:

This committee of the Trail chamber of commerce wishes to express its protest against the recent curtailment of passenger train services to twice weekly between Nelson and Penticton. It is hoped that this is a temporary measure of short duration and that the regular services will be put into effect at an early date.

May we have your assurance on this matter.

Yours very truly,

A. S. Mawdsley,
Chairman,
Transportation, mail and freight committee,
Trail chamber of commerce.

Then I read another letter indicating the discontent of the Nelson chamber of commerce. It is addressed to Mr. N. R. Crump, president, Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal, Quebec, and reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

The people of Nelson and district are far from satisfied with the passenger service of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The Nelson chamber of commerce are continually receiving complaints about the inadequate train service of twice weekly and the lack of service on this run.

At our executive meeting held recently it was unanimously agreed that this chamber submit to you a request for resumption of daily service from Nelson to Vancouver and that something be done to provide for serving meals and also some sleeping accommodation.

We would very much appreciate an early reply regarding this matter.

Respectfully yours,

(Mrs.) E. Christiansen,
Secretary.

Then in addition to chambers of commerce the trade unions unitedly have opposed this reduction of service, as have farmers' institutes, hospitals and other organizations. I have received letters from a large number of people who are greatly concerned about this situation. To indicate the attitude of the hospitals I will quote one paragraph from a letter I received from Mr. E. M. Stiles, chairman of the board of Kootenay lake general hospital in Nelson. It is addressed to the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, Ottawa, Ontario and reads in part as follows:

Gentlemen:

At the last meeting of the board of directors of the Kootenay lake general hospital, the matter of the passenger train service here was of concern to members, and a resolution was unanimously passed protesting the inadequacy of the present train service, and asking that the board of transport commissioners be notified of this protest, and informed that the lack of service is an obstacle in the way of good patient care.

That same protest is supported by all the hospitals in the district, which find it extremely difficult during winter conditions to deal with patients who require transport to the coast and things of that sort. When the minister was in my district during the election and, I think it is safe to say, was doing his best to terminate my public life, he was met by a large delegation of businessmen in Nelson including representatives of the chambers of commerce, and also a representative delegation of trade unionists, and a brief was presented to the minister expressing the point of view of the persons who were making these representations. Although it is a lengthy brief, Mr. Speaker, I think I cannot do better than put this brief on the record because it very well covers the whole situation.

I might say that this brief is the work of two or three members of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers in Trail who took the time really to probe into the question and to compile or assemble these facts for presentation to the minister. It was generally recognized throughout the district, after its publication in the local press, as being the best of the representations that were made on the question. These men who had drawn up this brief as the result of a considerable amount of work received congratulations from people all over the district. When people approach a problem in a constructive way and do not just sit back and howl but do something to present a case; when they use their time and their ability to present a certain situation to the minister, as these representatives did for the district as a whole, I think their efforts should be commended.

While the brief is long I am going to put it on the record, because I think in that way I can best bring to the attention of the house and the minister and the many other people who read Hansard—and there are a great many people who read Hansard in my district —what has been done, and in that way they will have a permanent record of the efforts of these people and of the situation complained of at the present time. These representations were made to the minister, as I said before, during his brief visit to my district when he was personally concerned about my return to this house. Anyway, this is the brief.

The paper I am reading from is the Trail Daily Times, which is a Conservative paper interested in this question as are all the other papers in the district, and is owned by a very close relative of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). It states as follows:

Local 480 Presents Brief to Hees

Local 480 of the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers today presented a brief to transport minister George Hees at Nelson calling for the resumption of daily service on the Kettle valley line between Penticton and Nelson.

The brief, presented by local 480 president Al King of Trail, also protested the Canadian Pacific Railway Company being given any further franchises, such as air franchises, ". . . when they apparently wished to curtail services to the public in areas where they hold an exclusive railway franchise, as they do in the Kootenays."

The text of the brief follows:

"Trail and district smelter workers union, local 480, of the autonomous mine mill and smelter workers union in Canada welcomes this opportunity of placing before you in your capacity as Minister of Transport some of the grievous problems that have been and are afflicting this general area of east and west Kootenays in the province of British Columbia, concerning the curtailment of railway services."

I might explain at that point that this brief received unanimous endorsation at a conference in Nelson of representatives of the trade unions in Kootenay east and west just prior to my leaving for Ottawa.

"We have appealed to the provincial government, and Mr. Wicks, who serves in the dual capacity of minister of labour and railways, has advised us to place the matter before the federal authorities. This we suspect as being more in the spirit of buck-passing than in any genuine interest of helping resolve our problems.

As is generally well known throughout the entire world, the east and west Kootenay, whilst not too heavily populated, is rich and valuable in readily available natural resources. By comparison with the hundreds of workmen who produce the primary and raw materials from this rich area, thousands of jobs are made possible in the manufacturing and processing industries of the North American continent originating from rich resources of the bountiful Kootenays.

One company alone, namely the C.M. and S., which is the major base metal producer of the area in the year 1956 handled a total of 2½ million tons of freight, incoming and outgoing, from its Trail plants. The Sullivan mine at Kimberley, the Bluebell mine at Riondel, and the H.B. mine at Salmo also would make substantial additions to that figure. Many other producing mining companies operate in the Kootenays as well.

Tons of Material

Over the rail lines into and out of the Kootenays flow millions of tons of ores, concentrates, base metals and precious metals, as well as fertilizers, both in solid and liquid forms, to say nothing of the vast supplies of machinery and equipment necessary to supply this flourishing industry.

The west Kootenay is also the centre of a rich and substantial logging, lumber and forest products industry. One of the largest match companies in the world, the Eddy match company, have just recently acquired holdings in the area, which speaks well of the Kootenays as a producer of valuable wood and forest products.

Certainly no one can deny that in the 50 or 60 years since the C.P.R. rail through the Kootenays was established, the steady growing revenue through the increased productivity of the whole area has been a source of considerable satisfaction to the one Canadian railway company that holds the trans-Canada rail monopoly in this area.

C.P.R. Service

Accompanying the general increase over the years in the volume of freight, it is safe to say that there has been a considerable reduction in passenger service, and, whilst to some extent the general trend of public travel has been to individual vehicular traffic, this union will always insist, and does so now, that adequate rail service should be provided at all times."

I might say that in this respect the union is supported by all people and all organizations in the district I have the honour to represent.

"This is probably more necessary during the winter months when mountain conditions force many people to rely on the railway for transportation. It is many years now since rail passenger service was completely discontinued into sideline points such as Rossland, Trail, Slocan valley, etc. Main line passenger service, however, is an entirely different matter.

In November of 1957, and apparently with the blessing of the ministry of transport, the C.P.R. summarily removed sleeping and dining car facilities for travel to and from the Kootenay area. We claim this is a rank injustice and that the Minister of Transport should require them to re-establish the former service. We do so for the following reasons:"

When that was written the union overestimated the minister's powers according to the law, and has since found the matter was not quite as they thought at that time.

Considerable numbers of people, both adults and children, are forced to travel to the larger centres, Calgary or Vancouver, for specialized medical and surgical treatment. To these people, railway facilities present the only opportunity for travel as bed patients on a daily seven days per week basis, air line travel being not only uncertain, but in some cases not suitable for an ailing person. All other possibilities such as road travel are too severe a hardship for such unfortunates.

In this respect I might say that during last winter I believe planes where unable to land in my constituency for a period of not less than 80 days.

"Need Man Here

The workmen's compensation board of B.C., despite this union's efforts to have an examining office stationed in the interior, still requires all those in need of special examination or treatment among their claimants to travel to Vancouver.

A similar situation confronts the disabled veteran who is obliged to enter the Shaughnessy military hospital at Vancouver and who heretofore could also travel in the relative comfort which the C.P.R. alone has been, and is, in a position to provide. We urge you, sir, to make this a responsibility of this company and to order the immediate resumption of sleeper and dining car service."

In that respect I would mention that I know of one or two cases of veterans who were seriously ill and whose transportation to the coast had to be delayed because it was not possible to use this service.

"In January of this year, ostensibly to protect the train crews and the public from alleged Doukhobor bombings, a further reduction in service was brought about when the daily passenger run was reduced to two days per week, each way. Although this union is as concerned with the safety of the railroad workers and the general public as any other group, we are not convinced that this severe cut in service is warranted."

I might mention that the railroad workers wholeheartedly endorsed this brief and its presentation to the minister.

"Possibly because of an incident of some years ago when an employee or agent of the railway company was implicated in a terrorist act, many people suspect that all of the uproar and suspicion attached to the Sons of Freedom sect of the Doukhobors is mere subterfuge and that they are being used as a convenient excuse that at this time suits the economic outlook of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In this connection, it is worth observation that there has been no reduction in the pay load traffic and the question is naturally asked—is the C.P.R.'s concern for its passenger run crews genuine when they appear to ignore the safety of the personnel on the freight runs?

Instituted Embargo

We have been informed by various farmers and poultrymen in the west Kootenay area that the railway has instituted virtual embargoes on the shipments of livestock and poultry. Indeed one of our members, a pigeon fancier, has protested to this union that he and his group can no longer transport their racing birds by rail and that the only alternative, truck travel, is unsuitable to their needs. Surely this is going too far when groups such as this are so sorely inconvenienced by a whim of the C.P.R.".

I might say in this connection—

An hon. Member: From what are you reading?

Mr. Herridge: I explained at the start that I was reading from the Trail Daily Times, which is a Conservative paper owned by a very close relative of the Minister of Public Works. I might mention on this last point that there has been, I think, some remedy with respect to the matters complained of by the pigeon fanciers' association and the canary breeders' association, which are the only ones in my district who had redress for their grievances.

"Here again this union maintains that the needs of the Kootenays are being entirely ignored by the C.P.R.'s apparent refusal to give service for which their franchise was granted to them to the exclusion of all others and that they are not living up to their commitments to this community and therefore the country as a whole.

We urge you, Mr. Minister, to use your power in such a way as to redress all these grievances and force the Canadian Pacific Railway to provide these necessary daily services, upon which the people of the whole southern interior of B.C. depend.

Unemployment

As a union we cannot ignore the fact that these moves aggravate the mounting unemployment problem in Canada and this area in particular. We maintain that from this viewpoint alone, the Canadian Pacific Railway has a responsibility in the general economic welfare, and that by maintenance of adequate service between fifty and one hundred workmen would again be gainfully employed.

Canadian Pacific Airlines

Your government recently saw fit to bring to an end the sole right of the Trans-Canada Air Lines to provide east and west air travel, which the Canadian Pacific Company, among others, after pressing for many years, hailed as a proper move in the so-called free enterprise of our nation. We cannot refrain from commenting here that in areas such as the Kootenays, where the Canadian Pacific Railway is apparently engrossed, apart from all considerations of the public welfare in cutting service, their entry into the trans-Canada air travel field is unearned.

We feel it only fair to say that as a union we oppose this company being given further franchises when they apparently wish to curtail necessary services to the public in areas where they hold an exclusive railway franchise, as they do in the Kootenays.

As you know, Mr. Minister, 1958 is a proud year in the history of the province of British Columbia. We are celebrating our 100th birthday—100 years of dynamic progress in productive and cultural contributions to the welfare of our nation, and our people.

It is somewhat ironic that precisely at this moment the C.P.R. seeks to turn the clock back instead of forward. Instead of looking forward to improvements in rail travel, in step with our general progress, the C.P.R. blithely institutes retrograde actions, such as they have instituted in these recent months.

Throughout the whole of 1958, it is anticipated there will be thousands upon thousands of visitors to every part of the province where the great centennial events are being programmed. We ask you sir what their estimation of B.C. as a thriving province, would be when our visitors are forced to endure rail travel of the nature that is presently available to them through the courtesy of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who advertise themselves throughout the world as the world's largest and most progressive travel organization.

On behalf of our union, and indeed the union men and general public of this province, we urge you to use your power to ensure that these conditions be rectified, and soon.

Mr. Speaker, I have read at considerable length from this brief because it deals with the question very thoroughly. As I said earlier, it has attracted much favourable comment throughout the district and of course has received very large support.

When the brief had been presented to him, and when representations regarding it had been made—and I am informed that the minister appeared to the delegation to be a very likeable person,—he replied to the delegation with these words: "I have no power to tell the Canadian Pacific Railway what to do". I understand that according to the law as it stands at the present time that is so. That was when the minister agreed to talk to Mr. Crump of the C.P.R.

A long time has passed since the hon. minister had this opportunity to talk to Mr. Crump. I am sure that after he said he would discuss this matter with Mr. Crump and the members of the transport commission he did do so, but the same situation exists. There has been no improvement whatever. We still have to put up with this bi-weekly service between Penticton and Nelson, and with the Budd car.

It is admitted that the Budd car service is somewhat more rapid; it is a very nice day coach, one might say. But the service is not sufficient, and the Budd car does not provide sufficient conveniences for older people, people with children, people who are ill and others who for various reasons cannot easily sit up in a day coach on the journey between Vancouver and Lethbridge, for example.

As far as food is concerned, one has to rely upon a boy who comes along periodically.

Sometimes he brings with him cups of coffee which he takes on at the stations together with some sandwiches which, on occasions, can be very dry indeed. I have travelled when there have been no coffee and no sandwiches; the rations have been entirely depleted because of the number of people travelling.

The C.P.R. will argue that the traffic does not warrant a better service, but what the C.P.R. is doing is actually reducing the traffic by making the service most unpopular. Everyone who can do so is travelling by some other means.

However, we in the Kootenays do not wish to be unfair. No one can expect companies to do the impossible, but this happens to be a very profitable section of the railway as a result of the hauling of ores from Kimberley and other mines to Trail and then the hauling of manufactured products from Trail to the coast and to other points in Canada. It is a profitable section of the road, and we feel that an area producing such a great amount of goods and such revenue for the C.P.R. should not be deprived of greatly needed rail facilities.

I am not going to elaborate at much greater length because I think the brief explains the situation quite well, but I do want to indicate that all this discontent is the cause of my having been asked to introduce this amendment to the Railway Act in order to give the board of transport commissioners the power to provide to municipalities concerned and affected by reductions of service such as I have described the opportunity to make representations to the board, and making certain that no company can reduce services without first hearing representations from the municipalities concerned.

Under the law as it now stands the railway companies are required to make application for a hearing only when they are going to abandon a service. They can reduce the service without making any application to the board of transport commissioners. This bill makes it necessary for them to make an application to the board of transport commissioners before being empowered to reduce a service, and makes provision that the board of transport commissioners should hear representations from the municipalities concerned in the area where the reduction of services is proposed.

I am sure the minister has a good picture of the situation with which I have been dealing, and I trust he will support this amendment to the Railway Act. It would mean a great deal not only to the people who are presently concerned in southeastern British Columbia, but to people in other parts of Canada.

I trust hon. members in this house generally will also support this bill as being to the general advantage of the people of Canada. While the Kootenay area suffers at the present time because of the lack of power vested in the board of transport commissioners, a good many Canadians in other parts of the country have suffered in the past because of the lack of these powers. Let us protect the rights of the people in the future by adopting this modest and, I think, very fair amendment to the Railway Act.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has been very interested, as I have been, in listening to the comprehensive outline of this situation given by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

As he has said, when I was in his riding in the course of the past election campaign I met with several delegations who put to me very strongly their objections to the curtailment of the Canadian Pacific Railway service in that area. I was very interested in what they had to say and, as the hon. member has stated, I promised I would bring their point of view personally to the attention of the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. Crump.

When I got back to eastern Canada I did so in some detail, and spent some time talking the matter over with Mr. Crump. He told me in some detail also why the Canadian Pacific had found it necessary to adopt the course it did in curtailing these services. This is a highly important matter, particularly to the people in the district, and because of its importance I have also discussed the matter at quite some length with the board of transport commissioners.

Before dealing with the hon. member's bill I would like to deal with the question of the curtailed Canadian Pacific Railway service in the district. I believe I can do that most quickly and effectively by reading a letter written on June 9 by Mr. A. LeSage, assistant director of operation, of the operating department of the board of transport commissioners, addressed to Mr. F. T. Collins, special assistant and secretary to the minister, Department of Transport, Ottawa, Ontario. The letter is as follows:

Dear Sir:

Reference to your request for some general information on the train service Vancouver-Penticton-Nelson-Lethbridge, Canadian Pacific Railway.

The route travelled by these trains, is known as "Kettle Valley-Crowsnest route". It leaves the main line at Katz, British Columbia, 84 miles east of Vancouver and follows the Coquihalla pass in a southeasterly direction to Penticton and then easterly close to the American border to Nelson, B.C.; continues in a northeasterly direction to Lethbridge, Alberta (Calgary connection) and thence easterly to Medicine Hat where connection is made with the C.P.R. main line.

Through the years, a daily passenger train has been operated in both directions between Vancouver and Medicine Hat over this route with dining, sleeping car, express and mail service included.

The advent of improved highways brought through bus service and encouraged privately-owned automobile travel. Air service was introduced between Vancouver and Cranbrook with stops at Penticton and Castlegar. The railway in an effort to meet the growing competition and develop new business, experimented with rearranged train schedules and local trains to and from the larger centres were added. However, the results obtained did not prove sufficiently productive to justify the heavy expenditure and the local trains were removed.

The construction of the Hope-Princeton highway opened November 1, 1949, effected an approximate 145 road mileage reduction between Vancouver and Penticton and made all of the Kootenay area readily accessible to Vancouver. Fast and frequent service over this new highway made serious inroads on rail traffic and the railways were again forced to seek ways and means to reduce operating deficits.

A study of the economics of the service was undertaken by the company's department of research, as a result of which it was decided to replace the convention equipment (handled by steam powered trains) with rail diesel equipment as soon as the latter could be acquired from the manufacturers.

It was felt that this proposal would make possible a reduction of the running time between Medicine Hat and Vancouver by several hours and provide connection at Medicine Hat, Alberta, with the fast main line service recently inaugurated by the Canadian. This new schedule require a night operation between Penticton and Nelson and removal of sleeping car, dining car, express and mail services. Express service would be provided by highway trucks. Coincidental with this change, steam operated trains between Medicine Hat and Lethbridge would be withdrawn and the rail diesel equipment operated in this area on essentially the same schedule as the trains to be withdrawn.

Advice of the company's intention to make the above change, was given to this department of the board in June, 1957, and confirmed in August of that year, along with advice that the change would be made effective on October 27, 1957. Advice to the public, in accordance with the board's requirements, was to be given at least 20 days prior to the change.

In anticipation of public disapproval of the company's proposal, the board's field inspector was directed on August 22, 1957, to travel on the trains then in operation and report on the traffic handled and express his views on the public reaction to the company's proposal, so that the board would be in a position to assess the situation and deal with complaints if any, when received. A check was also made of the patronage attracted to the new service immediately following its introduction on October 27.

The changeover was effective October 27, without public disapproval. The first complaint to reach the board was on November 15, 1957 and dealt with the lack of express service for the carriage of livestock on the company's express trucks. This and other complaints of a similar nature were received and dealt with and a solution satisfactory to the shippers arranged. The next complaint which was of a general nature, was received from Mr. Herridge, M.P. on January 30 and reply provided on February 14.

Copies of the letters above referred to are attached. I continue:

Incidentally, it might be of interest to note here that Mr. Herridge, in a telephone conversation with the writer early in January, commented favourably on the improved through service provided by the company to this area, after introduction of the rail diesel service, which provided connection at Medicine Hat with the "Canadian".

On January 15, 1958, a passenger train was derailed as a result of the track being bombed out near Fife, B.C. (76.9 miles west of Nelson, B.C.). This incident combined with other bombings and the use of contact mines on the company's trackage in the Kootenay area, moved the attorney general of the province of British Columbia, after consultation with company and railway labour organization officers, to recommend that the company suspend all night rail operation through the area between Nelson and Penticton.

As a result, arrangements were made to operate during daylight hours when regular maintenance of way forces were available to provide track patrols and since these employees work a five-day week, it resulted in a Monday to Friday passenger train operation between Nelson and Penticton on the following schedule:

Lv. Nelson	7.30 a.m.
Monday & Thursday
Ar. Penticton	5.00 p.m.
Lv. Penticton	7.30 a.m.
Tuesday & Friday
Ar. Nelson	4.45 p.m.

The above service was made effective at 12.01 a.m. February 5, 1958.

Effective with change of time April 27, 1958, the above schedules were changed as follows and are still in effect:

Lv. Nelson	7.00 a.m.
Monday & Thursday
Ar. Penticton	3.20 p.m.
Lv. Penticton	8.00 a.m.
Ar. Nelson	4.15 p.m.

It will be noted that prior to this change, no complaints reached the board other than those above mentioned in respect of handling express traffic. However, immediately the above change was placed in effect, complaints were received and the board's district inspector was instructed to visit the area, meet all interested parties at prearranged places, on certain dates and times and report on the situation. The inspector's report was placed before the board on March 21, last.

The board's investigation disclosed that since the company was obliged to operate through the trouble area during daylight hours, the through connection between Medicine Hat and Vancouver would have to be broken at Nelson and Penticton. It was further evident that any increase in this service would also have to be an interrupted one, thus discouraging public patronage. It was also hoped that this condition would be of a temporary nature, since we were advised that the attorney general of British Columbia was continuing a thorough investigation and it was sincerely hoped that a solution would be reached before long.

1. The service inaugurated on October 27, 1957, appeared to be working out satisfactorily.
2. The action of the lawless element prohibited the company from using its property for the purpose for which it was constructed.

3. The present service is unsatisfactory because—

To the company:

(a) It is unable to get full utilization of the costly equipment recently purchased to serve this area.
(c) Railway operation, both passenger and freight is unsatisfactory and costly.

To the public:

(a) The cities of Nelson and Trail are inconvenienced because through freight and passenger service to Vancouver is disrupted.
(b) Vancouver is the natural market and social and cultural centre for these cities.

Solution of the problem would appear to be dependent upon the success of the province of British Columbia in making this territory safe for continuous rail operation.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) A. LeSage,
Assistant Director of Operation.

I would like to deal briefly with the bill itself, Mr. Speaker. While I appreciate the concern of hon. members when railway companies find it necessary to reduce train service, I must at once say that I do not see how this amendment will give any more protection to the public than already exists.

The explanatory note to the bill states that the purpose of the amendment is to provide that the board of transport commissioners may, at the request of an interested municipality, deal with a reduction or proposed reduction of train service.

I have discussed the amendment with the board and its opinion is that the Railway Act already gives the board jurisdiction to prevent unwarranted reduction of train service and to entertain applications and complaints of municipalities and other interested parties regarding the adequacy of existing train service and any changes that may be proposed. In a word, the board considers that the amendment would not give to it powers that it does not now hold.

In support of this position I would point out that section 315 of the Railway Act requires railway companies to receive, carry and deliver traffic and to furnish adequate and suitable accommodation for the carrying of traffic. By virtue of sections 33, 36, 315 and other provisions of the Railway Act the board also has jurisdiction to make orders and regulations respecting train service; to require railway companies to furnish adequate and suitable train service and to prohibit them from reducing service below that standard.

I believe it is well known to hon. members that the board is continually exercising the powers it has in connection with reduction of passenger train services. I have before me a copy of the board's circular No. 275, dated June 16, 1953, which directs that 20 days prior to a reduction or other change in passenger service, railway companies subject to its jurisdiction shall post at ticket offices and stations a notice of such change, and as well shall, concurrently with the posting of the notice, place in the hands of agents for the information of the public a circular giving an outline of the change. It is also required that a copy of the circular shall be forwarded to the board. I have this circular No. 275 and I should like to read its contents to the house:

File 24942—Reduction of Passenger Train Services

In all cases of reduction in passenger train services and to provide sufficient time for investigation and consideration of submissions of all parties, the board directs as follows:

That all railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of the board, in addition to the announcements and the advertising now done by the railway companies, shall post at all ticket offices and stations, 20 days prior to any reduction or other change in passenger train service, a notice reading:

"Change of time will be made . . . For particulars apply to ticket agent."

Co-incident with the posting of this notice a circular giving an outline of the change shall be placed in the hands of agents for the information of the public and a copy shall be forwarded to the director of operation of the board in Ottawa.

Circular No. 139 dated January 13, 1915, and circular No. 208 dated December 3, 1925, are hereby rescinded.

By order of the board,
C. W. RUMP
Acting Secretary,
Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada

I want to emphasize that in all cases where the board is notified of a change in service and complaints are received the whole situation is thoroughly reviewed and indeed it is not unusual for the board to direct the railway to defer the proposed reduction pending investigation. For instance, 44 applications dealing with major reductions or discontinuance of passenger and mixed train service were dealt with during the year 1957. These applications were investigated on the ground by district inspectors of the branch, accompanied by headquarters officers in some instances and after consultation with the parties affected, reports and recommendations were submitted to the board. Several complaints from the public pertaining to inadequacy of train service were also dealt with in a similar manner.

I think it will be clear to the house from what I have said that the board does have the right to deal with the reduction of train service and that it does exercise its powers. I can assure the house that all the factors involved are carefully considered by the board and that the public interest is of paramount concern to the board in reaching a conclusion. In the circumstances I must advise the house that the government is opposed to the amendment.

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the second reading of this bill. I appreciate the feelings of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) in moving it. He is not alone in his problem. I understand that the line he has been referring to is a Canadian Pacific line. Up in our district we are served mostly by the Canadian National. I agree with all the remarks made by the minister. I have found out that the board of transport commissioners did for us up in Bruce just what the hon. member for Kootenay West is now asking to have done by this amendment to the act.

If there were a clause in the amendment along the lines that the board of transport commissioners should look into their findings a little more closely in connection with giving service to different communities I would be all for it. In our district we have found that after a railroad has lost the business they attempt to cut off the service. I am not finding fault with the officials of the railroad; they are there to do a job. The only thing I am finding fault with is the findings of the board of transport commissioners.

In our case we had a paying line at a time when the railways in Canada were not paying their way. Through mismanagement of some sort the railways lost their business to other types of transportation and now they have decided to curtail our services. I would say that such curtailment is just another move toward centralization which has been going on for the last 22 years as far as any government leadership is concerned. The height of irony is the fact that we are losing our service; after having our lines pay their way for a great number of years we are to be called on to contribute our share of the subsidy to the Canadian National Railways. If that is not adding insult to injury I do not know what it is. I agree with the minister's remarks that this amendment would not help the act at all.

I should like to put on the record my view that the board of transport commissioners are not exercising the judgment that should be used in dealing with this problem. I have no further remarks to make except to say that I cannot see any merit in the amendment.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, it is so many years since the constituency of Athabasca has been represented in this house in any manner which has been satisfactory to the people that I think I had better tell you where Athabasca is.

Mr. Pickersgill: Shame.

Mr. Winch: How about discussing the bill before us?

Mr. Bigg: We will get to that. Athabasca is situated in the northeast corner of Alberta and covers 60,000 square miles. This area is poorly serviced at the moment by any form of transportation. We, in Athabasca, feel that transportation is of vital importance because this area forms the gateway to the north. Many pioneers have gone into this vast territory on their own and they feel that Canada, now that she has vast resources at her disposal, is in a position to give considerable support to the development of the north country. Many of these people have taken the initiative and have given their whole lives to the development of this country. Now, they look to us to give them support.

One of the most important means of transportation is, of course, the railway. Arguments have been presented to the effect that the railways have outlived their usefulness. Consideration is being given to the closing of many branch lines, while many others will have their service curtailed. Let us not be hasty about this. The whole economic situation in Canada is changing rapidly. We do not intend to spend money like drunken sailors, but we must plan our transportation services. The question here is, first of all, whether or not railroads should be built into that part of the country. We in Athabasca believe that rail lines should be built in there, and particularly from the McMurray district northwards. This railway would serve not only the known resources in there, but would be available for future development.

So far as the servicing of the industries now in the north are concerned, we have a very active railway to Fort McMurray, at least to Waterways, which is the Fort McMurray end of the line. This railway is known as the Northern Alberta Railway, and is a joint venture of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railroads. There is considerable tonnage passing over the line, in fact the annual report shows it is a paying line. Again, I do not want to jump to conclusions because when we say "paying line" we mean that the books balance; we mean that on paper this part of the line pays.

As we all know, our railroad companies are operated as companies. Even the government-owned railways are operated as crown corporations, and they have to balance their books. This balancing of the books does not necessarily mean that the lines pay.

However, I do not think we can always assess our national effort in terms of dollars and cents or, what you might call "paying lines". We certainly cannot look at the results on a mere day to day basis. It is not of much help to look back, either. Some lines have been built where they should not have been built, and some lines should have been built which have not been built. We must not neglect the long-term view. I agree that we must balance our books, in the short-term view, but my fear is that in doing so we may be overlooking the most important thing of all and that is the solid economic future of our country.

If we plan with the same forethought as our ancestors, I feel we will achieve the same results. When we build these railways into the north we have to be bold but we also have to be careful to make sure we do not waste the taxpayer's money. We have to attempt to strike a balance between sound economic principles and dreams. I do not think the development of the north country is any idle dream. I have been there, and I have seen some of the potential.

In Athabasca, just north of McMurray, there is one of the greatest oil deposits in the world. It is true that this oil is trapped in sand and we are only now reaching the point where this oil can be freed from the sand by an economic process. Nevertheless there is no doubt that, given time, this process will become economically feasible. According to conservative estimates there are 200 billion barrels of oil trapped in these sands. It does not take a great deal of imagination to realize that if our supply of oil from the Near East, from Venezuela or any other place were to be cut off, the tar sands of Alberta would become not only of national but international importance. Whether or not the building of a railway into that section would speed up that process, I am not sure. However, I know that if the tar sands are developed a rail linkage will be required.

This railway to McMurray already carries the great bulk of the freight going into the north. As I said before, according to the books it is making money. If we extend these facilities farther north I think they will also contribute to the solid development of Canada. This railway at McMurray is the closest rail line in Alberta to the Canadian shield. The mineral resources of that shield have only been scratched. People who are conversant with railroads know that mineral areas are considered to be one of the finest sources of revenue for railroads. If we are only looking at the dollars and cents angle then railroads which are built to mining areas are the railroads which pay.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not the attitude of this member, nor is it the attitude of the members of this government to take a parochial or even a provincial view. If there are places to which this particular railway should go in order that the country will be better serviced, I would be one of the first to give the matter consideration. The final decision will not be mine. But when the final decision is made I shall have made all the attempts possible to present the government of this country with impartial facts on which they can make a decision where to place this railroad for the greatest good of the people of this country.

In case my questioner from British Columbia asks me what this has to do with curtailment of railroad services, I must say that we cannot be sure that any railroad will pay for a long period of time or that it will pay better than the building of adequate roads. In the whole of Athabasca we have 24 miles of hard-surfaced roads. Today hard-surfaced roads are essential. Hard-surfaced roads are very effective for increasing the economic welfare of any community. When I say that we need many miles of hard-surfaced roads I do not mean that we do not need a railway. However, it is possible that the expenditure of money on hard-surfaced roads would be more economically sound at this time. That we shall need a railway into the north country to carry minerals in the future, I have no doubt. But whether we build it this year, in five years' time or in 25 years' time is something that will depend on the economic necessity. I do not know what is going to happen to the price of base metals. If the price of base metals went up rapidly, great impetus would be given to the immediate development of these projects.

I merely want to point out that the curtailment of services or the expansion of services on the railway today is something which requires a great deal of thought and a great deal of planning. Since coming to Ottawa I have taken certain steps to look into these matters and I have found on the part of the railways a spirit of co-operation which surprised me. I found that they are very careful indeed in assessing all the factors, although I also found that they were hard-headed businessmen, that they liked to see books balanced and liked to see a good yearly report. Amongst these men I found capable engineers and men of vision who look upon the railway problem as just another national problem. They look upon it—as one of the members of the opposition said the other day—as part of a great jigsaw puzzle. They are responsible for one of the component parts of this puzzle and they are doing as good a job as we can expect them to do under the circumstances.

When business is good and traffic is heavy, the railroads make money. When business is bad and traffic is light, of course they appear to lose money and they do so. But I have found that they are willing, as are we, to look upon the matter from a long-term point of view; and if we can show them where the plans for the future will justify the extension of railways I am sure that they will be only too willing to accept their part of the responsibility. Where we are willing to put forth the money to extend railways into uneconomic territories, they will try to operate those railways as efficiently as possible. It is up to us here in parliament to decide where these railways will go and who will have to pay the bill. The C.N.R. is set up as a company but it is our company. If it loses money, we lose money. If it makes money, the whole country is better off.

To get even closer to the point of whether or not we should curtail services, may I say that we have a branch of the C.N.R. extending out of Edmonton to the east to the north of the Saskatchewan river, and it ends up in a village called Heinsburg. Another branch of the C.N.R. comes west through Saskatchewan and ends up at a place called Frenchman's Butte, 38 miles distant. This railway therefore has a gap of only 38 miles. If you want to carry farm machinery from Winnipeg to Heinsburg it is necessary to go by way of Edmonton, to shunt your box car and to take the box car back east a total extra distance of 328 miles. On the other hand, if you want to ship anything from Heinsburg to Winnipeg, you have to go west to Edmonton and back to Winnipeg. The people who live in there naturally feel that this is an unnecessary burden placed directly upon them and their personal exchequer. It is hard for them to see why a great railway system cannot close a 38 mile gap and give them what would obviously be far better rail services.

Looked upon from their point of view, there is no question that that gap should be closed. We have to decide whether, as a people, we are going to be able to give them that added facility regardless of the economic book balancing. A good many of these people went in there on the expressed promise of the then government that these facilities would be given to them. The vision of the development of the northwest—

Mr. Herridge: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member. During that period in which I was listening I was thinking that he would finally come to relate his remarks to this bill. However, I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the remarks of the hon. member so far are not related to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I want to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) for bringing the matter to my attention. I have been listening and perhaps I was a little bit lax in the discharge of my duties in not drawing the matter to the attention of the house earlier. I should like to make this point. In the explanatory note in connection with the bill, near the bottom of it, we find this sentence:

> The purpose of the proposed amendment is to provide that the board may, at the request of an interested municipality, deal with such reduction of service.

That is the bill or the amendment we are discussing. I hope hon. members will try to keep themselves within the amendment contained in this bill in order that I shall not be obliged to call the matter to their attention again.

Mr. Winch: This is not a railway extension bill.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to relate my remarks more closely to the spirit of this bill. It has been suggested that this railway should not only be extended but that the service on this line be cut out entirely. I think it is hard to discuss the cutting out of the service on this line without going into some of the history behind the line itself. With a view to making the point, in order to strengthen the spirit of this proposal that this line should not only be continued but that there should be no thought at all of cutting it out on the ethical ground I have proposed. These people deserve this line and therefore no reduction in the service should be contemplated, because along this line we have a rich agricultural community; not only that, but underneath the soil are large deposits of salt—

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bigg: —which would keep the world in table salt and salt to be used for all commercial purposes. The people of Athabasca, I might inform the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) do not think this is a laughing matter. Underneath the soil around Heinsburg there is a vein of salt from 80 to 200 feet deep and they have a mill there which sends out seven box car loads of salt per day. I wonder if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is aware of those facts.

An hon. Member: Let him laugh that one off.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder if the hon. member was listening when the Speaker read the purposes of the bill.

Mr. Bigg: I am confining my remarks to whether or not the service on this line should be curtailed or should be discontinued. I think what I am saying is relevant to the question when, as I have said, seven box car loads of salt can come out of one village each day.

It has been suggested that this line be torn up and if that is done or the service discontinued this mill will close down and 50 families will have to leave the area and seek employment elsewhere. That I do not think is a laughing matter, and the people of Athabasca certainly do not think it is a laughing matter for they have sent me to Ottawa to try to do something about it.

Mr. Winch: Very well then, support this bill.

Mr. Bigg: To support this bill is correct, but as the minister has pointed out, the bill itself is unnecessary because the Railway Act covers the problem.

Mr. Winch: It does not.

Mr. Bigg: The act does cover the problem but my hon. friends will, I believe, have an opportunity to speak again, so in the meantime may I continue, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Winch: On the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Go ahead.

Mr. Bigg: We have another rail line branching off from this one which ends at the town of Grand Centre. Grand Centre is the shopping centre for the Cold lake airport. From the east comes another railroad line where there is a gap of approximately 100 miles and the people of Grand Centre are faced with the same problem which they have in Heinsburg. If this railroad line also is torn up or the service is curtailed the people of Grand Centre will suffer in the same way. There are no all-weather roads as an alternative and I think this is relevant to the point under consideration because we are talking about transportation and a fair deal in transportation for all the people of Canada. The results of this bill would have to be paid for by the people of Canada and I think therefore that all the people of Canada, including those of Newfoundland, are interested in the welfare of every other province.

I believe this is a matter which is important, although I have only touched upon it very briefly because I do not now wish to take up the time of the house in view of the fact that it is obvious that it is the opinion of some people that I am stretching the railway question just a little too far. I will therefore express my views on this subject when a better opportunity presents itself.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, possibly before I launch into my observations on this matter, in view of the ruling which has been made and which of course I accept, sir, I might mention that I had intended to approach the matter in this way, that this bill appears to be appended to section 168 of the Railway Act, which reads as follows:

> Referring to railway companies.
> —may abandon the operation of any line of railway with the approval of the board, and no company shall abandon the operation of any line of railway without such approval.

This bill, of course, refers to the right of a municipality to appeal to the board with respect to the curtailment of services. I will state what I have in mind at once, and that is that in considering this question of abandonment or curtailment the matter cannot be dealt with without a proper study and survey of the economic factors which justified the original construction of the line and of the route it follows. I wish to discuss, secondly, the question of the route of the railway which is now proposed on the basis that in my opinion if proper considerations are not given to the choice of route it might be necessary at some time to apply under the terms of the section I have quoted, either as it is now or as it may be amended, for the right to abandon or curtail such services. With defeference, if I am not in opposition to your ruling, sir, I would like to say that I had intended to confine my remarks to the question of a proper choice of route for the railway now proposed so that there would be no need for recourse to this particular section.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member but I rise on a point of order with respect to what he has just said. The bill before the house has nothing whatever to do with the routes of the railways or with abandonments. It has to do with only a reference of curtailment of services to the board of transport commissioners and with no other principle.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I must once again direct the remarks of hon. members to the points contained in the explanatory notes, or hon. members may read the actual amendment. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) is quite correct. This amendment pertains only to reduction of services. There is nothing to do with—

An hon. Member: And appeals to the board.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): —and appeals to the board. It has nothing to do with proposed lines or extensions or anything of that nature. It is strictly on the reduction of services.

Mr. Baldwin: May I say, sir, that I had only intended, in deference to your ruling to suggest that if proper care and caution were exercised in the selection of the route it would not be necessary at any time to apply for a reduction in services.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of sympathy for the intent of this bill. I am quite conversant with the part of the country concerned, having done a good deal of travelling on this particular line of the C.P.R. and I trust the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) will allow a little groundwork to be laid, having in mind my various trips on that line since I think my remarks will have some bearing on this debate.

While travelling on the Kettle valley line in 1945 and 1950 we had dining room services, sleeper services and even a club car. The train would always be crowded and it looked to me as though it was a very paying proposition. As the minister pointed out there were certain changes in the year 1949 contingent upon the opening of the Hope-Princeton highway, which reduced the mileage from Vancouver to the Okanagan valley by something like 150 miles.

Travelling on the same line in the fifties you could see the traffic dwindle to the point where, when I made one of my last trips in that direction, I think I was the only person in the car, and on the entire train there were exactly, as far as I can remember, four people plus the train crew. However, this train gave a needed service to Nelson, Penticton, Trail and smaller communities between those points. It has been replaced by a Budd car service, as the minister pointed out, and I believe the reduction in travel time between Nelson and Vancouver is, as a result, something like seven hours. I made one of the last trips on the old style equipment but I must confess I have not been on the new Budd car service.

Discussing this service with the people who use the run I found they were in a bit of a quandary whether the reduction in the time taken made up for the lack of facilities on the new system. I think the minister was quite right in saying that while the service was a daily service there was not too much to be said against the service given to the people of the Kootenays.

However, due to a radical sect, the Sons of Freedom, who must not be confused with the law-abiding Doukhobors—and there are a lot of Doukhobors in the Kootenays who are very fine citizens—the service had to be curtailed. The Sons of Freedom are a radical sect which has created a considerable amount of disturbance, to put it mildly, for the residents of the Kootenays, and that disturbance has resulted in the curtailment of the service so that it now runs, as we have been told, twice weekly going eastward and twice weekly going westward, those runs being timed during daylight hours. I have travelled along the highway, and there are certain sections of the highway which follow along the Coquahalla pass and which give you a bird's eye view of the construction of the Kettle Valley railway, and it must have been a very rough decision for the C.P.R. to decide they would run this train even during the daylight hours because, frankly, anyone going over it in daylight through the Coquahalla pass would not be likely to repeat the journey. It consists of innumerable short stretches of track jutting out on stilts, and innumerable short tunnels where a few sticks of dynamite could cause a very serious accident. Speaking for myself, I cannot blame the train crews or the railways for acting in the interests of safety by regulating operations on that line so that all running is done during daylight hours.

All this is, I believe, directed to the particular problem which prompted the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) to bring forward this bill. With regard to the actual wording of the bill, the purpose of the proposed amendment, as you, Mr. Speaker have pointed out, is to provide that the board of transport commissioners may at the request of a municipality deal with reductions of services. Actually when the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking to this bill, I believe he used the phrase the board "must hear representations" from the interested municipalities. But, in fact, according to the wording of the bill, the board "may entertain an appeal from any interested municipality or municipalities and may confirm, disapprove or vary such reductions of service" and so on. The whole intent of the bill is to make certain that the board of transport commissioners is aware of reductions in services and that they have investigated these reductions to see whether there is an injustice being done—whether the service is to be reduced to cut out, say, a petty loss rather than a major loss—whether, in fact, a railway should have the right to reduce or modify its service in a particular instance.

Under the Railway Act it seems to me—and the hon. gentleman knows I am no lawyer, but it seems it is not too tough to find out how lawyers work—this question is already dealt with. In section 33, subsection 1, sub-paragraph (b) it says this with regard to the authority of the board:

(1) The board has full jurisdiction to inquire into, hear and determine any application by or on behalf of any party interested.

(a) complaining that any company, or person, has failed to do any act, matter or thing required to be done by this act, or the Special Act, or by any regulation, order or direction made thereunder by the governor in council, the minister, the board, or any inspecting engineer or other lawful authority, or that any company or person has done or is doing any act, matter or thing contrary to or in violation of this act, or the Special Act, or any such regulation, order, or direction, or,

(b) requesting the board to make any order, or give any direction, leave, sanction or approval, that by law it is authorized to make or give, or with respect to any matter, act or thing, that by this act, or the Special Act, is prohibited, sanctioned or required to be done.

In other words, it does seem to be pretty clear—

Mr. Winch: It is obvious you are no lawyer.

Mr. Broome: Does the hon. member wish to ask a question? Then, in section 36, it says —and I can go on to quote the whole of the Railway Act if you want me to:

The board may, of its own motion, or shall, upon the request of the minister, inquire into, hear and determine any matter or thing that, under this act, it may inquire into, hear and determine upon application or complaint, and with respect thereto has the same powers as, upon any application or complaint, are vested in it by this act.

I suggest that this again covers the field and allows the board to listen to any representations from municipalities, labour unions or anybody whatsoever who may wish to make any case before it. In proof of this contention is the fact that the minister read out a notice which the board requires the railway companies to post. It is a public notice, and there is only one reason for posting that public notice, namely that the public may know 20 days beforehand what the railway proposes to do, and the reason the public must know that length of time in advance is in order that they may be able to make any representations which they may care to make to the board of transport commissioners. In effect, therefore, the bill does not add anything to the powers which the board of transport commissioners now enjoy and, as the minister pointed out, if hon. members wish to find out the particular obligations imposed upon the railway they have only to turn to section 315 of the act, which states:

(1) The company shall, according to its powers,

(a) furnish, at the place of starting, and at the junction of the railway with other railways, and at all stopping places established for such purpose, adequate and suitable accommodation for the receiving and loading of all traffic—

And then it goes on, subsection after subsection pointing out what the railroad must do.

When you consider all these points, there is only one conclusion you reach and that is that what the hon. member for Kootenay West really wants to do is draw the plight of the Kootenays to the attention of this house and perhaps in a somewhat stronger way to the board of transport commissioners. But as far as the bill is concerned it adds nothing to what the board of transport commissioners has done in this case or to what they might do in any succeeding case.

The minister has pointed out that the board has its own men who travel the railway before and after a change in schedule. I think it is safe to assume they also check in detail with the municipalities that were affected by a change. The decision which was taken to curtail the service on the Kettle valley line was taken under circumstances that would make it extremely difficult for anybody to do other than what was done in this case. It would have been difficult for the board of transport commissioners to have investigated this entire situation any more fully than it did. Is it fair that the railway should be denied the right of changing or reducing its service in that area in view of the circumstances that obtained there, should the fruit shippers of the Okanagan valley for example help to carry the costs of a losing service?

One hon. gentleman who spoke previously referred to the part that is played by the railway in the development of the national resources of the country. You would expect a railway that was opening up new and untapped markets to have a pattern of constantly increasing revenue and traffic but the fact is that this particular line has sustained a constantly decreasing usage as far as passenger traffic is concerned.

I believe the governing factor must have been the actual bombings which took place and the railway in an effort to safeguard the lives of its employees changed the schedules to daylight runs. Several hon. members have indicated that there are alternative means of transportation including bus lines and airlines. Air transportation tends to be uncertain in winter but the points referred to in the presentation of the hon. member for Kootenay West are serviced by both bus and air lines. There was at least adequate rail passenger service prior to the complete elimination of the daily run.

As the minister pointed out, the railway wants to have its equipment in operation every day because it has invested in the purchase of it. I am genuinely of the conviction that the change in schedule to twice-a-week service was made on the basis of the railway wanting to discharge its obligation in terms of exercising care for the safety of its passengers and employees. As a matter of fact, I suggest that this bill is completely out of order and without point.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for having drawn to the attention of hon. members of the house the principle of the bill we are discussing. It deals solely with a provision for the board of transport commissioners to not only have power to hear representations on curtailment of service but power to deal with the same. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) made a point of the fact that in the terminology of the bill now before us the word "may" and not "shall" is used. I am certain that hon. members will readily understand the reason for this. This bill proposes an amendment to the Railway Act which applies to all railways in Canada. There are a number of railways in this country that are publicly owned rather than privately owned and one notable example is the Canadian National Railways which could be loosely described as a crown company responsible to and financed by the people of Canada through the medium of the House of Commons and the other place. It is completely beyond the power of a private member to move an amendment to a bill affecting a crown company involving the expenditure of public moneys. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South now appreciates why the word "may" is used in this bill.

Mr. Broome: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does the hon. member believe that I was trying to suggest that the bill should contain the word "shall"? That was not my point at all. I was merely suggesting—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. The hon. member may ask a question but he must not anticipate the committee.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman raised that point and I thought he should be answered. I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments that have been made on this bill and in particular the statements made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) concerning reasons why curtailment of service in British Columbia should not be considered. The principle of this bill concerns all of Canada in relation to our transportation system. Under section 168 of the existing act it is clear that the board of transport commissioners has the authority to hold official hearings on the abandonment of lines and the power to make decisions concerning their abandonment.

It is obvious from what has been said that it is in the minds of some hon. members who have spoken—and I think I am correct in saying also in the mind of the Minister of Transport—that the board of transport commissioners has authority to hold official hearings and to make decisions concerning the curtailment of service. The present bill was introduced by the hon. member for Kootenay West following conversations and his being in receipt of legal advice and a letter which he received from the board of transport commissioners to the effect that it has no power to hold official hearings or make decisions concerning curtailment of service.

I suggest through you, Mr. Speaker, that those who are interested in this matter and have spoken on it this afternoon make official inquiries through the legal officers of the board of transport commissioners as to whether or not it has the power which they have affirmed it holds. Our information, both verbally and in writing, from the board of transport commissioners is entirely different. I am informed that the Minister of Transport has no power whatsoever over the board or on appeal as regards the curtailment of railway services. I think I have said enough to indicate, with all the authorities that the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has given you, why in Ontario on two railway lines and in British Columbia it is necessary to have the act amended.

I was quite surprised when the Minister of Transport informed us that there was an understanding between the attorney general of British Columbia and the Canadian Pacific railway relative to a curtailment of service on the Kettle valley railroad because of certain bombings on the railway line itself. That is not a sufficient reason for a curtailment of service. If there is violence on any line, be it a railroad or any other system of transportation or communication, that is a matter for the police forces of the province and of the nation to correct; it is not a ground for the curtailment of railroad service.

The Minister of Transport, and I particularly add the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), said that the curtailment was for the protection of the life of the employees on the railroad and that trains could be run only in daylight. If that is so, then could we be given an explanation as to why the freight trains still operate at night, because surely the engineer, the firemen and the brakemen on the freight trains at night have exactly the same life as anyone who operates a train in daylight.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Winch: No. We are most interested in the protection of the lives of employees and of passengers, but we know from the information we have received that freight trains have not been curtailed in daylight or night. The question is curtailment of services and public hearings. The Minister of Transport was quite correct in what he said and he was reading from a memorandum supplied to him. He told us that, and therefore I am not breaking any secret. The memorandum which he read said that in the event of changes in prices, curtailment of services or change of hours, it is all posted. He was quite correct when he said that the board of transport commissioners will receive complaints and will even send out an investigator to look into the situation. That is good; but, in the final analysis, the power to hold an official hearing and to bring down a ruling on the curtailment of services does not come under the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners. It is of the utmost importance that the board of transport commissioners should have the power not only to hold official hearings but to decide finally whether a curtailment of services is in order.

The hon. member for Vancouver South and the Minister of Transport both made a point about unprofitable operations. I think I can also say it was mentioned by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Bigg). When you consider the operations of a railroad it must be realized that they must not be carried on on a day-to-day basis only this week, this month, next year; but with the background of the railroad systems of Canada in mind; more especially when one considers the Canadian Pacific railroad. If hon. members are interested they will find that in the construction of the Canadian Pacific railroad not one but numerous empires were given away free of charge by Canada,—

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Keep to the point.

Mr. Winch: —including rights to the finest land, timber and minerals of Canada. I know that in British Columbia, and particularly true on Vancouver island where only about 75 miles of railroad were built the railroad grants ran into hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this hon. member was one of those who raised a question about speakers on this side of the house keeping to the subject. He himself is now offending that rule very badly at the moment.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with the statement made and read by the Minister of Transport as a reason for the curtailment of services, and also mentioned by the hon. member for Athabasca and the hon. member for Vancouver South, who referred to the rate of return on a profitable operation and said that it was part of this entire question. I am dealing with that exact point. If they want to consider the rate of a profitable return on a certain train or a certain service, then they must take into consideration at the same time not only the profit or the loss of today but the profits made previously under grants to the railways by the Dominion of Canada. I am still commenting on what has been given as reasons for opposition to this bill. Am I permitted to continue, sir?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is in order if he deals with the question of current profits but if he goes back to the origins of the railways it seems to me he is straying away from the immediate question before the house.

Mr. Winch: Are you saying that the billions of dollars worth of grants made are not to be considered today?

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Winch: I know you free enterprisers would like to forget that. It is to be noted that in British Columbia, where passenger service has been curtailed, freight service has not because one of the grants was made to the company which now has a 55 per cent control of Kimberley and Trail. On that basis we should also decide whether or not services ought to be continued. In view of the past, and the free grants of the mineral, timber and land given to the railroad companies they should not now be in a position, without reference to the board of transport commissioners and without the authority of the board of transport commissioners, to curtail service to the people and maintain for their own purposes their freight operations.

No matter how you look at it, it is an involved question at all times, this question of transportation. We feel strongly that the board of transport commissioners, having been granted the power, and rightly so, of hearing and deciding final action on the abandonment of lines, it is just as logical and perhaps even more necessary that the board of transport commissioners should have a similar power to finally dispose of any representations that may be made on curtailment of service.

I sincerely hope that the bill presented by the hon. member for Kootenay West will receive the unanimous support of this house which it merits.

Mr. Bigg: May I be permitted to ask the hon. member a question? Can he give me an example of a complaint in this regard which could not be taken to the board of transport commissioners under the present act?

Mr. Winch: There is no question that it can be taken to the board of transport commissioners, but the board of transport commissioners has no power of final decision if the matter deals with the curtailment of services.

Mr. Bigg: May I ask another question? Is it the hon. member's wish that the board of transport commissioners should have the final say in matters concerning the railway?

Mr. Winch: I am afraid I shall have to ask the hon. member to state whether he is referring to the curtailment of services, and whether there should be an appeal beyond the board of transport commissioners to the governor general in council, as there is in connection with abandonment? I am not going to say the same provisions should not apply to curtailment. All we are asking now is that the board of transport commissioners have authority in connection with the curtailment of services.

Mr. H. C. McQuillan (Comox-Alberni): I have a great deal of sympathy, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and his effort to increase the service into that area. We see that going on all the time all across Canada. Originally our railways were built to perform two functions, the first one being the movement of bulk freight and the second to provide essential passenger services. The rapid increase in highway construction and highway services, as well as air services, has caused the latter function to become less important. Today the primary function of the railway is the movement of freight, particularly the bulk freight provided by our export and agricultural industries.

Freight rates for these items must be maintained at a figure that will permit our export industries to compete in the world markets. The continued operation of non-profitable passenger lines will inevitably result in an increase in these rates. A few years ago I made a trip to the prairies with my wife and one of my youngsters. We went to a little town called Leask. It was the first time I had ever been in that part of the country, and if I had known anything about it I would not have bothered to take the train. When I got there the people told me that nobody travelled by passenger train in that part of the country. We had to transfer at Edmonton to a line that went down through North Battleford. There was a sleeper and dining car on the train, and my wife, youngster, one other passenger and myself made up the total passenger complement. At North Battleford we transferred to a local train that runs up to Prince Albert. There were two other passengers, an Indian and his wife along with my wife, my child and myself. I would imagine that the probable cost of transporting the five of us for 50 or 60 miles was about $5,000. There are thousands and thousands of miles of such railway passenger services throughout Canada.

The end result of such operations is, as we have seen from the recent C.N.R. report, a deficit of close to $30 million. The estimated deficit next year is upwards of $50 million. The indications are that Canadian Pacific profits will be inadequate for the proper maintenance of the line, let alone any modernization. I should like to quote from a report prepared by Chief Justice Sloan following an examination of this subject some years ago. The report was submitted in November, 1954, and he said:

> Other sources of rail revenues are incapable of absorbing the constant cost of rail operations. Revenue from main line passenger service could contribute in a limited degree but operating losses on passenger service on branch lines in areas that are relatively sparse in population must be offset against main line passenger operation. Dining car service, as such, is operating at a loss.
> The railways then must endeavour to recoup this loss of revenue from some source if they are to operate on any sound financial basis.

Where do they look in an effort to recoup those losses? This search results in ever-increasing freight rates. About the same time, Chief Justice Sloan submitted another report in which he showed that a freight rate—I think he was referring to the rate on lumber—climbed in the period from April 1948 to June 1957 by approximately 125 per cent. These increases, of course, could have no other ultimate result than to kill these industries. If we continue adding to our railway costs by maintaining such services as are advocated here, freight rates will reach a level where we will not be able to compete in the export markets of the world. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West would be doing his constituency a greater service if he recommended the complete abandonment of the Kettle valley service. Perhaps then the railway serving that area could give a freight rate that would allow the industries in Kootenay West to stay in business and maintain employment, about which he is also greatly concerned.

I have been continually amazed at the lack of realism shown by members of the opposition in this house in so far as railway operation is concerned. They are continually asking questions about men being laid off and requesting the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) to prevail on the management of the C.N.R. to maintain employment or to allow featherbedding to continue. They must be aware that the end results of these practices will be one of two things: either an ever-increasing burden on the taxpayers of Canada or the complete destruction of our export industries.

If the hon. member for Kootenay West would shed his mantle of socialism that he has on in the house and would return to his true role of lumber operator in the Kootenays he should be the first one to realize that what he has recommended could very well destroy the lumber industry in the Kootenays.

Mr. Winch: Are you mad?

Mr. Herridge: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does the hon. gentleman realize that the whole lumber industry in my district is behind the protest against the curtailment of this service and supports the amendment in this bill which was drafted as a result of receiving the advice of good counsel?

Mr. McQuillan: Having had a good deal of experience with lumber men, I realize that there are a great many narrow-minded, local-minded lumber men.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): In talking on this question, the matter of whether this is properly before the house was raised by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees). He pointed out, and rightly so, in support of his position, section 315 of the Railway Act. Then he went a little further and buttressed his position by saying sections 33 and 36 were to the effect that the Railway Act requires railway companies to receive, carry and deliver traffic and provide adequate and suitable accommodation for the carrying of traffic and the regulation of train services, and requires the railway companies to furnish adequate and suitable train services and prohibits them from reducing services below that standard.

While the hon. member from Kootenay may not be wholly in order, I think he is taking advantage of this opportunity to bring to the attention of the house the complaint in his own particular riding. I think that is as it should be. I am also going to take the opportunity, under this section of the act, more or less to buttress his position or support it, even though it may not be properly before the house.

I am taking this opportunity because in 1956 I spoke of the inadequate service that was being given to the largest cities in the Dominion of Canada and in the ambit or the scope of the cities that were being talked about, Toronto was included. I was complaining about the attitude of some of the officers of the Canadian National Railways when they were talking about the complaint that had been lodged by the city of Toronto, particularly the suburban areas. At that time the complaint was coming from Oakville and Scarborough that there was inadequate commuter service to Toronto for the purpose of bringing the vast population to their work each day. The president of the Canadian National Railways brought in the argument that if we wanted that kind of service, we would have to pay for it. Then I went over the matter, as has been done by the hon. member for Kootenay West, relating what had happened in the past.

I can subscribe to what the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has said when he went over the details of why the railways were not paying and where they had been subsidized in the past. It is a good thing to bring these matters to the attention of the house because it is the only opportunity that we have of getting these views before the people of Canada who, in turn, are paying for and subsidizing the railways when there is a deficit. Likewise, when there is a surplus, the railways do not do much to improve the services. Likewise, I pointed out that in reporting, they made a great point with regard to inter-city service, saying that they had speeded it up and that they had improved the time and therefore though they had not increased the services, they were running a profitable venture between the cities. I pointed out to them then that, as to the commuter service that was given in Toronto they had never at any time endeavoured to give the service and to see whether it would pay or whether, if they gave good service, the people would be glad to support it even if they increased the rates.

At the time the board of trade of Toronto supported the board of transport commissioners in granting an increase in the rates for commuter service. The point is that it was never questioned by the people in the suburban sections of Toronto or of the metropolitan area, I should say, as to whether they would pay or complain about paying if they were given the service for which they were asking. The point I wanted to mention was that a vice president, I think it was Mr. Tile, had stated that the service had become so deficient that they could not now, even if they wanted to, give a better service for people in the suburbs.

I presume that condition exists not only in Toronto but in Montreal, Vancouver, Hamilton, London and in all the large cities of the Dominion of Canada.

Owing to their lack of foresight and lack of funds—but mostly, I would presume, through lack of foresight—they had never made any provision for extension or expansion of the services. In fact, at the time when we were trying to establish the electric railways under Sir Adam Beck's regime of Hydro, he pointed out that the day would come when they would need such services. The president of one of the railways, Sir Henry Thornton, joined with those who were opposing that extension of radial services in Toronto at that time. I assert that, owing to the fact that they wrecked that radial plan therefore it is their duty to supply something to help to overcome the condition they created. Therefore I have no sympathy with the railway or with the president Mr. Gordon when he tells us now that if we want this service, we should pay for it. They created this condition at Toronto.

Of course in the last decade or the last two decades, Toronto was more or less a forgotten city as far as this parliament was concerned. They did not supply us with services. So whenever an opportunity comes along when we can draw the matter to the attention of this house that the railways, through their transport board, should do something, I shall do so. I think that they should supplement or augment the services they are now giving. They have never really tried to give the service that we should like to have in Toronto. I think the people would be willing to pay for it.

I point this out, Mr. Speaker, because the situation has become so serious now in the large centres that they now have to have subways and they are very expensive. I would go so far as to say that if we had an adequate commuter service in the city of Toronto we would not be confronted today with the expense which we are now facing with regard to establishing another subway along Bloor, Danforth and University streets in Toronto. Therefore when the matter is being brought to the attention of the house by the Minister of Transport, that there is a provision in the act for what the hon. member for Kootenay West is requesting—that it is there but they have not taken proper procedure to bring to the attention of the house the situation whenever the railways are curtailing their services—I thought I would take this opportunity because the last time I brought it before the house very little attention was paid. I presume that the railway authorities likewise will treat it in the same fashion.

While I am at it I would say that there should be a certain checkup on the efficiency of the railway department responsible particularly for the pool service, not singling out anyone in particular. Those that come into the station, whether they come in in the morning or at night, get ample evidence of what kind of service the railway is giving the people of Ottawa. Likewise they are getting ample evidence of the kind of service we are getting in Toronto.

If a private business were to operate in the same manner as that in which the railways are operating, and treat their customers with such contempt for their convenience they would not be in business very long. It looks as though this is what the railways are trying to accomplish. When you arrive at the Ottawa station you find baggage cars and postal service cars occupying the space in the station right up to the door, and the passengers who are paying for it all have to walk from perhaps Laurier avenue all the way to the railway station. Not only that, but they have to sometimes even climb over trucks and crates and freight and wind their way, possibly helping some helpless woman who cannot carry her grip under the various difficulties which one has always to face because of the handicaps mentioned. This applies not only to Ottawa but to Toronto and I dare say many other Canadian cities suffer likewise. It is the service and the convenience of the passenger which they should be looking after but sorry to say it is freight that gets the nod because that is the most lucrative part of their business. Yet, in this act it distinctly says the railways are to provide adequate and convenient service for the people of the Dominion of Canada, and I can assure the house—and I believe every member will subscribe to what I have said—that the service, to use impolite terms, is absolutely lousy.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up the time of the house for more than one second. I am going to vote for this bill because it seems to me that what it provides is exactly what the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) so eloquently said ought to be provided—a proper place for a proper hearing of these matters, and that is all the hon. gentleman is asking for in this bill. It seems to me it would be a good thing, therefore, if it were passed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I would like to join my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in expressing my support of the principle of this bill, and I would also like to commend the distinguished hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) on the very graphic description he gave us of the operations of some railroad stations familiar to most of us in this house.

I rise simply to say that I have before me a concrete case which justifies the principle of this bill. In my constituency a merchant in the village of South Woodslee has written to me complaining that he understands the New York Central railroad proposes to close the railway station in his village. As a merchant, he has an appreciation of the express and freight service in that particular area, and he urges me to point out to the board of transport commissioners—as indeed I have done—the importance of not reducing this particular service. While the railroad will be afforded an opportunity of putting forward its side of the case I do think that the law should be such as to ensure that in any case of a proposed reduction in service there should be an opportunity for the public to put forward its views. For that reason I warmly support this measure.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed to hear the remarks of the two previous speakers, and I would like to compliment the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) for giving very good reasons why his party should support this bill.

As I have said, the purpose of this bill is to give the board the power to have an official hearing, to give people an opportunity to make their representations and to deny the right to reduce services, which power they do not have at the present time.

The correspondence I have received in this connection is in my office, but as a result of conversation in the last half hour with an official of the board of transport commissioners I might inform the house with reference to what has been said previously in this debate that I have received information that the board does not have the same power with respect to the curtailment of services to hold a hearing and to deny such curtailment as it has with respect to the abandonment of services.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member if he said this is information he has received from the board of transport commissioners during the last half hour?

Mr. Herridge: Yes, a telephone conversation. So there is obviously a misunderstanding on the part of a good many members who have spoken in this debate.

The amendment was drawn on the advice of competent counsel in my constituency and the usual advice one obtains here in order to achieve such an objective. A number of members in my opinion seemed to speak in defence of the necessity of the C.P.R. to gain profits from their passenger runs, even though they make large profits on the freight runs. We in this group aim to represent the wishes of the people in this respect and the company having in this case a monopoly, the people should have an opportunity to be properly heard through the medium of the legislation contained in this bill.

I must say I was amazed to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. McQuillan), who suggested the complete abandonment of the passenger service on the Kettle valley railroad, a railroad which hauls possibly, having regard to the mileage concerned, the greatest wealth per mile of any line in Canada. I was also very surprised to hear him correct me as to the sensibility and the ability of his colleagues in the lumber industry in my constituency. I want to say that we trust this bill will receive support from all sides of this house because we are aiming to do something we feel is to the advantage of the people of Canada.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-13, to amend the British North America Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, "rep. by pop." was one of the forces that brought into being confederation and the British North America Act. Briefly the basis of this bill is the same old slogan "rep. by pop."; representation by population, with certain ideas with regard to area that I hope to talk about later on.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, a number of members are asking to have six o'clock called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Is it the unanimous wish of the house to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): It being six o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, representation by population has been the general idea behind the apportionment of members of parliament ever since confederation. If you look at the first British North America Act you can see that that was in the minds of the people who drew it up; but it is also a fact that the climate of parliaments which, every 10 years, after the census, deal with the apportionment of seats amongst members or amongst areas, are what you might call equinoctial; they are filled with storm. Redistribution is something that every hon. member is going to hear and think about a great deal in the next four years. The next census is due in 1961. The results will be available some time in March or April, 1962, and some sort of bill will have to be brought in to change the Representation Act following that census before we can have an election.

It may interest hon. members to know that perhaps one of the reasons why this parliament may not go to the people again until the late fall of 1962 is that it will be impossible to prepare a Representation Act before that time unless the government is anxious to go to the people on the 1951 census and, of course, it is impossible to believe that. As a matter of fact, I had a certain diffidence in presenting this bill to the house because I thought the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) would be announcing legislation which would bring about the setting up of an independent commission to deal with redistribution matters, since it has been something very dear to his heart. Unfortunately when the Prime Minister was in the opposition he was the victim, according to both himself and his friends, of what might be called some Gardiner gerrymandering, or a little playing around, so that once he was shunted right out of his constituency and another time he was rather badly hived.

One of the members of the press gallery, Tim Creery of the Montreal Star, wrote a series of articles not too long ago on this whole problem of redistribution and I think a couple of paragraphs from them would state the case for a commission fairly well. I quote:

Ottawa, April 21—Several of Canada's most prominent politicians of recent years have denounced the present system of drawing up the boundaries of ridings.

Prime Minister Mackenzie King was against it. Senator Charles Gavan Power, as a leading member of the Liberals in the commons, was for years the leading champion of reform.

In opposition, Conservative Leader George Drew and the then member for Lake Centre, John Diefenbaker, called repeatedly for appointment of an independent commission to take the "geography" of redistribution out of the hands of the politicians.

Thus this measure that I have introduced has had support of a predated kind from the gentleman wielding the most power in the government at the present time. This is not to say that objections could not be taken to this bill. You do not change the British North America Act easily or casually.

The purpose of this bill is to introduce in subsection (1) of section 51 of the B.N.A. Act, 1857, the underlined words "independent of the parliament of Canada" so that the readjustment of the representation in the commons be done in future by an independent body rather than by a committee of the House of Commons.

The British North America Act, as it reads at the present time, says that such authority as parliament shall determine. Thus it could be argued that parliament already has this power to create an independent commission without changing the British North America Act. As a matter of fact, that argument has been presented in the past when this idea has come up but I do not think it is something we need to bother with here.

I have spent a considerable amount of time on this topic and tomorrow in the mail each member will receive a typed brief of about 16 mimeographed pages covering the rules for sharing the seats among the provinces. The second sheet gives the representation by population based on the 1956 census. This is the projected representation first time we have readjusted from the quinquennial census. The third and fourth sheets cover the same sort of thing; the first operation and the second operation from the D.B.S. estimate of population of last July 1, 1957.

The last sheet of the first set gives the 30 largest Canadian constituencies in area with 1956 population. This is the point where I became interested in redistribution because if you look down the list you will see that Port Arthur is the fifth largest constituency in terms of area, being 148,482 square miles, being bigger than most of the maritime provinces put together. It has a population of 78,111, which is the largest of any of those 30 largest constituencies. Attempting to campaign in such a constituency, and recognizing that both the Liberal and Conservative candidates were also aware of the problem, set me thinking of redistribution and of some means of evening up and getting back to "rep, by pop." to a better apportionment.

I would like the permission of the house to place on Hansard two bibliographies which were prepared by the librarian of the library of parliament, which I think hon. members will like to refer to in the next four years, perhaps, as this topic keeps coming up again and again. One is entitled "Redistribution—Canada" and the other "Redistribution—Great Britain and Dominions".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The hon. member would like permission to place them in Hansard?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. member permission to put them in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I think the articles and the references that hon. members will find in Hansard as a result of this will open up the topic very much to them.

The second part of the information which I have sent to each member gives the statistics for all the constituencies in Canada as they exist at the present time, province by province, with their areas in square miles and the number of electors in 1957; that is, the 1957 general election, the population in 1956, the population in 1951 and the last time each constituency was changed. The reason for giving the three population figures is to give some idea of the growth, and how some constituencies are going through tremendous growth while others are not but, as a matter of fact, are retrogressing. The point about giving the figures for electors is to let hon. members see that the relationship between the number of electors and the population is not a constant thing in all constituencies in Canada.

I do not believe that the number of electors is the factor to work on in considering how big a constituency should be. My reason for that is that with the tremendous growth in the responsibilities of the federal government, it is the population that counts. For example, you can quite often have immigrants who do not have Canadian citizenship and the right to vote, or even children, giving you more work to do as a member of parliament than electors, and therefore I think the argument, that population rather than electors is one of the most important things to keep to the fore in determining how many people there should be in a constituency, is valid. It should be by population and not by the number of electors.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The argument in connection with redistribution has to be presented historically; that is, you have to go back and look at the thing from the beginning in order to really appreciate it. An expert on this particular facet of our parliamentary life, aside from the chief electoral officer who knows a great deal about it, is a professor from Saskatchewan by the name of Norman Ward. Perhaps I should give one brief quotation from his great book which is called, "The Canadian House of Commons":

> A debate on redistribution reveals parliament at its worst.

Unfortunately, that is true, and the reason is that redistribution affects every one of us or can affect every one of us. We all have an interest in this problem, whereas almost every other bill that comes before the house may represent a mere party decision to us. Redistribution represents the only occasion upon which all members are interested in the subject under discussion. I think this is a problem that should interest every member in the house, and that is one of the main reasons why I have put forward so many statistics. This enables each member to ascertain how his constituency compares with other constituencies in his area, whether he is above the mean or below the mean in terms of population. The statistics also give him an idea how his constituency compares in area.

The mean figure in the 1962 redistribution will probably be somewhere between 64,000 and 66,000 people. If your constituency is above that, perhaps it needs a readjustment. If it is below, there may be need for amalgamation or something else should be done to adjust the balance.

I have a number of proposals that I want to make, but perhaps a little quotation from one of the most vitriolic tongues the North American continent has ever had, that of H. L. Mencken, on the point would be appropriate. He said:

> The yokels hang on because old apportionments give them unfair advantages. The vote of a malarious peasant on the lower eastern shore counts as much as the votes of 12 Baltimoreans. But that can't last. It is not only unjust and undemocratic; it is absurd.

You could say the same thing about a situation in which the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) represents people whose vote is worth about 1/17 or 1/18 of the habitants of the Iles-de-la-Madeleine constituency. One point that needs to be made in connection with redistribution is that the problem has to be settled within the boundaries of a province. It is, therefore, unfair to make a comparison between York-Scarborough and Iles-de-la-Madeleine because in one constituency in one province you have 11,000 people and in the other in another you have 180,000 or 210,000. However, in Ontario, in contrast there is a constituency which has a population of 28,000 and which has a member in this house. This situation is fine under these peculiar circumstances, but surely we have to come at this whole problem, when you see a discrepancy such as that, with the idea of making the representation fair and just on the basis of population.

The distribution of seats as between the provinces is relatively automatic, although there have been some changes and it has caused some small trouble. The people from the maritimes will say something about it because the maritimes have felt they have suffered and will suffer more. If you project the figures for redistribution you find that Nova Scotia is going to lose a seat, and perhaps the members from Nova Scotia will perk up their ears at that statement. It looks as though Newfoundland may lose a seat. New Brunswick is safe with a senatorial floor of ten and Prince Edward Island is safe with a senatorial floor of four. These facts illustrate why this issue is charged with dynamite in this session. Saskatchewan, if we continue with the present rules, is going to lose three seats in the next redistribution. One must remember the power we have in this house from Saskatchewan in the Prime Minister and one cabinet minister.

There are the reasons why I say this redistribution issue is going to be before parliament for the next four years. British Columbia is going to gain a seat, while Quebec is going to lose one. Alberta will perhaps gain one or two, and Manitoba is going to lose one. This means you are going to see quite a change in 1962 because of the rural-urban shift which has been extraordinary in the past few years. This problem should concern every member of parliament, and I hope that in the debate that ensues on this bill everyone will take a nonpartisan stand. Whether you believe it or not, that is the essence of redistribution. Even though there has been some partisanship and gerrymandering, the matter is supposedly decided in the House of Commons on a nonpartisan basis.

My idea, of course, is that this amendment will open up the way for an independent commission to undertake the task. Of course, this independent commission will have to be given a certain set of principles under which it should work, and of course parliament will have to do that. The independent commission would have to bring in a report to parliament for approval. The Prime Minister pointed out quite clearly in 1953 and 1947 that other countries of the commonwealth have found an independent commission worked very well. If any hon. members on the government side want to look up his speeches, they are to be found in volume 4, 1952 and in volume 6, 1947. I think, actually, the Prime Minister has been as eloquent a spokesman for the independent commission as anyone in this house.

I must confess that the former member for Port Arthur shrugged off the whole matter, saying the people do not care. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) took the former member to task with his favourite phrases such as "abundantly clear", or "glaringly obvious", stressing the fact that he was strongly in favour of an independent commission taking this whole question out of the area of a backbiting, impulsive and grasping parliament. Since redistribution almost always is considered towards the end of a parliament, with the tremendous rush to get things through, the problem is never solved satisfactorily. I am recommending these proposals for study now because if we do refer the bill, as I would like, to the special committee on elections, then a study of the proposals should be made and by the end of this year or early next year some progress could be made towards the establishment of an independent commission. The organization would be ready, with principles established on how it is to operate by 1962 when the census results will begin to be known. These proposals, of course, are along the lines of the recommendations made by the Prime Minister when he was in opposition. I think, as a matter of fact, I should refer to some of the things he said. In Hansard of July 15, 1947, at page 5644, he said: that is Mr. Bennett.

> In 1933 the Prime Minister—

> —pointed out the unfairness of leaving a measure like this to the end of the session. Presumably there was a desire to have the session closed at the earliest possible date, and the debate continued for four or five days. The Prime Minister on that occasion used certain words which I wish to adopt now. He pointed out that coming in at the end of the session and introducing a measure such as this is unfair and indicates a desire to eliminate members of opposing parties without enabling them to place their position before the house and the country.

Now, in 1952 the hon. member for Eglinton expressed the idea that something had to be done because if another government with a big majority were in control in 1962, we would continue with the old way. I think at the time the hon. member for Eglinton was afraid the big government in control would be a Liberal government. Of course, the situation has changed so that perhaps now we can look forward to action by this government to give effect to the wishes and ideas of the Prime Minister.

It is important that we get going on this matter as soon as possible because four years come along very quickly when you are dealing with something like redistribution. In 1867, as most of you probably know, the basis for deciding how the representation was to go stemmed from giving Quebec, which was neither the largest nor the smallest of the provinces, 65 seats. There was emphasis at this time that the division should be along county lines and it was found, in the discussion to be found in the old Hansards in the statements of Sir John A. Macdonald and other leaders of the times, that the principle of representation by population both between provinces and within provinces should be to the fore. Actually it was definite as between provinces but the act is silent on how it was to be adjusted within the provinces.

In order to prevent any one province from taking a real beating in the readjustment after each centennial census there was the one-twentieth clause inserted in the British North America Act which provided that the provincial ratio to the national population from one census to another, if it did not drop more than one-twentieth, would not lead to the loss of any members. This provision, of course, protected some provinces. The general idea up until 1872 and the first of the John A. Macdonald gerrymanders was that the government should bring down any changes and those changes, of course, came in when British Columbia and Manitoba came into confederation. Manitoba was given four seats although it only merited by population half a seat. British Columbia was given six seats though it only merited one. Hence representation by population went out the window. In 1873 Prince Edward Island came in and it was given six seats where it was only entitled at the time to five seats. Unfortunately for Prince Edward Island, it never got the assurance that this was an irreducible minimum whereas Manitoba was promised that the four would be a minimum until 1881 and British Columbia was promised that the six would be an irreducible minimum.

So by 1873 you see representation in the House of Commons on three different bases. There were the four original provinces which had roughly "rep. by pop." with 190 seats. Then you had the western provinces. They were guaranteed ten. Then you had Prince Edward Island that had six but was guaranteed none.

When Sir John A. Macdonald began to operate in the 1872 redistribution he did not give the opposition any opportunity really to consider the changes that were made. They were brought down and presented in the house as government business and the opposition, with much raving and ranting, had to accept them. The storm and fire was even more severe in 1882. This has been referred to as the great gerrymander or, as some people call it, the best gerrymander, when the Grits were really hived. Sir John A. Macdonald came out with a couple of statements that shot the principle of representation by population to bits. He said that representation by population from province to province was fine but within the provinces, because of county lines and town lines, there should be different interests looked after. Classes and localities should be represented and the principle of members according to population should not be the only one. So with 1882 you begin to get the development of the great discrepancy. You begin to get development of the idea that the rural voter is worth more than the urban voter.

As you hon. gentlemen must be aware, the Conservatives stayed in power until the 1892 redistribution when the Liberals first brought forward from opposition the idea that there should be an independent commission. Sir John Thompson who was the Prime Minister at the time for the Conservative party injected a completely new principle into dividing up the seats. That principle was to do nothing. He said that you should only interfere with representations in those districts where increased population had to be provided for. In other words, you kept the status quo unless a place had developed so much, say in the west, that you gave them another constituency. So you get with that attitude even more the development that the rural constituency remains the same, the larger urban constituency grows, but no provision is made for it and this tends to become a maxim.

One of the arguments brought forward at the time by the Conservatives was that rural members of parliament at the time usually lived in town; for example, most of the members from rural Quebec were not from the rural areas. They were lawyers or solicitors or advocates in the city of Quebec or in the city of Montreal. Therefore the cities really had better representation than you might think. One of the other arguments was that in the city the people were more alert and lively and that therefore they needed less representation. Furthermore they were easier to reach. They had more educational media available to them and the press was more present and therefore they did not need representation as badly as did rural people.

Then in 1892 the Liberals came up with the idea of a commission. Their idea was a commission of judges. This idea has been floating around the Canadian House of Commons ever since. Actually, when the Liberals got in power in 1896 they began to think about doing something about redistribution and for the first time they waived the change after the census. In 1899 they brought in a bill and this was the first adjustment apart from the census. This was the first serious proposal of an outside agency to look after redistribution. Their idea was that judges should be members of the commission because they not only had local connections and understood the counties but they were men of great integrity. The other place or the Senate tossed out these bills and the Liberals brought them back in again in 1900. Again the Conservative Senate refused to pass them. They claimed that this bill was a violation of the spirit of the British North America Act. So the Liberal government had to let it go until 1903 when following the census they brought in another representation act. At this time you get the very first serious provincial dispute. You begin to get the lobbies from the maritimes because Prince Edward Island was dropping drastically and New Brunswick was beginning to drop. So the provincial premiers or the provincial legislatures began to press for some sort of floor under their representation so that it would not sink away in relation to the tremendous growth that was taking place in the west. This came with senatorial floor of 1915.

The constitutional arguments at that time were quite complex. The main point that we need to remember is that the maritime provinces lost their arguments even though they carried them to the supreme court and then over to the privy council in Great Britain. The 1903 readjustment really came up with the idea that still prevails as far as redistribution is concerned, namely the principle that it should be settled by a House of Commons committee. Prior to 1903 the whole thing was settled by the government party. After 1903 there was a small special committee of the House of Commons which put the thing through. The first committee consisted of what we would call in slang "the big wheels". For example, Mr. Borden, who was the head of the opposition at the time was on it. Its members were almost all of cabinet minister or ex-cabinet minister rank. This principle of having representation settled by a committee of the House of Commons has continued right down until 1952 when, as I said earlier, we had a repetitious continuation of the decennial hassle that comes up regularly and in the last redistribution in which the present Prime Minister figured so largely.

In 1923 and 1924, with the redistribution another idea was introduced into the House of Commons committee and that was that it should be broken up into provincial subcommittees and that the members in each province should form a committee or have representation on a committee that would determine the constituency boundaries and just how the division was going to be made.

The whole point in connection with this system of House of Commons committees is that there is really no principle at all involved and I think Mr. Norman Ward in his book "The Canadian House of Commons" at page 46, sets out the whole matter quite clearly as follows:

> At the risk of repetition, it must be emphasized that harmony in the house committee guarantees nothing; as Mr. Mackenzie King has observed, in one of the shrewdest remarks of his long career, "anyone reading the Hansard report....must realize to how small an extent the redistribution being effected at the moment is based upon the foundational principle of the division of the various constituencies according to the general interest of the country as a whole." Although this statement was being applied specifically to the fiasco of 1933, it could be made with equal force concerning even the most peaceful of the eight redistributions which have occurred thus far.
> It does not necessarily follow that redistribution by a house committee is always bad; but it is indisputable that redistribution has so far taken place with reference to none but the vaguest of principles. At one time or another in this contentious history, as we have seen, no less than four principles have been followed: the use of local boundary lines; the adoption of relatively large urban divisions; the establishment of compact divisions; and the equalization of population.
> But one or more of these principles has always been applied in relation to the wishes of a majority in the House of Commons, and when it has been expedient not to observe a principle, it has been conveniently forgotten.

I see that I am approaching the end of my time. I have more material which I wished to present but I think I should cover the main representations which I believe we should keep in our minds in connection with the redistribution. If we set up an independent commission or an independent authority as recommended by this bill we should have some principles to give to the commission under which to operate and I suggest the first principle is representation by population.

It has been suggested to me by one of the gentlemen of the press gallery that you should develop a formula and I hope that hon. members will look at this bill. There was introduced in 1952 by the present Senator Power a bill respecting the division and duties of the redistribution commission and he provisionally set up in his bill an ideal commission and the principles under which it should operate. If you set up an independent commission the principles have to be fairly hard and fast, otherwise the members will not know how they are going to operate. A House of Commons committee is going to have to settle this whole Saskatchewan fiasco, but this is in the future—the question of Saskatchewan dropping three seats—and in the redistribution we have to decide first, is it going to be representation by population. Are we going to have a formula such as that existing in Manitoba, namely seven city votes as against four rural votes? Are we going to have something like Victoria in Australia where you have 22-15-8 formula worked out? My own suggestion, from looking at the question, is that we need to give that commission a principle which allows them a 30 per cent tolerance in assigning constituencies in terms of population, so that we can wipe out many of these tremendous disparities in our present system, as hon. members will see when they look at the statistics. I think the commission should operate within the framework of this representation by population principle with some such tolerance or some other principle to take care of the plain fact that you cannot tailor every constituency in terms of population and you cannot even come close to it in terms of making it equal in area.

However, I would like all hon. members to look at this brief which does show the tremendous disadvantages suffered by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White River-Labrador (Mr. Granger) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Henderson) and myself.

Finally I would like to say that this is an impartial matter and I hope it will be treated as such by all members who take part in this debate. It is not necessarily a party point of view which I am expressing here, although in the past when Mr. Knowles moved an amendment to set up an independent commission he received his strongest support from the present leaders of the government party. However, it is not something which has been confined to the C.C.F. group. Mr. Power, as a Liberal member of this House of Commons, was strongly for it and I believe many of the present government members were for it too.

The bibliography will be in Hansard and I hope that hon. members will follow it up and read the different points of view. Especially would I mention that almost every intelligent writer who has looked at this problem has laughed to scorn members of parliament for their behaviour at redistribution time. Let us therefore, for once, raise the whole dignity of proceedings by starting early —four years before election—and approaching the whole matter on a rational basis so that in four years' time we will not have the stigma of looking like a bunch of rabbits, with all of us standing up, shouting and jeering at the government for steamrolling and having Conservative members throwing their laughter back at us.

These are the main reasons why I believe we should give very serious consideration to the bill before the house at the present time.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question or two. I think he has made a very logical case, but just what does he mean by a committee independent of the parliament of Canada, and does he not think that the suggestion that that committee should report back to parliament would have the effect of watering down its independence?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member was dealt with very ably by the Prime Minister in 1953 when he was outlining the experience in the United Kingdom where they have an independent commission which does report to parliament and, since the first report it brought in, there has been very little argument or change; such changes as have been made being very minor in nature. In Great Britain it has worked very satisfactorily. As a matter of fact, only parliament can pass a redistribution brought in by that commission.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I must say to the hon. member who has presented this bill that I am opposed to it as presented. I think this proposition is another move in the direction of removing from parliament its inherent rights. I feel it is a delegation by parliament of control over its own affairs unless the body or committee is very clearly defined in the bill. My first and main objection to the bill is just this; it is not clear as to just what sort of body or commission is intended to be set up to deal with this very important duty of parliament.

I appreciate that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) has brought in this bill in an effort to get rid of what is known as gerrymandering and I may say that there has been a great deal of this in the past. In the riding which I have the honour to represent, Parry Sound-Muskoka, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) was defeated in 1949 as a result of a gerrymander and, as the hon. member who sponsored the bill has said, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was the hon. member for Lake Centre had his riding not only gerrymandered but eliminated. Fortunately for us, these circumstances only made the Prime Minister determined to seek and win another seat.

There are many other bad examples of gerrymandering, but I contend that the dangers of gerrymandering have been reduced to a point where they are not a serious issue, and I would say there are three main reasons which have brought this about. First, when there were small majorities, in the early days of this country, the changing of election boundaries even in a very limited degree could affect enough people to change the situation in a riding. Secondly, in the early days, we had static populations. This is no longer the case. Thirdly, the days of the die-hard party followers have been reduced or eliminated.

It might be interesting to go into the history of gerrymandering. The practice existed in Britain and in the United States for a good many years, but it fell to the lot of an American to give it a name and to carry it to its ultimate extreme. He was a gentleman by the name of Elbridge Gerry who was very prominent in the early years of the nineteenth century in the political circles of the United States. He was a member of congress, a governor of Massachusetts and, in 1812, Vice-President of the United States.

While governor of Massachusetts he became especially noted for his ingenuity in carving up ridings in the senatorial districts of his state in a very unusual manner. One such riding was carved up by taking a pocket here and leaving a pocket there in such a way that all his opponents votes were cast in one place. When the outlines of the riding thus created were placed on a map it looked like a salamander, and political opponents named the affair a "gerrymander" after Mr. Gerry. That is the reason for the word, and also the background against which the practice was carried on at that time.

I do feel that such gerrymandering as took place in 1812 would not be tolerated at the present time. When it was carried out, it was done to the discredit of those who were responsible. Furthermore, it is not always profitable, as those who carved up certain ridings prior to the general election of 1949 discovered to their sorrow. Aside from this, there are three practical reasons in support of this contention, as I have already mentioned.

The first is that majorities are increasing. In the early days of this country members were elected by a very small margin of votes. Let us consider my own riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka. I find that in the first election of 1872, the majority for the successful candidate was 121. In 1878, the majority was 63, and in 1882 it was four. But since 1935 a very different picture has been presented. In that year, for instance, the majority was 2,265. In 1940 it was 1,691; in 1949 it was 1,820 and so forth down to 1957 when the majority was 3,853.

Only a few days ago the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk), when outlining the history of his riding, reminded us that at the first election there an equal number of votes was cast for each of the two candidates and as a result of some manoeuvring at that time both were elected. For the first ten elections, the majority to the successful candidate never amounted to more than 500 votes. However, in the eight elections since 1926 the majority has never been less than 1,000. In more recent times, the majorities have been even greater.

Related to this is the second matter I mentioned—static population. The population of Canada is no longer static. Population shifts are more frequent; travel is more extensive; immigration has changed the nature of many ridings, and a good many of our immigrants are now becoming entitled to vote. People move more rapidly from one area to another. In these circumstances the deliberate gerrymandering of seats might nowadays not even bring about the desired result by the time the next election rolled around.

The third matter I mentioned concerned the floating vote. We have noticed in recent times that people are beginning to vote as they see things rather than as their fathers saw them, and in recent elections we have observed that when there is a swing there is a massive swing in one direction or the other. To a large extent, therefore, a gerrymander which would gain a party a few votes would not necessarily be enough, unless it were terrific in scale, to ensure a riding for a particular candidate. Thus I say that the dangers of deliberately contrived gerrymandering are no longer a serious factor.

But even if this were not so, I should still be opposed to the bill for another reason. I am firmly of the opinion that we already have too many government commissions, crown companies and boards, directing the affairs of Canada, making decisions which should be made by parliament or the government, spending large sums of money and remaining responsible to no one for their decisions. They are independent, and the elected representatives of the people of Canada have no control over these commissions in any effective way. They have been established in very secure positions, and they have been removed from political interference.

To whom are these commissions responsible? The elected members of this house are responsible to their constituents, and if they fail to carry out their duties in a satisfactory manner a very easy way to replace them is to vote against them at the next election. Whenever duties are passed on to a commission or to a board which is not responsible to anyone it adds just one more link to the chain which is getting away from responsible government. The enactment of the bill before us would create a body, and I quote from the bill—

—independent of the parliament of Canada.

As I said, the parliament of Canada represents the people of Canada and each of its members is responsible to the people for its actions. It is less than 100 years since we in Canada secured what we would term responsible government; indeed, it is approximately only 27 years since the Statute of Westminster made us a completely self-governing, responsible country. Since that time the process toward responsible government seems to have been reversing itself. I regret the continual moves that have taken us away from this position to a situation wherein we have boards, commissions and bodies governing extremely important aspects of the affairs of the country and being responsible to no one. Each step seems to be designed to take power away from the representatives of the people and I am opposed to this trend.

The bill as presented does not indicate what type of body would be set up and that to my mind is the most serious weakness in it. Before parliament surrenders any of its inherent rights I feel it must know to whom the rights are being surrendered. It must know what sort of body, commission or board is being established and it must know what type of people and how many will comprise the particular commission and what its responsibilities are. By supporting this bill we would be surrendering the rights of parliament without knowing to whom we were surrendering them. I would be strongly opposed to delegating any such authority until the responsible body is clearly spelled out and even then I would want to examine closely the composition of the body to whom this authority would be delegated. I could not possibly support the bill in its present form.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I am against this bill which is meant to introduce in subsection (1) of section 51 of the British North America Act, 1867, the underlined words:

independent of the parliament of Canada.

I do not approve of amending the British North America Act. If amendments are considered, let a conference be held of the provinces which gave birth to the confederation pact of 1867. It is time to put a stop to those repeated assaults which scoff at the provinces.

Since 1867, there have been about seven amendments to the constitution and, for the most part, they were made without consulting the parties concerned, the provinces.

In 1871, for instance, the United Kingdom parliament passed an amendment granting the parliament of Canada the right to create provinces and to deal with their representation in the House of Commons. I think that this amendment validated an act concerning Manitoba.

In 1886, there was another amendment authorizing the federal government to form, within parliament, a representation for the territories, even if they did not enjoy provincial status. I understand that this act corroborated the representation already granted to some of the territories.

In 1915, another amendment aimed at increasing the number of senators provided that the number of representatives attributed to a province in the House of Commons be not less than the number of senators to which it was entitled.

In 1943 another amendment put off until the first post-war session the redistribution which should have followed the census of 1941.

Then in 1946 there was another amendment which laid down new rules governing the number of members in the House of Commons.

Finally, in 1949, as part of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada, there was an amendment providing for a certain representation from that province.

Moreover, two orders of the Imperial Council established the representation of the provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island.

Another amendment, adopted in 1916, was designed to extend the life of parliament.

In 1949, parliament amended the constitution in respect of the adjustment of representation in this house. But the government of the day should have consulted the provinces.

In 1951 the British North America Act was once more amended by unilateral action, without provincial consent. However, no provision had been made in that regard in the 1867 act which would have given the federal government the right to amend the constitution. And when the present government sat in opposition it made its views clearly known in the historic debate which took place during the fall session of 1949, with regard to a government proposal to amend the British North America Act in order to allow the federal government to amend the constitution on matters which were held to be of a purely federal nature.

In fact, on October 17, 1949, the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, immediately proposed the following amendment on behalf of the official opposition, as is recorded in page 841 of Hansard of that date:

That the said proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the first word "that" and substituting therefor the following:

"That His Excellency the Governor General in Council be requested to convoke as soon as may be possible a constitutional convention of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments to devise a method of amending within Canada the constitution of Canada, and of safeguarding minority rights; so that such method may become the subject later of an humble address, when adopted, to His Majesty the King praying an amendment of the British North America Act, 1867, accordingly."

Furthermore, the now Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) stated also, during the same debate:

We are confronted here with the fundamental issue of respect for the Canadian constitution. On that issue we of the official opposition take an inflexible position that there is no right in this government or in this parliament to proceed to legislate now for the purpose of amending section 51 of the British North America Act without consultation with the provinces. So far as that kind of consultation is concerned, we say that in the light of history it is abundantly clear that we would not have had a united Canada and would not have had confederation had there not been some basis of agreement on the part of the initiating parties inscribed in the Quebec resolutions and later in the British North America Act. This is the basis upon which Canada came into being, and notwithstanding all the sophistry that has been uttered in the house on the subject of the great powers of the central government I say to you, sir, that we ignore and do violence both to the letter and the spirit of confederation by seeking, in the manner proposed by the government——of the time, which was the Liberal government—

—in the present bill and on other occasions, to ride roughshod over the British North America Act.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind hon. members of the wise statements of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe about the British North America Act. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for instance, made in this house, in 1907, a speech that has remained famous.

Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it and I submit that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

I should think this is clear enough. May I also quote the words of the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, in a speech he delivered in the House of Commons in 1924:

The British North America Act and the limitations which are imposed upon our powers, if there are any such limitations, are made of our own free will. There is no inferiority in that. It is the result of a treaty, as my hon. friend from Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien) has pointed out.

And further:

Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper".

(Text):

Mr. Winch: May we have a copy of the speech now being read?

Mr. Chambers: He is not reading; he is quoting.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member would not know the difference.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am quoting words of former members of the House of Commons.

Allow me to quote the late Hon. Ernest Lapointe who, in 1925, said in this house:

Surely, the British North America Act cannot be made a scrap of paper, as the neutrality treaty was made at that time. There is a way, perhaps, yes; but the only way is the friendly way, is the legal way, is the constitutional way. It is to approach the various parties to the agreement with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the changes which may be necessary and which may be agreed upon by all the parties to the pact. As I have said, I do not think there could be any other way; I believe that any arbitrary action in the matter would simply defeat its own purpose and would strike at the root of our national unity. I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end.

I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the one way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the members of the C.C.F. party wish to amend the Canadian constitution, I must say that I agree with the late Mr. Ernest Lapointe. Let the contracting parties, that is the provinces, be consulted and, after the matter has been discussed with the federal government, if there is need for an amendment, it will be brought about but, of course, with the agreement and the approval of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, to show that I disapprove of this bill, I have quoted the words of great Liberal leaders of the past who stated in this house that no amendment should be made to the British North America Act before consultation with the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the federal government should insist on setting up a commission whose function would be to study the readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons.

As far as my constituency is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express this wish: I would like it to be kept as it is: one of the finest. Of course, it is one of the largest in the country but, just the same, I should like it to remain as it is, since I had the honour of being a candidate there and while the former member, Mr. Breton, had been elected with a majority of 15,200 votes, the people of my constituency gave me one of 6,372. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I should like to express the very legitimate wish of keeping my constituency intact although it is one of the largest in the country.

I am opposed, therefore, to this bill, because it is at variance with fundamental principles; if the Canadian constitution is to be modified some day, it would be logical and indispensable that the provinces be consulted.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the bill introduced by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member whose constituency I cannot recall, and I would have liked to know exactly what was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. All I can say is:—and I apologize for the way I say it—Monsieur l'Orateur, je ne peux pas parler français. I understand that he opposes the bill.

This bill is not only an interesting one but it is one which is required in our country. The hon. member who spoke prior to the last speaker said that it was taking away the power of parliament. It is doing no such thing. It is asking that as far as the establishment of voting rights of constituencies are concerned it shall be determined on a non-political basis.

An hon. Member: Is that not the way it is done now?

Mr. Winch: The hon. member does not fully realize what he said. I have had the honour now of being a member of this House of Commons for only five years. Prior to that I was 20 years in the legislature of British Columbia and in that 20 years I was twice named as a member of a redistribution bill committee. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members, that of all the committees convened by parliament the dirtiest and the rottenest and the most difficult to be on is the redistribution bill committee, and I have been on one twice in British Columbia. You can be as altruistic as you like; you can be as eloquent, sir, as they want to be on the other side of the house, I am telling you that the dirtiest, rottenest job that a man in parliament can have is to be a member of a redistribution bill committee.

An hon. Member: You said that.

Mr. Winch: I said it and I am repeating it.

Yes, you can even be a C.C.F. member, and it is a rotten job, because as a member of parliament and a member of the committee you have the job of outlining the area of constituencies; the number of voters in constituencies and how many members there shall be—it is hell. I know it. Do not tell me that it is not the same on the federal basis as it is on the provincial. Irrespective of your party representation you are, first of all, faced with a committee that has to work out the representation on a logical basis. As a member of the committee you want to protect you own constituency and your own party. As soon as the committee submits its first report, then every member of every party comes to members of the committee and wants changes made here and there. Let us be honest, you should know this is a fact.

The hon. member spoke about gerrymandering. Of course, any time you have a parliamentary committee that has to deal with the breaking up of constituencies and the realignment of constituencies, there is gerrymandering. Surely, that is what we all should want to get away from. We do in the C.C.F., and we hope the government and official opposition do too. The only way this can be accomplished is to have the work done by a committee, completely outside of parliament.

Is there anyone in this House of Commons who would dare stand in his place and say that he does not want an unbiased, scientific analysis of Canada, a scientific basis for representation in this House of Commons? This cannot be accomplished except by people not directly connected with politics. If any member of the government, the opposition or the C.C.F. tells me it can, I say he is a liar because it cannot. Personal prejudice, constituency prejudice and party prejudice all enter the picture because we are all human and subject to human frailties.

I would not like to close my seat after 25 years and no other member would either whether he is here 25 years or only two months.

Mr. Halpenny: You will get a pension.

Mr. Winch: I am honest; are you honest?

Mr. Halpenny: I have on a red carnation, how could I be honest?

Mr. Winch: I have been here in Ottawa and in Victoria for 25 years. Twice during that time I have been on redistribution committees. I say, as a member of the C.C.F. and believing I am honest, that you cannot be honest on that kind of committee. You cannot be honest, because personal interest, personal prejudice and party interest all enter the picture.

An hon. Member: Is that so?

Mr. Winch: Are you afraid to hear from an honest man?

Mr. Ricard: You cannot be honest without being in the C.C.F.

An hon. Member: Are you sure about that?

Mr. Ricard: We can be honest; we have been honest all the time.

Mr. Habel: Are you sure about that?

Mr. Ricard: You are sure of that.

Mr. Winch: I did not catch what my hon. friend said, but I will say this. When the vote on this bill is taken, I intend to watch very carefully to see where he stands to be counted.

Mr. Ricard: You stand just because there is enough desk around you.

Mr. Winch: I do not see any halo around you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order; I must remind hon. members that they must address the chair and not each other.

Mr. Winch: One of our members has introduced a bill asking this House of Commons, in plenty of time, to establish a basis for representation in the house by constituencies and by provinces by a completely scientific analysis, completely free of any political interest whatever. I believe it will be 1962 before the bill can come into effect. The final bill concerning representation by provinces and by constituencies must be passed by this House of Commons and the other place. The final authority rests with the House of Commons and the other place. This bill now before us requests that the law be amended so the decision shall be made on a nonpolitical basis.

I fail completely to understand why a member of any party in this house could object to that scientific, nonpolitical basis. The final authority rests with the House of Commons, and I sincerely hope that the members of this house, when it comes to a matter of this nature being nonpartisan, will support the bill.

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks concerning this bill I should like to deal in some detail with some of the matters raised by the hon. member who preceded me and, I must confess, some of the rather astonishing implications, perhaps philosophical implications, of the comments that he made. I recall, in particular, his fervent, moving comments concerning the dirty, rotten redistribution committee on which he said he had the privilege of serving while a member of the British Columbia legislature.

Might I suggest in passing that it seems to me rather typical of those who occupy the eight lonely seats in the corner—

Mr. Peters: They are never lonely.

Mr. McGee: —that when they are handed something which is dirty and rotten, according to their own definition, their first reaction is to pass the buck to somebody else.

The somebody else to whom these dirty, rotten and other tasks are passed has always fascinated me about the philosophy of this little group in the corner; because in passing these things, things such as the control of the economy and other such matters that this group advance as their solution to the problems of Canada today, the powers they impute to the men who will make up these powers and to whom they pass their dirty rotten jobs from time to time, are incapable of solving them. For instance, if I may be allowed a "for instance", who is going to produce this planned economy?

Mr. Fisher: I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. member is far off course.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Speaking to the point of order, may I say this. Surely the hon. member is allowed to lay the groundwork for what he intends to say in connection with this debate. My hon. friends have not even given him that chance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I felt that the hon. member was laying the groundwork. Therefore, if he will continue we will save time.

Mr. Pickersgill: With a tar brush.

Mr. McGee: I notice that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is protesting. Is he doing so on behalf of this little group in the corner?

Mr. Pickersgill: I was saying that the hon. member seemed to be laying his groundwork with a tar brush. That was a purely objective observation.

An hon. Member: You profess to be a judge, do you?

Mr. Pickersgill: A member of the public.

Mr. McGee: The other comment which interested me—and I hope no hon. members will object to my commenting on the remarks of the member who preceded me, much less the hon. member himself;—it seems to me that that is the purpose of debate in this house, namely to comment on matters referred to in the speech of the member who precedes one in this debate or in any debate for that matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: One irrelevancy deserves another.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): There is no better judge of that.

Mr. McGee: As to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, when the history of this country is written and the students of future years examine Hansard they will wonder who in the world this wonderful person was who presumed to participate in virtually every other member's speech in the house.

Mr. Habel: They may find it is you.

Mr. Winch: In view of what the hon. member has said, is he going to comment on my remarks that politics should have no connection with redistribution? I have been saying that for a while now.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, I have been honestly trying to come to my point. My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who seems to be incapable of remaining silent for more than about 15 minutes at any given time, has interrupted. Two members from the lonesome eight in the corner have interrupted. I should very much like to get on to the body of my remarks. This statement is my final comment on the philosophy of your group. I think it has been said far better than I can say it by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) who said "he represents what I call the socialist doctrine of the assumption of the monopoly of virtue." Yet I find it is in curious contrast to the statement made by the hon. member to the effect that we are all human, implying that there was something sort of nasty about this process of the state of being, a statement with which I do not mind telling my hon. friend I do not agree.

Mr. Winch: Are you not human?

Mr. McGee: In acknowledging that fact I do not associate myself with the characteristics of the hon. member who originated the statement. We are all human beings, yes, but different human beings.

Mr. Winch: Have you no frailties?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I must again remind hon. members that they should and must address the chair.

Mr. Winch: I will address you, Mr. Speaker. Is my hon. friend prepared to sing his own praises now and to say that he has no frailties of a human being?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): That is not a question, I do not think. Will the hon. member continue?

Mr. Winch: It is a question that he will not answer.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be an unnecessary question.

An hon. Member: He wants you to confess.

Mr. McGee: In pursuing this matter of commenting on the content of the remarks of the speaker who preceded me, my effort is obviously not destined to be too successful in view of the number of interruptions. I think every hon. member of this house agrees that there is a need to achieve a fair redistribution. Following along with the idea of this matter of fairness I think it behooves us to examine the actions of past parliaments which dealt with redistribution, to observe the degree of fairness which they exhibited towards certain political decisions, not the least of which was the gerrymandering of the former riding of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to examine the record of those former governments in such matters. This is like many of the matters, resolutions, private bills and motions being put forward by the lonesome eight. I think they are fighting a lost battle; that they are protesting where protest is no longer required; that they are in the words of a certain gentleman who wrote an article recently in an edition of the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, "becalmed in a protest movement". They make noises similar to those of bygone days but their point and purpose is lost.

Certain interesting notions manifested themselves in the redistribution of 1952, such as the notion that the ridings of the party leaders—and this one intrigued me—should be left unhampered. In other words, certain basic principles or governing principles were being laid down then with a series of notable exceptions. I was going to deal with the specifics of this matter in far more detail but owing to the fact that I have been interrupted on such frequent occasions I find that my time is considerably diminished.

However, I will deal just with this basic notion, if you will permit me to do so, Mr. Speaker, of the position of the opposition parties in this parliament. It may be that this parliament will be responsible for redistribution and then again it may not. It is by no means a certainty, as I understand the facts and as I have studied this matter, that redistribution will occur before the next election. This certainly leads me to a side issue, Mr. Speaker, but if you will allow I would say that I do not think an independent body or group can make the specific decisions concerning the riding boundaries in local areas. The problem of defining specific boundaries must be within the control of persons who know more about these matters than anybody else.

This goes along with the notion of the C.C.F. that we should have experts to deal with these things. I do not know about the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but I consider myself as something of an expert on my own riding and I think this is true of every member in every quarter of this house. Who, better than you, is qualified to make political value judgments about boundaries and possible changes in your riding; who, by self-interest, by political education or otherwise, is better qualified for that task? I would remind the hon. member who sponsored this motion and those in his group who are supporting it that this is the essential weakness in handing over, holus-bolus, to an independent commission responsibility for specific knowledge of this kind.

I read in Norman Ward's article in the Journals of 1953 of the many complex problems which manifested themselves at that time and what occurs to me is that an independent body, agreed to by members of this house, should meet now or very shortly, not to effect redistribution but to lay down certain general principles, acceptable to every member and every group in this house as far as such agreement is possible. Having agreed upon those principles which affect the limiting of percentages, lost seats in provinces and diminishing representation in relation to the total, and the problems which are obviously going to manifest themselves as mentioned in the Gordon report for example with respect to the 15 metropolitan areas which in 1951 had 5,190,000 inhabitants and which by 1980 will have approximately 12 million inhabitants, these and similar problems should all be considered by such a body. There are statistics and facts available for the use of such a body to enable them to agree on the basic redistribution principles.

Where I part company with my friend in the corner is at this point. I believe that having laid down these principles, having achieved concurrence in this house, then the matter should come before the house with respect to questions of detail. Yes, it is going to be give and take; yes, it is going to be horse trading; yes, it is going to be a lot of things, but I do not think it is going to be dirty or rotten or filthy, and I do not think the ugly side of human nature is going to manifest itself in quite the degree suggested by my hon. friend. We in this house must ultimately be the masters of our own political future, and I would suggest, particularly to my hon. friends in the corner, that they rest easy because if the treatment they receive as a result of re-distribution is consistent with the treatment they receive, have received and will receive from this government—with, mind you, the largest majority in the history of this country—in terms of allotment of speaking time, in terms of committees and the increased powers of committees, then they will come out of redistribution in a far better position than any other opposition group which has ever been represented in this house.

Mr. Fisher: May I say, Mr. Speaker that I hope the hon. gentleman who has just sat down does not believe the bill was introduced because we thought we were going to be badly treated.

(Translation):

Mr. Remi Paul (Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere): Mr. Speaker, if we refer to the B.N.A. Act, we note that the fathers of confederation, in order to ensure a distribution of electoral seats which might really meet the needs of the people, provided under section 8 for a compulsory ten-year census, and under section 51, for a distribution of electoral seats based on such census.

The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), in introducing his bill, would like somehow to suggest to the house that the distribution of electoral seats should be done in a manner completely different from the one now in use. I am in full agreement with my hon. friend the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) when he explained a moment ago that any amendment to the B.N.A. Act should be a matter for unanimous consent by all provinces and the federal government, because it is a pact. On the other hand, the bill submitted to this house aims at finding a remedy or, at least a method of implementing section 51 of the B.N.A. Act. And the hon. member for Port Arthur wants the distribution of seats in the house to be handled by a body or rather by a commission independent of parliament.

To me it is inconceivable that hon. members of this house should not be called upon to give their own views on redistribution, because they, more than anyone should be familiar with the overall pattern of this country, as they are representing all its ridings. On the other hand, I am not in favour of creating a body or commission, which would not come under the immediate jurisdiction of the House of Commons.

This is in fact an opinion expressed some years ago by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King in 1933. If we refer to the official record of this house for 1952, pages 3897 and following, we will see that there was a discussion in the house on this matter when there was before it a proposed redistribution of seats. At that time, as previously, all party leaders were unanimous in suggesting the setting up of a commission or body of that type. Some hon. members even went so far as to suggest the setting up of a committee composed of judges. I cannot see hon. judges, who are removed from politics, having to travel from one point to another in this country in order to carry out a work of a purely political nature.

I believe that all members of the opposition, among whom are hon. members of the C.C.F. party, as well as members of the party in power, are unanimous in looking for a solution which would be such as to make it clearer to the Canadian people why such and such change is being made during the redistribution of electoral seats. The people are not sufficiently informed on the reasons that would justify a committee of the house to make certain changes such as, lopping off part of a constituency and adding it to another one. Some people cannot understand the real meaning of a census in this regard and, consequently, they cannot realize why such a change is made.

Well, the establishment of an independent body or commission which could be made up of economists or surveyors appointed by the provincial and federal governments would be one way of ensuring a fairer distribution of constituencies. As regards the number of constituencies in each of the provinces, the ten provinces would have to be consulted and then the house could consider the report of such a commission. Besides, the house would always have the power to accept or reject such a report.

At present, the redistribution of electoral seats is made by a committee which sets up one or more sub-committees to consider the need, the advantages or the necessity of redistributing the ridings. Whoever we are, we are human, and naturally we tend to protect members of our own party who might perhaps lose a large section of their riding. So much so that a member, with no ill intention perhaps, might accede to the request of a colleague which however might not truly meet the economic situation.

We are 265 members coming from different parts of Canada and I do not think that any one member can be familiar with the economic needs of every part of the country. A committee made up of 40 or 50 members would not be able to study the real needs of the country as a whole and, as I said a moment ago, this committee could instinctively make decisions which would not be in the interest of the population at large. Furthermore, in these serious times, when our parliamentary institutions seem to be directly attacked by ideologies contrary to our own, it is our utmost duty to try to improve that situation in order that this need which comes up every ten years may be truly met according to local conditions and according to the population of each of the electoral ridings.

As I said a few moments ago, we could appoint economists or land surveyors who would study the main reasons for a certain number of electors to be included in one electoral constituency, rather than in another.

I believe that the members of parliament would be the true spokesmen of the people they represent because, at the present time, some constituencies are too often made up in large part of a labour population side by side with a rural population. The mentality and the needs of each of the group composing those constituencies are often quite different and there might be some advantage in distributing the seats in such a way that the urban population of one constituency be 25 per cent higher than its rural population.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the bill proposed by the hon. member for Port Arthur deserves a detailed discussion. The opinions I am expressing tonight are not personal opinions; they are the consequence, the result of research I made in different speeches delivered on the matter.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this bill deserves our attention because the difficulty of ensuring an equitable distribution of electoral seats in any country is here complicated by the necessity of taking into account the various economic and social interests of the different racial groups, the growth of our population and its movements, and of making allowance, in the cities, for the economic conditions and, in the country, for new areas.

In spite of the evident and legitimate goodwill of all those members who would sit on the committee entrusted with the task of studying the redistribution of Commons seats, I fail to see how the solutions they would put forward would really satisfy the needs of the various groups in this country. As things stand, hon. members must speak on behalf of their constituents. Now these problems are different, and for this reason I do feel that it would be better to set up an independent commission.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that I support the bill moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur, provided that the commission that might be established be responsible to the House of Commons for its work so that the house may have the final say and even give orders with respect to the kind of research to be made in order that redistribution in the future may be more to the advantage of all and each of the voters of this country.

(Text):

Mr. Egan Chambers (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we have before us this evening a most important subject. There can be few things more important in a democracy than trying to assure for the people an adequate reasonable and equitable representation in the legislature.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) for bringing this matter to our attention once more. I also wish to commend him on the great amount of research that he has obviously done into the history and background of redistribution as it has been practised in this country in the past and as it is practised in other countries.

The particular method that this bill proposes to use to change our system of redistribution is one of amendment to the British North America Act. I would imagine that in choosing this method the hon. member had in mind creating something of permanence. Section 51 of the British North America Act is one of those sections that is susceptible of amendment in Canada by this house.

In the meeting of the special committee of this house on redistribution in 1952 Dr. P. M. Ollivier, parliamentary counsel of the House of Commons, noted that the British North America Act, No. 2, 1949, introduced an amendment to section 91 of the British North America Act of 1867 which relates to the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. He explained that by this amendment it was made lawful for the parliament of Canada to amend the Canadian constitution with certain exceptions which are enumerated in the amendment. Sections 51, 51(a) and 52 do not fall within these exceptions and can, therefore, be amended by the federal parliament.

The point that should be noted is that we can amend the act at this time to create the commission the hon. member seeks to have established but there is nothing to prevent a future parliament from amending it again to revert to the old system or to introduce another system. The law as it reads today is adequate to provide for the setting up of a commission for redistribution, as I understand it. Section 51(1) of the British North America Act provides in effect that on the completion of each decennial census the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons may be readjusted by such authority, in such a manner and from such time as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to certain rules relating to the proportionate representation of the provinces.

The idea of the hon. member for Port Arthur is to remove this right from the powers of parliament. I submit this is impossible and that the amendment, itself being amendable by parliament as I have said, would not have that effect. The subject matter and principle of this bill have great merit and I feel that perhaps a great deal of reform could be usefully introduced in our electoral institutions. I hope that a committee of this house will soon be empowered to look into the subject of the Canada Elections Act and the question of redistribution.

As the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out, the subject of redistribution has plagued—I was going to say succeeding governments, but it has really plagued succeeding oppositions down through the years. I come from a riding which has shrunk since the last redistribution. There has been a great deal of changing of residences into commercial properties, widening of streets and other things involving the removal of residential properties. Under any system of redistribution I imagine that the riding of St. Lawrence-St. George would be profoundly affected.

However, I feel I must agree with what was said earlier by an hon. member to the effect that if the day has not passed when great advantage can be gained for a party by control of redistribution it certainly is well on its way to having gone. The introduction and development of mass communication systems which brings the voices of leaders of the various parties to people all across the country has served to eliminate what in so many cases could be referred to as safe seats or protected pockets of people. I do not anticipate much objection when the time comes for redistribution on a fair and equitable basis. Of course, it would be impossible to redistribute the seats in this house in a manner that would make everybody happy, but on the basis of what has been said in this debate I believe that the hon. member for Port Arthur may be assured that when this matter comes up, as it no doubt will—and I hope along with him that it comes up soon before the fire horses begin to hear the bells of another election—he will find in evidence the mood that has been expressed in the speeches we have heard tonight—one of give and take and fair play for all concerned—and it is possible that a commission, better defined than that proposed in his bill, will be established. Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Fisher: How naive can you be?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the hon. gentleman who is leading the house if the business which was indicated last evening will be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall continue with the estimates of the Minister of Public Works. Unfortunately, the business which was indicated last evening, the continued debate on NORAD, will not go on tomorrow. The Prime Minister, you will recall, adjourned the debate. Due to the presence of a very distinguished guest tomorrow, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, our Prime Minister will be very busy and unfortunately will not be able to continue.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister indicate when the Prime Minister proposes to conclude the debate on NORAD?

Mr. Brooks: I could not give a definite indication, but some time next week.

Mr. McIlraith: What about the business for Monday?

Mr. Brooks: That will be announced tomorrow.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, before you adjourn, may I ask if in view—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Winch: —of the unfortunate situation of a week ago it is the intention to ring the bells tomorrow morning to summon hon. members to the chamber to hear the remarks of our distinguished visitor?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): That was announced by Mr. Speaker today. The bell will sound at 9.50 a.m.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You should come down and listen to us some time, Harold.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MARCEL GRENIER

Question No. 47—Mr. Rouleau:

1. Was Mr. Marcel Grenier appointed to a permanent position by the civil service commission as auditor in the office of the district auditor's office of the unemployment insurance commission at St. Jerome, Quebec, in October, 1952?
2. Was Mr. Grenier dismissed in July, 1956?
3. If so, on what grounds?
4. Was an order in council passed pursuant to section 52, Civil Service Act, chapter 48, R.S.C., 1952?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour):

1. Yes, effective September 1, 1952.
2. Yes, effective July 5, 1956.
3. Failure to comply with instructions with regard to travelling expense accounts.
4. No.

RADIOACTIVITY TESTS

Question No. 59—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Have recent tests been made in the level of radioactivity with regard to permissible limits?
2. Do these permissible limits correspond to those laid down by the national committee on radiation protection and measurement in the United States?
3. Are tests made of samples of milk to determine whether or not radioactivity exceeds the maximum permissible concentration for regular consumption?
4. According to the latest tests in Canada, what has been the concentration of strontium 90 found in milk samples?
5. Have other foods been selected for purposes of testing radioactivity levels in Canada?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. Yes.
2. The recommendations of the international commission on radiological protection serve as a guide to the radiation protection work of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The United States national committee on radiation protection and measurement works in close co-operation with the international commission, and their recommended maximum permissible levels correspond closely.
3. Yes.
4. The strontium 90 content of the milk powder samples tested in February ranged from about 4 to about 15 micromicrocuries per gram of calcium. These figures may have to be slightly revised when further calibration data are available.
5. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11.30 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED FUND TO HELP UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister care to comment on a news report in this morning's edition of the Globe and Mail to the effect, and I now quote:

—that the Canadian ministers were cool to Macmillan's plan to create a one thousand million dollar fund for loans to help the economies of underdeveloped countries.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the Prime Minister feels that is something he would wish to deal with, but it seems to me to be a straight question of policy.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

QUEBEC—LAY-OFFS IN SHOPS AT QUEBEC, CHARNY AND CHICOUTIMI

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): In the absence of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Labour. Has the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Transport, now that he is back, received a telegram from the president of the Quebec and district labour council protesting against the lay-offs of employees working as machinists' helpers in the C.N.R. shops in Quebec, Charny and Chicoutimi? If so, has the minister taken any action to see that those employees are reinstated?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have not received such a telegram.

Mr. Bourget: I have a supplementary question. Owing to the fact that the minister has answered that he has not received this telegram, could I send him a copy and would he care to take action?

Mr. Hees: As I have pointed out on almost countless occasions, before any lay-offs are made by the management of the C.N.R. every possible investigation is made with regard to the possibilities of keeping the men employed. I will speak to the C.N.R. about this matter, but I feel sure it has been treated in exactly the same way as have other matters that have been brought up in this house and about which I have spoken many times. I know that the Canadian National Railways management re-employs these men just as soon as there is any work to justify their re-employment. They feel just as badly as I do and as I am sure every hon. member of this house does when it is necessary to lay off any single employee of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Bourget: I would like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the numerous lay-offs which have occurred in the past few months, would the minister consider arranging a special meeting with the C.N.R. management to deal with this whole question of C.N.R. lay-offs?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned some time ago in making an announcement in this house, the Canadian National Railways are employing an additional 5,000 men this summer. That is two or three times the number of people they will be laying off. The number of people re-employed or given summer employment will be several times the number it is necessary to lay off because jobs simply do not exist for them, and every priority will be given to those who are laid off with respect to this new employment program of the C.N.R. this summer.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question of the minister. What action is being taken by the C.N.R. or by the minister with reference to the lay-offs to which my hon. friend has referred? During this week there have been two or three such lay-offs. Has any action been taken, or is any action being taken, by the C.N.R. or by the minister with reference to those lay-offs?

Mr. Hees: As I have told members of this house, and I will be glad to point this out again to the hon. member, before any lay-off is carried out every possible means of keeping the man employed is examined. He is laid off only when there is simply no work for him to do. As long as there is any possibility of employing him in his job he will be so employed. If there is any chance of his being employed on the additional work being provided through the summer maintenance program, for right of way maintenance and so on, then he will be given top priority for such employment. I do not think any hon. member can believe that the Canadian National Railways are acting in any way that is not completely fair in respect to this whole matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not suggesting that they are, but I would like to know if the minister could tell us how many of these people who are being laid off are being re-employed?

Mr. Hees: Just as many as it is possible to re-employ in the new work that is being undertaken this summer, and just as many as are willing to do that kind of new work.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HERRIDGE—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON JUNE 12

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I trust I am in order, Mr. Speaker, because I want to rise on a question of privilege. When my bill to amend the Railway Act was under discussion yesterday afternoon the Minister of Transport, as reported at page 1075 of Hansard, said as follows:

> I have discussed the amendment with the board and its opinion is that the Railway Act already gives the board jurisdiction to prevent unwarranted reduction of train service and to entertain applications and complaints of municipalities and other interested parties regarding the adequacy of existing train service and any changes that may be proposed. In a word, the board considers that the amendment would not give to it powers that it does not now hold.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to quote from a letter I have received from Mr. C. W. Rump, acting secretary of the board—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would first indicate what is his question of privilege.

Mr. Herridge: My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is that the minister misinformed the house with respect to the value of my amendment. The minister claimed my amendment did not give the board additional powers, but the letter from the board indicates—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: —that it would have given additional powers.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that is a matter which should have been disposed of in the debate yesterday. After all, it is a question of opinion and argument. The hon. member and others spoke in the debate. This question of privilege is raised with respect to something which was said in that debate, and which was said before the hon. member closed the debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I rise on this question because, unfortunately I was not here yesterday. I looked at the statement made by the minister and that made by the hon. member who is now raising the question of privilege, and it was not possible for the hon. member to raise this question yesterday during the course of the debate. He has here in his hand, I am informed, a letter from the secretary of the board of transport commissioners indicating a position contrary to that taken by the minister. I feel he should be allowed to put it on the record, and the minister should be allowed to make a statement indicating what his position is vis-à-vis that of the secretary of the board of transport commissioners. I believe this procedure would be as fair to the minister as it would be to the hon. member.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I point out that in this debate yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West made his opening speech. The Minister of Transport also spoke, and the hon. member for Kootenay West closed the debate. That was his chance to bring up any answer. Surely he is not entitled to do so now under the guise of a question of privilege and make a further reply to something that was said yesterday. If he had other material he should have brought it to the attention of the house yesterday.

Mr. Herridge: I was going to ask the minister a question. Would he consult with the board and inform the house who is correct?

Mr. Speaker: I will permit that question to be asked, but we are departing from the point of privilege which I want to dispose of now. Assuming the minister's statement was not correct, it still does not present any question of privilege that I am able to see. There is no reflection upon any member of the house or on the house or its proceedings. It seems to me that what the hon. member is really trying to do is reopen the debate. Unless he has some further point I cannot see that this matter can be raised as a question of privilege.

Mr. Herridge: My point of privilege is this. The opinion which the minister gave to the house had a disastrous effect on the support given to my bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): With great respect, sir, is it not a question of privilege if a minister inadvertently misinforms the house about a bill upon which a vote is to be taken, and in that way influences the vote on that bill?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I can clear this up. Yesterday when I spoke in this house what I said was based entirely on information given to me by the board of transport commissioners as to what their powers and responsibilities are in this matter. What I said still stands. The privileges of municipalities, according to the information given to me by the board, are as I said in this house yesterday. There is not one word of what I said yesterday which I would feel requires to be changed in any way, shape or form.

RIGHT HON. HAROLD MACMILLAN

INCLUSION OF ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT IN PROCEEDINGS OF TODAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): May I ask the leave of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I would move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson):

That the address of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Right Hon. Harold Macmillan, before members of the Senate and of the House of Commons in the chamber of the House of Commons this day, together with the introductory and related speeches, be included in the House of Commons Debates and form part of the permanent records of this parliament.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—ALLEGED ARREARS ON MORTGAGE LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the statement of the head of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation concerning the number of people who are falling into arrears in their monthly payments on mortgage loans, would the minister consider making a public statement on this matter setting out the government's position on a moratorium on foreclosures in cases where illness or unemployment is a factor?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is a report, I understand, of a meeting held by a committee of the other house. I rather think the report is a bit sensational. Certainly I know of no such situation as serious as this report would indicate. As for a moratorium, that would come under the jurisdiction of the respective provincial governments.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Public Works arising out of the answer he gave to the member for Port Arthur.

Will the Minister of Public Works not reconsider what he said with regard to the jurisdiction of this parliament in the matter of obligations owing by individuals to the crown in the right of Canada? What my hon. friend said with regard to moratoria generally I am sure is correct. General moratoria obviously arise out of the jurisdiction of the provinces. But will he not give consideration to his answer and perhaps on Monday or at some other time give a correct interpretation which clearly is that relief from obligations or debts owing by individuals to Canada come within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East is always very plausible, especially when he thinks he can make a little trouble for the government. As a distinguished lawyer he knows just as well as I do that the question of imposing a moratorium rests with the provincial governments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice, who is a distinguished lawyer, if he will give consideration to this question?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member might consult the law books himself, and he will find that on this occasion he is wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the attitude the Minister of Justice takes with regard to giving legal advice to the house—an attitude which I may say is in accordance with the traditions of his high office—would he consult the law officers of the crown?

SHIPPING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON TAXATION OF WHARVES AND BOAT HOUSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West redirected my attention to a question he had asked me on May 22 as recorded at page 340 of Hansard, which I took as notice. I apologize to the hon. gentleman for having been so long in giving him a reply. The hon. gentleman's question was as follows:

Inquiries of the Ministry

> In view of the fact that the government of British Columbia is giving consideration to the assessment of yacht club wharves and boat houses for taxation or exemption, and in view of the fact that such publicly-owned marine facilities might properly be considered as aids to navigation, would the minister inform the house whether under these circumstances such aids to navigation come within the jurisdiction of the federal government?

My understanding is that the hon. gentleman's question arose in connection with wharves, etc., on the lakes in the Kootenay area. Perhaps I should just say a word as to the position which has always been taken and which I also take as to the propriety of the Minister of Justice giving what are, after all, legal opinions on public matters in this house. As adviser to the government it is not proper for the minister to give legal opinions on public matters to the House of Commons; his task is confined to that of advising the government.

Therefore I can only answer the question in a very general way by saying that the jurisdiction of the federal government in waters such as these is confined, as I understand it, exclusively to matters of navigation. The question of the right to tax could only be determined if and when any legislation or other action to impose taxes is actually passed or taken.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED U.K. USE OF U.S. ATOMIC WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the absence of the Minister of National Defence, to whom perhaps it should be addressed, arising out of a report from Washington to the effect that arrangements have been made between the United States and United Kingdom governments by which United Kingdom forces may now use atomic weapons made in the United States. Are there any such arrangements covering Canadian forces?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I will take that as notice, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Fulton.]

DOUKHOBORS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, who I understand has been out in British Columbia lately. Would the minister care to make a report on any negotiations or discussions he had with officials of the government of British Columbia on the so-called problem of the Doukhobors, and also comment as to whether or not the remedy proposed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in this house yesterday is the government's way of finding a solution? I am referring to the abandonment of the Kettle Valley railway and the abolition of the lumber industry in the Kootenays.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I met with the premier of British Columbia, the attorney general, the provincial secretary and officials of the British Columbia government in Victoria on Monday, together with the deputy minister of justice and the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We received a statement of the position of the British Columbia government and a proposal from that government. I returned here yesterday, and it was the agreement arrived at in Victoria that I would report to my colleagues and communicate our decision and reaction to the statement of the British Columbia government position, to the premier of the province. It was agreed that until that is done and there is a chance to discuss the matter further, no public statement will be made as to the details of the negotiations.

As to the solutions suggested by any other persons, whether they be members of this house or not, I of course would not be in a position to comment while the matter is under negotiation. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that the solution to which he referred, at least as it was put forward, does not represent the attitude of the government.

HARBOURS

ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether the Minister of Public Works is in a position to table the correspondence I asked for yesterday.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I find that there is voluminous correspondence which will take some time to have copied. I have no doubt that the hon. member already has copies of the correspondence he requires.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the hon. gentleman himself read the correspondence?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, that is a very personal matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

328. General administration, $8,536,892.

The Chairman: The Department of Public Works, vote No. 328; this item will be found on page 67 of the blue book, the details on page 457.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I must begin by apologizing to the minister for my regrettable and unavoidable absence last Friday; but in my capacity as the member for one of the constituencies in Newfoundland I felt that it was desirable to visit my constituency.

An hon. Member: For a change.

Mr. Pickersgill: While I was there I had an opportunity to investigate the speed with which certain of the public works were being carried on in that province by the hon. gentleman's department. I was rather astonished, I must say, on reading the minister's opening statement in Hansard for last Friday, which I have done rather carefully, to find that the minister was taking great credit to himself and to the present government for the acceleration of the works that are being carried on across the country by his department. I would not presume to express any view about acceleration in most parts of the country, but I do know that in the province of Newfoundland, where we have had what I am told is one of the earliest springs on record and where there would have been an opportunity to get ahead with work very early this year, there is a deplorable absence of starts on any of the public works about which I was able to inquire.

I must say I am very pleased that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to make provision for certain works in the town of Bonavista, works that are very badly needed, works that were planned by the preceding administration.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And never proceeded with further.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will come to that in a moment if the hon. gentleman can possess his soul in patience. I noticed that the minister also made a good many references to the St. John's harbour development, about which I intend to say a word shortly. The one thing that is conspicuous about the St. John's harbour development is that so far as I can see nothing whatever is happening about it outside of the newspapers, where there is plenty happening.

Now, sir, I think there is no doubt that in one way the minister's statement as found on page 901 of Hansard for Friday last is quite correct. When he talked about accelerated construction, I think there is no doubt that is true in this very limited sense. I believe it is common knowledge—I do not think the minister would deny this for a moment—that when the present administration took office last June they thought the boom was going to continue and they hoped that by stopping public works wherever they could, decelerating wherever they could and slowing things down generally, they could make an apparent saving and justify the claims they had made during the 1957 election campaign that they could save half a billion dollars.

I give the minister full credit for realizing, around October or November, that this was a very unwise thing to have done, and about October or November the government very belatedly began to rush ahead with those projects which had been delayed, in some cases for three or four months. The consequence was that they were able to show quite a considerable record of activity in the winter months, activity that should have taken place last summer. In that sense, and in that limited sense only, the minister can claim some credit for accelerated construction.

I think the minister's claim, also found on page 901, that 97 per cent of the allotments for the year 1957-58 had been spent, is a very creditable record indeed. I think it is a remarkable achievement. In my opinion it is a great credit to the efficiency of the department and its officials, and all the greater credit to them because of the pause last summer. But I should like to remind the members of the committee that these estimates, of which 97 per cent was spent, were the estimates of the Liberal government of last year; and what the minister said at page 901 is a great and deserved tribute to the administration of the department by Hon. Robert Winters and to the care taken in treasury board by Hon. Walter Harris in seeing that honest estimates were made. There can be no possible credit to the government except—and I give them this gladly—credit for rather belatedly going ahead and carrying out that Liberal program.

It is also well known that at the time the estimates were prepared a year ago last December—I refer to the last estimates prepared by the Liberal government—it was realized that there was still a great deal of private construction going on in this country of a character and volume which gave grounds for concern about its inflationary effects, and that the view taken by Mr. Harris and concurred in by all his colleagues was that only essential public works should be undertaken, notwithstanding the fact that perhaps at times in the past, in years when there was an election, governments had not taken that view.

In the light of that fact and in the light of the fact that in 1957 there was so much private construction in contemplation—most of which, in fact was carried out in 1957, as the figures for the whole year show—it seems to me that the increases in the estimates for 1958-59 are very disappointing indeed, because we were led to expect something different.

Perhaps it does not matter what we in the opposition were led to expect, but the country was led to expect, and millions of people in this country were led to believe, by the speeches particularly of the Prime Minister, that we were going to have something entirely new, something entirely different in the way of a public works program to meet the current recession which the Prime Minister discovered only in January but which was known to the rest of the country as early as November of last year. We were led to believe that we were not going to get a public works program of the character which had been carried on in boom days, in the Liberal days, namely a program of the ordinary essential works. They must be done, of course and there is all the more reason for doing them now than there was a year ago. But we were led to believe that some vast new program which was going to deal effectively with unemployment was going to be presented to this parliament at the earliest possible date.

When the Minister of Public Works very graciously agreed to have his estimates come up for consideration first, I think we hoped that we were going to see the unveiling of what was to be the realization of stage one of the "vision". But what do we get? We get just the same ordinary routine public works, with practically no acceleration at all and with practically no substantial increase in their volume.

I have made an examination of the estimates, and in this matter I perhaps have an advantage that some hon. members on this side of the house may not have, because I served on the treasury board for a number of years and therefore possess a little background information about this matter. On examination of the estimates one can see very clearly that there is in them nothing new at all that was not in the planning stage, and well known to be in the planning stage, over a year ago. Of course the hon. member for St. John's West admitted that quite honestly the other day, and we give him full credit for his candor.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That was in another debate which was finished.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not sure that his colleagues were altogether pleased by it. That fact is apparent not merely as to the works that are in the estimates to be done this year, but I looked very carefully over that list of works the minister mentioned at page 907, at the bottom of the first column and the top of the second column.

Again I am not going to talk about things that I really do not know about. In Newfoundland it has been suggested that a federal building to provide accommodation for the unemployment insurance commission, and for the family allowances branch, is contemplated. Of course the minister knows perfectly well that that building was contemplated over a year ago as another step in the provision for accommodation for federal departments, and it was to be phased to begin about the time the present customs building would be well on the way to completion.

At that time I happen to know that a fisheries building was also in contemplation. Anyone who knows anything about the present accommodation of the Department of Fisheries in St. John's knows that a fisheries building is urgently needed. It is perhaps even more urgently needed than an unemployment insurance building, though they are both badly needed. It would have seemed reasonable to have accelerated some of these plans a good deal more than there is any indication of being done here.

Then I look at the buildings referred to for Ottawa. Not only have all these buildings, to my knowledge, been in the early planning stages; some of them were in rather advanced planning stages. The national library is in an advanced stage of planning. It is true that some of these buildings could have been begun a good deal earlier but for one thing.

I think perhaps I should interject a word at this moment so the minister will be saved the trouble of getting up and making the constant retort from the other side of the house, "Why didn't you do it when you were in office?" I will tell the minister—and he knows it perfectly well—why we did not do a great many of these things when we were in office. We did not do many of these things when we were in office because we felt that only the most essential building should be done at a time when there was a great private building boom, and that the government should not be competing with other builders in bidding up the cost of building. It was felt that there were a considerable number of these projects that were not of the first urgency, though they were important and urgent, which should be carried on as soon as they were needed in order to maintain the level of construction and the level of employment in construction.

There is no doubt that one of the reasons the minister's department was able to spend 97 per cent of its allotment this past year is that unhappily there has been, as we all know, some decline in private construction, especially latterly, and it was therefore somewhat easier to get on with some of these works than it was at a time when it was hard to find architects, hard to get engineers, and hard to get on with many of these projects about which we all know something.

The minister made a reference in my absence, which I found very touching, to the Wesleyville post office.

Mr. Green: It is started.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; I know the Wesleyville post office is started, but unhappily a year later than it would have been started if a certain event had not taken place on June 10 of last year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: What ingratitude.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not ungrateful; indeed, I am extremely grateful to the minister for reluctantly and belatedly going ahead with this project. But during the election campaign my opponent, a very distinguished Newfoundlander, promised that he would have this building built. He did not say he would have it built whether he was elected or not; I will be fair. He said he would have it built. He also said he would have a post office built at Badger's Quay. If the rumours I heard in Newfoundland are correct the minister is going ahead with that project, and I congratulate him upon that fact too.

Mr. Green: You may make me change my mind.

Mr. Pickersgill: During the election campaign when I was in Wesleyville I happened to come across the plans and blueprints for the building at Wesleyville, and they were dated May, 1957. They were all ready for the calling of tenders at that time, but the whole matter was delayed until the autumn and then all through the winter. It was an open winter and the building could have been built, and we could have been getting ahead with the Badger's Quay building this year if the plans had not been delayed. However, as the minister has said, I must not be ungrateful and I am very grateful that he is going ahead with it now. I will be even more grateful for the building at Badger's Quay.

Before his estimates have passed through committee I intend to give the minister the names of four or five other places in my riding where postal revenues are roughly equivalent to those at Wesleyville, Badger's Quay and Glovertown—where the previous government built a very good building—so the minister will have something to add to his shelf.

I would now like to say something about St. John's harbour, to which the minister also referred in his speech on a couple of occasions. I would first like to point out a contradiction which perhaps the minister himself did not realize. At page 902 of Hansard for June 6, in the second column, the minister said the following:

> The Liberal government had had a report on a harbour project for St. John's and did nothing about it. Now we have $1 million in the estimates this year.

Then at page 904 the minister said:

> The total amount of the St. John's, Newfoundland harbour development, $12 million, is not in the estimates. I pointed out that $1 million was in the estimates. The point I am making is simply that in most cases, if not in every case, these works would not have been proceeded with this year under ordinary circumstances, but in order to make work the government is going ahead with them.

The minister says in one place that the Liberals did nothing about it and implies that we ought to have done something about it, and in the next place, within the same half hour, the minister says he would not have gone ahead with it either if there were ordinary circumstances, and the only reason he is going ahead is to provide employment under the unusual circumstances which have developed since October last. Even the Minister of Public Works cannot have it both ways.

The fact of the matter is, of course, that this St. John's harbour development—and I give the minister full credit for his part in this development—was undertaken by Mr. Winters on his own personal initiative and I well remember going across the harbour in a boat with him when he pointed out the foreshore and indicated the kind of ideas he thought ought to be developed there. This is very well known in St. John's. At every stage this development has been proceeded with just as rapidly as it reasonably could be proceeded with—by both governments.

I do not, in what I say with respect to this matter, wish to inject any note of controversy which is not already there. However there is, as the minister knows, a dispute in St. John's as to whether this is the best way to develop the harbour, and I want to say in the most non-controversial way I can something about that dispute. First, I must say there is a great deal of disappointment in St. John's—and this was reflected in an editorial the other day in the Sunday Herald —over the fact that there is no work being done on the harbour, and no evidence that work will start on the harbour at an early date.

I was rash enough to say during the election campaign that, in my opinion, there would be no substantial employment, except for lawyers and those concerned with the acquisition of property, on the harbour development during 1958. I will be very happy if I turn out to be wrong, but I do not think I will. At the rate the government is now proceeding that will be the situation.

But to return to the controversy about the harbour development, I do not pose as an expert. Everybody who remembers those terrible years between 1940 and 1945 knows how important St. John's harbour was to the whole cause of freedom during that period and how important it is that St. John's harbour should be developed as a defence measure, if for no other reason, in such a fashion that it will be of the maximum advantage, not merely to Newfoundland and to St. John's but to the whole country, in the event of another wartime emergency.

Of course St. John's is a very small harbour, even in peacetime, but we hope the steady increase in the population of Newfoundland and in the development of resources will mean that the harbour of St. John's will become increasingly busy. It is terribly important, therefore, to make quite sure that whatever development does take place will provide the maximum amount of space for berthing and for manoeuvring in the harbour. Although I am a ship owner I do not, as I say, pose as an expert in these matters; but as the owner of a vessel I am naturally somewhat concerned that there should be adequate space for the berthing of all the vessels which want to use St. John's harbour at one time.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member has just finished lauding the previous administration, of which he was an active member, on the Foundation Company plans for the development of St. John's harbour. Subsequently he told the house something of the controversy which has been going on—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps the hon. member would care to inform the house what stand he takes in this controversy?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. member for St. John's East for bringing me to the point to which I was coming anyway, and I am very happy to answer him. As I was about to say when the hon. member rose, I have no personal opinion as to whether the Foundation Company's plan is a good one or whether the alternative suggested by various distinguished citizens of St. John's is a better one. The only thing I would like to see, and I am sure the minister and the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for St. John's West would agree with me in this, is that this matter should be resolved in a manner which will be of the maximum permanent benefit as well as the maximum immediate benefit to the people of St. John's, the people of Newfoundland and the people of Canada.

With respect to nine-tenths of the plan there is no controversy whatsoever. With respect to the development of the south side of the harbour, in so far as I have been able to read the documents—and I do not know whether I have read them all, because the minister has not yet been able to table them, but I have conscientiously tried to read such as have come into my possession—there is no controversy whatsoever, and there is no reason for any delay there at all. The only controversy is with respect to the waterfront between Water street and the harbour on the north side, and that is as to whether there should be a breastwork for the whole length or, I believe the figure is, only for 650 feet. On that point I must say my feeling is that if it can be done it should be done for the whole length, and I think almost anyone who has ever had anything to do with the berthing of vessels would feel the same way.

It is hard not to believe it would be a great deal better to have the whole length of the harbour along Water street developed for berthing instead of having a 2-3 grade, which would make it impossible to bring vessels alongside a good deal of the waterfront.

The main controversy, as the minister knows, and as all hon. members from Newfoundland know very well, is about the proposed pier for the west end of the harbour as compared with the alternative suggestion that the government should acquire certain piers which now exist at the east end of the harbour, bring them up to date and use them there. As I say, I do not propose to spend any time expressing my opinion on that question because I do not think my opinion would impress anyone. I do not think it would be of any value. I am not an expert, and I do not pretend to be an expert.

But because I think the matter is extremely important to the future of Newfoundland, in fact to the whole of Canada, what I do say to the minister most earnestly is this. Surely the minister could go ahead with the parts of the plan about which there is no controversy and have, as quickly as possible, a really expert investigation in which the proper people from the government would be called; in which Mr. Eric Bowring, who I understand acted as agent for the minister of war transport of the United Kingdom during the war and who had the responsibility of operating the harbour, would be called; in which any other person having any pretentions to real knowledge would be called; in which any citizen who wished to make representations would be called. It does seem to me, sir, that there are a lot of people in St. John's who are worried about this question. They are afraid that if the government do not proceed with the Foundation Company plan they will not do anything. I do not think so ill of the minister. I think much better of him than that.

What I am trying to suggest, sir, is that there is no need to delay going ahead with some parts of the plan while carrying on at the same time a careful investigation into these two controversial points. It does seem to me that all of us, on both sides of the house, would feel better satisfied if that could be done. I do not think there is anything more I can usefully say. I have attempted in what I have said to be entirely non-partisan because, as the hon. member for St. John's East rightly pointed out, it was the previous government that engaged the Foundation Company to make this plan. I am not competent to criticize, and I am sure the hon. gentleman does not think he is competent to criticize, either. However, some people with reputations, who feel they are competent to criticize, have criticized the plan. It does seem to me that it would be better for all concerned to clear this up.

If I may say something that perhaps reflects a little bit on the previous government, we have a situation in Port aux Basques that all of us on this side of the house rather deplore. I do not think those things that have been done at Port aux Basques would have been done by even the present Minister of Transport if he had occupied that position then. What I am appealing to the Minister of Public Works to do is to make sure he does not do some things which will turn out to be as regrettable as some things done at Port aux Basques. Again, I am not trying to cast reflections on anyone. I am trying to indicate what I think should be done about this problem that is of grave concern to people of substance, people of responsibility, in St. John's

I must say, sir, that I was pleased to hear that the minister is going to have what he called a proper shelf. He said something about that at page 907 of Hansard. Later on in the consideration of his estimates, when he begins dealing with the province of Newfoundland, I shall have a lot of suggestions to make to him as to some things that could be put on that shelf. I hope they will be kept right at the front of the shelf, and not pushed to the back.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Green: During the discussion a week ago there were several very interesting and important questions raised by different members who participated in the debate. I have been going over them carefully in the intervening period, and I think they can best be dealt with as we come to the individual items.

In so far as the remarks just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate are concerned, some of these also come in this category. They could only be properly dealt with on the particular items. But he did make one statement which I should like to correct at once. He intimated that last summer the new government, on taking office, had stopped public works as a deliberate policy.

I can assure him and other members of the committee that is not the case at all. He is completely wrong in these suspicions. Our attempt to provide employment is genuine. We have not only accelerated work projects but brought in new projects. The Wesleyville post office is a very important example. There may have been plans in the department under the former government, but I assure the hon. member that there was not the slightest intention of undertaking that construction. No funds had been provided for it in the fiscal year 1957-58.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister will permit me, since he has called my veracity into question, to state that I happen to know there were such plans. I say, on my responsibility as a member of the former administration, that I was assured by the previous minister that it was proposed to go ahead last summer with this building.

Mr. Green: I have great respect for the former minister. Hon. Mr. Winters was one of my best friends in the house for many years, and an excellent minister. But I happen to have had the responsibility for the work of the department for nearly a year now, and I say on my responsibility as minister of the department that funds were not provided for this post office in the fiscal year 1957-58. In order to provide work I put it ahead, just as I did with other projects that could be put ahead. As a direct consequence of that action the Wesleyville post office is now being built.

The hon. member is also quite wrong in trying to prove that the government has not a works plan by criticizing what the Department of Public Works is doing. This department is only one of the departments engaged in providing works projects. Other departments which probably provide more money are transport, defence production and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which does not come under the Department of Public Works although it reports to me as minister, has provided now over $270 million for the construction of homes. The hon. member, if he is going to criticize the work plans of the government, must attack us on a much broader basis, because the public works department only has part of this program.

Mr. Pickersgill: On that point, if I may interrupt the minister, I criticized the whole of the works program. I am very familiar with what the minister is saying about more than one department being involved. If one examines the whole works program of the government it becomes apparent there is no substantial change from a year ago. The amount is slightly larger, but considering the magnitude of the unemployment in this country it is totally inadequate.

Mr. Green: The hon. member is entitled to that opinion, and it is one which I should have expected him to express; but I think the people of Canada are a little more fair minded than he on this question, and they will agree with me when I say that all the works projects initiated by the government in the last ten months have resulted in a great many Canadians having employment who otherwise would not have had that employment.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a question of the minister arising out of what he has just said, Mr. Chairman. Am I right in concluding that he has stated as a matter of fact that there were no projects and no proposals for public works that had been agreed to by the previous government and for which appropriations had been made that were either cancelled or suspended by the present government when it came into office?

Mr. Green: There may have been some small items having to do with protection works in the St. Lawrence area. This was done in order for us to take a look at this whole policy, because in our opinion at least some of these projects were being constructed on a political and partisan basis; for instance, putting a wall in front of the property of a Liberal farmer and not in front of the property of any one else. But I know of no other works which were cancelled or suspended.

Mr. Pearson: There were a lot.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the post office building here in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: There was the question of the building in London of which the Leader of the Opposition is probably well aware. That work has not been proceeded with.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What building is that?

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the post office building right here in Ottawa?

Mr. Bourget: May I remind the hon. minister of the post office building in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: Would the hon. gentleman wait until I have completed my remarks?

Mr. Pearson: He will tell him about the building later.

Mr. Green: Also I think it should be pointed out that the increase in the estimates, including those of the Department of Public Works and the increased work for other departments, amounts to approximately $47 million which in terms of one-man days is roughly the equivalent of on-site labour of 800,000 and off-site labour of 1,500,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Days?

Mr. Green: In other words a total of 2,300,000 man days. With regard to new projects, the hon. member said he could not see any new projects anywhere in Newfoundland. I can only conclude that he must have spent all his time chatting with Premier Smallwood, and did not try very hard to find projects.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman should not misrepresent what I said. I said I could not find in the list of new projects he gave any that were not already in the early planning stages when we were in office; and I would be extremely interested to hear of any project which this government initiated from the very start.

Mr. Green: You might have had schemes in the early planning stage, but that is a long, long way from having any men put to work on them.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is certainly changing the ground.

Mr. Green: There have been 31 new projects in Newfoundland this year. Twenty-five have already started and the remainder will be started very shortly.

The question of St. John's harbour has given me great concern, because I received representations from Sir Leonard Outerbridge, the former lieutenant governor of Newfoundland and a man of very high reputation, and from Sir Brian Dunfield. These two prominent Newfoundland people have opposed this scheme not only on small grounds—the new pier may have been one feature to which they objected—but they took very strong exception to other features of the plan. Sir Leonard at least wanted a completely new survey and an entirely new plan. Because of my respect for this gentleman, and wishing to do a thorough job in connection with this famous harbour, I sent the plan back to my officials time after time. We would probably have been at work on it now had that not been done. Not only my own officials but those of the Department of Transport and the navy and in deed everyone interested in this harbour has supported the recommendations made by the engineering firm, the Foundation Company of Canada Limited.

Like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I am not an expert on this matter. I do not even own a rowboat, so I am not an expert on shipping. I do not quite understand how this ex-Manitoban from Ottawa suddenly gets to be a shipping magnate down in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the minister come down there sometime and see.

Mr. Green: I am glad he is learning to like the smell of salt water, anyway. Faced with that situation and with urgent demands from the mayor of St. John's, the board of trade, the general public and the newspapers—and certainly with no objection from the Newfoundland government, which is evidently trying to be neutral in this question—

Mr. Pickersgill: So am I.

Mr. Green: We finally decided a start had to be made. The engineers have been engaged to draw up plans, and we are hoping tenders will be called later in the present year. We will do our very best to see that this job is well done. I am sorry it has not been possible for the people of St. John's to reach agreement as to the type of development they wish. From my information an overwhelming majority of them favour the plan which was submitted to the former government by the Foundation Company of Canada Limited. This is just one of those situations in which we had to do the best we could.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question at this point? I read again only yesterday the correspondence that appeared in the Daily News, of which many hon. members have received copies; and as far as I could discern from reading it—and I could easily be wrong about this—there were only two points of difference. Nobody questions the desirability of the whole development of the south side as proposed in the plan. Nobody questions the desirability of having a roadway across the north side of the harbour to remove the congestion from Water street.

The Chairman: Order. I feel I must draw the attention of the committee to the fact that as I understand it the purpose of this debate on the first item of the department is to discuss the activities of this department in general terms, and that the debate on particular matters should come later when individual items are discussed. For the last half hour or so this discussion has been concentrated mostly on the subject of the St. John's harbour. I consequently believe that the debate should get back to more general terms.

Mr. Green: I believe the suggestion made by the chairman is a very wise one. There is an item in the estimates for this, and when we reach it I will be glad to deal with the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to comply with the minister's suggestion. It would have taken me less time to make the only point I had to make, sir, than it took the Chairman.

Mr. Fisher: I do not like to rise twice in the general discussion, but my inability to express myself properly this morning led the minister to misunderstand my question in relation to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I was using the word "moratorium" in the general sense that it is used in war payments and that sort of thing. In reply he suggested that it was impossible for the federal government to do anything about stopping or postponing foreclosures on mortgage loans which were held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He suggested this was a matter for the provinces.

I think at this time it might be worth while having a statement of the government's position in that regard, perhaps it would be possible for the minister to make a more specific statement than the one he so kindly made several months ago, that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was not going to push foreclosures in view of the information that was given in the committee of the other place. I shall read his words:

> The corporation did not hear of all cases where borrowers got into difficulties.

If the government, through the minister, came out with a forthright statement in this regard many of those borrowers whom Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation do not hear of would be aware that some action was being taken, and they would not have to be in the position of being foreclosed.

Another point on which I wanted to touch, because it has been brought to my attention, is this. In the interval since these estimates were last before the house several unions have intimated to me that there is no liaison between the Department of Public Works and the Department of Labour with regard to tenders and the operation of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act. As I understand it, on any of the projects which are let by tender by this department the contractor must conform to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act. There is a section of the Department of Labour which keeps a record of the going rates of wages of labour in a specific area.

One of the problems that come up is that the Department of Public Works does not check closely into those who bid on and may be awarded tenders, as to whether they have contracts with certain unions; and at times there is quite a conflict between the unions and the fair wage section of the Department of Labour as to just what are the prevailing rates in certain areas. The fair wage act says that prevailing rates must be paid on government contracts. This problem is also evident in Ontario as far as provincial projects are concerned, and officials of two different unions have told me that they find their relationship in the matter usually more satisfactory with the province than with the federal government.

It is almost impossible to get the federal government, the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Works, to take any action to see that when a contractor, usually a wildcat type, comes in to bid on a job in an area where he has not his base, he puts in a bid at a rate below the actual contract. Quite often he is able to get away with it because the section of the Department of Labour which keeps the record of the wage agreements, or the going prevailing rate in those areas, is behind in its work.

We had a case not two months ago in our particular area where the prevailing rates, according to the fair wage section, were $1.40 an hour for timbermen and $1.80 for carpenters, whereas the actual rate in the area as far as the unions were concerned with the bona fide contractors who were signed up by them—and I might say the coverage is almost 100 per cent—was from 40 cents to 65 cents above that. To this particular case a contractor from outside came in and put in non-union labour at this lower rate. When the union protested in order to protect this prevailing rate—you cannot blame the union for that—they were able to get no action at all from the Department of Public Works or the Department of Labour. There was a passing of the buck.

The unions are under pressure from the contractors in this regard. If a contractor signs up with a union at a set of rates which are going to prevail in a certain area he knows that when he bids on a contract he has to take those wage rates into consideration, and so his tender is submitted on that basis; whereas another contractor, who usually is from outside the district and who does not have that rate to take care of, can come in and submit his tender on the basis of lower rates and by doing so can undermine the whole structure. In effect a union contractor, whom we shall call the good contractor, has no sure way of getting some of the public works tenders.

The minister and his officials should consider working out a much closer liaison with the Department of Labour, and make it more clearly understood to everyone who gets a contract that if the wages paid are below the prevailing rate instantaneous action must be taken to raise the rates, and that the contract will be adjusted accordingly. If that were done we would get away from this difficulty. If the minister would like correspondence in this regard and an explanation of why the relationship with the province of Ontario has been much more satisfactory than with the federal government I will be only too pleased to give it to him.

The minister has brought up again today the point that I asked him to make a statement on, namely the question of patronage. I think before he gets to the specific items of his estimates he should make a statement on patronage. Perhaps his previous explanation of his determination to wipe it out did please quite a number and gave a great deal of pleasure to the public. I read this from the Temperance Advocate in relation to the minister:

> Our federal Minister of Public Works "cuts no corners on the high principles he established for himself in early life".
> There are no curryings of favour or salesbaiting offerings permitted in his office. Such gifts, we understand, are all returned.
> We commend the minister for his courage and the definiteness of his witness. The Hon. Howard C. Green is a teetotaler.

Let us have a statement from the minister on this patronage question and what steps he has taken to stamp it out.

The other point that I should like to bring to the minister's attention is this, and this may be a question of patronage or of inefficiency. When we get to the place in his estimates that deals with the central heating plant here and the boilers I expect, Mr. Chairman, that we will get a very clear explanation as to why the central heating plant is flooded with boilers at the present time, some of which are not being used, and at the same time we have some figures in the estimates for more boilers.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to take part in this debate on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Public Works. However, after listening to the long, elaborate and glorified statement made by the minister in introducing the estimates of his department on Friday last I felt it was an invitation that could not be turned down.

Before expressing my disagreement with some of the statements made by the minister I should like to express my appreciation for the co-operation received not only from the Minister of Public Works but from the officers of his department, and this applies to the deputy minister, to the officers and engineers in the field. On different occasions I have had the opportunity to follow the work of some of these engineers, and I can assure the committee that they spare no time and effort to solve the difficult problems placed before them.

I regret that I cannot agree with the minister's statements and the emphasis placed on the supposed accelerated program of construction by his department. In listening to the minister on Friday last one might have been inclined to believe that this was the first year that new projects were initiated by the federal Department of Public Works. The Canadian people still recall the Prime Minister's description of those prospective public works projects as a great national development which, to use his own words, "would swing into action immediately and would be part of his party's national development policy." In fact, he called it a very extensive and challenging program. It was to be a program which, in the Prime Minister's own words, "was to ensure the development of our country and to provide as well help to Canadians, work to Canadians and an opportunity for the better things of life." These projects were to total $280 million during the first quarter of 1958 and $1,185 million for the full calendar year.

When we listened the day before yesterday to the report on unemployment given the house by the Acting Minister of Labour, and learned that as of May 31 there were over 500,000 Canadians seeking unemployment insurance benefits, we on this side of the house felt that the public works program was not too effective. At this point I want to mention that we of the official opposition are not rejoicing about the large number of unemployed we have in the country today, because after all if there are 500,000 Canadians applying for unemployment insurance benefits there must be another quarter of a million who are out of work and whose benefits have expired.

When one listened to the minister's roll call of public works projects, followed by the diversified version supplied by the hon. member for Halifax, one might have been led to believe that never before in the history of this parliament had a series of new public works projects been undertaken by the government department responsible for such works. It has been made clear by the hon. member for Levis that the Prime Minister's great vision of a public works program offers very little in new projects of major importance, and it can be termed as nothing but the continuation of a routine departmental construction program, including many Liberal projects already under way such as the St. Lawrence seaway, the northern Ontario pipe line and others.

At this point I should like to place on record the total public works expenditures for the fiscal years 1953-54 to date. In 1953-54 the federal Department of Public Works spent $144,581,000. In 1954-55 the same department spent $157,287,000, an increase of $13 million over the previous year. In 1955-56 the amount spent was $167,865,000, an increase of $10 million over the previous year. In 1956-57 the amount spent was $173,592,000, an increase of $6 million over the previous year, and in 1957-58 the amount spent was $191,426,000, an increase of $18 million over the year before. The estimates for the present fiscal year, including the supplementary estimates tabled in the house, amount to $233 million.

These figures, with the exception of the last one, have been taken from the summary of standard expenditures attached to the main estimates for each fiscal year. The last amount, as stated by the minister on Friday last, shows an increase of $41.6 million over the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958. The increase, however, is only $23 million greater than the increase for the previous year, and we are asking ourselves if this is really the very extensive and challenging program outlined by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign.

The minister has mentioned 236 projects controlled by public works for other departments of the government, of which 168 are new items. This is certainly not the first year that the Department of Public Works has been asked to undertake construction projects not shown in his regular estimates but included in the estimates for other departments. The minister and members of the house know that this practice has been going on for years and years. I have here the report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Robichaud: Before the committee took recess at one o'clock I was referring to the 236 projects mentioned by the minister which were controlled by the Department of Public Works for other departments of the government. As I have stated, the minister knows, as do the other members of this house, that this practice has been going on for years. I have here the annual report of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957. I think that it would be a good thing to have a few paragraphs of this report on the record. This report starts as follows:

> A considerable increase in activity for the Department of Public Works was seen in the fiscal year 1957.

I may add that during that fiscal year the Liberal government was in power.

> Construction and maintenance work was continued on harbour facilities and protection works, dredging of navigable channels was carried out in harbours and rivers where required and testing laboratories were operated.

Further on it refers to the harbours and rivers engineering branch and states as follows:

> Construction and repairs were made to 302 wharves, breakwaters, other harbour facilities and protection works, of which 232 were completed during the year and 70 still in progress as of March 31, 1957. In addition to this, 1,339 smaller projects were undertaken.

This last quotation might be of interest to the hon. member for Halifax. All of this was done in a period of inflation when material was in short supply and when in many cases labour was not always readily available.

I should like now to speak more specifically of public works projects for the province of New Brunswick. We are aware that in New Brunswick there is today a great deal of unemployment. What major projects have been initiated within the last few months for New Brunswick? In 1954-55 over $1,350,000 was spent in New Brunswick for public buildings and over $1 million was spent in 1955-56. What has been done this year by the government to relieve this serious unemployment situation by public works projects? We see in the main estimates $1,625,000 plus $380,000 in the supplementary estimates tabled a week or so ago. It is true this makes a total of $2 million. However $1 million is for the customs building in Saint John, New Brunswick for which tenders were called before the June 10, 1957 election; $150,000 is to complete the Bathurst building and $100,000 is for the Newcastle building, both projects for which tenders were called before the June 10 election. In fact, they are all projects for which tenders were called by the previous administration, with the exception of $275,000 for Campbellton and Grand Falls buildings. The only items for New Brunswick in the supplementary estimates are $380,000 for Newcastle and Saint John, two projects which were started by the previous Liberal administration. Mr. Chairman, that is certainly not an accelerated program of public works for New Brunswick. In other words, if these projects had not been initiated by the Liberal government there would have been no items for New Brunswick in the supplementary estimates just mentioned.

How does the Minister of Public Works expect to relieve unemployment in New Brunswick by this piecemeal program where the people of my province are getting less than their share of public works? The minister may bring to the attention of the committee the sum of $4 million which is provided for in the harbours and rivers engineering services. Here again we see nothing but a continuation of projects initiated by the previous administration, with the exception of a few minor ones. The two main items such as $900,000 for dredging in Courtenay bay and $600,000 for breakwater replacements at North Head are all projects initiated last year by the previous administration and would have been completed this year irrespective of what party was in power.

The minister in his remarks mentioned the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge. Here I want to give the government credit for having succeeded in convincing the government of the province of New Brunswick and the government of the province of Quebec to accept the responsibility of sharing in this new venture. Also in the course of his remarks the minister asked me whether I was against the bridge. I want to make it clear that I am not against the construction of this bridge; I am greatly in favour of the bridge. I am sorry the Minister of Transport is not in his seat at the moment. I have here in my hand the Telegraph-Journal for Monday, May 26, which under the heading "Hon. George Hees officiates for Day's Ceremony" contains an article which reads in part as follows:

Campbellton—A start was made on the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge here Saturday when the Hon. George Hees, Minister of Transport, officiated over the dumping of the first load of stone on the causeway.

I wish the minister were here because I am informed—and I should like to check on this information—that the minister was about 1,000 miles away from Campbellton when this project was started and this ceremony took place.

Speaking about bridges, may I say that there is now under construction in Gloucester county a bridge to link Shippigan island to the mainland. This bridge is being built by a private company and when it is completed it will be a toll bridge. It is most unfortunate that the government of the province of New Brunswick has not consulted with the federal government with a view to making this bridge a joint federal-provincial project. After all, this bridge crosses navigable waters in an extremely busy channel which is being used at least two to four times a week by 60 to 70 draggers and a fleet of smaller fishing boats. This is a project which should have been undertaken with the joint co-operation of the federal and provincial governments because it is not right to ask the 5,000 or 6,000 people of Shippigan island to have to pay a fare every time they wish to cross to the mainland.

I would like to refer to projects which are of special interest to my constituency of Gloucester. I realize the Minister of Public Works has stated on many occasions that his government is determined, by means of this so-called accelerated program to help solve the unemployment situation. In my constituency the minister has a golden opportunity to put this policy into practice. We have for example, at Maisonnette, a small village of about 150 families, 35 fishing boats employing about 70 fishermen, but owing to lack of wharfage facilities and shelter these fishermen are limited to about two months of fishing operations per year. This is an opportunity where not only could employment be provided by the construction of additional wharfage facilities but employment could also be provided for these 70 fishermen if a fish plant could be erected there. With proper wharfage facilities there would be no unemployment problem at Maisonnette.

The same problem exists at Lower Caraquet where the old wharf was built 30 or 40 years ago and is now outmoded and practically useless. I would ask the minister to have a complete survey made at Lower Caraquet with respect to the possibility of a new location for a new wharf which could be used to advantage by the fishermen. We also have at Tracadie a situation which should be corrected without delay. The breakwater there also was constructed, at least 25 to 30 years ago and is now practically in ruins. The northern section of it is blocking the channel and this is a danger to navigation. I would urge the minister to give immediate attention to the removal of this breakwater which, as I have said, is interfering with navigation.

In conclusion, I would like the minister to state the position of his department with regard to the improvement of Bathurst harbour. During the last campaign my opponent had prominent advertisements in local newspapers to the effect that he had succeeded in obtaining $3½ million for harbour improvements at Bathurst, but there is nothing about this in the estimates and I would like the minister to clarify the situation. The port of Bathurst is in great need of wharfage facilities. In fact there is no public wharf at Bathurst which can be used to advantage and in this period when we still have, at this late date in the middle of June, about 3,500 to 4,000 unemployed in Gloucester county it would be a good time to negotiate with respect to projects of this kind.

(Translation):

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to take part in this debate on the estimates of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). I think the hon. minister is a first rate politician for, when he introduced his estimates, his speech was more a political one than anything else.

After the promises of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and of all Conservative candidates in the June 1957 campaign, repeated with even greater emphasis in the 1958 campaign, and considering that there were more unemployed in Canada than at any time, except under the Conservative administration of 1930-35, I thought and hoped that the Conservatives would fulfil at least one of their election promises. Unfortunately, such has not been the case.

istration, and find that this department's estimates are only 30 million dollars higher than in the preceding year, and also that most of the projects involved had been prepared by the Liberal government.

However I congratulate the Ministers of Public Works, of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and of Veterans' Affairs (Mr. Brooks) for awarding a contract for the construction of a hospital on the Smyth road and for actually starting the work on this site. It had been planned by the Liberal government. This hospital is necessary for the proper care of veterans, military personnel and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Hon. members and all Canadians will admit, I am sure, that we are proud of the fact that no other country has a better organized and more respected police force than the R.C.M.P. In fact, during a trip I had the pleasure of making six years ago through fourteen European and Asiatic countries, I heard nothing but praise for our soldiers, sailors and airmen. I am happy to feel that no other country takes better care than we do of our veterans, men who devoted themselves selflessly to the defence of Canada and of all people who wish to remain free.

In my opinion, public works expenditures will have to be increased every year. Because of the increased population and growing prosperity up to June, 1957, new buildings of all kinds will be needed to keep pace with the expansion of our country. The only time when it is proper to reduce the expenditures of the Department of Public Works is in times of prosperity when labour and materials are so scarce that they are better left to private enterprise. However, now that more than 10 per cent of the labour force is unemployed, and that there is a better supply of materials, we had better double the estimates of that department, and provide jobs paying from $50 to $80 a week so that jobless people may enjoy a decent living with their family, rather than pay unemployment insurance benefits amounting to $20 or $25 a week to some of them for doing nothing while thousands of others have exhausted their benefits. The Unemployment Insurance Act, as it is, was passed and put in force under the Liberal administration to assist unemployed people in the winter months. Unfortunately, in Canada there will always be a few thousand unemployed workers during the cold season. I appreciate that but it is ridiculous to find about 400,000 of them in June.

[Mr. Gour.]

One project which in my opinion would provide work for the unemployed of the Ottawa area, which includes the constituencies of Russell, Ottawa East, Ottawa West, Carleton, Hull, Gatineau and Labelle, would be to build headquarters for the armed services in the area of the Rockcliffe airport. I am sorry that the Minister of National Defence is not in his seat because I meant to ask him to try to prevail upon his personnel, as well as upon the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the cabinet, to have this project undertaken at Rockcliffe, where everything is ready, rather than in the vicinity of the Pinecrest cemetery, on the Base Line road, or else at Bell's Corners, as was suggested by some interested people,—which is too far away for water and electric services and where, moreover, no site is owned by the government. This latter site would cost much more and would be very inconvenient for employees.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that such works were not started last year. If the Liberal government had been reelected on June 10, 1957, the projects I have mentioned, as well as the building for the general staff of our armed forces, the construction of a post office and many other public works on Riverside drive would have started last summer. It would have provided jobs for thousands of unemployed of the Ottawa area who are now receiving unemployment insurance benefits.

As I have just said, Mr. Chairman, if the Liberal government had been reelected, all these projects would have been carried out, including the construction of a post office at Eastview which is essential and had, moreover, been decided by the Liberal government. The pentagon would have been built on a lot located partly in the town of Eastview and partly in the city of Ottawa and owned by the Department of National Defence.

If this government does not decide to build immediately on its own site, this land, in my opinion, should be subdivided and each lot sold for about $500 preferably to our veterans, to members of our armed forces and then to civilians. Not more than one lot should be sold to any buyer. The buyer should also be required to complete his construction work within six months. Moreover, I think that all necessary building materials I just mentioned should be manufactured in Canada on a 100 per cent basis. This would give work not only to construction workers, but also to those who manufacture the required material.

As I say, I am in favour of the Department of Public Works doubling its budget, so as to have all essential and useful projects built. The government should launch this program at once instead of indulging in political speeches on the radio or television networks, or here in this house. The construction of these buildings would certainly be a fillip to business in this country, and would give jobs to thousands of unemployed in the building industry as in the plants manufacturing the needed material. It would also help alleviate the plight of the poor unemployed, for at least fifty of them come to me each week to tell me about their difficulties and ask for my help.

Many people have told me they are sorry they voted Conservative. It is therefore in the best interest of those poor people that I am speaking, and even in the best interest of the Conservative party, for, if things thus go on from bad to worse, the people will ask you to resign before your term has expired.

Therefore, I call upon the Minister of Public Works to press other members of the cabinet to get permission to make such expenditures and, at the same time, to ask them to delegate groups of individuals and government representatives who would be entrusted with the mission of encouraging industrialists, both from the commonwealth and from elsewhere, to come and establish themselves in Canada, while urging our own Canadian industrialists to enlarge their plants and open others in order to manufacture those articles which we have to import from abroad. That would be much more advantageous to our Canadians than sending delegations to press foreign manufacturers to come here and sell us their goods, thus increasing by the thousands the number of unemployed.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, in entering this debate for the first time on the estimates of the first time on the estimates of public works, I should like to join with the hon. member for Levis in the felicitations extended to the minister on being selected to assume this portfolio. Speaking personally, I hope that the rumours to which the hon. member for Levis referred are not founded on fact, because I am sure everyone on this side of the house would be quite happy to have the minister continue in his portfolio, at least for the life of this parliament.

On looking over the estimates, and particularly the supplementary estimates, I find that the riding which I have the honour to represent has not fared too badly at the hands of the minister. I want to thank him for the consideration which he has given to the requests I have made of his department. On page 901 of Hansard, the minister mentioned the public buildings of Burin and Harbour Buffet as examples of the projects which had been advanced in order to help out the unemployment situation. If the minister will refer to his records, I am sure he will see that these two projects were provided for in the estimates for the year which ended last March and at least one of them, if not both, had already been advertised and tenders called for prior to June 10.

On page 907 of Hansard the minister said that his department was in the course of building up a shelf of public works. The minister will be happy to note that I am in the course of preparing a long list of items which I am sure will be of great assistance to him when he comes to building up that program. I hope to be able to present that list to him within the next few days.

Before the minister goes too far with the shelf of works, it would be wise for him to consider some addition to his staff because, from my personal observations, I believe there are no public servants in any department who are overworked to the extent they are in his department, particularly in the engineering and architectural branches. I should like to pay my personal tribute to these officials for the sympathetic consideration and the kind co-operation which they have always given to the problems I have brought before them. If the minister did not find any shelf of works when he assumed his portfolio perhaps one major reason for it is that his servants are already too greatly overworked to be able to do much more than carry out the current projects for every year. We know that if a shelf of works is to be maintained it requires much paper work and preparation of blue prints. As much as we would like to have a shelf of works I am sure we do not want it at the expense of the lives or at the risk of impairing the health of the servants of the Department of Public Works. I hope the minister will make a careful study of the work loads which some of his senior officials are now carrying.

As far as the estimates before us are concerned they seem to follow the same pattern as in previous years. The total estimates for this year are only about $42 million more than those of the previous year. I am sure the people of Canada will be somewhat dismayed to find there is not more evidence in these estimates of the great works program to which the Prime Minister referred in his broadcast from Winnipeg on February 12 in which he said that his government had already launched a program which was going to total $11,085 million and that $270 million of that amount would be spent in the first three months of this year. While we admit that this expenditure would be spread over several departments I believe it is reasonable to assume that a great deal more than approximately $40 million of that $11,085 million should be accounted for in the estimates of the Department of Public Works. But if there is no evidence of this huge public works program at the present time perhaps that is just as well because President Eisenhower in a recent broadcast referred to such programs in terms of their being a solution for the unemployment problem as something which would result in a minimum of jobs and a maximum of budgetary headaches later on.

I should like to draw to the minister's attention the special needs we have in Newfoundland particularly in small post offices for more space than is normally required in post offices on the mainland. I do not know how this accommodation is allotted but it is reasonable to assume that some comparison is made with the needs of communities of similar size on the mainland. However, the minister must remember that in most instances on the mainland a mail is received every day while in Newfoundland, and particularly in the coastal regions and in the riding which I represent, a mail is not received oftener perhaps than once a week. Frequently in the winter time mail is received only every two or three weeks and in some cases only every month. When the mail does arrive the local post office is required to handle perhaps ten or 20 times as much mail as would be handled in a post office of similar size on the mainland. I have been in post offices when a mail has landed and know that the postmaster has had no room to turn around and some of the mail has had to be stored in outhouses and in the lobby.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Carter: Not the kind you are thinking of.

There is a need for much greater space in the small post offices in Newfoundland than is required in similar stations on the mainland. I should like to plead with the minister to reconsider the plans that have already been approved for the public building at Marystown. I know he has had a great deal of correspondence about this already but I can assure him from my personal knowledge and observations that the space which it is proposed to provide in the new building is totally inadequate. I would also ask him to reconsider the plumbing arrangements for this building which are not at all in keeping with the size and importance of the community. The site for the building is a miserably small plot, big enough only to accommodate the building itself. It makes no provision whatever for expansion which will have to be undertaken in the not too distant future. I urge the minister to completely reconsider this building because at the present time it is not a credit to this parliament or to his department.

In the matter of the acquisition of sites I would suggest that the present policy of delaying purchase until they are actually needed is a shortsighted one because land values are increasing at a rapid pace. Many of the communities where public buildings will be needed in future are growing fast. I have particularly in mind the community of Channel where a public building is urgently needed. Consideration was given to this matter several years ago but for some reason or other for which I have never been able to find a satisfactory explanation the plans never materialized. It is going to be exceedingly difficult to secure an appropriate site for this building at Channel. I would urge the minister to have a survey made immediately and acquire whatever land is available because it certainly will not be available much longer.

Mr. Green: What was the name of that community?

Mr. Carter: Channel-Port aux Basques. It is a twin town but I understand that the latter part of the name is not in best of favour in his department so I left it off.

With regard to the specifications for public buildings I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that here is a wonderful opportunity to assist local industries which is also one of the best ways of solving the unemployment problem. We have in Newfoundland a very fine birch veneer plant which produces a quality product that compares very favourably with other products of a similar type that are available on the market. This plant does not have an opportunity to tender on public buildings because the specifications actually specify some other product. I understand that the two public buildings under construction in St. John's at the present time, the post office and customs building, are employing British Columbia fir and other products that are no better than what we produce ourselves.

Mr. Herridge: That is a misunderstanding.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is perfectly true.

Mr. Carter: It is a misunderstanding on the part of my hon. friend because he does not know what superior products we do have down there.

Mr. Herridge: I judge by the large exports of fir to Newfoundland that they cannot obtain that quality there.

Mr. Carter: Anyway, all we are asking for is an opportunity to tender, but there is no opportunity to tender if the specifications preclude it by specifying other types of materials which are produced in other parts of this country. We want to build up our industry. We have our own unemployment problem and here is one opportunity which the minister can take advantage of in the future. I am sorry he did not take advantage of it as far as the other buildings are concerned, but I do hope that he will give attention to this fact in the future.

Another matter in connection with this is the employment of local labour. I am told that at the present time in St. John's a number of riggers are brought in from the mainland and employed on those public buildings at a time when we have qualified riggers in St. John's who are still out of work and cannot get employment. The department should exercise much greater control over the type of products that go into the building and the employment of labour to give the maximum opportunity to local industries and local labour. I do hope that the minister will give consideration to this suggestion.

I thank the minister also for the provision made in the estimates for the matter of Codroy harbour. Although it is not in my own riding it is of great importance to the fishermen of my riding because it provides them with a haven which enables them to prosecute the fishery in the slack season, something which has not been possible for a good many years. I am thankful, too, for the provision of fishermen's wharves at St. Lawrence and at Harbour Breton. These wharves will enable the fishing industry to be prosecuted on a better and a more economic basis than has been done in the past. In Newfoundland we have more need of this type of installation than ever before because of the unemployment situation.

Hon. members will understand that when employment was plentiful on the mainland many of our fishermen forsook the fisheries and sought employment on construction work and in factories, but that sort of employment has dried up and the fishermen are now forced to return to the fisheries. Therefore, they must have these facilities if they are to be able to earn a livelihood from the fishing industry. We have particular needs at Seal Cove in Fortune bay and also at Lamaline and Garnish. In this connection I should like to draw the minister's attention to the need for shallow dredging equipment. The department has been in Newfoundland since 1949 and I understand that they do not yet have any equipment of that type. We need that type of equipment very badly in our province. Perhaps we have greater need for it in Newfoundland than any other province of Canada.

I also ask the minister to give consideration to a wharf at Isle aux Morts. This is a large community which has grown to a phenomenal size and at a phenomenal rate in the last few years. There are over a thousand people there now and they have no public wharf whatever. I know several surveys have been made and it was difficult to find a proper site but I believe a suitable site has at last been discovered. I do hope that every effort will be made to have this project undertaken at the earliest possible date.

As far as the harbour of St. John's is concerned, I have a special interest in it, too, because I live in St. John's and I have lived there for a great many years; St. John's is my home. It is one of the most historical cities in the new world and one of the most important harbours. St. John's is particularly important as a haven and I am going to come out flatfooted and say that I am in favour of the plan proposed by Sir Brian Dunfield and the town planning association. I say that this plan is much more comprehensive than the other one. It will cost more money but I think we should have the best and we should look forward not 10 or 20 years but 100 years in the development of our ports. Any plan that is going to curtail or diminish the water area of our harbour is going to prove to be a very severe handicap in the future. I am not going to say any more on this point now because I hope to deal with it again when the particular item comes up and perhaps speak in more detail at that time.

Before I sit down I want to commend the minister for increasing the miscellaneous grant. I see it has been increased by $200,000 to $1 million but I should like to point out to the minister that even this amount is still very small in proportion to the need. When I came up here in 1949 the grant was $500,000 but costs have gone up a great deal since then. Apart from that, in 1953, I believe, we changed the statute so that only items of $15,000 and over would be separately listed in the blue book, and have provision made for them individually. That greatly increased the drain on the miscellaneous grant because formerly only projects up to $9,000 were financed out of this grant. Now, projects up to $14,999 are financed out of this grant and since this $1 million is for all Canada, even if the maritime provinces do get perhaps a little more than their share, when it is divided among the separate provinces and is broken down among the different ridings the miscellaneous grant is still inadequate for the demand which is made upon it. I trust the minister will give consideration to these few suggestions I have made.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few words to say on this general discussion of public works and perhaps I would not utter them if it had not been for what the minister said a week ago in the rather extravagant claims he made for the program of public works which had been put forward by his government as a cure for unemployment. We heard a lot about this last February and March and I thought perhaps we would not have those arguments repeated in a discussion of the estimates of this department. No one, of course, on this side deprecates the importance of a program of public works in respect of national development. There can be no argument on that score and the public works which have been initiated and completed by the Liberal government when it was in power is an indication of our attitude toward public works and national development.

Nor can one quarrel with the idea that in a time of recession public works can be very useful indeed in creating employment, especially municipal public works, local public works, which can be started quickly, on which men can be put to work quickly and which do not require long planning and a great deal of red tape to be unrolled in federal headquarters before work can actually begin. No doubt economists will argue for a long time about whether public works or tax reductions are most effective in a time of recession. However, that argument is apart from the matter we are considering now because both can make their contribution to what we are seeking, more employment, though perhaps it should be pointed out that one of the difficulties and disadvantages in a great program of public works as a way of curing unemployment is that great expenditures on public works do provide a basis for the creation later of inflationary pressures. I have no doubt that is in the minds of the government when they consider public works because we still have the problem of inflation with us in the midst of a period of recession.

But to put forward as it was put forward, a couple of months ago and indeed was mentioned a week ago, a program of public works as a cure for our troubles did not make sense then and it does not make sense now. As has been pointed out in this discussion and previously, this great billion dollar program of public works was nothing more or nothing less than a collection of all the public works in the estimates of the previous year, some of which were on the verge of completion, some of which had just begun and some of which were new. To put that forward as something great and new in our public works history was, of course, something which had no basis of reality.

We have had an opportunity now to examine that electoral program of public works in the light of the estimates now before us and that examination certainly confirms the feeling we had at that time that the great billion dollar program was really the estimates of the previous year and that there were a great many things included in that program which had and could have no influence whatever on employment at this time. If members of the committee, as I have no doubt a good many of them have done, will examine the summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories attached to the estimates they will get confirmation of the fact that the program of works for 1958-59 is by and large in its amount not greatly in excess of that which covered the year 1957-58.

For instance, taking item 13 of the table, the item dealing with construction or acquisition, the amount voted for 1957-58 was $374 million and the amount in the estimates this year is $380 million, not a very great increase. Under the item for repairs and upkeep—and they were included in the electoral program put forward—the amount this year is $50 million and the amount last year was $48 million. Item 16, construction or acquisition, is a very large item indeed and formed a very large proportion of the billion dollar program that was going to do so much. The amount under that item last year was $548 million and this year the amount is $546 million, a decrease of $2 million. By and large the program in its amount is not greatly in excess of last year. This casts a rather lurid light on this great new billion dollar program of public works.

Mr. Green: I think the Leader of the Opposition should point out in fairness that the figures he is quoting now do not refer to the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Pearson: They include of course, some works under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend's department.

Mr. Green: This is a summary of all departments. For example, equipment includes all sorts of things. I think the Leader of the Opposition is not quite fair in trying to intimate that this constitutes the works plan of the government.

Mr. Pearson: I want to be fair but I would also point out that when the billion dollar plus program was put forward last February it included a great many things which were not specifically public works at all. I am making a comparison between that billion dollar program and the program we have outlined here. I quite agree that a lot of these things I have mentioned do not come under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend.

Mr. Green: This does not include, for example, the over a quarter of a billion dollars spent on housing.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not in the estimates at all.

Mr. Pearson: That is not included in the estimates we are discussing at all. I am talking about works, whether or not under public works. Surely my hon. friend will agree that when the $1,085 million public works program to cure unemployment was put forward a couple of months ago it included a great many things which did not have any relationship whatever to a new public works program. That is confirmed by the estimates of this year. That is the point I am trying to make.

As the last observation I wish to make until we get to the details of the minister's estimates, may I point out that the minister said this morning that no projects had been delayed or cancelled by the government when it came into power last June, although he qualified that statement a little later in a way which I will indicate. I think it is pretty clear in the minds of most of us that when the new government took over last June they were very preoccupied indeed with the desirability of reducing expenditures. They said so and they took action towards that end, and at a time when they were more concerned with that than with the possibilities of unemployment. In connection with the action which they took surely the minister, after reflecting, will now agree that some quite important projects were postponed, if not cancelled. He mentioned this morning that there were only two he could think of and that they were minor ones involving a breakwater in front of a Liberal farm instead of a Conservative farm along the St. Lawrence river or something of that nature and he also seemed to recall a post office or federal building in London, Ontario.

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Pearson: I mean London, England. That was a Canadian building in London, and I can certainly understand the government's attitude with regard to the postponement of that building if it were a question of public works for employment purposes because not many Canadians are being employed in the construction of that building. I know some of the difficulties about that building too which probably warranted some delay.

But last autumn the hon. member for Levis asked a question about this matter, being question No. 182 in the following words:

> 1. Has the government decided not to proceed during the present fiscal year with certain of the projects provided for in the main and supplementary estimates of the Department of Public Works?
> 2. If so, what projects?

The answer to that question is found on page 2640 of Hansard for December 19, 1957. I am going to read the items. There are a good many of them. Here are some of the projects which were postponed last year: New Glasgow, federal building; Oromocto, federal building; Dorion, federal building; Nicolet, federal building; Quebec, postal terminal; Morrisburg, post office; Emerson, Manitoba, customs building; Glacier national park, federal housing; Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, harbour improvements; Pleasant Harbour, Nova Scotia, breakwater-wharf; Port Hood, Nova Scotia, breakwater; Port Medway, New Brunswick, breakwater reconstruction; Back Bay, New Brunswick, wharf extension; Ste. Agathe des Monts, wharf; Ste. Flavie, dredging; Mutton Bay, Quebec, wharf; Pointe au Pere, wharf improvements; Little Cascapedia river, dredging.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition whether that return he has just read does not include an explanation in each case? In fairness, he should have read the explanation. For example, we find this:

Location	Project	Reason
New Glasgow, N.S.,	Federal bldg.	Site unsettled.
Oromocto, N.B.,	Federal bldg.	Site unsettled.
Dorion, P.Q.,	Federal bldg.	Drawings had to be changed.
Nicolet, P.Q.	Federal bldg.	Site unsettled.

This was not a case of the government cancelling them at all. It was a case of difficulties which had arisen in the course of the work of the department. It is not a case of the department postponing them at all. The Leader of the Opposition should not try to picture them as deliberate postponements.

Mr. Pearson: It is quite true that reasons are given after each of these projects.

Mr. Green: The Leader of the Opposition should have read them.

Mr. Pearson: But the minister this morning used the argument, as he did last Friday, that in all these cases the government had stepped in to accelerate these projects. There may have been difficulty preventing the acceleration—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, may I say that these works were not postponed, certainly not in the sense that that question was asked. In every single case there was some difficulty in connection with the site or the plans or something of that type. In no way could it be described as the government deliberately postponing a project. These matters arise every year. There will be cases this year.

Mr. Pearson: There are other works, which are not in this list and which perhaps the minister will explain, that have been postponed including the West Vancouver post office, the new Bronson avenue canal bridge in Ottawa, the Ottawa Post Office Department building, the national library, and the national memorial shrine. There may have been good reasons why those projects should have been postponed.

Mr. Green: Again the Leader of the Opposition is not being fair. These buildings were not postponed at all. I have never said they were postponed. The post office building was not postponed at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: It just was not proceeded with.

Mr. Pearson: If it is a question of semantics, I will change my language. These were projects which had been initiated by the previous government but which, for one reason or another, have not yet been proceeded with. The argument that my hon. friend was making, and he made it vigorously and in political terms last Friday—

Mr. Payne: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw the attention of the Leader of the Opposition to this fact. He said that the West Vancouver post office is not being proceeded with. May I say that work has been going forward for the past three months.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member will have a chance to explain his attitude toward these matters. I leave the matter in your hands, Mr. Chairman, but I doubt that it is a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: You had better explain your inaccurate statement that you just put on the record.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Last Friday the minister made a great point of the fact—and as I say again, he made the point in political terms; in fact, he gloated over our discomfiture at the time—that these public works had been accelerated, that we had held things up and that they pushed ahead with them. With regard to the magnitude of the program I am trying to point out that no case can be made for any great increase over the last year and with regard to acceleration, that there were some projects which were on the books, which had been initiated, had been planned and for which appropriations had been made but which were not proceeded with, certainly in an accelerated way. Those are the two points I wish to make. I think they are valid points and I think they have a bearing on this whole question of public works, both as something which is important for unemployment and also in respect of the government's position that they have pushed hard to give employment through public works. Neither of those points seem to have been entirely met by the minister in the discussion we have had on this first item of his estimates.

Mr. Green: I wish to say just a word or two. One very good example of a work which was accelerated is the post office in West Vancouver. We got that rushed ahead. The difficulties about the site were settled with the municipality and the work was actually started many months before it would have been started in the normal course. This was done wherever it was possible; it was done in many dozens of cases. I read a list a week ago of works which had been accelerated and I stand by that today.

Some mention has been made by the Leader of the Opposition of the Post Office Department building. I presume he means the one which is to be built on Riverside drive.

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Green: No provision was made in the 1957-58 estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes; there was.

Mr. Green: No provision was made at all in those estimates for construction of that building. There was money used for planning but there was no provision at all for actual construction. The vote was for planning of the building.

Mr. Pearson: How much was the vote?

Mr. Green: $300,000.

Mr. Pearson: $300,000 for planning only?

Mr. Green: There has been absolutely no delay in that building. If we had been in a position where we did not have the need to create employment, that was one building which would very well have been held off but it is being put ahead for the purpose entirely of providing employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would permit one question? This morning I paid him and the department a tribute for spending 97 per cent of the department's allotment. I am coming to think I made a mistake in doing so. With all that long list of works included in the estimates for last year which were not proceeded with—and I use the minister's own term—surely he does not mean to say that notwithstanding that, 97 per cent of all the estimates for the department were spent.

Mr. Green: The figure of 97 per cent is accurate. The department has never before been able to spend anything like that percentage of the vote in a year. We aim to spend 100 per cent but you cannot always do that.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is impossible.

Mr. Green: Every day or so there are problems which crop up. For instance, we can go back to the post office in Wesleyville. In some of the centres we find that people want four or five different sites and that there is a rather violent quarrel in the community as to where it is to be. Things of this sort delay the construction. There are other projects where there have been difficulties of one kind or another and which the department no matter how efficient it might be, in my opinion could not avoid.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is suggesting that these projects which the Leader of the Opposition read out—a quite substantial list of projects, some of which seem to be rather large—constituted substantially less than 3 per cent of his total estimates?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bourget: He is getting an answer.

Mr. Caron: I will wait for the answer.

Mr. Green: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, may I say this. The estimates for 1957-58 had to be reduced by the amount of $2.7 million covering those buildings and other works where there was delay. If that reduction had not been made, we would have spent 95.7 per cent as against the 97 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister did not do quite as well as he claimed to have done.

Mr. Green: I did not do it at all. It was the departmental officials who did it, and I think they have done a grand job.

Mr. Pickersgill: So do I.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): Order. May I make a sugestion to the committee concerning remarks at this stage of the resolution and I do so without seeking to cast aspersions on any remarks by any hon. member in any quarter of the house to date. I might suggest that we confine our remarks in such a way that they be pertinent to the department and that we do not attempt to refight the last election.

Mr. Pickersgill: Those remarks should be addressed to the minister.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I will not try to re-fight the last election. The only thing I would like to say about the little discussion a while ago is that when the minister spoke last Friday he was not quite so ticklish as when he was accusing the previous government of not doing anything with respect to public works. He has a right to be ticklish once in a while because he seems to have so much fun with others.

The last time I spoke my subject was that of protection walls and I hope the minister did take note of the points I raised and that the matter will be referred to the supreme court because, since Quebec says it is the responsibility of the federal government which the federal government denies, we do need some clarification.

Today I wish to mention that there was an understanding between the government and the federal district commission some years ago that public buildings should be decentralized in order to help with the problems of traffic circulation and parking facilities in Ottawa and the surrounding districts. However, some of our new public buildings are being built miles and miles away from the centre of the capital, all on the Ontario side, in spite of the fact that a good part of the territory with which the federal district commission is concerned is on the Quebec side.

Up to now we have been treated as poor relations of a big family, and I want to ask that the minister and his department take a look at some of the beautiful spots we have on the Quebec side which would be suitable for public buildings and would be much nearer the centre of the city than some of the new public buildings which are as much as six and seven miles from the main government buildings. They seem to extend further and further and they will soon stretch far beyond the city limits. Since the public printing bureau was constructed nothing has been built on the Quebec side of the river.

I believe we are still part of Canada and our services are good with the exception of the lack of a bridge, but I trust that the minister will see that a good bridge is built. There are good sites in the city of Hull, both in South and West Hull and there are good sites at Gatineau Point, all of which are near the centre of Ottawa, and all would be suitable for the purpose of decentralizing and alleviating traffic problems as excellent space is available for parking purposes. Such projects would be of great benefit to the people in that area.

Mr. McWilliam: The minister, in introducing his department's estimates, gave a long list of projects which were said to have been accelerated in order to provide employment. He tried to leave the impression that he was doing great things in opening up a new large scale program of public works which would cure our unemployment problem. The fact is that in large measure this works program was started by the former government and many of the current plans were made by that government.

An examination of the estimates brings forth a much different picture from that painted by the minister on Friday last. This great works program will fall short of relieving unemployment to any worth-while extent. The urban centres may benefit somewhat but the rural centres across Canada will find no relief from the works itemized in the estimates. In fact, the cost of surveys, drafting plans and specifications and the purchase of materials will take up a great portion of the funds allotted leaving, in many cases, only a small amount for actual wages.

With respect to the acceleration mentioned by the minister, I wish to draw the attention of the house to a newspaper article appearing on June 10 last in the Ottawa Journal from which I read in part as follows:

> Charge Delay in Government Work
> Complaints were registered by building trade union officials in Ottawa today at the delay in the public works department in calling tenders for many millions of government contracts.
> The 1958 construction program for Ottawa is estimated at more than $100 million. At the moment there were 200 carpenters waiting for work.

The minister has tried to make quite a play on what his department accomplished in having a start made on the Campbellton-Cross Point bridge, between the province of New Brunswick and Quebec, which connects northeastern New Brunswick with Gaspe. The minister, by perusal of departmental files, could ascertain that the previous government some years ago offered to pay its share of the cost of this bridge, but that the provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec would not enter into an agreement at that time. The people of New Brunswick, particularly the people of the northeastern part of that province, are very pleased that the governments of the provinces concerned have finally entered into an agreement so that by means of this three-way proposition a start on the construction can be made.

The minister's remarks with respect to acceleration of public works do not apply to a federal public building at Newcastle, New Brunswick. Tenders for this building were called by the former government and the contract was awarded to the Kenny Construction Company in 1957, over a year ago, but what we find today is just a hole in the ground. The construction bogged down when the old building was torn down. This project would have provided employment during the last winter and during the spring months which would have been very beneficial to the unemployed of the area. The minister will say, no doubt, that delays were caused by a request for a change in the plans made by town officials. In this regard I would like to quote from Hansard November 20 1957, at page 1355, as follows:

> 1. Have steps been taken to begin construction of the federal public building at Newcastle, New Brunswick?
> 2. Was a change made in the site of the building?
> 3. If so, of what nature?
> 4. Did it entail much change in plans and specifications?

The answer filed by the parliamentary assistant to the minister was as follows:

> 1. Yes.
> 2. Yes.
> 3. The town officials made available a 10-foot strip of land to the rear of the crown site and it was therefore possible to meet their request that the building be set back 10 feet from its planned position to help traffic conditions.
> 4. No.

Question No. 4, which I should like to repeat reads:

> Did it entail much change in plans and specifications?

The answer was no. On January 22 of this year I asked the minister the following question which is found at page 3606 of Hansard for that date:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister advise as to the cause of the long delay in commencing the erection of the federal public building at Newcastle, N.B.? The answer to order paper question No. 178 on November 20 last led me to believe that construction would start shortly after that date.

The minister's answer was:

> Mr. Speaker, I did not receive notice of this question until just as I was coming into the house, and I will have to make inquiries and obtain the answer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, from the facts as recorded in Hansard of last session it is clear that a long and quite unnecessary delay has taken place. In spite of any excuse the minister might offer he cannot lay claim to acceleration, unless it is acceleration in reverse. Was the handling of this project in keeping with the government statements on their actions to relieve unemployment?

The expenditures in public works for this constituency for the fiscal year amount to $21,000 for the Baie Ste. Anne wharf extension and $40,000 for the lower Neguac wharf extension, two projects that were in the district engineer's plans for 1958 during the former government's term of office.

At this point I should state that Northumberland-Miramichi received several public buildings, many new wharves and wharf extensions under the Liberal government since I have been a member, all of which were designed to assist the fishing industry, shipping facilities and provide buildings for public services. Last year when I raised the question of financial assistance by the federal government towards the erection of a proposed highway bridge at Chatham, N.B., I was advised that the federal government did not assume any responsibility for the construction of highway bridges within provincial boundaries. On December 20 of last year, on pages 2711 and 2712 of Hansard, the following questions and answers are recorded:

Question No. 286—Mr. McWilliam:

1. During the past two months did the Minister of Transport receive representations from the Chatham, N.B. board of trade, in connection with the highway traffic problem and proposed construction of a highway bridge across the Miramichi river at Chatham?

2. If so, did the minister reply to such representations, and what was the nature of the reply?

The reply was tabled by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport and reads as follows:

1. Yes, a telegram was received from the board of trade.

2. The following reply was sent:

"Your telegram November 29 requesting survey traffic conditions relative to need for a bridge at Chatham have spoken to several of my officials and must advise cannot find any indication the proposed bridge would be a federal government responsibility. The bridge would be within province of New Brunswick and consequently I would suggest your representations be addressed to the province."

These answers further confirmed, at least in my opinion, the department's policy concerning responsibility for erection of highway bridges within a province. I ask now, does this policy still exist? Has there been any change whatever from the former policy? I should like also to ask the minister if his department ever received a request from the government of New Brunswick for financial assistance towards the construction of a proposed highway bridge at Chatham across the Miramichi river.

This matter has been a political football for the past few years. The provincial government has failed to take any action. Newspapers and political aspirants have promoted the view that it is a federal responsibility, in part as a result of the location of the Chatham R.C.A.F. station. The federal Conservative candidates in the 1957 and 1958 election campaigns promised the construction of this bridge. They failed to give any consideration whatever as to where the responsibility lies. These statements misled the voters of the area, many of whom never gave any thought as to which government was responsible for construction or whether it might be a joint responsibility. A decision on this aspect of the problem is necessary so that the parties concerned can direct their efforts along the proper channels.

The minister is familiar with this situation. When he was campaigning last spring the bridge committee of the Chatham board of trade interviewed him. A report in the Chatham, New Brunswick Gazette of May 6 stated in part, and I quote:

At the conference held with Hon. Mr. Green, every assurance was given the committee by Mr. Green that he would co-operate in every possible way and explore every available channel to enhance the erection of this bridge. It is therefore planned that the committee will, if necessary, journey to Ottawa and discuss the matter further with the hon. Minister of Public Works.

At this conference did the minister advise the committee on the government's policy of erecting or giving financial assistance toward the erection of highway bridges, exclusive of the trans-Canada highway bridges, solely within provincial boundaries? If he did state a policy, and I think he should have in order to keep the discussions within the proper channels, what policy did he state? Has the policy changed from last year? Has the bridge committee asked for an interview with the minister? Has the minister invited this committee to come to Ottawa and discuss the matter? The responsibility, in whole or in part, for the construction of this proposed bridge should be cleared up now.

The provincial government continues to draw red herrings across negotiations. They promised a survey five years ago, but no action was taken. Perhaps an indefinite start will be made on the survey on the eve of the next provincial election. In the light of the press report in the Chatham Gazette which I just quoted, the minister gave the bridge committee some very nice sounding words. However, I wonder what they contain? Those words only added to the confusion amongst the people of that area as to where the responsibility lies. If there is a federal responsibility, in whole or in part, then the minister should say so when he answers the remarks made by members on this item and clear up the confusion. I sincerely trust that the minister will state his department's policy in this regard.

As I said before, there is no sign of acceleration of public works projects in Northumberland-Miramichi. There is little hope held out that the promised relief from unemployment through public works will lessen the number of unemployed this year, when it is at an all-time high for this season of the year. Perhaps in the future, next year or the year after, something of a more concrete nature will be provided. In the meantime, I must say there has been no acceleration whatever in this respect in the constituency which I represent.

Mr. Hardie: I do not intend to follow the minister's example of turning this committee into another election campaign. I should like to deal with some of the matters the minister mentioned in his statement. I have some questions to ask and possibly he can answer them now or have answers prepared for the time when the related items come before the committee.

The minister spent a great deal of time listing the 168 new projects that were supposed to have been started by his government this year. I wonder if he would give us a list of the projects included in that total of 168 where the preliminary work and planning was initiated since his government took office on June 10 last. I do not think it would take nearly as long to list those projects as it did to list those he cited the other day.

We have heard a great deal about acceleration on the part of the government in public works projects and about the steps it has taken to relieve unemployment. I wish to place on the record a part of the statement made by the minister on June 6 as recorded at page 901 of Hansard:

> We have accelerated construction. This is a factor which has been almost entirely overlooked in the criticisms made from the other side of the house. For example, we have gone out of our way to promote work during the winter months.

Why should the government not go out of its way? It is its responsibility. You would think it was doing the unemployed people of this country a favour by promoting public works projects during the winter months.

In his statement the minister said that part of the public works program initiated by this government to look after winter employment was the brushing of 150 miles of road from Fort Providence to Fort Rae during the past winter. This project did relieve some unemployment in the city of Edmonton. It did bring a little relief to some of the unemployed in the Northwest Territories, too, but we had many people in the Northwest Territories who were unemployed last winter. Fifty per cent of the labour brought in on that job had to be hired through the unemployment insurance office in Edmonton; those were the instructions the contractor received from the minister. He had to obtain half of his labour from Edmonton while people all over the Northwest Territories were unemployed. Bringing them in from Edmonton meant paying their fare from Edmonton to Fort Providence and return and at the same time people living in the immediate vicinity of the project were unable to obtain employment.

I want to ask the minister a few questions and if he cannot answer them immediately he will have an opportunity to prepare answers before the items are dealt with in the committee. My questions relate in particular to the job between Fort Providence and Fort Rae and are as follows: How many men were hired through the unemployment insurance office in Edmonton for this job? What was the average period of employment of these men? What was the cost of transportation for these men going to and from Edmonton? How many men were hired from the Northwest Territories? What was their average period of unemployment? What was the cost of transportation for men hired in the Northwest Territories? What was the total amount paid to the contractor for this job? What was the total acreage cleared on this project? This may seem to be asking for more than one should expect but I do not believe it is. The contractor obtained that job on a cost plus fixed fee basis and his costs should have been turned over to the department in detail. There should be no difficulty in supplying me the information I have requested.

In addition to that I would like the minister to tell us what was the amount paid the Indian affairs branch for the clearing of the same road west of Fort Rae and how many miles were cleared?

The building program for the Department of Fisheries at Hay River is another example I wish to bring to the attention of the minister. It was not started until late in the year, I think around November. Not one man in the town of Hay River could obtain work on that project but men were hired from Edmonton whose transportation costs had to be paid. Meanwhile, skilled carpenters in the town of Hay River were without employment. We in the Northwest Territories do not object to helping the people of Canada but it must be borne in mind that a serious unemployment problem exists there not only now but every year.

In the list of projects referred to by the minister he mentioned a northern affairs school and hostel at Fort Simpson costing $2 million. That is the total amount for the project. Tenders were called and bidding will close either at the end of June or July. Regardless of the closing date, in order for the contractor who is awarded the contract to make a start on that school this year he has to have his material brought in to the end of steel, or to the end of the highway at Hay River, by September 15 at the latest. I doubt whether construction could be got under way this year to the extent of $300,000 of the $2 million.

The minister made a strong point the other day of how his department had accelerated its planning to such an extent that this year work had started earlier than in previous years. In the case of the school at Fort Simpson work has not started earlier but later than most projects commenced in other years. I have another question for the minister. How much earlier or how much later were the contracts awarded for the Mackenzie highway from Fort Providence to Fort Rae and from Yellowknife to Fort Rae this year as compared to last year?

As far as the increase in expenditures and the $33 million for a road program in the Northwest Territories that the minister mentioned and all this malarkey we heard during the election campaign in my riding—

Mr. Grafftey: Order.

Mr. Hardie: I will put you in order in about two minutes.

An hon. Member: Invite him to meet you outside the house.

Mr. Hardie: If I had to list all the promises made by my opponent in the last election you would find that all the 168 new projects that the government is starting would be located in my riding. I am not going to delay the proceedings of this committee by reading the list of the 168 projects that were promised for my riding.

Mr. Carter: Don't restrain yourself.

Mr. Hardie: What has happened to this road program? There is less money going to be spent on roads in the Northwest Territories this year than was spent last year. The minister made a big point of mentioning the $12 million Mackenzie highway. This is a job that was started two years ago by the Liberal administration. Up to date possibly 93 miles have been completed and the $12 million was just the remainder of the estimate of the Liberal government two years ago when they started the job.

There are some other questions I should like answered. For instance, I would like to know the amount of the contract awarded to the contractor on the Yellowknife-Fort Rae section of the road last year. What was the amount of that tender? How much was spent on that portion of the road up to the end of March this year? How many miles of road did the contract call for the completion of; how many miles of road have been completed? I am asking these questions now so that the officials of the department may have the answers when the particular item comes before the committee. The minister said the other day that the new government was going ahead with those projects. I say they are all later this year than they were last year. Less money is being provided this year than last year in my particular riding on this northern development program. He did say that the department has rushed ahead at a rate which would have left the former administration breathless and lying on the side of the road. I would say that as far as the former administration being breathless is concerned, I think the minister has run out of wind after his statement the other day. He should not run out of wind now; the stretch drive is the thing that counts. I think he will be out of wind by that time.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay the committee very long. Some of us might perhaps not have taken part in the discussion at this time had it not been for the attitude taken by the minister when he introduced his estimates last week. I know all Canadians were impressed when the Prime Minister kicked off his election campaign in Winnipeg with the announcement of $1,185 million of public spending. With the examination of these estimates in this chamber we see that the myth has been exploded. However, it is not with these large figures that I wish to deal today.

As I mentioned, I will be brief. I should like to refer specifically to one item and I seek the approval of the committee to cite this one instance. Last Friday the minister created the impression that the public works projects were being proceeded with with breathless dispatch while in fact many of the projects that I know of have been delayed. I have in mind one specific item, namely the dock at Mattawa.

Mr. Green: I rise on a point of order. I do suggest that discussion of this kind should take place on the item. If the hon. member is allowed to go into detail of the dock at Mattawa, then every other member can go into every other item in his constituency. This morning the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate stood over his discussion on the St. John's harbour. It is true it has been the custom to have a general discussion on the first item. This is going beyond that if an hon. member picks out an item and proceeds to talk on it on the general item.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I know the minister is an astute politician—perhaps I should say tactician—in this house, but I do say he left himself wide open when he mentioned so many specific items in the introduction of his estimates. I prefaced what I had to say by saying that I was going to delay the committee only on one matter.

The Chairman: Since we are discussing the general aspects of the department we should limit ourselves to a general discussion and eventually discuss the individual item when we deal with the items.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, I bow to your ruling, of course, but I do say with great respect that we should be permitted to use one instance only to prove a point that has a real bearing on the general discussion. I think the people of the country will find it rather distasteful that promises of public spending are used for political purposes. We have instances of it here, and I shall endeavour to raise the point again to indicate exactly what I have in mind. I know these are small matters in relation to the billion dollar spending program, or the reported billion dollar program, but they are important in our own area. These small amounts and small docks are very important.

The government should take a new look at the importance of the tourist industry in this country. The construction of those docks is tremendously important. I know docks are important in my part of the country and throughout all of Canada. The tourist dollar that is spent in Canada is one of our greatest sources of revenue. Therefore, I urge the government to take a more generous attitude toward those docks. There was a time when it was felt that the tourist industry perhaps was something which should be catered to strictly at the local level. Down through the years we have gotten away from that point of view.

In connection with those docks I should like to say just one word. It is a development that has perhaps come along with the times. The department should give consideration to the construction of a launching ramp or apron in connection with the construction of those new docks which are built throughout the country. It is not an expensive item at all. To a $10,000 or $15,000 dock it could be added as an extra feature for perhaps a matter of $200 or $300. It is a great convenience to the people who use such facilities for the launching of craft that may be transported on trailers or otherwise and I should like to make that suggestion.

In introducing his estimates the other day the minister brought up the matter of housing. I would remind him that I am still waiting for an answer to my question respecting the decision of the government to suspend agency loans. Many people are concerned about this. We perhaps know some of the reasons but I think the house and the country would benefit from a statement in this regard. As I have mentioned before, I know that many of us are concerned about the siphoning off of funds from the smaller cities. It would seem that the government is now going in the opposite direction to some extent because they are now going into areas having over 55,000 people with direct loans for the first time. Some of us are concerned as to precisely what the objective is. Is it control of housing or is it control of the economy? I am not going to delay the house by debating the matter now but I think the government should say what the objective is. I believe sincerely that the government's decision to suspend agency loans for the time being will have a detrimental effect on wage earners in the lower income brackets. In my opinion they will be worse off because banks and other institutions engaged in this type of lending will become more selective with their own money. I would appreciate it if the minister would refer to this matter when he replies.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, I intend to speak only briefly but I thought I should like to take this opportunity to say to the hon. member for Kootenay West how much I appreciated certain remarks he made with reference to the Minister of Public Works. I heartily agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West in the congratulations he extended to the minister with regard, for lack of a better word, to patronage and with regard to what he termed the decentralization policy now being carried out by the minister. Before continuing with these few remarks, and they are going to be brief, may I say that I know there will be cynics in the official opposition who will say that my remarks concern patronage but I think those who will scrutinize them carefully will know better. I can only say that I have sat in the house during the discussion of these estimates and while the speeches of members of the official opposition may look good back home in their respective ridings I think the Canadian people in general are happy that we have a minister who is going to deal with the Department of Public Works in the interests of the Canadian people at large. As I have said, I concur heartily in the remarks of the hon. member for Kootenay West concerning the minister.

On the question of the decentralization policy in the Department of Public Works I should like to refer briefly to what I had to say in my speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As found at page 413 of Hansard for May 23, I said:

—whenever it is administratively possible and practicable, decentralized buying and contract-letting policies should be carried out. So long as the citizen's tax dollar is being most economically handled, we should stress a program of local work for local people. In other words, fairly justifiable objections are heard when large city firms enter rural ridings to undertake contracts or to carry out works which rural people feel they could do at a cheaper rate themselves.

I fully realize, that under modern managerial techniques and having regard to the way business is generally done today it is very often economical to buy centrally and there are also many contracts that only big companies are capable of handling. But I do emphasize that a certain impersonal attitude has come into what I might call the big business picture. Very often the small man who can carry out works and contracts more cheaply is not invited to tender. Sometimes he does not know how to get on lists. I simply want to commend the minister for his intention to pursue a policy of decentralization. I know that most rural members, in fact, most members whether they be Liberal, C.C.F. or Conservative, welcome the pursuit of such a policy to a greater degree than has been the case in the past. I for one feel that such a policy fits in with the announcement in the speech from the throne concerning small businesses. We have all heard in the speech from the throne—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Minister of Public Works is not going to raise a point of order at this time.

Mr. Grafftey: We have all heard in the speech from the throne that the new administration intends to carry out policies that will assist small businesses. I feel this fits in very well with the policy of decentralization in the Department of Public Works.

The Chairman: Order. I regret interrupting the hon. member but at present he is reviving a debate which has already taken place. I would ask him to deal with the subject now being discussed.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, in making these remarks I feel I am expressing an opinion in which members of all parties can concur, I am expressing the opinion that the following of a policy of decentralization to a greater degree will result in reasonable savings within the department. I have heard so many criticisms from the opposition about various things that I thought I should stand up and make a few remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: You are a nice fellow but you are out of order.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the almost embarrassing congratulations of the hon. member who has just taken his seat make me glow with satisfaction and pride and also remove some of the loneliness in my heart indicated by an hon member speaking last night in another debate. In order to quiet the minister's fears, may I say that I am not rising to make another speech. I am simply rising as a pinchhitter for the hon. member for Port Arthur who has been called away. He has asked me to reiterate two questions he put to the minister both last Friday and today and they are strictly in order because they come within the ambit of policy and administration. He has asked me to bring to the minister's attention his request for a statement from the minister on his views with respect to patronage, past, present and future. Second, he would like a statement from the minister as to the possibility of a moratorium by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation with respect to payments on houses and house rentals. With these few remarks I have discharged my duty at this time.

Mr. Green: I should like to say this with regard to patronage. If I were to speak on patronage it might take a very long time. We attempt to run the Department of Public Works in a proper, businesslike way. With regard to the other question, may I say that I will deal with housing when we get to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation estimates. However, I would point out to my hon. friend that this stressing of a moratorium is not going to help in the provision of money for the building of homes in Canada and it might very well have a serious effect on the construction of homes and thereby on employment in the country and certainly on the procuring of homes by young couples who need them so badly. I suggest that before questions of this kind are stressed in the house it would be wise to give some thought to the results that may follow by the impression being created that there is about to be declared a moratorium on all mortgage payments. I think most hon. members will agree with me that it would not help Canada very much at the present time to have an idea of that type spread across the country.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask the minister a question based on some remarks he made when he was on this side of the house. In asking this question I do not want to be contentious in the slightest degree because I am sure that when the minister advanced this suggestion he was serious, just as I am at the moment.

Mr. Macdonnell: You are never contentious!

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you. I am glad to have my hon. friend confirm my statement. When the minister sat on this side of the house I think he expressed the opinion from time to time that it might be well if the Department of Public Works were to give consideration to taking over from other departments the construction of public works in those various departments. One day when I was passing estimates here having to do with certain construction works in the Department of Transport—I have forgotten what the item was but perhaps it had to do with radio or meteorological services or something of that kind—I recall that the minister expressed the feeling that perhaps it was a duplication of services or even a waste of money that there should be so many public works branches in all the departments of government that had any works of a public nature to perform. In the light of the changed circumstances in the house and in the light of the consideration which he may have had time to give to the matter since he has been over there on that side of the house, I should like to hear his comments. I am wondering whether or not he has had an opportunity to consider this problem and whether he would care to comment on it at this time?

Mr. Green: We do most of the governmental construction work. The main exceptions are the work of the Department of Transport and the work of the Department of National Defence. Occasionally we are doing some work for each of these departments. This seems to have been a practice which has grown up over the years. I do not know whether or not my hon. friend was responsible for it when he was minister of transport. The Department of Public Works cannot very well raid the Department of Transport. This is a matter which would have to be decided by the government as a whole. As the hon. member will realize, various practices have grown up for one reason or another in the administrative field. Eventually I would hope that they would be remedied. However, there is close co-operation between the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport. We happen to share the same office building. We have the very best of relationships with that department and we have great admiration for the work they are doing. I hope the hon. member will not press me any further for my views as to what should be done on this point.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not think of doing so. I should simply like to say this. I presume there is no intention of changing the policy that has existed in that respect over the years.

Mr. Green: We are trying to improve the former government's policies in many regards. This may be one of those.

Mr. Chevrier: May I proceed to another matter, and again I hope the minister will not think that I am contentious. I want to be constructive in this matter. It has to do with a point that was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam with reference to patronage. It is not my intention to open up that question today but I think perhaps briefly the minister could satisfy not only myself but, I am sure, the house in general. Could the minister say what the policy of the Department of Public Works is with reference to that question? Is there going to be an overall change in the present policy? Have any of the employees of the Department of Works in any category whatever been severed from their employment because of political activities? I think it would be well if the house were to be reassured in that respect. I know that after the election of June 10 the Minister of Public Works made in the house a statement that reassured most hon. members with reference to that matter. I should like to know from him now whether any employees have been severed from their employment since June 10 because of political activity?

Mr. Green: There was some discussion on this question during the last parliament, as the hon. member will recall, and references were made to some employees who had been dismissed. I think he will remember that there was one in the Department of Transport who had been extremely active politically. I think all hon. members will agree that civil servants should not take an active part in politics. Frankly I may say that where you have a case in which employees of any department are active organizers politically I do not think they deserve very much consideration. However, once again I should like to pay tribute to the work of the civil service. Certainly in my department I have found that they have been excellent. As I told the hon. member for Kootenay West, we are trying to run the department on a businesslike basis.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not dealing with the Department of Transport, although I well remember the case the minister had in mind and he had not been extremely active politically: I was dealing with the Department of Public Works. I wonder if he would answer the question by saying whether any employees have been severed from their employment for that reason. My understanding of the case he had in mind is that a member of parliament on his responsibility as a member of parliament and also on his statement that he knows that a person has actively participated in a campaign, may because of that fact require the severing of an employee from his employment. But my understanding of the situation is that that rule does not apply to civil servants as such but applies to the other categories of casuals, supernumeraries or the like and that in so far as civil servants are concerned, the matter is governed by the pertinent sections of the Civil Service Act.

However, the question to which I wanted to obtain an answer from the minister if he can give it now—and if he cannot do so, I shall be pleased to wait until a later date—was whether or not in his Department of Public Works, which is a huge department of employment in that respect, there have been any employees who have been severed from their employment because of political activity.

Mr. Green: I would inform the hon. member that one of the employees of the Department of Public Works had himself appointed a returning officer for the election last year and took a leave of absence to act in that capacity. That employee has since resigned. That sort of thing, in my judgment, is inexcusable.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the minister say "to be a returning officer"? A returning officer is an appointment of the crown.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister consider that the appointment of a returning officer is an act of partisanship?

Mr. Green: It certainly was in this case. I do not believe there has ever been a government take over in Canada where there has been so little political partisanship shown towards the civil service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: I would inform the hon. member that there have been some very provocative actions which in other days would have called for pretty drastic action, but this government has leaned over backwards to be non-partisan in its dealings with civil servants, and I am sure the people of Canada as a whole clearly understand that that has been the attitude of the government.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I was not trying to be provocative at all. On the contrary, I raised this question in the most casual manner I could, but I believe the house is entitled to know, if the minister can tell us, whether or not any of these men have been severed from their employment for that reason. He did mention the case of the returning officer and in order to indicate to him and to the house that I have no intention of being provocative I say to him now that if it is not possible for him to give the information at this moment, I would be quite happy if he gives it to me next week or even afterwards. I am not pressing for an answer immediately but I think not only this house but the public generally will want to know and will want to be reassured of what the minister has just said, that the government is doing a good job with reference to the employees under its jurisdiction. If it is doing that job, fine, and I will be the first to commend the government, but I would like the minister to be a little more specific. He has been very courteous in his reply but has really shelved the issue. I believe we are entitled to a little more than that and if he feels after consideration in the week to come that the reply should be made at a later time I am perfectly happy. However, I feel the house should know what is the position.

Mr. Green: I think it would not be in the best interests of the service or of the Commons to precipitate a debate on a question of this kind. If it is to be debated then facts will have to be brought out and arguments made as to this man and that man having participated and what he did and so on and so forth. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose whatsoever to get into a wrangle of that kind. The change of government has been made after a period of 22 years when, as the hon. member himself knows very well, active supporters of his own party were given positions in the civil service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: Twenty-two years with one party in power, and when thousands—

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know of any who were discharged.

Mr. Green: Thousands of employees were appointed by that government and there were many cases where supporters of opposition parties were unable to get work or were dismissed.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, oh. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Green: Don't you get started. I do not believe it is in the best interests of the country to open up this subject. We believe in the merit system for the civil service and our actions during the last year have shown that we have faith in that service. We intend to stand by them and it does not help very much to try to precipitate a debate on a matter of this kind.

Mr. Chevrier: I was not trying to precipitate a debate but apparently the hon. minister has been touched by what I have said and has gone, I think, a little further than he should have gone. I have no intention of discussing cases. I was looking for an over-all statement such as the minister made, voluntarily, after the election of June 10 when he assured the Canadian people that there would be no severing of employment because of political activities in so far as the government was concerned. The position which he is now taking is different from that which he took on the first occasion, and he has withdrawn—

Mr. Green: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I made no such statement that there would not be any action taken where there had been political activity. The hon. minister cannot find that I made any such statement.

Mr. Chevrier: I must accept the hon. minister's statement but he certainly did in this House of Commons assure not only the whole house but the country that this question would be carefully considered by his government as would the question of change-over and we were assured that—

Mr. Green: I made no such statement in the House of Commons and the hon. minister cannot find that I did.

Mr. Chevrier: I am very glad the minister thinks I am still a minister.

Mr. Green: There has never been a government which has taken over in Canada where there was so little disruption of the civil service.

Mr. Chevrier: I would like—

The Chairman: Order. I would like to bring to the attention of members that we are at present debating the estimates of the Department of Public Works and I believe we are now getting away from that debate. May I therefore suggest the return to the matter under consideration?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I could help the Chair by bringing the discussion back to the item under consideration and by restating that when I rose, I discussed the question in a general way in the hope that I would get a simple answer. Instead I got a rather acrimonious reply, but notwithstanding what the minister has said I would like to say that while I was on the other side of the house there was no occasion which I can recall when, in my capacity as Minister of Transport I had occasion to recommend that a person be severed from his employment because of political activities and I do hope that will be the case under the present government.

Mr. Green: There was a very good reason because they were all on your side, so why should they be severed?

Mr. Chevrier: There were five elections.

An hon. Member: How would he know?

An hon. Member: What about Cornwall?

Mr. Chevrier: What was that about Cornwall?

Mr. Robichaud: I would like to ask the minister what is the policy of the department with respect to the appointment of inspectors on construction projects when among the applicants is a man who has overseas service with the Canadian forces to his credit?

Mr. Green: I will deal with that when we come to the particular item.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister's answer is quite good enough. This question applies to the whole range of activities of the department. We are discussing the administration of the department and it does seem to me the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester is very relevant. He beat me by a fraction of a second in asking it. There are a great number of appointments—I do not believe any department has more appointments than the minister's department—of a casual and occasional nature. I think we are entitled to know, on item 1, whether or not it is the policy of the department to respect the veterans' preference in connection with these appointments.

Mr. Green: The answer to that is yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are two questions that I wanted to put to the minister. I have been looking through the estimates and I cannot find anywhere—that is why I am asking the question on item 1—a vote for the survey of the Chignecto canal which the Prime Minister promised to investigate during the election campaign. I wonder if the minister could tell me where to find that item in his estimates.

The second question is as follows: I have been looking at the amounts appropriated for the minister's department by the governor in council, in the absence of any parliament in this country. I find that the amount appropriated was about $3 million less than was in the estimates presented to parliament which were never passed. I was wondering if that $3 million was also taken into account when the minister was making the claim he did about spending the proportion of the estimates he said had been spent. If by arbitrarily reducing the estimates by $3 million, then the claim that they had spent 97 per cent of it would give a very different picture from the one the minister tried to give last Friday.

Mr. Green: There is no item in the estimates with respect to the Chignecto canal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the government doing anything about it?

Mr. Green: Well, it is under study. With regard to last year's estimates and the balance of which was covered by governor general's warrants, a discussion will come up I presume on the amendment to the Financial Administration Act, or at a later stage. It is not involved in these particular estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite aware of that.

Mr. Green: There were certain amounts voted, certain monthly votes and that sort of business, so I am not in a position to give the exact situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps the minister would have been quite right if he had not raised the matter himself, but since he made the claim he has spent 97 per cent of last year's estimates I think the committee is entitled, before we pass this item, to be told what estimates he means. Is he talking about the estimates that were presented to parliament or the revised estimates the governor in council passed in secret after the election campaign was under way? It is a very simple question.

Mr. Green: The percentages I gave earlier in the afternoon were the correct percentages.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, but percentages of what?

Mr. Green: Percentages of the estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: But of the estimates originally presented to parliament?

Mr. Green: It was 95 per cent, approximately, of the estimates as printed, and 97 per cent of the revised estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is unaware of anything being done about the Chignecto canal?

Mr. Green: I told the hon. member that this situation was being studied.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister indicate whether that is being done by his department or by whom?

Mr. Green: By the department.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member shows great interest in it now, but he did not show too much a few years ago.

Mr. McIlraith: I have two questions to ask the minister. Before doing so, I hope I will not attract acrimonious comment from him when I tell him that I was very pleased to hear him acknowledge, in a wholehearted way, the merit of the civil service. I hope he will not deny me the pleasure of feeling that it is, to some extent at least, to the credit of the former government that they did leave a civil service of such calibre. I think that is fair comment.

The questions I wanted to ask him are these. With regard to the discussion a few moments ago about the public works department supervising the actual construction of all federal public buildings, could he tell the house as to whether or not any decision has been reached with respect to an administrative headquarters, presumably in Ottawa, for the C.B.C.? Could he say whether or not any decision has been reached as to whether such a building, when it is built, will be built under the supervision of the public works department or the C.B.C.

Mr. Green: We have nothing to do with that.

Mr. McIlraith: My point was as to the actual construction of the building, the supervision of the work. It was very much a lively topic of discussion in the past.

My next question has to do with the policy of the government concerning the placing of public buildings on the central experimental farm. I am one of those who considers it a very happy circumstance that we have, right in the heart of our Canadian capital, the very fine central experimental farm. The minister will recall that within the last few years the previous government announced a policy of putting no further public buildings on the lands of the central experimental farm, save and except such buildings as were directly related to the agricultural work being undertaken there. Could he give the house the policy of the present government in that respect?

Mr. Green: This really comes under a particular item of the estimates. Perhaps if we could get the general item through this afternoon, then I would be glad to deal with the question.

Mr. McIlraith: The information I wanted was as to the general policy of the government on that point. It is not on a particular item. I should like an answer. If the minister wants the subject discussed on a particular item, and if he will give an undertaking of the government that it can be discussed on a particular item, I will be happy to abide by that.

Mr. Green: That would come under buildings in Ottawa, and I shall be glad to discuss it then.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

328. General administration, $8,536,892.

Mr. Robichaud: This item shows an increase from 549 to 595 employees. Could the minister explain if this increase of 46 employees is due to the establishment of new branches in the department or if it is just a normal increase in office employees?

While the minister is obtaining the information to my first question he might at the same time prepare himself to explain the increase from 58 to 117 employees in the property and building management branch. Here again is this due to new services, new branches, or is it just a regular increase in employees?

Mr. Green: There have been no new branches. There has been a readjustment which accounts for the difference in the numbers shown under this vote. Unfortunately I sent my books upstairs. I had the information all marked.

A survey of the combined office service units in district offices showed that many of the minimum services have not been provided to the technical and professional staff. This has necessitated additional positions in several districts. The heavy work load resulting from highway construction programs and the national parks necessitated six positions to carry out the work now being done by prevailing rates staff. Additional staff is needed at Edmonton to deal with increasing developments in northern construction.

Mr. Robichaud: In the details concerning the building construction branch to be found on page 460 of the blue book it is indicated there has been a decrease of 46 employees. Was that due to transfer to other services of the department? How is the decrease explained?

Mr. Green: Forty-eight additional positions have been transferred from the building construction branch as the duties of the positions relate to buildings and maintenance. It is a transfer within the department.

Mr. Robichaud: I see there is quite a difference in the development engineering branch. There is an increase from 167 to 261. Is this difference due to the hiring of new engineers in the field or an increase in the staff here in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: Large increases in the funds provided for highway construction by other departments have necessitated an increase of 94 positions in the highways division. Thirty-six of the positions were established under the supplementary estimates in 1957-58 to provide engineers in Newfoundland, the Terra Nova national park, the Northwest Territories and the western national parks. Thirty-one positions were established under the main estimates mostly for the western national parks and the Northwest Territories. These are designated as term positions to be reviewed in three years in the light of the department's commitments at that time. The additional 27 positions have been established for the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Robichaud: There is a general increase for that branch in this item 328 of a little over $1 million. There is an increase from $7,402,301 to $8,536,892. Is this increase mainly owing to salaries or to an increase in staff?

Mr. Green: Most of the increase is due to salary increases; then, of course, there is some additional staff.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising very briefly to re-echo what was said by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. I could not agree more completely with him about the excellence of the staff of the department both here in Ottawa and in the province of Newfoundland. I am sure the minister's officials will tell him, if he does not know already, there is only one thing wrong with the staff in Newfoundland and that is there are not enough of them. That was very understandable in the period when the architects and engineers and other technical personnel were so fully employed in this country that it was just not possible to hire them and probably not desirable to interfere with capital development throughout the country by going on with any public works that could reasonably be postponed. We have now reached the situation where the minister himself indicated that it was greatly in the public interest to accelerate those works in every way possible. I know from what I have seen, even in the past week, that the addition of some engineers in the province of Newfoundland would enable the department to get on more rapidly with this work, work which as the minister knows is very badly needed in that province. I have wondered what efforts were being made by the department in that direction because we all know at this time, with the universities closing, it is not hard to get competent personnel to carry on this kind of work.

Mr. Green: We will be very glad to check into this situation in Newfoundland. The officials of the department have been carrying a tremendous load during the winter months and now with the increased construction during the present season. It is not always easy to convince the treasury officials as to just how much of an increase there should be in staff. The hon. member knows that this was always somewhat of a problem.

Mr. Pickersgill: Quite.

Mr. Green: We are very anxious to keep the staff at its proper size.

Mr. Pickersgill: Anything that I can do to strengthen the minister's hand I will do. I can think of one argument he might use on the Minister of Finance. It is that the salary of half a dozen engineers in each of the provinces might save thousands and thousands and maybe millions of dollars in unemployment insurance and unemployment assistance in this country, because the bottleneck in so many of these projects is supervisory, technical and engineering staff. I know, because, when I made supplications year after year to the Department of Public Works when I was on the other side of the house, I had it explained to me by the former minister. He convinced me because I know he was right, that they just could not get on with these projects because they could not take engineers from other work which was more in the national interest; but that is not true today.

Mr. Caron: Did I understand the minister to say a while ago that the increase of over $1 million was due mostly to increases in salaries?

Mr. Green: The increases were, salaries and wages, $792,591; travelling and removal expenses, $150,000; freight, express and cartage, $2,000; telephones and telegrams, $36,000; office stationery, supplies, et cetera, $43,000; materials and supplies, $71,000; acquisition of equipment, $10,000; repairs and upkeep of the equipment, $30,000.

Mr. Caron: Has there been a general increase in the whole department or is it just increases in some branches of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Green: Most of the increase in salaries is for new positions. There are some other increases involved in it but the bulk of the sum is for new positions.

Mr. Caron: Have any increases been given to the lower bracket salaried people in the department during the last year?

Mr. Green: A general increase was approved by the present government after coming into power last summer.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the recommendation of the preceding government.

Mr. Caron: Does that apply to the lower bracket salary people?

Mr. Green: That applied to everybody.

Mr. Caron: The civil servants or the hourly rated people?

Mr. Green: The general increase applied, of course, to the permanent civil servants. Those employees on an hourly basis have their pay adjusted from time to time accordingly. They were not covered by it. The amounts are set by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Caron: I did not quite understand the last sentence.

Mr. Green: The prevailing rate employees have increases made from time to time. They are not included in the general adjustment. The prevailing rate increases are on recommendation of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Caron: Are tradesmen paid according to the rates paid union tradesmen in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: Generally speaking I believe that is the case but this again is settled by the Department of Labour.

Mr. Caron: Is it not the understanding that salaries will follow those paid to union men outside the government?

Mr. Green: My difficulty here is that this is a question of policy of the labour department, not of the Department of Public Works. Therefore I am unable to give an answer to that question. The Department of Labour recommends the rates to the Department of Public Works and we set them accordingly.

Mr. Caron: Can we get an answer when we come to the Department of Labour or can the minister get an answer for us before we finish his estimates?

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister perhaps prepare a memorandum and present it the next time his estimates are before the committee?

Mr. Green: This is a question which should be taken up when the estimates of the Department of Labour are under consideration.

Mr. Caron: The minister is quite sure that they will not refer the matter back to the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Green: I understand these rates have always been set by the Department of Labour. This is not a new practice. It has always been the case.

Mr. Caron: In the estimates book there is a total amount of $191,426,540 shown for 1957-58. Has the money all been spent or does that comprise the estimates for 1957-58 as they were presented or should have been presented?

Mr. Green: That figure of $191 million odd is the revised figure.

Mr. Caron: Has that money been spent for 1957-58?

Mr. Green: Approximately 97 per cent has been spent.

Mr. Caron: And inasmuch as no estimates were brought forward for that period that money was all spent through governor general's warrants.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Green: Most of the amount was covered by interim supply passed from time to time by the last parliament. The balance was covered by governor general's warrants.

Mr. Caron: Without the estimates being discussed.

Mr. Green: They are to be brought up by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Caron: Will we have the details of what has been spent by governor general's warrants some time during this session so that we can discuss them?

Mr. Green: That is to be brought before the house by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Caron: I want to know if we will have the details before us for the amount which has been spent through governor general's warrants or the other part covered by interim supply.

Mr. Green: My understanding is that those figures will be available.

Mr. Caron: They will be furnished.

Mr. Chevrier: May I revert for a moment to the confidential reports my hon. friend referred to the other day in connection with harbour and river improvements. Do these reports cover all of the ports along the St. Lawrence? Can the minister give us some idea of the ports with respect to which a special study has been made and where it is anticipated river and harbour improvements will be carried out?

Mr. Green: In connection with these lower St. Lawrence ports the main or supplementary estimates contain substantial items for port improvements at Rimouski, Seven Islands and Sorel and in addition there are sizeable items for Pointe au Pere and Riviere du Loup. During the last winter investigations were made of harbours at Matane, Pointe au Pere, Rimouski and Riviere du Loup on the south side of the St. Lawrence as well as Chandler and Gaspe farther east on the Gaspe peninsula. In addition, of course, there have been investigations made at the lakehead, Sault Ste. Marie, Windsor, Sarnia, Kingston, Cornwall, and there may have been others.

Mr. Chevrier: Are these investigations made in the light of the new traffic that is likely to ensue following the opening of the 27-foot channel?

Mr. Green: Oh yes, that is one of the main reasons for making these investigations. We have a team go out composed of representatives from the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport.

Mr. Chevrier: Is any specific attention being given to the north shore of the St. Lawrence river where, because of iron ore development, railway installation and natural resources development, additional facilities will be required?

Mr. Green: As the hon. member knows, some of the ports I have mentioned are on the north shore of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the minister give the amounts involved?

Mr. Green: They appear in the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want them in detail as it would take too long. Can he give the over-all amount for the ports east of Montreal?

Mr. Green: We have not got figures here worked out on that basis. Some of the ports on the St. Lawrence, of course, do not come under the Department of Public Works. They are under the national harbours board. I refer to Montreal, Chicoutimi, Quebec, Three Rivers—

Mr. Chevrier: You have named them all.

Item agreed to.

591. General administration—further amount required, $102,800.

Mr. Batten: I want to make one or two remarks and one or two inquiries concerning public buildings in the province of Newfoundland and in my own constituency.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 591 is to be found in the supplementary estimates at page 8. It is another administration item.

Mr. Batten: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I will wait until we get to item 329.

Mr. Green: The supplementary estimate is to increase the general administration item by $102,800. The details will be found at page 27 of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I ask this question? Is it not a little bit unusual to start taking the supplementary estimates before we have finished with the main estimates? I have a feeling that greater progress would be made in the committee if we could go ahead with the main estimates and then deal with the supplementary estimates later.

Mr. Green: I do not care one way or the other. It has been done both ways. Some departments take the supplementaries with the regular estimates. Others do not do that. Mind you, it makes for a clearer explanation of the total amount that has been spent on the different items if the supplementaries are dealt with at the same time as the main estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister would rather do it that way, it is all right with me.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 591 carry?

Mr. Caron: Then it is the intention of the minister to discuss the supplementaries first and then come back to the other ones?

Mr. Green: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings construction and services—

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—

329. Newfoundland, $3,461,474.

Mr. Batten: I should like to make one or two remarks and also ask a couple of questions about the public buildings in the province of Newfoundland and in the riding of Humber-St. George's. May I first refer to the public building which now exists at St. Andrew's. This is a small public building. It came into federal ownership as one of the terms of confederation. It is now, I think, long past its usefulness. It is no longer able to serve the community as a post office. It is poorly located. Over the last few months there has been some considerable correspondence concerning this building. I wonder whether the minister is in a position now to give me any information as to what can be done about this problem.

Mr. Green: We will look into the question of the building at this particular location.

Mr. Batten: May I refer to one other building. There is one other public building in my constituency that needs attention, the public building situated at Port au Port. This building is not as old as the one now existing at St. Andrew's. However, it is a very small building and it is completely inadequate to handle the mail that must be handled at this particular point, inasmuch as Port au Port is the distribution centre for the whole peninsula. There is a small anteroom or waiting room on the outside and then there is the inner office which, even for an average mail, is too small to accommodate the number of bags of mail that arrive, and the mail has to be handled in the outside part where it is trodden on by people coming to be served at the post office. I think there has been some discussion as to what are the possibilities of making this building a little bit larger and more suitable for handling the work it is required to handle. I wonder whether the minister, when giving me some information about the post office at St. Andrew's would also give me some information concerning the building at Port au Port?

Mr. Green: The hon. member will be glad to hear that we are now making plans for a building at Port au Port and we hope to get it started this year.

Mr. Batten: I thank the minister for that information. Is he in a position now to give me any indication as to what type of building this will be and when tenders will be called?

Mr. Green: It is an addition to the present building.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not quite so cheerful.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo raised a question about the buildings at Burin and at Harbour Buffett. The former was authorized on March 26 of this year and the latter on March 3 of this year. One of them is already under construction. We hope to get them both built this year.

He made some other quite interesting suggestions. For example, he urged the use of local veneer. He said that the veneer plant had been unable to qualify. My instructions are that the specifications were not such as to prevent bids by the Newfoundland plant. They allow for birch plywood. Then he also asked us to build a larger building at Marystown. The Department of Public Works does not necessarily set the size of the building. That will depend upon the requests made by the other departments; for example, in this case the request was made by the Post Office Department. We are adding 200 extra square feet to the building at Marystown. There was some trouble there in connection with getting a site, apparently.

Mr. Carter: No.

Mr. Green: I am wrong. The hon. member complained about the site not being large enough.

Mr. Carter: That is right.

Mr. Green: The view of the officials is that the site is adequate. One difficulty was that the suggestion was made by the town that this building should also house a civic centre and provincial offices. If it were to do that, of course it might have to be bigger. However, we are not in the business of providing office space for civic centres or for provincial governments.

Then he raised the point of using local labour. In our contracts there are standard provisions that local labour must be employed. In addition to that, we are constantly on the watch for ways of making sure that the local people get as much as possible of the business where projects are being built in their district.

It is not as easy as it looks because when we call for tenders somebody may come in with a lower tender who may not be doing business in the particular centre where the project is being built and we cannot maintain a low tender basis of doing business and at the same time refuse to give a contract to a man who happens to make the lowest tender because he lives somewhere else. Every effort, however, is made to create the maximum amount of benefit from these projects in those areas where the projects are being constructed.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question on a point of information. Is this a period when all 207 backbenchers might ask about all the buildings in our constituencies to find out what they are going to be built of and why they are not built in the different villages or towns?

The Chairman: We are now discussing item 329 which covers public buildings, construction and services.

Mr. Green: Perhaps I might help the hon. member by telling him that every member is entitled to do so but I am hoping that they all will not.

Mr. Carter: Following up what the minister has just said, could he say what control is exercised by his department in order to ensure that local labour is employed, because we do have riggers out of work in St. John's at the present time while riggers are being brought in from the mainland.

Mr. Green: Officials of the department try to watch this very closely and to see that local labour is employed.

Mr. Carter: I pointed out to the minister earlier today how overworked is his staff, and I know that in the St. John's office they are terribly overworked, so I do not see how they could possibly have much opportunity to look after matters of this kind in addition to the ordinary work of his department.

Mr. Green: We do the best we can and if the hon. member, or if any hon. member knows of a case where this is not being done we will be very grateful for any information they can give us about it.

Mr. Carter: I do not think there is any indication of laxity on the part of the minister's officials. I was not trying to imply that at all, but I do know that I have received complaints from riggers in St. John's who wonder why they cannot get work on these buildings when people are being brought in from the mainland to do the same job.

Mr. Green: The department apparently has not been aware of this situation and we will look into it at once.

Mr. Carter: May I ask the minister a question about this local industry. We manufacture a number of products in Newfoundland today such as cement, etcetera, which could be used in public buildings. I have just been made aware that the minister answered part of this question while I was in the lobby and did not hear him. Could the minister tell me, however, whether the local industries had an opportunity to tender on materials for these public buildings?

Mr. Green: Local industry would have to tender to the head contractor.

Mr. Carter: Yes, but my understanding is that when they tender to the contractor the contractor finds himself bound by the specifications with respect to materials which are actually written out in the contract and if the particular product is not actually specified by name then they cannot tender.

Mr. Green: If the hon. member will give us an example where this has been done we will remedy the situation at once.

Mr. Carter: This is not a complaint peculiar to Newfoundland; I am getting complaints of this kind from all over the maritimes. The people of the maritimes complain that local suppliers do not have a chance of supplying materials required for public buildings, and they blame the situation on the specifications. Some even go so far as to imply there are lobbies in Ottawa to get preference for certain materials.

Mr. Green: I would not like the hon. member to spread the news around, but we actually specify local materials are to be used, wherever possible in the maritimes.

Mr. Carter: And that includes Newfoundland?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Hardie: On the question of local labour, is there any way in which the minister could write into the contract that a certain percentage of local labour must be used?

Mr. Green: This is actually written into the contract.

Mr. Pickersgill: When I spoke earlier today I was just about to say something with respect to standard plans to which the minister had referred when he opened the discussion. This matter is very relevant to this particular item because there is no doubt that there are a number of public buildings needed, such as post offices, in some of the middle-sized places of Newfoundland. These have not been built in the last few years, for the reasons I indicated earlier with which I think the minister agreed. It would be a very great help to have these buildings constructed at this time when the provision of employment is so vital. As to standard plans, I have in mind particularly the plans used at Glovertown and Joe Batt's Arm. Buildings of the kind I have mentioned are well adapted to these communities and those plans could be used. There are a number of other communities. I do not profess to know other parts of Newfoundland as well as I know my own riding, but in my own riding there are three or four places which would qualify with exactly the same criteria as the two I have mentioned. So far as revenues and amount of postal and telegraph business are concerned they are equally suitable for projects of this kind. I have a few places to add to the minister's shelf, although I do not seriously expect him to get all this work done this year because I know the estimates are now before us. I know, however, that he is anxious to go ahead with his planning for the next year so that he can really make an early start and so that that start will not be just the vision mentioned in his speech, but a reality.

I would mention, therefore, that Gambo and Hare Bay would undoubtedly qualify. I would also like to ask the minister, although he may not have the information immediately if he would tell me before the estimates are concluded whether the announcement made by my opponent during the election campaign to the effect that a building was going to be constructed this year at Badger's Quay is correct. I believe it is correct, and I hope it is, but there is no evidence of it in the estimates. I presume the reason is the same as in the case of Wesleyville, namely that it is not expected to exceed $20,000 in cost and therefore does not have to be specified separately.

While on this subject there are two other points I would like to mention and one perhaps is a criticism of the administration to which I belonged. Even though I was a member of the government for four years, I was never able to discover—so well kept was the secret—who or which department it is that really decides the size of these buildings. If you go to the Post Office Department they will say, "Oh, yes, we ask for so much, but those people in the Department of Public Works always screw us down", and, if you go to the Department of Public Works, they say, "We are just purveyors. Whatever the Post Office Department asks for, we give them."

I am sure the minister must have had that experience himself when he was over here, and I just wanted to confide in him that even a minister of the crown has the same experience. However, with this new regime where there are going to be no secrets and everything is going to be out in the open I think it would be wonderful if the minister would tell us, once and for all—and would get the Postmaster General to agree with him before he says it—which department it is that really does decide. I am making this plea primarily for the benefit of the 150 members opposite who will not get much chance to speak on the estimates and who are just as much interested as we are in these matters. I know that they would like to know to which department they ought to go, whether it is the Post Office Department or Public Works.

The fact of the matter is that, it has been a regrettable experience that whichever department it is has never been able to appreciate how rapidly Newfoundland is growing. Again, I say this may be slightly in criticism of the administration to which I belonged, but it is true that practically every public building that has been built in Newfoundland is already too small. The building at Stephenville—I believe the hon. member for Humber-St. George's will confirm this—was too small before it was opened. The building at Deer lake, which was opened only two years ago, is going to have an addition to it already, according to the estimate. We are glad to have Newfoundland growing. We hope it is going to continue to grow, even under the adversity of a Tory government.

Mr. Green: That is why it is growing.

Mr. Pickersgill: One of the best expressions the minister can give of his confidence in his own government, and in the results of his administration, would be to see that these buildings are 25 per cent to 30 per cent bigger than those which the post office requests. If the minister will do that, and if he will build buildings at Hare Bay and Gambo, and at one or two other places I will mention on another occasion, I am sure that he will make a lot of people in Newfoundland happy and a lot of people think better of his administration.

Mr. Green: I was rather surprised that the hon. member raised this question of the size of buildings because I understood that my predecessor thought the building at Bonavista was too large.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister take that view? I saw that building in Bonavista this week, and I can assure the minister that all the rooms in the building seemed to be fully occupied. When the mail comes in three times a week, the waiting room is pretty well filled, too. The building is actually a credit to the people of Canada and a fine symbol of the advantages of confederation.

Mr. Green: I hope they did not all turn out just to meet the hon. member?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad the minister mentioned that point, because a large number of them did turn out, I regret to say, to ask the hon. member if he could find them a job. If the minister could only get ahead with his dredging and his work on the piers at Bonavista some of these people would have jobs and would not have to be asking for one.

Mr. Green: The hon. member will be glad to hear that we are going to build a post office at Badger's Quay this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am delighted.

Mr. Green: In so far as the responsibility for determining the size of these government buildings is concerned, that must be a matter of co-operation between the departments. While we do build many buildings for the Post Office Department, we build an increasing number of buildings in which other departments of government are housed. I am afraid the position must continue that this is a matter of co-operation between the different departments.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is one other question I should like to ask, and that is all I have to say on this item. Can the minister give us some estimate as to when it is expected the customs and post office buildings respectively will be completed in St. John's?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There is more than Newfoundland in this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, but they did not elect anybody to speak for them.

Mr. Green: The answer to the last question asked by the hon. member is that we expect these buildings to be completed in mid-1959.

Mr. Carter: Would the minister say if the amount of space provided in the building now proposed for Marystown is the same as was requested or equal to what was requested by the Post Office Department?

Mr. Green: The area is 20 per cent greater.

Mr. Carter: It is 20 per cent greater than what?

Mr. Green: It is 20 per cent greater than that agreed upon by the post office.

Mr. Carter: My question was, is it greater than the area requested by the post office, not what was agreed upon?

Mr. Green: Yes, 20 per cent.

Mr. Robichaud: While we are on this item of public buildings, construction and services, could the minister state if the Department of Public Works has a definite policy concerning the construction of post office buildings? What I mean is, does the revenue of a post office have to be up to a certain amount, or is it just built where the demand is strong enough?

Mr. Green: These questions are very carefully considered by each of the departments. They set up different priorities for different centres. For example, No. 1 city may be put in category A, and then the building there would be built ahead of the building in a centre in the second category. By the way, this year we either have or will have under construction all the category A buildings, and about half of those in category B.

Mr. Robichaud: My question was, before the department decides to build a post office building must the revenue of that particular office attain a certain level?

Mr. Green: That is a factor in the decision as to whether there will be a new building. Mind you, there are other factors. There may be a satisfactory lease. You cannot lay down any general rule because conditions are different in the different cities.

Mr. Tucker: With reference to unemployment and the clause that local help must be used on these works, I hope the minister will see to it that they adhere strictly to the clause. I should like to ask if in every public building erected in the different towns there is always provision made for the necessary washroom facilities?

Mr. Green: Yes, I understand provision is made for our own employees, but of course not for the general public.

Mr. Tucker: Not always, I understand.

Mr. Carter: I have a few more questions to ask, but it is now six o'clock.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, will the house leader indicate what the business will be on Monday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, by arrangement between the parties we are to have a one-day supply motion on Monday with the understanding that at least by ten o'clock we shall get into supply when under the rules we can call three departments. If by any chance we should get into supply before ten o'clock we would go on with the public works estimates.

On Tuesday we intend to start with the resolution dealing with hospital insurance and then to follow that with the resolution concerning the Department of Transport Act, the resolution on the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the one with regard to the Cape Breton Highlands national park. We only have until six o'clock because the budget speech will be delivered at eight.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in view of the extreme co-operation which the minister has received on the first item of his estimates perhaps I could persuade him to go a bit further and tell us what we might expect on Wednesday, if that is possible.

Mr. Green: I am not yet sure about Wednesday. We may conclude the debate on the NORAD agreement and then take other government business which happens to be on the order paper. Next Thursday may be government business or we may go into supply and on Friday an arrangement has been made under which the debate on the budget will commence.

Mr. Speaker: I understand from the house leader that all parties have agreed that the supply motion on Monday will be a one-day motion and there will be no time carried forward beyond that and the vote will be taken at the end of the discussion or at the end of the first day.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the case so far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Herridge: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is agreed.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

RIGHT HONOURABLE HAROLD MACMILLAN,

Prime Minister of the United Kingdom

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

ON

FRIDAY, JUNE 13, 1958, AT 10.00 A.M.

Mr. Macmillan was welcomed by the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Hon. Mark Robert Drouin, Speaker of the Senate, and the Hon. Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of both houses of parliament: This is the third time that a prime minister of the United Kingdom during and since the war has spoken in this chamber. Our thoughts are carried back to those dark days during the war when freedom hung in the balance, and when there was made in this chamber by that indomitable statesman Sir Winston Churchill a speech which gave new hope to the legions of freedom everywhere in the world. Mr. Macmillan and Sir Winston have in common not only their devotion to national and international well-being, but through their maternal strain both unite their own country with the United States of America in its partnership with us without which freedom cannot be achieved in the world.

On this occasion I know you would want me to say as well that we are very happy that Lady Dorothy Macmillan has accompanied her husband at this time. We remember that it was during the days following the first great war that here in this city of Ottawa Mr. Macmillan met his bride-to-be.

In these difficult days the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom approaches the critical world problems with wisdom, with loyalty, with long experience in business and as a House of Commons man, and with the scholarly clarity born of outstanding academic distinction. He is one whose mind has been tempered in his devotion to the great masters of history and politics, and whose desire for peace and the necessity of its maintenance was born of his own experience of the terrible toll of war. One of his great predecessors, Benjamin Disraeli, once offered this as a definition of a statesman: "One who represents a great idea, an idea with which he may identify himself, an idea which he may and can impress on the mind and conscience of a nation".

That definition is one to which Mr. Macmillan conforms in his devotion to the achievement not only of the well-being of his own nation and of a prosperous commonwealth dedicated to freedom, but in addition thereto in his never-ending efforts on behalf of peace.

During the last couple of days he and I and my colleagues have been associated in informal discussions. No one anywhere in the world need fear the purposes or the objectives of these and similar meetings. These discussions are not in the nature of conspiracies, but are conferences for peace designed to attain the joining of our efforts for the maintenance of an honourable and humane international society.

Today the joint purpose of all of us must be never to weary in well-doing and to realize at all times that while some may say it is a futile objective to have that idealism in the face of the sometimes sheer paralysis in the inflexible stand of the U.S.S.R., we must not consider that quest as futile. Out of this meeting has been reinforced, as I see it, the conviction that we will not be "futilitarians", however great the frustrations may be, but will continue to do everything we can to do our part simply, humbly and justly in order to bring about the assurance of peace to generations to come.

On your behalf and on behalf of the Canadian people I welcome Mr. Macmillan as a scholar, a soldier, a world statesman, commonwealth friend and expounder; the Right Honourable Harold Macmillan, Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

Address by Right Hon. H. Macmillan

Right Hon. Harold Macmillan (Prime Minister of the United Kingdom): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, and members of both houses of parliament: I am very grateful for the invitation which has been extended to me to address the Canadian parliament. I have spent 34 years of my life listening to speeches in the House of Commons. I therefore know what a high compliment it is for parliamentarians to add voluntarily to the burdens they may have to undertake.

I remember very well sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons in Canada in Ottawa nearly 40 years ago. At that time I was a young member of the governor general's staff, which I joined shortly after the end of the first world war. I recall in particular the leading figures on both sides. Mr. Meighen, happily still with us, was on one side, and on the other was Mr. Mackenzie King. Those were the heroic days of parliamentary debate. Being already attracted to politics, I used to spend many hours listening to these classical masters of oratory. If I remember right the fashion of that day was that speakers were not only very polished but sometimes—dare I say it—somewhat prolix.

I listened to your proceedings as a young man, and now in revisiting your parliament after this great lapse of time I am reminded of a story of Sir Winston Churchill who is still, I am happy to say, an active member of the British House of Commons. On a visit to America and Canada in the middle of the last war he was persuaded somewhat against his will, for he was much pressed for time, to go to Niagara falls, which he had not seen for 40 years. When asked what he thought about it he made this observation, "Well, the principle of the thing seems much the same". So, if I may say so, it is with your parliament.

I lived a year in Canada, and I had the good fortune to travel over the greater part of the country. In fact I think I have visited perhaps more places from coast to coast than have many Canadians. I took away from Canada the most happy memories. I made many friendships which have lasted through the years. I also took back two precious gifts: first, the return of my health—for I was a cripple from war wounds when I came here; and second, a gift to which you have made kind allusion, Mr. Prime Minister—a wife. I am glad to say that I have contrived, in spite of the ups and downs of life, to preserve both these blessings.

The last time I was in Ottawa was in November of last year. I had already had the good fortune, Mr. Prime Minister, to make a friendship with you in the summer previous when you came post-haste from a general election to the commonwealth prime ministers' conference. I shall always admire the way in which you arrived almost at a day's notice. Nor can I forget that at that conference by your inspiration and persistence there were sown the seeds of the commonwealth trade and economic conference to which we are looking forward with such high hopes. The first stage took place within a few months at Mont Tremblant last year. For the second, the preparatory work of experts and officials is now proceeding. I earnestly hope that the conference will mark a great advance in commonwealth co-operation in trade and commerce.

When I saw the Prime Minister and the cabinet seven months ago we had full and frank discussions; but if I remember right it was a position of some political uncertainty. Since then you have had another election and you, Mr. Prime Minister, have the satisfaction of being now supported by a large majority in the house.

Perhaps you will allow me without impertinence to make some reflections upon the ups and downs of politics. You have had them in this country, and we have had them in ours. Great successes are very agreeable when they come, and defeats are correspondingly disappointing; but both victory and defeat are in our democratic system part of the game. We learn to accept them cheerfully and look forward to the next time. We recognize that the rights of minorities must be respected as well as the powers of majorities, and perhaps this is the special strength of our tradition and our democratic system. It is based on, and indeed it can only be preserved by, good humour, common sense and fair play.

This leads me to venture some observations about the commonwealth as a whole. I have had in the last few months a most wonderful experience. I made a tour, much too rapid to be satisfactory but comprehensive enough to be inspiring, of five commonwealth countries in as many weeks. All of them have their problems—India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Australia, New Zealand. I hope I may be allowed some day to make not only these occasional visits to the capital of Canada, but a more prolonged visit to other parts of the country. This tour which I made in January made me realize more deeply what I had already known but perhaps had not fully comprehended, the immense force for good which the commonwealth is and can be in the world today.

What is it that binds us together? The United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa—we are, of course, held together by common origins and tradition.

We feel a deep and personal loyalty to the crown, perhaps never more than today. We are fortunate indeed to have in our Queen so noble a representative of the royal function. But there are many countries of the commonwealth which do not share common origins or common allegiance. We are not, all of us, bound together by ties of race, colour or religion. In these countries of Asia and Africa even the crown itself, so dear to you and to us, is respected more as a symbol of commonwealth unity than as a real and personal object of loyalty.

What, then, is this spirit that breathes upon this unique community of nations? It is, I think, closely connected with what I was trying to say just now about our parliamentary system and how we work it. It is the idea of free government, freedom of the law, of law and government separated, the judiciary uncontrolled by legislature or executive. It is the belief in government by consent, by debate, by committee, by local authority, by parliament. Above all, perhaps, it is the conviction that the state was made for man and not man for the state. People who believe in these ideals will never surrender to materialism or to tyranny.

Of course the new nations of Asia and Africa have many problems and difficulties, but I have been deeply impressed with the deep impact which our people and our institutions have had upon these peoples of the east. I am quite sure of this; we do not gain in their estimation by denigrating the very real contributions which we have made. I am not thinking only of the great viceroys, the famous governors, the conquering generals; I am thinking about the work done throughout the subcontinent of India and throughout many parts of Asia and Africa by quite simple people—the district officer, the doctor, the missionary, the schoolmaster. These men come from humble homes; the small squire, the professional class and above all from vicarage and manse. The work they did is not forgotten. It is still fruitful, more fruitful perhaps than they ever could have dreamed. All these ideas and examples have revivified the old societies of the east, and if now the new vigour and bursting energy of these lands seems sometimes wrongly directed, let us remember this simple fact. In the great struggle for the future of mankind which has continued throughout all history and is now perhaps more intense than ever, the ideals of the commonwealth, steadily pursued, have put the commonwealth nations firmly on the side of freedom.

Military alliances, economic pacts, formal guarantees; all these are good and necessary and have served us well. We in Britain are proud to be the only nation to belong to all three defensive groupings in the world—NATO, SEATO and the Baghdad pact. Nevertheless these do not of themselves bring us new friends or win over the hesitant and doubtful, for this is a struggle partly of power and partly of ideas. In this struggle it is, in my view, the ideas and the ideals which will count in the long run, and in all these the commonwealth of today has a vital role to play.

It would be wrong to think that in this world struggle we can take only a defensive posture. The steady growth of the commonwealth is, indeed, the best evidence that our way of life is positive and vital. That is what we have to show to all the other peoples of the world who are hesitating to commit themselves, as well as to those who are at present under the yoke of Soviet domination.

You may ask how will it all end. I do not believe that we need fear the future if we hold firm to our faith and our ideals. In time even the monolithic dictatorships crumble and change, for although the free world by its very diversity often seems weak, in its variety and above all in its freedom it is fundamentally strong. I do not believe that a purely materialistic concept of life will forever satisfy men and women; nor do I fear a continuing struggle of ideas. This I think should be our chosen battleground.

(Translation):

In this large family which is the commonwealth, Canada represents a link of vital significance. Yours is a special position. I believe that Canada and Great Britain have never felt closer than at this time. We hope and strive to increase that cooperation in all fields. I have already referred to the economic conference. It is more than that. It is the feeling that you and I have, Mr. Prime Minister, as members of the same team, serving the same Queen, and humbly dedicated to identical aims.

And to you, French-speaking Canadians particularly, I can say that you are living examples of unity in the free world. The traditions of French civilization were entrusted to your forefathers. In preserving them with unwavering tenacity, you have nevertheless successfully transformed and adapted the traditions of the past. And by this transformation, you yourselves have developed. But other Canadians have changed too. And from this blend, unique in the world, rises the splendour of Canada as it is today.

(Text):

May I with your permission, Mr. Speaker, add a few words about the old country. It is not too often that the people at home talk much about themselves, except of course in self-criticism. If you were to read what the newspapers say about us, what the opposition say about us, what the backbenchers of the government party say about us, what the popular writers say about us, what the television stars say about us, and what the broadcasting experts and columnists say about us, you would really think that the poor old country was on the way out. But this habit of self-criticism in the British people—I should really say the English people—can be very misleading.

Being half a Scot and half an American I can look at the English people with that special devotion which only those with no English blood would dare express. They are really a most wonderful folk. They go on grousing away, but do not be misled. Quite a lot of people have been misled in my lifetime; the Kaiser was, and so was Hitler. The truth is that although they affect to be idle, flighty and even cynical, they are in fact a most hard-working people with deep-rooted principles and a strong sense of duty and devotion. The only thing is that they do not like talking about it.

In the 12 years since the war the old country has carried a pretty heavy burden. When I was a young man and joined the army in 1914 the national debt of Great Britain was £800 million. Today, it is £27,000 million. We have not repudiated these debts; we have not got out of them by wild inflation as some other countries have done. We have tried to pay our way by honest money. We have raised our standard of living to almost the highest in the world. Since the last war we have raised our exports from £900 million to £3,500 million. We have increased industrial production by nearly 60 per cent, and we have increased investment at home by 120 per cent. We have increased our lending abroad to an average of over £200 million a year—now running higher than that, because I said an average—and all of this invested in the commonwealth.

In the five years immediately after the war we naturally had great difficulties. The average deficit in our balance of payments was £80 million a year. Over the last five years we have had an average surplus of £170 million a year, and this improvement is continuing. Naturally, since our reserves are too slender for the immense business which we finance, we are always subject to temporary difficulties. Almost 40 per cent of the world's trade is done in sterling, in our money, and we have only 4 per cent of the world's reserves to support it. But we shall get through future difficulties as we have done the last ones. The only thing that up to now we have not been good at is salesmanship, and that, with your help and by your example, we are now learning.

I was particularly pleased at the job done by the visiting Canadian delegation a few months ago. The contacts that were built up and the close association that we have now with Canadian industry are going to produce some remarkable results as the months go by. We have with your government the closest understanding. We have between your industries and ours novel and quite remarkable developments in practical co-operation. Your industrialists have been to see our country and how good the stuff is that we have to sell. We hope that our recent mission to Canada under Sir William Rootes will have helped us to add still further to our understanding. We are looking forward, therefore, to increased mutual trade and closer working in all industrial and economic fields.

Our two peoples, among so many other things in common, have also this which ties us together. There is a word, which like most of the sacred things we do not find it easy to bandy about; which we do not talk about, but feel, and that word is "loyalty". Canada was founded on loyalty. The people of the old country, with all their differences and divergences, are a profoundly loyal people.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is with deep emotion that I have the honour to speak in this chamber as Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. I never dreamt as a young man of such a possibility. Now that it has come I can scarcely believe it, but the message I bring to you is one based upon the thoughts of my early youth and confirmed by later experience. Our people and your people have been tested twice in my lifetime, tested in a hard school through two long wars and the harsh and difficult problems that follow war, but never were Canada and Britain closer together than they are today. Each of us can say to the other, with sincerity and truth, those beautiful words we know so well:

> Whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.

(Translation):

Hon. Mark Robert Drouin (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. Prime Minister, may I, on behalf of the members of the Canadian Senate, express the pleasure your visit to Canada has brought us. We were happy to learn that you had kindly consented to address us in this house, and I wish to offer my most sincere thanks for the admirable speech you have just delivered. Each of us, I am sure, has found in it food for deep thought.

I would also like to avail myself of the opportunity, Mr. Prime Minister, to express, on behalf of those senators and members who, like myself, are of French descent, the pleasure we felt while listening to you speak to us in our native tongue.

Our country is rightly proud of the visit of so illustrious a personage as you are, and we are most happy to have you with us at this time.

As was said by the right hon. Prime Minister, this is the third time in less than 20 years that a prominent spokesman of the United Kingdom has honoured this house by his visit and enlightened it by his authoritative statements.

In December, 1941, it was the Right Hon. Sir Winston Churchill whose engaging personality was the hope and inspiration of the democratic world during the dark hours of the war. In February, 1956, we welcomed the Right Hon. Anthony Eden, who played such a great part in the administration of the foreign affairs of his country. Today, we welcome you, Right Hon. Mr. Macmillan, who, in these uncertain days, continue to play the same prominent part as your predecessors. To us, you are the personification of the importance and the greatness of the United Kingdom. This relationship between our two countries is of the highest order. Owing to our frequent consultations, we have been in a position to work in perfect understanding for the promotion of our mutual progress and development. Has it not been said, and rightly so, that the commonwealth countries constitute a vital part of the business world? Although those countries have evolved and have reached nationhood, the similarities which they have preserved create among this group of parliamentary democracies a relationship which allows them to spread their influence throughout the world and to contribute to the establishment of a spirit of understanding and cohesion.

We are confident, Mr. Prime Minister, that this relationship will continue to be strengthened with the years.

The whole of Canada welcomes you as an ambassador of friendship and of peace, two sentiments which are made especially alive by your kind presence here today. May I say to you, sir, how deep an impression you leave with us? Your visit here has extraordinary importance at a time when some international problems remain unsolved. Moreover, it symbolizes the loyalty which unites our two countries; it is the symbol of the sustained efforts your country made after terrible years of hardships. If, at the most critical time of history, we sometimes tend to lose faith in the future, we only have to look upon the glorious past of your country to find new courage and energy.

We are all rightly proud to be members of the commonwealth, this group of partners who, in a spirit of equality and fraternity, work for the maintenance of peace and freedom in co-operation with other agencies of world security. Such is the ideal you represent, Mr. Prime Minister, and in closing my remarks I should like to endorse the opinion expressed by one of our French-speaking newspapers, on the occasion of your visit:

> There is no doubt that, like previous ones, this meeting between the head of the government of Great Britain and the head of the government of Canada will be friendly and will afford both countries a new opportunity to strengthen friendly ties which are not to be neglected in the western world at the present time.

Therefore, I have the great honour, Mr. Prime Minister, of expressing to you, on behalf of this assembly which represents the Canadian nation as a whole, our deep gratitude for your visit, and I should like to transmit, through you, to all your fellow citizens our sincere and friendly regards.

(Text):

Hon. Roland Michener (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. Prime Minister Macmillan, on behalf of the House of Commons I have the honour to add our words of appreciation to those expressed by my colleague of the Senate. From our point of view it is particularly appropriate that you should have spoken to the Canadian parliament and people in this chamber, the green chamber of the commons. Although it may look a bit strange to your parliamentary eye by reason of its expanse and its comfortable armchairs and desks as contrasted with the narrow benches of your own house, the Speaker's chair, which is an exact replica of the one in Westminster whence it came as a gift of your parliament, should fill you with that familiar sense of uncertain security which this ancient seat has symbolized for generations of house leaders.

You will agree, I believe, that in spirit we are a true House of Commons in which responsible government is carried on in the British tradition, with only such variations as were needed in a federal union of two races and many regions. As you have remarked, these parliamentary institutions and practices have taken root in all the self-governing nations of the commonwealth, and bind us together with an understanding of each other's politics which is certainly a broader if not a stronger bond of union than those of language and race. So it has been in your travels about the commonwealth; you have been welcomed with pleasure and understanding by fellow parliamentarians, Asian, British and French, all speaking the same language of the standing orders and rules of procedure.

You have been welcomed, of course, for your own sake; for your friendly charm and your great personal attainments and, as our Prime Minister has mentioned, in this case for the presence of your charming wife. But this commonwealth welcome is deeper. It recognizes in you as the Prime Minister of the original parliament a personification of the ancient source from which we have all drawn and to which we still look for living example and inspiration, and through which we communicate one with the other.

Knowing your heavy responsibilities, although you do your best to conceal them, we are the more grateful that you have found time to speak to us today. We thank you for your message and your greetings. We ask you to accept our heartfelt good wishes and to carry them with you to your own House of Commons and people.

Monday, June 16, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE BUDGET

TABLING OF BUDGET PAPERS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have tabled the budget papers in connection with the budget which I hope to present tomorrow evening. In keeping with past practice and for the convenience of the house and that of subscribers to Hansard, may I move that the budget papers be published as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings and as an appendix to tomorrow's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to agree to this proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

POWER

NEW BRUNSWICK-NOVA SCOTIA—TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT AND AGREEMENTS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): As this is the first occasion that I have to table the report under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act I think I should mention it in the house, because there have been a number of questions asking when this report would be available. I am now tabling the report along with two agreements signed with the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These agreements are attached to the annual report now tabled.

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the fact that the power agreements with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have now been tabled, would the minister comment on the statement made in Fredericton on June 11, and reported by the Canadian Press on June 12, by the chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, which reads as follows:

No agreement has yet been completed with the federal government with regard to the Saint John thermal plant. The agreement is still under study and being prepared.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I shall have to ask the hon. member to send me a copy of the statement and I will make a comment on it later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East) moved that the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented to the house on June 12, 1958, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BELGIUM FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-28, to implement a convention between Canada and Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income taxes.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This bill follows the form which has become quite customary in recent years, and confirms an agreement recently reached with Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax. The agreement follows the form which has been used with respect to a number of countries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND BELGIUM FOR THE AVOIDANCE OF DOUBLE TAXATION IN BELGIAN CONGO AND RUANDA-URUNDI

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-29, to implement a convention between Canada and Belgium for the purpose of extending to the Belgian Congo and the territory of Ruanda-Urundi under trusteeship the convention between Canada and Belgium for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income taxes.

He said: The explanation of this agreement and bill is the same as I gave with respect to the previous bill. The first agreement applied to Belgium. This second agreement applies to the Belgian Congo and to one other Belgian territory.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

Motion No. 6—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate proceeds with the motion.

Mr. Green: Could we ask that this stand?

Mr. Pickersgill: This has been stood for some time. Could the leader of the house indicate when he expects to proceed with it.

Mr. Green: We hope to be able to go ahead with it on the next occasion when it comes up in the house.

Motion stands.

HEALTH INSURANCE—ONTARIO AGREEMENT

Motion No. 13—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

For a copy of the agreement signed by the federal government and the province of Ontario in the matter of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act on February 25, 1958.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position to report to the house on the conferences which he and members of his government had with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom last week.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to do that tomorrow. There are some details that have to be filled in before a full report can be made. I could give a general report at the moment, but I feel if the question were left for a day or so I would be in a position to give a rather more ample report than I could give at this time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, related to these conferences may I ask the Prime Minister if he will comment on the accuracy of press reports to the effect that during the United Kingdom Prime Minister's visit our Prime Minister intervened to prevent a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation commentator from asking Prime Minister Macmillan a question about the United Kingdom free trade offer?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to do that. As a matter of fact what actually took place was this. Following a press conference at which matters were very fully discussed there was a meeting between the Prime Minister and myself. We discussed various matters, it being understood that thereafter there would be a joint conference before the C.B.C. When we came out we met with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation representatives and just before the interview commenced the Prime Minister asked what the questions were. As I recall it the first question on the list of two was as to whether or not the representations or the so-called proposal advanced last September regarding free trade with the United Kingdom would be on the agenda of the trade conference this fall. I said, "No, no," and then that terminated it as far as I was concerned. Naturally, thereafter I was surprised to find the comment that was made respecting what took place. In point of fact a mountain was made out of a molehill.

I can only say in so far as this government is concerned at no time has there ever been, directly or indirectly, any interference with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and the nature of the observations made from time to time by commentators regarding this government and its undertakings since it came into power would be an effective answer to anyone who would suggest the contrary. In other words, there has not been and will not be any interference of this kind on the part of this government, either directly or indirectly, and there was no suggestion of that in any way the other day nor will there be at any other time. After all, while we may disagree with what is said about us, and while criticism of those in public life is sometimes not factual, the essence of democracy is the preservation of the right to make such criticism.

In so far as this question is concerned, I can only say that there was nothing whatsoever to justify the conclusions that were arrived at in various quarters. There is nothing to conceal about the offer. Questions concerning this matter had been fully asked at the press conference, and my information is that last evening full and complete discussions took place by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom regarding this offer or proposal, so-called.

No attempt in any way was made to interfere nor will there ever be, which is something different from what happened when the last government was in power.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the Prime Minister's answer, am I to understand that the statement attributed to him, not by one but by a number of reputable newspaper correspondents, "No, no, you cannot ask that question", then had nothing whatever to do with the question that Mr. Macmillan might have been asked by the C.B.C. reporter regarding free trade?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have nothing really to add to what I have already said. Any question that arose was in consequence of his request as to the nature of the questions that were to be asked. In other words, he wanted to know in advance. As far as any other matter is concerned, I can only say this: that there is no ground for any lamentation over this as being an invasion in any way of the right of the C.B.C. to express its views, or of anyone to express his or her views regardless of whether it is critical of the government or not, as is apparent to every person in this country since this government came into power.

CYPRUS—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS IN NATO PERMANENT COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Arising out of the gravity of the situation which now unhappily prevails on Cyprus, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the permanent council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is seized of this urgent matter?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In reply to that question, my answer is yes.

FRUIT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPRESENTATION RESPECTING PRICE SUPPORT STABILIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I sincerely hope it will not be an exercise in "futilitarianism". In view of the very great anxiety with which the members of the British Columbia fruit growers' association anticipate the outcome of their application to the agricultural stabilization board for price support for the 1957 crop of apples, apricots, crab apples, peaches and prunes, can the minister inform the house when a decision with respect to this application can be expected?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question by the hon. member is an exercise in expectation. However, I can tell him this. We have had two officials in British Columbia during the past week looking into this matter of the fruit situation as it was, and the returns received in British Columbia for their 1957 fruit crop year. I might say also that only this morning did we receive from the British Columbia fruit association a report on what their operations have been; therefore we have not as yet, as can readily be seen, had any time whatever to give consideration to the matter.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA AND SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED AGREEMENT ON FINANCING OF ACCESS ROADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Will the minister explain to the house the basis of his information, given to the committee on mines, forests and waters last week, as reported in the Vancouver Province on June 11 to the effect, and I quote:

> The federal government has reached complete agreement in substance with British Columbia and Saskatchewan on joint financing of access roads to new resources.

I ask this question, sir, because a day later, as reported in the Vancouver Province of June 12, the premier of British Columbia is reported to have said, and I quote:

> —that the minister's statement was mere propaganda, news to him, and that the provincial government was still awaiting details.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the hon. member is asking a question about what the minister said in a committee of the house?

Mr. Winch: No, sir. I am asking for information concerning the report in the press and the denial made by the premier of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member is asking a question about a statement made before the committee on mines, forests and waters.

Mr. Winch: It is based on the statement made by the minister as reported in the Vancouver Province of June 11, which statement has been denied by the premier of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: If the basis of the report is a statement made in the committee it seems to me it is not proper for the house to inquire into what is going on in the committee before it has reported.

Mr. Winch: Is it not completely in order, sir, for a member to ask a question based on a report in a newspaper? I gave the name of the newspaper, the Vancouver Province of June 11, which contains the report of the statement made by the minister, and that statement was denied a day later by the premier of British Columbia, as appears in the Vancouver Province of June 12. Is that not a matter of urgency justifying a question on the orders of the day in order to get an explanation?

Mr. Speaker: Well, I do not know whether—

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can simplify the matter very easily by saying that for at least a year operations on the roads have been under way. I think that is the import of the statement I made, that we are in agreement on the substance of the matter.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister inform the house whether the statement made by the premier of British Columbia to the effect there is no such agreement is incorrect?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no agreement signed but there is agreement in substance between the two governments. That is evidenced by the fact that work on the roads has been proceeding for a year.

FINANCE

WOOL FABRICS—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BASED ON TARIFF BOARD REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. First, has the government completed its study of the recommendations made by the tariff board relative to the wool fabrics industry? Second, if such study has been completed, what action does the government propose to take concerning this matter?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member's question is one that he might keep until Wednesday, because it seems to me that it relates to budget matters.

Mr. Boulanger: I understand that the Minister of Finance said recently that he was going to make a statement on the tariff on wool fabrics. That is why I wanted to ask whether he had any information.

Mr. Speaker: Of course if the Minister of Finance does not regard this matter as being associated with the budget there is no reason why the house should do so, but it seems to me that the question does involve a subject matter of the budget announced to be introduced on Tuesday.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that the minister is going to reply to the question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, the minister has no intention at this stage of the session of replying to questions that are not proper.

Mr. Chevrier: I object to that kind of interpretation by the Minister of Finance. I do not think it is up to the minister to determine whether or not a question is proper. I think that is for the Speaker to determine. If I may, sir—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —I submit respectfully that the minister has not said that this matter is associated with the discussion of the budget, and for that reason the question should perhaps be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wants to address himself to the question of the propriety of asking about this matter at this time I will hear him, because I have not finally ruled the question out of order.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might be heard briefly on the point of order. As I recall the matter, when the Minister of Finance tabled the tariff board report on wool fabrics he said he was going to make a study of the report. The reference has been turned up for me. As found at page 854 of Hansard of June 5, the minister said:

> I should like to assure the house, Mr. Speaker, that the foregoing recommendations made by the tariff board will be very carefully studied by the government.

Then there was some further discussion. If I heard the first part of the question correctly the hon. member asked if the minister had completed such study. Surely that part of the question is in order, because it is a question of fact. As to the other part, there may be some question whether or not it involves the budget.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Ottawa West is correct. The first part of the question is unobjectionable, but the part which asks what action is to be taken I would consider to be a budget matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have nothing to add to what I said in the house on the occasion to which reference was made.

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS—APPLICATION OF PRICE STABILIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if his attention has been directed to a statement made to the soybean growers by the chairman of the agricultural prices stabilization board as to the way in which the floor price for soybeans is intended to operate. If the minister has not seen that statement, would he be prepared to look at it and advise the house as to whether or not that is a correct statement of the application of this floor price policy?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Not only have I not seen the statement, I have not heard of it to date. I shall be glad to look into the matter.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON REPORTED DENIAL OF ENTRY TO CANADA OF DUTCH FAMILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has she anything further to report on the Dutch family and its troubles in Halifax?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am glad to report to the house, to the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, who also brought the matter up the other day, that the family is now on its way to the west coast. In fact, at the moment I think they are travelling across northern Ontario. I should like to mention at this time that we are indebted to the press for their co-operation in this regard.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO SHARING OF TAX REVENUES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is now in a position to table the letter to the premier of Saskatchewan and any reply there may be to it, to which I referred the other day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, sir, I will see that that is done at once.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATEMENT ON REPORTED U.K. USE OF U.S. ATOMIC WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): On Friday the Leader of the Opposition asked a question arising out of a report from Washington to the effect that an arrangement had been made between the United States and the United Kingdom governments by which the United Kingdom forces may now use atomic weapons made in the United States. His question was:

> Are there any such arrangements covering Canadian forces?

The answer is in the negative.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

TOLLS CHARGED ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I thought at this particular time I should like to bring up a matter that is vital to the economy of Canada, namely the proposed tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway and the Welland ship canal. Not since the early 1900's has any toll been charged on any canals or locks from lake Erie to the sea—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but may I ask the members if they will kindly settle themselves and moderate their conversations so the hon. member can be heard.

Mr. McMillan: I was going on, Mr. Speaker, to say that not since early in the 1900's have any tolls been charged on any canals or locks between lake Erie and the sea.

According to the statement which the Minister of Transport made in this house not long ago, the proposed tolls are to be announced around July 1 and at that time shipping and other interests would have an opportunity to make representations in connection therewith. According to reports emanating from Washington, and more recently from Ottawa, it is estimated that the average tonnage passing through the St. Lawrence seaway over the first four or five years will be in the neighbourhood of 41.5 million tons each year; and Mr. Reese Harill, the chairman of the United States tolls committee, has made a statement as follows:

> We will not be too far off from the target of $1.25 per ton for general cargo and 50 cents per ton for bulk.

I have also seen statements from Washington indicating that observers in that city believed that the toll charges would be greater than these amounts and I was wondering if the Canadian members of the toll committee thought they could go along with the toll of $1.25 and 50 cents, in view of this feeling in Washington. I would like to know from the minister if the Canadian members were insisting on these last mentioned rates.

The locks on the Welland canal conform in size with those presently being constructed on the St. Lawrence seaway, and the only work being done on the Welland canal is the deepening of the sailing levels at a cost of something under $30 million. As members of parliament we should be interested in the costs of vessel operation in so far as they relate to the cost of moving cargo. We should consider what effect this cost may have on industry generally, on agriculture and commerce. We should be interested in the shipping industry because of the thousands of men who are engaged as seamen and because of the shipbuilders and suppliers, in the same way that we should be interested in the welfare of Canada generally.

I have often read that 40 per cent of our workmen depend for their livelihood upon our foreign trade, and I believe that if we are to have a continuing prosperity in this country we must have an expanding trade. The St. Lawrence river and the great lakes basin, which extends to the very heart of our continent, a distance of 2,900 miles from the sea, are Canada's greatest single outlet to the markets of Europe, the western coast of the United States and South America. Much of the trade between Canada and the United States goes across this route. The water transportation in this area is called the most economical transportation system in the world and, because of its economy, it has helped to build up our country. It has helped our farmers to market their wheat in highly competitive markets, even though that wheat is grown thousands of miles from the seaports. It has also helped our industry to assemble raw materials, to manufacture products and to enter competitive markets. Today this water transportation system is becoming even more important to the economy of Canada because of the prospective shipping of large tonnages of iron ore from Quebec and Labrador to steel centres along the great lakes in both Canada and the United States.

I read over the bill authorizing the setting up of the St. Lawrence seaway authority to charge tolls. Those tolls charges are to cover the operation of the canals plus the amortization charges, which are to be retired in 50 years. The bill received the support of all parties in this house when it was passed in 1951. There was no division on any reading of the bill, and the only opposition I could find in reading over the debates was that this St. Lawrence seaway was being built as window dressing for the Ontario hydro-electric power commission, which at that time particularly needed power.

In order to meet United States legislative requirements the tolls must pay off the United States' contribution of $140 million which, because of higher cost of construction, is today around $165 million. We must pay this amount off in 50 years as well as operate the canal itself. If the same applies to the Canadian contribution, something in the nature of $30 million per year will be required to be raised by means of tolls. It will be well, therefore, to examine the volume of trade now making use of the canals and the increased tonnages of iron ore likely to move up through those canals from Quebec and Labrador to the Canadian and United States steel centres.

First of all, in the year 1956, which is the last year for which figures are available, traffic through the Welland canal amounted to 23.1 million tons and that through the St. Lawrence canals to 13.5 million tons. In that year Canadian coastal shipping accounted for one-third of the traffic through the Welland canal and one-half of the traffic through the St. Lawrence canals, while United States coastal shipping accounted for only 6 per cent of the traffic through the Welland canal and less than one-half of one per cent of the traffic through the St. Lawrence canals. Most of the international trade is made up of imports of soft coal to lake Ontario ports and to Montreal, petroleum and other oils and paper, and last year 2.8 million tons of iron ore from Seven Islands were shipped to the United States steel industry.

Direct overseas shipping is increasing, but last year it accounted for only about 6 per cent of the tonnage going through the St. Lawrence river. It is difficult to arrive at a figure, but it would seem that Canada makes use of about 90 per cent of these lower canals and that the United States makes use of something less than 10 per cent. It is therefore only reasonable that tolls should be set to encourage United States shipping and to at least ensure that our tonnages of iron ore will pass through these lower canals—that is to say, the St. Lawrence and Welland canals—to help us pay for the cost of operating them plus the amortization charges.

I said earlier that the Welland canal was being deepened at a cost of something under $30 million and that the tonnages going through amounted to 23.1 million tons in 1956. It is therefore easy to see that the cost of the current deepening of that canal could be retired over a period of 50 years by a charge of just a few cents per ton. It would appear to me to be unreasonable and unfair to charge the Welland canal with more than this $30 million figure because you would then, for example, be charging the importers in Toronto or in Hamilton—and they make a great deal of use of the canal—tolls in excess of what they should pay.

If this were done it would be asking them to pay some of the cost of the St. Lawrence seaway although they would not be making any use of the seaway. After all, tonnage moving through the Welland canal is about twice that moving through the lower canal, the St. Lawrence seaway. For this reason I have always thought it wrong to include the Welland canal as part of the St. Lawrence seaway, because nearly half the tonnage through the Welland canal never reaches the St. Lawrence river.

There are certain basic concepts which our government should keep in mind before reaching an agreement with the United States on the amount of tolls to be charged. First, it should be remembered that lake Ontario and the Welland canal are the sites of the major part of Ontario industry making use of water shipping. Lake Ontario will be the only lake of all the great lakes that will be toll-locked, requiring tolls at both ends before ships are allowed either to enter or leave.

The shores of lake Ontario are the source of little raw material for industry. Therefore most of our Ontario industry bringing in raw material by boat for processing will have to pay a toll charge on it, no matter what the source. This is not true of most of the competitive American plants. The Steel Company of Canada Limited at Hamilton, for example, would be required to bring in three and a half tons of raw material through a toll area to make one ton of steel, while steel companies at Buffalo and Cleveland would have no tolls to pay on any of their raw materials.

Second, it should also be borne in mind that the St. Lawrence seaway is not such a major factor in the economy of the United States. If the tolls on the seaway are too high the United States has alternative water and other routes to carry its heavy commerce, while Canada, because of its geography has not.

Certainly the United States makes comparatively little use of the canals at the present time. In the Chicago area and the American mid-west much of their commerce goes down the Mississippi, while the eastern railways in the United States can deliver Quebec and Labrador ore to such American steel centres in central and southern Ohio from special docks at Baltimore cheaper than by ship through the St. Lawrence seaway even at the present time. If we are not successful in collecting tolls on a very large part of our own iron ore from Labrador and Quebec destined for American mills, then the toll charges on our own shipping will be increased. If we had double the shipping we would have half the toll charge.

The eastern railways always opposed the St. Lawrence seaway construction, and it is only natural for them to lobby to get the tolls as high as possible to increase their own business in the movement of this ore. The United States government spent $150 million for construction of a canal at Baltimore. I understand that six ships having a capacity of 40,000 to 60,000 tons each are now being constructed to carry this Canadian ore to Baltimore, while only two new 25,000 ton ships are being made ready to transport ore through the seaway, and I also know that some canal boats now operating through the Welland canal will be able to operate through the St. Lawrence canal and carry this iron ore.

The higher the tolls the more the United States shipping and our own ore will be diverted to other routes, and the more our Canadian shipping will be left holding the bag. I saw a statement not long ago, originating in Washington, which suggested there should be a maximum charge over the first four or five years to pay all charges, after which these charges might be lowered as the tonnage increased. I hope that such a high toll will not be set in the early years of transition from small canallers to large carriers, because it will take a few years to replace the smaller boats, and consequently shipping charges per ton in the earlier period of use will remain high. Mr. Harrill, chairman of the United States toll committee, said the job of the joint committee is to reconcile the United States legislative necessity of paying off the cost of the seaway in 50 years with having tolls low enough to attract traffic.

Surely this statement allows our members on the joint committee to bargain for low toll charges until maximum tonnages have been established. The United States government did the deepening and the building of two locks in the international part of the St. Lawrence river. This comprises rather a small share of the total cost of St. Lawrence seaway project, the rest of it being in the province of Quebec, and the Welland canal lying wholly within Canadian territory in the Niagara district.

I do not like the lever that the smaller expenditure of $140 million seems to give the United States over the tolls, because almost every dispatch from Washington seems to emphasize their legislative monetary requirements for the next 50 years. There are reports of many pressure groups in the United States wanting the tolls as high as possible in order to gain tonnages for their own transport systems.

I agree that there should be a joint tolls committee to deal with the international part of the seaway, and to correlate it with the other major part which is wholly within Canada. However, I cannot help but resent a foreign power being given any direction or say over the operation of any canals within our own country. To me it is akin to surrendering some part of our sovereignty by giving them some direct voice in our economy for the next 50 years; and this over the years, could lead to ill-will and distrust among the peoples of two friendly nations.

Hon. members will all recall the difficulty in getting the seaway and power project underway. The Ontario government was badly in need of more power; and while public opinion in Canada would have supported Canada doing the whole project alone, it could not be done without the acquiescence of the United States as it involved flooding some of that country's sovereign land. The principle of tolls was accepted, but our government reserved the right to build her own two locks at Cornwall and then have an all-Canadian waterway.

It is interesting to note that the shipping tonnage through Sault Ste. Marie canals is nearly five times the tonnage through the Welland canal and over eight times that through the St. Lawrence canals; and that the United States coastal shipping is over eight times that of the Canadian through those canals.

The United States government is deepening the channel from the Detroit river up to lake Superior at very high cost—a cost comparable to that of the St. Lawrence seaway itself—and this waterway is to be toll free. It so happens that where United States tonnage is heavy on the whole waterway the tolls are free, and where our tonnage is heavier tolls are to be levied. I am not an economist, but I would expect this will produce an unbalanced economy to Canada's disadvantage in our great lakes system.

Thus far I have assumed that the Canadian government has decided on tolls. I am personally against tolls, particularly on the Welland canal, but in saying this I know I am in the minority in this house. There are so many implications in connection with the imposition of tolls that I proposed that the Canadian government should have an economic survey made before tolls are applied. I thought such a survey might come up with findings on the impact tolls might have on our economy and provide a better answer than a tolls committee, which would have little time for such a survey and which might be primarily interested in seeing what the traffic could bear.

Many plants have settled in the Toronto and Hamilton area and along the Welland canal. They established in those areas never expecting tolls, and their operations are geared to a toll free economy. I will take the paper industry for example. We have several paper mills in the Niagara district, and much of their pulpwood comes from the province of Quebec. The enlarged and deepened canal cannot help but result in their having to pay large sums of money for tolls without adding in any way to the economy of their operations. They must still continue to use small draught canal boats to gather up their pulpwood at the mouth of rivers of streams down which the pulpwood has been floated. The pulpwood is waterlogged and heavy, and no doubt they would be expected to pay tolls on the weight of wood containing nearly 50 per cent water.

A cord of wet wood weighs 5,000 pounds, and assuming a toll of 50 cents for bulk cargo this would mean paying a toll of $1.17 per cord, without taking into consideration the fact that in most cases a toll would be charged the ship when light on the return journey. Loads both ways cannot be carried by most ships, as the downbound or downstream tonnage is three and one half times the volume of the upbound or upstream tonnage.

I should like to go into some detail in connection with the Ontario Paper Company at Thorold. This company has 1,200 employees and an annual payroll of $8 million. They have wood preparing plants and research facilities in Ontario. In addition the company owns a plant at Baie Comeau in Quebec on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river where it has its own power and wood preparing plants. The company also owns a fleet of 11 ships engaged in transporting not only its own products but general commerce as well. Altogether this company has 7,910 permanent and seasonal employees, with a total annual payroll of $25,700,000. Its total production amounts to over $60 million, of which $58 million was exported to the United States; and this is equivalent to 2.3 per cent of Canada's total exports to that country.

The Ontario Paper Company has always treated labour most fairly. I think this company's contribution and that of its top executives is a fine example of responsible Canadian industry. The company presented a brief to the tolls committee of the St. Lawrence seaway authority not long ago, and I wish to quote part of that brief, as follows:

> The locational advantage of proximity to its power source is now being threatened if the Ontario hydro-electric power commission carries out its policy of applying power rates on a system-wide basis rather than based on cost of transmission of power from close sources. If, in addition, a burden of $800,000 per year for tolls upon its traffic is superimposed upon it, it could be the means of forcing the location into an untenable position, thus forcing consideration of either abandonment or relocating its manufacturing equipment to a location where we have our own power facilities and avoiding the burden of tolls.

Based on press reports from Washington and Ottawa concerning tolls, the company is now of the opinion that the tolls could result in an additional expenditure of more than $1 million a year on their part. If the Ontario Paper Company finds it necessary to relocate because of these extra burdens—that is, their higher cost of power and the proposed seaway tolls—it will be a tremendous loss to the Niagara district and to the province of Ontario. I cannot think that this government or any tolls committee would want to see this happen. The building of the waterway will not in any way add to the economy of this company's operations.

I am of the opinion that the Welland canal should not be put in the same category as the St. Lawrence seaway. We should all strive for a closer-knit economy in Canada. Last year when the Minister of Transport was in Hamilton he was reported in the press as having assured the people there that they would be able to purchase coal shipped from Nova Scotia. If high toll charges are placed on the St. Lawrence seaway it will be difficult for Nova Scotia coal to compete with United States coal in the cities of Hamilton and Toronto.

There is one other important point. I have often heard reports to the effect that the operation of the canals is to be under a joint committee of Canada and the United States. The canals have been very well operated under the Department of Transport, and I would like to see their operation continue on this basis and not placed under any other supervision.

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, representing as I do a riding that does not actually border the Welland canal but is in close proximity to it, I feel duty bound to say a word on this important question. Before doing so I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Welland on his very fine presentation of the question, and to state categorically that I am in full and complete agreement with what he said.

In my opinion the question of tolls for the Welland canal is one of the most important questions facing not only the people of the Niagara district but the people of Canada. It is one that must be answered by the government of Canada in the very near future. Without doubt there will be a lot of public opinion both pro and con on this important subject. If tolls are imposed on the Welland canal they will work a hardship on industry, and especially those long-established industries which have done so much in the past to protect our national economy and to preserve our independence and freedom. These industries will indeed be placed at an economic disadvantage.

Tolls are imposed only for the use of facilities constructed for special purposes, such as locks built in various places for the floating of logs on isolated inland streams. I admit this is more true in the United States than in Canada, but I feel that tolls should not be charged for the use of improvements in Canada that are generally available for navigation and commerce. Some stretches of the connecting channels between the great lakes in both the United States and Canada have been improved by our engineers, and this has been going on for over 50 years without any suggestion of tolls. Over the years it has been absolutely shown that the canal free of tolls is a stimulus to commerce and generates new business for forms of transportation other than those directly using the canal. Herbert Hoover once said:

> New waterways are not competitive but complementary to our great and efficient railways. It is the history of transportation that an increase of facilities and a cheapening of transportation increases the volume of traffic.

One must agree that ultimately tolls are always paid by the consumer, whether he knows it or not. They are included in the cost of transportation and eventually wind up in the price charged for the product. In the case of our basic materials the added cost of transportation through tolls increases in proportion to the number of processes through which the material passes before it finally goes off the dealer's shelves. It is thus cheaper, to say nothing of less painful, for all of us to pay for waterway improvements just once through taxes rather than repeatedly through the higher prices which would result from tolls on the Welland canal.

We must never forget that our improved canal, free of tolls, will play an important role in the defence of our nation. Opening up the great lakes by means of the St. Lawrence seaway and the Welland canal means opening up ship-building facilities around the lakes for the construction of sea-going vessels in time of emergency. It also means a safe lane a thousand miles long for the shipment of war materials, thus shortening the hazardous voyage across the Atlantic by nearly one-third.

Surely no one will argue that you should expect tolls to pay for this defence measure. It requires no stretch of the imagination to picture the hullabaloo that would be raised if tolls were proposed, say for instance, in New York harbour. Surely one must have his tongue in his cheek if he goes out and actually campaigns for tools on the Welland canal. To me they certainly are vulnerable, and I hope it will not start a landslide which will clog our canal and spill over into avenues of commerce which have contributed so much to the growth and economic welfare of our nation.

To my way of thinking those fighting for high tolls overlook two important facts. The first is the expansion in foreign trade which the canal will generate, and the other is the tremendous growth of population not only in our own province and dominion but in the United States as well.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, from engineers who have made an estimate of the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence seaway that the traffic to be expected through the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence seaway would be somewhere in the vicinity of 35 million to 37 million tons. Other engineers and business-men tell us that the estimate for 1965 would be well over 52 million tons. Perhaps the more pessimistic observers and engineers say that it will increase to only 40 million tons.

I contend that it is not possible to charge a toll in the Niagara district without causing drastic harm to the economy of our nation. One cannot help but submit that the St. Lawrence seaway is faced with a dilemma, and certainly the only solution is a low toll which will not be injurious to industry but will be helpful to industry in the Niagara district.

I realize that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act provides that if tolls are imposed they may be charged in two ways; either by a toll system set up by the St. Lawrence seaway authority alone for the Canadian section of the canal, or by a joint toll system set up by the St. Lawrence seaway authority together with the American seaway development corporation, which the Minister of Transport tells us will be meeting about July 1. Naturally their findings would have to be approved by the governments of Canada and the United States, and would constitute an international agreement binding upon both countries.

Many organizations, chambers of commerce, the Hamilton council and the Toronto council and various councils in the Niagara district have at times recommended to the Minister of Transport that the Welland canal be maintained as a toll free system. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that any toll system reduces the potential of the Welland canal to provide maximum benefits not only for all the people of the Niagara district but of Canada as well. The collection of even a minimum toll would work hardship in many cases, and affect the ability of industry and agriculture to expand.

Back in 1934, Mr. Speaker, there was a full debate in this house on the motion that all goods shipped through canals owned and operated by the government of Canada be subject to taxation. In speaking against this motion Hon. R. J. Manion, at that time minister of railways and canals, stated in part:

> In regard to the Panama, Suez and Manchester canals, it is true that they collect tolls. We must realize, however, that the conditions under which these canals are operated are altogether different from those existing in connection with Canadian canals. The Manchester canal is a private commercial enterprise, whereas in Canada our canals are national. Then the Suez canal is operated by a privately owned company. True, the Panama canal is publicly owned and operated, but we must remember this important point; the difference between the Suez, the Panama and our Canadian canals is that no vessel-owner is forced to use either the Suez or the Panama.
> On the other hand, in Canada we have no alternative water route from the western grain fields, unless one wishes to use the railways from the head of the lakes. As has already been pointed out, however, the railroad would be so much higher that it would not be possible in the marketing of grain. It is important that we should have the lowest possible rates in order that we may compete with countries whose grain fields are closer to the seaboards than are the fields of Canada.

To me, Mr. Speaker, those words are as true today as they were in 1934, and perhaps more so, and I think today they even assume a broader aspect since this nation is more truly a trading nation, with its prosperity depending in large measure upon sound competitive business in our world trade.

Let me say this, Mr. Speaker. When the United States agreed to join with Canada in the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway they did so only on the understanding that tolls were to be collected to cover the cost of construction, maintenance and operation of what Washington certainly regarded as the seaway proper, that is the section of the St. Lawrence river lying between Iroquois, Ontario and Montreal. I do not believe there was ever in Washington's mind any idea that the heretofore toll free Welland ship canal, completed in 1932 at a cost of well over $130 million, would be included in the St. Lawrence seaway for toll purposes. I certainly hope that Washington is still under that impression, and that it is their disposition that the matter of tolls on the existing Welland ship canal is one for Canada alone to decide.

I believe they gained this attitude owing partly to the fact that the Welland ship canal has always been under the control of the Minister of Transport. I can only repeat with emphasis that it should remain under the control of the Minister of Transport rather than the St. Lawrence seaway authority. The Toronto board of trade, the Hamilton chamber of commerce, and several other bodies representing the whole public community are very anxious that no change be made in the present set-up. I agree with them just as strongly as possible that the Welland ship canal should stay under the control of the Minister of Transport, and should continue to be toll free.

We cannot forget that the Canadian and United States users of the Welland ship canal started their shipping through that canal on a toll free basis nearly a quarter of a century before a start was made on the present St. Lawrence seaway. Certainly the present users of the Welland ship canal did not ask that it be deepened to 27 feet to conform to the seaway standard. They have been and are still quite content with the existing 25-foot depth. They have all built their ships to conform to this depth. It is hard to conceive, at least in my estimation, why they should now be expected to bear the cost of a deeper channel for which they did not ask and which will not be of any service to them.

I cannot help but wonder whether Windsor and Detroit would like to pay tolls on iron ore, limestone, scrap and other cargoes which move through the Sault canal and the St. Clair and St. Marys rivers. One only has to think how much worse off Toronto, Hamilton, Welland and the Niagara district generally would be and, indeed, our neighbouring and satellite communities, in the event of tolls on the Sault canal, tolls on the three connecting rivers and tolls on the Welland ship canal. You can well appreciate why we in the Niagara-Toronto area are so exercised about the evil potentialities, not only for ourselves who reside in the district but for all those in Ontario who will be so seriously affected by such a move.

Certainly cargo tolls on the Sault canal and the Detroit, St. Clair and St. Marys rivers would constitute double jeopardy for those Canadian industries, including the prairie wheat grower, forced to use those facilities as well as the Welland ship canal. In my estimation the only way we can avoid the numerous troubles that seem to be ahead of us is for Ottawa to understand fully the many and serious implications of imposing tolls on cargoes passing through the Welland ship canal.

May I sum up by saying first, Mr. Speaker, that to establish tolls on the Welland ship canal would create a dangerous precedent which would hamper the future development of the great lakes area and place undue restrictions on Canada's economic growth. Second, tolls would divert trade from the water route, resulting in removing the stabilizing influence of water transport on other forms of transportation. Above everything else, Mr. Speaker, we should not lose sight of the point that any agreement with the United States pertaining to tolls would take control of the canal out of Canadian hands, as it would be subject to joint control.

Many of our existing industries have invested huge sums of money in the region of the Welland canal based upon free water transportation, and certainly this investment would be confiscated by oppressive tolls. I think we here in Canada should take the stand, and it should be a firm one indeed, that the purpose of the seaway is to attract industries, not to destroy them or drive them away. Our country can advance in wealth and power at a wonderful rate but it would be tragic indeed if this generation, possessing economic resources never before equalled, were to have such tolls imposed upon them.

May I make this statement, and I make it with no feeling of ill will whatsoever toward the United States. I say that the United States is looking after the interests of the United States and not those of Canada. I say they realize that if we suddenly start charging tolls on the Welland ship canal certainly United States cities such as Baltimore, Maryland, and others will get the business rather than Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor or the Niagara area, because freight would naturally move by an alternative all-American route. It is all right to argue that tolls are charged on the Panama and Suez canals, but we cannot lose sight of the fact that ships actually make money by paying these tolls.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that as members of the House of Commons we should stand squarely on our own feet with regard to the toll question, because we need the western and the great lakes business. It is my sincere hope that the Minister of Transport will be able to bring a favourable reply to the house indicating that tolls will not be charged on the Welland canal. We are looking to him to that end. I say with emphasis, Mr. Speaker, that to charge tolls on the Welland ship canal would be a step backward so far as the future of this country is concerned.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with keen interest to the two speeches just made by the hon. members for Welland and Niagara Falls. Both have indicated clearly that while they are in favour of the principle of tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway they do not favour the application of tolls on the Welland canal. It is easy for any member of the house to understand why these two and perhaps other members representing areas in the Niagara peninsula are fearful of the effects which tolls may have on established industries in those areas.

The reason I rise is to discuss the problem generally and also to regret the fact, first, that the Minister of Transport is not in his seat—he is detained, I am sure, by other important business—and, second, to complain about the fact that the minister and the government have not seen fit to alleviate some of the fears and anxieties of those groups in the country which will be affected by the imposition of tolls. In fact there has been very little said either by the minister or the government on the question of tolls since they took office following the election of June 10 last year.

It is unfortunate that that should be the case, because while I know that in the earlier period after assumption of office by the government it was difficult to deal with a problem of this nature. Nevertheless as time went on, and particularly in the last few months, it has in my opinion become much easier for a statement to be made either by the minister or the government in this respect.

As I understand it, sir, there are two groups agitating with reference to the question of tolls. First of all there is a group which would have no tolls at all on the seaway. They argue that tolls were imposed years ago on Canadian canals and were afterwards withdrawn, arguing therefrom that they were not a success and that on this occasion, following the opening of the seaway or shortly before, a toll system should not be instituted. Then there is another group, congregated mostly in the United States, agitating in favour of tolls which would be so prohibitive as to discourage traffic up and down the seaway.

It would appear to me, sir, that the attitude adopted by the St. Lawrence seaway authority, namely that of proceeding through a committee in Canada and an opposite committee in the United States to establish a toll which is fair and reasonable, is the attitude which is commendable on this occasion. I should like to preface what I have to say now by stating that by international agreement, by legislation in this house and by pronouncements made both in this house and outside, the intention has been clear all along, that tolls should be charged on the St. Lawrence seaway.

The toll problem, of course, is a difficult and complicated one. It is made more difficult because of legislative requirements both in Canada and the United States that the project shall be self-liquidating. The operating costs, interest and amortization charges must be recovered from the tolls to be charged the users of these facilities. In other words the seaway is to be not only a self-liquidating project but a self-liquidating public utility.

As I said earlier and as was also said by the two hon. members who have just spoken, tolls were charged on canals in Canada in 1903. Those tolls were suspended for a time as an experiment, and afterwards were completely removed. They were completely removed because the United States decided to build the Erie canal and thereby take traffic from the upper regions of the great lakes down through that canal to the port of New York. Canada, finding itself losing traffic because of that canal, decided to remove tolls on its own canals entirely, and that proved to be successful. These tolls were finally abolished in 1905.

Now may I say a word about the basis for the establishment of tolls. The basis is briefly this. Capital expenditures are being incurred by both Canada and the United States in building the seaway. When the project is completed there will be an aggregate amount representing the capital cost of the seaway. It is on this amount that interest will accrue, and which must be amortized over a period of 50 years. In addition there will be the annual operating costs, including maintenance, but by far the greater part of the total costs will be the interest and amortization. Once the annual costs to be charged against the seaway have been determined there is another step which is of importance, and it is the consideration of the actual tariff of tolls.

What is the toll which is to be charged on the seaway? Before establishing a toll on the seaway I think one has to look at what is being done elsewhere, on the Panama canal and the Suez canal, for instance. It is only natural that one should compare the operations of these two canals. The Panama canal, for instance, can be easily bypassed. In other words a ship going through the Panama canal need not come back by the same route. As a result the authorities operating the Panama canal see to it that light vessels are charged only 80 per cent of the toll on loaded vessels. The situation is not the same with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway. It cannot be by-passed. Once a ship enters the St. Lawrence seaway it must go through and must come back. It cannot go by another route. It need not, of course, go through the whole route up to the head of the lakes and back, but it must retrace its route after it has entered the seaway at the St. Lambert lock at Montreal in order to come out of the seaway.

Then again, in the case of the St. Lawrence seaway there is another factor which does not operate in either the Panama or the Suez canals. In Canada there are other paralleling transportation facilities along the seaway route; there are here parallel highway and railway facilities offering competition to the water route. Canada agreed to the imposition of tolls by international understanding. Until the month of March, 1947, I do not believe there had been any thought in Canada of imposing tolls on the seaway; but when it became clear that Canada was able, willing and anxious to go ahead with the building of the seaway the United States became apprehensive lest it would have no voice in a seaway which would be used by a large proportion of United States shipping. A statement by the secretary of state for external affairs was made at the time in the House of Commons on that subject. His statement, on April 24, 1947, is recorded at page 2354 of Hansard as follows:

> The Canadian government has now concurred in principle with the proposal to make the St. Lawrence seaway self-liquidating by means of toll charges subject to the conclusion of arrangements satisfactory to both governments for the implementation of this principle.

This statement was repeated to the United States government in 1951 by an exchange of notes, I believe, and if not certainly by other correspondence, which pointed out particularly that Canada merely approved the principle of tolls. I emphasize this because of what I intend to say a little later. Canada merely approved the principle of tolls, without making any reference to the extent of the work to be amortized, the division of expenditures between the two countries, or to the allocation of costs as between power and navigation.

Then again the same idea is contained in certain sections of the seaway authority act. From the legislation it is clear that if tolls are to be established by agreement between Canada and the United States, directions pertaining to such tolls must be given by the governor in council. Then the seaway authority act clearly sets out the purpose of the tolls. The tolls must, first of all, be fair and reasonable. Tolls must be high enough to recover the capital costs of the seaway, and they must be low enough to encourage traffic along the seaway. It would be ridiculous to make tolls so high that the cost of moving ships through the seaway would be prohibitive.

As I have said, in accordance with the act the tolls must be fair and reasonable. Furthermore, they must be non-discriminatory. Tolls must encourage increased utilization of the navigation facilities; for it would be anathema, as I have said, to spend $300 million or more to improve these facilities between Montreal and lake Erie only to impose prohibitive tolls.

Now, the point which I am sure interests the two hon. members who have just taken their seats, and the house in general, is this. What are to be the amounts of the tolls? This is a very difficult and complicated decision to make. A careful study would seem to indicate that there should be, first of all, a low toll on the net registered tonnage of the vessel applicable to all loaded or unloaded ships, and next a toll on the cargo itself. For example, if one were to encounter a ship having a net registered tonnage of 10,000 tons, and if there were say a toll of 10 cents per ton on that net registered tonnage, the ship would pay $1,000. If, over and above that, the ship had a cargo of 20,000 tons, assuming a toll of 50 cents per ton the ship would pay an additional $10,000, and hence on a 20,000-ton cargo a toll of $11,000 would be imposed. This is a simple method of assessing tolls. It should not be complicated like railway freight tariffs, because if it were then it would become extremely difficult of application and in case of appeal on complaints by shippers.

However, as I said earlier and as I repeat now, this is a matter for the tolls committees of both Canada and the United States to determine. It is, as I said at the outset, unfortunate that the minister has given the house little or no information on this extremely important matter. The house is entitled to know something about these tolls, as well as the shippers and ship operators who will be affected. I am sorry to say that the minister has not made very many pronouncements on the subject. I believe I am accurate in stating that on one occasion he went to a dominion marine association convention, not far from here, and made a statement on the subject, and that was quite some time ago. Apart from that there has been no statement on the subject at all. On the contrary, there has been a considerable amount of information emanating from the United States, to which I think this house and the country were entitled. For instance, on May 14 there was a statement emanating from the chairman of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, the United States entity, that tolls would be made public on July 1.

On the same day the hon. member for Welland asked the Minister of Transport, although he did not know about the statement from Washington, what the decision was with reference to the Canada-United States tolls committee. The hon. member was told that no decision had yet been reached, and that a public announcement would be made when such decision was reached.

The next day the minister was asked if he had seen the statement made on that same day by the president of the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, or whether he was aware of that statement. His reply was that he had nothing to add, that no decision had been arrived at.

Meanwhile, on May 17, the chairman of the United States tolls committee, Mr. Reese Harill, who has already been referred to in this debate, announced in effect the amount the tolls would be, and I would like to give his statement to the house again because it does bear on this subject. I quote from the Financial Post of May 17, 1958, bearing the dateline Washington, D.C., as follows:

> In so far as the actual tolls are concerned the United States toll committee chairman still says, "We'll not be too far off from the target of $1.25 per ton for general cargo and .50 cents per ton for bulk."

Then, ten days later, there is a statement emanating from Ottawa confirming everything which has come out of Washington thus far, both the statement made by the chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation and the United States chairman of the tolls committee, to the effect that this is what is under discussion, that this is what is being considered, and that a statement would be made on the matter about July 1. My grievance at this time is first of all, that these statements, instead of emanating from Washington, should have emanated from Ottawa concurrently. My complaint is that there are many questions in respect of this matter which should not have been left unanswered. For instance, how will the tolls affect different commodities? Will certain commodities or certain classes of traffic receive more favourable rates than others? Will there be any discrimination in tolls as between Canadian and United States traffic or between local and overseas traffic? What are the latest estimates of traffic on the seaway?

There have been several estimates given as to traffic. In 1954 the United States estimates gave a figure of around 36½ million tons. They were revised afterwards to somewhere between 30 and 35 million tons. Then there are the estimates made by the Department of Trade and Commerce away back in 1940 or 1944 which indicated the traffic potential at that time to be about 44½ million tons and there are also the estimates made by the economists of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. But all these estimates may well be obsolete by now. These are estimates which were announced months ago, as a matter of fact, several years ago, and I think it would be well if this house and the country were told what are the latest estimates of traffic on the seaway and particularly what are the latest estimates of the cost of the seaway, because it is clear that no toll policy can be established unless the costs and the anticipated traffic are correlated, unless the costs and the traffic can be gauged as closely to the actual as is possible to gauge them.

Then there is the all-important question of how and where tolls are to be collected. Should they be collected separately from the United States or jointly with the United States? There is no provision covering this point in the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act and it would seem to me that it would be a mistake to have two agencies collecting tolls, one a Canadian agency and the other a United States agency, because not only would that be a nuisance to the shipper but it would be a difficult thing from the point of view of accounting. It would be far simpler, since Canada is paying two-thirds of the cost of the seaway and since ships must of necessity enter the seaway in Canada through the St. Lambert canal at Montreal, that one agency and one agency alone be entrusted with the collection of tolls. I hope it will be found that that agency will be the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I am sure that they could make some sort of agreement, and I hope that they will if it has not already been done, with the St. Lawrence development corporation, the United States entity, that they would on behalf of both groups collect the tolls and then turn over the United States portion to the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation.

As to the points of collection, St. Lambert in the Lachine section and Welland in the upper section seem to be the logical locations for collection of tolls and when the volume of traffic reaches the point where navigational facilities become necessary at Cornwall, then it would seem that Cornwall should be an additional point for collection of tolls. That is why I repeat that it is unfortunate that the minister has not seen fit to enlighten the house or the country on these matters and I hope he will take the first opportunity to do so.

Two hon. members who have just spoken have touched on a very important question, namely that of whether or not tolls should be charged on the Welland canal. Certainly from what I have said thus far and from the understanding made by the two governments, it would appear that in the year 1951, when the legislation was passed, the intention at that time was to cover the Welland canal. However, there was information which I am sure the seaway authority did not have and could not possibly have envisaged when the house was considering the over-all picture. Here again I must say that while the house gave unanimous consent to this legislation back in those years I am sure there are many members of parliament who would not have approved the project if they had not been assured by the government of the day that this was to be a self-liquidating project.

I return to the question of the Welland canal. When the legislation was passed, and for quite a long time afterwards, it was envisaged that the Welland canal would involve an expenditure of only $2 million. That was the estimate as it was tabled in the house at that time; in other words, in order to deepen Welland from 25 to 27 feet the estimate of cost was $2 million. That certainly could not be considered by any stretch of the imagination as being a large amount having regard to the total cost of $300 million which was being voted at the time. So that even at that time the amount of tolls with reference to the Welland canal, having regard to the total amount of the expenditure, could only have been a very small amount. It now turns out, unfortunately, that the cost—and I am sure that is nobody's fault—of the work in the Welland canal will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 million. That could not have been envisaged at the time because it was only when the contractors and engineers got into the field at Welland that they discovered a large portion of the work in connection with dredging would have to be done in rock. The dredging in rock will be far more costly, and I am informed will be in the neighbourhood of $15 to $16 per cubic yard as compared with $2 or $2.50 per cubic yard for ordinary earth or clay dredging. I stand to be corrected on these amounts for I am speaking from memory only.

The point I am trying to make is that it was not envisaged at the time that this additional amount of $28 million would be expended at Welland, and now that it has to be expended this may well make the difference in support of, and in substantiation of the claim made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) that the operation of that canal should be exempted from the imposition of tolls.

There is another factor. Section 15 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act provided, I believe, for a situation such as this. Section 15 states, in subsection 3, that every such tariff—that is, tariff of tolls—or amendment thereto shall be filed with the board of transport commissioners and shall become operative from the date of such filing. Then subsection 4, which I think is extremely important, says:

> Any person interested may at any time file a complaint with the board of transport commissioners that there is unjust discrimination in an existing tariff and the board shall thereupon consider such complaint and make a finding thereon which shall be reported to the authority.

The point I am trying to make is this: that if an industry on the Welland canal feels itself aggrieved by the imposition of these tolls, high or low though they may be, it may make application to the board of transport commissioners by way of complaint and be heard under that section of the act. That section envisages that where there is unjust discrimination in a tariff the board would thereupon act to remove such discrimination. While I have no time or desire to go into the reasons which may impell the board to act in cases such as this, I think the board of transport commissioners would apply to these rates the same arguments as they apply with reference to unjust discrimination in so far as other rates that are considered under the Railway Act. There is much jurisprudence on this subject—many legal cases—and, in fact, a number of recommendations were made in the report of Mr. Justice Turgeon on freight rates which was tabled in the house some years ago and which dealt with this question of unjust discrimination.

Thus I say that while the position on the Welland canal may be different from that of other areas along the seaway route in that there were no industries along the other canals in the beginning; it was built either in the existing waters or alongside the shores or inland on farm territory where no industry was then in existence; though since then, in certain areas, industries have sprung up. The position with reference to Welland, is that the industries along the Welland canal have been established there for many years and it may well be that they would have a case in arguing that the toll which the seaway authorities would establish would be one that is discriminatory with regard to their industry.

Then again there is also the obligation of the government under the seaway authority act. After the tolls committees of both countries have agreed upon a tariff of tolls, following study and examination to recommend to their respective governments; it is then up to the governments to determine whether that toll shall apply along the whole seaway.

The government has the right, if it so desires, under the order in council which it will pass, if it so wishes, to exempt a certain portion of the route from the operation of the toll, and it would seem to me that this could hardly be done without consultation with the seaway authority and with the other government. In other words, it becomes clear from what has been said in this debate that there are two members of parliament who are apprehensive lest the industries in their area be detrimentally affected. The government, I respectfully submit, should look into this matter and give consideration to the points made by the two members that industries may be injuriously affected on the Welland canal. Should these apprehensions prove well founded, consideration should be given to whether or not sufficient relief can be given to these industries under section 15 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act. I, certainly, would have thought so when the act was introduced in the house. It may be, because of the changed conditions which I outlined a moment ago, that the position is not the same today, but that is a matter for study. Then it would seem to me that consideration should be given to whether or not the Welland canal should be exempted from the application of the tariff of tolls.

It is impossible to answer this question, in my opinion, unless a study has been made of the whole situation by the proper body to do so, the tolls committee and the seaway authority. That is why, some time ago, in an earlier debate, I recommended the establishment—and I have done so on more than one occasion—of an economic survey to consider the whole effect of the seaway on the various regions of Canada and, of course, to study this question as well.

I conclude by repeating what I said at the outset of my remarks, that the question of a tariff of toll is an extremely difficult and complicated one. It is one which I am sure will be given careful study by the St. Lawrence seaway authority and it is one which no doubt the government will wish to consider carefully before it imposes a tariff of tolls which will apply, as the law now obtains, from one end of the seaway to the other. It will, of course, be the prerogative of the government to exempt from the operation of the tolls the seaway route or any part of it.

I am sure that in view of the international agreement and in the light of other statements I have made, the government will have some difficulty in arriving at that conclusion. But I am sure all of us here—and I want to emphasize this—would not want to see these tremendous sums of money spent and then see the establishment of a toll which would be prohibitive. I am sure the St. Lawrence seaway authority does not want this, and I am sure the authority is going to do its utmost and bend over backwards to see to it that the toll will be so attractive as to encourage traffic. I also feel that should the case be such that because of the high costs of the seaway as compared with the amount of traffic that will go through it tolls must of necessity be high in order to amortize the principal, then I think the government should give careful consideration to refinancing part of the indebtedness so that shipping may be encouraged to move through the route.

I have not looked at the cost figures for a long time nor have I had an opportunity to study them. In fact, I do not know what the latest figures are. I have seen the budget tabled in the house but those figures are not necessarily the figures that will be agreed upon between the two governments and therefore I am not in a position to state what the capital expenditure is at this time. But what I do say is that having regard to this great international enterprise I am confident both the seaway authority and the government will want to make sure the toll will be of such a nature that ships will move freely through the seaway.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am going to raise a grievance of another kind on a subject other than the one that is before us now.

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other hon. members who wish to speak on the grievance now before the house?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is going to raise another subject perhaps I should say a few words on the grievance before us. The government, of course, had no inkling that this question of tolls on the St. Lawrence seaway would be raised this afternoon and unfortunately the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) under whose jurisdiction this matter comes is unable to be here. However, I can assure hon. members of the house that the officials of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the minister and the officials of his department have been giving very careful consideration to this question and will continue to do so in an attempt to work out a reasonable, sensible solution.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who has had a great deal of experience because of the important post he held as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, has made a very interesting review this afternoon and he has pointed out just how complicated and difficult the question of tolls will be. Perhaps it is to be regretted that he did not get that problem settled before he left the seaway authority. It has not yet been settled, of course, but I can assure him and the other two hon. members who have spoken that a most careful study is being made of this subject and their suggestions will be given every consideration.

TELEVISION—REPORTED INTERFERENCE IN INTERVIEW WITH PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am going to raise as the subject of a grievance the important question of what I consider to have been the interference of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Diefenbaker) last Friday in connection with a television interview with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. By raising this matter on orders of the day I hoped the Prime Minister might give a satisfactory explanation of press and radio reports which appeared over the weekend concerning this event but as I understand the Prime Minister's explanation the best that can be said for it is that it adds to the confusion which already exists with regard to it.

This is not the first time that the Prime Minister by attempting to interpret statements which have been made previously in the press regarding remarks of his own and others with whom he was associated has created confusion of this kind. Far from clarifying the situations the Prime Minister's interpretations have made them even more difficult to understand. I am thinking of the 15 per cent trade diversion proposal and the clarification that has been attempted since. I am thinking also of the press conference of the secretary general of NATO and the interpretations that were given by the Prime Minister of the words of the secretary general of NATO and the interpretations of interpretations after that.

Last Friday we on this side of the house read with some surprise a report to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada intervened in connection with a television interview that had been arranged between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister's reply to my question on the subject seems to me to be entirely unsatisfactory and certainly in direct divergence to the reports concerning it that have appeared not only in one newspaper but in a number of newspapers and over the air. In attempting to explain away this matter this afternoon the Prime Minister said we were attempting to make a mountain out of a molehill.

Mr. Pallett: You are bringing forth a mouse.

Mr. Pearson: Well, we will see about that. The Prime Minister said that last Friday he and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom met representatives of the C.B.C. following their conference. Just before the arranged interview commenced the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, according to the Prime Minister of Canada, asked what would be the questions in this interview. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that as he recalled it the first of the two questions—and these were questions to be addressed not to the Prime Minister of Canada but to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom—was whether or not the free trade proposal advanced last September would be on the agenda of the trade conference this fall. Our Prime Minister said this afternoon—and I think I am quoting accurately what he said—"I then said, 'No, no.'" That terminated the matter so far as he was concerned, the Prime Minister said today.

That may have terminated the matter so far as the Canadian Prime Minister was concerned but that explanation does not terminate the matter so far as we on this side of the house are concerned, it does not remove our strong feeling on the question of intervention or interference with the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by members of the government. We feel the Prime Minister should regard this in the same light we do in view of a debate which took place in this house only a year or so ago and which I will mention in more detail in a few minutes relating to intervention or interference with the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on the part of members of the government. "No, no", said the Prime Minister.

What was the result of this "no, no"? Well, in this interview with Mr. Macmillan no question regarding the free trade offer was in fact asked. The matter was not brought up although it was one of the two questions, apparently, that the C.B.C. representative had in his mind and he had mentioned them to the man whom he was going to interview. Then when the Prime Minister gave his explanation this afternoon I, in order to give him another opportunity to clear up the matter, repeated my earlier question in somewhat different form. I said:

Arising out of the Prime Minister's answer, am I to understand that the statement attributed to him, not by one but by a number of reputable newspaper correspondents, 'No, no, you cannot ask that question'—

And that was a quotation from the report in the press.

—then had nothing whatever to do with the question that Mr. Macmillan might have been asked by the C.B.C. reporter regarding free trade.

The Prime Minister said:

I have nothing really to add to what I have already said. Any question that arose was in consequence of his request as to the nature of the questions that were to be asked. In other words, he wanted to know in advance.

And when he was told in advance as to what one of the questions would be the Prime Minister himself admits that he intervened and said, "No, no." That seems to me to constitute interference in the affairs of the C.B.C. by the Prime Minister of this country, especially in view of the fact that in the subsequent interview no mention was made of this very important subject. May I just read what the Canadian Press had to say about this matter. This is the report which appeared throughout the country and it is substantiated by reports from other newspaper correspondents who were here on this occasion. This is the Canadian Press report of the incident as it appeared in the five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Journal of June 13, 1958:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker today intervened to prevent a C.B.C. interviewer from asking Prime Minister Macmillan of Britain a question about Britain's proposal for an Anglo-Canadian free trade area.

The C.B.C. asked Mr. Macmillan for a brief recorded television interview after he and Mr. Diefenbaker concluded a 45-minute discussion in the Canadian Prime Minister's office.

The interviewer explained to Mr. Macmillan before the actual recording began, that his first question would concern the British free trade proposal made last fall. He said—

That is the interviewer.

—the question would be: "Will Britain's free trade scheme be discussed at the commonwealth economic conference?"

Mr. Diefenbaker, standing beside Mr. Macmillan, said, "No, no," and a whispered conversation among the two prime ministers and the C.B.C. interviewer ensued.

When the recording began, the first and only question asked by the C.B.C. was what Mr. Macmillan considered the main achievements of his visit to Canada and the United States.

With great respect I suggest that nothing the Prime Minister said this afternoon in his ambiguous, cloudy and uncertain explanation relieves him from the responsibility of having intervened between the representative of the C.B.C. and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in the way which determined, at least to some extent, the nature of the interview and the questions that would be asked. I claim that that is certainly interference in the affairs of the C.B.C.

Was there any justification for the Prime Minister in intervening in any way, shape or form in regard to a question addressed to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom about a free trade offer of his government made to the Canadian government last autumn? We on this side of the house have been trying to secure information on this matter for months in the place where that information should be secured, namely in the House of Commons, and we have not been successful. But we have read in accounts, in reports outside the house, in newspapers, that this offer of free trade still stands. That statement was made by the president of the board of trade some weeks ago when he was in Montreal. That statement was made by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom himself only the other day when he is reported as saying that the United Kingdom stands by her suggestion for an Anglo-Canadian free trade area. Mr. Macmillan emphasized that the proposal for free trade had been laid on the table by the United Kingdom and it was still there; the offer remained to be taken up in whole or in part. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, surely it was the natural thing for a C.B.C. television interviewer to do, to suggest to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom that that was to be one of the questions he would ask him, the most natural and reasonable thing in the world.

It seems to me there was no cause for the Prime Minister intervening in this question in any way, shape or form or for saying, "No, no" or, "no, no, no" whatever he might have had in mind in using this double negative. It was a perfectly proper question for an interviewer to ask the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, a question which deals with the matter of the greatest possible importance, a matter which has aroused the interest of the people of this country.

I suggest that quite apart from the reasonableness of the question itself, whatever the question may have been that was suggested to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, the Prime Minister of Canada had no right whatever to interfere in any way in this matter. I suggest that in the intervention which he made last Friday he was exercising a form of direct censorship over the C.B.C. interviewer carrying out his job. The Prime Minister, of all people, should have been the very first to appreciate the impropriety of this. We on this side of the house recall how last March 29 he and other members of his party in the house at that time so bitterly criticized the prime minister of that day for writing, not to a C.B.C. interviewer or a C.B.C. correspondent but to the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that he did not think very much of a particular program which had appeared. This was after the program had appeared, not before someone was going to ask somebody whether he could put a question on the air. At that time the Prime Minister said that this constituted very serious interference with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

If a complaint made in writing to the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, complaining about a program that had been delivered, constituted very serious interference with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, how can you describe the intervention of the Prime Minister on this occasion when a question was addressed by a C.B.C. interviewer to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom concerning a matter which is of very considerable interest and great importance to this country and which in fact that interviewer wished to ask and which in fact, as it happens, he did not ask because of this intervention? Perhaps I might read from the Prime Minister's own statement at that earlier time. The Prime Minister, in attacking the prime minister of the day because he wrote the letter I have mentioned, had this to say as found on page 2830 of Hansard of March 29, 1957:

This seems to me—

He is referring to Mr. St. Laurent's letter to the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

—an example of supercilious censoriousness that is not in keeping with the maintenance of freedom of speech within this country.

Then he went on to say:

To say that the Prime Minister has the right, or, indeed, that he can defend the right to communicate with the chairman of the C.B.C., with all the vast authority and prestige which the position of Prime Minister carries, is one of the most outrageous propositions that have ever been advanced in this house. It denies freedom of speech. It denies that the C.B.C. may broadcast programs which are not agreeable to the susceptibilities of the Prime Minister.

If the present Prime Minister felt that way a little over a year ago about a letter of complaint addressed to the chairman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation by the prime minister of that day, I wonder what he would say if he were on this side of the house if the prime minister of that day had interfered between an interviewer and the prime minister of the United Kingdom in an effort at least to direct what he would or would not be asked. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had some even harsher things to say at that time and the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) also contributed his bit to this debate, the result of which, as some hon. members will recall, was a whole series of questions put on the order paper to be answered orally by every cabinet minister of that day asking each cabinet minister to get up and say whether he had ever intervened in any way, by letter or orally, with the C.B.C. to influence any of their programs.

My hon. friends opposite will remember that we stood up one after another and answered that question and the opposition of that day got a good deal of pleasure out of that procedure. Later in the same debate to which I have referred the Postmaster General, in making his contribution to the attack on the government of that day for what they called interference, interference after the event not before, had this to say as found at page 2838 of Hansard of March 29, 1957:

—it is the . . . duty of the Prime Minister to keep away from intervention in the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I quite agree that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to keep away from intervention in the affairs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I can imagine no more gratuitous or dangerous form of intervention than to suggest to an interviewer of that corporation what he may or may not ask the prime minister of the United Kingdom in an interview which had been arranged with the prime minister of that country. Again, Mr. Speaker, with very great respect, the ambiguous explanation of the Prime Minister this afternoon, and that is putting it mildly, does not remove in any way, shape or form our grievance or our strong feeling that such intervention has taken place. That is why I venture to bring this grievance to the attention of the house. If the Prime Minister is tempted in the future to dictate who shall say what over the air I suggest that he might hesitate and repeat to himself words which he used on a less happy occasion last Friday, "No, no, no."

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the statements I made last year I believe them to be as implicitly correct today as they were then. I am going to recall the circumstances in connection with the actions of my hon. friend's associates and the government of that day which brought about the words which I used on that occasion, words which were in keeping with the occasion. The first occasion when there was interference, and it was interference, was when Professor Ostry was to be given the opportunity to speak over the C.B.C. on the life and times of Mr. Mackenzie King. It was advertised that he would do so and that revelation was received with anticipation by the people of Canada as a whole. But for some reason that broadcast was never proceeded with. Indeed, it was withdrawn.

When we brought the matter of interference with the C.B.C. before the government of the day there was not one member of that government, including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who was able to stand up and say that the government of that day had not interfered directly in order to prevent a broadcast which would have hurt the susceptibilities of some of my hon. friends opposite. They did not dare stand up and say they had not made impossible the carrying out of the broadcast in question.

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement is not correct.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearkes: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order to point out that what the Prime Minister has stated with regard to this particular incident is totally inaccurate.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member that that is scarcely a point of order. If the hon. member wishes to take exception to what is being said by the speaker who has the floor and the floor is not yielded he should refrain until the speaker is finished.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the floor. There is no point of order if it is similar to the last one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who is the Speaker here?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, speaking to the point of order—

Mr. Green: There is no point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, you had ruled—

Mr. Speaker: I have already made my ruling and it is not open to the hon. member to discuss that point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is quite right that you made a ruling but under the practice of the house it is open to representatives of political groups to rise and, with respect, seek to indicate to the Speaker that possibly he has overlooked something in the ruling he has made.

Mr. Speaker: That is true—

Mr. Pickersgill: There are distinguished precedents.

Mr. Speaker: —if it is done before the ruling is made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rose, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I did not see the hon. member but I must consider the incident closed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I address myself to the Speaker for whom, of course, I have the greatest respect, as he knows. Surely this group or any hon. member of the house will not be denied the opportunity of having at least one member make representations with regard to a ruling which the Speaker has made. I am not going to persist with the point because of my respect for Your Honour but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you will want to give consideration to my right in these circumstances to comment on your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member, and I think he is an experienced member of the house who will recognize the practice, that the Speaker does, if he feels it necessary, hear members to assist him in coming to a conclusion. Now in this case I had no doubt about the point of order, which was really not a point of order but a question of contradicting something that had been said. I did not see the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), or I would have been glad to hear him. After I have concluded my ruling I hope he will not seek to contradict the Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is no surprise to me, Mr. Speaker, that as I speak and refer to those things in the past within the sorrowful memory of my hon. friends it causes them to rise on questions of privilege.

I had pointed out that they did, in fact, interfere with the C.B.C. in connection with the broadcast to which I made reference earlier, an anticipated one, an advertised one by Mr. Ostry—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house the evidence on which he makes those statements?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The evidence is very clear, and when the evidence was brought to the attention of the house there was no denial.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was denied.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A denial now.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was denied at the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. The hon. gentleman has just heard the member for Bonavista-Twillingate deny the statement and the Prime Minister, under the rules of this house is obliged to accept that denial without any reservation. That is the point I had in mind a few moments ago. I submit to you with great confidence that the Prime Minister must accept at once the statement made by an hon. member in this house that a denial was made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend is endeavouring to raise issues that have no—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have raised a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raised a point of order that the Prime Minister should accept a statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Would he indicate what statement it was that should be accepted?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There was a statement that there had been interference with regard to the Ostry broadcast, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate denied that statement. The Prime Minister persisted as though no denial had been made. I say that under the rules of the house it is not open to any hon. member to fail to accept a denial made by another hon. member. I am asking Your Honour to ask the Prime Minister to accept the statement of the member who has just made the denial.

Mr. Green: On this point of order, may I point out that the hon. member for Essex East is completely distorting the rules. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had made some statement with regard to what he, himself, had said, then perhaps the Prime Minister should accept it. He did not speak for himself, he spoke for the former government as a whole. Now, the fact that he says the former government did not do something surely does not mean we have to accept that as gospel.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did deny that statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Deny what statement?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The statement made by the Prime Minister, who persisted in saying there was no denial; I will not accept any denial, says the Prime Minister. This is clearly contrary to the rules of the house, and is a practice in which the Prime Minister should not indulge.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps since I have been dragged in to this, I could say one word.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You jumped in, head first.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I asserted was that there was a denial at the time, as Hansard will show. There was no interference by the government in respect of that broadcast.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we are confusing two matters. I asked the hon. member for Essex East what words he felt should have been accepted. If it were a denial by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate of a statement made by him in his place that he had not interfered with the C.B.C., then I feel sure the Prime Minister would have been bound, and would have accepted the statement. But as I recall what transpired it was not a denial of what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said about himself. I think we can proceed, and perhaps restrain our susceptibilities in a matter of this kind where obviously things will be said which are within the normal course of party conflict, and which would not be acceptable on both sides of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To return once more to the trend of my thoughts, I was dealing with a subject, Mr. Speaker, which does lead to the wounding of the susceptibilities of my hon. friends opposite, namely the broadcast that was advertised to take place by Bernard Ostry. The people of Canada were interested in finding out what this author had to say. However, the government of that day had in its membership those who did not desire that the people of Canada should become aware of some of the things which had been dealt with in the book. At the time, there was a question raised as to who had actually brought about the cancellation of that much anticipated broadcast. We were unable to find out. The only information available was that information would not be given.

Television Interview—Alleged Interference

Then came the occasion mentioned by my hon. friend on the 26th, 27th and 28th of March last, in which there was again an example of the kind of thing which should not take place. In this case the then prime minister—I am not going into the facts because he is not in this house—heard a broadcast by a young professor in Winnipeg who referred to a subject that sometimes arouses the susceptibilities of the Leader of Opposition, namely the kind of policy that Canada had at the time of Suez when Canada, through the hon. gentleman, cast a vote against Britain and France and placed them in the same position as the U.S.S.R. as countries which had departed from the course that they should have followed.

This is one subject about which my hon. friends do not like to hear. On that occasion, the then prime minister wrote a letter in which he pointed out—at least we understand this is what the letter contained because we were never able to see it—that this young man, who had only been in Canada for a few months, did not have that background of understanding education or appreciation, to be able to speak to the Canadian people through the medium of the C.B.C. In other words, the direction was clear, that he should no longer appear as a commentator on the C.B.C. Now, those were the two examples that were brought to the attention of the house as examples of interference with the rights of the people of Canada to obtain information.

I now come to the matter in question. My hon. friend really revealed the reason why he is so exercised, because he said that they have not yet found out about the free trade offer. Might I suggest that he should bring up something new. They used all that during the election campaign—bring up something new. Get a new speech.

Mr. Pearson: You get a new one every day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This was used over and over again during the election campaign. It was said that facts had been concealed. There was nothing concealed here. The question was asked as to whether or not this would be on the agenda. It was a joint interview and I was present on that occasion. The question of whether or not it would be discussed at the conference this fall is something which will have to be determined in due course. However, there was no concealment; members of the press gallery asked question after question regarding this matter and the prime minister answered them. There was certainly no concealment in so far as the C.B.C. keeping anything from the people was concerned. Last evening Mr. Edgar McInnis, the president of the council of the Canadian institute of international affairs, interviewed the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and that interview was quite lengthy. There was nothing kept from the Canadian people; it was indeed a full and free discussion. I say that this simply indicates how short of issues are my hon. friends opposite when they endeavour to raise such matters in order to obscure the real issues facing this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: Rubbish.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend is the best judge in the house of rubbish.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have listened to enough of it from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have nothing to withdraw. There was no interference with the C.B.C.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friends have suddenly developed an affection for the independence of that body which they did not have during their days in office, whereas we know today, as from day to day we listen to the broadcasts and the commentators, the C.B.C. is not under the same degree of control, whether by direct influence or whether it was subconscious in its effect, which brought about a situation in this country where some of the commentators did not enjoy the freedom they enjoy today, to speak fearlessly regardless of any circumstances. The former situation was made clear by the communication to the C.B.C. to the effect that a certain commentator had not spoken as he should have done and did not have a proper realization of Canadian conditions and that he had trodden on the delicate toes of the government then in power.

My hon. friend has spoken with exaggerated exuberance about this matter in his desire to leave the impression, which cannot be left with the Canadian people who have listened to the C.B.C. since June 21, 1957 and have heard day by day the broadcasts over the various channels of that body, that criticism has been restrained.

The government has at no time or in any way interfered with the C.B.C. When my hon. friend reads what I said in 1957 he will be aware of my views in this matter. I repeat my words, that as long as this government is in power—and that will be a long time if this kind of picayune criticism persists—there will be no interference, directly or indirectly, with the criticisms of commentators or others, nor will there be any interference with the right of the people of Canada to secure full information on any and every subject. I think it makes it clear that this has been the state of affairs since June 21 last, when one remembers that the only example which could be raised by the opposition in no way indicates any interference with the C.B.C. The information in this case had already been given in detail to the press conference and had been broadcast over the C.B.C., in part or in full, and last evening the fullest possible discussion was allowed on this matter during the course of the interview of the prime minister by Mr. McInnis.

The only thing about it, Mr. Speaker, is that my hon. friends have harassed themselves because they do not have the information on the so-called free trade proposition which was advanced to this government, and they are adopting this method of bringing to the attention of the country that they have not been able to secure this information and so are endeavouring to hold this government responsible for interfering with the C.B.C., which is something it never has done, will not now do and does not intend to do.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has referred to this matter as being picayune and has given the impression that this is a mountain made out of a molehill. These were some of the words he used when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) today asked him some questions on the orders of the day. I am sure there are many precedents in speeches of the right hon. gentleman which clearly indicate that this is an important question. One is, I think, understandably surprised by the words of the Prime Minister, particularly in view of his well-known interest in matters affecting freedom in all its aspects, in that he should have regarded the raising of this particular question as not so important as is being suggested. One is certainly justified in saying that the Prime Minister is not doing himself justice, having in mind the views expressed in his capacity as a private member in other days.

The Prime Minister says this is a mountain made out of a molehill but he has gone further in the speech which he has just made. I suggest that this, as an explanation of what has already been said, only adds to the confused situation with respect to what the Prime Minister actually did say and does not clarify what he perhaps intended to convey. The Prime Minister's remarks on the orders of the day were recalled by the Leader of the Opposition but I think they deserve to be mentioned again. The Prime Minister said: "We discussed various matters, it being understood that thereafter there would be a joint conference before the C.B.C. When we came out we met the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation representatives, and just before the interview commenced the Prime Minister asked what the questions were." He asked what the questions were and in this context, and in the words used by the Prime Minister that query by the British prime minister could only mean one thing, and that is: What questions are going to be put to me by those who are going to interview us? That interpretation, I say, is the only interpretation which can reasonably be made.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman what he is reading from?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am reading the observations made by the Prime Minister during the course of this afternoon, observations already referred to by the Leader of the Opposition and commented on by the right hon. gentleman. I was saying that when the British prime minister asked what the questions were, in the context of the language used by the right hon. gentleman they could only mean that the British prime minister was thinking of only one thing, that is the questions that had been prepared, presumably by the C.B.C. for submission to the British prime minister for reply by him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What does the hon. member mean, "prepared by the press"?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): By the C.B.C., I should say. And now that the Prime Minister has raised this, it is a matter which touches not only the C.B.C., because, after all, although the C.B.C. is representative of radio and television it does represent the press in the larger sense of the word, and this is certainly a matter which can be considered as involving not only the freedom of radio and television but also the freedom of the press itself.

The Prime Minister went on, in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, as I recall it to say: "The first question on the list of two was whether or not the representation or the so-called proposal advanced last September regarding free trade with the United Kingdom would be on the agenda of the trade conference this fall, and I said 'no, no' ". Now that answer, that observation when related to the previous sentence of the right hon. gentleman, certainly presents a picture in which it is clear what happened. Certain questions were put by the representatives of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to the British prime minister and, for some reason, which has been made manifest not only on Friday last but for many months, the Prime Minister seemingly is reluctant to have any unnecessary mention made of this proposal which was brought forward, first of all, by the chancellor of the exchequer last autumn and more recently, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, by the president of the board of trade three or four weeks ago in Montreal.

The Prime Minister may have good reasons for not wanting this opinion of the British proposal discussed. After all, the Prime Minister has access as leader of the government to information not open to those of us on this side of the house. But he could at least give reasons for minimizing the number of occasions when this question could be discussed. But in the absence of a satisfactory explanation, it is the duty of the opposition to ascertain from the government and from the Prime Minister what its attitude with regard to this proposal is.

The Prime Minister obviously minimizes the importance of the British proposal. Today he does not even call it a proposal; he says it is "a so-called proposal". That is not what the chancellor of the exchequer said. That is not what Sir David Eccles, president of the board of trade said; that is not what Mr. Harold Macmillan said in the press conference he gave the other day. We mean business with this proposal put forward by Her Majesty's government, said the British prime minister. It is not a so-called proposal. I know the right hon. gentleman is seeking to minimize his own proposal of last July with regard to diversion by saying it was not a proposal at all, that in fact it was a statement of objective. But the fact is that we have had from the Prime Minister for the first time, in the limited context in which he used it, a mention of the phrase "British free trade proposal". I think this afternoon was the first time he has even mentioned the phrase in this house.

In spite of repeated questions directed to him—and the Prime Minister will recall that I put some of them to him myself last fall—it has not been possible to get from the right hon. gentleman any reaction whatsoever regarding what the government as a whole thinks about this proposal. And not only are we denied this opportunity in the house, but the Prime Minister apparently took the opportunity, when he was with the British prime minister, of precluding the latter from amplifying details which we on this side of the house have been trying to get from this administration for many months both before and after the election. And if we have not been able to succeed, should those who represent the agencies of communication of this country be denied the opportunity of conveying to the people of Canada the views of the British government in respect of a matter which they regard as so important not only for the United Kingdom but for Canada and which in the light of the need for interdependence, as the British prime minister said, could mean so much to the world at large in these difficult days of international tension.

I am sure the Prime Minister has not succeeded this afternoon in satisfying this house that he did not by his manner and speech preclude the British prime minister from making a comment in answer to a question submitted to him by the C.B.C., a question which is of the greatest interest to this house and to this country. That is an unwarranted interference with one of the agencies of communication in Canada which it is our duty, just as it was the Prime Minister's duty when he was in opposition and thought there was interference on another occasion, to bring to the attention of the house.

The Prime Minister said in answer to the Leader of the Opposition that he meant what he is reported to have said last year at page 2830 of Hansard, and repeated today. Of course, the Prime Minister is a master in the art of diversion. I do not mean trade diversion; I mean in the art of diversion in debate and in the debate last year he undertook to give a full answer to the comparable though justified allegations made today by the Leader of the Opposition.

Assuming, for argument sake, that the course taken by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister last year with regard to the letter by the former prime minister was valid. That does not in any circumstance justify the action which the Prime Minister took on Friday last. I say: if that course was right a year ago—and I am not saying that it was; I say it was not—that was no reason for the Prime Minister doing what he did on Friday last. As a matter of fact and again assuming for purpose of argument—and I will come to that point later—that there was validity in the position taken last year by the right hon. gentleman and those of his colleagues who sit with him now, compare the difference in the situation: in the one case it was a letter directed in terms apparent for everyone to see and understand—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And unproduced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman, apparently, saw it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Have you got it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He apparently saw it, because he told us all about its terms. It was a letter directed to the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the former prime minister denied that it involved the kind of intervention about which the right hon. gentleman complains. But compare that situation with the situation of last Friday. Here are the British prime minister and the Prime Minister of Canada. Who seeks to put the question? Is it the president of the C.B.C. or the general manager? No. It is a reporter of ordinary status though, I suspect, of great ability. He obviously would be awed by an intervention by the Prime Minister of Canada.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that a comparison of these two situations puts the Prime Minister exactly in the position—only with more reasons attached to him in which he sought to put the former prime minister and whatever the hon. gentleman may say about the incident of last year the fact is there was a denial by the prime minister of that day that he had in any way interfered with the operations of the C.B.C. What is more, any one who knows the character of that right hon. gentleman who formerly sat in the treasury benches knows that any denial made by him is one that would be accepted by any hon. member of this house.

The Prime Minister, again resorted to the capacity he has for diversion and of introducing a red herring—a talent which I as a fellow lawyer certainly cannot help but admire—

Mr. Green: You are good at it yourself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank my hon. friend for that compliment. The fact is, however, that the Prime Minister on this occasion resorted to another red herring. He introduced the Ostry matter. That, too, was denied. There is no evidence—and I challenge the Prime Minister now to produce it—to support his contention that there was any interference. The only evidence he could produce is a statement by the then minister of national revenue who reported on matters having to do with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the C.B.C. had advised him in an answer which they prepared and which he presented in this house for reasons of non-adaptability they had cancelled the program. The Prime Minister did not refer to that and so, when he introduces the Ostry matter, he introduces a matter which like the previous one is not in fact a precedent at all and in no way helps to justify the course which the Prime Minister used when he appeared with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom last Friday during the television interview regarding questions being put by the representative of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

By introducing this technique of red herring the Prime Minister said there was no interference in the discussion of these matters. "Why, the president of the Canadian institute of international affairs spoke about this matter on Sunday," said the Prime Minister. No one has suggested that this interference by the Prime Minister extends to all programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We realize there are limitations in the mobility of the Prime Minister; there are circumstances beyond the physical control of any man. I heard that broadcast by Professor McInnis and I do not recall him saying anything about the British free trade proposal but in any event if he did that does not justify the Prime Minister in precluding a representative of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation from asking a question on the very same subject of the British prime minister.

As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister introduced a fourth red herring this afternoon. He mentioned an important incident involving the nations of the world in the matter of Suez. He forgets that that particular incident recalls the very technique which he apparently used on Friday last. I well recall reading in the paper that after the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) had been sworn in he was asked by the newspaper men of this country what he thought about Canada's foreign policy and what he thought about Suez. The Secretary of States for External Affairs replied and said that he agreed fully with the policy of the present Leader of the Opposition, the former secretary of state for external affairs. At that very point my right hon. and genial friend the Prime Minister said, "No, no, no. The policy of this government is exactly as stated by me in parliament." This left the clear implication that anything said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that is contrary to anything the Prime Minister has ever said must not be uttered and must not be communicated to the press and not even reported by the press. The views of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on important matters of that kind apparently must not run counter to what my right hon. friend as leader of the Conservative party and Prime Minister of Canada thinks and says. And so the technique of "No, no, no" used on Friday last was on one occasion used on the steps of the building that houses the Supreme Court of Canada after the distinguished Secretary of State for External Affairs had been sworn in as a member of Her Majesty's privy council.

We all realize that the Prime Minister has heavy responsibilities, that he is a busy man. We can very well understand that there are occasions when his over-all consuming interest in the problems of the nation and of the world are such that he might do things which as the private hon. member for Prince Albert he certainly would not do and which he certainly has alleged should not be done. But it is our duty—and I am sure the Prime Minister recognizes it is our duty—to remind him of these excursions into the realm of violation of the kind of freedom which we cherish in this country and which I know he along with every other hon. member of this house would want to see us perpetuate.

The hon. gentleman would do well to remember his own words which the Leader of the Opposition quoted. But if the words quoted by the Leader of the Opposition are effective and bear repetition so, too, do the words of the distinguished Minister of Finance who sits with him. Here is what the Minister of Finance said on March 29, 1957, as recorded at page 2824 of volume 3 of Hansard:

> As long as I am a member of parliament I certainly intend to defend Mr. Dunton's right to support the policies and defend the programming activities of the corporation even when I disagree with them. But when there is disagreement, sir, let it be in the proper place, let it be in the houses of parliament. Parliament is supreme; parliament is the body to which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is responsible. And in this particular if, as appears from the statement made by the Prime Minister yesterday, Mr. Dunton resisted the attempt of the Prime Minister to influence the programming activities of the C.B.C., then I say—

And I ask the present Prime Minister to pay special attention to these words:

> —then I say this parliament owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Dunton for having stood firmly for a principle that the Prime Minister ought to have been the first to uphold and which at that time he evidently was discarding and repudiating.

The Prime Minister might well recall other words of his when at the conclusion of his remarks last year as recorded at page 2831 of Hansard he said:

> I say to the Prime Minister,—

This is the present Prime Minister speaking—> —and I do not wish to carry the matter any further, but I hope this will be a lesson to the members of this government that interference, indirectly or directly, direct or subtle,—

"No, no, no" might be subtle.

> —will not be condoned. Interference of this kind can only destroy the independence of the C.B.C. and dry up the wells of information to which the Canadian people are entitled.

As I have said, we all appreciate that the Prime Minister has heavy responsibilities. They may have been responsible for the statement he made in this house about the press interview given by the secretary general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization which remarks, incidentally, Mr. Spaak repeated in Halifax after he left Ottawa. We can understand the Prime Minister's concern about the remarks he made about trade diversion with the United Kingdom. We now have this further incident when the prime minister of the United Kingdom was precluded in his presence from saying to a representative of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation what he thought about a proposal to which this government obviously has not yet given the full and final consideration this question is entitled to receive. I say to the Prime Minister, then, in his own words, "Let this particular occasion be a reminder of the undesirability of this kind of action, and let it not happen again, and let it now be remembered as a result of this debate."

I say to the Prime Minister, too, why does he not take the country into his confidence and tell us what the British prime minister wanted to say about the proposal? It certainly deserves at least from this government a statement that it is prepared to give this question of British free trade the kind of sympathetic attention that one would expect this government to give to a friendly government like Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom. That, surely, is not asking too much of the Prime Minister and we all trust he will not make this mistake again.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising because after the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) spoke I confirmed my recollection by consulting Hansard and I would like to make clear from the record itself, from the answers that were given by the then minister who answered in this house for the C.B.C. what the facts were about this Ostry affair. The first time that I can find it was brought up was at page 881 of Hansard of February 6, 1956. A question was asked by the then member for Humboldt-Melfort, Mr. Bryson, as follows:

> I should like to direct a question to the minister of national revenue. Why was the discussion on the book "The Age of Mackenzie King" cancelled by the C.B.C.?

To which Mr. McCann replied:

> Mr. Speaker, I have asked the C.B.C. about this matter and I am informed that it was not a case of cancelling a program. The C.B.C. reports that, while some consideration was given to the book as a possible subject for a national television network discussion, on consideration it was not thought to be a good basis for such a discussion.

Now, there were a number of other references to this at various times which I think it would be trespassing on the time of the house to refer to, although I would be quite happy to give the page references to anyone who wished to have them, but it was finally brought up by the then member for Eglinton, now the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fleming), at page 1462 of Hansard of February 23, 1956, as follows:

> Is the Minister of National Revenue now in a position to answer the question I asked him on February 15 as to who it was within the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who made the decision that the program on "The Age of Mackenzie King" by Ferns and Ostry should not proceed? The question is to be found at page 1198 of Hansard.

Mr. McCann replied as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation takes full responsibility for their attitude.

I may say that on examination of the other references I find that there is not the faintest suggestion of any evidence at any point anywhere that any member of the former government ever discussed this matter with the C.B.C., and I happen to know of my own personal knowledge that this matter had been fully determined by the C.B.C. before the members of the government, with one exception and that exception happened to be myself, had ever heard about it, or any proposal of that kind. I know this because I mentioned the matter to Mr. Dunton, and he told me when I first mentioned it to him that the C.B.C. had already decided that it was not a suitable program—these are the facts —and that he had discussed it with no member of the government.

Mr. Pallett: Except with you.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): He discussed it with you.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman had been listening attentively he would have heard what I said. I asked Mr. Dunton the question and he told me the decision had already been reached.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was the hon. member a member of the government at that time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, I was a member of the government in 1956; I was a member of the government from 1953, and I had no discussion whatsoever on this matter with Mr. Dunton; I just asked him the question.

Mr. Brooks: Why?

Mr. Pickersgill: And he told me there was going to be no such program. I asked the question out of curiosity that I think was proper curiosity. I had the assurance from Mr. Dunton at that time, as I say, that no member of the government had discussed the matter with him, no member at all.

Mr. Pallett: Except you.

Mr. Cardiff: The hon. member just told us that he discussed it with him and he was a member of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might repeat what I said for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. I said that I met Mr. Dunton and I asked him about this program about which I had read in the press.

Mr. Cardiff: Why?

Mr. Pickersgill: About this proposed program, and he told me then there was going to be no such program and that is all that happened.

Mr. Pallett: What was the question? There is going to be no program, is there?

Mr. Pickersgill: As to the letter that Mr. St. Laurent wrote to Mr. Dunton about which the Prime Minister seemed to know so much, we all know, of course, that the Prime Minister is a great authority on letters he has never seen. He admitted he had never seen this letter and yet he presumed to tell us what he believed was in it, as he presumed to go back and forth across the country and talk about other letters at a time when he had never seen them. I notice the Prime Minister has said very little about them since he has had an opportunity to see them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What letters are they?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister remembers very well certain correspondence between prime ministers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which prime ministers?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. St. Laurent and Sir Anthony Eden. The Prime Minister discussed the correspondence frequently on the platform before he became Prime Minister but I notice he has had nothing to say about it since he became Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have had no reason to say anything.

Mr. Pickersgill: There never was any reason. I say that the Prime Minister has become quite an authority on letters he has never seen. These are just two examples. The Prime Minister, of course, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) pointed out a few minutes ago, is a past master, and I am not in his league at all, and I do not pretend to be. He is a past master at the art of diversion, and one of the most extraordinary of his diversions today, I think, was to bring up this old question of that famous vote at the United Nations. I thought we would not hear any more about that after the occasion at Geneva only a few weeks ago when the high commissioner for Canada, no doubt on instructions from the Prime Minister, voted with Russia against Great Britain, France and the United States as well.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it condemning Britain as an aggressor?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, neither was the other vote. There, Mr. Speaker, is the best possible example of the Prime Minister's diversion of the facts because that vote at the United Nations, as the Prime Minister ought to know, had nothing to do with condemning anybody. It was the question of putting an item on the agenda. In those days, of course, the items on the agenda were known. Now they are unknown.

I find myself disturbed about what the Prime Minister had to say. The most disturbing thing this afternoon was the very serious reflection that the Prime Minister made upon the management of the C.B.C. The Prime Minister implied, and in fact, almost said, that since June 21, 1957, the C.B.C. had been free to broadcast criticism of the government and that it had not been free before. I do not know what the Prime Minister did about listening to the C.B.C. before June 21, but some of us on this side of the house thought there were a good many programs on the C.B.C. which were at least somewhat critical of the then occupants of the treasury benches, and I think I have heard nothing on the C.B.C. since June 21 any more critical than a fair amount of the criticism that we heard on the C.B.C. before June 21.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Because we are doing so well.

Mr. Pickersgill: I believe it is a very good thing that there should be criticism of the government on the C.B.C. I think it was a good thing when we were in office, I think it is a good thing still and I hate to see anything whatever done that will in any way jeopardize the independence of the C.B.C. If we need a bill of rights in so far as matters affecting parliament are concerned, surely the first right we need to safeguard is the right of free expression on the air. It does seem to me that it is very odd indeed, when this appears to have been called into question by the Prime Minister himself with his famous "no, no, no," that the Prime Minister should then suggest that those who raise the question in the house are raising a question that is picayune. Surely freedom of speech in parliament and outside it is the most fundamental question of all.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we got very far with the last grievance but I hope we can get a little farther with this one. It is a matter involving some hundreds of people in the city of Vancouver, including a considerable number in my own constituency of Vancouver East. I have always found it very difficult to understand why the government has not seen fit to alter the federal regulations pertaining to eligibility for unemployment insurance whereby they now deny the opportunity and right to people drawing unemployment insurance benefits to try to obtain employment in the longshoring trade even if only for a few hours. I do not know the reasons for the regulation because to the best of my knowledge it applies only to the longshoring trade.

If a person is eligible for unemployment insurance benefits and in order to help himself gets a few hours work in any other trade and earns a few dollars, he does not become ineligible to continue drawing his unemployment insurance benefits, but if he gets even as little as two and a half hours work as a longshoreman he is immediately denied the right to draw unemployment insurance in the two week period that is involved. To me this is a most iniquitous regulation. I could give a great number of examples but I will refer only to one in order to prove my contention.

This case came to my attention recently. It concerns one of my constituents who by occupation is a logger. He has been unemployed and has been drawing unemployment insurance since December 14, 1957. Recently he decided he would try to get employment somewhere and he sought work as a longshoreman. To get work as a longshoreman you have to obtain what is known as a stevedore's registration number. He did so and he worked for two and a half hours on Tuesday, May 27. He earned $6.50. On the following day, which happened to be the day for payment of his unemployment insurance benefit, he received his unemployment insurance cheque for $30. He made out a statutory declaration as required by law advising the unemployment insurance commission office in Vancouver that he had worked two and a half hours as a longshoreman and had earned $6.50. He was immediately told that because he had worked two and a half hours as a longshoreman he was not eligible to draw his $30 and would have to wait for two weeks until the payroll statement of the company employing the longshoremen had been checked.

He was denied payment although he had only worked two and a half hours as a longshoreman. This man is married and has two children, a young girl of seven and a half and a boy two years and three months old. There was no food at all for the family and he was not eligible for any other assistance. It was just by the grace of God that we were able to have the Salvation Army provide him with temporary relief.

When the case was appealed to the unemployment insurance commission in Vancouver the officials were most co-operative and helpful but they said there was nothing they could do about it because of the regulation of the commission in Ottawa and that they had to abide by it. Here is a rather amazing situation. The chief claims agent—I forget his exact title but I think that is correct—in the unemployment insurance office in Vancouver told this man that if he would give up his stevedoring registration number he could immediately pay him his unemployment insurance. This man was trying to obtain a little bit of work in order to get some money to help his family but because he did so in the longshoring field and although he only worked for two and a half hours his endeavours to become a useful and productive member of society were curtailed and hampered. The only way he can draw his unemployment insurance benefits is by giving up his stevedoring permit number.

As I said, the employees in the office in Vancouver were most co-operative and helpful but they said they could not do anything about it because of the Ottawa regulations. I have only cited one case but I could refer the minister to hundreds of a similar nature. This is an absolutely vicious and iniquitous practice. It is a vicious, iniquitous regulation. I felt that I should draw this grievance to the attention of the government because it should be correced immediately.

The matter probably comes under the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) but unfortunately he has been away for a great many days. However, I note the evident interest of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) who also comes from Vancouver and who knows something about the longshoring trade and the unemployment situation there. If he cannot give the matter personal consideration I trust that he will see that it is drawn to the attention of the proper officials to see if the situation cannot be corrected.

Although I am not going to go into details at the moment I hope the government will also look into the situation in the city of Vancouver as far as the payment of unemployment insurance benefits to longshoremen is concerned. To the best of my knowledge they are the only group who in respect of unemployment insurance are classified as second class Canadians in that different regulations apply to them from those that apply to people engaged in any other occupation, regulations of such a nature that these men pay more and receive less when it comes to benefits.

I know that in the past a brief was presented to the government and I was informed only this morning that a new brief is being prepared for presentation. I am not going into this matter at the moment except to draw it to the attention of the government.

In so far as this other matter is concerned, this major grievance where a casual worker for only 2½ hours was cut off unemployment insurance, I hope for speedy action by the government.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in so far as this question of unemployment insurance is concerned, I should like to bring to the attention of the house a problem concerning young people who, being entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, try to use their spare time by attending local schools and are denied the right to draw their unemployment insurance benefits. There is something rather unfair about this particular regulation.

I have a number of people in my riding who during the summer engaged in the fishing industry and were thereby well qualified for unemployment insurance benefits during the winter. Employment was extremely difficult to get, and rather than spend the time doing nothing they decided to go back to school. The moment they entered the school their unemployment insurance benefits were cut off. In my opinion there is something wrong when a young lad qualifies himself for unemployment insurance benefits, and then is denied those benefits because he tries to use his spare time profitably.

If I may put it another way, it seems to me there is something wrong with a scheme of this kind which pays a young man to waste his time. I would say again that this is one problem which certainly needs some investigation. It is a question that needs very careful attention. At the moment, it does appear that these regulations governing unemployment insurance are a little too rigid in many cases and need the attention of the unemployment insurance commission.

NATURAL GAS DISTRIBUTION—REPORTED UNSATISFACTORY LABOUR CONDITIONS

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to raise another matter which appears day by day to become more important in this country. I am referring to the situation with regard to natural gas, and all its aspects across this country. No useful purpose will be served by going into past history, with which most of us are familiar. Certainly, the history should be familiar to the government because this matter had a great deal to do with the fact the government is sitting on that side of the house today. There are many references on the record also concerning the change of heart the government has had since they left this side of the house concerning the trans-Canada pipe line issue.

I should like to deal in more detail with what might be called some of the side issues that have been raised with regard to this great Canadian utility. It appears to me that this whole issue of natural gas, trans-Canada pipe lines and the distributing lines, is nothing more nor less than an evil tree which, with all its evil branches, seems to be spreading across this country. Conceived in the rape of our natural resources by people who were referred to by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) as those Texas buccaneers, this evil tree has grown in the west and has spread towards the east, with every one of its branches appearing to be just as troublesome and just as evil as the tree itself. We have seen nothing but labour problems all the way across the country, starting with the infamous back-door agreement which was signed with a hit-and-run union before the employees were hired. They were forced into a union which they had never seen, the stewards of which they had never seen and which could not properly serve their interests. This master contract was signed in Alberta and covered all future employees.

We have seen some of the results of this action. There was the big strike at the head of the lakes around the Hearst area which tied up the whole operation for a period of three weeks last winter. The federal Department of Labour had to step in on that occasion in an effort to settle the matter so that the company could proceed with clearing the right of way and laying the pipe. The troubles did not end there. In fact, they were just getting nicely started. On two different occasions during the month of March I had to appeal to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) because clauses of this agreement, signed under the supervision of and with the assistance of the Department of Labour, were being violated. I should like to compliment the minister at this stage upon the speed with which he acted to correct the situation. On one particular occasion I sent a telegram to the minister's office one afternoon, and the following morning I received a telephone call from one of the top officials of Trans-Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): When the house adjourned at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with some of the labour problems which have arisen with respect to the trans-Canada pipe line, particularly in northern Ontario. In all fairness, and in spite of the record across the country, I would like to say that a lot of the trouble has not been the fault of the pipe line company—that is to say the parent company—but has been the fault of some of the contractors, subcontractors and sub-subcontractors. It appears that quite a spider's web of subcontracting is going on up there, and how things can be split so many times with everybody showing a profit is something which I cannot understand or explain to this house. However, it does involve difficulties when one tries to iron out any of these grievances; it is something like being in the middle of a northern swamp in the month of June when the mosquitoes are at their worst, not knowing just which mosquito is doing the biting.

Another convenient arrangement, and this of course applies to the period after the base rate was established following the strike in January, when there was an increase of a matter of 20 cents per hour to bring the base rate fairly close to the local rate, is where we get a group of employees, many of whom unfortunately may not be too well educated, being told "the rate here is $1.40 per hour but you don't want to work for as low a rate as that, you should do it on a piecework basis." After a good sales job they are convinced they can make themselves a fortune in a very short time, so they go in on a contract basis but find at the end of three or four weeks that all they are making is about 90 cents an hour instead of $1.40.

We have received many other complaints about how part of their pay has been held back for various reasons and now there is apparently a brand new gimmick altogether. In place of hiring local men who by this time are quite familiar with the agreement signed following the strike, they seem to be giving preference to people from outside the province and, indeed, in many cases from outside the country altogether. Such new men are not familiar with the agreement covering the projects and they make certain that these men do not stay on the job long enough to become familiar with it. After a few days' work they are laid off and others hired in their places. As recently as June 4 last I received a communication listing some of the problems I have raised and asking advice as to what could be done about them.

Another aspect of the matter which has affected this project right across the country has to do with the rights of way across farm properties. I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, of nothing so much as a wolf pack after the moose in winter; they pick off the moose one by one. Every known device in the selling field is used to have these men sign agreements, often without reading the small print and so on and so forth. The majority of them perhaps feel they could not afford legal advice to interpret the fine print in any event. As a result, they are picked off one by one. It might be wise to give a word of advice to the farmers who will become affected from now on. I might suggest that they might take an example from the moose and that if they, like the moose, keep together they will find they can protect themselves against the wolf pack.

This leads me to another aspect, probably the most important aspect of this whole question; that is the newspaper headlines which follow this project across Canada. I am speaking particularly of the scandal associated with municipal and provincial authorities right up to cabinet rank. We have seen some evidence of this in the province of Ontario and I believe there are one or two investigations going on in regard to this matter at the present time. The most significant thing about it is that while there are relatively few men who have abused the privileges and trust placed in them by the electorate, the fact nevertheless remains that the innocent are smeared along with the guilty, and it has now reached the stage where it is quite conceivable that the respect and trust in elected officials across Canada will be severely shaken. We have seen what has happened in the province of Ontario and, in the last few days, we have seen that this malignant tree has spread its roots into the province of Quebec—

Mr. McPhillips: On a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These grievances, I must inform the hon. member, must be of a federal nature. It is out of order to discuss in this house questions which are of a strictly provincial nature and which have no bearing on the affairs of this house. I must therefore ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to matters of a federal nature.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I thank the Speaker for the ruling and I would assure the house that it is my intention to show that this matter has very much to do with the federal government. If you will recall, sir, this matter had its start in the federal house during a debate which not only rocked the house but rocked it so that it upset and spilled one side on to the other. It has developed right across the country with other implications of provincial and municipal import which situation, I submit, has very much to do with this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to refer the hon. member to article 234, section (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition at page 198, which reads in part as follows:

> When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament—

Actually the redress of grievances which are of a municipal or provincial nature does not fall within the jurisdiction of this parliament and I must therefore ask the hon. member to refrain from discussing them.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I would submit, sir, that this matter has been, is now and can always be under the jurisdiction of this federal house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Had the proper action been taken by this federal government originally none of these things which I have mentioned would have come to pass or, at least, only in a very limited degree. The best thing of all would have been for the house to have taken the proper action in the first place and operated this transmission line for natural gas as a public utility. The second best thing would have been for this present government to have taken advantage of its opportunity to bring the line under public control. The third best thing would be for this government to take the proper and necessary action even at this late date. I would remind hon. members of some words; quoted I believe by Sir Winston Churchill, about sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind. This parliament has an inescapable responsibility to take action even at this late date to try to restore some of the respect and trust placed in public officials.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say something on this particular grievance.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Peters: For the very simple reason that I think a lot of Conservatives now sitting on that side do not believe that this transmission line should and will eventually be a public utility in this country. It is quite natural that some hon. member should ask why. Unfortunately in my part of the country we have been concerned with some of the problems surrounding the construction of the pipe line in the past few months.

The pipe line as it passes through northern Ontario is owned partly by the federal government and partly by the provincial government, and I think that many of the responsibilities which should have been accepted in connection wtih its construction have been ignored both by the federal government and by the provincial government of Ontario. Some hon. members may wonder why we wish to discuss this question of the pipe line, but I am certain that many other constituencies both in Ontario and in Quebec will soon be facing the type of difficulty I am about to describe.

When the federal government passed the pipe lines act they included in it a great many clauses granting privileges to the private companies building the lines, including the right of expropriation. They were granted the right to use a farmer's land with or without his agreement, but in my opinion adequate provision was never made for the rights and interests of those who were forced to give up their land. In my own riding of Timiskaming, when the officials of the company applied for easements they went to the farmers and said: this is only an option, we would like to pay you $5; we would also like to buy four acres of your 160-acre farm, having in mind the fact that the land required was only 66 feet wide and the rest was a linear measurement. At the same time they implied that whatever the farmer might decide; the federal government had already given them the right of expropriation.

I have looked into this question of expropriation to some extent, and I find that the company has been given that right. I have also found that very little protection has been given to the farmer who is faced with expropriation. In this case, although the farmers were inclined to stick together and deal collectively with the officials the pipe line company said they could not do this and that they had no intention of dealing with the farmers in this way. They played one farmer off against another. I think that having given the pipe line company the right to apply for expropriation, the right to easements, we should have given the farmers some protection by setting up an impartial board which would evaluate farm land.

I should like to call attention to a case which happened a few weeks ago in the riding of Timiskaming where a young couple, a veteran and his wife had applied to the Department of Veterans Affairs for money with which to start a tourist camp to be installed on a nice piece of land near a very suitable lake. They had applied to the department and were waiting to hear whether they could get money to start this motel. In the meantime the pipe line company came along with a crew on a Sunday night when people were not normally on that property, cut down the trees, brought in their bulldozers and cleared a stretch 60 feet wide. When the people concerned complained to the officials—the provincial police and other authorities—they were told that there was no redress and that if they wished to start an action for trespass they would have to go to proper legal channels. In this particular case the people had asked the Department of Veterans Affairs to send an evaluator and this official had set a valuation on this property in accordance with the plans which had been prepared for its development many months before, and his valuation of the land, and of the detrimental effect that this pipe line would have on it, was three times what the owners of the property were offered by the company.

I think that when we gave the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited the right to construct this public utility we should have given greater protection to those with whom the company has to deal. It is all very well to tell a farmer that he can take the company to court, but it is my understanding that in the riding of Timiskaming there is not one lawyer who is willing to conduct such cases against the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited. I know for a fact that the attorney general's department is not too willing to press trespass charges against the company, because I have made inquiries and have been informed that they are not willing to do so. The farmers in my part of the country are not sufficiently well off to spend thousands of dollars fighting against something they did not ask for in the first place.

The government of Canada has the responsibility for protecting these people. While I agree that we must allow this public utility to expropriate the land required we must also see to it that the people who are affected receive an adequate amount of money in return. It was accepted by some of the farmers at their meetings that they would be quite happy to settle for a basic sum of $50 an acre. They pointed out that if the company had to pay $200 to clear the land, then if the land had already been cleared, surely it would be worth at least that amount; the amount it would have cost, in any case, to clear. I believe the payment of $50 plus $200, making a total payment of $250, is a fair and reasonable price.

The contract set out certain things that would be done on behalf of a man who sold property. They undertook to close in the trenches and do clean-up work. They went so far as to state that they would seed the ground, grade it and place grass on it thereby making it very nice for the farmer. I understand that has not been done in most cases in western Ontario where the pipe line passed through. I do not think it will be done in Timiskaming because the people agreed to an over-all sum which would include damages and signed away or waived all rights to court procedure with respect to damage. I believe we have an obligation to look at the matter not only for the present pipeline but in order to set a precedent for the future. There is a popular rumour to the effect that it will not be long until a second and third line are put in.

Another problem with which it is difficult to deal is that of labour. We have no objection to United States companies and it is true that many have a large investment, perhaps $3 million worth of equipment. While it is true they should be allowed to bring in from the United States their overseers, foremen and employees above that rank I do not think it is necessary or desirable to allow them to bring in shovel operators, backline operators and workers of that type. In Ontario we have many competent shovel operators and other workers with many years of experience on construction crews. They would be perfectly capable of doing the work and this would obviate the necessity of bringing in men from other countries.

There has been a question raised as to whether this is a matter of federal concern. Certainly the question of bringing in United States workers to work on Canadian pipe lines comes under federal jurisdiction. We are faced with an odd situation when we cannot find out from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration how many United States workers were employed on a particular spread. In the contract governing the employment of workers for the section of the pipe line that is operated by the crown corporation all United States workers must be hired only with the consent of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) but the bulk of the people who have been brought in to work on the pipe line are from the United States. I must admit that we in Timiskaming refer to them as "you-all's". I suppose that is because many of them come from Texas and speak with a southern drawl: "How are you all?" These people do not enter Canada under a work permit. They come as landed immigrants and have no citizenship papers. They can move freely from place to place and stay as long as they wish. When a job is finished they can return to the United States to pursue their occupation elsewhere.

It is interesting to note how those charged with the responsibility of hiring employees to work on the pipe line avoid the use of the unemployment insurance offices. I believe that people seeking employment on construction jobs should not be required to line up in front of a construction shack at six o'clock in the morning while the boss comes out, strolls up and down, and says, "You and you and you work today; the rest of you be back here at six o'clock tomorrow morning." I can remember occasions like that when I went to work in the mines of northern Ontario at the end of the thirties and the beginning of the forties. Management thought it was wonderful to have 300 men lined up at the gate seeking to fill two vacancies. I thought those days had passed for all time.

One of the failings of the unemployment insurance commission is that it cannot guarantee that a man sent to a job as a shovel operator, for instance, is fully qualified in his occupation. We have no system in Canada under which we can determine who is and who is not qualified for a particular job. It frequently happens that a man sent to a job who has five or six years experience in his occupation is told by management at the end of half an hour that he is not qualified to do the work or has insufficient experience and someone is brought in to replace him who might have been employed by the company on a previous occasion, perhaps in western Canada. The unions are unable to do much in this regard because they are not in close contact with the situation. In most cases they have hiring clauses in their contracts but they are not in a position to say that a man is qualified for a particular assignment and when a company says he is not qualified that is usually the end of the matter.

It has been said there are not sufficient trained welders in Canada, and that this accounts for their working double shifts. If we have not a sufficient number of qualified welders in Canada I say it is a disgrace to the people of this country that we should not be capable of suitably training people to do this type of work.

I would like to discuss the common labourer for a moment. Surely no one would contend we have an insufficient number of these men or that they are required to work double shifts. Many of these men who earn $1.25 an hour are working 70 or more hours each week. In view of the serious unemployment situation that exists in northern Ontario we should be able to enforce a 40-hour week for common labourers and thus employ two people on a job where we are now employing only one. This would not mean delaying the pipe-line contractors. Indeed this would be undesirable as they have a short season and must accomplish as much as possible during good weather. However, a swing shift system would offer employment to many people who are seeking it and each common labourer could do a reasonable amount of work and we could perhaps employ two or three men where we are now employing only one.

The matter of working on Sunday has become a great problem deserving the attention of the federal government. We have piously enacted the Lord's Day Act which sets out that no work should be done on Sunday if the operation is not continuous but we do not see fit to enforce the provisions of this legislation. I am pleased to state, however, that the townspeople in my area have taken matters into their own hands. They went out on Sundays when they did not have very much to do themselves and made such a fuss about it with the contractors that the contractors have now shut down except for maintenance work on Sundays.

These are questions we as Canadians are going to have to face. If transmission lines are to be built across Canada then we should have regulations to protect the Canadian people. My colleague, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) mentioned the fact that this line would have been more satisfactorily handled if it had been entirely done through a crown corporation. I believe this truth will be borne out in time based on the success we had in putting through the line in the northern Ontario section which is now owned jointly by the federal and provincial governments. The work progressed very rapidly and the Department of Defence Production has done an exceptionally good job in this field. The problem of stock distribution could have been prevented if we had seen fit to make the entire pipe line a public utility.

I would urge the federal government to give full consideration at least to this matter of controlling the price, setting up the board of transport commissioners to control the price of gas coming through northern Ontario. As everybody knows, northern Ontario has now progressed past the original state of development where it depended on and could live off its natural resources. We are now sorely in need of secondary industries. While in the town of Timmins a unit of gas is quoted at $2.40, yet in the city of Cornwall, which will be another 500 miles along the line, that same unit of gas is being quoted at $1.40. The board of transport commissioners could do a great service to the people of northern Ontario by making gas as readily and as cheaply available as possible to encourage the introduction of new industries. I urge that some control be exercised over pipe lines in general and the trans Canada pipe line in particular, and that before we grant a licence to another pipe-line company to build a line across Canada we insist on some protection for the workers and the farmers who will be directly affected by the line.

I would point out that this is not a radical change for the Conservative government because only a year or so ago while in opposition the members of the Conservative party were pleased to support a different policy on natural gas. I would strongly urge that they consider now the implementation of that policy.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

[Mr. Peters.]

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

157. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, $592,290.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

391. Departmental administration, $739,086.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

414. Departmental administration, $2,144,060.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—

329. Newfoundland, $3,461,474.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 67 of the book of estimates, the details on page 464 in the same book. Shall vote No. 329 carry?

Mr. Carter: Last Friday while we were on this estimate I raised the question of specifications in relation to the fact that certain products may be mentioned by name and would therefore preclude other products from being used even though they may serve the purpose equally well. I wonder whether the minister has had an opportunity to look at the specifications regarding the two buildings now being constructed in St. John's? We are anxious to use as much of our local products in these buildings as we possibly can. We can supply excellent doors and interior finishes, and I wondered whether the minister would table or read into the record that section of the specifications which actually call for certain specific materials to be used. Perhaps the minister can do that at some later date; I know he cannot do it at once. If he would do that I would personally like to see how those specificatons are worded because, even though there may be an escape clause which would permit other products to be used, if one product is specifically mentioned it can be interpreted by the contractor as being the first choice, and any other substitutions would perhaps be regarded as to be used only if the former were not available.

This is a very important point as far as Newfoundland is concerned, and I do hope the minister will be able to give us all the information possible on this point. Before I sit down I would like to bring to the attention of the minister and through him to his colleagues in the government—because this will concern the cabinet as a whole—a situation which has developed in Newfoundland due to the difference in policies in regard to public buildings before and since Newfoundland joined confederation. Before Newfoundland became a province of Canada the construction of public buildings was the responsibility of the provincial government, and they had a very simple policy which was based mainly on the size of the community, and also on the fact that in Newfoundland we had a special situation with respect to post offices and telegraph offices. These two services were combined into a single service prior to Newfoundland becoming a province of Canada and as it was not suitable for those services to be performed in private homes the provincial government built a public building in the community for those services.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That was not so everywhere.

Mr. Carter: My hon. friend can tell his story after I have finished; I am going to tell mine. After Newfoundland became a province of Canada, the maintenance and the construction of public buildings became the responsibility of the federal government. The federal government has a different policy altogether. For example, post offices are built only in communities where the revenue from the sale of stamps is around $10,000. You have to have a very large fishing community to have stamp sales of that magnitude.

The situation which I wish to bring to the minister's attention is this. In a community of about 200 or 300 families before confederation that community would have a public building of its own, a small public building for the post office department and for the telegraph office.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can you name some of them?

Mr. Carter: Yes, Bay L'Argent, is one; Burgeo is another; Gaultois is a third in my riding. I could name dozens of those places. The point I want to make is that where those buildings had to be replaced they have been replaced by the federal government and have been improved upon. If my hon. friend wants an example I can give him a beautiful example which the minister himself mentioned, namely Harbour Buffett. Harbour Buffett is an example of a public building in a small community of about 500 people. The time came when that building had to be replaced, rebuilt, and now, as the minister pointed out last Friday, a very nice public building is being erected in Harbour Buffett, which is far better and a great credit to the minister, to his department and also to the federal government which provided the funds for it prior to the general election of June 10.

We have in this community a very fine public building but the point is that in my own riding and in Newfoundland generally there are many other communities of the same size that did not happen to have public buildings prior to confederation and under the present policy of the federal government these communities cannot get a separate public building. I hope the minister will look into that situation to see what can be done so that we may have a uniform policy in Newfoundland with respect to public buildings.

Mr. Green: I am sure the hon. member will realize that we have no responsibility for providing accommodation for the provincial government.

Mr. Carter: That is not my point at all.

Mr. Green: I understand that some of these buildings to which he has referred would accommodate provincial government offices as well as federal. We have no responsibility for that. The hon. member said that we do not accept any liability to erect a building unless there is a postal income of $10,000 a year. That is not correct either. The figure is $3,000 a year. Below $3,000 the Post Office Department makes its own arrangements. With regard to specifications, the department would be very glad to have the hon. member examine the specification forms which were used. They are much too long to read into Hansard. We do not make a practice of setting out trade-marked goods in the specifications. I agree with him that would be unfair. Specifications are supposed to be drawn in broad terms so that the product of any company can qualify and no favour is shown to one supplier over another.

Mr. Tucker: As found on page 1145 of Hansard of June 13, the hon. member for Mackenzie River asked the Minister of Public Works this question:

> On the question of local labour, is there any way in which the minister could write into the contract that a certain percentage of local labour must be used?

This was the minister's reply:

> This is actually written into the contract.

I would be grateful if the minister would advise the house if this clause relating to the hiring of local labour is being strictly adhered to.

Mr. Green: It is supposed to be and if the hon. member knows of any instances where it has not been adhered to I would be very grateful if he could let me know.

Mr. Tucker: I believe the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo referred to such cases a few days ago.

Item agreed to.

592. Newfoundland, $116,000.

The Deputy Chairman: This vote is found on page 9 of the supplementary estimates and has to do with Newfoundland.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, when estimates have been discussed in the past the practice has been to discuss the main estimates and then to take up the supplementary estimates. Otherwise we have a lot of books on our desks and it is very hard for us to follow. Of course, we are alone. We have not got the help that the minister has in front of him. I do not mind too much but I think it would help other members.

Mr. Green: I understand that upon some occasions at least the present procedure has been followed of taking the estimate in the main estimate book and then the supplementary estimate covering the same appropriation. This question was raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on Friday and we have already dealt with the administration item on this basis. I really do not care one way or the other but I think this does give a more accurate picture of the money that is being spent, for example, on buildings in Newfoundland.

Mr. Bourget: From reading the discussion that took place last week I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate agreed in the case of the administration item but that is quite a different situation. Here we have many supplementary items and for that reason I think we should discuss them in the way I have suggested. I am not saying this to delay the passing of the estimates. I think it would help private members if we dealt first with the main estimates and then came back to the supplementaries.

Mr. Green: The hon. member will see that on page 464 of the main estimate book a certain number of buildings are listed under the heading "Newfoundland", and in the supplementary estimates there are three additional buildings in Newfoundland listed on page 27. I think it is a tidier way to deal with all the estimates having to do with buildings in Newfoundland at one time rather than to deal with those listed in the main estimates tonight and when the estimates come up again deal with the three buildings in the supplementary estimate.

Item agreed to.

332. New Brunswick, $1,625,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I realize that the Minister of Public Works, as have other members of the cabinet, has become accustomed in the last few weeks to hearing members on this side of the house talk about the downward trend affecting most business in Canada. Fortunately or unfortunately we have an exception in Gloucester county. We have a certain kind of business where the clients have practically doubled since June 22 of last year. The clients are so numerous now that new quarters have had to be rented in the last three months. What I have in mind is the local unemployment insurance office. There is an item for a public building in Bathurst. Has the Minister of Public Works received representations to the effect that the quarters to be supplied for the unemployment insurance commission office in this new building will be too small?

Mr. Green: The hon. member will notice that on page 465 there is a vote of $150,000 to be spent this year for a public building at Bathurst. So far as the department is aware that building will be ample to meet the requirements. As of the end of May the building was 60 per cent completed.

On Friday the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi had something to say about the federal building at Newcastle. He tried to base an argument on it that we were not really accelerating construction at all. The situation at Newcastle is this. In the first place, the mayor of that famous old town and several of the members of his council came to see me last fall and asked that the building be moved back, I think it was 10 or 15 feet. I agreed that that should be done in order to help them and to co-operate with them.

Then when the contract was let and the work commenced, it was found that there was water trouble in the excavation, and that has been the reason for the delay. There has been a great deal of difficulty in connection with water. I happened to visit Newcastle—

Mr. McWilliam: I am aware of that, during the campaign.

Mr. Green: I hope the hon. member felt my presence. I had the pleasure of visiting Newcastle during the election campaign and I noticed that the building was not getting ahead as I had hoped it would. When I passed through Ottawa on my way back to the west coast I made a very strong complaint about the fact that the building in Newcastle seemed to be held up. Actually the trouble arose from the water in the excavation. We do run into difficulty of this kind, and certainly the department is anxious to get that building completed just as quickly as possible. I understand that as of the end of last month it was about 13 per cent completed. There is a very substantial vote for the building, $100,000 in the main estimates and $130,000 in the supplementaries, a total of $230,000 which we expect will be spent in Newcastle within the present fiscal year. The hon. member, therefore, is really not doing too badly.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, I sort of expected the answer the minister was going to give me and that is why I prefaced my remarks by certain quotations which appear in Hansard. When he says the building is 13 per cent complete, I may say that I saw the site of the proposed construction some two weeks ago and if the building was 13 per cent complete it is going to be a very small building. It will not take very much money to construct it.

In so far as the delay is concerned, I know that the mayor of the town was in Ottawa and spoke with the minister about moving the building back 10 feet. A question was placed on the order paper asking if this would entail any great change in plans, and the answer given by the department was no. The answer was given last fall. During the winter months there was no sign of activity at all around this building site. However, I do not wish to make an issue of this. The minister has said that they are going to proceed with the building now, and I trust that they will.

I should like to ask him one or two questions with regard to the building. Has there been any target date set for the completion of the work? I should like to know also if there is an estimate of the total cost. Another matter I wish to bring up is that when the plans were examined some representations were made concerning inadequate space for the unemployment insurance commission. I believe also there were local protests from the post office officials that the working space allotted the post office was too small. If I recall correctly, I think it was proven to the people who made the representations that the space was adequate for the moment. I have never heard any report about what took place concerning the representations—I do not even know if they reached Ottawa—made by the unemployment insurance commission that their space was too small. Perhaps the minister could advise me on these three matters.

Mr. Green: We expect to have the building completed by fall.

Mr. McWilliam: This fall?

Mr. Green: This fall. There was a request received from the unemployment insurance commission for increased space, and a readjustment has been made of the area within the building in order to meet this request.

Mr. Robichaud: Coming back to the Bathurst public building, has the department received a complaint from the unemployment insurance commission or the Department of Labour that the space reserved for the unemployment insurance office is too small?

Mr. Green: The answer I gave a moment ago had to do with Bathurst, apparently, and not Newcastle. I understand we have had no request from the unemployment insurance commission for an increase in the space allotted at Newcastle.

Mr. Robichaud: You had some from Bathurst, then?

Mr. Green: Yes, an additional space was allotted.

Mr. McWilliam: Did I understand you to say you did not have any representations from Newcastle? There was some confusion between the two.

Mr. Green: I will have the answer to that in a minute.

Mr. Robichaud: Out of this total amount for vote 332 of $1,625,000 for public buildings in New Brunswick, and I understand $380,000 in the supplementaries, is it not true that the only new construction is $200,000 for Grand Falls and $75,000 for Campbellton?

Mr. Green: The new items are Grand Falls, Campbellton and at Saint John, accommodation for the standards division, Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Robichaud: All the others are items for projects that were started last year?

Mr. Green: The others are all items which were included last year, but as I pointed out the other day the construction of those has been accelerated.

Item agreed to.

333. Quebec, $9,477,000.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, last week when I spoke on the first item I said in committee that I was surprised that members from Quebec city could not see an item for the Quebec post office. I should like to ask the minister if the government, since it has taken office, has taken steps to try to get an agreement between the city of Quebec and the Canadian National?

Mr. Green: Before I go on to deal with that situation I now have the report with regard to the request for space for the unemployment insurance commission at Newcastle. The position there is exactly the same as in Bathurst. The commission did request additional space and a readjustment was made by the Department of Public Works in order that this space will be allocated for the commission.

Mr. Robichaud: Would the minister be prepared to provide more space for next year, because it will definitely be needed?

Mr. Green: No, we expect the present government will be in office next year and that additional space will therefore not be required. It was only required last time because we took over from the previous government.

With regard to the building in Quebec city, this has caused great concern because we are particularly anxious to get ahead with this building. As the hon. member for Levis knows, the Department of Public Works has a site but the planning commission of the city of Quebec would not let us build a federal building on that site. Shortly after I became minister I wrote to the mayor of Quebec asking for an early decision on this aspect of the question.

Mr. Bourget: Could the minister give me the date of that letter?

Mr. Green: I have not the date here but it was some time last fall and I pointed out our desire to get on with the building as quickly as possible and then, on December 30, the mayor replied requesting a meeting. We met with him in Ottawa on January 27 and it appeared during that discussion that a stalemate had been reached in the negotiations between the railway and the city with respect to the exchange of land. The city wanted to have this federal building on a site owned by Canadian National Railways and we suggested that the federal government should bypass the C.N.R. property and exchange our site for a property further to the east which could be acquired by the city without involving either the Canadian National Railways station or the track. This suggestion seemed to find favour with the city officials as did our suggestion that any exchange of properties would be on a value for value basis. On February 25 we repeated these proposals and again expressed the need for early action. On March 16 the mayor advised us that no decision was possible before April and, to date, we have had no further word from the mayor of Quebec.

We have, however, had a verbal communication to the effect that the Canadian National Railways was prepared to demolish its station and to make the land available for construction of a federal building provided the city would agree that buses could be substituted on the Quebec city-Ste. Anne de Beaupre run. My understanding is that the city of Quebec also has this information but we do not know what progress has been made with respect to reaching an agreement with Canadian National Railways. That is the way the matter stands at the moment. We are only too glad to do everything we can to facilitate the construction of the building, but we cannot force the Canadian National Railways to demolish its station and give up the land.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister tell me whether the Canadian National Railways is still asking the same price for the site where the old station is located? I have a distinct recollection that they were asking about $540,000.

Mr. Green: The department has never been given information concerning the amount the Canadian National Railways was asking for the site. It is between the city and the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Bourget: I think the minister will find the information on the file, if I remember correctly. I did, of course, take a special interest in this matter because it is near my home town and I do remember that the figure was $540,000. In any event, I would ask the minister if he would take some steps to try to get the C.N.R. and the city together. He could also obtain the help of the Minister of Transport, which I think was the policy followed by the previous government, in endeavouring to get the two parties to reach an agreement. My fear is that otherwise a generation will pass without the city of Quebec having its federal post office built.

Mr. Green: We cannot force the hand of the Canadian National Railways and, incidentally, we could build the building on the site on the other side of the station if the city officials were agreeable.

Mr. Bourget: I know that the minister cannot force the C.N.R. but he does know from past experience that we are paying deficits for the C.N.R. and certainly with the help of the Minister of Transport I think he could do a lot to get the two parties together. Even the Prime Minister could assist in this regard as did the previous prime minister. In this connection I know that the former prime minister in the last few months of his administration took steps to even see the president of the Canadian National Railways. The minister is well aware, as is also the Postmaster General, that this building is very badly needed. I am not in any way blaming the minister, but I do make this suggestion because if this matter is left entirely in the hands of the city I do not think the city would have the money to pay the amount asked by the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Green: We wrote to the mayor just a few days ago asking for an up to date report on the situation and we again reminded him that we would like to get this building started. As the hon. member has pointed out, the former prime minister tried to get this project under way but he was not successful, so the hon. member must not now be too hard on us.

Mr. Bourget: I am not too hard, I am just trying to make a suggestion because the minister said he was a kind of miracle man who was going to try to have all these projects started this year and he even said that 97 per cent of his estimates had been spent.

An hon. Member: Make your suggestion.

Mr. Green: If the hon. member will admit that I am a miracle man I will get his post office under way.

Mr. Bourget: I did not say he was a miracle man, I said he pretended to be one, which is quite a different thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister now has a chance to prove it.

Mr. Bourget: There is another item which I would like to mention, namely the purchase of the Marconi building in Montreal for $132,000. Might I ask the minister if an appraisal has been made in connection with the purchase of that building?

Mr. Green: This building was hired from a crown corporation, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation. I have not got the information for which the hon. member is asking at the moment.

Mr. Bourget: Perhaps the minister would be good enough to tell me later if an appraisal has been made. I see an item which reads: Public building at Plessisville—to complete —$50,000. Could the minister tell me when tenders were called to complete that particular building?

Mr. Green: There were two tenders called. On the first call, the lowest tender was $140,-970 to a firm by the name of Savard Limited. A thorough investigation of this tender was made by the department and it was found that the firm was primarily engaged in road construction and that the experience of the superintendent in charge of this project had been mostly in the field of concrete bridge construction and that his experience of building construction was extremely limited. Inspection of the buildings constructed by this firm during the last four years revealed that in each case the workmanship was of inferior quality. As a result, the department decided to reject the lower tender and issue a new call for tenders. New tenders were called the lowest of which was from a firm called J. O. Lambert Inc. of Quebec city at a figure of $137,662. It is very rarely that this has to be done but there are occasions when for one reason or another it is unwise to accept the lowest bid. In each case where the low bid is not accepted it is necessary to get the approval of the treasury board.

Mr. Bourget: When the first tenders were called, was there not another company which tendered?

Mr. Green: Yes, there was a tender from the firm of Poudrier and Boulet Limited of Quebec city at a figure of $149,970.

Mr. Bourget: Could I ask the minister why a contract was not awarded to that second firm which was then the lowest tenderer.

Mr. Green: I am getting further information.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give me the figure of the company that got the contract the last time the tender was asked?

Mr. Green: Yes, the company which was low on the second tender called bid $137,662. That is about $3,000 lower than the low tender the first time.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Bourget: I am awaiting an answer to my question asking why the contract was not awarded to the second low bidder in the first instance.

Mr. Green: I am getting that information from the officials.

Mr. Bourget: While a search is being made could I ask the minister when the tenders are going to be called for with respect to the public building at St. Georges.

Mr. Green: The department requires some additional information concerning the site. Plans are only about half completed, but it is hoped that the call will be made in about six weeks time.

Mr. Bourget: May I point out to the minister that this is a very bad policy on his part if he wants to reach the 100 per cent mark next year, because if the site is not settled he may find himself in a position where he cannot build.

Mr. Green: The site has been settled but there are some survey details in connection with the site which have not been settled.

Mr. Bourget: Have the plans been started on that building?

Mr. Green: I said the plans were about half finished. I am now informed they are about 60 per cent completed.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the minister if the department itself is preparing a plan or if an outside architect is preparing it?

Mr. Green: Plans are being drawn up by the department. The reason there was a new tender called for the building at Plessisville is that it was considered that the second tender on the first call was too high. The hon. member will notice that as a result of the second call the price has been brought down by over $12,000.

Item agreed to.

334. Ottawa, $18,918,000.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister is now prepared to make the statement he said he would make concerning the policy of the government with respect to building on the central experimental farm. The minister will recall I raised this question the last time the estimates were before the committee.

Mr. Green: The policy is that no buildings will be built on the central experimental farm except buildings for the Department of Agriculture.

When the estimates were up for the first time there were some complaints from the hon. member for Port Arthur about the esthetic qualities of the buildings being erected in Ottawa. I am sure he will be pleased to hear that in each case the Department of Public Works must obtain the consent of the federal district commission to the plans of buildings to be erected in Ottawa. We are very anxious to have buildings that will maintain the architectural standards of the city.

Mr. McIlraith: If I may pursue the first question a bit further, has the minister come to any conclusion as to what will be done with the land on the experimental farm now occupied by the temporary buildings when they are removed?

Mr. Green: I take it that the hon. member for Ottawa West refers to temporary buildings Nos. 5 and 8. For some years the policy has been that when these temporary buildings are torn down nothing will be constructed on the site.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to commend the minister for continuing the policy set out a few years ago by the Liberal administration in that regard. I believe he will agree it is a very satisfactory policy.

I take it from the minister's answer to the hon. member for Port Arthur about the design of buildings that he is also continuing the policy of the Liberal administration that public buildings in Ottawa would have the approval of the federal district commission as to exterior design?

Mr. Green: Yes, we have to obtain the approval of the federal district commission.

I now have an answer to the question concerning the Marconi building in Montreal. There was no appraisal by an independent appraiser. The cost of this building to the crown corporation was $275,000. We bought it for $130,000 after an appraisal by officials of our own department and it was considered that we got a very good deal on it.

Mr. Bourget: From the crown company?

Mr. Green: From the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Company.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman; I remember when the minister was in opposition he was very much concerned at that time about proposals to demolish the west block, I think because of some association his party had with that building over a long period of time. Could the minister inform the committee now whether it is the policy of his government to decimate this block, to rehabilitate it or to recreate it?

Mr. Green: I can assure the hon. member that as long as I am Minister of Public Works the west block will not be demolished.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the minister a question concerning the Riverside drive development ancillary buildings including power plant for which there is an item in the amount of $1 million. Would he tell us what those ancillary buildings are and what ancillary work is covered in the details of this item?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this amount is required for the construction of a power plant, a booster pump house and a telephone building or PBX—I think that means telephone exchange—to service the buildings to be erected in the Riverside drive development.

Mr. McIlraith: Just two or three more questions, Mr. Chairman. What is the target date for completion of the office building for the Department of Public Works for which there is an amount of $2¾ million?

Mr. Green: October 1959. We are very anxious to get into that building as quickly as possible. The hon. member will notice there is a supplementary vote for this building of $1¼ million. This is one building the construction of which certainly has been accelerated. It is going ahead much faster.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I will not criticize the minister for his interest in this particular building but I want to ask some questions about the Department of Trade and Commerce building. What is the expected date of completion and occupancy of that building? There was some financial difficulty on the part of the contractor. Would the minister tell the committee what was done when the department had to step in, whether or not further tenders were called and how the matter was handled?

Mr. Green: This is another building the construction of which has been greatly accelerated, the hon. member will be glad to hear, and we expect to have it finished by September of this year. The original contractor went into bankruptcy last fall. We called for tenders for the completion of the building on a management fee basis and it looks as though we will be able to complete it without taking any loss on the original contract price.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister when tenders are going to be called for the much delayed building for the Post Office Department in Ottawa?

Mr. Green: This is another project which has been accelerated. Tenders for the cafeteria are being called at once, and for the main building within six weeks.

Mr. Bourget: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I tell the minister that at the end of May, 1957, 55 per cent of the plans were already drawn up and if the building was not started last year it was the fault of the new administration, because those who know something about drawing plans and specifications can tell the minister that when 55 per cent of the plans are ready it does not take more than two or three months to complete the plans and call for tenders.

Mr. Green: The hon. member has been watching the Department of Public Works from a long way off in the last year.

Mr. Bourget: I have a good memory.

Mr. Green: The facts are that we have had to drive the architect very hard in order to get the plans completed at the present time to call tenders.

Mr. Bourque: I see no appropriation here for the west block. Is it the intention of the government to remodel or do anything with the west block?

Mr. Green: There is no money in the estimates for the west block.

Mr. Bourque: Do I understand that nothing is to be done with the west block?

Mr. Green: Yes, planning is being done in connection with the changes which will be necessary.

Mr. McIlraith: Where is the item for the planning?

Mr. Green: That comes under the planning vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister say when he hopes to get started on the national library?

Mr. Green: We plan to start the national library early in the next fiscal year.

Mr. Bourget: There is $600,000 to complete the trade and commerce building. If my information is correct, the prime contractor went bankrupt. Is that right?

Mr. Green: I explained that.

Mr. Pallett: You should have come in earlier.

Item agreed to.

335. Ontario (other than Ottawa), $13,040,000.

Mr. Houck: I would like to ask the minister a question about the new post office at Niagara Falls which was promised in the last election campaign. I realize that the minister—perhaps I had better state his officials—has a gigantic job on his hands trying to satisfy different groups with respect to the site for that post office. Therefore, I am dividing my question into three parts. First, has a site been selected; second, is money appropriated for this new post office in the estimates; third, will it be started this year?

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the difficulty in Niagara Falls is that there are four different groups fighting about the site for the post office.

Mr. Houck: I said that.

Mr. Green: The hon. member could give considerable assistance to us, if, with his great good nature and his many friends in that city, he could arrange for those different groups to get together and agree on a site. This is a difficulty we encounter quite frequently. We do not like to go ahead and erect a building on a site to which a large number of people object, and Niagara Falls has given us one of our worst problems in this connection. If we could get agreement on a site we would get on with the building right away.

Mr. Houck: I would be very happy to co-operate and give some advice if I was on that side of the house.

Mr. Green: We would be very happy to have the hon. member here on this side.

Item agreed to.

336. Manitoba, $1,695,000.

Mr. Forgie: I should like to revert to item 335, "Ontario (other than Ottawa)" just for a moment to inquire what the $50,000 allotment for Deep River refers to.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member permission to revert to item 335?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Forgie: I would like to know what the item of $50,000 is for. Is it for a post office?

Mr. Green: This amount is required for the construction of a public building to provide improved accommodation for the postal service.

Mr. Forgie: Has a site been chosen for the post office?

Mr. Green: Tenders for the building will close on July 9.

Mr. Forgie: Has the site for this building been chosen?

Mr. Green: The site selected for the building is the north corner of the Deep River road and Hillcrest avenue. This property is owned by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and will be transferred to the Department of Public Works for a nominal sum.

Mr. Forgie: Is it an extension of the existing post office?

Mr. Green: No; I am instructed that it is a new building.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): As grateful as we are in our city for the post office promised for some nine years by the former administration but never achieved, could we have some indication as to the extent to which the $1 million will cover the entire appropriation for the completion of that post office.

Mr. Chevrier: This item has to do with Manitoba.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is several items out of line.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I will reserve my question until we come to the item.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Green.]

338. Alberta, $1,847,000.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): May I now address the same question to the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: The answer is the same.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the plans for this building are about 98 per cent completed. The hon. member knows or should know that it was necessary to do a demolition job. The contract for the demolition was let in March and the job was to be finished late in April. The total cost of the building is to be approximately $2,900,000 and the estimated requirement for this fiscal year is $1 million.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I can help the minister by telling him that the demolition job is completed. My question was with respect to the expected date of completion of the post office.

Mr. Green: The post office will be completed in one and a half to two years. I can assure the hon. member that this job will be done very much faster than it would have been done under the former government.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, if I may have permission I should like to refer to vote 599. It slipped through somehow.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to discuss vote 599?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jones: How long is it estimated that the construction of the post office in Saskatoon will take once tenders have been called, and when does the minister expect that tenders will be called?

Mr. Green: We expect that it will be about two years before the building is completed.

339. British Columbia, $2,010,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting all day for this vote. About three years ago the former government purchased some property in Nelson with a view to erecting a very much needed building for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I understood that the building was to cost about $300,000. Can the minister inform the house whether there is any item in the estimates to provide for its construction and, if so, when will construction likely commence?

Mr. Green: The hon. member referred to a building for the R.C.M.P. in Nelson?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Green: Plans are under way now and we should be able to start construction about the month of October.

Mr. Herridge: Is there provision in these estimates for that work? I cannot find the estimate.

Mr. Green: This is an example of work which is being done for another department. The vote for this building will be in the R.C.M.P. estimates. The vote does not appear in the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

340. Yukon and Northwest Territories, $2,458,400.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister about the items for Aklavik East Three. I notice that of the whole vote $1,651,400 is for housing for federal government employees and then there is a public building. Is there nothing for the hospital and school at east three or is it carried in the estimates of some other department? Is the Department of Public Works doing this job?

Mr. Green: The items for the hospital and school will be under national health and welfare and northern affairs.

Mr. Hardie: But the work will be done by the minister's department?

Mr. Green: We do the work but the money is provided by these other two departments. One provides the money for the school and the other the money for the hospital.

Mr. Hardie: Have tenders been called for the items shown here and for those in northern affairs and national health and welfare estimates?

Mr. Green: Yes, tenders have been called recently for these projects.

Mr. Hardie: Is it the intention of the government to complete all construction this year on the east three townsite?

Mr. Green: I understand that all of the construction in this project will not be completed during the present fiscal year. It was understood that it would take two to three years to complete the project.

Mr. Hardie: When travelling round my constituency a few months ago I was told that even to complete the work this year on Aklavik East Three would require the bringing in of 800 men from Edmonton and other places outside the Northwest Territories. Is this true or is it not?

Mr. Green: No, we do not believe that there will be that number of men brought in. We are co-operating with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in order to get every possible local man who can be found to work on this project.

Mr. Hardie: By "local" does the minister mean from Aklavik or from the whole of the Mackenzie river district?

Mr. Green: Men from Aklavik will have first priority and then men from the Northwest Territories, both ahead of men from the provinces.

Mr. Hardie: With respect to the contracts that have been let up to now, what percentage is written into them to cover local labour?

Mr. Green: There is no percentage written into the contract, but the terms do provide that local labour must be given a preference.

Mr. Hardie: How does the department have any control over how many men the contractor may bring in from outside? How does the minister or the department regulate this business of local labour as against labour from all over the province? Do you wait until they are all in there and somebody in Aklavik squawks, then ship them all back out?

Mr. Green: The method followed is for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to indicate how many men are available in the territory, and then any additional numbers that are required can be brought in from outside.

Mr. Hardie: Has the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources given the Department of Public Works the number of men available for this job?

Mr. Green: The other department is working on this question at the present time.

Mr. Hardie: At the present time—there have been men coming in for the last month or so from Edmonton.

Mr. Green: The men who have been coming in from the outside are supposed to be technical supervisors and foremen. At the present time, the main contract has not been let.

Item agreed to.

341. Improvements generally—not more than $25,000 to be expended on any one project without the approval of treasury board, $700,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to take any time at all on this item. I want to congratulate the minister upon increasing the amount of this vote. I just want to suggest to him that if he has any difficulty finding other buildings worth less than $25,000, I would strongly recommend Hare Bay and Gambo, which I mentioned on Friday. He might also have a look at Port Blandford.

Mr. Green: Will the hon. member promise to show a great deal more gratitude than he did for the Wesleyville post office?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am most grateful to the minister for the Wesleyville post office.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister if there is any provision for smaller buildings in Kootenay West in this estimate?

Mr. Tucker: I would like to ask the minister to give consideration to a post office at Port Rexton and Little Kettle Island?

Mr. Green: The small buildings do not come under this vote. They come under vote 369.

Mr. Hardie: I noticed that in the supplementaries under northern affairs there is an item for $3,500,000 for construction, acquisition of buildings, works and equipment. I imagine that this work would be done by public works. Can the minister give us a breakdown of that item?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, this is a vote of the other department. We are not in a position to give any breakdown or discuss that in our estimates.

Mr. Hardie: Is this department doing the work under this particular item?

Mr. Green: We do not have the details of this vote here, so I am not in a position to say whether or not we are doing it or part of it.

Mr. Hardie: How do we get any information if public works, the people who are doing the job, cannot give us that information now?

Mr. Green: That can be ascertained from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources when his estimates are under consideration.

Mr. Bourget: The minister will recall that in past years he was extremely critical of this item. I am glad that he is now putting that item of improvements generally in the estimates, and has increased the amount this year from $300,000 to $700,000. Once again this shows that he is following exactly the policy established by the previous administration. I am tempted to remind the minister that on April 13, 1956, he said that this figure was a fictitious figure and also that it was a strange procedure. Now that he is facing responsibility, he realizes that the item we put in there, and which he has retained, was a good one. He is following the good policy that was established by the previous minister. If he has any success it is the result of the fact that for four years previous ministers have established good practice in the department.

Mr. Green: I admit I am learning something every day. We are trying to follow the better policies of the former government, but unfortunately there are not very many in that category.

Mr. Bourget: Can the minister give us the reason why this item has increased this year by $400,000? If he looks at the details on page 471 the actual expenditure up to January 1, 1958 amounted to $262,000, and it is estimated that for the balance of the year $37,000 will be needed, making a total of about $300,000. I know the minister has not got the figures for the present year, but will he give us a breakdown for the past year?

Mr. Green: I am rather surprised the hon. member would ask this question because this is one increase that was designed to give jobs to Canadians, and it has been very effective in doing that.

Mr. Bourget: The minister has not answered my question at all. I was asking for a breakdown. It is peculiar that there are so many items for which the government says they are giving jobs, nevertheless last month we had over half a million people unemployed in Canada.

Mr. Green: Oh, no.

Mr. Bourget: Oh, yes.

Mr. Green: Oh, no, you are stretching it. These are spread all over the country, as the hon. member knows, but I have some examples for this year which are as follows: St. John's, Newfoundland, public building, improvements to grounds, $7,500; Stellarton, Nova Scotia, public building, chain link fence, $1,000; Montague, P.E.I., public building, retaining wall, $1,100; Lachute, Quebec, public building, repairs to foundation, $1,500; Stanstead, Quebec, public building reinforcement of foundation, $5,000; Three Rivers, public building, repairs to retaining wall, $12,000; Montreal, film board, air conditioning and ventilation, $10,000; Winnipeg, custom building, replacing elevator, $22,500. Those are only examples, but those are small jobs all over the country and jobs which have been very effective in bringing about employment of additional Canadians quickly.

Mr. McWilliam: Could I ask the minister if there is anything listed there for New Brunswick, in the small jobs?

Mr. Green: The ones I have read out are just examples. There are many of a similar type in the province of New Brunswick and in all the other provinces to which I did not refer.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

TRANSPORT

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask leave to revert to motions in order to move that the estimates of the Department of Transport be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the minister why the Department of Transport estimates are being referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines rather than being discussed in the House of Commons, as are his own estimates, and I presume the estimates of other departments mentioned earlier.

Mr. Green: As I explained on an earlier occasion, Mr. Speaker, when we were considering an amendment to the standing orders to set up a standing committee on veterans affairs and one on estimates for this year, we planned to try out referring certain of the estimates to standing committees and I instanced the referring of estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to the committee on lands, forests and waters and the estimates of the Department of Fisheries to the standing committee on marine and fisheries; the estimates of the Department of Labour to the standing committee on industrial relations and I think I also referred to the Department of Transport estimates and suggested they would be referred to this standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. In addition, of course, the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are to be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

We are trying, in addition to having those particular estimates referred to these standing committees which I have mentioned, to have the estimates committee review several of the departments' estimates and they are now working on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. I expect one of these days they will request that the estimates of certain other departments be referred to them but we do have to keep some estimates for consideration in the house. Until tonight we only had public works and agriculture which could be considered in this committee of supply but we now also have the estimates of trade and commerce and of justice which were put in tonight.

It so happens that there is a standing committee which we think could very well deal with the estimates of the Department of Transport and we propose to try out this plan. If it does not work out satisfactorily then next year we can follow some other course. I refer to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and, as the hon. member for Laurier knows, this has been one of the best committees of the house. He and I have always served on it and I am sure he will find this plan will be fairly successful.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not complaining about the plan but I thank the house leader for the explanation he has given to this house. On the contrary, I would think, as the Leader of the Opposition has already stated, that in so far as the three departments which were referred to by the house leader are concerned, namely national defence, northern affairs and veterans affairs, there would be no objection from this side of the house to their being referred to their respective committees, but there has been no agreement with respect to the Department of Transport. I am taking no position at this moment other than to say it seems to me that the Deparment of Transport, being such an important and large department—as is the minister's own department—its estimates should be considered by the whole house rather than by the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. That is a committee, to my way of thinking, which is charged with a certain responsibility and it would seem to me that it is not the committee to which the estimates of this department should go. My suggestion would be, if my hon. friend would agree, that he might allow this motion to stand until tomorrow so that I may discuss it with the Leader of the Opposition after which we could come to some agreement.

Mr. Green: I have no objection to that but I would point out to the hon. member for Laurier that if the course we suggest is followed the transport estimates will be considered twice, first of all in the standing committee and then in committee of the whole house.

Mr. Chevrier: We will be perfectly satisfied if they are considered but once.

Mr. Green: Probably they would not be brought on for consideration in the house for some considerable time if they did not go to the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: If the motion stands, we will leave the matter there.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what is the business for tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we start with item No. 10 on today's order paper, which is the resolution dealing with hospital insurance; then item No. 6 on today's order paper, the resolution dealing with the Department of Transport Act; then item No. 8, the resolution dealing with the Cape Breton Highlands national park; item No. 11, dealing with the legislation in connection with the Yukon; and then item No. 4, second reading of an act to amend the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act. I imagine that will be enough to keep us busy—

Mr. McIlraith: What will we do afterwards?

Mr. Green:—until six o'clock but if not we will take up the question of an act to set up a harbour commission at the lakehead and the amendment to the Penitentiary Act. At eight o'clock the budget speech is to be delivered and I understand it may take a few minutes after ten o'clock—at least the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) tells me that the reply may take a few minutes after ten p.m. so we may ask the members not to watch the clock after ten p.m.

An hon. Member: Are you suggesting he is going to talk for two hours?

It being ten minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TAX RENTAL PAYMENTS, ONT. AND QUE.

Question No. 79—Mr. Meunier:

What amount was paid to (a) the province of Quebec; (b) the province of Ontario, under the Tax Rental Agreements Act (i) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1957; (ii) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1956-57, the Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1952: Quebec, nil; Ontario, $160,558,129.

1957-58, the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act: Quebec, equalization payment only, $43,060,000; Ontario, tax rental payment for individual income tax only, $74,379,000.

These payments do not include the share of income tax of certain public utility corporations. Under section 6 of the Tax Rental Agreements Act, 1952, all provinces are entitled to 50 per cent of such payment of federal income tax.

1956-57: Quebec, $1,186,280; Ontario, $1,428,408.

1957-58: Quebec, $1,675,230; Ontario, $1,333,166.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO SHARING OF TAX REVENUES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked for the production of correspondence between the premier of Saskatchewan and the federal government since March 31. I wish to table herewith that correspondence, to which another letter will be added later this day.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister consider requesting that it be printed in Hansard in the usual way?

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the house whether it gives leave to having the documents just tabled by the Prime Minister printed as part of Hansard this day? Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of correspondence above referred to, see appendix "A", pages 1283-84.]

LEBANON—STATEMENT AS TO STEPS TAKEN BY UNITED NATIONS

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to give a statement to the house. I desire to inform the house of the steps which the United Nations is taking in connection with the crisis in Lebanon, and the role which Canada is once again being called upon to play.

The security council resolution of June 11 under which the United Nations group in Lebanon is functioning grew out of the complaint submitted by Lebanon regarding interference in its affairs by the United Arab Republic. The operative part of the resolution—passed, as hon. members of the house I am sure know, with the full concurrence of 10 of the 11 members of the council, including Canada, with only the U.S.S.R. abstaining—meets the essential requirements of a constructive United Nations intervention. It calls for the urgent dispatch of an observation group to proceed to Lebanon—and I quote from the resolution that was adopted by the security council:

> ...so as to ensure that there is no illegal infiltration of personnel or supply of arms or other materiel across the Lebanese border; —and it authorizes the secretary general to take the necessary steps to that end.

Because of the need for haste the secretary general turned in the first instance to the United Nations truce supervision organization in Palestine—UNTSO—to form the nucleus of the substantial military observer corps that he will require to assist the political team of three which will constitute the observation group proper. This team consists of three highly qualified and experienced men selected by the secretary general; a Norwegian, an Ecuadorian, and an Indian. The Norwegian —General Bull, commander of the Norwegian air force—arrived in Beirut on June 15, preceded a day or two earlier by 15 military observers from the UNTSO staff, including one Canadian, Major G. D. Mitchell. All these UNTSO officers are assigned on a temporary basis only, but I need hardly say that the secondment of a Canadian officer from the TSO to this urgent and highly important task of getting the UN operation under way was arranged with the full approval of our Department of National Defence.

General Bull had not been on the ground for more than a few hours when it became apparent to him that the modest sized observer corps which had at first been envisaged would be entirely inadequate for the task in hand, having regard to the complexity of the situation and the mountainous nature of the frontier areas. He promptly reported to the secretary general that a minimum of 100 military observers would be essential to the success of the operation. The secretary general thereupon requested Canada and 13 other countries to supply additional observers from their regular armed forces on a basis of the utmost urgency. Of the other countries so approached Finland, Netherlands, Norway, Italy, Chile and Denmark have accepted, and several others are momentarily expected to do so.

I need hardly tell the house that the Canadian government too has responded speedily to the secretary general's appeal. Ten Canadian officers have already been chosen for this assignment, and they should be on their way to Lebanon within 48 hours. The ultimate scope of the United Nations operations in Lebanon is not yet clear, and the secretary general himself is leaving for Beirut tonight to examine the situation on the spot.

The task with which he and the observation group have been entrusted by the security council is a delicate and difficult one. The success or failure of this initiative has, of course, immediate significance for Lebanon's security and possibly for peace in the area as a whole. But it could have far wider implications; it represents a further test, perhaps a crucial one, of the United Nations ability to deal rapidly and effectively with international disputes of a kind likely to lead to open conflict.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will have heard with great interest the statement of my hon. friend, and I can assure him of the full support of our party in the action which the government has taken so speedily and I think effectively to ensure Canadian participation in this United Nations peace-preserving effort. I would also express the hope, Mr. Speaker, that if the situation should deteriorate in Lebanon to the point where the legitimate government there might be overthrown as a result of intervention from outside, any further steps that might have to be taken would be taken not by any individual government but under the auspices of the United Nations.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group listened with great interest to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just read, and are pleased to note that he is utilizing the machinery for the maintenance of peace established in great part through the efforts of the former secretary of state for external affairs.

SUMMIT CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR REACTION TO LETTER FROM PREMIER KHRUSHCHEV

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. As a keenly interested front-line political observer, would the Prime Minister give the government's reaction to Premier Khrushchev's latest letter to President Eisenhower, asking for a clarification of the west's attitude toward a summit conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not think any clarification is necessary regarding the attitude of the free world toward a summit conference. In so far as the letter from Premier Khrushchev to the President is concerned, all I have seen regarding that would indicate an attitude somewhat akin to a desire to hold up the possibility of convening a summit conference. I would think that the attitude of Canada, as of the western world, is an expression of the hope that a summit conference can and will be achieved after the necessary preliminaries have taken place and the necessary conferences at a lower level to assure that when it does take place it will bring about the achievement of results rather than expectation alone.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is contemplated in the discussions which are now going on that Canada should take part in this proposed summit conference?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think there is anything I can add to what has already been said in that regard.

REPORTED INTRODUCTION OF CONFIDENTIAL LETTER BEFORE U.S. SENATE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with an answer he gave me on May 21 with regard to the appearance of a confidential letter from the Prime Minister of Canada in the hands of the United States authorities. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs determined from Senator Morris how he obtained the letter? If not, has any check been made on the progress of the letter before it started into external affairs channels?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have been informed that the United States senator to whom reference has been made has refused to disclose how he got that letter. Every check has been made as to the fate of that letter, but I have nothing further to give to the house than I had when I answered the question approximately two weeks ago.

Mr. McIlraith: A supplementary question. Is that the reason the senator was refused the right to speak on the C.B.C.?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, that astonishes me.

Mr. Fisher: A further supplementary question. I should like to ask for an elaboration of the minister's answer. Does it mean that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can assure us that as far as it is known the letter did not disappear from the office of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I cannot speak for the office of the prime minister of that day.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—REPORTED STATEMENT BY UNION DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister, to whom I sent notice this morning. Is the Prime Minister in a position to comment on the press report that William Mahoney, national director of the national steelworkers of America, has asked for a meeting with the government to discuss steel prices and policies in Canada, with special reference to the charge that prices are administered or arranged in such a way that they are geared to United States prices?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing regarding this matter except the press report; and until a communication is received in the usual way no consideration can be given to the matter by the government.

AGRICULTURE

SOYBEANS—STATEMENT ON APPLICATION OF PRICE STABILIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Essex East asked this question, as found at page 1159 of Hansard:

> I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if his attention has been directed to a statement made to the soybean growers by the chairman of the agricultural prices stabilization board as to the way in which the floor price for soybeans is intended to operate? If the minister has not seen that statement, would he be prepared to look at it and advise the house as to whether or not that is a correct statement of the application of this floor price policy?

The so-called statement actually is a letter which was written by the chairman of the board to Mr. Standing of the Ontario soybean growers marketing board, and the letter conveys correctly our ideas, on the basis of information we have received so far from the soybean growers marketing board, as to how support will have to operate. In order that other hon. members may know what we are talking about perhaps I should read a few paragraphs from the letter which outlines the situation. The letter states in part:

> I believe you understand that this stabilization assistance is to be in the form of a deficiency payment whereby this board will make up the difference between the average return to all growers and the prescribed price.
> We believe your board—

That is the soybean marketing board.

> —regulates the price of all the product for the growers and it is understood that you will be keeping a record of each producer's deliveries and the return per bushel which he receives . . . we will need to be able to determine the average sale price per bushel for all grades and then the difference between this average price received by all growers and the stabilization price of $2.10 per bushel will be paid to each eligible grower.

This is the way it will operate. We will say that the average price that is received for soybeans is $2 a bushel. That will mean there will be a deficiency payment of 10 cents per bushel which we will make up. But the beans from each individual grower will have been sold at different prices by their own board. Some of that difference will be due to the time at which they are sold. Some farmers will perhaps be holding their beans for four months before they are sold; others will sell them practically out of the field. Second, the difference would be due to variations in grade.

In any event, the only thing we can do is make up the average difference. Whatever that sum is—we will say it is 10 cents in this case—it will be paid to each grower which will mean, of course, that each grower will not receive the same price for his beans. The only way in which they can receive the same price for their beans is if the soybean growers marketing board and the growers themselves are willing to pool their returns, as is done by the wheat growers of western Canada under the Canadian wheat board. If they are willing to pool their returns there is, of course, no difficulty in connection with the matter. These people can then receive the same return. If they are not willing to pool their returns, which is their own decision, there is no way in which the returns can be made exactly the same to each of them.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister for the quick way in which he dealt with my question of yesterday. I should like to ask him if he is aware that as a result of the communication written by the chairman of the agricultural prices stabilization board there is great concern on the part of the soybean growers. They feel that, as a result of this declaration as to how the price policy should operate, the averaging of prices between those farmers who receive less than $2.10, the declared price, and those who receive a higher price will bring about the result that though deficiency payments will have been paid, the farmers who will have received less than $2.10 will not, in fact, receive a floor price of $2.10 at all.

In consequence of that result, is the minister aware that farmers are now asking for a higher floor price which I believe, at their meeting in Chatham, they fixed at $2.57?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that concern has been expressed. So far it has not been expressed to me. I am not aware that they are asking for a higher floor price, but I would not be surprised if they were because everybody asks for higher floor prices on all other commodities; that is only human nature.

So far as the other remarks the hon. gentleman has made, I answered them in what I said. The remedy for this complaint which he mentions is in the hands of the growers themselves, and in the hands of their board. If the growers and the board are willing to pool their returns, which so far they have not expressed any willingness to do, just the same as the prairie grain growers pool their returns, then they will all receive at least $2.10 a bushel. We cannot of course, as a government, force them to pool their returns; that is their individual choice.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the minister might answer a supplementary question. Has the government considered paying a floor price to the producer directly in order that the producers may obtain the same price? If he is suggesting that this type of thing is the same as the Canadian wheat board, is the government prepared to establish a government board like the Canadian wheat board in order to accomplish equity amongst the producers?

Mr. Harkness: So far the growers have not asked for a government board, and I understand they do not want a government board. They want their own board to handle this crop. We, of course, pay the deficiency payments direct to the farmers. If there is any complaint over the fact that each farmer is not going to receive the same price for his soybeans, the remedy is in their own hands. All they have to do is agree to pool their returns.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister explain why the board or the government do not establish a continuing floor price and offer it to the producers if they wish to deliver their products to the board?

Mr. Harkness: Apparently the hon. gentleman does not understand that the Ontario soybean growers marketing board, under the Ontario marketing legislation, has been given the sole authority to market these soybeans; that is part of the Ontario law.

INQUIRY AS TO DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS AND FLOOR PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister decided to establish any floor prices or to make any deficiency payments in respect to fruits and vegetables which have not yet been announced? I should also like to hear the minister's comments on strawberries, peaches and cherries.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member would like me to make a long speech, but I can assure you I am not going to transgress the rules by doing so. The matter of establishing support prices for commodities which are not already supported will, of course, be decided when an application has been made by the producers of any of these commodities for assistance of this kind. I am therefore not in a position to say what further commodities will be put under price stabilization.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it not a fact that the wheat growers of Ontario have asked for a floor price on wheat, and if that is the case when will the minister be in a position to make an announcement?

Mr. Harkness: If the hon. member will cast his mind back to a few months ago when we were discussing the matter here, he will remember that there is a mandatory floor price provided as far as wheat, oats and barley are concerned. Therefore it is not a matter of whether or not these supports are in effect; they are there, and they exist in the legislation.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Do I take it from the minister's answer that this is the only floor which will be provided for the Ontario wheat producers, and if so does he think it is at a satisfactory level?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member is trying to turn me into a prophet now, and that is a role on which I am not prepared to embark at the moment.

SHIPPING

GROUNDING OF C.G.S. "BAFFIN"—STATEMENT ON RESUMPTION OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): In reply to a question by the hon. member for Port Arthur I advised the house on May 23 that because of the illness of Judge Pottier the final sittings of the court of investigation into the grounding of the C.G.S. Baffin had to be postponed, but that it was expected the commissioner would be able to call the court together again within two or three weeks.

I regret that since that time the department has learned that Judge Pottier's doctor will not permit him to resume work until the autumn, and in these circumstances the completion of the inquiry will be further postponed for some months.

GRAIN

WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether the annual report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1956-57 will be referred to the agriculture committee?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member did not give me notice of his question, Mr. Speaker, and he has taken me by surprise. I thought he was going to ask me about the Manitoba election and the success of Mr. Duff Roblin and the Conservative party. With regard to the report he has mentioned, perhaps the committee will make the necessary request.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the report might be referred to the committee because of the universal disappointment in the final payment for wheat for that crop year. With reference to the Manitoba election, I wonder whether this helps to account for the fact that the Conservative party dropped from getting all the seats on March 31 to a minority government yesterday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Very feeble.

PROGRESS OF INQUIRY INTO ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has he any information to impart to the house with reference to the progress of the investigation into the box car situation?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The investigation with regard to the box car situation is going ahead very well. A series of public meetings are being held in Saskatchewan and Alberta during the course of this month. When they are concluded I think the report will be prepared and submitted to the department very shortly thereafter.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the minister any idea as to the date of that event?

Mr. Churchill: No, I cannot set an exact date for that event.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILES—ALLEGED INTERFERENCE BY U.S. IN CANADIAN EXPORTS TO CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he is now in a position to give a reply to the question which I put to him on June 2 with regard to the investigation promised by the government in connection with the alleged attempt on the part of a Canadian automobile company to sell automobiles to China, an act that was arrested as the result of action taken by the parent body in the United States pursuant to the laws of that country?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I hope that an answer to the hon. member's question will be ready before too long.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, that is practically word for word the reply the minister gave me on June 2.

Mr. Fulton: So is your question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the minister not at least vary his reply by using different words?

Mr. Churchill: It just shows, Mr. Speaker, how accurate I am in answering these questions which are repetitive in nature.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO PORTRAIT ON FORTHCOMING STAMP ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Baskin (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Would the Postmaster General comment on reports that the model portrayed on a forthcoming postage stamp issue is not a qualified nurse?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. Unfortunately the choice of these models is not the responsibility of the Postmaster General but that of the artist who is retained by the department to design the stamp. When the artist was given the commission to design this particular stamp he was referred by the department to the officials of the Canadian Nurses' Association for material, and that association in turn referred the artist, Mr. Trottier, to the illustration of a nurse used by the Department of National Health and Welfare, which had been developed with the full co-operation of the nurses association. The artist decided that this was a satisfactory model and arranged to take his own pictures of her, which formed the basis for the illustration on the stamp.

I may say that the uniform which was used while these photographs were taken was provided by the Canadian Nurses' Association. The only thing I might add, Mr. Speaker, is that I am quite sure the Canadian Nurses' Association have many members who are equally as attractive as the girl portrayed on this stamp.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE CONTRIBUTIONS TO PARTICIPATING PROVINCES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 4, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Monteith (Perth)—Mr. Sevigny in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to authorize contributions being made as of the first day of July, 1958, to a participating province which has a plan in operation; and to make certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, a week ago, at about two minutes before six o'clock, I began to make some comments on this subject. Today I should like to continue my remarks with regard to the proposed amendments to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

I said at that time that I was aware from my own experience of the need for some type of hospital insurance; that I had attended the last dominion-provincial conference on this subject, and had been impressed by the fact that most of the spokesmen for the provinces had expressed the need for hospital insurance in their particular provinces. They had also expressed the need for federal aid.

The cost per patient day has been going up steadily all across Canada. In Ontario, for example, the cost in 1941 was $3.47, while in 1956 it was $14.46; and in no intervening year has there been a decrease in these costs.

I have here a copy of the daily bulletin of the dominion bureau of statistics of May 30 from which I will read a few extracts. It cost nearly half a billion dollars to run the hospitals of Canada in 1956. The total expenditures for hospitals of all types rose by more than 11 per cent to the record figure of $467,500,000, representing an average per capita cost of about $29. Public hospitals, including federal, private, mental and tubercular hospitals, reported expenditures of $347 million. It cost $3,583 to maintain the average public hospital bed in operation for the year, as against $3,379 a year before. The average cost per patient day in 1956 was $13 as compared with $12.26 in 1955, while in 1952 the daily cost was $2.47.

Costs have varied according to the size and nature of the hospital concerned. The figures give the breakdown of costs under salaries and wages, drugs and medical supplies, food and so on. One thing struck me particularly, the fact that in Canada we are giving less voluntary help to our hospitals. According to the dominion bureau of statistics this decreasing dependence on voluntary public support is illustrated by the fact that donations from the public for current operations provide only $16.10 of every $1,000 of general hospital revenue, as compared with $17.43 two years previously.

The highest figure for public donations was $30.32 per $1,000 of revenue in Quebec, and the lowest was $1.50 in Alberta.

With this background of rising hospital costs in mind, and taking into consideration the mental stress and financial worries attendant upon prolonged illnesses, our former prime minister decided to make available to the provinces the best available hospital and diagnostic care. The federal government would assume approximately half the cost while the provinces would assume the other half, the only stipulation being that these services should be available to every person resident within a province. In my opinion that was one of the greatest humanitarian acts ever placed on the statute books of Canada. This act was piloted through the House of Commons by the former minister of national health and welfare, now the hon. member for Essex East, who received a well deserved and merited compliment the other day from the hon. member for Durham when he referred to the great part played by the hon. member for Essex East in putting this legislation on our statute books.

Provision was made that this act should come into operation as soon as six provinces had signed the agreement and could qualify under the act. I can well remember the criticisms that were voiced in this house. I well remember the statements made by the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Knowles, who maintained that this act should go into operation immediately and should apply to those provinces that had hospital plans already in force. I well remember certain hon. members now to your right maintaining at that time that this act should apply to depreciation and administrative costs, and that it should provide for payment of half the costs for mental and tubercular patients in those institutions.

I well remember the fine argument put forward by my friend the late hon. member for Lanark, Dr. Blair. He insisted that there should be no differentiation between sickness in a general hospital and sickness in a mental or tuberculosis hospital. In fact hon. members on the other side of the house, and particularly the present Minister of Finance, criticized the exclusions contained in section 2 (e) of the bill. The Minister of Finance, the then private hon. member for Eglinton, felt so keenly about it that he divided the house on third reading of the bill. As I recall it the present Minister of National Health and Welfare and many hon. members who now sit on your right voted with him.

I refer to page 3381 of Hansard of April 10, 1957, where an amendment moved by the present Minister of Finance is recorded in these words:

> That Bill 320 be not now read the third time, but that the said bill be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of reconsidering the provisions to exclude tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria and hospitals and institutions for the mentally ill in clause 2 (e) thereof.

He went on to state:

> My purpose is to ask the house to refer the bill back to the committee of the whole in order that this same clause which contains this unjustifiably narrow definition of the word "hospital" may be reconsidered. I put before the house the ground that there can be no justification in good sense or in principle or in humanity or in the existing facts of life as applied to the financial difficulties of the provinces and municipalities of this country, for this government to try to drive a wedge between general hospitals on the one hand and tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria and hospitals and institutions for the mentally ill on the other hand. It is only by changing the definition that the government proposes in clause 2 (e) that this unworthy distinction can be eliminated.

The hon. member at that time argued that there could be no justification whatever for the exclusion of those hospitals. I wish to refer briefly to the remarks made by the present Prime Minister with regard to this amendment proposed by the present Minister of Finance. On April 10, 1957, as recorded at page 3386 of Hansard, the Prime Minister, the then private hon. member for Prince Albert, said:

> The amendment moved by the hon. member would refer the bill to the committee of the whole for the purpose of considering this clause and thereby giving an opportunity, even at this late hour, of including within the ambit of the legislation sanatoria, tuberculosis hospitals and institutions and hospitals for the mentally ill. I cannot understand this omission.

It is interesting to note that the right hon. gentleman who now sits in this house as Prime Minister pursued this matter in the election campaign that year. The Winnipeg Tribune of May 14, 1957, reports him as having said:

> The Conservatives, he said, would repair a "serious omission" in the federal health plan which does not include tubercular and mental institutions.

The Toronto Globe and Mail of May 28, 1957, reports the hon. gentleman as having said in Saskatoon:

> Mr. Diefenbaker said the Conservative party still believes that hospital insurance should cover patients in mental and tuberculosis institutions.

I consider that in these statements, if correct—and I have no reason to accuse either the Globe and Mail or the Winnipeg Tribune of not being correct—we have a solemn promise to the people of Canada. I am certainly surprised in view of this fact that section 2 (e) is not being amended by the government at this time to widen the definition in order to cover mental and tuberculosis hospitals.

I was interested in seeing what some of the provinces thought about the bill. The Vancouver Province of March 8, 1958, carried the following report:

> Premier Bennett made his first direct criticism of the national Conservative government.
> "We are a little alarmed," he told the house "at the way the present government is holding hands with Ontario and Quebec; it is a little too much for the best interests of British Columbia."

Earlier he said:

> I am terribly disappointed in the Diefenbaker government. I had hoped that it would have had vision. Actually it has dealt with British Columbia more severely than the Liberal government did.

In the 10 months since this government was elected it has been in the business of politics rather than that of government. To digress a little, I certainly believe that, because in my own riding unemployment is increasing in spite of the promises that we would have no unemployment by the middle of the summer.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What has that to do with hospital insurance?

Mr. McMillan: I have had wires from home today saying that unemployment is going up.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What has that to do with hospital insurance?

Mr. McMillan: It has something to do with hospital insurance. When I was home a man came to see me who, because he was unemployed, could not meet his payments and so on. He was actually sick, so sick that he had to go to hospital.

Mr. Cardiff: Why did you not do something for him?

Mr. McMillan: I will tell you that worrying about unemployment does produce ulcers, will make ulcers worse and cause them to bleed, and so on. I refer to stomach ulcers, and that is true. It is easy enough to laugh about unemployment. Hon. members across the way do laugh about unemployment, but I can tell them that in Welland the numbers are going up every week instead of going down.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are not laughing about unemployment.

Mr. McMillan: The minister of health of British Columbia said this:

> The Tories have stated mental care and tuberculosis care can't be accepted as shareable hospital insurance costs without impairment of payments made provinces under other arrangements.

The best compliment this government is paying to the former government is contained in the proposed amendments to this act. One has to do with getting the scheme started; otherwise the scheme could not get started. The other minor amendment has to do with providing some meals and restricting the use of drugs. I would like the minister to tell us what Premier Bennett has in mind. I would like to know whether British Columbia was offered a deal different from that signed by Ontario. I know the minister said the other day that Newfoundland had signed an agreement. I would like him to tell us whether there was any difference in detail in the agreement signed by Ontario and the agreement signed by the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): They are all within the terms of the act.

Mr. McMillan: I am asking whether there was any difference in detail. I would like to know why the other provinces have not signed. It seems to me that there must be some difference or British Columbia would have signed. It looks to me as though this government got the province of Ontario to sign and is offering this amendment as bait to the other provinces to come in so as not to embarrass the province of Ontario on January 1, 1959, if six provinces have not come into the scheme by that time. I really think this government is forced to bring in this amendment as the result of its own failure to pursue the parliamentary objective of having a nation-wide hospital insurance plan under way as soon as possible.

I think the act itself is excellent; I believe the formula worked out by the previous government was an ingenious one. It tends to prevent any interference on the part of the Department of National Health and Welfare in things that come purely within provincial jurisdiction. The act itself is generous and it will readily be taken up by the people. I think, however, this scheme would have been very difficult of attainment without the national health program that we had in force under the former minister for a period of 10 years or more. We spent something like $250 million under that program. We helped to provide beds in new hospitals and hospital extensions. We spent much money in the control of such diseases as tuberculosis, venereal disease and cancer. We also spent much money in training large numbers of personnel.

One very good example of the action taken by the former minister was the help given to the provinces to get their poliomyelitis immunization programs under way. As a result the incidence of polio has dropped. I have not seen the recent figures, but I know it has come down very markedly. The dominion government spent $3 million on that program. There has been a great saving to the people, not only in hospital beds because those people are not in the hospitals for prolonged periods, but because many children are not going to be handicapped for life.

One outstanding feature of the bill, of course, is the fact that there is no time limit on hospitalization. I know from personal experience that many people who suffer multiple fractures and terminal illnesses are often in hospital much longer than they could be and still be covered by the insurance schemes at present in vogue. Hospitals also should be able to budget and not have large deficits. The municipalities should benefit when this scheme is in operation. If the provinces play fair with the municipalities, the municipalities will not have to put up their share for indigent people going to hospital. We have old age pensioners, old age assistance cases and various other civil pensioners who go to hospitals; and if the provinces assume their share then the municipalities will be relieved financially.

Dr. Malcolm G. Taylor of the University of Toronto was commissioned by the Canadian tax foundation to submit his findings concerning the probable cost of hospital and medical care in Canada, and by a series of calculations he came up with a figure showing that our national hospital insurance scheme would cost something like $634 million by 1960. Dr. Taylor thinks we should be able to do this and I certainly think we should, since this figure is just a little over half our liquor bill in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is for 10 provinces.

Mr. McMillan: Yes, 10 provinces. He estimated that by 1960 the combined cost in Canada of medical and hospital care would be 2.6 per cent of our national income, whereas today it is 2 per cent.

One thing I like about this scheme is the fact that people will be able to go to hospital as of right and not be classified as indigents. We have a highly educated public. They are all aware of the benefits of good health care, and they look upon the rising standards of medical care as concomitants of a rising standard of living. Therefore, but for the hospital scheme we have put on the statute books, I think we would have had increased hospital and medical care.

I know the minister is very anxious to answer some of these questions. I have tabulated certain questions which I should like to hear him answer before we adopt the resolution. First I should like him to tell us why more provinces have not signed agreements. There have only been two and there certainly should have been six by this time. I think we would have had six if the minister had pursued the matter more vigorously. Second, what is the reason for British Columbia's attitude? I have heard from other sources that British Columbia does not look on the plan very favourably. Third, were all provinces offered the same agreement? In spite of what the minister said in the house the other day I have heard that there is some difference between the agreements signed by Ontario and Newfoundland.

I have one last question, and I am sure the minister can answer it very easily. Why do the minister, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the minister's other colleagues take such a restricted view of section 2 (e) of the act, when they all voted to include hospitalization in mental and tubercular institutions on April 10, 1957?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, we have just heard some very interesting remarks from the hon. member for Welland who speaks, I understand, as a medical practitioner. His views on this subject are most interesting. I will have to speak as a patient of various medical practitioners throughout the country and try to give the viewpoint of the patient with regard to this matter.

I believe there are many phases of the hospital insurance plan that are badly in need of explanation at the present time. I quite realize that some of the problems I may raise are not caused wholly by the federal government, but I believe the federal government has a duty and responsibility to the people, particularly of the province of Ontario, to try to correct some of the wrong impressions that have been created in the minds of the people and to clear up some of the confusion and misinformation under which the people of Ontario are labouring at the present time.

The first point I should like to refer to, and in my opinion it is a serious fault in the plan, has to do with the fact that there is no coverage for old age pensioners. Throughout the country there are examples of hospital insurance plans that have been in effect for quite a number of years and have worked very satisfactorily, and which do not lack such a provision. This is not a new field we are plowing. Examples, figures, information and data are all available. I think such a provision definitely should be included in this plan; and as long as amendments are being made to the scheme we should certainly include the major amendments needed to make the plan as good as it possibly can be made.

There is another aspect with regard to old age pensions which I believe will cause a lot of confusion. As I understand the situation, people who are drawing old age assistance will be covered by the plan made effective by the agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government so far as their hospital costs are concerned. However, when they pass from the 65 to 70 old age assistance group, during which time they receive a pension with a means test, to the group 70 and over who automatically receive an old age pension with no means test, I understand they will have to obtain a certificate proving they are indigent or in very needy circumstances or they will automatically lose their hospital plan benefits. I think that is a point that needs very close scrutiny. If the situation is as it appears to be from the information I have received so far, it is certainly something that should be corrected.

The information I have referred to is contained in the literature being published concerning the plan at the present time. On page 8 of the booklet I have here which has to do with questions and answers about hospital insurance in Ontario there is a reference to social assistance persons. There is a further reference to page 50, where one finds a description of the various people who will be eligible. One sees that persons who qualify under the Old Age Assistance Act are eligible, and then it says that persons who come under the Old Age Security Act and are approved by the department of public welfare are eligible to receive medical welfare services.

Because of that information and subsequent telephone calls and inquiries I have made I have gained the impression that a person receiving old age assistance, with respect to whom the means test is automatically abolished at age 70, will have to apply for a certificate of financial distress, shall we say, or he will automatically lose his hospital benefits under the plan.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can my hon. friend be more precise? That is a very important statement to make. Perhaps the minister might comment on it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am hoping that the minister will comment and clarify the point if he has the information available because, as I understand the situation from the information I have obtained, the only way old age pensioners, those 70 and over, can obtain these benefits is by obtaining a certificate to the effect that they are in needy circumstances. This would mean that they would automatically lose the benefits they have had from age 65 to 70 unless they were fully aware of the situation and obtained the necessary certificate.

There is another matter which I think should be given very close scrutiny and consideration at this time. Under the plan as it has been outlined there is no assurance as there is, for example, under the Ontario Blue Cross plan, that the current monthly rates will remain the same even for the period of one year, as they now do under Blue Cross. Under the Blue Cross plan, the most common hospital plan in Ontario at the present time, you at least have a guarantee for one year as to what the plan is going to cost you. There is no guarantee under the proposed plan, I understand, and that is borne out by a question asked at a meeting held in January, 1958. In Industrial Canada for February, 1958, I find the following question:

> Will the commission be able to guarantee the premiums set by it for any specific period, as does the Blue Cross?

This was the answer:

> No. It is hoped that the rates will hold but if hospital costs rise payments to hospitals will have to rise.

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that clarification of this very important matter is required. Under this set-up, insured persons would seem to have no guarantee against sudden fluctuations in insurance costs.

Another very important matter is that there is no provision at the present time in any way, shape or form for the waiving of premiums of people who are unfortunate enough to have a prolonged stay in the hospital. There is no obligation of any kind on companies or employers to provide coverage for those people, and certainly common sense tells us that after an extended stay in the hospital a man is far from able to pick up and continue his hospitalization premiums. I feel this matter should be given very careful consideration, and certainly some action taken in that respect.

The hon. member who spoke before me made some mention of the case of indigents. From what I have gathered about this particular plan I believe indigents are divided into two categories. The first category is that of patients who are permanently in the indigent class. They, of course, are provided for under the present plan. I believe a considerable amount of confusion and possible distress could be caused amongst patients in the other category, that is people who, through no fault of their own, may be temporarily placed in the indigent patient class. This could result from unemployment or some other factor of that kind.

Possibly a little later I should like to deal with the particular cost aspects of this matter. Actually the arrangements that have been worked out, as we understand them and in spite of the very clear stand taken by many members of the present cabinet just one year ago, still fail to include the cost of mental and tubercular cases. I should like to quote just one paragraph from Hansard for April 10, 1957, page 3380. These are the words of the present Minister of Finance, who said:

> We as a party and as Her Majesty's loyal opposition have already expressed in the strongest terms our view that there is no justification whatever for the exclusion of these hospitals and institutions from among those that lie within the scope of the scheme of hospital insurance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the minister owes all of us in this house an explanation as to why there is such a change from that very definite stand of just one year ago.

There is another matter upon which I should like to have some clarification from the minister, if he is in a position to do so. Over the last few months there has been a considerable amount of newspaper advertising concerning the new Ontario hospital plan which will be established the first of next year. These advertisements usually contain an address to which one can write if one needs further information. I had a case drawn to my attention in which a person wrote to this address requesting further information about the new hospital plan, and to my amazement the reply had nothing whatever to do with the hospital plan but was a very colourful advertisement for the Ontario Blue Cross plan for supplementary benefits that could be purchased over and above the regular hospital plan. This raises a question in my mind, sir, as to whether the costs of this advertising for another plan are included in the costs of the Ontario hospitalization plan which, in the opinion of many thinking people, appear to be rather high.

This brings me to my next point, which is the cost of this plan. Most of us realize that the plan presently proposed is on the basis of $2.10 per month for a single person and $4.20 per month for a family. People generally have been given the idea that that is only one third of the cost and the other two thirds are borne equally by the provincial and federal governments. In fact I have here a copy of a pamphlet entitled "Facts about Hospital Care Insurance; for Residents of Ontario". On page 4 I read:

> The projected total cost of the hospital insurance program for 1959, including care and treatment in mental and tuberculosis hospitals, is about $210 million.
> Revenue from premiums will total about $75 million, or about one-third of the cost of the total program. The balance is being financed by general revenues of the federal and provincial governments. Each level of government will bear approximately one-third of the cost.

I should like to point out that those figures are certainly very misleading. As I understand this plan, and this is subject to correction—I would be glad if the minister would inform me if I am wrong—the arrangement is that the federal government will pay one half the cost of hospital patients in Ontario, excluding tuberculosis and mental patients. I have also received information that tuberculosis and mental patients take up roughly one half the hospital beds in this country. This would mean that the federal contribution would not be one third but merely one half of one half, which according to my arithmetic means one quarter. The premiums of individual groups supporting this plan will amount to roughly $75 million as estimated in this pamphlet, which is in fact 36 per cent of the estimated $210 million. Well, with the federal government paying 25 per cent and the individual 36 per cent, this leaves 39 per cent for the Ontario government. If we translate that into dollars it means the federal government would pay $52.5 million, the individual premium payer $75 million, and the Ontario government $82.5 million. This is definitely not the picture presented by the various data put out by the province of Ontario.

There is another interesting point, and that is the additional coverage which may be purchased through the various private companies. The information we have received is that a person will be able to pay through the Ontario commission not only the premiums covering the Ontario hospital plan but also any additional premiums for private coverage by a private company. In other words the commission is being used as a check-off for private insurance companies that may be selling additional coverage. Once again, sir, I wonder to whom these costs are charged, and whether or not we have been given a true picture of the actual costs of the hospitalization plan.

That brings me to the point I mentioned a little while ago, namely the arrangement with regard to temporary indigent patients. As I understand it, the situation at the present time is that these patients are going to be screened by the municipalities, and that once they are judged by the municipalities to be eligible for assistance, then the costs will be borne by the municipalities; but the costs coming back from the provincial government will not have any relation to the actual costs paid by the municipalities but rather will be on a per capita basis for the municipalities to use in any way they see fit.

In my opinion that procedure could lead to a situation where you could have your sidewalks paved and the cost charged to the hospital plan. In one sense possibly it does not make much difference, as far as the municipal taxpayer is concerned, which pocket it comes out of as long as he gets full value for his money. However, in all fairness to our hospitalization plan I think some better arrangement than this could be made. I would hope the minister would be able to answer some of these questions.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I shall try to answer a few of these questions that have been mentioned by hon. members.

The hon. member for Welland certainly presented some extremely interesting statistics with regard to rising costs generally, and he gave an amazing picture as to the cost jump from approximately $2 to $14 I think that was his last figure—in a comparatively short space of time. He mentioned the fact that we are not proposing any change in clause 2 (e) having to do with tuberculosis and mental hospitals. That is quite right. The situation has been unchanged since it was previously mentioned in this house, in fact since the last fiscal conference between the provinces and the federal government. He went to some pains to congratulate the hon. member for Essex East, and with those congratulations I agree wholeheartedly. However, I would point out that it took the previous government since 1919 to get around to bringing in hospital insurance. I should also like to point out that if they had still been in power no provincial governments would be participating; up to January 1, 1959, they would not be in receipt of federal funds.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are just going to get into a speech.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is a fact, is it not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, it certainly is not.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As to the hon. member for Timmins, really anything the hon. member had to say came within the jurisdiction of the provincial government of the province of Ontario. We actually participate and pay 48.8 per cent of the shareable hospital costs in the province of Ontario. As the hon. member knows, I am sure, we pay 50 per cent of 50 per cent of the across-Canada average and 50 per cent of 50 per cent of the—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Total cost.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —total cost across Canada, and we also share with the provinces—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the situation not 50 per cent of the total cost based on 25 per cent of the national average and 25 per cent of the provincial average?

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Fifty per cent of the total cost, but half of that is based on the national average cost and the other cost is based on the average provincial cost.

The hon. member mentioned old age pensioners having to reapply when they become eligible for old age pensions at the age of 70 after having been on old age assistance. My understanding is that this is not so. It has been indicated to us that those who have been on old age assistance prior to age 70, when they reach the age of 70 and become subject to old age pension they will automatically come under the scheme and have their premiums paid.

As to the rates, here again this is purely a provincial matter as to how they raise their share of hospital costs. Some are going to do so by sales taxes, I presume. Some may do it out of general revenue. Others are doing it on a premium basis. The hon. member suggested that there is no guarantee that these rates may not be raised. That is quite so, but we understand no change is contemplated for some little time at least. Eventually there may have to be a change. I am not in a position to disagree with that possibility.

The hon. member for Skeena, speaking to this resolution earlier, suggested that we should give more consideration to prevention, which is important. I quite agree. In this respect I would point out that we are spending millions for research generally and for the prevention of disease. I feel that the hon. member for Skeena has made a very close study of this matter, and I should like to say that I greatly enjoyed the remarks he made in commenting on the hospitalization scheme.

I think I might give a brief resume of just what the situation is in the various provinces. There seems to have been some concern in the minds of the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Welland to the effect that we had not gotten on with this scheme just as rapidly as we might. I should like to assure them that entirely the opposite has been the case. My officials have visited all the provinces. We have had many provincial officials visit Ottawa. We have had two technical conferences at the official level, with some ministers present. I have met with several ministers. Everything possible has been done to facilitate the signing of agreements with the provinces.

I should like to point out the situation, taking each province in turn. As the house has been informed and as hon. members know, Ontario has signed an agreement under date of March 3 last. This program will come into being on January 1, 1959. As to Newfoundland, the minister of health for Newfoundland and I signed an agreement on June 9.

It will come into effect on July 1, 1958 provided this legislation is passed in order to make it possible. As to Manitoba, the province has passed the requisite legislation. The agreement has been drawn up and is now ready for signing. This province plans to commence its program on July 1, 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the present election results will not interfere with the progress in that connection.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would not expect it to do so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You can never tell what a new government will do.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The province of British Columbia has submitted to the federal government for study their act and draft regulations. After preliminary examination a meeting was held in Ottawa with provincial representatives, with particularly satisfactory results, and an agreement is now before the government for consideration. This plan is expected to commence on July 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What province is that?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): British Columbia.

Mr. McMillan: Did the minister say British Columbia had agreed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, there is no agreement; it is not signed.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The agreement is not signed as yet, but the province has submitted its plan and it is now before the government for consideration. Saskatchewan have submitted their acts and revised regulations and draft agreement. Meetings were held last week with representatives of Saskatchewan. We expect to have this agreement signed very shortly and in effect by July 1, 1958.

The minister of health for Alberta, Dr. Ross, and some of his officials are expected in Ottawa later this week. Dr. Ross has indicated to us their wish to sign an agreement effective as of July 1, 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the difficulty with regard to Alberta? They were here two weeks ago.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There has been some question as to whether their legislation as it now stands does come within the requirements of the act. We have had this matter before the Department of Justice for consideration. It is hoped that final arrangements for an agreement will be reached by the end of this forthcoming visit.

Discussions have been held with New Brunswick both in Ottawa and in Fredericton, and they are planning to have their program in effect by the first of the year. Nova Scotia is in much the same position.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does that mean that New Brunswick will sign by July 1st?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, effective January 1, 1959. I have indicated that we expect five provinces to sign by July 1 so that their schemes can go into effect by that date. Nova Scotia is in the same position as New Brunswick, and it is expected that their programs will commence on January 1, 1959. Prince Edward Island has announced its intention of participating in the program but the province is yet in an early stage of planning and it appears likely its program will start some time in 1959. Quebec has not indicated its intention in respect to the act.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anything more I have to say. There has been some mention of capital cost. I think this government has recognized that there is a need here. We have given consideration to this matter and, as was announced in the house earlier, we have doubled the capital costs construction grants to the various provinces. If there are any further questions I shall be glad to answer them, possibly when we get to the bill which is before us. We will be able to go into more detail at the committee stage.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As far as we on this side of the house are concerned we shall reserve our questions and further observations on this matter, to which we attach, understandably, the greatest importance, until we come to the bill. But in forbearing at this time I would nevertheless indicate to the minister that we do not feel he has completely answered the questions which have been put to him, more particularly the questions which were addressed to him the other day. When we get to the bill we shall expect a detailed reply with regard to the reasons why we are in this position now—compelled, in order to meet the important problem which faces Ontario—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What is that, again?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said we are in this position now in order to assist the province of Ontario in carrying out its very important program on January 1, 1959, and obliged to deal with this particular amendment.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, we are not. I beg to differ. That is not so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When we come to the bill, I expect to discuss this.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We can discuss it now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think there is sufficient time, although I am prepared to do so. I am trying to meet the convenience of the minister. I am simply indicating to him that I do not want it to be taken that because we allow the resolution to go through at this time we are satisfied with the answers he has given, because that is not the case.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I can extend my answer very briefly. Certainly nothing having to do with this amendment affects Ontario. It is quite obvious that we will have at least eight agreements signed by the end of the year and according to the provisions of the present act all we need is six, including Ontario. I think that answers the hon. member's question.

Mr. McMillan: May I ask the minister a question? I think he stated that British Columbia is submitting a plan. Has British Columbia already submitted a plan? Is there wide latitude in the plans that they may submit?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Let me put it this way: this is not one national hospital scheme, one hospital scheme on a national basis; it is proposed that there be ten different provincial schemes all coming within the scope of the act. They can and do differ in some respects.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The act permits that. We will go into all that with great care later.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to thank the minister for replying to the question as he has done. There is only one other question to which I should like an answer at this time—the matter has been referred to already by the hon. member for Welland—that is, in view of the definite stand which was taken by members of this government with regard to mental and tubercular patients a year ago, could the minister make any comment at this time on how soon we may expect the government to implement their policy in this respect, or give reasons why no such provisions have been included on this occasion?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Chairman, I have no comment to make on that except to repeat what I said a moment ago to the effect that this was discussed at the last federal-provincial conference. The situation is unchanged since that time.

Mr. Argue: I think the statement that the minister has made is extremely disappointing. It is most disappointing to the people of Canada that the government should have failed to take action to bring mental and tubercular institutions under this plan. Certainly the stand which was taken by the government in this regard is completely clear. There can be no doubt that the government favoured bringing tubercular and mental patients under this legislation, and I am amazed that the minister is not able to give the committee some further information regarding what the government intends to do in this field.

I think the minister should be reminded of the very definite stand which was taken by his own party and by the Prime Minister in particular in the 1957 election campaign. According to the Winnipeg Tribune of May 14 of that year and I quote:

> The Conservatives . . . would repair a "serious omission" in the federal health plan which does not include tubercular and mental institutions.

And according to a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 28, 1957 datelined Saskatoon, May 27, the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition said:

> The Conservative party still believes that hospital insurance should cover patients in mental and tuberculosis institutions.

Moreover, the records of this house demonstrate very adequately the stand which has been taken by the Conservative party. Certainly prior to both elections the people of this country were led to believe that tuberculosis and mental institutions would be brought under a health plan. Speaking in this house on April 10, 1957, as reported on page 3386 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had this to say as leader of the opposition at that time:

> Now that we are passing such legislation, every reasonable facet of the problem should be met, for once the legislation finds its place on the statute books an amendment in order to cover tuberculosis sanatoria and institutions and mental institutions will be almost impossible of attainment. I cannot see that this demand is unreasonable and I feel that reality demands acceptance of the principle contained in the amendment moved.

Those words of the Prime Minister should be reiterated in this debate by all hon. members who are interested in having a comprehensive health plan. The Prime Minister went on to say:

> —the goal that all of us have in mind will not be achieved until the two types of institutions to which I have made reference are included within the provisions of this legislation.

I am wondering if the minister can say what studies are presently being conducted in his department in the field of a general health insurance plan. From statements that have been made in this house on previous occasions I know that such a study has been made in the past and it is probably a continuing study. My question is whether the present government, even though its position has not changed since the federal-provincial conference, is having studies made within the department as to how mental and tuberculosis institutions might be brought under the plan and an over-all health insurance plan introduced?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I have no further comment. The situation is simply unchanged since December last, as I have mentioned before.

Mr. Argue: But could the minister tell us whether any studies are being made in his department for the purpose I have outlined?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Up to the moment the staff have beeen concentrating for some months on getting the present hospital scheme into operation and we expect to get that under way immediately.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Monteith (Perth) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-30, to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT ACT

CONTINUATION OF AUTHORITY RESPECTING TRANSPORT OF GOODS IN BULK, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Department of Transport Act to provide for the continuation for a further period of two years of authority to make regulations for the control of transport of goods in bulk including, amongst other things, the appointment of one or more controllers and one or more deputy controllers to carry out the provisions of such regulations, and the payment of their remuneration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may this order of business stand? Could we proceed to take item No. 9 on today's order paper with respect to a measure to provide for the withdrawal of certain lands from Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the order was called last night in this sequence and our members are here ready to discuss item No. 7 as it now stands on the order paper. If we were to go on to the other item on the agenda it would interfere with the order of the business announced last night.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources consent to let this question stand?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) we should pause for just a moment in the absence of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees).

Mr. Chevrier: The minister is arriving now.

Mr. Speaker: It has been moved that I do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee to consider this resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The terms of the resolution are very clear and I believe that no explanation of the purpose is really necessary. I may say, however, that parliament amended the Department of Transport Act in 1954 to enable the governor in council to make regulations for the purpose of ensuring:

—prompt, efficient and orderly transport of goods in bulk.

This amendment embodied in section 6 (a) of the act was by further amendment in May 1956 extended until May 31, 1958. The sole purpose of the legislation which it is proposed to introduce following the adoption of this resolution is to extend the life of section 6(a) of the act until May 31, 1960.

As hon. members already know the purpose of this amendment is simply to make it possible for the government, if at any time it appears necessary to do so, to appoint a transport controller to assist the board of grain commissioners in allocating box cars for the better and easier handling of our grain crop. Since we formed the government a year ago there has been no need for appointing such a controller but at some time in the future it might be deemed necessary and a controller would be appointed. This amendment is simply to give the government the right to appoint a controller if it is considered desirable to do so.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might ask the minister a question before he sits down, Mr. Chairman. Is the purpose of obtaining this power the possibility or probability—either one—of a transport controller being necessary in order to carry out the recommendations, whatever they may be, of the Bracken commission inquiring into the distribution of box cars?

Mr. Hees: It is not possible for us to say what the recommendations of the Bracken commission are going to be until that commission has reported but it was originally intended to renew the life of this provision before it expired on May 31. It was not possible to bring forward this amendment before May 31 of this year and it is considered desirable to enable the government to have the right to appoint a transport controller if such an appointment is considered necessary at any time and if it is not considered necessary then of course one will not be appointed.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for the statement which he has just made on the powers which are being sought by the government in this resolution. I do think, however, that he should have been somewhat more explicit and have dealt more at length with the reasons for the extension of those powers, having regard particularly to the attitude which was taken on this measure not so much by my hon. friend but by those with whom he was associated when they sat on this side of the house.

I do agree with him when he says that the resolution is a simple one in that it divides itself into three parts: first, the resolution seeks an amendment to the Department of Transport Act in order to provide for the continuation of certain powers, as set out in that act, for a period of two years; second, to make regulations for the control of transport of goods in bulk; and, third, the appointment, as the minister has stated, of a transport controller or a deputy transport controller, as the case may be, and to pay him remuneration.

This resolution covers not only the movement of box cars but also the movement of ships and the controller, whoever he may be, if he is appointed would have very wide powers under the regulations that are sought to be extended. As a matter of fact, those powers were contained in an amendment to the Department of Transport Act which was passed by this house and which now forms part of the statutes of Canada 2—3, Elizabeth II, 1953-54, chapter 30. It was an amendment to the Department of Transport Act which was then known as section 6(a)(i)(ii). Therein are contained succinctly the powers that are being extended by this legislation.

The position of the opposition is, of course, going to be one which is consistent with the attitude it adopted when it was in office. There is no doubt in our minds that this extension should be granted; there is no doubt in our minds that these powers should be continued; there is no doubt in our minds that this legislation at the resolution stage should be approved. I do think, however, that the minister should have given some explanation for the attitude taken by his party when it was on this side of the house, because at that time very strong exception was taken to the extension of those powers. So strong was the exception taken to those powers and their extension that on one occasion the debate lasted a considerable length of time. For the edification of the committee I would like to read to the hon. gentleman some of the statements that were made on that occasion.

Mr. Montgomery: Why read all that?

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot hear what the hon. gentleman is saying.

Mr. Montgomery: Carry on, then.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. gentleman has such a weak voice that from this side of the house it appears like a mumble. If he has anything to say I wish he would speak up. I was saying I would like to read back to the committee some of the things that were said during the course of a similar debate when hon. gentlemen who now sit on the government side were sitting on this side of the house. I would like to quote from Hansard of 1956, at page 3228; the present Prime Minister, then the hon. member for Prince Albert, is reported as having said:

> The transport controller has the power to order any person dealing with any bulk transport to transport goods in bulk, to fix minimum quotas, maximum ratios and so forth. So great are the powers conferred that, no matter what he does, as long as he acts within the powers conferred upon him there is no right of action. If any person fails to fulfil any contract or obligation because of the order of the controller, it is a good defence to an action against such a person to place before the court and prove the allegation that what was done was done pursuant to the order of the transport controller.

Then, later on, during the course of the same debate, at page 3274, the same gentleman had this to say:

> So far as regulations are concerned I may say that the Supreme Court of Canada paid its tribute to the kind of regulations the minister's department has brought into being by referring to them as inconsistent with justice and derogatory of the rights of individuals.

Well, if that language, which was pretty strong at the time, still stands I would have believed that the minister would have thought it incumbent upon him not to demand the extension of those powers, without explanation. Then, again, in volume IV of Hansard of 1956, at page 3496, there is a quotation from the same gentleman that I would like to read:

> The regulations provide for a transport controller having authority to order any person dealing in various bulk commodities to fix minimum quotas, to fix proportions and the like and also to order any person dealing in bulk transport facilities, which include railways, steamships and the like, to extend, furnish, supply or make use of any bulk transport facilities for transporting any bulk commodities.

These powers are very wide. The transport controller becomes almost, if not completely, omnipotent. His authority is above the law; his discretion is unchallengeable.

I would think that those qualifications of the powers of the transport controller, if he is appointed under the regulations as they are now before us, would be exactly the same today as they were then, because I presume there has been no amendment to those regulations and that is one of the questions which I would like to ask the minister. I hope he will be able to tell us whether, during the course of time his government has been in office, there has been any amendment to those regulations. I presume there have not been any but if there has been any I would hope they would be given to the house.

The government of Canada provided for the appointment of a transport controller in the month of August, 1951, under the Emergency Powers Act, and subsequently there was put in the statutes legislation generally known as Bill No. 443, and containing the terms of the order in council P.C. 4535. It was the opinion of the government at that time that due to the heavy demand upon all forms of transportation particularly lake and rail some authority was necessary to ensure an equitable distribution of the various bulk commodities such as grain, iron ore, coal, sand, pulpwood and the like. The main duties of the transport controller had to do with the hauling and handling of grain; first, to make sure that when grain is sold by the Canadian wheat board or any other exporter the grain moves freely to the seaboard port when the vessels present themselves for their loads; second, to see that transportation does not limit the amount of grain which can be sold by Canada.

There are, as the house knows, four outlets for the export of grain in this country. There is the Pacific coast outlet made up of the ports of Vancouver, New Westminster and Prince Rupert, all of which are open the year round. Then there is the port of Churchill which is open for a period of about two and a half months. There are also the St. Lawrence ports with a navigation season lasting for about eight months. Finally, there are the Atlantic ports of Halifax and Saint John which, while open for navigation all year, are used for the export of grain during the months of December to April inclusive when the St. Lawrence ports are closed.

At this moment I am particularly concerned with the movement of grain in the St. Lawrence area. I am sure that other members of the house will deal with the problems having to do with western Canada but as I speak at the moment I am particularly interested in the movement through St. Lawrence river ports. This movement originates at the lakehead. The grain is moved in three circuits. First, grain is moved by means of lake carriers down the great lakes for trans-shipment at the ports of Port Colborne, Prescott or Kingston from where it is trans-shipped in canallers to Montreal, Three Rivers, Quebec, Sorel and other such ports for further transshipment overseas. The second way is the lake and rail route. That shipment is by water to the bay ports and from the bay ports to Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports by rail. The third movement is an all water movement from the head of the lakes to Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports by means of canallers.

The reason I raise this matter is that there has been serious complaint at the port of Montreal that it has not been receiving a sufficient quantity of grain. In other words, the same quantity of grain that obtained in the past has not been there for transshipment overseas. I do not have the figures before me at the present time but I recall a recent statement made by the shipping authorities of the port of Montreal complaining bitterly that the movement of grain towards St. Lawrence ports was diminishing and was not nearly as substantial as it has been in the past. What are the reasons for this? I know they are manifold. I should like to bring the situation to the attention of the minister and say that one reason may well be the fact that a transport controller is not there to direct this movement of grain. That may have something to do with it.

I am sure there are other reasons. I am sure that the proximity of the Pacific coast ports to the wheat area also has a great deal to do with it and I am sure that rates have some influence on the situation. But I would direct the minister's attention particularly to the fact that there was no serious complaint in the past and I do not see why it is not possible to distribute the movement of grain in a more equitable manner. I realize that much of the grain moves during the short navigation season to the port of Churchill. There is an area within a certain radius of the port from which I presume it is much less costly to move grain to that port and from there to the United Kingdom market.

But the practice has grown up over the years to send a substantial movement to the port of Montreal and with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and the fact that there are interests in the United States who state categorically that they will ship their wheat down this route to overseas markets by way of Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports it becomes more and more important to make sure that this movement is assured and that facilities exist for transshipment at Montreal.

There are a number of questions I should like to address to the minister. First, following the line of the leader of the C.C.F. party, can the minister give the house some indication whether or not a transport controller will be appointed? Does he think, that the usefulness of a transport controller has disappeared entirely? Does he feel or do his officers feel, having regard to the present situation with respect to both railways and ships, that such an officer should not be appointed at this time? What is the present personnel of what remains of that office? Is it now being administered by the Department of Transport? If it is, I wish the minister would give us details.

I am sure that the C.C.F. leader will deal with the box car situation in western Canada in greater detail than I will but this matter is always one of interest to the house. I remember when I was on the other side of the house I was required to give from time to time the position respecting the shortage of box cars across Canada. What is the present position of C.N.R. and C.P.R. box cars in Canada? Is there a shortage of box cars? How many Canadian box cars are now held in the United States and, vice versa, what is the number of United States box cars in Canada? What is the proper balance as between the two? Did the minister want to say something?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the first question of the hon. member for Laurier—

Mr. Chevrier: I had not finished.

Mr. Hees: Oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I thought the minister was rising to ask a question but if he wants to interject—

Mr. Hees: I do not want to interject. I thought the hon. member wanted me to answer these questions.

Mr. Chevrier: I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the orders of the day today what the position was with reference to the box car investigation being carried on at the present time. I did not get much enlightenment from his answer. It may be that the Minister of Transport will be able to give the house more information. Then, what is the position with reference to ships?

Are there the required number in the great lakes area? Are ships required for the movement of ore under the purview of this resolution or of these powers? Most of the time when the house has been considering this resolution, it has been directing its attention to the rail aspect of transportation. I think one should not neglect the water aspect. Is there the required number of vessels? Those are questions that occurred to me as I was looking at this resolution.

I sum up by saying that there will be no doubt as to our position. We will want to support the extension of these powers because this is legislation similar to that which we proposed to this house. But I would appreciate from the minister some comment as to the attitude taken by his colleagues when on this side of the house, with reference to the powers, with reference to the rights of parliament that would be affected by the passage of these tremendous powers. I would hope the minister would not limit himself simply to a short general statement such as he has made. I am sure he will want to give the house, not only the answers to the questions that have been asked and will be asked in the course of this discussion but he will want also to justify the attitude of the government in the light of the position they took when they were on this side of the house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, we in this group have taken the position, since the war that a transport controller was needed for the efficient movement and allocation of box cars amongst elevator points on the prairies. However it seems to me the attitude taken by the government in presenting this resolution at this time is a very strange one. The Conservative party over the years objected to the former Liberal government being given wide, all-inclusive powers. The former minister of trade and commerce, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, was castigated and criticized for having very wide powers which he could use at his discretion. It would seem to me that the Conservative party is not in a suitable role in presenting this motion, in the light of its traditions and in the light of its actions in this house for many years.

The Conservative party has always objected to wide powers being taken by the government under particular circumstances. We in this group have always been prepared to look at any given case on its merits. If we have felt that wide powers were necessary, we were quite prepared to grant them. I believe, and now I am talking from the standpoint of the Conservative party's record, that in presenting this resolution at this time they are on very weak ground. I say they are on weak ground because of the answer just given by the Minister of Transport. It is one thing to say we want wide powers when there is a specific job to do that requires wide powers. It is another thing to say to this house, we want wide powers on a speculative basis to take care of some undisclosed, unstated emergency which might arise at some time in the future.

I should like to see the hon. member for Greenwood take a good look at this resolution, and try to judge for himself whether or not it is a wise thing for the government to ask for such broad powers for undisclosed and unstated purposes. There may be a need for such powers. As a matter of fact, I think there is a need for such powers. I do not feel I am being inconsistent. I should like to see a member of the government stand up and tell us what they are going to do with these powers, then let us judge the necessity for them on the basis of the proposed action. I do not think it is good enough for the minister to say, we want these powers and we may or may not use them. I ask the minister whether these powers might be connected with the Bracken commission inquiry into box car allocations. I see him shaking his head in the negative. I cannot conceive of anything else they might have to do with. I am quite prepared to stand corrected, but as the former minister of transport well knows and as the present minister knows, this act has been used exclusively or almost exclusively in connection with the movement of grain. I believe that little, if any, of the power has been used in connection with the other commodities named.

I cannot see why, therefore, the government should want these powers unless it contemplates using the powers. I cannot conceive of any use to which the powers might be put other than as a result of the report that Mr. John Bracken may be making at some future date. The government has told us of the very heavy agenda that faces parliament at this time. The speech from the throne indicated there might be a great deal of work for this session. We have asked the Prime Minister what action might be taken on Dr. Clark's report, which might lead to an increase in pensions paid to elderly people. His answer was that there was an abundance of work for this session. He did not feel for this reason that parliament should be asked to deal with any such report during this session. Yet we have a minister presenting a resolution at this time and saying he does not know to what use the powers might be put. He wants these powers for two years, but he does not know for what purpose. He just wants to have them around. This sounds worse than C. D. Howe used to sound when he wanted powers. Usually, he wanted them for a purpose, and very often a laudable purpose. The present Minister of Transport just wants to have authority. He does not know if he is going to have a transport controller or a deputy controller, and he does not know whether any power will be used. But, even in peacetime, he wants to have power and I ask him, for what purpose?

Mr. McCleave: Are you in favour of him having it?

Mr. Argue: If he will do what I want him to do with it, and if he will use it in the way I should like him to use it, yes. Certainly, there is a need for it. When I asked him what the purpose was he did not say there would be a necessity for exercising such powers in connection with the distribution of box cars for the movement of grain. His answer was that he did not think it had anything to do with the Bracken royal commission. The producers on the prairie are as dissatisfied with the distribution of box cars under this administration as they were under the other administration in recent years. Producers are concerned that the allocation of box cars is forcing them to deliver grain to elevators that they did not choose. They are asking that this power be used to provide a fair and equitable system of box car allocation.

The grain producers of the prairies, through their main farm organizations, are in favour of a transport controller being appointed and they are in favour of the transport controller using his power to allocate box cars in order to allow farmers to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice. There are few other groups in this country which are forced by circumstances to do business with firms with which they do not wish to do business. The grain producer—and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources knows this very well—has little or no choice because of economic circumstances. A few box cars are dropped off at elevator A and the farmers all line up in front of elevator A to deliver their grain because they are badly in need of money at that time.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): You will admit that we are doing something about it.

Mr. Argue: No more than the other government did. As a matter of fact, I have some figures to show that you are just about a tie. As a matter of fact, up until June 9 you are just a little worse than the other government.

Mr. Chevrier: I get some consolation out of that statement.

Mr. Argue: Of course, things are now improving slightly. In fairness, I must point that out. Farmers marketings from August 1, 1956 to June 5, 1957 in the prairie provinces totalled 442 million bushels. In a similar period of time under the present administration, from August 1, 1957 to June 4, 1958, farmers' marketings were 396.1 million bushels. Hence the present government has a policy—or has not a policy, whichever way you want to look at it—which has had the result that during this period of time producers in the prairie provinces have marketed 46 million bushels less grain than they marketed under the previous administration. So when the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources says that things are improving may I suggest that those figures do not seem to bear out that suggestion. It is true that at the present time there is an improved movement of grain. It is correct to say that box cars are going out on the prairies in sizeable quantity and that there is an improved marketing of grain at this time. I do not know whether or not the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources would wish to hazard a guess whether farmers' marketings during the present crop year will exceed those of the last crop year. They have quite a long distance to go in order to do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The main thing is that we have sold more abroad.

Mr. Argue: That is only part of it. The main thing is for the farmer to have an income; and the only way in which he can have an income is to deliver grain. Hence on the basis of farm deliveries the position is just a little worse this year than it was last year. The minister says they are selling more. That is true as far as wheat is concerned. It is not true as far as barley is concerned and it is not true as far as flax is concerned. However, it is true as far as wheat is concerned. There is a noticeable improvement there.

It has been my pleasure in this house in previous years to sponsor a bill setting forth a precise formula for box car distribution amongst various marketing points. I have promoted the proposition that once a year farmers should be able to indicate, by way of a ballot, the elevator to which they wish to deliver their grain; and that after having so indicated their choice, box cars in the subsequent crop year should be allocated amongst elevator companies in accordance with the farmers' wishes. As far as I know, that was the first enunciation of such a policy. I am pleased that farm organizations in general now have supported my proposal and have presented it to the Bracken royal commission. I am hopeful that the royal commission may make such a recommendation. If it does so, this legislation can have some sense and some practical application.

There is another method by which equity could be advanced. That method would be by the payment to farmers of storage for grain stored on their farms. If the government did that the farmers themselves would be able to deliver grain almost any time throughout the crop year with less compulsion because of economic circumstances. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources says that this government is doing better than the previous government did.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): A lot better.

Mr. Argue: "A lot better", the minister says. I do not think there is much difference. With great respect to the minister, I do not think that the results in Manitoba would indicate that the people out there are very happy about what has happened since March 31st.

Mr. McGee: They are voting in a provincial election.

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend says they are voting in a provincial election. Where were all the Manitoba Liberal members of parliament during the last few weeks?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Where were you?

Mr. Argue: I have been so accustomed for so many years to saying that about the Liberal party that I have used the wrong terminology. But what was done so unsuccessfully in the past by Liberals has been copied by the Conservative members with about the same degree of success. The great majority of Conservative members for Manitoba were not here in the last few weeks in this house. They were out in Manitoba explaining the federal government's policy, no doubt; and they have explained the policy so badly and the farmers are so greatly opposed to what the government is doing, that even though the Conservative party was able to get 100 per cent of the seats on March 31, they are down to less than 50 per cent in yesterday's election.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMPANIES IN DEFAULT ON RETURNS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-14, to amend the Companies Act (annual returns).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am going to take a rather unusual course on this bill so I want to explain just how I came to get interested in it. In the last house, in following up some of the dealings of the former member for Port Arthur, I was checking up on a private holding company he happened to have because I was interested in discovering what relationship a certain very high civil servant had with this private company of the minister. I discovered that in the last year or two, though that company should have submitted a report to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche), no report had been submitted, and so I had to work on ancient information. Thus I submitted a question on the orders of the day to determine how many corporations were in default, in the years indicated, with regard to information summaries under section 125 of the Companies Act, and I discovered that there was a total in 1957 of 287 public companies and 893 private companies which were in default.

If any hon. members look up the penalty provided under that section they will find it is substantial. I wanted to know how many prosecutions had been laid against those companies in default and I was informed that there had never been any prosecutions. Fortunately I was never exposed to legal training, and this led me to ask the question: why have something in the law which provides a penalty which no one ever bothers to exercise? And so I felt the thing to do to clear up this situation of having 1,800 companies in default—in a sense, defying the law and yet the law not prosecuting them—was to abolish the whole matter, and so I went ahead with this amendment to the Companies Act. The first purpose of the amendment is to repeal subsection 4 of section 125 of the act. This is the section which says:

> Where a company makes default in complying with any requirement of this section, it is liable to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars for every day during which the default continues, and every director and officer of the company who knowingly and willfully authorizes or permits the default is liable to the like penalty, and such fines may be recoverable on summary conviction.

After I had put the bill on the order paper I discovered through the Secretary of State —through the officials of that department —that they had already taken steps to clear up this very thing that I was after. Through the courtesy of the minister I was able to spend a considerable time examining the set-up of the Companies Act agency and just how the provisions of the act were carried out. It is a minor matter, and I am quite willing to concede it.

I am very pleased to hear that the Secretary of State was under way in his move to check up on this particular point before my bill was on the order paper, and because the minister is now in the house and prepared to make a statement on the steps which have been taken I should like at this present time to yield the floor to the Secertary of State and have him make his statement with regard to this particular matter.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the first purpose of this amendment is to repeal subsection 4 of section 125 of the Companies Act. This section applies to companies with share capital. The subsection to be repealed, at present reads as follows:

> Where a company makes default in complying with any requirement of this section, it is liable to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars for every day during which the default continues, and every director and officer of the company who knowingly and willfully authorizes or permits the default is liable to the like penalty, and such fines may be recoverable on summary conviction.

The second purpose of the amendment is to ensure, by the proposed new subsection 4, that parliament is informed each year of any company which fails to file an annual summary in proper form with the Secretary of State. I think I should outline the reasons why the bill should not be enacted.

Even though no prosecutions were ever undertaken under subsection 4, nevertheless its very presence in the statute has a salutary effect. If circumstances arose where a company deliberately refused to file a return no effective means would be available to the department to enforce compliance by threat of prosecution or to have a penalty imposed by means of a prosecution if the subsection were repealed.

Furthermore, the presence of subsection 4 creates an offence for which an aggrieved party could launch a private prosecution, a right which would no longer be available if the subsection were repealed. There are approximately 12,000 companies which file the returns each year. These returns are required to be filed on or before June 1st in each year. In each year, there are approximately 1,500 companies which do not file by June 1 for a variety of reasons, such as the absence of a signing officer, oversight or a psychological abhorrence of business people to file government returns. The returns arrive in the department in a deluge from the middle of May to the middle of June each year and the departmental staff is busily engaged in processing the returns received. This processing takes approximately three months.

The primary purpose of the return is to have the information respecting the companies. Therefore, when the bulk of the returns received is disposed of, the department sends out a notice addressed to all companies in default. There is no statutory requirement for this notice being mailed, but it is a practice taken to follow up on defaulting companies. This notice usually results in about 1,300 of the 1,500 defaulting companies filing the returns, leaving about 200 companies each year.

When these companies are in default to file returns for three consecutive years, subsection 9 of section 125 requires the Secretary of State to give notice, by registered letter addressed to the company or its president as shown by the last summary filed; that is, should the Secretary of State desire to apply to the company the sanction provided by subsections 9 and 10. By subsection 9 the company is required to prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State that it is still a subsisting company.

Under subsection 10 if, at the end of one month from the date of such notice the Secretary of State has not received a response from the company or its president, the company may be deemed not to be a subsisting corporation and no longer entitled to the sole use of its corporate name.

The registered notices mentioned in subsection 9 do not result in many of the defaulting companies submitting returns. These companies were incorporated by the applicants with high hopes which did not materialize, and they simply give up. The directors all resign, and there are no funds or assets in the company.

In a recent judgment of the court of appeal in the province of Quebec, in the Acme Vacuum case, it was held that even though a company does not file returns for three consecutive years and does not respond to the registered notice sent under subsection 9 the company does not lose its corporate status or the right to the sole use of its name, unless so deemed.

As a consequence of this decision the department now waits for 30 days for a reply to the notice. If no reply is received, a further 30 day period is allowed to elapse and then a further notice is sent to the company deeming it not to be a subsisting corporation.

The practice of sending this further notice was inaugurated in 1955, following the decision of the Quebec appeal court in the Acme Vacuum case reported in (1953) Queen's Bench 188, and 19 Canadian Practice Reports 45, and has not resulted in more than six companies establishing that they are subsisting and filing annual summaries in arrears.

I quite agree that in addition to the deterrent effect of subsection 4 it should be enforced where circumstances warrant a prosecution. Therefore, steps have been taken by the officers of the department to compile a list of companies in default. A list of the companies —212 in number—in default to file summaries for the periods ending March 31, 1956 and 1957, together with a list of their directors, has been prepared. Notices are now being sent to these companies and their directors, together with arrival receipt cards pointing out the provisions of subsection (4). The reason that directors are being notified is to acquaint them with a knowledge of their obligations and because for a prosecution against a director to be successful he must have "knowingly and wilfully" authorized or permitted the default.

A further list of companies in default to file a summary for the period ending March 31, 1957 is also completed, together with the directors. This list contains the names of 350 companies. Notices are also being sent to these companies and their directors. Depending on the nature of the replies to be received investigation will be undertaken in co-operation with the officers of the department, the R.C.M.P. and the officers of the Department of Justice to ascertain the possibility of successful prosecutions. If the results of such investigation disclose that the companies are in fact carrying on business and that a prosecution would not prove abortive, such prosecutions will be undertaken.

I should also add that information is available in the department to any person who inquiries as to any specific company. The tariff of fees, as prescribed by P.C. 1954-1922 as amended by P.C. 1955-51 passed under section 141 of the Companies Act, contains an item—"Searches—each $1.00." There is another item entitled "Searches—within such categories as may be exempted by order of the Secretary of State—no fee". I can assure the house, through you, Mr. Speaker, that I am quite prepared to consider ordering that any inquiry by a member of parliament as to whether one or more specified companies have filed their annual summaries under section 125 in specified years be exempted under this item.

However, a list has not been prepared listing all companies in default to file annual summaries since confederation and those companies incorporated before 1867, which are subject to the Companies Act—although information is available with respect to each such company—because such would be a prodigious task at this late date.

Incidentally, if the bill were to be enacted it would necessitate other amendments to the Companies Act; for example, subsection (7) of section 125 would have to be repealed. Furthermore, as the proposed new subsection (4) would call for the names and addresses of "managers" and "officers", subsection (1) paragraph (r) of section 125 would have to be amended to require disclosure of this information in the annual summary.

Representations have been received from members of the legal profession expressing the view that "the suggested report to parliament does not seem to have much merit, particularly if the penal clause is eliminated." It is also represented that the tabling in parliament of such lists would result in an unnecessary cluttering of parliament's records, bearing in mind that most companies actively carrying on their business do in fact file their returns and that the companies that are in default are largely inactive companies whose affairs would be of very little interest to more than a few people, and also that many companies use the non-filing of returns as a means of letting a company die and there is no improper intent in this, so far as the shareholders are concerned. I have already outlined the procedure following in the department under subsection (9) and (10) of section 125 with respect to defaulting companies, more particularly those that presumably are inactive and may be deemed to be no longer existing.

However, should there appear from this debate to be a general demand in the house for this, I would be glad to consider including a list of defaulting companies in the annual report of my department which is tabled in parliament. The report of the department for the year 1958-1959 for instance could list the companies which defaulted in 1958 and were still in default on March 31, 1959.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, in view of the information that has just been given by the Secretary of State I would ask for leave with the unanimous consent of the house to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The mover of this motion has proposed that with unanimous consent of the house the motion and bill be severally withdrawn. Is it the pleasure of the house to permit the motion and bill to be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

EXTENSION OF RIGHT TO VOTE AT ADVANCE POLLS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-15, to amend the Canada Elections Act (voting at advance polls).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, this is not a strange bill to any hon. member who has been in the house in previous sessions or who is a veteran of this place. The last discussion on a bill similar in content to this took place on January 3, 1958. The subject matter of this bill is something that was a favourite of the former hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Knowles. The idea of it, of course, is very simple although the actual changes it entails are quite complex.

The purpose of the bill is to provide the opportunity to vote at an advance poll to any citizen of Canada who believes he is not going to be at his own poll on the ordinary polling day. The main reason for the development of advance poll provisions stems from the very great changes that have taken place in the social structure of our society. As many hon. members know, originally election day varied throughout Canada. It was not until the eighties that a consistent election day applicable throughout the country was established. We then had a long struggle to bring in advance poll provisions for people who would not be in their own constituencies on election day. Finally in 1920 provision was made for certain categories of workers including railway employees and fishermen.

Since 1920 there have been even more changes in our social setup. There has been a tremendous acceleration in the shift of population from rural to urban areas. People are engaged in travel to a greater extent and there are many more businessmen on the road. There is an increased tendency for people to plan vacations in advance, sometimes even months ahead. A general election can be called at any time because it is the prerogative of the Prime Minister to call a general election and frequently people are away at election time. There has been a vast increase in construction and bush work and various kinds of employment which takes people away from home. There is no adequate provision for the change that has occurred in our social organization.

The advance polls we have at the present time are set up to operate on the three days before the Sunday and Monday of the actual polling day. The intent of this bill is to set the advance polling date earlier which would involve moving back the nomination day from two to three weeks.

Perhaps that is one of the criticisms that could be made of the bill from, let us say, the point of view of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), because the Prime Minister's freedom of action in choosing the election date of course becomes circumscribed the more complicated the election act gets. If you move the nomination day farther back from the actual election day you limit the choice and the freedom of time in setting up the election.

One of the other weaknesses of setting up advance polls is something we have to consider and that is the straight question of costs. A number of the provinces have gone into the provision of advance polls much more liberally than we have done in federal elections, and they have discovered that it is a fairly expensive business in terms of the number of votes that are actually cast. Any enthusiast of advance polls who looks at the election results in the Ontario general election of 1955 will quickly realize that the response to the advance poll provision was not as great as had been expected. No matter what provision you make it will be an infinitesimal part of the population which will vote at advance polls.

I am not deliberately trying to destroy the merit of this bill; I think the merit still exists. I am trying to anticipate the usual arguments.

When the former member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced his bill he made the point very clearly in relation to an election broadside that was put out by the first commoner of this house before the last general election. This broadside made the point that it was the Liberal government that was responsible for restricting the advance poll to such limited categories of people, and I think that argument is the one to keep to the fore, along with the fact that if the vote is a privilege that we have, every effort should be made to see that the privilege can be seized and taken advantage of.

I think that after the bill receives second reading it should be referred to the committee on privileges and elections and some sort of study should be made of how the provincial schemes are working and their costs before the bill is brought back from the committee for any further action.

There is little more that I wish to say. There is not much time left for any discussion of the bill, but I hope that members who do speak will stick to the point of whether the advance poll provision is a sound one from, let us say, the theoretical point of view and that we will not find them rambling off in the byways as we have had them do on certain other occasions when those private bills, especially those in connection with the elections act, and using this time as an opportunity for slanderous comment upon other parties who happen to have been involved in elections at various times.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time within a week that I have followed the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) in replying to a bill which he has proposed. I wish to assure him that this time I am going to agree with him in principle. At the outset may I say I think it is quite clear that the present provisions for voting at advance polls are quite inadequate. I am definitely in favour of enlarging the provisions for voting at advance polls and I am in favour of the bill in principle, subject to one or two minor things which the hon. member himself has anticipated. Firstly, I think there should be no limit on the reason which must be advanced for a person to vote at an advance poll. At the present moment the person voting must have as a reason that he is going to be away on duty. That is a very disappointing reason to a good many people who go to advance polls in the hope of voting. If you want to find a reason you can always dream one up. In various instances, if the persons qualify to vote they do not have any trouble in finding the correct reason for doing so.

I also think there should be no limitation on the class of persons who are entitled to vote at an advance poll. When you try to limit the class of people you get into difficulties. One of the best examples I have heard of in recent times is that of a commercial traveller. At least he thought he was a commercial traveller until he went to vote. He was the purchasing agent for a large manufacturing company. He spends a good deal of his time on the road. He learned that commercial travellers were entitled to vote at advance polls, and so he presented himself to vote. When he presented himself there happened to be a rather sharp returning officer on hand who read to him the section about commercial travellers and it is set out in the explanatory note of the bill, and reads as follows:

> 'Commercial traveller' means a person employed on salary or on commission by a manufacturer or wholesale merchant to travel from place to place selling goods to or taking orders for goods from, jobbers and retailers.

Of course, the act quite clearly states that he has to be selling goods, and this chap to whom I refer did not qualify as a commercial traveller and was not permitted to vote. This is the sort of thing you run into when you try to limit the number or the class of persons who may vote. Undoubtedly, when the act was first passed a commercial traveller was a person who went about the country selling for a wholesale establishment, but in the meantime the customs of the business world have changed to the point where there are now a good many people on the road who are commercial travellers and who try to do a selective job in purchasing for the company which they represent. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we should not try to limit the number or class of people who are to vote.

We have had many examples quoted in the house from time to time of people who ought to qualify and who are just slightly outside the strict group which has been laid down by the act. We all know of many people who have presented themselves at advance polls from time to time in the hope that they would be able to vote but because the act is so restrictive they found that they did not come within the proper class of people or that they were disqualified for some other reason such as not being away on duty.

I believe that the qualification to vote at advance polls should be as set out in this bill, namely substantially any person whose name appears on the list and who reasonably believes that he will not be present on election day. There is not much point in enlarging the class without opening up the act for all persons.

There is the other point the hon. member mentioned in connection with the time of holding an advance poll. Ten days before an election is a long time. Actually, a good many of the political parties and candidates set out at the beginning of an election to bring on a campaign. If they happen to be assisted by a high class advertising group, or by a person who is interested in and accustomed to selling goods and services or electoral candidates to the public, the campaign is started off on a slow basis and worked up to a climax a few days before election day.

A good many of the important and major speeches by party candidates, a good many of the ideas and matters that candidates want to bring forward, are left until a few days or a week before the actual voting day. A person who wants to vote at an advance poll has not received the benefit, if it can be called such, of campaign literature which he might otherwise have benefited from. Mind you, he may not even appreciate it. He may be the type of voter who would much prefer to make up his own mind a month before he votes, but regardless of that he has not been made acquainted with all the issues that the candidates wish to place before him.

I feel that ten days prior to voting day is quite a long time before voting day for advance polls and that the person who would vote at such an advance poll would not vote with the same knowledge and facts in his mind as a person who would go to the polls ten days later. That is one difficulty. I believe I understand the reason for the ten day period. In the first place, if we are going to open up the provision with respect to voting at advance polls to every person who is going to be away for any good and valid reason we are going to have a larger number of people voting at advance polls and if such polls are held on the Thursday, Friday and Saturday before election day as is the case now I can foresee that it will be practically impossible for returning officers to get proper lists of those who have already voted to the different polls.

These difficulties are certainly great. I have no doubt that even under the present system there is difficulty in that some person who wants to vote twice and thus break the regulations of the elections act can still do so. I perceive that there are two different situations so far as urban and rural polls are concerned. In the case of urban polls the difficulty under present conditions is the lack of ability to identify voters. On the other hand, it is safe to say that in a small rural poll of 50 to 150 people the deputy returning officer will know every person who presents himself to vote or if he does not the poll clerk or one of the scrutineers will. This is certainly not true in the case of the larger urban polls where no one may be aware of the actual identity of the person and it is very easy for a person to misrepresent himself.

But I do not think this difficulty is sufficient to justify advancing the date for advance polls. A person can now come along with identification, not be the person he claims to be and vote, thus contravening the elections act.

There is another difficulty in the case of rural polls. There the difficulty does not concern identification but the distribution of lists of persons who have already voted. In the case of rural polls there are great distances to be covered. With respect to urban polls, it is a very simple matter geographically for the returning officer to distribute lists of persons who have voted by going from one place to another in a reasonably short space of time. It is next to impossible to do so in the case of the larger rural polls where the polling subdivisions are often many hundreds of miles apart.

In the result, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the principle of the bill that we should enlarge the provisions for voting. We should enlarge the group who are entitled to vote at advance polls. I would be inclined to leave the time of voting as it is now. Let it be proved by trial and error whether it is satisfactory. I think it has been found that there are not too many who actually vote at advance polls. Granted that the number will increase when more are entitled, nevertheless I would not anticipate the terrific influx of people wanting to vote at advance polls that might be expected by some. If the act is to be amended I think it would be sufficient for the moment at least to enlarge the eligible group and leave the time of voting as it now exists.

Canada Elections Act

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to spend much time dealing with this bill. The very thoughtful speech of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) covered some of the major objections to it. I think, however, that we should direct our attention for a moment to the principle of the bill and what its objectives are. When the former member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced this bill in the last session of parliament he dealt with the principle in these words, as recorded on page 2807 of Hansard of January 3, 1958:

> It seems to me that we should take a new look at this question; that we should be thoroughly consistent with our belief that the right to vote is a privilege which belongs to every one of our citizens. If, then, the right to vote is a privilege, I submit that we have no right to take that privilege away from any one of our citizens if, for example, he has to be away from home because he is on vacation.

On that same page he went on to say:

> Either a citizen has the right to vote or he does not have that right and if he has it it seems to me that our elections act should safeguard it in every possible way.

Then he went on to refer to the provisions of the present act with respect to the entitlement of armed forces personnel to vote. Then he came back to his theme, the principle of allowing every person to vote who has the right to vote, and said:

> Furthermore that vote should not be taken away from him because the election happens to fall at a time when he has to be away, whether it be on some kind of business not covered by the act or whether it be because he is on a holiday.

It seems to me that the bill introduced today does not meet the very principle enunciated by the original author of the bill. It seems to me that the original intention of those who are in agreement with the proposition that all people who have the right to vote should have the opportunity to vote would embody something more than just extending the qualifications respecting people who can vote at advance polls.

For example, there are many people who would not fall within the classification of those who could vote under the act as it would be amended by the bill before us. There are many Canadian citizens who would otherwise have the right, and should be given the right, to vote who may be in hospital with chronic ailments or people who may be temporarily out of the country at the time these advance polls were to take place. This bill does not deal with that situation at all. I mention the problem here because it seems to me that some provision should be made if we are to amend the elections act to provide for absentee voting, to provide for those who have the right to vote but who cannot attend an advance poll.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Now, in my practice of law I had the opportunity on one occasion of assisting a lady from Texas to vote in the United States elections. She came to the office with a number of forms of various sorts and sizes, and as a result of going through these forms before a notary she was able to vote in the presidental elections which were taking place in the United States, and to have that vote cast in Canada. It seems to me that is a provision which we should at least consider before passing this bill.

The point I have raised here I submit is one that we have to consider when we are considering not only this bill but the several other bills which are on the order paper purporting to amend piecemeal the elections act. I notice, for example, on today's order paper there is Bill No. C-15 with regard to advance polls; Bill No. C-18, concerning election expenses; Bill No. C-19 concerning the publication of straw poll results. There is a further bill, No. C-23, to amend the act with regard to absentee voting, and Bill No. C-8 which is to amend the Canada Elections Act. This seems to me to be a very piecemeal approach to the whole problem of correcting our elections act.

Mr. Winch: How else can a private member do it?

Mr. Jones: It seems to me the proper way to do this, and I earnestly urge the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) to take this into consideration, is to open the whole act for revision. At that time the very many matters which should receive consideration could be discussed. I think the whole problem of ensuring that Canadians have the right and the opportunity of casting their ballot should be thoroughly investigated. Perhaps at that time we could have the benefit of the experience of those who are well informed on the procedures used in the United Kingdom and in the United States, with a view to making our own act more inclusive. I earnestly hope such consideration could be given by the committee on privileges and elections well in advance of another election. It seems to me that proceeding as we are, with five different bills each attacking one portion of this Canada Elections Act, is not going to serve a really useful purpose. The purpose could best be served, I feel, by having a general revision of the act when the various arguments could be dealt with in the committee on privileges and elections.

In his introductory remarks in connection with this piece of legislation, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) mentioned that the cost of such an amendment should be studied. I certainly agree with him in that, although I do suggest that we should be very careful not to allow the question of cost to affect our decision on the sort of amendments that should be made because the right to vote is a very sacred right, as all parties agree, and has been won at enormous cost and sacrifice over the years.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, in view of the privilege we in Canada enjoy as the result of the efforts of our forefathers in obtaining the right to the vote we should attack this serious problem in a serious manner, and in a way in which we can effectively deal with the various points that do need to be considered. I noticed, too, in the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur there was reference to a new problem which arises in connection with construction workers. This problem may be expected under the development program which is the policy of this government, and may be expected to increase. I am sure the hon. member will be happy to look forward to that increase.

There is a real problem in that connection because, as was pointed out in the debate last year, the problem certainly obtains in my own constituency. People work on projects at some distance from the place where they live. Often they have to rise long before the polls open and return to their homes after the polls have closed. The same situation applies to advance polls. This bill would not provide the solution for these people who rise before the opening of the advance poll, go to their place of work and return after the advance polls have closed.

Mr. Broome: After 10 o'clock?

Mr. Jones: Yes.

Mr. Broome: They would be working 20 hours a day.

Mr. Jones: I can tell you that in Saskatchewan, for example, there are many people working on projects which are 80 to 90 miles away. Some of these people are away from the constituency for several days at a time; they go to trailer camps and so on to fulfil their duties. I feel that in this connection the bill does not meet what we, on every side of this house, wish to see done and that is that every Canadian who is entitled to vote shall have a reasonable opportunity to cast his ballot on election day.

Mr. B. C. Thompson (Northumberland): Mr Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on this bill. I consider the amendment to be a very important one because it deals with the time during which votes may be cast. It deals also with the exercise of our franchise which is one of the most precious privileges we have today.

In so far as this particular bill is concerned, there are one or two questionable features about the principle of extending the advance poll in the manner in which this bill advocates. One questionable feature, as I see it, is the fact that by giving to everyone who believes that he or she may be absent from the riding on polling day permission to use the advance poll in effect we create three voting days rather than just one. The bill makes provision for anyone who believes that he will be away; and the fact is that it is not essential that that person in fact be away on the ordinary polling day; all that is necessary that he believes at the time he makes the affidavit that he is going to be away. It therefore leaves it open to anyone to make use of the advance poll and in effect there are created three general polling days rather than one.

The difficulty with that suggestion, as I see it, is that you have two different forms of procedure, one on an advance polling day and one on the general polling day. On a general polling day the poll clerk in the poll has a poll book in which he records the names and particulars of each individual who votes. On the advance polling day no poll book is used. The affidavits of the people who vote are kept by the poll clerk. Therefore in effect you have two different procedures used on the two different days. You have the voters on one day being treated in a different way from that in which voters are treated on the other day. They are not subject to the same procedure. It seems to me that if we want to provide for people who may be away, possibly we should just have three general polling days rather than two advance polling days and an ordinary voting day, in this way giving everybody the benefit of the same procedure during the election.

Those are just two points that I raise for the consideration of the house. I think the principle of this bill is very desirable. I do not think there is any member in the house who has not had the experience on advance polling day of people coming to him who are going to be away; they may be going away on a trip or going away on holidays and they say, "Can I use the advance poll? Can I vote at the advance poll on advance polling day?" Of course the answer is no; and it is difficult for them to understand why they cannot do so. I think every hon. member has had that experience.

Another difficulty in connection with the present act and the way in which it is worded at the present time is that in some cases it is difficult to interpret and you have a ruckus, a disagreement or an argument at the polling booth as to whether or not a person is entitled to use the advance poll. For that reason I think there is room for improvement in the present act.

The purpose of the elections act is to allow as many people as possible to exercise their franchise. We want as many people as possible to have the right to vote. In spite of the people who are on holidays, who may be ill or who may be working at some occupation other than those stipulated in the present act, in my riding a large percentage of the voters vote; the percentage is in the eighties. I think that speaks very well for the people of my riding, for the interest they take in elections and in the exercise of their franchise.

The present section came into force, as I believe the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) stated, in 1920. Since that time many changes have taken place. It is much more customary now for people to go away on holidays; more people go away. It is also customary for them to stay away longer. This does not apply to any particular time of the year; it applies at all times of the year. As changes take place with the lapse of time it is necessary to bring our laws up to date. As to the principle of extending the right to use the advance poll to some people, I think it is a worth-while one.

Mr. Fisher: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: Is the hon. member aware that on second reading approval is given in principle? Since he approves in principle, if he does not sit down and allow the question to be put to a vote we shall not have this bill approved in principle; and he has already indicated that he approves.

Mr. Thompson: If the hon. member would allow me to finish what I have to say, maybe we can bring the matter to a vote. I have one other observation I want to make. It has to do with the cost. At the present time we have advance polls. We are faced with this extra expense and we have very few people who are able to take advantage of them. For a little extra cost we could give a greater number of people the same advantage. Actually the cost factor would not make much difference. We could do it without much additional cost. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I support the principle of this bill but there are some provisions of it which I cannot support, and I should like to deal briefly with them.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Thompson.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said:

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply sensible of the privilege of presenting this Canadian budget for the year 1958. I approach this task tonight in a spirit of deep humility and dedication in recalling, as did some of those who have preceded me in delivering their first budget speech, that this honour has fallen in times past to the lot of some very great Canadians. The task has been filled with challenge.

There is much that is associated with the annual budget which is traditional. I have the healthiest respect for sound tradition, and I have, I hope, in the preparation and presentation of the budget faithfully followed the best traditions of our parliamentary practice. There is one practice associated with the presentation of the budget in the Canadian parliament, however, which I shall not describe as a tradition, from which, if hon. members will bear with my acknowledged limitations, I intend deliberately to depart tonight.

A careful review of all the budget speeches delivered in the Canadian parliament since confederation has disclosed that in no case has any portion of the budget speech ever been delivered in the French tongue. It is surprising to me that in a parliament with two official languages enjoying complete equality every part of the budget speech has always been delivered in English. It is true that on three occasions, December 7, 1867, April 28, 1868, and May 7, 1869 respect was shown for the rights of the French language. These were the days before the Hansard report of the debates of the house, but the scrapbooks on the proceedings in the house in the early days after confederation are available in the library of parliament. They indicate that on these three occasions following the budget presentation in English by the Hon. John Rose, Sir Georges Etienne Cartier followed in French with an explanation or abstract of the statements of the minister of finance.

At the outset I should like to acknowledge with deep gratitude my indebtedness to the officials of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue for the service that they have rendered in the preparation of this budget as well as in the performance of their other duties. They have demonstrated an exemplary devotion to public duty and have worthily maintained the highest traditions of the Canadian public service.

I must mention one in particular. I know it is a matter of regret on the part of all hon. members that Dr. A. Kenneth Eaton, assistant deputy minister and director of the tax division of the Department of Finance is retiring from the public service on July 15th. Dr. Eaton has played a very important role in the preparation of every Canadian budget in the last quarter of a century. He has achieved an international reputation as an expert in public finance and taxation. Many of the sound and enduring features of the Canadian tax system are the result of his expert knowledge and advice. For my own part, I should like to record my appreciation to Dr. Eaton for his willingness to continue beyond the intended date of his retirement to assist me in the completion of this year's budget.

ECONOMIC REVIEW

During the past 18 months Canada shared with most of the rest of the world some slackening in the pace of economic growth. Business activity declined in the United States, and the rate of expansion slowed in western Europe. In Canada unemployment emerged as a serious problem and declining business capital investment as a significant developing tendency. Nevertheless, it would be a mistake to forget that there were solid achievements on the economic side and developments which augur well for the future.

Foremost among the factors which we must keep in mind in reviewing the year 1957 is the record population increase of 552,000, an increase which brought our population at year-end to 16.9 million. About half of this growth was the result of natural increase and about half was due to the exceptionally high level of immigration. Some idea of the economic importance of this great increase can be gained from the fact that there are only three Canadian cities with a population in excess of half a million people. It is as though we had added during 1957 another city almost the size of metropolitan Vancouver, or a new province nearly as populous as New Brunswick.

Population growth of itself does not ensure progress, but in a country such as ours it has a special significance. It provides a greater market for our agricultural produce and for the products of our factories and reduces our vulnerability to changes in external demand. It brings us a greater diversity of talent and the means of employing it to better advantage. It reduces the per capita cost of supplying essential services in this great land. There can be no doubt that the population growth of the post-war period has had these effects.

The second factor which I would mention is that during 1957 Canadians added $7.4 billion in plant, equipment and housing to an already large stock of physical capital while a further $1.4 billion was added by governments to our social capital. From these important increases, the largest in any year in Canadian history, will flow future increments to income and to well-being and national productivity.

There is another factor to which I should like to call attention—the trend in foreign investment and the balance of payments. The great bulk of the large capital investment I have mentioned was matched by Canadian saving, but there were substantial capital inflows and an increase in our foreign indebtedness. This net capital inflow was the other side of our balance of payments deficit which amounted to $1.4 billion, practically unchanged from 1956. But while our deficit on current account was little different for 1957 as a whole than for 1956, there was a marked difference in trend. A substantial part of the deficit in both years arose because of the intensity of our investment boom which led to greatly expanded imports of machinery and equipment from the United States. As the boom lost momentum in the latter part of 1957, these commodity imports declined very rapidly so that a much smaller deficit is indicated for the current year.

It is apparent, therefore, that a number of developments of 1957 can be sources of strength and improvement. We ended the year richer in numbers, in skills and experience, with a larger and more productive stock of capital and consequently somewhat less dependent on foreign markets or sources of supply. These are developments on which we can safely base an abiding faith in our future.

The budget white paper, tabled yesterday, reviews in considerable detail the economic forces in operation through 1957 and early 1958. All I need do this evening is to highlight the main developments as they bear upon the formulation of our budget policies.

The rate of economic growth slowed noticeably during 1957 as the forces which underlay the great surge of 1955 and 1956 spent themselves. For the year as a whole gross national product amounted to $31.4 billion, and was 4 per cent higher than in 1956. However, most of the increase of 4 per cent was due to higher prices. There was a moderate gain of one per cent in the volume of non-agricultural production, but agricultural output declined as a result of the smaller western grain crop.

Some slowdown in economic activity was to be expected after the excessive pace of 1955 and 1956, a pace which was straining our resources of men and materials despite very large borrowing abroad.

The most important change which emerged during 1957 was the decline in the importance of business capital investment as a dynamic force in our economy, particularly investment in our resource industries. A somewhat larger decline in capital investment occurred in the United States. This declining importance of capital expenditure as a stimulus in our economy should be examined in the light of the developments of the last few years. During a great part of the post-war period perhaps the most notable characteristic of the Canadian economy has been the rapid rate of investment and particularly investment in increased capacity in the resource industries. This strong growth factor has been based not only on world demand for many Canadian raw materials but on the rapid growth at home of population and incomes. Following the recession of 1953-54 there was a new period of expansion characterized by rapidly rising demand for basic industrial materials, and this expansion was in evidence throughout the western world. As a result, world capacity in metals, fuels and forest products was enlarged much more rapidly than demand, and Canada, an important source of these materials, experienced the full force of this expansion.

Early in 1957 many commodity markets moved into a position of over-supply. The doubts created by these particular developments began to affect the plans for further expansion. In particular, this began to make itself felt in the resource industries, and as a mood of caution began to develop it spread to other industries. By mid-1957 the value of large capital projects being started began to run behind the value of projects being completed.

These were the developments which have led to an important change in the role of capital expenditure and to the change of emphasis within the capital program.

At the same time, the strongly inflationary conditions and the mood of optimism fostered a very rapid rate of inventory accumulation which placed a further strain on the economy in 1956 but was withdrawn as 1957 progressed. In 1956 capital expenditure rose by 30 per cent and together with increased inventory accumulation accounted for almost one-half the very large increase in total demand. In 1957 there was a much more moderate rise of 9 per cent in capital expenditure. More important was the fact that during 1956 capital expenditure was rising at a rapid rate while in 1957 investment outlays as a whole first levelled out and then declined slightly. The slow-down in the rate of capital investment was accentuated by the inventory liquidation which developed toward the end of the year. This reduction in inventories continued into the first quarter of 1958, which has meant that to some extent the demand for goods is being met out of stocks rather than giving rise to new production.

Although business capital investment ended the year on a weaker note than it had begun, the reverse was true of housing. The expansion of housing investment had come to an end in the middle of 1956 when the keen competition for loan funds resulted in a shortage of mortgage money and brought about a decline in home-building. During 1957, however, the competition for loan funds became less active as the year progressed and, more important, in August and again in December government funds in a total amount of $300 million were made available to augment the loan funds supplied by insurance companies, banks and other private lenders. At the same time new stimulus was given to the demand for housing by reducing down-payments on homes financed under the National Housing Act and by lowering income eligibility requirements.

These measures were the major factor contributing to the sharp rise in house-building during the second half of the year. This improvement has continued into 1958, and for the first four months of the current year housing starts have been about 80 per cent higher than they were for the same period in 1957.

Consumer expenditure was an important sustaining force in 1957, and at the end of 1957 was running about 4 per cent higher than a year earlier. Expenditure on durable goods, however, showed practically no increase over the previous year, reflecting in part the slower growth of incomes but also the rapid expansion in 1955 and 1956 which was based upon large increases in consumer credit.

Government expenditures contributed to the maintenance of economic activity. At all three levels of government they rose by almost seven per cent despite some decline in defence expenditures. Transfer payments especially rose rapidly and for the latter half of the year they were an important element in sustaining and increasing personal income and consumer demand. The largest elements in this increase were the greatly increased payments from the unemployment insurance fund, larger payments to the aged, the blind and the disabled, larger veterans allowances and pensions and increased family allowances.

Export trade, which is so important to the livelihood of so many of our people, was well maintained in 1957. There was some weakening in the demand for forest products and base metals, but there were other products which made noteworthy gains. For the year as a whole, exports were 1½ per cent higher than in 1956. Uranium exports were three times as large as in 1956, and petroleum exports rose by one-third. Our exports of iron and steel, nickel, and beef cattle were substantially higher. Wheat sales although lower for the year as a whole began to pick up in the last quarter and since December they have forged ahead on a year-to-year comparison.

I have reviewed the main changes in the strength of the underlying economic forces during 1957. The reduction of the pressures and demands which characterized 1956 led to a mood of greater caution with regard to new capital ventures and was reflected in a declining rate of increase in job opportunities. Despite these conditions, there were more people at work in each month of 1957 than in the comparable month a year earlier. The increases over the preceding year became smaller as the year progressed and in January, February and March of 1958 employment was slightly lower than a year earlier. However, by April 1958 employment was again higher than a year earlier. For 1957 as a whole the number of people with jobs averaged 135,000 or 2.4 per cent higher than in 1956, an increase which compares quite well with the increases in employment during 1955 and 1956.

It was something of a coincidence that this period of adjustment should have occurred simultaneously with the largest expansion of the labour force that this country has ever known. The labour force increased by 210,000, about double the average annual rate of the preceding five years. About half of this increase was due to the unusual rate of immigration and the remainder to natural increase and a further rise in the proportion of the population seeking employment. The combination of somewhat less favourable employment opportunities with a rapidly expanding labour force resulted in an increase in unemployment. As employment was higher through 1957 than through 1956, so also was unemployment.

For 1957 as a whole the average number of persons without jobs and seeking work was 254,000, an increase of 75,000 over 1956. As a percentage of the labour force, unemployment in 1957 averaged 4.3 per cent, equalling the rate in 1954. Once again the latest figures are encouraging, showing a rapidly narrowing gap in the percentage of unemployed as compared with a year ago.

From October to December there was a pause in the upward movement in aggregate labour income, although for the year as a whole the rise in labour income amounted to 7½ per cent, but early in 1958 the upward trend in aggregate labour income reasserted itself. The average annual earnings per paid worker rose by four per cent during 1957 although there was a decline in the average hours worked per week.

Despite the much lower grain crop in the west, farm cash income supported by substantial liquidation of inventories declined only slightly in 1957. Returns from livestock and from dairy products were substantially higher.

Corporate profits declined by 11 per cent as costs rose and markets became more competitive. Other investment income, which includes rentals and bond interest, rose by 11 per cent.

As we have seen, the expansion in Canadian income during 1957 was less rapid than in 1956. Nevertheless, the total savings out of current income were almost as high as in 1956 and amounted to about $6 billion. The largest part of the nation's saving arises from funds set aside by business enterprises, either as depreciation allowances or as undistributed profits. In 1957 business saving as a whole was little changed from 1956, accounting for about three-quarters of total saving. Personal saving was down about 5 per cent and accounted for almost one-quarter of total saving.

In 1956, and again in 1957, a substantial part of our investment program was financed from abroad. The deficit on current account in 1957 amounted to $1.4 billion. This deficit was financed to some extent by direct U.S. investment in Canada but sales of securities, as in the previous year, were the major source of external capital. A good part of the rapid rise in imports which took place in 1956 and early 1957 was the result of heavy imports of machinery, equipment and industrial materials connected with our capital program. The importation of these items helped us to escape some of the pressures connected with the high level of domestic investment. The converse of this situation is that the decline in investment in machinery and equipment has fallen to a very considerable extent on imports which have shrunk markedly in the last few months.

To some extent the pressures generated in 1956 did not have their full effect on prices until 1957. Thus, the consumer price index, which began to rise in mid-1956, continued upward until last October, and experienced another short period of increase in the first four months of this year. Wholesale prices, on the other hand, reached a peak in January 1957, declined 1.4 per cent during the succeeding ten months, and have risen again moderately since November. The rise in consumer prices offset about half the increase in average wage rates so that advance in real income during the year was about two per cent.

In the absence of immediate inflationary pressures I would not expect any general increase in prices during the balance of 1958. But this is not something we can take for granted. It is the duty of all groups and classes in our society to ensure that the prospects for a sound recovery are not dimmed by a spiralling of costs or that efforts to stimulate recovery do not lend strength to a new inflation. Inflation remains a very real danger against which we must remain guard.

(Translation):

I have dealt with some of the more significant economic trends which have developed over the past several months—with the declining strength of business capital investment and with the consequences from an employment standpoint of the slackening of demand. The natural economic effects of these tendencies have been softened and reduced by government action on a number of fronts. I have already referred to the large amount of money made available for housing. In addition, in line with the government's intention to proceed with a comprehensive program of national development and at the same time to alleviate current unemployment, a major program of public works is now being implemented. In this connection I indicated to this house last January that our desire for a balanced budget would not take precedence over the necessity to provide jobs for the unemployed.

Additional financial assistance being given to the provinces will enable them to proceed with needed capital improvements in the provincial and municipal fields. Social security benefits have been substantially increased during the past year. Benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act have been expanded. The Unemployment Assistance Act was amended so that the federal government now participates equally with each province in the cost of assistance to those not drawing unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Taxes were lowered. The exemption for children receiving family allowances was raised from $150 to $250 and for other children from $400 to $500. There was as well a reduction in the rate of personal income tax. The special excise tax on automobiles was lowered by one-quarter and small businesses were benefited by an extension of the corporate income bracket subject to the 20 per cent tax rate from $20,000 to $25,000. The total reduction in taxes amounted to $178 million in a full year.

(Text):

Monetary policy also changed in the latter part of 1957. The money supply was expanded rapidly after mid-August, and partly for this reason and partly because of a reduction of demand in certain credit fields, monetary conditions in Canada generally became easier and interest rates declined substantially. Banks have now for some time been in a position to meet all credit-worthy demands for commercial and personal loans. Market rates of interest in almost all categories of borrowing have declined substantially.

The value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar rose to a high of $1.06 in August 1957 and then declined steadily to a low of $1.01 in January 1958. Recently the Canadian dollar has been somewhat stronger and the premium in terms of United States funds has recently been around 3¾ per cent. It is often said that a decline in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar would contribute to the profitability of our export industries and, at the same time, improve the position of those producers who are most exposed to import competition. It is true that some benefits of this sort would accrue to some industries, but at the same time we would lose certain advantages which a strong exchange rate gives us. The weakening of our exchange rate would turn the terms of trade against us and to this extent we would pay more for our imports and receive less for our exports. Prices of imported raw materials, machinery, equipment and tropical foods would tend to rise in Canada. In other words, a change in the external value of the Canadian dollar brings gains to some Canadians and losses for others. The exchange rate is determined by the interplay of forces operating in the exchange market through their effect on the supply of and demand for United States and Canadian dollars. While our exchange fund is used to limit the effect of short-run fluctuations in these forces, we do not attempt to reverse persistent market trends. Indeed, it is doubtful if the exchange fund could be successfully employed for this purpose over any extended period of time.

I can conclude this analysis of our economic situation by saying that there are hopeful signs that we have reached the end of the recent decline. Moreover, the problem has moved more clearly into the domestic field. Although the influence of external demand was important as one of the origins of the current adjustment, the direct effect of the decline in certain basic exports has been less significant than the indirect effects on business capital investment. Now that capacity in a number of industries has overtaken or exceeded current demand it seems obvious that relatively less of our energies will for a time be directed to creating new capital facilities in the business sector. As a result we shall be able to devote more of our energies to filling some of the gaps which have developed over the last few years in housing, in municipal services and in other requirements for social capital in Canada, and in laying the basic foundations for the new period of business expansion which will not be long delayed. The policies of this government are assisting the growth in housing and social capital. The expanded role of social capital is illustrated in the 1958 Outlook for Private and Public Investment published by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Present investment intentions of business for capital outlays in 1958 are about 11 per cent below the 1957 level. Planned outlays for housing, government departments and institutional services on the other hand are 14 per cent higher.

With these factors in mind and with due regard for the resourcefulness of the Canadian people and the determination of this government I have no hesitation in budgeting on the basis of a resumption of the rise in incomes and production. Assuming normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events, I am basing my revenue forecasts on a gross national product of $32 billion, which is about 2 per cent above the level achieved in 1957.

I propose now to review briefly the government's accounts for the fiscal year that ended on March 31. Comprehensive statements of these accounts are contained in the white paper which I tabled yesterday and hon. members will find further details in it. These figures are preliminary and subject to revision.

In my financial statement last December I accepted my predecessor's forecast of revenues for 1957-58 of $5,170 million, which after taking into account the tax reductions I announced then would have resulted in net revenues of $5,144 million. As I was budgeting for expenditures of $5,064 million, a prospective surplus of $80 million was indicated. Although the fiscal year ended some weeks ago the books for the year have not yet been closed and some entries have still to be made. On the basis of the figures in the white paper which I tabled yesterday revenues were $5,047 million, expenditures were $5,086 million and there was a deficit for the year of $39 million.

The decrease in revenues of $97 million below forecast is less than two per cent and reflects the earlier decline in the general level in economic activity which only began to show its effect on revenue collections in the January figures which became available early in February. Expenditures, at $5,086 million, were $21 million or less than one-half of one per cent higher than I had forecast last December.

Each year in addition to the expenditures for government services that are included in the budgetary accounts, the government disburses substantial sums for loans, advances and a variety of other essential purposes. During 1957-58 these disbursements amounted to $571 million, and included $108 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $95 million to the St. Lawrence seaway authority, and $71 million to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. To meet these outlays substantial sums amounting in all to $447 million were available from the repayment of loans, net annuity, insurance and pension account receipts and from other non-budgetary sources. Details of these will be found in the white paper.

It has been possible to finance this budgetary deficit of $39 million and the net amount of $124 million required to cover the excess of disbursements over receipts in our non-budgetary operations, without any net increase in the government's outstanding unmatured debt, by reducing our cash balances by $163 million.

Our public debt operations during 1957-58 included the redemption and refinancing of a very large volume of government securities. Net sales of Canada savings bond series 12 amounted to $1,177 million and other new securities amounting to $1,350 million were issued, in addition to the refunding of treasury bills which matured weekly. During the fiscal year outstanding securities amounting to the very large sum of $2,650 million, including $1,050 million of previous Canada savings bond issues, were redeemed. After taking into account the net sales of securities amounting to $123 million from our securities investment and sinking fund accounts the unmatured debt held outside these government accounts was almost exactly the same at the end of the fiscal year as it was at the beginning.

During the first five months of the fiscal year interest rates generally as in the previous period continued to rise, reaching a peak in August. Thereafter the rates began to fall and this downward trend continued to the end of the fiscal year. The average interest rate paid on the government's unmatured debt was 2.98 per cent at the end of the fiscal year compared with 3.05 per cent at the beginning of the year. Treasury bill rates reflected a similar but more pronounced trend. The yield on the first issue in the fiscal year was 3.69 per cent. In August the yield rose to a high of 4.08 per cent, falling thereafter to a low of 2.27 per cent on the last issue of the fiscal year, and the most recent issue was at 1.76 per cent.

I should like also to report briefly on the operations of the old age security fund during 1957-58. Pensions of $55 a month are paid from the fund, the monthly allowances having been raised from $40 to $46 as from July 1, 1957, and from $46 to $55 as from November 1, 1957. Payments from the fund during the year amounted to $474 million. Revenues of the fund are derived from the proceeds of the two per cent taxes on sales, corporation profits and personal incomes and in 1957-58 these amounted to $372 million. The deficit for the year of $102 million was financed by a temporary loan from the Minister of Finance, and parliament will be asked for authority to charge this deficit, together with $1½ million representing the remainder of the 1956-57 deficit, to expenditures in 1957-58.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS

I should like next to review some of the main developments in our international trade and economic relations. The importance which the present government attaches to a healthy and balanced expansion of our foreign commerce requires no special emphasis or repetition. The important initiatives we have taken in this field and the constructive results already achieved are well known. We shall continue to pursue this task with energy and determination.

Our broad objectives have been clearly stated by the Prime Minister on appropriate occasions. In brief, they may be described as follows:

1. To achieve expansion, diversification, better balance, and greater stability in our trade with all countries;

2. To extend and strengthen Canada's trade and economic relationships with the commonwealth;

3. To support and promote a regime of law, order and morality in the field of international trade; to respect the spirit and intent of international commitments; and to stand ready to defend our rights and interests if they are challenged or ignored;

4. To recognize the legitimate needs of Canadian producers; and to safeguard them against unfair trading practices;

5. To promote the balanced growth of all sectors of Canadian industry and agriculture.

To implement this program fully will require sustained co-operative effort by the Canadian government, Canadian business and the Canadian people. We have already witnessed a successful demonstration of such co-operation in the trade mission to the United Kingdom which was led by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), last autumn and in the return visit of a distinguished group of British businessmen this spring.

I have already referred to Canada's balance of payments position and the main changes in our external trade and investment accounts. I should like now to comment upon the recent trends in our commodity trade.

The value of Canada's merchandise exports in 1957 increased by $73 million to the record level of $4,936 million. On the other hand, imports declined by $82 million to $5,623 million. Our deficit on commodity trade was thus reduced from $842 million to $687 million, or by almost one-fifth.

This trend towards a smaller deficit on trade account has continued into 1958. For the first four months of this year exports have held steady at about the same level as a year ago, while imports have substantially declined, and the deficit in this four-month period has been cut from $406 million to $174 million, a drop of more than 50 per cent.

The changes which occurred in the geographic pattern of Canada's external trade during the period under review are no less significant. The United States continues to be by far Canada's largest trading partner, accounting in 1957 for about 60 per cent of our total exports, roughly the same proportion as in 1956, and for about 70 per cent of our imports, which was significantly less than the 73 per cent in the previous years. This change resulted from a small increase in our exports and an appreciable decline in our imports. Although our trade deficit with the United States was reduced by about 20 per cent it still exceeded $1 billion. This trend towards reduction in our deficit in trade with the United States has been accelerated in 1958, with imports falling off much more sharply than exports.

Both import and export trade with the United Kingdom on the other hand moved in the opposite direction. In 1957 the United Kingdom took some 15 per cent of our total exports as compared with 17 per cent in 1956; on the import side the United Kingdom supplied 9.3 per cent of our import requirements, somewhat better than the 8.5 per cent achieved in 1956. As a consequence, the United Kingdom deficit with Canada on trade account declined from $333 million to $220 million or by roughly one-third. This trend, too, has continued into 1958. Canada's trade with the rest of the commonwealth moved in a similar direction, resulting in a minor deficit in 1957 as compared with a small surplus in 1956. Finally, our trade with Europe increased modestly in both directions, leaving a surplus in Canada's favour of $244 million, approximately the same as in 1956.

To summarize, let me say that in 1957 the value of our exports exceeded all previous records; imports declined significantly; our trade deficit with the United States was reduced; and our trade with the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and the rest of the world moved in the direction of more balanced relationships. Broadly the same trends continued into the first part of 1958, and while exports are on balance being maintained, imports, particularly from the United States, have been falling sharply. Indications to date are that the over-all deficit on trading account will be sharply reduced in the current year, accounted for very largely by a very much smaller deficit in our commodity trade with the United States.

The most striking feature of Canada's external trade in recent years has been its heavy concentration on the United States and the large imbalance of our trade with that country. About two-thirds of our total external trade has been with the United States. During the past five years the average total deficit on current account with the United States has been in excess of $1 billion per annum. These huge deficits, accompanied by heavy increases in our long-term indebtedness to the United States, carry serious implications for the future health and economic independence of our country.

I appreciate that the very large deficits that we have been incurring in recent years can be attributed in no small measure to the rapid development which has been taking place in the Canadian economy, particularly in the resource industries. Canada's rapid economic growth of recent years could not have been sustained by Canadian resources alone, and the large capital inflows and the accompanying large trading deficits, reflect the extent to which we have had to draw on foreign resources to accomplish our spectacular economic progress. I am confident that with more stable rates of growth and the increased production which will flow from our recent large investment we shall have the capacity, to an increasing extent, to meet our investment needs more nearly out of our own resources. At the same time I should remind hon. members that Canada has incurred substantial trade deficits with the United States even in years when our over-all external accounts have been in balance. The chronic nature of our massive trade imbalance with the United States requires, in our judgment, energetic corrective measures.

If the world in which we live were characterized by free convertibility of currencies and the absence of restrictions and discriminations on trade and payments, we would on economic grounds have less to fear from a situation of large imbalances with individual countries. But actual trading conditions in the world today are far removed from the ideal, and countries which have trading deficits with us are under constant pressure to endeavour to reduce them. We are frequently reminded in trade discussions that we must buy more from them if they are to maintain their volume of purchases from us. The implications of this for the stability of our exports, and our bargaining position in seeking wider outlets for our exports to these countries do not require elaboration.

Furthermore the heavy concentration of our trade on the United States means that the Canadian economy is vulnerable to changes in the United States economic and political climate and to shifts in its trading policies. Because of the vital place that external trade occupies in the Canadian economy, and the large proportion of this trade which is concentrated on the United States, changes in the terms of access to the United States market, even where they may be of minor importance in the United States scheme of things, often have a critical significance for our country, a fact which unhappily is not always appreciated in that country.

While access to the United States market has been improved in the last decade, and its tariffs have been significantly reduced, entry into that market remains difficult and uncertain for many classes of goods produced in Canada. In many cases, especially on fully manufactured goods, tariff rates are almost prohibitive. Quite apart from the tariff, their customs laws and administration often impose serious additional barriers. Perhaps most troublesome of all are the uncertainties arising from the many escape clauses in United States legislation and administrative practices. Hon. members do not need to be reminded of the recent restrictions imposed against Canadian oil and the continuing threat to our exports of lead, zinc and copper—notwithstanding firm trade agreement obligations.

In addition, United States agricultural policies continue to be severely damaging to Canadian interests. Apart from direct restrictions imposed on Canadian agricultural products, we suffer severe harm from United States surplus disposal activities. Massive United States disposals of wheat and other grains on give-away or subsidized terms have done serious damage to Canadian exports in some of our best commercial markets. Despite frequent and energetic Canadian complaints these harmful practices have continued. We find it difficult to understand why the United States should treat its best customer and friendly neighbour in this way. We have made it clear to the United States authorities that measures which add to our difficulties in selling in the United States market or in third countries cannot but impair our ability and willingness to import from them.

This brief examination of the nature of our trading problems with the United States points up the need for vigorous action of a constructive nature. We intend to press for wider access on reasonable terms to the United States market; and we will continue to oppose with all the means at our disposal any threat to impose greater obstacles against Canadian exports to that market. We will encourage the United Kingdom, the commonwealth and other overseas countries to seek out wider opportunities to supply Canadian import requirements in the expectation that much can be achieved on the basis of normal market forces. At the same time we will continue to foster the growth and diversification of efficient Canadian industries so that a constantly larger supply of our requirements may be met economically from domestic production.

At this point I should like to say a few words about the important trade developments which have been taking place in Europe. Hon. members know that six European countries—France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg—have agreed to form a customs union. The treaty establishing the European economic community signed in Rome in 1957 and subsequently ratified by the parliaments of the six countries, provides that over the next fifteen years tariffs and other barriers to trade within the community will be progressively eliminated. At the same time the six will establish a common tariff on trade with the outside world.

Related to this development is the initiative of the United Kingdom for the establishment of a European free trade area. Under this proposal tariffs between western European countries and the United Kingdom would be gradually but progressively eliminated, while individual countries, participating in the free trade area, would keep their own tariffs on trade with the outside world. This proposed free trade area is complementary to and not a substitute for the common market of the six.

The Canadian government is following with sympathy and interest these European efforts to integrate their economies and to develop a broader and more competitive system of production. The countries of the six together would make up an economic unit comparable in population to that of the United States. The looser free trade area group would be very much larger. On the basis of these enlarged internal markets European countries can be expected to achieve stronger and more efficient economies. We attach high importance to the economic and political strength of western Europe as a safeguard of world peace and prosperity. Europe, however, has extensive trade and economic links with the rest of the world. In our view it is vital that efforts to solve European regional problems should not weaken these wider connections. We have been disturbed about certain recent tendencies lest they convert Europe into an inward-looking regional trading bloc fenced off from the rest of the world by high tariffs, trade restrictions and other barriers. Such a development we fear would defeat the essential constructive purposes of the common market and free trade area projects.

The trading arrangements being worked out in Europe are of fundamental importance to Canada. More than a quarter of our total exports are absorbed by the United Kingdom and the countries of Western Europe. For commodities such as wheat, coarse grains, aluminum, certain chemicals and others, the United Kingdom and European markets are of paramount importance to Canada. While a strong, prosperous, outward-looking Europe would result in an expansion of trade with Canada, a regional restrictionist system of trade in Europe would have very serious implications for our export trade.

The Canadian government has therefore maintained a close watch on these developments and seizes every occasion to impress upon our European friends the desirability of ensuring that their new trade arrangements take fully into account Canada's essential export interests. With respect to the common market countries we have directed our efforts at keeping the common tariff at a moderate level, at minimizing the use of import restrictions, and assuring that the special arrangements for trade in agricultural products take into account our traditional exports to them.

With regard to the proposed European free trade area we have received firm assurances from the United Kingdom that our interests in that market will be fully safeguarded. We have given urgent attention, among other things, to the retention of our position in the United Kingdom for agricultural exports, and to the rules concerning the origin of goods entitled to tariff-free treatment. This problem of origin, though highly technical, is of particular importance to the tariff treatment which will be accorded to the products of Canada's mines, mills and forests in the markets of the United Kingdom and Europe.

We have also welcomed recent assurance from the government of the Federal Republic of Germany that it will support outward-looking policies for the common market and for the European free trade area.

Hon. members will, of course, wish me to report on the preparations for the all-important commonwealth trade and economic conference to be held in Montreal next September. The development of close trade and economic links with commonwealth countries holds a central place in the government's external economic policy.

(Translation):

It will be recalled that last September the finance ministers of the commonwealth met on Canadian soil for the first time at Mont Tremblant, in the province of Quebec. On behalf of the Canadian government I proposed that a commonwealth trade and economic conference be held in 1958 and indicated that Canada would be honoured to be host at such a conference. The unanimous and enthusiastic support which our proposal has received from all commonwealth governments has been a good augury for the success of the conference which will meet in Montreal, again in the province of Quebec, in September.

(Text):

May I say immediately that the 1958 commonwealth trade and economic conference cannot closely follow the lines of the 1932 conference. The world in which we live is very different from the world of 1932. The commonwealth itself has been greatly changed since that time. In these twenty-six momentous years the commonwealth has expanded in membership, has matured in its political relationships, and has become much broader in embracing more diverse interests. The commonwealth trade agreements which were entered into in 1932 made an invaluable contribution to solving many of the difficulties confronting all of us at that time. The issues facing us today, however, are very different from those of 1932. They require equally energetic and imaginative solutions, but along rather different lines.

We are not proposing a new system of commonwealth preferences. But we propose to maintain the existing system of preferences, and we are convinced that the wide variety of skills and resources of the old and the new members of the commonwealth, applied with energy and imagination to our common problems, can greatly contribute to the growth and prosperity of all. Our objectives can be summed up simply. They are these.

In the first place we aim to expand the opportunities for mutually profitable trade between Canada and the other countries of the commonwealth. We hope that progress can be made in removing restrictions and discriminations which are imposed against us.

Second, we would like to explore with our commonwealth partners ways and means of making more rapid progress towards currency convertibility and a freer system of world trade and payments. We appreciate that this poses a complex of difficult problems. We would like to see steps taken to increase world liquidity in the means of international payments. We shall support constructive steps to promote appropriate trade and financial policies on the part of the principal creditor nations, and the development of sound relationships with the new trade groupings now being set up in Europe. All of this cannot be accomplished by the commonwealth acting alone. But we should concert our commonwealth efforts and in this way encourage other countries to move along parallel lines.

Third, it is desirable to promote measures which will assist in the economic development of commonwealth countries, particularly the newer members which are less industrially advanced, and to improve their standards of living. Finally, we wish to extend and deepen our commonwealth institutions so that they can contribute more effectively to our joint economic and political strength and in all these ways, by our example and by our achievements, defeat the threatening inroads of communism.

As hon. members know, a conference of this magnitude and importance requires the most careful and intensive preparations. These preparations are now well in hand, and I am confident that the Montreal conference will bring lasting benefits to Canada, to our partners in the commonwealth, and to the world at large.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

I should like to outline the government's program of assistance to the gold mining industry.

The serious problems of adjustment confronting this industry, going back as far as the war years, have adversely affected the northern mining communities which are dependent on it. In recent years these difficulties have become more acute as a result of rising production costs and a higher exchange rate for the Canadian dollar. Since 1952 more than one-quarter of the hard rock gold mines then in operation have closed down. Many more would have suffered this fate but for the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

The world price for gold is fixed at $35 per ounce in United States currency. With the appreciation of the Canadian dollar in recent years the return to Canadian mines has been proportionately reduced. An increase in the price of gold would, of course, provide the best solution to the problem. Notwithstanding our best efforts, however, there is no evidence that the United States intends to raise the price of gold under present conditions. Much has been done by the gold mines themselves to improve their position. Substantial capital outlays on exploration and for the installation of new equipment have led to more efficient operation. Notwithstanding these commendable efforts most mines have experienced a substantial fall in their net incomes.

My colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), has already announced that the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act will be extended to apply to the calendar years 1959 and 1960. I wish now to announce that the bill to be introduced by him to extend the act will increase the scale of assistance by 25 per cent of the amount payable under the present act. This increased assistance will be applicable not only to the years 1959 and 1960 but to the full calendar year 1958 as well. The recommended increase in aid will amount to about $2½ million for 1958, and raise the total to about $12 million. It is my hope that this measure will contribute to maintaining the level of gold production in Canada and in this way promote the well-being of our northern gold mining communities.

I turn now to the budgetary outlook for the current year. Early in this session I tabled the main estimates for 1958-59 totalling $5,179 million, and two weeks ago I tabled the first supplementary estimates for the year in the amount of $58 million. The house therefore has before it expenditure proposals totalling $5,237 million. In addition there will be further statutory expenditures as well as the usual final supplementary estimates.

On the basis of the presently expressed intentions of the provincial governments I expect we shall be paying out close to $70 million in this fiscal year under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. We shall also be required to meet the increased deficit in the old age security fund which will be about $190 million in this fiscal year. The C.N.R. deficit for 1958 will be considerably larger than that reported for 1957. We must also expect some payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, though I hope that market conditions will be such that these will not be large.

On the other hand we propose to eliminate the balance remaining in the national defence equipment account. This account was set up in 1950 when NATO was being organized, and to it was credited the value of all equipment given by Canada to our NATO allies. At its peak there was about $310 million in this account. The former government drew on this account from time to time by charging to it, and not to budgetary expenditures, the cost of replacing such equipment. On the basis of past practice there would be about $165 million in this account at the end of this year. We believe that in the interests of good accounting practice and the maintenance of proper parliamentary control of expenditures this account should be liquidated during the current year.

After studying all the available data most carefully and taking account of possible lapsings and our continued search for economies, I have come to the conclusion that our budgetary expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1959 will be approximately $5,300 million. This figure is $215 million higher than our expenditures last year.

Admittedly this is a substantial increase but it includes all the new expenditures on health and welfare introduced by this government such as the increases in old age pensions and veterans' benefits and the initial cost of hospital insurance.

It also includes large expenditures for national development which will improve our productive capacity and efficiency and in due course add to our collective wealth and income.

Furthermore, all these expenditures to which I am referring, by providing employment and sustaining private incomes, will help to maintain the level of the national income during this temporary period when export demand for certain of our staple products has been softening and during the pause which this has caused in some sectors of capital investment.

I emphasize that with respect to all government expenditure we shall continue to search for economies and to eradicate inefficiency, waste and extravagance wherever we find them. I appeal to all members of parliament, regardless of party, to assist us in tracking down waste and extravagance wherever they may be. I can assure all hon. members, and indeed every citizen of Canada, that every good suggestion leading to economy and efficiency will be sincerely welcomed and carefully considered.

I am asking that the public accounts committee should make a special study of the new printing bureau to ascertain why the cost of that building has been so grossly in excess of the estimates originally given to parliament.

On the revenue side, forecasting in times like these presents an even more difficult problem. I have already said that assuming normal crops and no change in the general price level I expect a gross national product of $32 billion, a 2 per cent increase over 1957.

After reviewing very carefully all the evidence and trends I have concluded that our present tax structure will yield revenues of $4,660 million in the current year. This is $387 million less than our revenues in 1957-58. Of this reduction more than half is the result of tax reductions made last year, and less than half is due to a decline in our tax base, and almost all of this reduction is the result of a falling off in corporation profits.

For the convenience of hon. members may I insert in Hansard at this point a table summarizing what we may expect in revenues from the tax structure as it now stands?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister leave to insert this table in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The table is as follows:

TABLE I

Forecast of Revenues before Tax Changes
(in million)

	Preliminary 1957-58	Forecast 1958-59
Personal Income Tax	$1,499	$1,370
Corporate Income Tax	1,235	1,020
Non-resident Tax	64	70
Succession Duties	72	65
Sales Tax	703	705
Other Excise Taxes and Duties	549	550
Customs Duties	498	450
Other Taxes	2	2
Total Taxes	4,622	4,232
Non-Tax Revenue	425	428
	$5,047	$4,660

Having forecast budgetary revenues at $4,660 million and budgetary expenditures at $5,300 million, I would expect, in the absence of any change in the tax laws, a budgetary deficit of $640 million.

But before I proceed to discuss the appropriate tax policy in our current and prospective circumstances, I must bring to the attention of the house our large cash requirements over and above or outside the budgetary figures.

Each year the government makes large loans to or investments in a considerable variety of public undertakings. These are not budgetary expenditures because in all, or almost all cases, such undertakings pay interest and eventually repay the principal of these loans.

Similarly, each year we collect large amounts of cash which are not revenue, the principal items being moneys paid to the government for the purchase of annuities, insurance or superannuation benefits, and moneys received in repayment of loans made in earlier years.

During the current year 1958-59 we will require about $400 million for housing loans, about $250 million for the C.N.R.'s capital investment and refunding programs, nearly $250 million of cash advances to the St. Lawrence seaway, the northern Ontario pipe line and to other crown companies and agencies; and other non-budgetary cash requirements, including the liquidation of the defence equipment account, will be about another $240 million.

Against this we shall have available in this fiscal year some $50 million in our securities investment account, about $65 million from the repayment of loans made in earlier years, and we can expect to receive net about $240 million of cash into our various annuity and superannuation accounts.

The net requirement of cash for these non-budgetary transactions, excluding the exchange fund account, is thus about $775 million, and this we shall need to borrow. We shall also need to borrow the funds to cover our budgetary deficit of $640 million, and our net new cash requirements in this fiscal year will therefore be of the order of $1,400 million.

In addition to this, some $1,950 million of our marketable funded debt will be maturing during this fiscal year, and these maturing securities will require to be paid off by an equivalent amount of new borrowing. In other words, during this fiscal year we shall need to sell bonds or other securities in a total amount of close to $3,400 million. This is a major financial operation and will require the closest co-operation between the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks and all investment institutions and dealers.

We have already made a good beginning. Since April 1 we have sold issues totalling $950 million, of which $350 million was new cash. We still have before us the need to refund $1,350 million of maturing bonds and to raise more than $1,000 million of new cash.

We shall be making every effort to promote a good sale of Canada savings bonds next autumn, but whatever net new cash we obtain from that source will still leave us with a very large financing task.

Government policy regarding the management of the public debt cannot follow any rigid formula; it must be adapted to economic conditions and to market requirements. While I do not propose to place an undue burden on the longer term bond market, it is most desirable to keep our maturing debt reasonably spread out over the years. To refinance maturing issues chiefly in the short term market would only build up greater difficulties for ourselves two or three years hence. It will be our aim to offer acceptable volumes of longer term bonds whenever suitable opportunities occur, and to spread the remainder sensibly between short and mid-term maturities.

While the prospective increase in our debt will be quite substantial during the next year or two, the net burden of the public debt will remain well below what we carried quite easily only a few years ago. To illustrate this point may I insert here a table showing our gross national product, our net debt and their percentage relationships over selected years from 1926 to the present.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that the proposed table be inserted in Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The table is as follows:

TABLE II

Public Debt and Gross National Product
(in billions)

	Calendar Year G.N.P.	Net debt as of March 31 of the following year	Net debt as a percentage of G.N.P.
1926	$ 5.2	$ 2.3	44
1938	5.3	3.2	60
1945	11.8	13.4	113
1946	11.8	13.0	110
1947	13.2	12.4	94
1948	15.1	11.8	78
1949	16.3	11.6	71
1950	18.0	11.4	63
1951	21.2	11.2	53
1952	24.0	11.2	47
1953	25.0	11.1	44
1954	24.9	11.3	45
1955	27.1	11.3	42
1956	30.2	11.0	36
1957	31.4	11.0	35
1958 (est.)	32.0	11.7	37

A perusal of this table will show that while our net debt at the end of this year will be somewhat higher than it was at any time during the past ten years, its burden when measured as a percentage of our gross national product will be significantly lower than it was as recently as three years ago.

TAX POLICY

I come now to discuss what our appropriate fiscal policy should be in these circumstances.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

There has been wide public discussion of these matters in recent months. Most of this discussion has centred around the relative merits of tax reductions, public investment programs and income maintenance policies. It has seemed to me, if I may say so, that too many of the protagonists of these various policies tend to take up rather doctrinaire and exclusive positions.

The advocates of tax reductions argue that by leaving more money in the hands of individuals, consumer spending will be stimulated and more savings will be available for productive capital investment. But I believe experience has shown that while this may happen to some extent, unless other stimulating measures are taken much of the tax saving to many taxpayers tends to lie idle. It is neither wholly spent nor put into productive investment.

A program of public investment has the obvious advantage of providing employment for idle or under-employed manpower and equipment. But it cannot be a complete answer. In a country as large and as economically diverse as Canada it takes time for some programs to exert their maximum benefit upon the under-employed resources of the secondary industries and of many districts.

The third approach to the problem—the extension of income maintenance policies—has the essential value of relieving hardship and somewhat equalizing the burdens of recession, but apart from maintaining a reasonable level of consumer spending, such measures make a limited positive contribution to the resumption of healthy economic expansion.

My own view is that just as there is no single remedy for the problems of inflation, so there is no one way to meet the problems of recession. We need to use all the effective means available to us. The essence of sound policy lies in using the right balance or the best "mix" of the various means, and to apply them in a timely fashion.

This I believe we have done. Last December we introduced tax reductions which are saving the taxpayers of Canada $178 million in 1958. We have introduced new programs of public investment in housing, in resource development and in improvements to transportation that add up to many hundreds of millions of dollars, and the provinces and municipalities under the much easier money conditions are proceeding with further hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of social capital investment. By increasing old age pensions, improving veterans' benefits, extending unemployment insurance benefits and developing programs of farm income maintenance we have put additional hundreds of millions of spending power into the hands of those who would otherwise have been most harshly affected by the forces of recession.

I believe, moreover, we have done all these desirable things at about the right time. We took action on housing last August and again in December. We took action on farm incomes, on old age pensions, on veterans' benefits and on unemployment insurance in November, December and January. We have taken more action on housing, on unemployment insurance and on hospital insurance in the month that this new house has been in session, and we have further constructive measures on the sessional program.

As a result of such timely action the recession has taken a much more moderate course in Canada than in other comparable countries. On a seasonally adjusted basis our retail sales are running ahead of last year; in the United States they are down about 6 per cent. Industrial production in Canada has declined about 5 per cent from its peak; in the United States the drop is 12 or 13 per cent. Total labour income in Canada has hardly declined at all; in the United States it is down about 3 per cent. I do not take any satisfaction in these somewhat greater declines in the United States, for nothing could benefit Canada more quickly than an early resumption of business expansion in the United States. But we are entitled to take some satisfaction, and perhaps some credit, for the relatively stronger economic position in Canada.

These actions and policies of tax reduction, public investment and income maintenance now find their financial expression in the budgetary figures I have placed before the house this evening.

With a budgetary deficit of $640 million, and a total cash requirement of about $1,400 million, it is not in my judgment necessary for economic reasons to propose any further major tax reductions. The stimulating effect of the policies that we have already and promptly put into effect should, in the absence of any further adverse external events, sustain economic activity and provide the economic climate for an early resumption of economic expansion. Moreover, the main factor in bringing about the slackening in our rate of expansion has been the decline in the export demand for some of our basic resources, and at this stage further general tax reductions would not improve the external markets for our forest products or our base metals.

To go still further into deficit financing at this time could create conditions in which overt inflation of a degree very difficult to control might re-emerge. Indeed even now we have the somewhat paradoxical situation of simultaneous symptoms of both recession and inflation. If we go too far in the measures we take to combat what is, after all, a fairly mild recession, we might find that we had planted an inflationary time bomb which might later go off with a dangerously explosive effect. Admittedly, it is not an easy matter to judge just the right degree or balance in these matters; but in the present circumstances, it seems to me that we have, for the time being at least, a fairly sensible balance of fiscal policy, investment policy and income maintenance policies.

While I am not recommending to the house any major tax changes, I shall now put before you, Mr. Speaker, a fairly large number of particular tax proposals. None of these taken separately will have a material effect on the balance of ways and means, but each of them will be significant to the particular groups or persons affected; and collectively they will constitute a considerable measure of improvement in the equity and the efficiency of our tax system.

INCOME TAX CHANGES

First of all in the field of income tax I am bringing forward numerous amendments which I am sure the house will recognize as long overdue.

Commencing tomorrow the cost of drugs purchased under prescription may be included in the deduction for medical expenses. Expenses for eyeglasses will also qualify. Likewise the use of an ambulance will count as a medical expense. Other items such as laboratory and diagnostic charges may also be included in future. These provisions are, I think, eminently sensible. They will go a long way to correct the unfairness which in the past has been the source of so much complaint about this section of the income tax law.

The period within which refunds of tax may be claimed will in future be four years instead of two, and interest allowed on overpayments of tax will be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

A proposed amendment will allow a deduction for amounts paid for support of a dependant upon order of a court, for example, by a family court, even though there is no divorce or written separation agreement. The payer, however, may not claim the recipients as dependants. The person receiving such payments must include them in income and may then claim a deduction for any dependant in respect of whom the payment order was made. This provision will resolve many awkward tax situations which arise under the present law.

At present when a wife's income just passes the $1,000 mark the husband's exemption in respect of his wife drops abruptly by $250. In future the decrease in his exemption in such circumstances will not be more than the amount by which the wife's income exceeds $1,000. The wife, however, will still be required to file a separate return when her income exceeds $1,000.

Oil and gas producers will be allowed a deduction for bonus payments in respect of exploration reservations under the same conditions which apply in respect of lease bonuses. Likewise, wells drilled for water disposal or for a source of water for injection into an oil or gas well may be treated in the same manner as ordinary production wells.

An important amendment to the Income Tax Act will widen the scope for charitable contributions by corporations. In recent years our governments, both federal and provincial, have greatly increased their spending on welfare and on higher education; but I believe all hon. members would agree that it would be a sorry day for Canada if governments assumed all these costs and responsibilities in their entirety. A high level of private participation is most desirable.

At the present time the law allows corporations to make tax-free gifts up to 5 per cent of their profits. I am proposing that for 1958 and subsequent years this limit be raised to 10 per cent. I realize that a great many, indeed far too many, corporations do not come close to taking advantage of the present 5 per cent limit; but I am glad to say that many corporations do take their responsibilities in these matters seriously.

Particularly I am hoping that this change in the law will swell the flow of funds from industry to the support of higher education in Canada. During the next five or six years our universities will need to invest more than $300 million in expansion. This is the capital cost, first of making room for the very greatly increased numbers of students who will be graduating from our high schools and going on to university; and second of providing the increasingly expensive equipment which is indispensable to fundamental research. Our Canadian universities and research institutions have already achieved high standards, but we must accelerate our pace still more if we are to maintain and improve our competitive position in the world of today and tomorrow.

I am informed by the national conference of Canadian universities that they believe they can depend on governments and foundations to provide something better than two-thirds of this $300 million of capital requirements, including $50 million being provided through the Canada Council, but that they must look to private sources, and particularly to corporations, for nearly $100 million of capital gifts during the next five or six years. I think it is desirable that they should look to private sources for this measure of support and more. Even if governments were willing and able to provide all the funds required, it would not be desirable for them to do so, because universities need much more than money; they need the enlightened support of the community; they need the interest and enthusiasm that attach to active participation in growth.

I should like it to become more generally recognized that the privilege of carrying on business in our free enterprise country carries with it the strongest moral obligation to maintain a substantial measure of private support of both our welfare institutions and our institutions of higher learning and research.

Two important amendments to the gift tax will be proposed to parliament. The first of these will allow a married person to make one tax-free gift up to $10,000 to his spouse where the gift consists of transfer of ownership of a home jointly occupied by the married couple, or of a farm from parent to child. This special exemption will be in addition to the other exemptions now allowed under the gift tax. This provision will take care of the large majority of the difficult tax cases which arise through transfers between husband and wife and parents and children of property rights in the home in which they are living, or the farm they are operating. It will also give recognition in the taxing statute to the very common practice adopted generally to give added security to the legal position of the wife in the home she occupies.

The second change in the gift tax will allow a refund of any gift tax paid by a person within three years of death to the extent that it exceeds the tax payable on that gift included in his estate upon death. This will supplement the present provision which allows gift tax paid to be credited against succession duty but only up to the amount of such duty. For example, in future if it is found that no duty at all is payable on death the full amount of gift tax paid on gifts in the three years before death will be refunded.

The bill to be introduced will contain a wide variety of corrective amendments, most of which will be beneficial to taxpayers. Some are designed to remove anomalies in the law, others are merely for greater clarity. It is important that income tax law should receive constant attention to ensure the greatest degree of equity in its operation. In this statute eternal vigilance is the price of fairness. I am confident that this year's amending bill will be a most important step in this direction.

The revenue implications of the proposed changes are somewhat difficult to assess. However, I estimate that the annual relief to taxpayers as a result of these amendments will amount to about $11 million in a full year, the greater part of which will be accounted for by the increased scope of deductions for medical expenses and for corporate donations.

Before leaving the income tax I should mention a forthcoming change in the regulations under the act which will withdraw for the 1959 and future taxation years the right of taxpayers to claim a so-called depletion allowance in respect of dividends from non-resident companies. The difficulties in the way of fairly determining the basis for such allowances have been found to be insuperable.

ESTATE TAX

Last January I introduced a bill setting forth the pattern for an estate tax which might replace the present Succession Duty Act. At that time I invited careful scrutiny of this draft bill and made the request that criticisms of any of its provisions be sent to me for study. The response has been gratifying. Within the past few months I have received many excellent briefs not only from important national organizations but from individuals as well. I express my thanks for the painstaking efforts that have been expended in the preparation of these representations. These briefs have been extremely useful to me and I can assure all concerned that we have given the most careful study to the wide range of recommendations contained in them.

I am tabling a resolution along the same lines as that of last January. It will afford the house an opportunity for debate on the general principles underlying the proposal. If the resolution is adopted by the house the new bill will be introduced forthwith. It will contain a number of revisions of the measure introduced last January. It is my intention upon second reading of the bill to move that it be referred at once to the banking and commerce committee for detailed study and report.

In view of this proposed procedure it would I think, be inappropriate for me to do more at this stage than comment briefly on the budgetary implications of the proposed legislation.

The proposed new estate tax is definitely a tax-reduction measure. On an annual basis the yield from this revenue field will be less by about $7 million. Furthermore, the relief is deliberately mainly concentrated in low value estates. The house will agree that this is a commendable feature. In every tax bracket, however, according to the size of estates the revenue yield will ordinarily be less under the new bill although in the upper brackets it will be only slightly less.

Specific mention of exemptions may be desirable. Where a husband dies leaving a widow there will be a fully deductible exemption of $60,000 with an additional deduction of $10,000 for each dependent child. Thus, if a widow is left with three dependent children no tax at all will be payable unless the estates exceeds $90,000. If the value of the estate exceeds this figure tax will apply only to the excess over $90,000. This will be a true exemption. Moreover, in no case under any circumstances will an estate of less than $50,000 be taxable at all.

SALES AND EXCISE TAXES

While unable in the light of our need for revenues to recommend any general reduction in the sales and excise taxes I am, however, proposing a substantial list of new specific exemptions.

Perhaps of greatest interest are the added exemptions for purchases by municipalities. Commencing tomorrow morning the following additional items purchased by municipalities will be exempt from federal sales tax:

(a) All goods, including culverts, for use as part of sewage and drainage systems;

(b) fire truck chassis for permanent attachment thereon of fire-fighting equipment;

(c) fire hose, couplings and nozzles; and

The revenue loss from these exemptions—which, of course, is the measure of the tax relief to municipalities—will be about $5 million annually.

Most goods used exclusively or almost exclusively by farmers are already exempt from sales tax. I am glad to be able to extend this exemption to a number of additional items in this category. The new exemptions include stock conditioners and feed supplements for poultry and livestock, sugar beet handling equipment of a kind covered by item 417 of the Customs Tariff, all rodenticides, tree-guards for fruit growers, and all materials used in the manufacture of grain and seed-cleaning machines.

Cut flowers will in future be exempt from sales tax. The existing discrimination in the law and the technical difficulties in the way of ensuring fairness in the administration of the present tax have become intolerable. The anuual cost to the treasury of this exemption will be about $1 million.

We propose to abolish the $2 fee now payable for a sales tax licence.

In the resolution to amend the Excise Tax Act will be found an extensive list of other proposed changes in the schedule of exemptions proposed for the relief of the taxpayer. I am proposing no changes in the special excise taxes in this budget.

It is estimated that the total revenue loss on an annual basis from the proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act will be approximately $7 million. For the remainder of the present fiscal year these changes will cost the treasury approximately $5 million.

I should like to report progress on work being done towards a revision of the sales tax structure. Officials have been devoting considerable study to this problem and my hope is that some important amendments may soon be ready for consideration by the government.

TAX ON SPECIAL EDITIONS OF NON-CANADIAN MAGAZINES

I turn now to the so-called "magazine tax" which imposes a 20 per cent levy on the advertising revenues of special Canadian editions of foreign magazines.

During the past twelve months the government has received numerous representations regarding this tax and regarding the general position of Canadian magazines. Canadian publishers have stressed that they are encountering unusually severe competition. This competition takes many forms: competition for circulation and for advertising revenues, competition from magazines published abroad, from Canadian daily newspapers and their weekly editions, from radio and from television.

The government has a sympathetic interest in the problems confronting Canadian magazines. We believe that Canadian magazines are contributing to the quality of our national life. But this interest does not blind us to the inequities introduced by this tax. When we were on the opposite side of the house we warned repeatedly that this tax would prove to be both unjust and ineffective. Experience has confirmed our views.

Accordingly, I am recommending to the house that this tax be repealed forthwith. The loss of revenue will be about $1 million.

I do not underestimate the difficulties which Canadian magazines are facing. Likewise I do not underestimate the difficulties of governmental action in this field. If the government is to give any special support it should be in a manner that infringes neither the freedom of the press nor the reading preferences of the public. A number of proposals have been put forward, but none has proved to be both practical and acceptable. While we are prepared to study any serious proposal to encourage a truly Canadian periodic press, it must conform with the principles I have stated.

TARIFFS AND RELATED CUSTOMS MATTERS

Earlier in my remarks I outlined the main features of this government's commercial policies and the principal objectives we are seeking to achieve in this field. I discussed the major developments in our external trade relations and the steps that are being taken to expand and safeguard our export markets. I should like now to outline a number of specific measures in the field of tariffs and related customs matters designed to meet the legitimate needs of Canadian industry, to protect our producers and workmen against certain unfair trading practices, and to promote the diversification and balanced development of the Canadian economy.

During the past year many representatives of Canadian industry, large and small, and agriculture, have discussed their problems with members of the government. We have been impressed by the serious difficulties that have been created for many of them by the dumping of foreign goods in the Canadian market. Such dumping may arise from a variety of causes and may take many forms. The present dumping duties section of the customs tariff together with the valuation provisions of the Customs Act are adequate to deal with some forms of dumping. However, they do not deal with cases where goods are being imported into Canada at less than their cost of production and are also sold in the country of export below cost.

(Translation):

I have examined this problem with the utmost care and am satisfied that this unfair trading practice is in fact occurring, with a harmful impact on Canadian producers. This situation appears to be particularly serious in the case of primary textiles where, for some years now, depressed conditions and difficult problems of adjustment have prevailed in many countries. Canadian industry should be expected to compete with imported goods on reasonable terms but it is unfair to subject our producers to trading practices which are really a special kind of dumping.

(Text):

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I have examined this problem with the utmost care and am satisfied that this unfair trading practice is in fact occurring, with a harmful impact on Canadian producers. This situation appears to be particularly serious in the case of primary textiles where, for some years now, depressed conditions and difficult problems of adjustment have prevailed in many countries. Canadian industry should be expected to compete with imported goods on reasonable terms but it is unfair to subject our producers to trading practices which are really a special kind of dumping.

Most countries which carry on substantial foreign trade have laws to protect their domestic producers against dumping. Indeed the right to take effective measures against dumping has long been a standard provision of international trade treaties including the GATT. The government intends to defend Canadian producers against the practice of dumping, whatever form it may take. This will require the strengthening of the present valuation provisions of the Customs Act and their effective enforcement. To this end my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) will shortly submit a bill to parliament amending the valuation provisions of the Customs Act, to add a provision to section 35 along the lines of the legislation in effect prior to 1948, requiring that, where appropriate, the value for duty of imported goods shall not be less than the cost of production plus a reasonable advance for selling cost and profit.

In referring to the Customs Act I should mention the matter of appeals from decisions of the customs authorities under item 1201 which prohibits the entry of material of a treasonable, seditious, immoral or indecent character. In a recent judgment the tariff board questioned whether it is the appropriate body to hear such appeals. The government shares the doubt expressed by the tariff board. Accordingly my colleague the Minister of National Revenue will shortly be introducing a bill to amend the Customs Act to provide that the appeal in such cases shall lie to the courts.

At the conclusion of my remarks tonight I shall table certain amendments to the Customs Tariff. A great many items are involved. For that reason, and to facilitate the consideration of all these items by the house at a later stage, I have divided them into groups according to subject-matter. Several groups relate to tariff board reports of which I shall now speak, and the final group comprises miscellaneous tariff adjustments.

During the previous session of parliament I tabled five reports by the tariff board. They related to basic iron and steel; pipes and tubes; rubber footwear and rubber-soled canvas footwear; certain zinc products; and fresh fruits and vegetables. A sixth report, that on wool fabrics, was tabled two weeks ago.

It may be of interest if I summarize, in a few sentences, where matters now stand with regard to each of these reports.

First is the report on basic iron and steel. We have now completed the process of negotiating with other countries, under the procedures of the GATT, the adjustments in commitments which were necessary in order to implement the tariff board's main recommendations. The amendments which the government is proposing in order to carry into effect the results of these negotiations are set out in the resolutions. They involve a complete overhaul of the very important sector of the tariff relating to primary iron and steel products. More than 100 tariff items are involved; and 92 of these are being reduced to 38 items. This substantial simplification will be accomplished by the elimination of numerous end-use items providing for reduced rates of duty on iron or steel for special purposes. The remaining items are consolidated into four major groups relating to plate, structurals, bars and sheet, respectively. There are increases in some rates of duty and reductions in others. The changes are designed to provide what, in the light of the evidence presented to the tariff board, appears to be adequate protection on those items where it is required. I understand that Canadian steel producers consider the new schedule to be a decided improvement over the old one.

Second, pipes and tubes. The renegotiation of these items under the provisions of the GATT has also been completed and the proposed tariff changes are set out in the resolutions. These changes also involve some reductions and some increases. They will bring the tariff up to date and simplify its structure. All the drawback items will be eliminated, and the number of end-use items will be reduced. A separate tariff item is being proposed to cover all kinds of iron and steel pipe for use in the construction of oil and gas pipelines at rates of 10 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 15 per cent under the most-favoured-nation tariff. A major result of these changes will be to make more effective the protection which it affords to Canadian producers.

Third, zinc and zinc products. Once again, I am glad to say, the necessary international negotiations have been completed. The revised items and rates of duty as recommended by the tariff board are set out in the resolution. These proposed tariff changes constitute a balanced package. On balance the proposed changes do not involve any increase in the Canadian tariff on zinc and zinc products. However, they provide for adjustments in the rates on rolled zinc which will encourage additional fabrication in Canada.

Fourth, rubber footwear and rubber-soled canvas footwear. The former government had instructed the tariff board to make a study of the rubber footwear industry, but did not ask for recommendations. We have examined the board's report on this reference, and have referred the matter back to the board with a request for its recommendations.

Fifth, fresh fruits and vegetables. Negotiations with the United States have been initiated. I hope that they will soon lead to agreement on a more satisfactory schedule of duties. However, I am not at present in a position to forecast just when we will be in a position to introduce tariff amendments based on the results of these negotiations. In the meantime we have available in section 38 of the Customs Act a means of dealing, on a temporary basis, with any serious emergencies that may arise.

Sixth, wool fabrics. The report on wool fabrics is the first of a series which will cover the whole field of primary textiles and their main products. As recently as February, 1955 the board had made a report to the previous government on tariff item 554b, which is the main wool fabric item. At that time, however, the government of the day did not ask the board for recommendations, and took no action on its report.

The present government requested the tariff board to make recommendations, and these are included in the report which I tabled two weeks ago. We were, of course, well aware that the problem posed by the situation in wool fabrics was one of peculiar difficulty. It represents one of the few instances where competition from the United Kingdom is a serious factor in the difficulties of Canadian industry. We believed, however, that careful examination of the problem would point toward a solution which would relieve the pressure on the Canadian industry without materially affecting the interests of British producers. The tariff board has suggested an adjustment in the British preferential tariff which offers some hope of achieving this result. Accordingly, the resolution to be moved later tonight includes one involving a modest increase in the British preferential tariff on wool fabrics under tariff item 554b, as recommended by the tariff board.

The tariff board's recommendations relating to wool fabrics, involve a change only in the British preferential tariff. For the time being the present most-favoured-nation rates, as bound under the GATT, will continue to apply. But it is our intention to renegotiate item 554b as soon as possible with a view to restoring the margin of British preference.

Before leaving the subject of the tariff board references, I should mention those which are still in progress. The board has completed its hearings with respect to fluorspar, and I am awaiting their report. As to the textile reference, hearings are now proceeding on the cotton items and when these are completed the board will be directing its attention to synthetic textiles, knitted goods and finally narrow fabrics. After that major studies on chemicals, and on radio and television parts await it.

Thus far I have referred only to tariff changes arising from tariff board reports. These comprise most of the changes that I shall propose, and rightly so. I have found the board to be a valuable means of screening tariff requests. It provides an open forum in which all interested parties may state their views.

We receive, however, a great many representations which it would not be practicable to refer to the tariff board. Many of them involve matters which are not of general interest, but none the less are important to the applicant. Others are technical suggestions originating in the Department of National Revenue or in the Department of Finance relating to anomalies that are arising constantly as a result of changing industrial techniques and conditions.

You will find, accordingly, that the last group of items in the resolutions is a heterogeneous collection. The purpose of many of the proposed changes will be readily apparent. It is to give Canadian producers access on better terms to materials or equipment of types that cannot be obtained in Canada, and thus to improve their competitive position. There are, in addition, numerous items which it is proposed to reword, without altering the rates of duty.

Perhaps the most significant change in rates of duties in this category is that relating to foamed and expanded synthetic resin products. At the time of the tariff board inquiry in 1952, these products were not made in Canada and the board recommended that they be made duty free. However, the board in its report noted that the plastics industry was undergoing rapid development and that the plastics schedule would have to be revised from time to time to keep it up to date. It seems clear that if these particular products had been made in Canada at that time, the board would have recommended the same rates of duties as in the case of cellulose sponges, which were made in Canada at that time. There are several Canadian companies manufacturing this item. We are proposing the same rates as now apply to comparable plastic products. Proposed changes do not require negotiations inasmuch as the new rates do not exceed the rates bound under the GATT.

Another change relates to the duty on certain lumber products. A recent decision of the tariff board had the effect of classifying many kinds of worked lumber as "manufactures of wood" carrying a higher rate of duty than had generally applied previously. Canadian lumber interests have expressed serious concern about the possible implications of this change for their important export interests and they have been urging that the earlier position be restored. To meet this situation I am proposing changes in wording to make it clear that all lumber products produced by a planing machine, except those specifically named in the tariff, are treated in a uniform manner at the rates of duty which had been generally in effect prior to the tariff board decision.

There is one further important proposal to which I wish to refer. It relates to the "tourist clause".

This item now provides for a $100 exemption at four-month intervals to Canadian residents who are absent from Canada for not less than 48 hours. It is apparent that this favours those who are accustomed to making frequent trips to the United States as compared with those who travel abroad only occasionally. The former may bring in duty-free goods to the value of as much as $300 per annum, while the latter are allowed only $100 worth on the rare occasions, possibly many years apart, when they are in a position to make use of the exemption.

On a number of occasions the United Kingdom authorities have asked whether some modification could be made in our tourist exemption so as to facilitate purchases by Canadians visiting the United Kingdom and other overseas countries.

The trade statistics show how the present exemption works out in practice. In 1957 duty-free imports into Canada under the exemption totalled $77.4 million, of which $74 million were from the United States, $2 million from the United Kingdom, and $1.4 million from all other countries combined.

I have examined various suggestions for modifying the present provision so as to make it operate with greater fairness as between individual Canadian travellers on the one hand, and the various countries which they visit on the other hand. I have decided to recommend a rather simple, but none the less significant, addition to the present item. This will neither add to nor subtract from the present provision in so far as travel on the North American continent is concerned. But it will make available to the overseas traveller, provided he is absent from Canada for at least fourteen days, an option which he may wish to exercise. In effect, such travellers will be permitted to draw upon their future exemptions to the extent of an additional $200. The maximum exemption available will thus total $300, and the traveller who takes advantage of it will not be entitled to any further exemption under item 703(b) for twelve months thereafter.

This privilege will apply to visitors to places beyond the continental limits of North America, including Bermuda, Cuba, Puerto Rico, the British West Indies, and all of South America, as well as still more distant places. It is proposed that the new provision come into effect July 1st of this year.

SUMMARY OF TAX CHANGES

I can now summarize the effects of the tax reductions I am proposing this evening on our budgetary position. I should point out, however, that the principal tax changes affecting the present fiscal year were introduced and approved by parliament last December. Those changes amounted to tax reductions of $178 million in a full year. The further changes now submitted add up to $26 million in a full year, and it can therefore be fairly said that our total tax reductions in our first year in office exceed $200 million.

Since we are well into the current year, and since the reductions to be effected by the new estate tax can hardly affect our revenues this year, the net effect of the proposed tax changes on this year's revenues will be to reduce them by $8 million.

If I have leave I should like to insert in Hansard at this point a final table showing these tax changes and our expected 1958-59 revenue after giving effect to them.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to insert this table in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have a further one also, Mr. Speaker.

The tables are as follows:

Since our expenditures are expected to be $5,300 million, and our revised revenue $4,652 million, the prospective deficit for the year ending March 31, 1959 is $648 million.

CONCLUSION

I suppose it rarely falls to the lot of a Minister of Finance to be faced with conditions of his own choosing in preparing his budget. Hon. members will not be slow to realize that a minister who is faced with a deficit of $648 million is severely circumscribed in writing the kind of budget he would have wished. But we live in a world of realities.

Moreover, I confess my concern over costs of production and prices in Canada. Only by keeping our costs of production in line with those of our competitors can we hope to achieve expanding employment and progressive improvement in our standard of living.

We are in danger of becoming a high-cost economy. Such a prospect is particularly perilous in the case of a country like Canada which must sell so much of its production in markets abroad. Moreover, Canadian producers are encountering increasing difficulty in retaining their domestic market in the face of keen competition from abroad. Many of them under these circumstances turn to the government for a solution of their cost problem.

In a free society there is no simple formula by which the government can maintain stable prices and there is a limit to what governments can do to assist producers to hold down their costs of production. A wise government can, of course, help to promote an environment which is conducive to price stability and this government gives a high place to that duty; but to an important extent prices are the result of competition among the various economic groups which compose our nation, each striving for a greater share of the national product. I echo the warnings issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to all sections of the Canadian people in appealing to all, whether employers, employees or self-employed, to have regard for the general interest in the returns they seek for their services and products. In a free society there is no omnipotent arbitrator who can set prices and wages at stable levels. One must depend upon the sense of responsibility of free men and women not to demand more than their fair share of the national income. As I have said on other occasions, increases in incomes can be justified by increased productivity and by increased productivity alone.

This budget is designed to take realistic account of the forces which are exerting a powerful influence on the tone and direction of the Canadian economy today and to apply fiscal policies which will assist the forces which are contributing strength to the Canadian economy and at the same time to slow down or resist those forces which are impeding Canada's growth and wellbeing. It is an expression of the purpose of the government to encourage the enterprise, industry and self-reliance of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

As debtors to the sacrifices of the generations which have gone before us and heirs to the fruits of their labours, we Canadians take pride in the unyielding march of this nation to her great destiny. The advances of these ninety-one years have surpassed the dreams of our forefathers; yet today we know that we stand but on the threshold of the true greatness of this favoured land. There remains for us a sacred duty, that of contributing to the realization of the hopes and aims of the fathers of confederation.

This budget has been born of confidence in Canada's future, not blind wishful thinking, but unshrinking realism. 7. That the amount by which any gift tax paid on a gift made within three years prior to death exceeds any succession duty or estate tax subsequently imposed in respect of a death after June 17, 1958, on that gift under any act of the parliament of Canada will be refunded.

8. That with effect after June 17, 1958, the exemption from the tax on income of non-resident persons now granted in respect of dividends paid by a non-resident-owned investment corporation be changed so as to apply only in respect of dividends paid after the time when the corporation has paid out dividends which in the aggregate equal the undistributed earnings accumulated by the corporation in years when it was not a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries; and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, last evening when the leader of the house gave us some indication that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would not be brief tonight, one of my neighbours—I must say, not on my immediate left—said: Well, he probably will need a lot of time to explain the bad things away. And I think we have certainly found that out.

The minister tonight used a lot of pages, and he got into a lot of economic gobbledygook—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: —to explain to us about these affairs, but I think that was in a large measure due to the fact that the minister has learned that he gets into a fair amount of trouble when he is too dogmatic and, perhaps, because we can certainly think of some of the more prominent things he has said in recent times of that nature of which, no doubt, he would not like to be reminded at this moment. For example, there was his reference to inflation, when he said just about a month before last Christmas down in Florida to United States investors: "I confidently tell you that inflation has been checked." Again, in his last budget speech from the opposition side in a very terse and dogmatic statement, he stated very positively "we wish to see a balanced budget because we believe in balanced budgets." Well, that is funny in relation to this budget tonight.

I have tried to find things which would make it possible for me to extend some words of congratulations to the hon. gentleman, but the nature of his budget does not make that very easy. Perhaps I can say, however, that he has at least introduced some harmony tonight with the blue box in front of him, and the blue carnation and the blue haberdashery. And we certainly have a blue budget. I think we have more than a blue budget; we have a sick budget, and I am afraid that most people among the public after hearing about it will agree that the minister himself offered very little anti-recession medicine with his sick budget.

The minister could, I suppose, be congratulated for having established some records. The size of the deficit is, of course, an all-time record in peace time, and the amount of his spending is an all-time record. But there is one thing with regard to which he has not established a record as a Conservative finance minister, because since 1913 a Conservative government has never introduced a budget with a surplus.

Now it will take a little while to examine the very complicated figures which the minister gave to us tonight in order to make sure whether even his deficit of $640 million will prove to be the deficit we would normally have under our accounting system. I do know that probably the most responsible outside organization which looks at these things very carefully, the Canada tax foundation, estimated that the budget figures would probably establish a deficit of $1 billion. But the writer of this editorial did say that the Minister of Finance—and I quote the words used—"may be able to hide some of this amount by certain accounting adjustments." I expect that when we do examine the minister's speech in Hansard more carefully tomorrow we will be able to find, looking at some of these so-called suspect items, some figuring in past style different from the figuring he has produced I am sure the deficit will be larger.

I myself, in the estimates committee the other day, asked whether or not there was going to be a raid on the defence equipment fund, and it will be very interesting tomorrow to find out whether the figures with regard to loans and investments will prove my suspicion to be well founded.

In addition to this, the house did not get the story with regard to spending. We did not hear a word tonight about dominion-provincial relations; there was not a suggestion that if certain wishes of Premier Frost are going to be fulfilled in the near future another $78 million will be required, and if additional payments are to be made in this direction we would anticipate that probably another $150 million beyond what we have heard, would be involved in equalization payments.

We have heard nothing about the estimate of the cost of the federal share of national hospitalization, arrangements for which would be implemented within a couple of weeks—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course you did.

An hon. Member: Were you not listening to the speech?

Mr. Benidickson: Reference was made to the old age pension deficit but, of course, this house was not informed that it is estimated that the old age pension deficit for the year to which the minister was referring will not be $102 million as mentioned in the speech tonight but will, doubtless, be about double that.

An hon. Member: He said that.

Mr. Benidickson: But my chief criticism of the budget, as I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, is that there is little anti-recession medicine in it. It is a deficit budget, of course, but it is prominently a deficient budget. I suggest that it lacks quick economic stimulants and the disappointment is that not only does it lack push, it will push a lot of business thinking in the wrong direction. In other words, just like Topsy, this was not a planned or an economic, designed budget—it just "growed". We have a deficit not by design but a deficit by default and one might say that the promises of yesterday have become the deficits of today.

There is nothing new in the terms of this budget for jobs and there is less for business. It has been a piecemeal economic attitude that has been developed by the Minister of Finance and we can say now with great confidence and satisfaction that we certainly were right last session when we told the Minister of Finance that he should bring down a budget, that we should have a white paper so that the economics of the situation in the light of new events could have been most carefully examined not only by the minister but on a formal basis, as always takes place at budget time, in the presence of the officials whom he very promptly complimented tonight.

At this point may I, too, associate myself with the minister in saying that I have enjoyed not only the friendship but several years of close association with Doctor Eaton who has a long-term record of service to this country in the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue. I join with the minister in wishing Doctor Eaton well in his new employment.

My analysis of what is lacking in this budget is that the government is simply sitting out the situation and sitting it out on its hands. An eminent United States economist, Senator Douglas, made an interesting comment with respect to remedies that should properly be applied in the recession in that country which I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance: It is better to do too much than to do too little and then do it too late.

Mr. Baskin: You should know all about doing too little too late.

Mr. Benidickson: I cannot resist commenting that even if my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, had done something tonight it would be too late. Evidence of the fact that the minister and those associated with him have been too late in coming to grips with what has needed to be done is that, according to their speeches, they did not recognize the nature of the problem that had been facing us last winter and last fall. There was no bold new program then and there is not any bold new program now. It is a wait and see, a slow motion budget and I suggest to the minister that because he will have to do things eventually we are asking why he is not doing them now.

An hon. Member: Maybe he learned from your experience.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not much of a budget, my friend. There is little for anybody in this budget.

Mr. Baskin: There is very little in your reply to it.

Mr. Benidickson: The budget contains very little for the Canadian people except cheaper rat poison, violins, cut flowers and tree guards not more than 36 inches in height, as I noted some of the points made by the minister tonight.

We have heard something about changes in tariffs. We will have an opportunity of discussing these matters in more detail at a later date but I want to say one thing at this time. Everybody knows that British appetites were whetted by the eloquence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) with respect to trade just as Canadian appetites were whetted by the talk we heard about tax reductions. Just before the Mont Tremblant conference cold water was thrown on certain tariff items that affect the British and I suggest that quite a chill has been cast tonight on the commonwealth conference that is about to take place. All of this is very inconsistent with some of the philosophies of the Prime Minister. At Brantford, Ontario, on February 17, 1958, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> The purpose of the commonwealth conference is to capture markets that have been lost. Let us give the British an opportunity for trade in Canada and assure them the necessary Canadian dollars to buy our products because trade must be in both directions.

Again I say that appetites that were whetted by the Prime Minister here will certainly be disappointed. I recall that toward the end of the last session, on January 20, 1958, as recorded at page 3523 of Hansard, the Prime Minister in some cross questioning about what tax reductions the Canadian people might expect said:

> We have reduced taxes—

The following exchange then took place between the Prime Minister and the then hon. member for Coast-Capilano, Mr. Sinclair:

> Mr. Sinclair: How much?
> Mr. Diefenbaker: They say how much, Mr. Speaker.
> Mr. Sinclair: You promised $500 million.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: When we have the authority we shall do so.

What government had more authority to carry out promises to the people than that which the government has at the present time?

As I have the right to continue this speech on Friday—I believe that is the date, may I adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Benidickson the debate was adjourned.

Collapse of Second Narrows Bridge

BRIDGES

SECOND NARROWS, VANCOUVER—COLLAPSE OF TWO SECTIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the house adjourns I think I should make reference to the catastrophe that has taken place in British Columbia when two sections of the second narrows bridge in Vancouver collapsed this evening with a loss of life, and to say that all of us in this house extend our sympathy to their loved ones who survive and our deep regret at what has taken place.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those in this party I wish to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister's expression of shock and regret at this very sad news.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my words to those already spoken. This touches me very deeply because the bridge is located in my constituency and I together with others have been looking forward to the opening of this bridge in the very near future. It is one of those occasions when one can hardly find words to express one's feelings. All I can do is to join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in hoping that our thoughts will be understood by those who survive.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the government leader what the business of the house is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with the second reading of the bill to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, which is item No. 11 on today's order paper; then continue the debate on the resolution concerning the Department of Transport Act, which is item No. 7; then take item No. 9, the resolution concerning the Cape Breton Highlands national park; and item No. 12, the resolution relating to the Yukon Act. If there is any time left after that we shall take item No. 3, second reading of the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, and item No. 4, the second reading of the bill to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners.

It being 23 minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CARGO-PASSENGER VESSEL, WEST INDIES SERVICE

Question No. 2—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Have plans and specifications been prepared for the construction of the new cargo-passenger vessel to serve the West Indies federation?
2. If so, what will the ship cost?
3. Will tenders be called for its construction?
4. When will it be completed?
5. What islands of the federation will it serve?
6. To whom will the ship be entrusted for operation?
7. Has a report been prepared on the economics of this service?
8. What will be the cost of operating the ship?
9. What will be the amount of the annual deficit?
10. What will be the total cost to Canada, capital and operation, of this aid to the federation?
11. What trade will be promoted between the two countries by this ship?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

This answer is in the form of an interim report on the status of this project. The questions ask for a considerable amount of detail about the plans, specifications, costs and operational arrangements for the vessel which cannot be answered in full at this time.

It should be explained that some time before federation was achieved in the West Indies the standing federation committee of the islands had sought outside advice as to the needs of the various islands for a service to provide cargo and passenger accommodation on a regularly scheduled basis between all the various islands. As a result of expert study of this question by outside specialists and by the West Indians themselves, it became clear that one of the pre-eminent needs of the federation was for a regularly scheduled shipping service between the islands and that a vessel for this purpose would have to meet certain design specifications.

As a result of these investigations and of reports by Canadian representatives in the West Indies, the Canadian government took the view that the most useful thing that Canada could do for the West Indies was to make available a ship for this interisland service. The detailed plans and specifications to which the question is directed have yet to be drawn up. Canadian government shipping experts are being made available to the West Indies to help them draw these detailed plans and specifications; the first of a series of meetings between our experts and West Indies experts is expected to take place in the West Indies toward the end of June.

When discussions between Canada and the West Indies are much further advanced it will be possible to give much more detailed information in answer to the present inquiry. Tenders will be called for the construction of this ship in the usual way, but it is not possible to give a precise figure as to what the ship will cost or when it will be completed. The preliminary advice received is that the vessel will cost almost $2½ million. Funds to meet the cost expected to arise in the current financial year are included in the supplementary estimates of the Department of External Affairs.

Parts 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the question are directed at the arrangements for the operation of this vessel when it is built. This vessel will be given to the West Indies federation. Title to the vessel will be formally turned over to that government and it is therefore a matter for the decision of that government how the vessel is operated, and with what company or other agency arrangements are made for its operation. It would not be appropriate to comment on the cost of operating the ship and the amount of the supposed annual deficit, except to state that Canada has not undertaken any responsibilities for the operation of the vessel. The operation of this vessel is a responsibility of the federal government of the West Indies; it is the view of the Canadian government that Canada can best give assistance by providing the vessel itself.

Part 2 of the question asks what trade will be promoted by this vessel between the two countries. Trade in the whole range of products which have traditionally moved between Canada and the islands will be assisted by the provision of this vessel. In particular, the products of the smaller islands will be moved more expeditiously, regularly and rapidly to major transshipment centres by the provision of a regularly scheduled interisland service.

When the technical discussions referred to above have advanced somewhat, further information will be available.

AUTOMOBILE EXPORTS TO CHINA

Question No. 22—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

Has an investigation been made into the allegation that automobiles manufactured in Canada have not been allowed to be exported to China because of action taken by the government of the United States and by automobile manufacturers in that country?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Yes. Inquiries in this matter have been instituted and are continuing.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT—LOANS TO FARMERS

Question No. 53—Mr. Argue:

1. How many farmers have applied for a loan under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act in each province and for each month since December 1, 1957 to date?

Questions

2. How many farmers in each province have obtained a loan under this act for each month since December 1, 1957?

3. What was the total amount paid out in loans within each province under this act for each month from December 1, 1957 to date?

4. What is the mean average amount of the loans given in each province since December 1, 1957?

5. What is the total amount that has been refunded under this act from within each province each month since December 1, 1957 to date?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. There is no record available of the number of producers who applied for advances under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act through their local elevator agent and whose applications were rejected because of ineligibility. Records are maintained, however, with respect to all applications approved by the local agent, the detail of which is shown in the answer to question 2.

APPENDIX "A"

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN FEDERAL AND SASKATCHEWAN GOVERNMENTS

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER CANADA

Ottawa, June 4, 1958.

My dear Premier:

I have your letter of May 30 in regard to the calculation of tax-sharing payments for the fiscal year 1958-59 for the province of Saskatchewan.

I am asking my colleague the Minister of Finance to examine the facts which you have placed before me and you will, no doubt, be hearing from him shortly.

I am,
Yours sincerely,
John G. Diefenbaker.

The Honourable T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Legislative Building,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

PREMIER'S OFFICE
Saskatchewan

Regina, May 30, 1958.

The Rt. Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Prime Minister:

Our officials have reported on the recent meeting of the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters. On the basis of their report, I am taking the liberty of writing you about a possibility which will have unfortunate effects upon the amendment to the Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act passed by the House of Commons last January.

We are now receiving the initial tax-sharing payments for fiscal 1958-59 based on 95 per cent of the latest revised 1957-58 payment, with adjustment for the increased share of 3 per cent of the federal individual income tax rates. We hoped that this was an indication that the basic stabilization amount for the current year would be adjusted so that we receive the benefits of the 3 per cent increase should the stabilization provision become operative.

Our officials inform us, however, that the payment now being made should not be considered a basic stabilization amount. Rather, the basic stabilization amount for fiscal 1958-59 will be 95 per cent of the 1957-58 payment, which was based on the old standard rate of 10 per cent of individual income tax.

In view of economic trends, this will nullify the purpose of the 3 per cent amendment.

Your telegram of last January 24 stated the purpose of the amendment as enabling provincial treasurers, when budgeting, "to know immediately what if any additional fiscal payments they may expect to receive from dominion government during the fiscal year".

On January 27 the Minister of Finance urged passage of this resolution to which "the government attaches very great importance, for it looks upon this measure as one that will bring aid to the provinces and municipalities of this country, and effective aid also in meeting the problem of unemployment". The minister stated further that the measure "will assure for the fiscal year commencing April 1 next an additional sum of $62,203,000 for distribution among them (the provinces) on the relatively simple basis of increasing from 10 per cent to 13 per cent that proportion of the individual income tax which the provinces are entitled to receive".

Of course, the value of the increase will be determined by the level of taxable income and population in taxation year 1958. To date, income trends indicate that the increase of 3 per cent will not provide an additional $62 million to the provinces, but will only offset the drop that might otherwise have taken place. Indeed, it now appears possible that there will be a drop in payments so severe that the basic stabilization provisions will be invoked. This means the amounts the provinces will receive for fiscal year 1958-59 will be the same as if the act had not been amended.

Therefore, the 3 per cent increase will not contribute to the objectives of aiding the provinces and municipalities and the unemployed. In addition, the budgetary aim of the amendment will be defeated, since the provinces will have overestimated their revenues by some $62 million. I feel sure that this is not the intention of your government.

I would urge that an amendment to the Tax-Sharing Arrangement Act be brought before parliament in order to forestall any possibility of the above occurring.

There seem to be two ways in which such an amendment can be given effect. First, for purposes of computing the basic stabilization amount for the current fiscal year, the 1957-58 payment be recalculated using a 13 per cent standard rate for individual income tax. Ninety-five per cent of this recalculation would become the basic stabilization amount for 1958-59. Allowing for final adjustment on the 1957-58 payment, this would approximate the amounts currently being received as initial 1958-59 payments.

A second method is to divide the 1958-59 basic stabilization amount into two components—95 per cent of the finally adjusted 1957-58 payment, and an additional 3 per cent on the standard rate for individual income tax, based on 1958 returns. While the value of this additional 3 per cent would not be known for some time, an approximate payment might be made. This would minimize provincial overbudgetting.

There is, of course, no suggestion that these amendments have any retroactive effect.

Unless an amendment is approved in time, new population estimates will lead to deductions for overpayment to the provinces in July. This gives the entire matter an element of great urgency, so I would request you to give this your earliest earnest consideration.

Because it is important to all provinces, I am sending copies of this letter to all provincial premiers.

Yours sincerely,
T. C. Douglas.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

OTTAWA, June 17, 1958

The Honourable T. C. Douglas, M.L.A.,
Premier of Saskatchewan,
Regina, Saskatchewan.

My dear Premier:—

As you know from his reply of June 4, the Prime Minister has sent me a copy of your letter of May 30 in which you make certain representations on the subject of stabilization under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act.

I am sorry that there has been an apparent misunderstanding on your part as to the basis of the preliminary payments for 1958-59. When I introduced the amendments last January, I was careful to point out and to illustrate by a table that the increase of $62 million you refer to was based on statistics of the previous year and not of the year commencing April 1, 1958. As early as February 21 your deputy provincial treasurer was advised of our concern regarding the trends that were appearing for the current year and the basis of the preliminary payment was clearly indicated in the letter accompanying the April remittance.

I mention this because I think everyone concerned has appreciated the difficulties of accurately estimating payments in the current year. This basis was requested by most of the provinces, including Saskatchewan, with a full knowledge of the problems. Under the circumstances, I can hardly be expected to assume responsibility for the budget estimates of the provinces. While I am always happy to supply as much and as accurate information as possible, in the final analysis the responsibility for these is the provinces' own. Mr. Fines seems to have accepted this point of view, for he has not budgeted on the basis of the illustrative figures of which the $62 million was a part, but on his own estimate of $34.5 million, an amount somewhat less than that on which we are paying at the present time.

While I quite understand and appreciate the desire to maintain revenues at as high a level as possible, I believe your suggestion involves more than was ever suggested or indicated at the time the idea of a floor under provincial payments was proposed. I made that quite clear in the House of Commons on January 29, 1958. The purpose was to assure that no province would suffer a sudden and serious fall from the previous year in revenue from federal payments under this act. It was not intended to be a retroactive application to the extent of 95 per cent of any improvement in terms that might result in the future.

Yours sincerely,
Donald M. Fleming.

THE NATIONAL ACCOUNTS

National Income and Product

In 1957 aggregate physical production in Canada remained substantially unchanged from the record-breaking year of 1956. In value terms, national production increased by 4 per cent to a peak level of $31.4 billion but the increase was a reflection of higher prices. In both 1955 and 1956 the economy had expanded at a quite extraordinary rate. In 1957 the momentum of the economy slackened, and this loss of momentum was evident in the fields of income, production and use of resources.

Agricultural production declined in 1957 mainly as a result of the much lower yield for the western grain crop. On the other hand, the volume of non-agricultural output rose by about one per cent in 1957. This gain, while indicating a continued high level of overall demand, marks a pronounced change from the situation in 1956 when for the second year in succession strong expansionary forces dominated the economy. During that two-year period, non-agricultural production in real terms increased by 16 per cent and in the later stages of the economic upsurge the demand for additional goods and services began to press against the limits of productive capacity. In 1957, non-agricultural output, apart from seasonal factors, reached a peak in the first quarter of the year. Under the influence of less buoyant economic conditions both at home and abroad, production remained relatively stable for the next six months and declined by about 2 per cent in the fourth quarter of 1957. During the course of the year, the pressure on supply progressively eased and in some sectors, particularly the resource-based export industries, the continued growth in output capacity was somewhat more than adequate in relation to existing levels of demand.

Employment in 1957 was, on the average, 2.4 per cent higher than in 1956 and this, in relation to the level trend in output, indicates that there was some decline in productivity. The labour force expanded at about double the average annual rate in the preceding five years and the gains in employment were not sufficient to absorb this extraordinarily large increase. Unemployment rose considerably and in early 1958 reached a higher level than in any other post-war year.

Both the commodity-producing industries and the service sector contributed to the modest rise in non-agricultural output for 1957 as a whole. Except for transportation, all the major service industries showed further increases in 1957, ranging from a small advance in retail and wholesale trade to a rise of 5 per cent for finance, insurance and real estate. The overall expansion in the volume of services amounted to about 1½ per cent. This indicates that there was some shift in the pattern of production since, in contrast to 1956, the growth in the goods-producing industry was less pronounced than in the service sector and accounted for a smaller share of the rise in total non-agricultural output. As in the previous year, the largest increase occurred in construction; the greater part of the growth of 8 per cent took place before the middle of 1957 when the high rate of activity in non-residential building began to taper off. There were substantial advances in mining and public utilities reflecting the continued stimulus from capital investment in the primary goods sector. Forestry was a notable exception and the sharp decline in activity in this industry was related to reduced sales of lumber in particular as well as higher inventories for other wood products. Non-durable goods manufacturing continued to rise slightly. Durable goods manufacturing, however, declined by almost 5 per cent with decreases concentrated in wood products, electrical apparatus, non-ferrous metal and iron and steel products. As a result manufacturing as a whole was off by about 2 per cent.

The sharp upward movement of production in 1956 was associated with a rapid rise in earned incomes. There was a further advance in national income during 1957 but the expansion reflected the changing tempo and pattern of economic activity and was more moderate, amounting to 3 per cent in contrast to the rise of 11½ per cent in the preceding year. In 1956 all major income groups kept pace with the rise in national income whereas in 1957 different trends prevailed among the individual components. Wage and salary payments rose faster than total income in 1957 and reached a level of $15.8 billion or $1,106 million above 1956. The gain in labour income of 7½ per cent was sufficiently large to bring about a further improvement in real purchasing power. Labour income after reaching a peak in August, 1957, began to ease off but the level of wage and salary payments in the fourth quarter remained about 4 per cent higher than in the same period twelve months earlier. A substantial part of the gain in labour income for the year 1957 was due to the rise of 3 per cent in the number of paid workers. Since it is estimated that there was some reduction in working hours, more than half of the increase in total wage and salary payments was accounted for by the continued upward movement in rates of pay.

Changes in business conditions are quickly reflected in the trend of corporate earnings. In 1955 and 1956 corporate profits rose to peak levels as greatly expanded productive facilities operated close to capacity levels. In 1957 lower prices for some of Canada's major export products and reduced output levels in a number of industries were some of the factors reflecting weaker market conditions. At the same time, costs of production continued to rise notwithstanding some easing in raw material prices. These trends on both the demand and the supply side were largely responsible for the decline of $297 million or 11 per cent in corporate profits during 1957.

Income from rentals and interest payments increased by 11 per cent in 1957 and reached a level of $2,179 million. The gain of $215 million was about the same as in the previous year and this tends to emphasize the steady growth in this component of investment income during recent years in contrast to the greater variation in corporate earnings.

Farm cash income declined by $75 million or 3 per cent in 1957. Lower returns from grains more than offset increased receipts from livestock and dairy products. Farm cash income takes into account only final sales whereas accrued farm income is based on the value of annual production. Thus, accrued net farm income fell by $500 million or 34 per cent in 1957, largely as a result of the decline of about 400 million bushels or 27 per cent in the western grain crop while farm cash income was maintained to a considerable extent from sales out of inventories. On a per capita basis the reduction in farm income for 1957 was somewhat less because of the further decline in the agricultural labour force.

Net income of non-farm unincorporated business remained largely stable in 1957. There was a modest gain in the service and trade sector. However, income from construction declined for 1957 as a whole notwithstanding a marked improvement in the latter part of the year when housing starts began to rise rapidly.

National Expenditure

In 1957 the capital investment programme and the world demand for Canadian exports tended to exert a lesser stimulus on economic development than in 1956. The change in the economic climate was reflected in more selective increases in demand over a wide range of consumer goods as well as a progressive slackening in the rate of inventory accumulation. The rise in government expenditures, particularly the pronounced growth in transfer payments, was an important factor in maintaining disposable personal income and a high level of overall spending. However, the transition during 1957 from a very rapid rate of growth in all sectors of the economy to a more diverse pattern of development had a pronounced effect in a number of directions. There was a reduction in merchandise imports as the pressure on domestic sources of supply diminished. The upward trend in prices for final goods and services continued but a greater degree of flexibility became apparent in wholesale prices the general index of which levelled off. Easier conditions in the credit field during the latter part of the year brought about a sharp reversal in the trend of interest rates. In contrast to 1956 when there were labour shortages, new job opportunities in 1957 failed to keep pace with the growth in the labour force.

In 1957 aggregate demand exclusive of inventory changes rose by $2.1 billion compared with an increase of $3.9 billion in the previous year. Although consumer outlays reflected the more stable trend of economic activity during 1957, the demand from this source became relatively more important as a stimulus to production. The expansion in consumer outlays in 1957 absorbed roughly one-half of the increase in overall demand exclusive of inventory changes and this was a higher proportion than in 1956 when about one-third of the expansion in total final purchases were made by consumers.

In 1957 personal expenditures on consumer goods and services rose by $1,071 million or about 6 per cent and reached a level of $19.8 billion. The growth in consumer demand was fairly steady in 1957 but the rate of advance was quite moderate compared to the sharply rising trend throughout the previous year. At the end of 1957, consumer expenditures were about 4 per cent above the level twelve months earlier compared to a gain of 9 per cent at the end of 1956. Whereas in 1957 consumer expenditures on services rose more than in 1956, the increase in outlays on non-durable goods was less marked than in the previous year and purchases of durable goods remained substantially unchanged compared with the expansion of 5 per cent in 1956. Higher prices in 1956 accounted for only a small part of the 7 per cent expansion in consumer outlays. In 1957 prices for consumer goods and services advanced by almost 4 per cent or about twice as fast as in the preceding year and accounted for about two-thirds of the growth in consumer expenditures. The increase of about 2 per cent in real consumption did not keep pace with rising population and per capita real consumption declined slightly in contrast to per capita gains of 3 per cent in 1956 and 5 per cent in 1955.

Government expenditures on goods and services rose in the calendar year 1957 by $346 million or 7 per cent and reached a level of $5,612 million. Since there was a decline in defence expenditures of about 2 per cent the growth in outlays on goods and services for civilian purposes at all three levels of government was larger than the expansion in total expenditures and amounted to $378 million or 11 per cent. Capital expenditures at all three levels of government rose by 11 per cent in 1957 or faster than investment outlays in the private sector. The share of investment outlays in total government expenditures on goods and services has steadily increased in recent years and rose from about one-fifth in 1954 to about one-quarter in 1957.

In 1956 business capital investment and housing expenditures combined rose by 30 per cent and this extraordinary expansion exerted a dynamic influence on economic development. The momentum carried over into 1957 and capital expenditures reached a level of $7,389 million about 9 per cent above 1956. This gain of $615 million was substantial and accounted for about 30 per cent of the rise in total final demand. It is noteworthy, however, that investment outlays as a whole, after reaching a peak in early 1957, remained stable in the second and third quarter and became a sustaining force rather than a stimulus to further expansion. In the fourth quarter there was a decline of almost 2 per cent but capital expenditures did not fall below the level twelve months earlier. Within this total the major components showed differing trends. In the first half of 1957 business capital investment rose more than enough to offset declines in residential construction. In the second half of the year combined business expenditures for plant and equipment eased somewhat whereas outlays on housing made a strong recovery.

Expenditures on residential construction rose by about two-thirds in the four years since 1952 due to continuing high demand, increased capacity on the part of the building industry and special financial arrangements under the National Housing Act. The upward movement came to a halt in the middle of 1956. In the course of the next four quarters housing outlays declined steadily and this was mainly associated with a shortage of mortgage money. During 1957, the competition for loan funds from other investment outlets lessened and, more important, government funds were made available in the second half of the year on a large scale to augment loan funds supplied by private lending institutions. There were also legislative changes in late 1957 which had the effect of reducing down payments on houses financed under the NHA. These factors contributed to a substantial recovery in home-building and expenditures at the end of 1957 were slightly above the level a year earlier. This trend was reflected in the number of housing starts which on a seasonally adjusted basis rose from a rate of 86,000 at the beginning of 1957 to a record rate of 150,000 by the end of the year. Housing completions remained fairly constant during 1957 and the number of completed dwelling units amounted to 117,000 or 18,000 units less than in 1956. The rate of completions in 1957 remained in excess of net family formation. Despite the renewed strength in the latter part of the year, expenditures on new residential construction for 1957 as a whole were 7 per cent below the level in the preceding year.

Non-residential construction rose sharply during the first half of 1957 and continued to expand for the rest of the year but at a slower pace. For 1957 as a whole the increase amounted to $644 million or 25 per cent and this was the largest expansion in absolute terms of any post-war year except 1956 when outlays rose by $741 million or 40 per cent. In 1956 the pressure on supplies and manpower was most acute in industrial and commercial construction and prices in this sector rose by about 6 per cent. In 1957 the increase in prices was more moderate and amounted to about 3 per cent. Taking account of the price factor, the average annual rate of increase in the volume of non-residential construction amounted to 30 per cent for the years 1956 and 1957. This compares with an average annual rate of physical growth of 9 per cent for the period 1948 to 1955.

In 1956 expenditures on new machinery and equipment were 34 per cent higher than in 1955. Outlays reached a peak in the first quarter of 1957 and then began to decline. A substantial part of the decline in expenditures on machinery and equipment during the latter part of 1957 was reflected in a reduction of purchases from abroad and to this extent did not affect domestic production and employment. For the year as a whole outlays on machinery and equipment remained 3 per cent above the level in 1956. However, prices rose proportionately faster and the volume of investment fell by about 2 per cent.

In 1957 inventories continued to expand but the additional investment amounted to only $142 million compared with $815 million in 1956. The smaller growth in overall inventories in 1957 was partly due to an outright reduction in farm inventories and partly a result of the slower accumulation in stocks held by business. The net decline in farm inventories between 1956 and 1957 amounted to $371 million, mainly the result of the much lower grain crop in 1957. Business inventories increased at a progressively slower rate during 1957 and in the fourth quarter showed a moderate decline. During the twelve-month period beginning in the fourth quarter of 1956, the swing in business inventories from heavy accumulation to slight liquidation amounted to over $600 million. This decline represented an offset to demand equal to about 2 per cent of gross national expenditure. For 1957 as a whole, business inventory accumulation continued although the addition to demand was $302 million less than in 1956. The effect of the upward movement of prices on inventories was less pronounced in 1957 than in 1956. In volume terms business inventories expanded by about 3 per cent in 1957 compared with 7 per cent in 1956.

In 1956 the extremely rapid rise in imports together with the lesser but very substantial increase in exports resulted in a current account deficit of $1,358 million, about twice the level in the preceding year. In contrast both exports and imports of goods and services increased by less than one per cent in 1957 and there was little change in Canada's current account deficit on a year-over-year comparison.

Personal Income And Its Disposition

Personal income differs from national income in a number of ways although the components of these two totals are for the most part similar or identical. While national income is the total of the annual earnings of Canadian residents from the production of goods and services, personal income is the sum of the current receipts of income regardless of whether these receipts are earnings from production. For example, personal income includes only that part of corporation profits which is actually received by Canadian persons as dividends. On the other hand, transfer payments such as family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' benefits and charitable contributions of corporations are part of personal income although they are not payments for services and, therefore, do not form part of national income.

In 1957 personal income increased by somewhat more than 5 per cent over 1956 and reached a record level of $23.1 billion. Although the gain of $1,184 million was smaller by about one-half than the increase of the previous year, personal income remained more buoyant than national income which rose by $780 million compared to the expansion of $2,371 million for the year 1956. Two factors in particular account for this difference. National income was affected by the decline in corporation profits in 1957 whereas personal income excludes this item but includes dividends paid to Canadian residents which rose by $22 million. Similarly, government transfer payments are only reflected in personal income and this item increased sharply in 1957. Government transfer payments which had risen only slightly in 1956 expanded by $318 million or 18 per cent in 1957. The growth in outlays was particularly pronounced in the second half of 1957 and in the fourth quarter transfer payments were about one-third higher than a year earlier. This sharply rising trend was instrumental in maintaining the level of personal income despite the decline in wage and salary payments in the latter part of 1957. Most of the increase in transfer payments took place at the federal level. To a substantial extent this was a reflection of the growth in unemployment insurance payments. Higher welfare payments brought about by legislative changes in the autumn of 1957 also had the effect of increasing disbursements.

In 1957 Canadians spent about 85 cents of each dollar of income on consumer goods and services, somewhat more than 6 cents took the form of personal saving and slightly over 8 cents was paid out in direct taxes. Although reductions affecting the federal income tax were introduced in 1957, the changes which became effective during the calendar year had only a minor impact on tax receipts and the rise of $195 million or 13 per cent in collections from the personal income tax was directly related to the expansion of personal income. The growth in total personal direct tax revenue was slightly less, amounting to $187 million or 11 per cent, because the decline in yield from succession duties more than offset the increase from miscellaneous taxes.

After payment of direct taxes Canadians had $21.2 billion at their disposal for spending or saving during 1957. The gain in disposable income amounted to $997 million or 5 per cent. There was some change in the pattern of disposition of personal income for 1957. The growth in consumer expenditures was somewhat larger than the expansion in disposable personal income and as a result personal saving declined. This decline in saving arose mainly because of the poor grain crop which affected both income in the form of lower earnings and saving in the form of sharply reduced farm inventories. Exclusive of farm inventories (increases in which are to a large extent involuntary saving), personal saving actually rose by $320 million or 25 per cent in 1957. Personal saving exclusive of farm inventories constituted 7.6 per cent of disposable income in 1957 compared with 6.4 per cent in 1956.

The increase in consumer expenditures for 1957 was almost entirely confined to non-durable goods and services. Purchases of non-durable goods rose by $469 million or 5 per cent and reached a level of $10.0 billion. As in the previous year there was a rise in outlays on food, tobacco, gasoline and clothing and these products absorbed the greater part of the expansion in expenditures. The steady upward trend in outlays on services continued in 1957 and the increase of 9 per cent was somewhat larger than in each of the two preceding years. Expenditures on durable goods in 1957 remained just about stable. In contrast to 1956 when sales of motor cars were at record levels, there was a notable decline in demand for cars during 1957 and this tended to offset relatively modest increases elsewhere.

Source and Disposition of Saving

Saving may be divided into three parts. In addition to personal saving, which is discussed in the preceding section, there are business saving and government saving.

The nation's total saving rose by 14 per cent in 1955 and 29 per cent in 1956. In 1957 decreases in farm inventories, in undistributed corporation profits, and in the government surplus, more than offset higher saving arising in the other major categories so that the total fell by $156 million or 2½ per cent.

Government saving consists of the excess of revenues over expenditures for all three levels of government combined. In the calendar year 1957 the revenues of all governments exceeded expenditures by $52 million compared with a surplus of $379 million in 1956. These figures are calculated in accordance with National Accounts practice and the decrease in government saving between 1956 and 1957 reflects for the largest part the adjustment of federal receipts to place corporate tax revenue on an accrual basis. Excluding the effect of this adjustment, which has no fiscal significance, government saving actually amounted to $292 million in 1957 compared with $321 million in 1956. As in the previous year, the surplus arose in the federal accounts and this was offset in part by the excess of expenditures over revenues for all provincial and municipal governments combined.

The largest part of national saving arises in the form of funds set aside by business enterprises for internal uses. In 1957, the two principal items, depreciation allowances and undistributed profits, moved in opposite directions and business saving as a whole remained largely stable. Undistributed corporation profits declined by $209 million in 1957. The reduction of one-fifth in retained earnings reflected lower total profits after taxes and an increase in the amount paid out in dividends. As in all the previous post-war years, depreciation allowances, the other major component of business saving, showed the effect of rising investment in capital facilities and increased in 1957 by $207 million or 6 per cent to a total of $3,722 million. This component constituted 61 per cent of total national saving compared with 57 per cent in 1956.

The deficit on our international current account amounted to $1,383 million in 1957 or only slightly more than in 1956, and the share of foreign funds in the financing of domestic investment remained substantially unchanged. The excess of Canada's current payments over receipts was balanced by the inflow of capital and a slight reduction in Canada's reserves of foreign exchange. The value of direct investment remained at a high level, but capital inflows from security transactions were, as in the previous year, the most important source of external capital. These transactions are treated more fully in the section on the International Balance of Payments.

Investment and Capital Expenditure

Investment expenditures in the public and private sectors combined reached a record level in 1957 and amounted to $8,794 million, an increase of $760 million over 1956. About nine-tenths of this expansion came about as a result of the rise in expenditures for construction. Capital outlays accounted for a greater proportion of gross national expenditure than in any other post-war year and constituted 28 per cent of the total, compared with 26.6 per cent in 1956 and about 23 per cent in each of the years 1955 and 1954. The value of capital investment put in place during 1957 actually exceeded the level of expenditures planned at the beginning of the year.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

The Budget—Appendix

Notwithstanding the unprecedented level of capital spending, there was a significant change in the underlying factors determining the rate of capital development. Over a wide range of industries the very rapid expansion and modernization of facilities during recent years had been effective in raising productive capacity to a level more or less in line with existing or prospective demand. On the other hand, housing and social capital expenditures which in part had been held back due to shortages responded only gradually to the effect of easier conditions in the market for labour, materials and funds and the total for the year as a whole remained substantially unchanged from 1956. As a result capital expenditures in 1957 rose less rapidly than in 1956 and increased by 10 per cent compared with 29 per cent in the preceding year. In volume terms, capital investment expanded by 5 per cent, compared with 22 per cent in 1956.

In 1956 there were substantial increases in capital outlays in all major groups except for institutions. Development in 1957 showed a more diverse pattern and investment declined in agriculture, forestry, the construction industry and in housing.

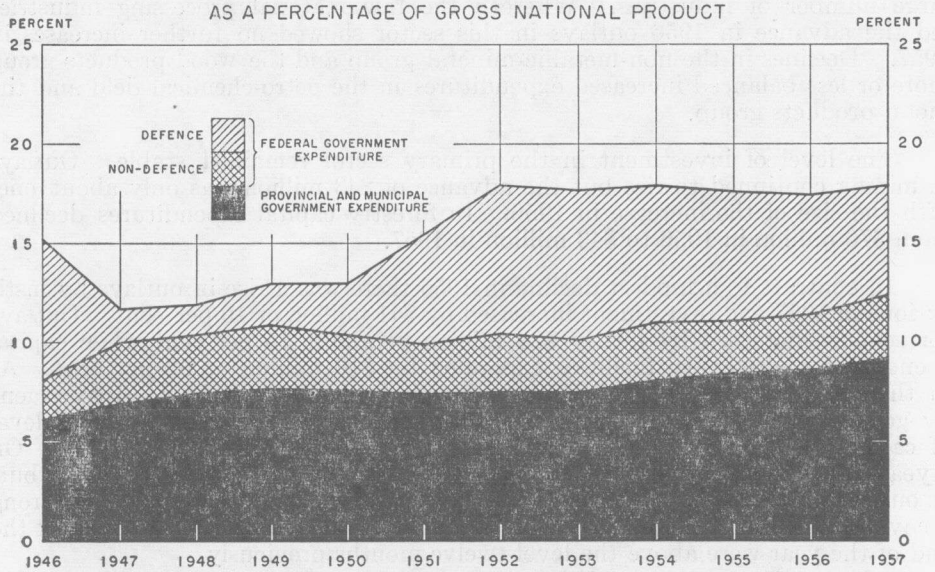
The largest expansion occurred in outlays by utilities. This sector absorbed only 27 per cent of total investment but contributed 78 per cent of the overall increase which took place in 1957. Expenditures rose by $591 million compared with $626 million in 1956. The pronounced and steady growth in this group reflects continued heavy requirements for power and transportation facilities. In addition the extension of gas pipelines and telephone networks accounted for significantly higher expenditures.

There was also a substantial rise in outlays by service establishments. Total expenditures increased by 18 per cent or about double the rate of expansion in the previous year. New investment by retailers more than offset a decline in expenditures by wholesalers and the increase of $55 million for the trade group as a whole was equal to more than one-half the expansion in the service sector.

Investment in manufacturing rose only modestly in contrast to the large increase in 1956. The growth of $32 million in expenditures was spread over a large number of industries. Whereas the raw material processing industries led the advance in 1956 outlays in this sector showed no further increases in 1957. Declines in the non-metallic mineral group and the wood products group more or less balanced increased expenditures in the petro-chemical field and the metal products group.

The level of investment in the primary sector remained stable. Outlays in mining continued to rise but the advance of $43 million was only about one-fifth the size of the increase in 1956. In forestry capital expenditures declined from $76 million in 1956 to $43 million in 1957.

In contrast to a modest decline in 1956 there was a rise in outlays by institutions in 1957 and investment increased by $41 million or 10 per cent. Outlays for schools increased by nearly $28 million or about 15 per cent while capital spending for university facilities expanded by $16 million or 62 per cent. As in the previous year expenditures on hospitals declined slightly. Investment by government departments rose by $123 million or 12 per cent and the level of capital expenditures in 1957 was about half as large again as in 1954. On a year-over-year comparison the largest absolute decline occurred in housing but, as outlined in the section on National Expenditure, home-building made a strong recovery in the second half of 1957 and outlays for residential construction at the end of the year were above the level twelve months previously.



Revenue and Expenditure of All Governments

This section includes only those government transactions which have relevance for the National Accounts, and consequently the surpluses or deficits shown here differ from those shown in the various public accounts. In particular, corporate taxes have been adjusted to an accrual basis. In the calendar year 1956 the adjustment was fairly moderate in size and increased revenues by $58 million. In 1957 the adjustment was much larger but reduced revenues by $240 million. Excluding the effect of this adjustment, which has no significance from a cash standpoint, the surplus for all levels of government combined was substantial in both years. The excess of revenues over expenditures amounted to $292 million in 1957 compared to $321 million in 1956. Compared with 1956, there was little change for the first three quarters of 1957 in the overall impact of budgetary operations on the nation's economy. In the fourth quarter of 1957, however, the shift in the federal surplus, declining both absolutely and relative to the level a year earlier, provided some offset to the slack in the private sector of the economy.

On the provincial and municipal level government expenditures increased by $400 million or 12 per cent while revenues rose by $441 million or 14 per cent and the deficit declined from $216 million in 1956 to $175 million in 1957. In the federal accounts, excluding the adjustment for the accrual of corporation taxes mentioned above, receipts increased by $238 million or 4 per cent and expenditures rose by $308 million or 6 per cent, so that the surplus fell by $70 million to a level of $467 million.

The economic effects of fiscal operations are not determined solely by revenues and expenditures. The expansionary or restrictive impact of governmental operations depends also on changes in loans and investments. In this sector, the net change in the federal accounts from the previous year was of significant proportions particularly in the latter part of 1957 and tended to exert a positive impact on economic activity.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES ON GOODS AND SERVICES
AS A PERCENTAGE OF GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT

For the calendar year 1957 government expenditures on goods and services rose by $346 million or about 7 per cent compared to an increase of $486 million or 10 per cent for 1956. The slower growth was almost entirely due to changes in the federal amounts. Defence expenditures declined by about 2 per cent from 1956 but remained somewhat above the level in each of the years 1955 and 1954. Non-defence outlays on goods and services rose by 9½ per cent in 1957 and this increase, while substantial, was considerably less than in the previous year. Whereas the level of defence expenditures fluctuated within a fairly narrow range in recent years federal outlays for other goods and services followed a steady upward trend. As a result, non-defence expenditures accounted for a growing share of total federal expenditures on goods and services, rising from 30 per cent in 1954 to 35 per cent in 1957. The pronounced upward movement in provincial and municipal outlays on goods and services continued in 1957 and expenditures increased by $295 million or 11 per cent above the level in the preceding year. In 1957 total expenditures on goods and services exclusive of defence at all three levels of government amounted to $3,844 million. Municipal governments accounted for the largest share or 45 per cent of the total compared with 30 per cent for provincial governments and 25 per cent for the Federal Government.

In recent years outlays at all three levels of government have risen rapidly and absorbed an increasing proportion of total final purchases of goods and services. The most striking expansion occurred in outlays of provincial governments which have risen by more than one-half since 1954. This trend in expenditures reflects to a large extent the heavy additions to capital facilities which were required due to the growth of population and as a result of the rapid rate of economic development. The substantial rise in wage and salary payments was also an important factor in bringing about the expansion of government outlays.

All levels of government contributed to the rapid growth of transfer payments in 1957. The advance of $230 million or 13 per cent in federal transfer payments was particularly notable in contrast to the moderate increase of one per cent in 1956 and 3 per cent in 1955. A substantial part of this expansion in 1957 came about as a result of legislative changes. Social security benefits were increased in 1957, including higher family allowances, old age pensions and veterans' pensions as well as more generous provisions for payments to the unemployed. The growth in the number of persons eligible to receive old age pensions and family allowances also had the effect, as in previous years, of bringing about higher disbursements. However, the major impetus underlying the rapid expansion of federal transfer payments was the rise in unemployment and the consequent increase in unemployment insurance payments. There were increases in benefits paid under provincially administered welfare programmes and this, together with the continued growth in grants to private non-commercial institutions, led to an expansion of disbursements by provinces and municipalities. Transfer payments of provincial and municipal governments were $106 million or 14 per cent higher than in 1956.

The Federal Government collects by far the largest part of direct tax revenues whereas receipts from indirect taxes are shared in roughly equal proportion with provincial and municipal governments. Federal revenues from the personal income tax rose by $191 million or 13 per cent in 1957 and reached a level of $1,652 million. The important element in the growth of income tax receipts was the continued expansion of personal incomes. Although reductions in the federal income tax were announced during 1957, these changes for the most part did not become effective until 1958, and as a result had little effect on revenues during the calendar year 1957. There was a further increase in receipts from the Quebec income tax and from miscellaneous taxes. Federal collections from succession duties declined by $19 million whereas provincial revenues from this source remained stable. Total personal direct tax revenues rose by 11 per cent to a level of $1,907 million and accounted for about one-fifth of total revenue at all three levels of government.

Excluding the effect of the adjustment to place the federal corporation tax on an accrual basis, federal revenues from this source rose by $51 million or 4 per cent in the calendar year 1957. This modest increase in yield represents a fairly marked change from 1956 when receipts from the corporation income tax advanced by $247 million or 24 per cent. The trend in federal receipts reflects to an important degree the effect of the entry of Ontario into the corporation income tax field in 1957. Federal revenues were reduced by a tax credit of 9 per cent on the 1957 income of Ontario corporations. The increase from 7 to 9 per cent in the tax credit on earnings of Quebec corporations had a similar though less substantial effect on federal receipts. The sharp rise in provincial collections from the corporation income tax was directly related to these changes.

The growth of $188 million in collections from indirect taxes at all three levels of government was less than half as large as the expansion in revenues from these sources in 1956. The explanation for this is found in the trend of federal receipts which rose very rapidly in 1956 but remained largely stable in 1957.

Federal revenues from indirect taxes rose by 13 per cent in 1956 in contrast to the increase of one per cent in 1957. The decline in merchandise imports during 1957 led to a drop of $22 million or 4 per cent in customs duties. This decline was somewhat more than offset by further increases in sales and excise taxes but tax reductions and the more stable trend in consumer expenditures were instrumental in keeping the rise in revenues from these sources to relatively modest proportions. The upward trend in provincial and municipal revenues from indirect taxes continued in 1957 without much change and receipts rose by $170 million or 10 per cent above the level in 1956. There were increases of $13 million in receipts from retail sales taxes and of $46 million or 16 per cent from gasoline taxes. Receipts from natural resources rose slightly. Municipal revenues from the real property tax expanded by $74 million or 10 per cent in 1957.

Income from investment of provincial and municipal governments rose by $52 million or 10 per cent in 1957. There was a decline in income from this source in the federal accounts amounting to $47 million or 15 per cent, and this arose primarily because the deficit of the Canadian National Railways more than offset increases in other components of investment income.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

Canada's international transactions in 1957 reflected the changing tempo of economic activity both at home and abroad. The value of merchandise exports continued to rise but the expansion of 1½ per cent over the previous year was considerably smaller than the increase of 12 per cent recorded in 1956. The slower growth came about in association with a downward trend of production in the United States and a less rapid rate of expansion in Europe. The change in merchandise imports was even more pronounced and the total actually declined by about 1½ per cent in contrast to the sharp increase of 22 per cent in 1956. This was related in large measure to the levelling out in expenditures for business capital investment in Canada. In 1957 export prices remained fairly stable, but import prices increased by 3 per cent so that the terms of trade, or the ratio of export prices to import prices, moved against Canada.

The increase in merchandise exports together with the decline in merchandise imports brought about a reduction in the imbalance on commodity trade and the deficit fell to $578 million or $156 million below the record level incurred in the preceding year. There was, however, an increase in the deficit on non-merchandise transactions, and this slightly more than offset the shift in the trade balance. As a result the deficit on current account was $11 million above that in 1956 and amounted to $1,383 million. Notwithstanding the relatively stable level of the current account deficit when comparing the average for 1956 and 1957, the underlying movement in merchandise exports and imports brought about a pronounced change in the trade deficit in the second half of 1957, and the excess of total payments over receipts declined very substantially. At the end of 1957, the current account deficit in terms of the seasonally adjusted annual rate amounted to $1,116 million.

In 1957 merchandise exports rose by $76 million over 1956 and reached a level of $4,909 million. Notwithstanding the moderate expansion in total sales abroad there were substantial increases in some exports including a threefold rise in the value of uranium shipments and an increase of 35 per cent in sales of petroleum. Other commodities such as iron and steel, nickel and beef cattle also showed important advances over 1956. However, a larger number of items than in the previous year showed the effect of a lessening in demand. The biggest drop occurred in sales of wheat and other grains and there were smaller but substantial declines in exports of lumber, copper and other products of the forestry and mineral industries.

The value of merchandise imports fell from $5,567 million in 1956 to $5,487 million in 1957, a decline of $80 million or 1½ per cent. In volume terms the decline was actually larger since import prices rose by 3 per cent. While there were few significant changes in the value and composition of imports on a year-over-year comparison, the trends through 1957 were strikingly different from the movement in the previous year. In 1956 imports rose rapidly and on a seasonally adjusted basis reached a peak in the fourth quarter, whereas in 1957 there was some easing during the first nine months and this was followed by a sharp decline at the end of the year. In the fourth quarter of 1957 merchandise imports were about 10 per cent below the level in the same period of 1956. These changes were accompanied by a pronounced shift in the pattern of imports. Investment goods which had been the prime factor in the extraordinary growth of imports in 1956 became progressively less important and the substantial drop in requirements for machinery and equipment as well as industrial materials in the latter part of 1957 was instrumental in lowering the total level of purchases from abroad. Imports of consumer goods, on the other hand, were well sustained and there were further increases for some products.

BALANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PAYMENTS

The geographic pattern of Canada's external trade underwent moderate though significant changes in 1957. Compared with 1956, exports to the United States rose slightly while imports from that country declined materially. This decline in imports was related to the levelling off in capital investment, referred to above. Trade with the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries moved in the opposite direction with exports, particularly to the United Kingdom, substantially lower and imports significantly higher. Trade with Europe and Latin America increased in both directions. Trade with all other countries, taken together, followed a pattern similar to Canada's trade with the United States, exports rising and imports falling.

Comparing 1957 with 1956, the trade deficit with the United States showed a decline; the surplus with the United Kingdom was reduced; the balance with other Commonwealth countries moved into deficit; and the trade surplus with all other countries showed an increase.

The deficit on non-merchandise transactions rose from $638 million in 1956 to $805 million in 1957, an increase of $167 million. The growth in the deficit came about mainly as a result of the rise of 7 per cent in total payments but also because of a decline of one per cent in total receipts. On the payments side all categories except freight and shipping showed an increase over 1956. Interest and dividend payments rose more than other items, and the increase in this group accounted for about one-half of the expansion in total non-merchandise expenditures. The major factor in bringing about the decline in total receipts was a reduction in expenditures by the United States Government on defence installations in Canada. There was also a decline in earnings from freight and shipping.

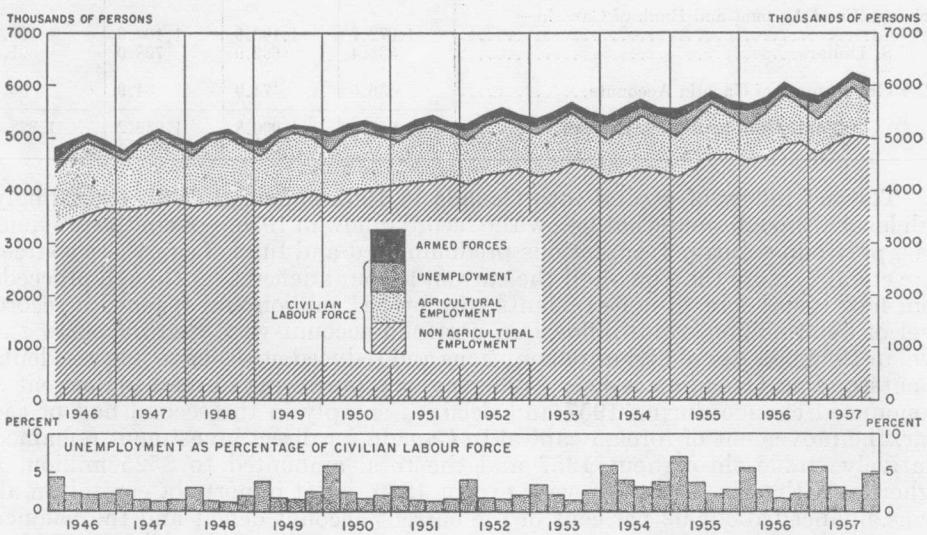
The net inflow of capital into Canada in 1957 remained at an exceedingly high level although somewhat below the record inflow in 1956. As in the previous year, portfolio security transactions predominated and funds from these sources were equal to more than one-half the current account deficit. Although proceeds from new issues sold to non-residents rose by $81 million and reached a record level of $762 million, total inflows on portfolio account were slightly below the level in 1956 because of higher redemptions and reduced net sales to non-residents of outstanding Canadian issues. Whereas new borrowing abroad underwent a pronounced change during 1957 and declined sharply in the second half of the year, the movement of foreign capital to Canada for direct investment remained relatively stable throughout 1957 and the total amounted to $525 million, a higher level than in any other year except 1956. Net imports of capital, in all forms, financed about 92 per cent of the current account deficit and the balance was met by a moderate withdrawal from exchange reserves. At December 31, 1957, official reserves of gold and United States dollars, expressed in United States funds, amounted to $1,828 million compared with $1,936 million at December 31, 1956.



Throughout 1956 the exchange value of the Canadian dollar rose steadily and this upward trend continued until August, 1957, when the premium on the Canadian dollar reached a peak of over 6 per cent in terms of the United States dollar. Subsequently, the premium on the Canadian dollar declined. For December, 1957, the average rate of exchange for the United States dollar was 97.74 compared with 96.05 for December, 1956.

EMPLOYMENT AND EARNINGS

There were more persons with jobs in each month of 1957 than in the corresponding period of 1956, but in the fourth quarter of the year the gains became progressively smaller as employment began to show the effects of the levelling out in production. For 1957 as a whole the number of persons with jobs rose on the average by 135,000 or 2.4 per cent compared with increases of 3.7 per cent in 1956 and 2.6 per cent in 1955. A significant factor in 1957 was the extraordinarily large expansion in the labour force which rose by 3.7 per cent compared to 2.6 per cent in 1956 and 2.4 per cent in 1955. It is estimated that about 210,000 persons entered the labour market in 1957, some 63,000 more than during 1956. The faster rate of increase in 1957 came about partly as a result of the very high level of immigration, but also because of a further rise in the labour force participation rate as more housewives, older persons and others decided to take up work outside the home. Thus, conditions in the labour market, reflecting on the one hand the less favourable trend in employment opportunities and on the other hand an unusually large addition to the labour force, led to a substantial rise in unemployment during 1957.

The shift from rural to urban occupations which had been a notable feature in the pattern of employment during recent years continued in 1957 and about 28,000 persons left the agricultural industry. The drop of 3½ per cent in agricultural employment compares with a decrease of 5½ per cent in 1956 and 6 per cent in 1955.

THE LABOUR FORCE

During the first three quarters of 1957 the number of persons employed in non-agricultural occupations rose, on a seasonally adjusted basis, by almost 3 per cent over the level in the fourth quarter of 1956 while the volume of non-agricultural production remained largely unchanged. This difference in trends is less pronounced when account is taken of the decline in hours worked per week. None the less, it suggests that there occurred a decline in productivity compared to the situation in 1956 when the expansion of 7 per cent in output was accompanied by a rise of 5.4 per cent in employment. Productivity is affected by a wide variety of factors and these may combine at any one time to bring about a notable deviation from the long-run trend. Since overall economic activity kept more or less stable during most of 1957 the adjustments in plant operations tended to lag behind the selective declines in demand which took place in a number of industries and this was reflected in less economic operations, including the use of proportionately more labour than earlier when output was closer to optimum levels. There was also a shift in the pattern of production in 1957 from industries using a large amount of fixed investment such as the resource-based industries to sectors which employ relatively more labour such as the service industries and this may have had a similar effect on the labour output ratio. These and other such factors ceased to have any further marked impact during the fourth quarter of 1957 when both production and employment in the non-agricultural sector moved in the same direction and declined.

Employment in the major commodity producing industries followed a similar trend and the number of persons with jobs at the end of 1957 was below peak levels reached four to twelve months earlier. The decline was most pronounced in the forestry industry whereas the level of employment in mining remained fairly stable in the fourth quarter of 1957. In the service sector employment continued to rise throughout 1957 but the increase was less marked than in the preceding year.

Throughout 1957 unemployment was higher than in the preceding year. For 1957 as a whole there were 254,000 persons without jobs and seeking work or 75,000 more than in 1956. Unemployment in 1957 accounted for the same proportion of the labour force as in 1954 when a post-war peak had been reached and averaged 4.3 per cent compared with 3.1 per cent in 1956. The low in unemployment occurred in June, 1957, when 162,000 persons were jobless, compared with 117,000 during the same period in 1956. From the third quarter to the end of 1957 unemployment just about doubled and there were 386,000 jobless persons in December compared with 186,000 a year earlier. On a seasonally adjusted basis unemployment rose throughout 1957. In the first quarter of 1958 the seasonally adjusted index of unemployment showed a further increase. However, the rate of increase was considerably less than in the fourth quarter of 1956. In April, 1958, unemployment began to decline but remained higher than in the previous year.

The steady upward movement which characterized the trend in labour income during recent years ceased in September, 1957. Wage and salary payments declined but in each successive month labour income remained above the level reached in the same period twelve months earlier. For 1957 as a whole there was a substantial expansion in labour income amounting to 7½ per cent. The number of paid workers rose by 140,000 or about 3 per cent in 1957 and average annual earnings per paid worker amounted to $3,534, an increase of $141 or 4 per cent over the previous year. Since it is estimated that average hours worked per week were somewhat lower than in 1956, there was obviously a pronounced increase in rates of pay. In manufacturing, for example, average hourly earnings rose by about 6 per cent compared with a 5 per cent increase in 1956. For the economy as a whole the rise in consumer prices provided an offset to most of the gain in per capita earnings and the improvement in real income for 1957 was slight compared to the advance of 4 per cent in 1956.

The increase in earnings in 1957 occurred in all the main industrial categories. Whereas wages and salaries paid in the service sector rose faster than labour income as a whole there was less buoyancy in the commodity producing industries. Finance and related groups led the way with an increase of 12 per cent. There was also a pronounced rise in salaries and wages paid by public utilities, transportation, communications, storage and trade and the total advanced by 9 per cent. In manufacturing the increase in labour income was substantial and amounted to 5 per cent. Earnings in construction and in the primary industries rose by more than 3 per cent.

MONETARY AND CREDIT DEVELOPMENTS

There were substantial changes in monetary and financial conditions in Canada in 1957. During the first part of the year the pressure of demand for money and credit continued to increase. Although the amounts of money that Canadians were willing to save and to lend continued to expand, the amounts wanted by borrowers rose even more rapidly. Competition in the market for loanable funds increased and interest rates rose.

During the latter part of the year there was a pronounced change in the balance between supply and demand in the market for borrowed money. As overall spending in the economy levelled off, conditions in the capital market became easier and in addition action by the Bank of Canada had the effect of improving the liquidity of the chartered banks. As a result of these and other factors interest rates which had reached a post-war peak in August, 1957, began to decline. The sharpest drop occurred in short-term rates. Three-month treasury bills fell from 4.08 per cent in August, 1957, to 1.54 per cent in May, 1958. Yields on medium-term government bonds were close to 5 per cent in August, 1957, and subsequently the three to five-year theoretical rate steadily declined to 3.13 per cent in May, 1958. The 15-year theoretical rate fell from about 4½ per cent in August, 1957, to 3.75 per cent in December and kept relatively stable in early 1958. During part of 1956 and in 1957 the yield on short-term and medium-term bonds was higher than on long-term bonds, but in early 1958 the situation was reversed.

Interest rates for provincial, municipal and industrial bonds also declined from the levels in the third quarter of 1957. The chartered banks prime commercial loan rate fell from a high of 5¾ per cent in 1957 to 5¼ per cent in early 1958. The Bank of Canada discount rate continued to be established on the basis of one-quarter per cent above the average tender rate for treasury bills. The Bank Rate declined from a peak of 4.33 per cent in August, 1957, to 1.79 per cent in May, 1958.

Monetary conditions in the United States began to ease somewhat later than in Canada and in the latter part of 1957 the spread between interest rates in the two countries narrowed. However, some widening took place again in the first part of 1958, particularly in long-term rates.

Net new bond issues by provinces, municipalities, corporations and institutions reached a peak in the second quarter of 1957 but the amount of new funds obtained in the market in the second half of 1957 was less than in the same period of 1956. For 1957 as a whole, net bond issues were $175 million higher than in the preceding year and reached a level of $1,725 million. Net new corporate stock issues, however, declined by $181 million in 1957 in contrast to the increase of $225 million in the previous year. As in 1956, the widening spread between interest rates in Canada and the United States made borrowing in the United States market attractive. For 1957 as a whole, a larger amount of new issues was sold to non-residents than in the preceding year, notwithstanding a substantial decline in issues sold abroad during the latter part of 1957 when the interest rate differential narrowed.

Although the banks were in a position to expand their lending activity in the latter part of 1957, the demand for bank loans levelled off and most of the increase in chartered bank assets remained in relatively liquid forms. Total assets increased by $483 million in the last five months of 1957 and more than one-half of this was reflected in the expansion of day-to-day loans and in purchases of government bonds.

General loans remained relatively stable during the last half of 1956 and for the first ten months of 1957 but declined in November and December below the level twelve months earlier. During 1957, the largest decrease occurred in loans to instalment finance companies. This was related to the markedly slower expansion of consumer credit in 1957. Loans for construction purposes also fell, reflecting a levelling off in the rate of activity in the building industry. These and other declines were partly offset by a higher level of lending to industrial concerns, to merchandizers and public utilities among others.

There were no significant changes in bank holdings of corporate and provincial and municipal securities in 1957. The addition to bank holdings of insured N.H.A. mortgages amounted to about $93 million and most of this expansion took place in the second half of 1957.

The public's holdings of currency, bank deposits and Government of Canada securities rose by $235 million in 1957 or considerably more than in the previous year. Holdings of currency and bank deposits increased by $308 million while holdings of Government of Canada securities fell by $73 million. This increase in the public's liquid assets occurred almost entirely as a consequence of activity in the banking system since there was approximate balance between the total budgetary and non-budgetary receipts and outlays of the Federal Government.

[1] To make the statistics for the different periods in this table comparable certain approximate adjustments have been made in calculating changes in loans and investments. The 1956 figures have been adjusted for the reclassification of foreign currency loans from Canadian loans to net foreign assets which was made in the returns of the banks to the Department of Finance, and the 1957 figures for the change in the allocation of inner reserves consequent upon the change in the method of valuing Government and provincial securities required in the returns of the banks to the Department of Finance.

In 1957 the total amount of Federal Government direct and guaranteed securities outstanding declined by $69 million, the reduction of $177 million in market securities being partially offset by the increase of $108 million in Canada Savings Bonds. For the year as a whole there was a decrease of $151 million in the amount of this debt held in government accounts, a decrease of $73 million in the amount held by the general public and an increase of $154 million in the amount held in the banking system.

PRICE TRENDS

After several years of relative stability the consumer price index began to rise in mid-1956, and the upward movement continued throughout most of 1957. In December, 1957, consumer prices were 2.3 per cent higher than at the start of the year compared to an increase of 3 per cent during the same period in 1956. Whereas consumer prices followed a rising trend, the general index of wholesale prices reached a peak in January, 1957, and declined slowly during the succeeding ten months. Wholesale prices fell by 1.4 per cent in the course of 1957 in contrast to the rise of almost 3 per cent in each of the two preceding years.

The consumer price index rose steadily from 120.3 in January, 1957, to 123.4 in October. There were fractional declines in the next two months but the upward movement was resumed and the index reached a level of 125.2 in April, 1958. This was followed by a small decline in May, 1958, and the index stood at a level slightly more than 3 per cent higher than a year earlier. During 1957 the largest increase occurred in the cost of services which rose by over 4 per cent. All other major components of the index also followed an upward trend. The smallest increase, apart from seasonal movements, was in food prices, which in December, 1957, were 1½ per cent higher than at the beginning of the year. However, in early 1958 food prices provided the major impetus to the rise in the consumer price index. The food component rose by 3.9 per cent during the first four months of the year and in April, 1958, stood at a level 5.7 per cent higher than twelve months previously. This upward movement was in part attributable to the effects brought about by poor crop conditions in the United States. In May, 1958, the food index declined somewhat.

CANADIAN WHOLESALE AND CONSUMER PRICE INDEXES

The United States consumer price index, like the Canadian index, registered a further increase in 1957 and prices rose by nearly 3 per cent during the year. The upward trend continued in 1958. Food prices in the United States rose more rapidly than in Canada and in April, 1958, were nearly 7 per cent higher than in the same month of 1957.

The Canadian index of wholesale prices averaged somewhat higher for the year 1957 than for 1956, but this comparison hides the downward movement which prevailed during most of 1957. The index declined from a high of 229.2 in January, 1957, to a low of 224.1 in November. Increases in the next few months brought the index back to a level of 228.1 in March, 1958, approximately the same level as a year earlier. The rising trend mainly reflected the exceptional level of demand in the United States for Canadian cattle. In April, 1958, there was a small decline in the index of wholesale prices. During 1957 and early 1958 the broad categories of wholesale prices followed diverse trends. The most rapid decline occurred in prices of industrial materials, particularly non-ferrous metals, although some firming became apparent in early 1958. There was a substantial downward movement during 1957 in prices of raw materials but this was followed by increases in the first few months of 1958. The same trend prevailed for Canadian farm products. The recovery of prices in 1958 was notable and the index for farm products stood at 222.7 in April, 1958, about 6 per cent higher than twelve months earlier. Prices for building materials and manufactured products remained fairly stable during this period except for some easing in prices for residential building materials in the second half of 1957.

REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS

1. INTRODUCTION

The figures presented in this Part for the fiscal year 1957-58 are preliminary and subject to revision. The fiscal year of the Government ended on March 31 but the books must remain open for some time after that date to record various adjusting entries and to take into account all payments up to and including April 30 made on account of expenditures originating in and properly chargeable to the fiscal year 1957-58. The final figures when they become available next August may vary to some extent from those given in the following pages.

2. HIGHLIGHTS OF GOVERNMENTAL FINANCIAL OPERATIONS DURING 1957-58

Budgetary transactions

Revenues of the government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, amounted to $5,047 million. This was $97 million or about 2 per cent less than the forecast of $5,144 million given in the financial statement of December 6, 1957, and $59 million or one per cent less than the total of $5,106 million collected in 1956-57.

Expenditures amounted to $5,086 million and were $22 million or less than ½ of one per cent more than the December forecast of $5,064 million and $237 million or 5 per cent more than the total spent in 1956-57.

Expenditures in 1957-58 exceeded revenues and resulted in a budgetary deficit of $39 million compared with a December forecast of a surplus of $80 million and a surplus of $258 million in 1956-57.

On the revenue side of the government's budgetary operations collections have shown a decline from the previous year. Part of this was due to the reductions in taxes announced in the March, 1957 budget and in the financial statement of December 6, 1957, and part to the fact that the general level of activity and production in the economy has been somewhat less than that on which the forecasts had been based. Although receipts from corporation income tax, succession duties, and excise duties and taxes other than sales tax, and non-tax revenues exceeded expectations, these were more than offset by the amount by which collections of personal and non-resident income taxes, customs import duties and sales tax fell short of expectations.

On the expenditure side defence has again been the most significant feature in the government's programme. In 1957-58 defence expenditures amounted to $1,687 million, a decrease of $96 million or 5 per cent from the preceding year and represented 33 per cent of the government's total budgetary outlay. In 1956-57 defence expenditures amounted to $1,784 million and constituted 37 per cent of the total.

The Budget—Appendix

Non-budgetary transactions

Although the budgetary deficit for 1957-58 was only $39 million, the government's bank balances at the end of the fiscal year were $164 million less than a year ago. This reduction was the net result of the budgetary deficit of $39 million, payments of $571 million for loans, investments and working capital advances and other non-budgetary disbursements offset by receipts of $447 million from repayments of loans and investments, annuity, insurance and pension accounts and other non-budgetary sources together with a reduction of $1 million in outstanding unmatured debt.

The following table summarizes the budgetary and non-budgetary transactions for the fiscal year and indicates how they, together with changes in the unmatured debt, affected the government's cash balances. For purposes of comparison, the corresponding figures for 1956-57 are also shown. In the section entitled "The Cash Position" a more detailed explanation of these transactions is given.

Old age security fund

Pension payments from the old age security fund amounted to $474 million in 1957-58 and tax receipts credited to the fund totalled $372 million, and the deficit of $102 million for the fiscal year was covered by a temporary loan by the Minister of Finance to the fund. During 1956-57 pension payments amounted to $379 million and tax receipts credited to the fund to $371 million, resulting in an excess of pension payments over tax receipts of $8 million, of which $6 million was charged to expenditures in 1956-57 under the authority of a vote of parliament. Parliament will be asked to authorize writing off to expenditure in 1957-58 temporary loans of $104 million outstanding at March 31, 1958.

Debt transactions

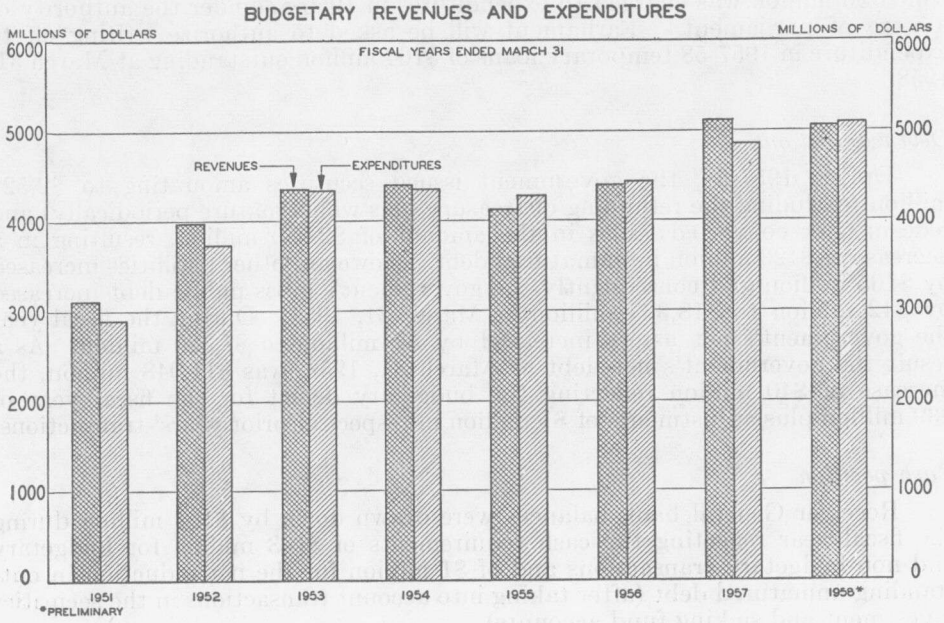
During 1957-58, the government issued securities amounting to $2,527 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature periodically) and redeemed or converted issues in the amount of $2,650 million, resulting in a decrease of $123 million in unmatured debt. However, other liabilities increased by $165 million and consequently the government's gross public debt increased by $42 million to $18,368 million at March 31, 1958. During the fiscal year the government's net assets increased by $2 million to $7,320 million. As a result the government's net debt at March 31, 1958, was $11,048 million, the increase of $40 million reflecting the budgetary deficit for the fiscal year of $39 million plus adjustments of $1 million in respect of prior years' transactions.

Cash position

Receiver General bank balances were drawn down by $164 million during the fiscal year reflecting the cash requirements of $163 million for budgetary and non-budgetary transactions and of $1 million for the net reduction in outstanding unmatured debt (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts).

3. THE BUDGETARY ACCOUNTS

Total revenues, amounting to $5,047 million for 1957-58, were $59 million less than the total for the previous year. Total expenditures were $5,086 million, an increase of $237 million over the total for 1956-57. The deficit for the fiscal year was $39 million compared with a surplus of $258 million for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957.



A summarized statement of the revenues and expenditures and deficit for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, with the figures for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1951 to 1957 inclusive, is given in the following table:

A. Revenues

Budgetary revenues amounted to $5,047 million in the fiscal year 1957-58. This was $59 million or one per cent less than in the previous year. Of the total for the year, $4,622 million or 92 per cent, was derived from taxes and $425 million or 8 per cent from non-tax revenues.

A statement of revenues for 1957-58 classified by major sources and the corresponding figures for 1956-57 is given in the following table:

(1) Tax revenues

Tax on personal incomes

The personal income tax in 1957-58 was again the largest source of government revenue. The yield for the year (excluding the old age security tax) was $1,499 million. This was $99 million, or 7 per cent more than in the previous year. This increase was due to the rise in the total of personal incomes that took place in 1957.

BUDGETARY REVENUES BY SOURCE

In addition the 2 per cent tax on personal incomes levied under the Old Age Security Act totalled $135 million during 1957-58 compared with $125 million in 1956-57. The maximum tax is $60 per person. This revenue was credited to the old age security fund.

Corporation income tax

Corporation income tax was the second largest revenue producer in 1957-58. Collections (excluding the old age security tax) were $1,235 million, a decrease of $33 million from the previous year. This decrease was due to lower profits in 1957 and the re-entry of the Province of Ontario into the corporation income tax field. These influences were offset in part by substantial receipts early in the year on account of high 1956 profits.

In addition the 2 per cent tax on income of corporations under the Old Age Security Act yielded $61 million during 1957-58 compared with $67 million collected from this source in 1956-57. These collections were credited to the old age security fund.

Taxes on interest, dividends, rents and royalties going abroad

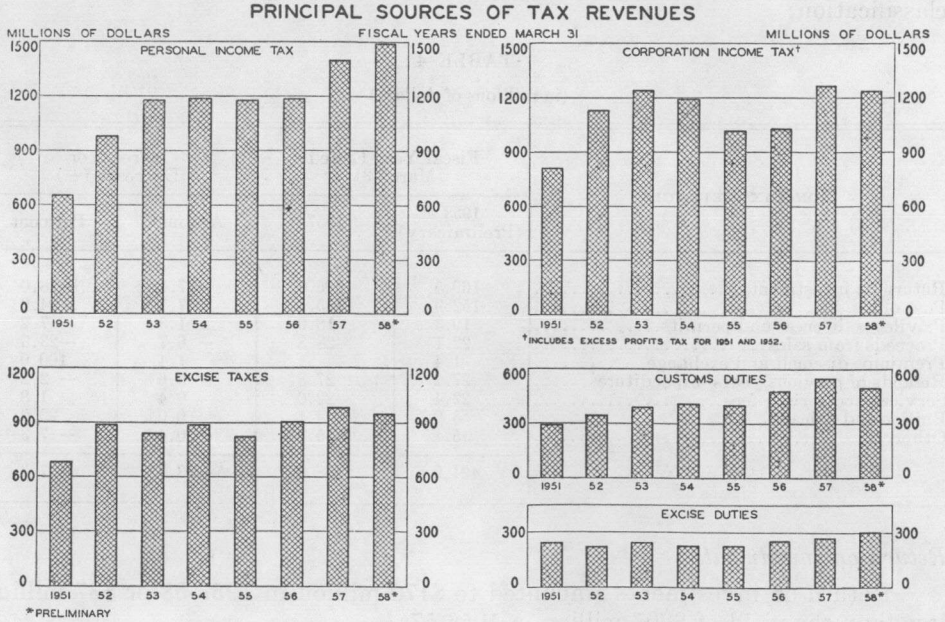
Revenue under this heading is derived from taxes withheld on payments of interest, dividends, rents, royalties, alimony and income from estates and trusts made to non-residents. The total of $64 million for 1957-58 was $12 million less than in the previous year reflecting lower corporate profits in 1957 and the fact that refunds adjusting overpayments in previous years were larger than usual.

Excise taxes

Included under this heading are the revenues from the general sales tax and the special excise taxes levied on a wide range of manufactured products. Total net collections for the year were $953 million a decrease of $32 million or 3 per cent from 1956-57.

The sales tax, which from a revenue standpoint is the most important tax levied under the Excise Tax Act, yielded a net revenue of $703 million in the year (excluding the 2 per cent old age security sales tax). This was $14 million or 2 per cent less than in the previous year reflecting the changes announced in the March 1957 Budget which exempted a number of commodities from this tax.

Excise taxes other than the general sales tax yielded approximately $250 million, or $18 million less than in 1956-57. This decrease was due mainly to tax changes. The repeal of the tax on candy and chewing gum in March 1957 resulted in a reduction of revenue for the year of $9 million and the repeal of the tax on soft drinks at the same time reduced revenue by $8 million. The reduction in the tax on automobiles from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent on December 6, 1957, resulted in revenue from this source declining $7 million. In addition lower sales of television sets caused the revenue from the tax on this item to decline by $2 million.



These declines were partly offset by an increase of $10 million from the taxes on tobacco products. The revenues from the taxes on jewellery, matches, lighters, toilet preparations, wines and sundry commodities showed little change from the previous year.

The 2 per cent tax on sales levied under the Old Age Security Act and credited to the old age security fund yielded $176 million in 1957-58 compared with $179 million in the previous year.

Customs import duties

Revenue from customs import duties was $498 million, a decrease of $51 million or 9 per cent from 1956-57. This decrease in revenue reflected the decrease in the volume and value of imports during the year.

PRINCIPAL SOURCES OF TAX REVENUES

Excise duties

Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products. (Additional taxes on tobacco products are levied under the Excise Tax Act referred to above.) The revenue from excise duties for the year was $300 million, an increase of $29 million or 11 per cent over the previous year. The collections from the taxes on alcoholic beverages, before deducting refunds, were $172 million, an increase of $18 million over the previous year. The gross receipts from the taxes on tobacco products amounted to $132 million, an increase of $11 million.

Succession duties

Revenue from succession duties totalled $72 million in 1957-58, a decrease of $8 million from the previous year. The revenue from this source for the year as well as for the previous year was substantially affected by collections from two unusually large estates.

Other taxes

The principal source of revenue under this heading in the previous year was the tax on the premium income of insurance companies amounting to $17 million. In 1957-58 the federal government withdrew from the premium tax field in favour of the provinces. Small amounts of revenue were received from the special taxes on the export of electrical energy from Canada and the tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories.

(2) NON-TAX REVENUES

Non-tax revenues for 1957-58 amounted to $425 million, $34 million less than the 1956-57 total of $459 million. The following table presents a comparative summary of these revenues for the two fiscal years by principal classification:

TABLE 4

Return on investments

Return on investments amounted to $170 million in 1957-58 or $37 million less than the yield of $207 million in 1956-57.

Payments from Crown corporations were $114 million or $39 million less than similar payments of $153 million received in 1956-57. A large part of this decrease was due to receipts from the Bank of Canada and reflects an increase of $21 million in the Bank's profits transferred to the Receiver General for 1957 over those for 1956 more than offset by the non-recurring payment of $43 million in 1956 on inner investment reserves set aside out of past years' profits, which were no longer required when the Bank adopted amortized values as the basis for valuing its holdings of securities. Most of the remainder of the decrease was due to a reduction of $18 million in receipts from the Canadian National Railways, as there were no profits of the Company in 1957 to be transferred to the Receiver General.

Receipts from other loans and investments were $55 million, or $2 million more than similar receipts in 1956-57. Increases of $6 million in exchange fund profits and $1 million in sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt were nearly offset by decreases of $3 million in the earnings of the securities investment account, $1 million in receipts from interest-bearing balances with chartered banks and $1 million in interest payments from other national governments.

A comparative summary of the receipts for 1957-58 and the previous year is given in the following table:

Post Office

Net post office receipts credited to budgetary revenues in 1957-58 totalled $153 million or $7 million more than in 1956–57. Gross receipts were $177 million but authorized disbursements from revenues for salaries and rent allowances at semi-staff and revenue offices, commissions at sub-offices, transit charges on Canadian mail forwarded through or delivered in foreign countries, etc., amounted to $24 million. Last year, gross receipts amounted to $168 million and authorized disbursements totalled $22 million.

As costs of operating the post office during 1957–58 (excluding the $24 million charged to revenues) were $153 million, net costs and net revenue were the same for 1957-58. However, in making this comparison, it is to be noted that the total shown for post office revenue does not reflect any payment for the franking privilege covering parliamentary and departmental mail or for certain miscellaneous services provided for other government departments and agencies, nor does the total shown for operating expenses reflect any charges for premises occupied by the Post Office Department or for certain accounting and miscellaneous services provided by other departments.

Privileges, licences and permits

Revenues of $19 million were received during the fiscal year on account of privileges, licences and permits compared with $18 million received last year. Included in the total for the current fiscal year was approximately $8 million for collections by the Department of Transport, mainly on account of aircraft landing fees, rentals of hangar accommodation, and other miscellaneous rental charges.

Proceeds from sales

Receipts from proceeds from sales were $22 million for 1957–58 or about $7 million less than the total received in 1956–57. This amount included $7 million from Crown Assets Disposal Corporation representing amounts realized from the disposal of surplus Crown assets (after deducting certain agency fees and transfers), $4 million under agreements of sale, and $5 million from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation representing the proceeds from the sale of wartime housing properties, including depreciation provisions set aside by the Corporation in previous years on properties that have now been sold.

Premium, discount and exchange

Premium, discount and exchange transactions in the current fiscal year resulted in a net credit of $1 million to revenues compared with a net charge of $1 million to expenditures in the previous fiscal year.

Refunds of previous years' expenditures

Refunds in the current fiscal year of expenditures made in prior years totalled $27 million compared with $28 million received last year. A large part of these refunds arose from previous years' expenditures by the Department of National Defence on contracts with the United States Government for the supply of engines, aircraft and other defence equipment. The arrangement is that when Canada places contracts with the Government of the United States, payments of the estimated costs are made to the United States Treasury. If these estimated costs are revised, or if there are reductions in the contracts, the United States Government refunds the overpayments. Refunds arising from this source totalled $14 million in 1957–58; in 1956–57 the total was $7 million.

Services and service fees

Sums totalling $22 million were collected during 1957–58 by various government departments for services and service fees, about the same as the amounts collected during 1956–57. The total of $22 million included $6 million received by the Department of Trade and Commerce, mainly for services in connection with the inspection, weighing, storage and elevation of grain and for electricity, gas and weights and measures inspection services; $7 million received by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, mainly for police services to provinces and municipalities; and $3 million received by the Department of Transport, chiefly for wharfage and other canal and marine service fees, steamship inspection, air-ground radio at airports, and government telegraph and telephone services.

Bullion and coinage

Revenue under this heading arose out of the operations of the Royal Canadian Mint and included assaying, refining and handling charges and the net gain on coinage and refining operations. The amount credited to bullion and coinage revenue for 1957–58 was $5 million, $1 million more than in the previous year.

Other non-tax revenues

Other non-tax revenues amounted to $5 million, about the same as was received in 1956–57.

(3) COMPARISON OF ACTUAL REVENUE WITH FORECAST

The forecast of revenues for 1957-58 made in the Budget Speech of March 14, 1957, was modified by tax changes announced in the Financial Statement made on December 6, 1957. In this Financial Statement the Minister of Finance stated that it was expected, on the basis of eight months collections, that revenues for the year from some sources would exceed the amount forecast in the March Budget Speech while other revenues would fall below this forecast but in total the revenue for the year would fall below the forecast in March only by the amount attributable to the tax reductions announced in the Financial Statement.

Revenue collections up to the end of the calendar year were quite close to expectations, but during the final quarter of the fiscal year they began to reflect more markedly the effects of the recession. This, together with the fact that during the final quarter refunds of previous overpayments of tax were higher than expected, resulted in total budgetary revenues being $97 million, or about 2 per cent, less than the December forecast. Although revenues from several sources exceeded the forecast by small amounts these were more than offset by the amount by which revenues from customs duties, personal and non-resident income tax and sales tax fell below the forecast.

The following table shows the extent to which revenues for 1957-58 differ from the forecast for the year as modified by the December Financial Statement:

Total budgetary revenues	5,170.0	5,144.0	5,047.1	−96.9	− 1.9

The revenue from the personal income tax was $44 million below forecast. This occurred because the extra collections in January based on year-end bonuses were below expectations and the level of taxable personal incomes in the final four months of the fiscal year declined more than was foreseen.

The revenue from the tax on income going to non-residents fell below the forecast because dividend payments going abroad were not as high as expected and because some large refunds had to be made toward the end of the year to adjust overpayments of tax in previous years.

The revenue from the corporation income tax exceeded the forecast despite the fact that corporation profits for the year were not as high as expected. This occurred because the payments made in the year to complete payment of taxes due on high 1956 profits were substantially in excess of what was anticipated.

The revenue from succession duties has been substantially influenced in the last three years by duties payable on two exceptionally large estates and actual revenues in each year have varied from the forecasts because of the difficulty of foreseeing exactly when the duties on these estates would be paid.

The revenue from customs duties was $92 million less than forecast. The decline in imports appears to have been more pronounced in commodities bearing higher rates of duty than in those coming in free of duty or at the lower rates.

The extent to which the revenue from the sales tax fell below the forecast is a reflection of the extent to which commodity sales fell below expectations.

Revenues from excise duties and other excise taxes exceeded the forecast largely because sales of alcoholic beverages and tobacco products showed a greater buoyancy than expected.

Non-tax revenues were $35 million above the forecast. A large part of this was due to larger than expected Bank of Canada profits.

B. EXPENDITURES

Budgetary expenditures for 1957-58 amounted to $5,086 million, an increase of $237 million over the 1956-57 total of $4,849 million.

A comparative summary of expenditures by departments and principal purposes for the fiscal year 1957-58 and the preceding year is given in the following table:

Defence expenditures

Defence expenditures consisting of expenditures of the Departments of National Defence and Defence Production and outlay for the civil defence programme were again the largest category of government expenditure. The total of $1,687 million for the fiscal year was approximately 33 per cent of the aggregate budgetary expenditures of the government. This is a decrease of $96 million or about 5 per cent less than the 1956-57 total of $1,784 million when defence expenditures were 37 per cent of aggregate budgetary expenditures.

The Budget—Appendix

Expenditures of the Department of National Defence amounted to $1,668 million and those of the Department of Defence Production to $15 million, while outlays in connection with the civil defence programme were $4 million. In 1956-57 expenditures were $1,759 million, $21 million and $4 million, respectively.

NOTE: The unshaded areas of the columns in the chart for health, welfare and social security, represent pension payments out of the old age security fund not charged to budgetary expenditure in the year in which they were paid.

A comparative summary of defence expenditures for 1957-58 and 1956-57 is shown in the following table:

Expenditures for army, naval and air services amounted in the aggregate to $1,401 million, $89 million less than the total for 1956-57. Outlay in 1957-58 was less than in the previous year by $10 million for army services, $64 million for naval services and $15 million for air services.

Expenditures for defence research and development were $79 million, an increase of $9 million over the 1956-57 programme.

Expenditures of $118 million under the mutual aid programme and contributions to the military costs of NATO were $15 million less than in the previous fiscal year. Under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, defence equipment and supplies may be transferred from Canadian stocks to other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The expenditures of $118 million for 1957-58 included $78 million for the transfer of equipment and supplies, and $30 million for costs incurred in acquiring and supplying military equipment for, and in the training in Canada of aircrews from, countries which are parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The contribution of $10 million on account of Canada's share of the NATO military budgets and infrastructure costs which was also included in this total was $4 million less than in 1956-57. The percentage share of these costs to be borne by each nation is established in the North Atlantic Council and is subject to ratification by the respective member governments.

The government's contribution to the permanent services pension account during 1957-58 of an amount equal to 1-2/3 times the contributions by permanent services personnel was $50 million consisting of $46 million relating to current contributions and $4 million to contributions for arrears. This was $3 million more than the 1956-57 contribution of $46 million of which $41 million related to current contributions and $5 million to contributions for arrears.

The expenditures of $15 million for 1957-58 for the Department of Defence Production reflect a decrease of $6 million, mainly in respect of the programme under which capital assistance is given to private contractors, Crown plants operated on a management fee basis, and Crown corporations undertaking contracts essential to the defence programme. For 1957-58 this capital assistance was $5 million compared with $10 million in 1956-57.

Civil defence expenditures at $4 million, reflected a slight increase over the 1956-57 expenditures.

In addition to these budgetary expenditures for defence, there were certain other cash outlays which must be considered in assessing the full effect of the defence programme on the economy of Canada.

The Department of Defence Production makes cash disbursements for the procurement of materials for use in the manufacture of defence equipment, which are not recorded as budgetary expenditures. For purposes of accounting and control, these amounts are charged to the defence production revolving fund and are treated as assets on the books of the government until they are billed to the Department of National Defence or sold to defence contractors for use in the manufacture of defence equipment. As a result of the transactions during 1957–58, the assets of the revolving fund were reduced by $2 million leaving a balance in the account of $54 million at March 31, 1958.

As indicated above, defence equipment and supplies may, under the provisions of Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, be transferred from Canadian stocks as mutual aid to other parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. For several years the estimated replacement values of equipment and supplies acquired by the Department of National Defence prior to March 31, 1950, and later transferred to NATO countries, were credited to the National Defence equipment account. These credits may be used subsequently to purchase equipment or supplies for the army, naval or air services, thereby involving cash outlays which are not reflected as budgetary expenditures. Since 1956 no further credits have been made to this equipment account. The Defence Services Vote provides that where any equipment or supplies are transferred as mutual aid, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to that vote instead of being paid into the special equipment account, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces. Disbursements from the equipment account during the fiscal year were $24 million. The balance available at March 31, 1958 for disbursements in subsequent years was $212 million compared with $236 million at March 31, 1957.

Under section 11 of the National Defence Act there is provision for the sale of materiel, not immediately required for the use of the Canadian defence forces or the Defence Research Board, to such countries and upon such terms as the Governor in Council may determine. The proceeds of such sales are credited to a special account to be used for the procurement of materiel. Net credits to the account during 1957–58 were $17 million leaving a balance of $18 million at March 31, 1958.

The following table summarizes the cash outlays for defence for the past two fiscal years:

Public debt charges

Public debt charges which consist of interest on the public debt, the annual charges for amortizing bond discounts and commissions, the cost of issuing new loans and other charges incurred in servicing the public debt amounted to $567 million for 1957–58 or 11 per cent of all budgetary expenditure, compared with a total of $534 million or 11 per cent for 1956–57. They were again the second largest item of budgetary expenditure.

Interest on public debt amounted to $539 million or $19 million more than the corresponding expenditure of $520 million in 1956–57. Interest on unmatured debt totalled $438 million compared with $430 million in the previous year. This increase was due to the rise in interest rates during the year and occurred despite the fact that unmatured debt had been reduced by $123 million during 1957–58. Increases of $5 million in respect of the superannuation account, $3 million in respect of the permanent services pension account and $2 million in respect of the government annuities account brought interest on annuity, insurance and pension accounts to $98 million for 1957–58 compared with $87 million for 1956–57. Interest of $3 million on deposit and trust accounts was unchanged from the total for 1956–57.

Other public debt charges, which include the cost of issuing new loans, the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions, fees for the services of fiscal agents and registrars, commission for the payment of interest on the public debt, and other costs of servicing the public debt totalled $28 million compared with $14 million in 1956-57. The increase of $14 million was due to an increase in the annual amortization of bond discounts and commissions of $9 million and to the fact that the 1956-57 charges had been reduced by a premium of $5 million on the partial conversion of the fifth victory loan.

The table which follows presents a comparative summary of public debt charges for 1957–58 and 1956–57:

(in millions of dollars)

Interest and Other Public Debt Charges	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1958 (Preliminary)	1957

Servicing of public debt	0.6	0.5	0.1
Cost of issuing new loans	1.2	1.1	0.1
	567.1	534.1	33.0

When considering the magnitude of these public debt charges and the burden they place upon the public treasury, it must be borne in mind that a substantial portion of the debt is attributable to, or is invested in, productive or earning assets. Therefore in calculating the net burden of the government's annual interest charges, the income derived from loans, investments and other productive assets must be taken into account. For 1957–58 this income amounted to $170 million as shown in the preceding section on non-tax revenue. This amount deducted from the gross total of $539 million for interest shown in the previous table leaves a net annual interest charge of $369 million compared with a net of $314 million in 1956–57.

Subsidies and tax-sharing payments to provinces

Payments to the provinces during 1957–58 for statutory subsidies, rentals under the tax-sharing arrangements act, the transitional grant to Newfoundland and the transfer of a portion of income tax receipts from certain public utility companies amounted to $383 million compared with $395 million in 1956–57.

A comparative summary of the payments for the two years is given in the following table:

(in millions of dollars)

Subsidies, Tax-Sharing and Tax-Rental Payments to Provinces	Fiscal Year Ended March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1958 (Preliminary)	1957

Transfer of certain public utility tax receipts, Sec. 6, c. 49, Statutes of 1952	7.4	6.6	0.8
	382.7	395.4	−12.7

Payments under the Federal-Provincial tax-sharing arrangements in 1957-58 were $13 million less than the payments under the tax-rental agreements in 1956-57. The decrease was due to the decision of the province of Ontario not to rent the corporation income tax field under the new tax-sharing agreement. If Ontario had rented the corporation income tax field, the 1957-58 payments would have been $105 million in excess of the 1956-57 payments.

Payments to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial tax-sharing arrangements in 1957-58 as shown in the next table were adjusted by deducting $1 million from the tax-sharing entitlement of the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. This deduction represented recovery of one-fifth of the overpayment made to those provinces under the 1952 tax-rental agreements on account of an over-estimation of their population as revealed by the 1956 census.

By memoranda of agreement with the provinces concerned, the 1952 tax agreements were amended to authorize the recovery of the overpayment in equal monthly deductions from the tax-sharing payments of those provinces over the five-year life of the new agreements.

Statutory subsidies at $21 million in 1957-58 were unchanged from the previous year.

A summary of payments, by provinces, during 1957-58 is given in the following table:

(in millions of dollars)

Subsidies and Tax-Sharing Payments to Provinces	Fiscal Year Ended March 31, 1958 (Preliminary)

British Columbia	1.3	59.0	.....	1.3	61.6
	20.6	353.3	1.4	7.4	382.7

The amount of public utility tax receipts transferred to the provinces in 1957-58 amounted to $7 million or $1 million more than in the previous year. Section 6 of the Tax-Rental Agreements Act, 1952, authorizes the payment to the provinces, whether participating in the agreements or not, of a portion of the income tax collected from corporations whose main business is the distribution to, or the generation for distribution to, the public of electrical energy, gas or steam.

Family allowances

Family allowances are payable in respect of all children under sixteen resident in Canada, with minor exceptions such as in the case of children of immigrants who must reside in Canada a year before an allowance is payable. The monthly allowance prior to September 1, 1957 was $5 if the child was under 6 years; $6 in the age group 6 to 9; $7 in the age group 10 to 12; and $8 in the age group 13 to 15. Effective September 1, 1957 the monthly allowance was changed to $6 if the child is under 10 years and $8 in the age group 10-15. Children of immigrants receive family assistance of $5 per month during their first year of residence in Canada from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration if during that period they are under sixteen years of age.

Family allowance payments amounted to $438 million in 1957-58 representing 9 per cent of total expenditures for the fiscal year. The increase of $40 million over the corresponding 1956-57 outlay reflects the increase in the monthly allowances and the increase in the number of children in the eligible age groups.

The following table presents a comparative summary of payments by provinces:

Unemployment Insurance Act administration and government's contribution

Expenditures in 1957-58 relating to the Unemployment Insurance Act (excluding the government's payment as an employer) amounted to $70 million compared with $66 million spent in 1956-57.

Unemployment insurance benefit payments are not charged directly to budgetary expenditures but are paid from the unemployment insurance fund which is financed by contributions from employees and employers, by interest earned on investments, and by the government's contribution of an amount equal to one-fifth of combined employer-employee contributions.

The government's contribution to the fund for 1957-58 was $38 million and administration costs were $32 million; the corresponding figures for 1956-57 were $37 million and $29 million.

Government contributions with respect to the superannuation account

The government's contribution to the superannuation account was $78 million in 1957-58 compared with $72 million in 1956-57. Of this total $44 million was due to the additional liability created by the general salary increases to civil servants effective May 1, 1957 and $34 million to the government's regular contribution of an amount equal to the current and prior service payments of individuals. The corresponding figures for 1956-57 were $41 million and $31 million.

Provision for reserve for losses on realization of assets

No charge to expenditures for an addition to the general reserve for losses on realization of assets has been included in the government's accounts for 1957-58. In 1956-57, $50 million was added to the reserve and charged to expenditure. The balance in the reserve which was $546 million at March 31, 1957 remains unchanged, and is equivalent to 7 per cent of the aggregate active assets.

Agriculture

Expenditures of the Department of Agriculture totalled $95 million for 1957-58 compared with $85 million in 1956-57.

The net increase of $10 million was due to the deficit of $6 million in the prairie farm emergency fund (for which there was no corresponding charge in 1956-57) and increases of $2 million in the costs of experimental farms service, $1 million each in costs of marketing service, science service, and operating losses of the agricultural stabilization board offset in part by a decrease of $1 million in rehabilitation and reclamation projects. Authority of parliament will be sought to charge to 1957-58 expenditure the operating losses of the agricultural stabilization board.

A comparative summary of expenditures for 1957-58 and 1956-57 is presented in the following table:

Atomic energy

Expenditures of the Atomic Energy Control Board and payments to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited totalled $22 million for 1957–58 the same as for 1956–57.

Administration expenses of the Atomic Energy Control Board and grants for research and investigations with respect to atomic energy were $0.5 million, compared with $0.3 million for the previous year.

Payments to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for its research programme amounted to $21 million compared with $22 million in 1956–57. Of the total, $14 million was for current operations and maintenance and $7 million for the construction and acquisition of buildings, land, works and equipment.

In addition, advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for the construction or acquisition of buildings and equipment at Chalk River and Deep River and for the commercial products division at Ottawa amounted to $3 million. This brought the total of advances covered, or to be covered, by obligations or shares of the company to $56 million at March 31, 1958.

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation

Payments by the Government of Canada to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation totalled $43 million for 1957–58 compared with $39 million in 1956-57. This increase of $4 million was due to an increase of $6 million in the grant toward the deficit in radio broadcasting and television service offset in part by a decrease of $2 million in the payment to the corporation of an amount equivalent to the collection of the 15 per cent special tax imposed on radio and television sets and tubes.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures and advances for the past five years:

No additional loans were made to the corporation in 1957–58, total loans remaining at $27 million at March 31, 1958. Interest at various rates is paid semi-annually and is included in non-tax revenues under the heading "Return on investments".

Citizenship and Immigration

Expenditures of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration were $52 million for 1957–58 compared with $44 million in 1956–57. The principal items causing this increase were a $4 million increase in Indian affairs, mainly for larger outlays for Indian education, and a $3 million increase in immigration expenditures which included family assistance under which children of immigrants under the age of sixteen in their first year in Canada are eligible for a monthly allowance of $5.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1957–58 and 1956–57:

External Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of External Affairs amounted to $60 million the same as for 1956–57. A decrease of $2 million in Canada's assessment for membership in international or commonwealth organizations was more than offset by increases in other categories.

The decrease of $2 million in Canada's assessment for membership in international or commonwealth organizations was due mainly to a change in the effective date of payments in 1956–57 which increased the payments for that year.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1957–58 and 1956–57:

Finance

The major items of expenditure for the Department of Finance have been dealt with in previous paragraphs under the headings "Public debt charges", "Subsidies and tax-sharing payments to provinces" and "Government contribution with respect to the superannuation account".

Other expenditures totalled $159 million for 1957–58, an increase of $108 million over the expenditures for 1956–57. This increase of $108 million was due to a grant of $100 million to the Canada Council, for which there was no corresponding charge in 1956–57, and increases of $8 million in grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property and $2 million in administration expenses of the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury offset in part by decreases of $1 million in premium, discount and exchange and $1 million in administration and general costs.

The following table presents a comparison of 1957–58 expenditures with those for 1956–57:

Mines and Technical Surveys

Expenditures of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys totalled $36 million for 1957–58, the same as for 1956–57. A decrease of $1 million in connection with the movement of coal under the Dominion Coal Board was offset by smaller increases in other expenditure categories.

National Health and Welfare

Family allowance payments, amounting to $438 million for 1957-58, constitute the main item of expenditure for the Department of National Health and Welfare and have been dealt with under a separate heading in preceding paragraphs. Civil defence expenditures, amounting to $4 million, are dealt with under the heading "Defence expenditures".

Other expenditures of the Department in 1957-58 totalled $221 million, an increase of $61 million compared with expenditures of $160 million in 1956-57.

Outstanding temporary loans by the Minister of Finance to the old age security fund amounted to $104 million at March 31, 1958. Parliament will be asked to authorize writing off these temporary loans as a charge to expenditure in the 1957-58 accounts.

Expenditures for Indian and Eskimo health services were $20 million for 1957-58 compared with $18 million for 1956-57. Expenditures for other health services were $10 million in 1957-58 compared with $7 million in 1956-57.

General health grants to the provinces for assistance in hospital construction, general health services and the control of diseases amounted to $35 million for 1957-58 compared with expenditures of $36 million in 1956-57.

Under the Old Age Assistance Act, the federal government reimburses the provinces by paying 50 per cent of the lesser of $55 monthly or the amount of assistance given by the provinces in the form of monthly pensions to eligible persons in need who are in the age group 65 to 69. (Under the Old Age Security Act, all persons 70 years and over who satisfy the residence requirements of the Act may receive a pension of $55 per month from the federal government out of the old age security fund.) Similarly, the federal government reimburses the provinces under the Blind Persons Act for allowances of not more than $55 per month to blind persons in need over the age of 18 by paying 75 per cent of the total payments, and under the Disabled Persons Act by paying 50 per cent of not more than $55 per month for allowances to disabled persons in need over the age of 18 years. Two sets of amendments to the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act, and the Disabled Persons Act, raised the maximum pension towards which the Federal Government would contribute from $40 to $46 effective July 1, 1957 and from $46 to $55 effective November 1, 1957. Similar increases were made in old age security pensions at the same times, through amendments to the Old Age Security Act. In 1957–58 payments for old age assistance were $25 million compared with $20 million in 1956–57, for blind persons allowances $4 million compared with $3 million and for disabled persons allowances $11 million compared with $7 million.

Under the Unemployment Assistance Act the federal government contributes up to 50 per cent of the cost of unemployment assistance paid by the provinces, subject to certain deductions as set out in the Act. To date eight provinces have signed agreements with the federal government. Expenditures under this Act amounted to $8 million for 1957-58 the same as for 1956-57 which covered a twenty-one month period from July 1, 1955 (the effective date stipulated in the Act) to March 31, 1957.

The following table presents a distribution of these payments to provinces for health grants, old age assistance, disabled persons and blind persons allowances and for unemployment assistance for 1957-58:

National Research Council

Expenditures of the National Research Council amounted to $22 million for 1957-58, $3 million higher than for 1956-57. Salaries and other expenses amounting to $19 million were $3 million more than the corresponding amount in 1956-57; the costs of construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment totalling $3 million were approximately the same as the corresponding outlay in 1956-57.

National Revenue

Expenditures of the Department of National Revenue were $68 million for 1957-58 compared with $62 million in 1956-57. The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for the two years:

Northern Affairs and National Resources

Expenditures of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources in 1957-58 were $49 million, compared with $37 million in 1956-57.

Of this increase of $12 million, $7 million was attributable to expenditures by the northern administration and lands branch (of which $5 million was for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment and $2 million for operation and maintenance); $2 million to expenditures by the national parks branch (of which $1 million was for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment); and $3 million to the expenditures of the forestry branch.

Post Office

Gross expenditures of the Post Office Department for 1957-58 were $177 million, an increase of $15 million over the 1956-57 outlay of $162 million.

Remuneration of postmasters and staffs at revenue and semi-staff offices, commissions at sub-offices and certain other authorized disbursements are paid from revenue. These payments, included in the total of $177 million, amounted to $24 million for 1957-58, compared with $22 million in 1956-57.

Disbursements charged to budgetary expenditures were $153 million, an increase of $13 million over expenditures in 1956-57, due mainly to the increase of $6 million on account of the general salary increase effective May 1, 1957, and $5 million in costs of movement of mail.

Public Works

Expenditures of the Department of Public Works for 1957-58 amounted to $206 million, compared with $165 million for 1956-57, an increase of $41 million. Costs of the development engineering branch increased by $26 million of which $25 million was attributable to the trans-Canada highway; costs of the public buildings construction and services branch increased by $11 million, of which $9 million was for the acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings in Ottawa; and costs of the harbours and rivers engineering branch increased by $3 million due mainly to the acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1957-58 with those for 1956-57:

Royal Canadian Mounted Police

Expenditures for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police amounted to $47 million for 1957-58, $4 million more than the total spent in 1956-57. Larger outlays of $2 million in land and air services, and $1 million each in marine services and headquarters administration and general (due mainly to the salary increase effective May 1, 1957) accounted for the increase. These payments represented gross expenditures; payments received from the provinces and municipalities for police services totalling $7 million were credited to revenue.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1957-58 and 1956-57:

Trade and Commerce

Expenditures for the Department of Trade and Commerce totalled $57 million for 1957-58 compared with $55 million for 1956-57. The net increase of $2 million was due to increases of $2 million in assistance re storage costs of grain and $2 million in administration and general expenditures, offset in part by a decrease of $3 million in the outlay of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The 1957-58 expenditures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics did not include an item comparable to the $4 million spent in 1956-57 for the 1956 census.

Transport

Expenditures of the Department of Transport for 1957-58 amounted to $207 million, an increase of $49 million over the total of $158 million in 1956-57.

Expenditures for air services at $91 million were $20 million higher than those for the previous year. This was due to an increase in the outlays of the civil aviation division of $12 million, of which $9 million was for the construction and acquisition of buildings, works, lands and new equipment including construction work on municipal airports and $3 million for the operation and maintenance of airways and airports; an increase in the outlays of the telecommunications division of $6 million, of which $4 million was for the construction and acquisition of new lines; and an increase of $2 million in the costs of the meteorological division.

Expenditures for marine services amounted to $33 million in 1957-58, an increase of $6 million over the outlay of $27 million in 1956-57. This increase was due mainly to higher expenditures for the construction and acquisition of steamers.

Expenditures for railway and steamship services amounted to $18 million, a decrease of $3 million from the previous year. Decreases of $2 million in costs of construction and acquisition of auto ferries and $1 million in expenditures in connection with the Straits of Canso causeway accounted for this decrease.

Expenditures for the Board of Transport Commissioners at $13 million were the same as in the previous year.

Payments to cover the net operating deficits of certain Crown corporations totalled $31 million in 1957-58, an increase of $23 million over expenditures of $8 million in 1956-57. The increase was due almost entirely to the reimbursement of $22 million to the Canadian National Railways on account of its 1957 deficit for which there was no corresponding charge in the previous year. "Non-active" advances to the National Harbours Board totalled $5 million in 1957-58 compared with $4 million for 1956-57.

Veterans Affairs

Expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs were $277 million in 1957–58 compared with expenditures of $252 million in 1956–57. The net increase of $25 million was due mainly to increases of $15 million in pensions for disability or death and $7 million in war veterans allowances as a result of legislation increasing on July 1 and November 1, 1957 monthly payments of pensions and allowances, and $4 million in the costs of treatment services. Partly offsetting these increases was a decrease of $2 million in the provision for reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans Land Act.

Expenditures relating to the administration of the Soldier Settlement and Veterans Land Acts were $5 million, unchanged from the previous year, while the provision for the reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans Land Act was $5 million. These conditional benefits are granted to veterans who enter into agreements with the director for purchases of land and chattels provided they fulfil the terms of the agreements for ten years. The amount charged to expenditures under this heading covers one-tenth of the conditional benefits included in sales to veterans.

The following table presents a comparative summary of expenditures for 1957–58 and 1956–57:

All other departments

Expenditures of the departments not dealt with in preceding sections amounted to $90 million for 1957–58, compared with expenditures of $70 million in 1956-57. The increase of $20 million was due mainly to increases of $13 million in the expenses of the Chief Electoral Officer, due to the June 1957 and March 1958 federal elections; $3 million in expenditures of the Department of Fisheries, mainly in the outlays of the Fisheries Research Board; and $3 million in expenditures of the Department of Labour, mainly in the costs of vocational training.

A. CHANGES IN PRINCIPAL LIABILITY CLASSIFICATIONS DURING 1957-58

The gross liabilities of the government increased by $42 million during the fiscal year. Increases of $285 million in annuity, insurance and pension accounts, $16 million in suspense accounts and $19 million in deposit and trust accounts were only partly offset by decreases of $128 million in current and demand liabilities, $123 million in unmatured debt and $27 million in undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts.

Current and demand liabilities

Current and demand liabilities, which include matured debt outstanding, outstanding treasury cheques and interest, interest accrued, accounts payable, non-interest bearing notes payable to the international monetary fund and the international bank for reconstruction and development and other obligations payable on demand, decreased by $128 million during the fiscal year. Decreases of $81 million in outstanding treasury cheques, $31 million in accounts payable, $12 million in matured debt outstanding, $8 million in non-interest bearing notes, $3 million in the net liability for post office money orders and $2 million in interest due and outstanding, were partially offset by an increase of $9 million in interest accrued.

The changes in the various accounts are shown in the following table:

TABLE 32

(in millions of dollars)

Deposit and trust accounts

Deposit and trust accounts which consist of sundry funds deposited with the Receiver General or held in trust for various purposes increased by $19 million during 1957–58.

In 1957–58 a new account was set up to record deposits of Crown corporations of cash temporarily in excess of current requirements which would earn interest at a rate determined on the basis of weekly treasury bill yields. At March 31, 1958 the balance in this account was $10 million. Also during the fiscal year it was decided to record in the contractors' security account, in addition to the cash deposits formerly recorded, the value of all bonds and certified cheques held by the government as a guarantee of the fulfilment of contracts. This amount was also included as a contra account in the asset category "Securities held in trust". At March 31, 1958 the value of these additional securities was $13 million. Other major changes in this category were decreases of $6 million in contractors' holdbacks, $4 million in contractors' securities—cash, and $3 million in the prairie farm emergency fund. The increase of $8 million in all other deposit and trust accounts was due to a change in the method of presentation of those portions of certain deposit and trust accounts which are held in the form of bonds. In prior years these were shown as a deduction from the gross liability whereas in 1957-58 they are included in the new asset account "Securities held in trust".

Annuity, insurance and pension accounts

Annuity, insurance and pension accounts increased by $285 million during 1957–58. The changes in the various accounts are shown in the following table.

TABLE 33

(in millions of dollars)

Annuity, Insurance and Pension Accounts	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (−)
	1958 (Preliminary)	1957
Unemployment insurance fund	754.8	885.7	−130.9
Less investment in bonds and accrued interest	−739.7	−875.1	135.4
	15.1	10.6	4.5

Permanent services pension account	513.8	426.3	87.5
Other	89.7	82.0	7.7
	2,712.0	2,427.2	284.8

The unemployment insurance fund decreased by $131 million during the year reducing the balance at March 31, 1958 to $755 million. Of this amount $740 million was invested in bonds and accrued interest and $15 million was held by the Receiver General in the consolidated revenue fund. The decrease of $131 million in the fund represents the amount by which benefit payments totalling $385 million exceeded contributions by employers, employees and the government, income from investments and other miscellaneous revenue credited to the fund. Benefit payments in the fiscal year were $154 million higher than the $231 million in 1956-57.

The government annuities account increased by $58 million reflecting the amount by which premium receipts, interest credited to the account by the government and the amount required to maintain the reserve exceeded payments to annuitants and beneficiaries.

The increase of $127 million in the superannuation account was due mainly to the government's contribution of $34 million equal to the estimated current and prior service payments of individuals in 1956–57, the government's contribution of $44 million in respect of the civil service salary increase effective May 1, 1957 and $40 million interest credited to the account. The remainder of the increase was due to the excess of employee's current and prior service contributions over benefit payments.

The permanent services pension account increased by $88 million, reflecting the government's contribution of $50 million which is made at the rate of one and two-thirds times the current and prior service contributions, interest on the account of $18 million and contributions by permanent services personnel for current and prior years service less payments from the account.

Other annuity, insurance and pension accounts showed an increase of $8 million for the fiscal year.

Old age security fund

Under the Old Age Security Act pensions of $55 per month are paid, without a means test, from the old age security fund to all eligible persons seventy years of age and over. The monthly allowance was raised from $40 to $46 effective July 1, 1957 and from $46 to $55 effective November 1, 1957. Payments from the fund during the fiscal year were $474 million while credits to the fund from the proceeds of the 2 per cent tax on personal incomes (maximum tax $60), the 2 per cent tax on corporation profits and the 2 per cent sales tax totalled $372 million. Temporary loans amounting to $102 million were required to cover the deficit resulting from these transactions during 1957-58. Parliament will be asked to authorize writing off to expenditure in 1957-58 the remainder of the 1956-57 deficit of $2 million and the 1957-58 deficit of $102 million.

The following table shows the transactions in the old age security fund for the fiscal years ended March 31, 1953 to 1958 inclusive:

Undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts

This category was set up to record the undisbursed balances of appropriations to special accounts for which moneys have been appropriated by parliament and from which disbursements may be made for authorized purposes in periods subsequent to that in which the appropriation was made. There was a net decrease of $27 million during the year in these accounts, due to decreases of $24 million in the national defence equipment account and $6 million in the Colombo plan fund and an increase of $3 million in the railway grade crossing fund.

The decrease of $6 million in the Colombo plan fund represented the amount by which disbursements from the fund of $40 million exceeded the $34 million credited to the fund out of moneys voted by parliament for assistance to countries in south and south-east Asia.

The transactions in the national defence equipment account resulted in a decrease in the undisbursed balance in the account which was established under section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and continued by subsequent votes of parliament. Under the terms of the Act, the value of defence materials and supplies acquired prior to March 31, 1950, and transferred to members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization may be credited to the account and these credits may be used in subsequent years to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian forces. Disbursements from the account during the fiscal year were $24 million. No credits have been made to this account since 1956.

The increase of $3 million in the railway grade crossing fund represented the amount of $5 million credited to this account and charged to expenditure less disbursements from the account.

Suspense accounts

Suspense accounts, which consist of balances where some uncertainty as to disposition exists and balances where the ultimate treatment is known but which are held until certain conditions are fulfilled showed a net increase of $16 million during the fiscal year. The major changes in the accounts in this category were increases of $16 million in the replacement of materiel account, $5 million in international monetary fund—revaluation of Canadian dollar balance account, and $2 million in other suspense accounts, and decreases of $4 million in balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets and $2 million in Crown Assets Disposal Corporation account.

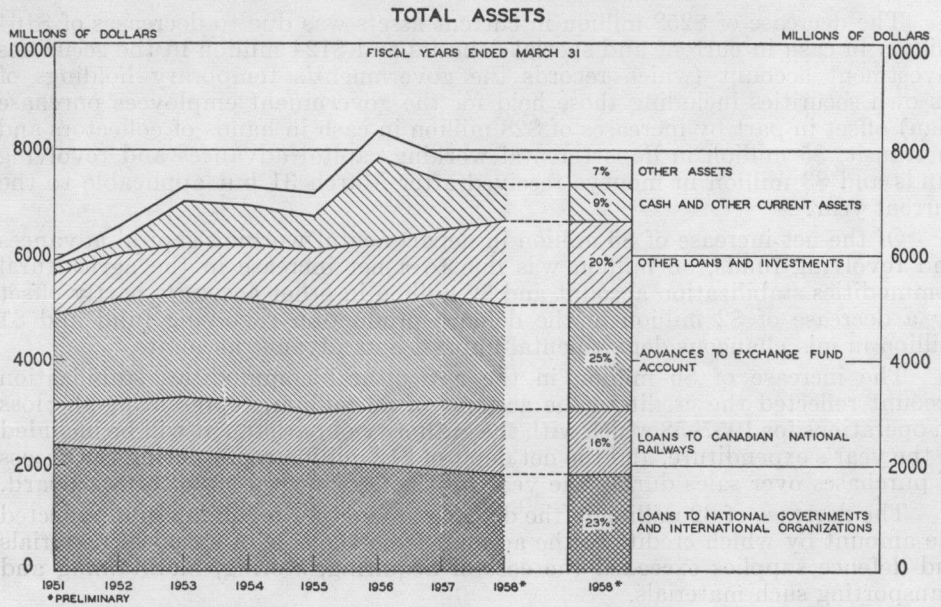
The replacement of materiel account established by section 11 of the National Defence Act is credited with amounts realized from the sale of materiel that has not been declared surplus to requirements but has been authorized by the Governor in Council to be sold to other countries. The account is debited with disbursements representing amounts paid for the procurement of replacement materiel. During 1957-58 credits to the account exceeded disbursements by $17 million.

The increase of $5 million in the international monetary fund—revaluation of Canadian dollar balance account, represented adjustments occasioned by the decreased value in terms of Canadian dollars of Canada's subscription to the fund.

The reduction of $4 million in agreements of sale of Crown assets reflected payments on outstanding agreements including $1 million each from Canadair Limited and Orenda Engines Limited.



The decrease in Crown Assets Disposal Corporation account represented a reduction in the government's equity in the agency account of the Corporation.

Unmatured debt

The outstanding unmatured debt at the close of 1957-58 was $14,245 million, a decrease of $123 million from the previous year which was reflected entirely in debt payable in Canada.

B. Changes in Principal Asset Classifications During 1957–58

The total of assets increased during the fiscal year by $2 million. The principal changes were increases of $299 million in loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations, $23 million in securities held in trust, $13 million in deferred charges, $4 million in the province debt account arising out of 1952 tax-rental agreements, $3 million in other loans and investments, $1 million in sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt and $1 million in inactive loans and investments partly offset by decreases of $252 million in current assets, $46 million in advances to the exchange fund account, $35 million in loans to national governments and $9 million in suspense accounts.

Current Assets

Current assets, including cash, departmental working capital advances and revolving funds and securities held in the securities investment account, totalled $695 million, $252 million less than the previous year.

The changes during the fiscal year in the various accounts in this category are shown in the following table:

TABLE 36
(in millions of dollars)

Current Assets	Balance at March 31		Increase or Decrease (—)
	1958 (Preliminary)	1957
Cash in current and special deposits	308.3	472.2	—163.9
Cash in hands of collectors and in transit	160.0	132.0	28.0
Departmental working capital advances and revolving funds—
Agricultural commodities stabilization account	26.4	20.7	5.7
Defence production revolving fund	54.4	56.3	—1.9
Miscellaneous departmental imprest and advance accounts	20.0	21.3	—1.3
Other	28.1	25.6	2.5
Securities investment account	80.1	204.3	—124.2
Other current assets—moneys received after March 31 but applicable to the current year	17.2	14.6	2.6
	694.5	947.0	—252.5

The decrease of $252 million in current assets was due to decreases of $164 million in cash in current and special deposits and $124 million in the securities investment account (which records the government's temporary holdings of its own securities including those held for the government employees purchase plan) offset in part by increases of $28 million in cash in hands of collectors and in transit, $5 million in departmental working capital advances and revolving funds and $3 million in moneys received after March 31 but applicable to the current year.

Of the net increase of $5 million in departmental working capital advances and revolving funds, $6 million was due to a net increase in the agricultural commodities stabilization account and $2 million in other accounts partly offset by a decrease of $2 million in the defence production revolving fund and $1 million in miscellaneous departmental imprest and advance accounts.

The increase of $6 million in the agricultural commodities stabilization account reflected the credit to the account of $6 million, representing the loss on operations for 1957–58 which with the authority of parliament will be included in the year's expenditure, and the net debit of $12 million representing the excess of purchases over sales during the year by the agricultural stabilization board.

The decrease of $2 million in the defence production revolving fund reflected the amount by which credits to the account from the sale of essential materials and defence supplies exceeded the cost of acquiring, storing, maintaining and transporting such materials.

Miscellaneous departmental imprest and advance accounts record accountable advances to departments held on deposit in various banks in the name of the department concerned, certain travelling and imprest advances to public officers and advance payments to contractors. During the fiscal year these advances are carried as charges to the relevant appropriations; if they are not repaid or accounted for at the year-end, they are cleared from the appropriation and debited to this account and at the beginning of the new fiscal year are cleared from the account and charged to the appropriation concerned until such time as an accounting is made.

Advances to the exchange fund account

Advances to the exchange fund account to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange amounted to $250 million and repayments to $296 million, resulting in a net repayment of $46 million during the year.

Sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt

Sinking fund and other investments held for retirement of unmatured debt totalled $212 million at the end of the fiscal year 1957-58, an increase of $1 million, due mainly to an increase in the holdings of bonds of various Government of Canada issues payable in United States dollars.

Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations

Loans to, and investments in, Crown corporations amounted to $2,550 million at March 31, 1958, an increase of $299 million over the previous year. The most important changes were net increases of $108 million in loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $95 million in advances to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, $71 million in loans to Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, $14 million in advances to Canadian Farm Loan Board, $11 million in advances to National Harbours Board, $7 million in advances to Northern Canada Power Commission, $3 million in advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and a decrease of $11 million in loans and advances to the Canadian National Railways.

The following table shows the changes in this category during the year:

Advances to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, to be covered by obligations or shares of the company, amounted to $3 million during the fiscal year, bringing advances to $56 million at March 31, 1958. Advances during the year were for the construction or acquisition of buildings and equipment at Chalk River and Deep River and for the commercial products division at Ottawa.

No loans were made during the year to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Total loans to the corporation outstanding at March 31, 1958 were $27 million. Grants were made to the corporation during the fiscal year of $43 million.

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958, the government advanced $233 million to the Canadian National Railway Company for capital purposes and the retirement of debt in the hands of the public. During the year the Company repaid $295 million (of which $289 million was made available from the sale of $300 million Canadian National Railway Company 4% bonds guaranteed by the Government of Canada) of current and prior year's advances and thus reduced by $62 million the amount of advances outstanding at March 31, 1958 compared with March 31, 1957.

However, in addition to the advances the government purchased $22 million of 4 per cent preferred stock of the Canadian National Railways in order to assist the Company to finance additional capital expenditures. This stock is issued pursuant to the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, in an amount equal to three per cent of the gross revenues of the Company.

Further, to cover the income deficits the Government provided the Company with $51 million during the year by way of temporary loans. Of this amount $22 million in respect of the 1957 calendar year deficit has been written off to expenditure.

Therefore the total amount made available to the Company during the year was $306 million and the repayments and write-off amounted to $317 million for a net decrease in the amount outstanding at the end of the fiscal year of $11 million.

Loans to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation during the year amounted to $114 million, of which $98 million was for direct loans by the corporation and joint loans with lending institutions, $15 million for federal-provincial housing projects and $1 million for advances for house construction. Repayments totalled $6 million, of which $5 million was in respect of advances for house construction and $1 million in respect of loans for federal-provincial projects. The net increase for the fiscal year in loans to the corporation was $108 million.

Loans to the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation in connection with the construction of the Northern Ontario section of the all-Canadian natural gas pipe line totalled $71 million in 1957-58.

Advances to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority during the year amounted to $95 million, bringing total loans at the close of the year to $172 million. There were no repayments made on advances in the fiscal year.

Other increases in loans and advances to Crown corporations included $14 million to Canadian Farm Loan Board, $11 million to National Harbours Board, $7 million to Northern Canada Power Commission and $2 million to other Crown corporations.

Loans to national governments

Loans to national governments totalled $1,444 million at the end of the fiscal year, a decrease of $35 million from the previous year. The changes in these loans are shown in the following table:

During the year the Government of the United Kingdom reduced the balance of the $700 million interest-free loan granted under the provisions of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942 by $30 million as arranged under the terms of an agreement entered into on August 13, 1953, between the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada. The balance outstanding at March 31, 1958 was $23 million. Under the terms of the agreement the loan is to continue to be free of interest until December 1958.

The Government of the United Kingdom deferred the payment of principal and interest on the $1,185 million loan made under the $1,250 million credit authorized by the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, the principal outstanding at the close of the year remaining at $1,097 million. The deferment of principal and interest was by an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Kingdom that was approved by a 1957 Act to amend the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946. The agreement, which became effective April 29, 1957, permits the United Kingdom in lieu of any right of waiver hitherto existing to defer after December 31, 1956, seven instalments of principal and interest under certain conditions. The first of any such deferred instalments is payable on December 31, 2001, and the others annually thereafter, in order.

Repayments of advances under part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act to certain foreign countries to assist them in purchasing goods and services in Canada amounted to $20 million for the year, as shown in the preceding table.

Other loans and investments

Other loans and investments, consisting of Canada's subscription to the capital of the international monetary fund, the international bank for reconstruction and development and the international finance corporation, advances and loans to international organizations, loans to provinces and municipalities, veterans and miscellaneous loans and balances receivable, amounted to $658 million an increase of $3 million over the previous year.

The balances of the main accounts in this category together with the changes during the year are shown in the following table:

The accounts of the international monetary fund are maintained in terms of United States dollars. In order to keep the government's subscription at the required amount, that portion represented by the Canadian dollar balances is revalued quarterly and any settlement required is made annually as at April 30, the end of the fund's fiscal year. The increase of $5 million during the fiscal year reflected the settlement at April 30, 1957 and the subsequent quarterly adjustments due to the revaluation of the Canadian dollar balances.

Loans to provincial governments were reduced by $3 million reflecting payments by the governments concerned.

Advances under the Veterans Land Act decreased by $13 million during the year. However, as there was also a decrease of $10 million in the reserve for conditional benefits under the Veterans Land Act, the net decrease was $3 million.

Miscellaneous loans and investments increased by $4 million during the year. The main changes in this category were increases of $4 million in the acquisition of land to control properties in the vicinity of main terminal airports, $3 million in loans under the assisted passage scheme and $3 million in other accounts and decreases of $4 million in balances receivable under agreements of sale of Crown assets, reflecting repayments received on previous agreements, and $2 million in the government equity in the agency account of the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

Securities held in trust

This is a new category set up to record the security holdings of various deposit and trust and annuity, insurance and pension accounts that were formerly shown as deductions from the liability and, also, to record bonds and certified cheques held in connection with contractors' securities deposits listed under deposit and trust accounts. The balance at March 31, 1958 was $22 million.

Province debt account arising out of 1952 tax-rental agreements

Under the 1952 agreements, at their termination, payments were to be recalculated using revised G.N.P. and population figures based on the 1956 census. The revised G.N.P. figures did not differ materially from those originally used, but the census revealed an increased national population and thus a smaller G.N.P. per capita. This coupled with an over-estimation of population for Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, would have resulted in substantial overpayments to those provinces had the fourth quarterly instalments been paid on March 31, 1957. However, under the agreements quarterly instalments were not required on March 31, 1957, being replaced in the agreements' final year by terminal payments payable not later than April 30, 1957, which were to adjust any over- or under-payments made during the period of the agreements. In the terminal settlement, all underpayments were adjusted. As those provinces that had been overpaid would have suffered severe budgetary strain had the overpayments been recovered in their entirety from the terminal payment, the federal government agreed to amend the 1952 tax agreements and make remittances equivalent to the full quarterly payments. Any overpayment was to be recovered by equal monthly deductions from the payments accruing to the provinces concerned under the 1957 tax-sharing arrangement. The five provinces which had received overpayments subsequently signed Memoranda of Agreement amending their 1952 agreements to give effect to the above.

The overpayments amounted to $5 million. During the course of the fiscal year $1 million was recovered leaving a balance of $4 million due at March 31, 1958. The outstanding overpayments bear no interest.

Deferred charges

This category consists of the residual balance of discounts and commissions, redemption bonuses and conversion premiums on loan flotations that have not been amortized or written off to expenditure.

The balance of the unamortized bond discount and commission account increased from $64 million on March 31, 1957 to $77 million at March 31, 1958. The net increase of $13 million during the fiscal year reflected the amount by which the aggregate of payments of $42 million charged to the account for commissions and discounts on new loans and $5 million representing the unamortized portion of the discount on treasury bills issued in 1957–58 and maturing in 1958–59 (which will be charged to interest on public debt in 1958–59) exceeded the annual amortization charges of $34 million. This latter amount included $8 million charged to interest on public debt representing the unamortized discount of treasury bills issued in 1956-57 and maturing in 1957-58.

Unamortized portion of actuarial deficiency in the superannuation account

There was no change during the fiscal year in the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the superannuation account (that portion of the government's liability in respect of the superannuation account that has not been charged to budgetary expenditure); the balance at March 31, 1958 remained at $139 million.

Suspense accounts

The decrease of $9 million in this category was due almost entirely to the adjustment of the government's Canadian dollar equity in the international monetary fund. The accounts of the fund are maintained in terms of United States dollars. In order to keep the government's subscription at the required amount, that portion represented by Canadian dollar balances is revalued quarterly and any settlement required is made annually as at April 30, the end of the fund's fiscal year. The annual settlement with the fund at April 30, 1957 reduced the balance in this account from $8 million at the beginning of the fiscal year to nil at April 30, 1957. Due to the decreased value of the Canadian dollar in terms of the United States dollar, subsequent quarterly adjustments are reflected in the liability suspense category. The remainder of the decrease was due to a reduction in the temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance to the old age security fund. Parliament will be asked to authorize writing off to expenditure in 1957–58 the outstanding temporary loans of $104 million.

Capital assets

Capital assets which consist of assets of the government such as land, buildings, works and equipment, etc., that are charged to budgetary expenditures at the time of acquisition or construction, are shown on the statement of assets and liabilities at a nominal value of $1.

Inactive loans and advances

This category records those loans and advances which are not currently revenue-producing or realizable. At March 31, 1958 the balance was $91 million and included the loan of $49 million to China under the Export Credits Insurance Act, loans of $24 and $7 million made to Roumania and Greece in 1919-20 and 1920-21 and advances of $11 million in respect of the implementation of guarantees (Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited), an increase of $1 million over 1956-57.

Reserve for losses on realization of assets

There was no change in the reserve for losses on realization of assets during the year; the balance at March 31, 1958 was $546 million, unchanged from the end of the previous year.

C. Increase in Net Debt

The budgetary deficit of $39 million for the fiscal year 1957-58 plus an adjustment of $1 million in respect of prior years' transactions resulted in an increase of $40 million in the net debt of Canada from $11,008 million at March 31, 1957 to $11,048 million at March 31, 1958.

The adjustment of $1 million in respect of prior years' transactions reflected increases in the recorded liabilities in the civil service insurance, returned soldiers insurance and veterans insurance accounts of the amount by which these balances were below the actuarial liability as at March 31, 1957, as calculated by the Department of Insurance.

5. THE CASH POSITION

The government's cash position is affected not only by the budgetary transcations explained in some detail in preceding sections but also by non-budgetary transactions and changes in the government's outstanding unmatured debt. Although there was a budgetary deficit of $39 million in 1957–58, the government's bank balances declined by $164 million during the same period. This decrease was the net result of the budgetary deficit of $39 million, a cash requirement of $124 million for non-budgetary transactions and a reduction of $1 million in outstanding unmatured debt (after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts).

Non-budgetary receipts and credits relate to transactions which result in increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities and do not appear in what might be called the government's income account for the fiscal year nor do they enter into the calculation of the annual budgetary surplus or deficit. However, in considering the full scope of the government's financial operations and in measuring their effect on the government's cash position and their impact on the economy, non-budgetary as well as budgetary transactions must be taken into account.

The increases or decreases in the government's assets and liabilities have been described in detail in the section entitled "Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada". On the assets side the non-budgetary transactions consist, for the most part, of loans and advances to, and repayments by, Crown corporations and other government agencies and funds (including the old age security fund), national, provincial and municipal governments, international organizations, veterans and other borrowers. On the liabilities side they relate mainly to receipts and payments in connection with the many deposit and trust accounts, and annuity, insurance and pension funds held or administered by the government.

The following statement summarizes the non-budgetary transactions for 1957–58 and indicates how they, together with the budgetary transactions and changes in the unmatured debt position, affected the government's cash position. For purposes of comparison, the corresponding figures for 1956–57 are also shown.

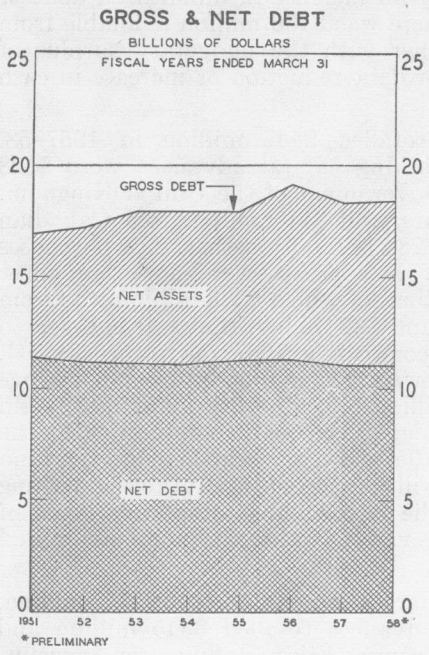
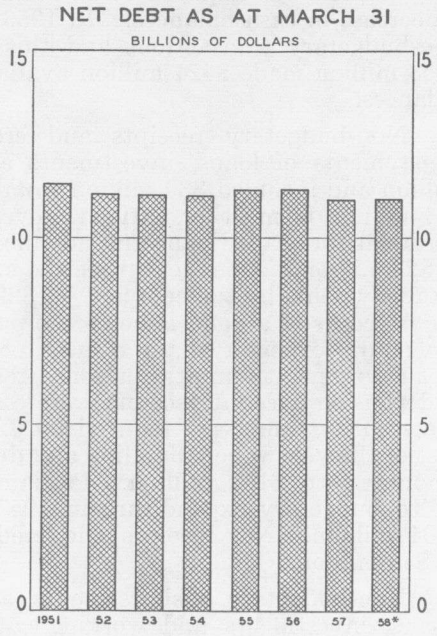
As the table shows, non-budgetary receipts and credits for 1957–58 (excluding unmatured debt transactions) totalled $447 million while non-budgetary disbursements and charges (also excluding unmatured debt transactions) amounted to $571 million, resulting in a net amount of $124 million required for non-budgetary transactions. As there was a budgetary deficit of $39 million, $163 million was required to be financed by an increase in unmatured debt or a decrease in cash balances. In 1956–57 there was $166 million available from non-budgetary transactions and this together with the budgetary surplus of $258 million made $424 million available for debt reduction or increase in cash balances.

Non-budgetary receipts and credits totalled $447 million in 1957–58. Repayments of loans, investments and working capital advances were $128 million and included $30 million from the Government of the United Kingdom, $21 million from other national governments, and $11 million from Canadian National Railways (loans and advances of $284 million together with purchases of $22 million of 4 per cent preferred stock of the company were more than offset by repayments by the company of $295 million, of which $289 million was from the proceeds of a bond issue to the public, and $22 million that was charged to budgetary expenditure in respect of the company's 1957 operating deficit). Net government annuities account receipts were $58 million and net insurance and pension account receipts were $222 million. Temporary loans to the old age security fund were reduced by $2 million. Such loans outstanding at the first of the year were $2 million and during 1957–58 temporary loans to the fund amounted to $102 million. Parliament will be asked to authorize writing off to budgetary expenditure in 1957–58 the outstanding temporary loans of $104 million. Net receipts and credits in various other accounts amounted to $38 million.

Non-budgetary disbursements and charges amounted to $571 million. Loans, investments and working capital advances totalled $345 million and included $6 million to the agricultural commodities stabilization account in connection with the purchase and sale of agricultural commodities after allowing for a charge to budgetary expenditure of $6 million, which parliament will be asked to authorize, in respect of the loss on operations for 1957–58, $14 million to Canadian Farm Loan Board for the purpose of making loans to farmers, $107 million to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the purpose of making housing loans, $16 million to the Government of India for the purchase of Canadian wheat, $70 million to Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for financing the Northern Ontario section of the natural gas pipe line, and $95 million to The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority for the dredging and construction of the seaway. Other non-budgetary disbursements and charges totalled $226 million and included $8 million for net payments from the special defence accounts and $128 million for the net decrease in current and demand liabilities (such as outstanding cheques and outstanding matured debt).



In summary, unmatured debt outstanding in the hands of the public was reduced $1 million after taking into account transactions in the securities investment and sinking fund accounts. As budgetary and non-budgetary transactions required financing in the amount of $163 million, cash balances on deposit with the banks were drawn down by $164 million.



6. THE PUBLIC DEBT

Gross and net debt

During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958 the gross public debt increased by $42 million to $18,368 million.

This increase was made up of a decrease of $123 million in unmatured debt, and an increase of $165 million in other liabilities. The government's recorded net assets increased during the year by $2 million. The net debt thus increased by $40 million to $11,048 million.

The following table shows the relationship between the gross public debt, the unmatured debt and the net debt at the end of each fiscal year, 1948-49 to 1957-58 inclusive.

Unmatured debt

The total unmatured debt of Canada at March 31, 1958 was $14,245 million. This was $123 million less than that at the end of the previous fiscal year. During the same period the government's holdings of securities in the sinking fund and securities investment accounts decreased by $122 million, resulting in a net decrease of $1 million in the amount of outstanding unmatured debt.

Summary of security issues and redemptions during the year

During the fiscal year 1957–58 the government issued securities payable in Canadian dollars in the principal amount of $2,527 million (excluding the refunding of treasury bills which mature periodically) and redeemed or converted issues in the amount of $2,650 million (including the redemption of treasury bills in the amount of $100 million) all payable in Canadian dollars.

Redemptions were financed as follows:

By issue of Canada savings bonds, series 12 (net)	1,177
By refunding and conversion	1,350
By available cash	123
	2,650

The net decrease in unmatured debt as a result of these transactions was $123 million. There was no change during the year in the unmatured debt payable in U.S. dollars and sterling. At March 31, 1958 the amount payable in New York was $300 million and the amount payable in London was $52 million.

Details of redemptions and new issues of securities during the fiscal year are set out in the following tables:

The net increase during the year for all series was $127 million and the amount outstanding at March 31, 1958 was $2,547 million compared with $2,420 million at the close of the previous fiscal year.

The amount of treasury bills outstanding at the end of the fiscal year was $1,525 million or $100 million less than at March 31, 1957.

Interest rates

During the first five months of the year interest rates generally continued to rise and reached a peak during August. Subsequently, rates dropped considerably and continued the downward trend to the end of the fiscal year. The average interest rate on the government's unmatured debt at March 31, 1958 was 2.98 per cent compared with 3.05 per cent at the end of the previous fiscal year and 2.60 per cent at March 31, 1951.

Treasury bill yields reflected a trend similar to that of general interest rates. The yield on three-month bills on April 5, 1957 was 3.69 per cent. In August 1957 the yield rose to a high of 4.08 per cent declining to a low of 2.27 per cent on the last issue of the fiscal year.

The following table shows the high and low yields together with the yield on the last issue for the fiscal year 1947–48 to 1957–58 inclusive on three-month bills:

Indirect debt or contingent liabilities

In addition to the direct debt set out in the statement of assets and liabilities the government has assumed certain indirect or contingent obligations. These consist of securities of the Canadian National Railways, guaranteed as to principal and interest, or as to interest only, and a number of miscellaneous guarantees, the chief of which are the guarantee of insured loans made by chartered banks and other approved lending institutions under the National Housing Act, 1954, deposits maintained by the chartered banks in the Bank of Canada, bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board, advances under the Export Credits Insurance Act and bank loans under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

The government's liability under its guarantee of insured loans under the National Housing Act, 1954 was $1,395 million at December 31, 1957 compared with $122 million at December 31, 1954 and $1,061 million at December 31, 1956.

The following tables give details of the bonds and debenture stocks guaranteed by the government, and also indicate the nature and approximate extent of the government's other guarantees and contingent liabilities:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

STATEMENT ON ACQUISITIONS OF LANDS TO ESTABLISH GREEN BELT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an announcement at this time regarding the establishment of the green belt around the city of Ottawa. The government has now decided to recommend to parliament the necessary measures to make it possible for the crown to acquire ownership of what is known as the green belt around the nation's capital, so as to do what is possible to ensure that the development of the capital area over the long-term future will be in accordance with the national importance and significance of this city. To achieve these ends will require suitable general powers in a bill to establish the national capital commission, as well as to set up the authority over a period of several years for the crown to lend money to the commission to be invested in the purchase of the requisite lands for the purpose.

This project, as the house knows, was considered by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons two years ago and approved by that committee, with the suggestion that the possibility of achieving this purpose by the use of provincial legislation should be further explored. The government has reached the conclusion that only the acquisition of the land by the crown under the authority of parliament offers any assured hope of achieving this important long-term objective which we believe the committee had in mind.

It has been suggested that the legislature of Ontario might pass legislation to establish this green belt, which would have the effect of taking from private owners of the lands, particularly within the confines of the green belt, the values they could get by developing it for purposes inconsistent with the restrictions necessary to achieve the purposes and aims of setting up the green belt. Such legislation might well give rise to valid arguments that the owners had a legitimate claim for compensation from the province of Ontario because of the effects on them of action taken to accomplish this national purpose. Such problems do not arise under the plan which the government proposes to place before parliament, under which the crown will buy the property and lease it subject to the restrictions necessary tc accomplish the purpose.

The details concerning the areas to be included in the green belt, the limitations of the use to which lands therein may be put, will be worked out for the approval of the government by the federal district commission after consultation with the local authorities concerned. Broadly speaking, the area and uses will be those placed before the joint committee in 1956. Some modifications will be desirable which have regard to the developments which have occurred since that time. The government wishes to be sure that local views as to the precise details shall be taken into account.

I should like to emphasize that this is a long-term project undertaken in the national interest. It is not a short-term one nor one that has been undertaken at the request of the local municipalities. Experience has shown that unless effectual control is exercised, cities tend to sprawl out into suburbs, resulting in what is called ribbon development, in a manner that is quite contrary to and inconsistent with the long-term planning that is necessary and essential if the capital of Canada is to be preserved and developed so that it will be a capital city of which this generation and succeeding generations can and will be proud.

By investing a reasonable sum now to acquire title to the lands on the boundaries of the city the people of Canada, through parliament, can be assured of that control which is necessary before further developments take place which may indeed result in action being taken too late. During the early years after the land is acquired the rents received for it may not be as much as the interest on the funds borrowed to purchase the lands in question, but the government is confident that over the long-term period the investment will be found to be worth while financially, as well as being necessary to achieve the important purpose which we and the people of Canada as a whole, I believe, have in mind and desire.

I would suggest that the details concerning this matter can best be discussed when the national capital bill is before the house, which I hope will be at a very early date.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will welcome the statement made by the Prime Minister. I know that those who have taken an immediate and direct interest in this problem will be very pleased with the action now being taken. This matter has been receiving attention for some considerable time. To see the realization of the green belt in concrete form is something that will, I am sure, meet with the approval of all who are concerned with the problem.

I should like to ask one question by way of clarification. I take it from the statement that it is intended that this matter be dealt with in the new bill replacing the Federal District Commission Act and not as a separate piece of legislation. Is that right?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the purpose we have in mind.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group welcome the very important announcement just made by the Prime Minister. As do other Canadians, we look forward to the building of a planned national capital of beauty which all Canadians will be proud of in the future. We will wish to look at the bill in detail when it is before the house to see that the legitimate interests of all property holders are maintained. We also express the hope that in the work as it goes forward attention will be given to the removal of slums within this area, and the development of the whole area not only in the interests of the people of the country generally but the residents of the national capital area.

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for this decision. It was decided in 1956 that this would be the best thing to do. I should merely like to ask whether the owners of land will be reasonably well paid for lands within the green belt that are purchased or expropriated. I also wish the name "green belt" would be changed.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROPOSED TOLLS

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway authority of Canada and the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation of the United States in a simultaneous announcement today are making public the proposed tolls which may form the basis of recommendations to their respective governments to meet the requirements of the legislation of each country. The recommendations which were submitted by the Canadian tolls committee and by the United States tolls committee are in complete agreement.

The main features of the proposed toll structure are as follows: For each passage through the entire seaway, Montreal to or from lake Erie, a vessel will be assessed 6 cents per gross registered ton of vessel and in addition 42 cents per ton of bulk cargo and 95 cents per ton of general cargo carried. For each passage, Montreal to or from lake Ontario only, a vessel will be assessed 4 cents per gross registered ton of vessel and in addition 40 cents per ton of bulk cargo and 90 cents per ton of general cargo carried.

For partial transit of the new seaway facilities between Montreal and lake Ontario, where there are seven locks, the user will be charged 15 per cent of the applicable toll for each lock transited.

For each passage through the Welland canal only a vessel will be assessed 2 cents per gross registered ton of the vessel, and in addition 2 cents per ton of bulk cargo and 5 cents per ton of general cargo carried. In the Welland canal a partial transit will be assessed 50 per cent of the toll irrespective of the number of locks used.

The unit of weight for the collection of tolls on cargo will be a ton of 2,000 pounds.

Commercial vessels carrying passengers will be charged 50 cents per passenger for each lock transited between Montreal and lake Erie in addition to the vessel charge.

The charging of tolls on the Welland canal as part of the seaway in order to defray the capital cost of deepening as well as operating and maintenance expenses is a requirement of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act passed without dissent by the parliament of Canada in 1951. The act pertains to a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie.

The suggested tolls, according to the tolls committees, should be sufficient to meet all financial requirements as the anticipated traffic develops. It is believed by the members of the tolls committees that the revenue derived will provide for the annual cost of operation and maintenance of the new seaway facilities and of the Welland canal, and meet interest charges and amortize borrowed moneys over a period covering the next 50 years. They have estimated that in the first year of operation the traffic through the new portion of the seaway would approximate 25 million cargo tons but would rise gradually to 50 million tons by 1968. The latter figure has been used for the 40 years after the development period, since this is considered to be the workable capacity of the facilities presently existing and under construction between Montreal and lake Erie. For the Welland canal the Canadian committee estimates the tonnage of cargo at 40 million tons in 1959 with a gradual increase to 60 million tons in 1968.

The traffic estimates of the committees anticipate a developmental period extending to 1968, that is a period of 10 years during which there may not be sufficient revenue to meet all the annual financial requirements. However, with the proposed tolls and the level of traffic which is anticipated beginning with the year 1968 they say that the annual revenues will be sufficient to compensate for the deficiencies incurred during the development period, and that all other financial requirements will be taken care of within the period of 50 years.

A simple method of toll collection is proposed based on the necessity of non-interference with prompt passage by any user. Provision is made for prior registration of any vessel and satisfactory security being given for the payment of charges either with the St. Lawrence seaway authority or with the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, subsequent to which passage will be permitted. Toll collection and invoicing of accounts as well as the preparation of statistical data is proposed to be assigned to the St. Lawrence seaway authority. The St. Lawrence seaway development corporation has agreed to participate and share in the annual cost of these services. Charges will be billed to the owner or agent promptly and will be payable within seven days after the passage of the ship.

For through passage to or from Montreal and lake Ontario, the invoice will show two amounts to be paid: (1) in Canadian funds to cover the proportion applicable to the St. Lawrence seaway authority, which has been determined at 71 per cent of the total charges; and (2) the balance of the account, or 29 per cent, in United States funds, representing the proportion applicable to the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, payable at any designated bank in Canada or in the United States. Tolls collected for use of the Welland canal will be for the St. Lawrence seaway authority account and payable in Canadian dollars. The committees stated that the division of tolls indicated above is based upon current figures of estimated capital and operating costs, and can be subject to variation as actual costs are determined.

The reports stated that the projection of traffic volume and financial requirements has been made, bearing in mind the legislative requirements on the one hand and on the other the desirability of establishing tolls which in the early years will be conducive to the development of traffic. If future events should indicate that traffic conditions or future financial requirements have been either overestimated or underestimated, the necessary adjustments can be made in the toll structure.

Bulk cargo as defined in the proposed tariff will include such commodities as grain and grain products, loose or in sacks, ores and minerals as described, liquids in ships' tanks, pulpwood, poles and logs, woodpulp, waste paper, iron and steel scrap and pig iron. Domestic package freight of each country will also take the bulk cargo rate. All commodities not included in the definition of bulk cargo will be classified as general cargo.

The recommendations of the Canadian tolls committee, together with supporting statistical data, are being made public concurrently.

In accordance with the requirements of their legislation, the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation will hold public hearings at Washington on August 6, 1958, at which interested parties will have an opportunity to express their views on the proposed charges. The St. Lawrence seaway authority, as a matter of policy, will hold public hearings at Ottawa commencing the same day.

Those intending to appear at Ottawa should advise the acting secretary of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, Ottawa, of their intention to make representations, and should also submit 10 copies of their briefs at least 10 days before the date of the hearing.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that hon. members will wish to know the total effect of this levy per bushel of grain or per ton of iron ore, etc. On a cargo of wheat moved from Fort William to Montreal we expect that savings of at least 4 cents a bushel will be realized after allowances for the toll charges. For the movement of iron ore, as there are no published freight rates it is impossible to state the exact saving which will be made. However, the evidence is that the savings through the avoidance of transshipment, and use of large ships, will be far in excess of the levy of 46 cents per ton.

For all the wide range of other commodities that will be carried on the seaway similar savings will be realized, varying with the commodity and the particular conditions of its transport. These include bulk commodities such as coal, pulpwood and petroleum products, package freight—which as domestic traffic is to be charged tolls at the same rate as bulk freight—and direct overseas traffic in general merchandise. Here again I can only point to the opportunities for savings which the seaway will provide, which indicate that the amount saved over and above the toll charges should be substantial.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the minister and more particularly, if he will allow me to do so, the St. Lawrence seaway authority for the establishment of a tariff of tolls at this time. When the St. Lawrence seaway authority was established it had two things to do. The first was to build a 27-foot navigation canal from Montreal to lake Erie. The second was to establish a tariff of tolls, the latter being a matter of great importance and one which was extremely complicated.

That is why I would now like to say that I believe the St. Lawrence seaway authority as well as the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation should be commenced for the establishment of that toll in co-operation with each other. I am not in a position, of course, to pass judgment on the matter of tolls; that will require some study, but I would point out to the minister that I am glad he has made this statement because just on Monday of this week my colleagues the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) complained about the fact that we were being given little or no information concerning the seaway, concerning the imposition of tolls and concerning the manner in which those tolls would be imposed. Now, while we have not been given all the information for which we have asked, we have been given some information and for that I am grateful to the minister.

I would also like to say that as I listened to the information on the various tolls mentioned by the minister, while I am not in a position to comment upon them they did appear to me to be attractive. However, whether they are low enough to be non-discriminatory to the industries which will be established along the seaway is a matter which will have to be studied by the bodies to which the minister has referred.

As the minister has said, the toll must be high enough to amortize the capital expenditures in connection with the seaway and must be low enough to encourage traffic. Are these tolls low enough to encourage traffic to move freely? I hope they are.

The questions which now come to my mind are, first, will the government seek the approval of the United States government with respect to this tariff of tolls; and second, will the board of transport commissioners hear applications—I now refer to complaints made on Monday by the two hon. members I mentioned previously—with respect to an industry which is being discriminated against? In other words, will the board of transport commissioners have jurisdiction to hear such cases, as outlined in section 15 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, or will such cases fall under the jurisdiction of the St. Lawrence seaway authority?

There is one other point which I would like to raise, and this is by way of complaint. I made a complaint on Monday that unfortunately many of the statements which have been emanating from Washington should have emanated from this House of Commons. On at least three different occasions there have been complaints in this house on the part of both the hon. member for Welland and myself that the minister and the government should have given the information to the house and, instead of giving it to the house at the appropriate time, it came from Washington. I am informed on reliable authority that the statement which the hon. minister has just made was given to the press in Washington last night, and that newspapermen in the United States telephoned newspapermen in Canada asking them for their views on the tariff of tolls. The newspapermen in this country had not seen this tariff and were therefore not given an opportunity to consider the tolls. I know this is not the fault of the government but it is certainly the fault of someone, and it is a pretty serious fault because, since the tolls are so complicated, it barely gives our newspapermen a chance to report authoritatively on them.

I would therefore ask the minister why Canadian newsmen did not have the same opportunity as their colleagues in the United States to obtain information on these tolls at least 12 hours before the announcement was made, in order that they might have had an opportunity to prepare their reports.

Mr. Hees: I would like to answer the hon. member on that point. It was arranged between the Canadian and United States authorities that this release would be made simultaneously at 2.30 this afternoon. It was my understanding that this release was not to be handed to the press of either country until that time. It was our intention to give this release to the press in Canada simultaneously with my announcement in the house. However, the authorities in the United States released copies last night, I understand. I was told of that this morning, and was advised that the release bore a release time of 2.30 p.m. today. As soon as I learned that this had been done, which was at about a quarter to twelve this morning, I immediately made arrangements that the statement should be released to the press of Canada at that time for their information with a release time firmly stated upon it of 2.30 this afternoon.

Mr. Chevrier: I am just wondering, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend realizes that this is about the third time within the last two or three months that this has happened.

Mr. Hees: I might answer the hon. member in this way. Any time that reports have come from Washington I have been as surprised and disturbed as he and other hon. members have been. I have made inquiries upon each occasion, and have been told that the statements have not been official statements and have not been connected with the members of the tolls committee or the American seaway development corporation, and I have accepted the explanation of the United States authorities in good faith.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the statement by the minister. A reading of the Congressional Record in the last several months, especially the portions emanating from the House of Representatives, indicates there has been a great deal of misinformation in the United States house as to the part that Canada has played in the seaway and the respective weight of the burdens borne by the two countries, and concerning the whole definition of toll charges.

I hope the government will take the action which seemed to be called for in the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier, and that is to issue an aggressive statement on Canada's position in this whole question of tolls and the role we have played. In other words, the government should do something in the way of a public relations job in the United States and especially in Washington, to let them know the part Canada has played.

I take it from the minister's statement that any possibility of discriminatory clauses against foreign shipping has been completely ruled out. Of course I do not think this is a dead issue, and I hope some of the groups who present briefs to the meeting on August 6 will bring up that matter again, because it is a question that is not completely settled to the satisfaction of many people, especially those along the lake, despite the report of the royal commission on coastal shipping.

TRANSPORT

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last, after the house had gone into supply, the estimates of three departments were called including those of the Department of Transport. At that time I asked leave to move that the estimates of that particular department be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. My friend the hon. member for Laurier suggested that this motion be allowed to stand until yesterday in order that he might discuss this proposal with the Leader of the Opposition.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks):

> That items numbered 414 to 430, inclusive, items numbered 433 to 441, inclusive, items numbered 444 to 472, inclusive, and items numbered 512 to 516, inclusive, as listed in the main estimates 1958-59; and items numbered 628 to 634, inclusive, items numbered 636 to 651, inclusive, and items numbered 661 and 662, as listed in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, relating to the Department of Transport be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

That list excludes the five items which in the ordinary course are sent to a special sessional committee on government-owned railways and shipping. All items with the exception of those five are covered by the motion.

I merely point out again that this plan is being followed in the belief that the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will be able to thoroughly examine the estimates of the Department of Transport. There it will be possible to have officials of the department interrogated and a much more careful study made than is the case in the committee of the whole house. Of course, once the estimates have been considered by this standing committee they would then be referred back to the committee of supply, when they will all have to be passed by hon. members of the house sitting in committee. This is in line with the action we have taken—

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I understand the motion which the minister is making it is under standing order 57 and is not debatable. If the minister feels it necessary to make an extended explanation I would feel obliged to permit at least equivalent debate from hon. members on the other side of the house, so I warn the minister that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. Green: I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker. I will say no more.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I was certainly under the impression that the motion could be debated, and I would like to say something at this time.

Mr. Speaker: That is not my understanding of the standing order under which the motion is made. Perhaps I should read the motion, which is as follows:

That items numbered 414 to 430, inclusive, items numbered 433 to 441, inclusive, items numbered 444 to 472, inclusive, and items numbered 512 to 516, inclusive, as listed in the main estimates 1958-59; and items numbered 628 to 634, inclusive, items numbered 636 to 651, inclusive, and items numbered 661 and 662, as listed in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, relating to the Department of Transport be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Before Your Honour proceeds with the matter may I say that I am under the impression that this is a motion which requires notice, and I was rising not to protest against notice not being given, but to take advantage of the fact that notice was not given and to ask for permission to make a statement. The leader of the house has already made a rather lengthy statement, and I should like to be allowed to say something in reply, with the permission of the house.

Mr. Speaker: With the permission of the house it would be possible. As I understand it the motion comes under standing order 57, which reads:

A motion, to be decided without debate or amendment, may be made without notice during routine proceedings by a minister of the crown withdrawing any item or items in the estimates from the committee of supply and referring the same to any standing or special committee and, upon report from any such committee, the said item or items shall stand referred to the committee of supply.

This is a new rule in the last amendment and presumably it was designed specifically for the present purpose. Perhaps the minister did not understand when he made his statement. I daresay in the circumstances he and the house will agree to hear a brief statement from the hon. member for Laurier. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank Mr. Speaker and the house. My purpose in rising, Mr. Speaker, is to object to the estimates of the Department of Transport being referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. It seems to me that is a standing committee of the house established under one of the rules for an explicit purpose, namely to deal with matters concerning railways, canals, waterways, civil aviation and the like, which are referred to it from time to time by this house. It would seem to me that we should deal in the House of Commons in the committee of the whole with the estimates of the Department of Transport, which is a large spending department, as is the Department of Public Works.

That is one of the reasons why I think the estimates should remain here. Another reason is that I am afraid this committee is to be used for purposes other than those for which it was established. The suggestion was made very innocently the other day at the committee meeting that perhaps there could be called before that committee such witnesses as Mr. Donald Gordon, president of Canadian National Railways, and Mr. Gordon McGregor, president of T.C.A., to discuss matters concerning the affairs of the Canadian National Railways and T.C.A., when for years it has been the practice to deal with these matters in another committee.

Mr. Green: May I point out it is the intention this year to have the Canadian National Railways and the T.C.A. dealt with by another committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad to hear that is the intention. It will give the house its usual opportunity of discussing these matters when the committee is established. But then there is another thing to which I feel I must strongly object, namely the intention of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to establish itself as a study group and call officers and officials of the Department of Transport. I think that is getting away from the purpose of standing committees of this house. They are not established for the purpose of being used as study groups. If there are members in this house who feel that they want information there are several ways in which they can get that information other than by turning the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines into a study group.

In conclusion, because I realize I am trespassing on the time of the house, I should like to quote just one short statement which may be found in Hansard of 1955, volume I, at page 968, when the house was dealing with the motion to refer estimates to the special committee on estimates:

I shall conclude with this observation. I believe it would be a mistake—and again the minister may correct me if I misunderstood him—to have a committee of supply examining departmental estimates in this chamber and at the same time a committee on estimates examining some other department in some other part of this building. We would have the main House of Commons and a minor house of commons operating at one and the same time.

It seems to me that would detract from one or the other, and my preference is to retain the discussion here in the House of Commons.

These were the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill). I could read the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) but I will not trespass on the time of the house. All I need say is that at that time strong objection was taken to a motion of this kind. I do not believe it is possible to deal with these estimates properly in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, which is set up for one purpose, rather than deal with them in the House of Commons which is the proper place for them. I ask the minister and the Prime Minister to recall what, if not he, at least the present leader of the house said on one occasion, namely that it was the responsibility of the committee established at the time to decide whether or not estimates would be considered by it. Now it is the house that is deciding without the consent of the committee. Apparently the purpose—

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he not admit that this referred to the committee on estimates?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but the principle—

Mr. Green: It is an entirely different thing.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no; the principle is exactly the same. What was being done at the time was to refer certain estimates to the committee on estimates. What is being done now is to take various departments and send their estimates to other committees established and not functioning. In other words, eight or ten departments will go to eight or ten different committees; whereas I respectfully submit that the estimates, particularly of the larger departments, should remain in the House of Commons where they can get better consideration and better study can be given them. That is the point I am trying to make. I ask the minister as well as the Prime Minister to reconsider this motion.

Mr. Green: How does the hon. member differentiate between the course we are now advocating and the course followed in connection with the estimates of the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Chevrier: It was the only department.

Mr. Speaker: The matter is before the house, and I cannot even ask if the house is ready for the question. It is not debatable. It is my duty to put the question unless the mover and seconder request otherwise. Shall I dispense with the reading of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, on division.

STARRED QUESTIONS

RESEARCH INTO NATURAL HEALTH RESOURCES

Question No. 12—Mr. Winch:

1. Since July 16, 1955, has any research been undertaken under instructions of the Minister of National Health and Welfare by the Charles Best Institute in Toronto, or the research committee of the department into any aspects relating to natural health resources in Canada?
2. If so, will the reports be made available to the house?
3. If no research has been instituted, is same being considered?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The answer to the first part of the question is no; but it must be understood that a former minister of the department may have invited outstanding research centres and the provinces to submit suitable projects for federal assistance on behalf of such research—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —under the terms of the national health grants, but there is no record that the research centres or their sponsoring provinces have done so to date.

Question No. 2 is answered by my answer to question No. 1. In answer to question No. 3, I would say that it is not proposed at this time to undertake such research within the department, but the provinces will continue to be encouraged to submit projects under the national health grants for federal assistance for research dealing with all aspects of the health of the people of Canada.

FAUTEUX REPORT—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Question No. 13—Mr. Winch:

1. Have any of the 44 recommendations contained in the Fauteux report been implemented?
2. If so, which ones, and was such implementation made by federal or provincial authority?
3. Has the Department of Justice entered into negotiations with the various provincial governments relative to joint action?
4. Have steps been taken to call a dominion-provincial conference of attorneys general in connection with such recommendations?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of this question is yes. In reply to part 2 I would say that the following recommendations have been implemented, in whole or in part, by the federal government: 20, 21, 23, 24, 28, 35, 38, 39, 41, 42 and 43. I made a sincere attempt, Mr. Speaker, to prepare, for the information of the hon. gentleman who asked the question and of the house, a short summary of the actual content of those recommendations to which I have referred by number, but I found it was not possible to condense it into a short space. However, if the house would consent I would be prepared to table at this point, so that it may form part of the answer, a written statement showing in detail just what the recommendations were and what has been done in connection with them.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable that the statement to which the minister has just referred be tabled and made a part of Hansard at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: The recommendations that have been implemented, in whole or in part, by the federal government are as follows:

20. The federal and the provincial governments should give serious consideration, in expanding their systems of penal institutions, to the establishment, on a medium security basis, of such additional institutions as may be required.

Joyceville is being built as a medium security institution and the new Quebec institution will also be of that type.

21. In the women's prison at Kingston, Ontario, a more intensified system of varied forms of treatment should be instituted.

The commissioner of penitentiaries informs me that additional professional staff has been added.

23. In relation to the operation of all penal institutions in Canada, more reception centres should be established to which inmates may be initially committed for classification and ultimate committal to the particular institution that provides the most useful form of treatment in their particular cases.

Reception wings have been put in operation in the penitentiaries at Montreal and Prince Albert.

24. Classification staffs should be provided for all penal institutions in Canada and, where they already exist, they should be increased to an appropriate size.

Classification staffs in the penitentiaries are being increased regularly in size.

28. Every penal institution in Canada should institute an appropriate pre-release program for the benefit of inmates.

Each of the penitentiaries has instituted, by way of experiment, pre-release programs for inmates serving long sentences.

35. As soon as possible, a system of automatic parole review should be instituted for Canada, thereby dispensing with the present system which requires an application for parole.

The remission service has instituted a system of automatic parole review which is 40 per cent completed.

38. Some means should be found to provide specialized after-care for particular types of parolees, such as sex offenders, drug addicts, alcoholics and psychopaths.

The remission service, in conjunction with the after-care agencies and with the co-operation of certain clinics, is increasing the amount of specialized after-care that is available for persons of these types.

39. The federal and provincial governments should increase their financial grants to voluntary after-care agencies in order to enable them to work more effectively in the correctional field.

There have been annual increases in the amounts that parliament has been asked to appropriate by way of grants to voluntary after-care agencies. The amount for the current fiscal year that is asked is $120,000, divided between the penitentiary service and the remission service.

41. The annual conference of after-care agencies and government services should be continued in the future.

The conference of after-care agencies has been held annually since the Fauteux report was presented to the government.

42. A national parole board should be established as recommended in chapter XI of the report.

The speech from the throne forecast a bill to establish a national parole board at the present session of parliament.

43. The administration of federal correctional services should be organized as suggested in chapter XII of the report.

In partial implementation of this recommendation we have established a committee consisting of the deputy minister of justice, the commissioner of the R.C.M. Police, the commissioner of penitentiaries and the director of the criminal law section of the Department of Justice for the purpose of considering and advising on questions of policy or general concern in connection with matters under our jurisdiction in the correctional field.

The answer to part 3 is no and the answer to part 4 is yes. I should like to state by way of amplification that I answered 3 in the negative because we have not actually commenced the conference, and part 4 in the affirmative because we are taking steps to call that conference this year.

HEALTH INSURANCE—HOSPITAL SERVICE COSTS

Question No. 14—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Have representations been received from the Canadian Hospital Association by the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare, urging the administration to allow depreciation and interest on debt, and to be included as hospital service costs under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act?

2. If so, what reply, if any, has been made to these representations by the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to number 1 is yes and the answer to number 2 is that the representations made are about to be considered on the expert level to ascertain the implications inherent in them.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has considered the reply made the other day by the Minister of National Health and Welfare? I do not think it can possibly be regarded as consistent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member for Essex East to defer his question until the orders of the day.

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT ROADS

Question No. 16—Mr. Benidickson:

What offers, if any, for sharing costs of roads for resources development has the government made to the provinces since July 1, 1957, beyond the offer set out in appendix "C" to Hansard of January 3, 1958 (forest access roads)?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the offer made to the provinces, as set out in appendix "C" of Hansard of January 3, 1958, letters were sent to the premier of each province on February 12, 1958, offering them the opportunity of participating in the roads to resources program. The program in each province would be on a five year basis, and the federal government would be prepared to provide up to 50 per cent of the cost of constructing resource roads falling within an agreed program up to a maximum contribution by the federal government in any one year of $1,500,000 in each province or a total of $7,500,000 for the five year period. The provincial government would be responsible for the maintenance of any roads constructed under the program.

With the permission of the house I shall now table copies of the letters sent to the premiers of the provinces outlining the proposals of the federal government. The premiers of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick received identical letters to that sent to Premier Matheson of Prince Edward Island. I am also tabling a copy of the letter dated February 14 sent by the deputy minister of my department to the premier of the province of Alberta advising that the proposal need no longer be treated as confidential. Identical letters were sent to the premiers of the other provinces on the same date.

CANADA COUNCIL—CAPITAL EXPENDITURE GRANTS

Question No. 17—Mr. Fisher:

1. What value and percentage of the grants of Canada Council awarded to universities in the last operational year went for residences or dormitories?

2. Is it a requirement set by Canada Council that such residences contain a library?

3. If so, what requirements are there as to size, type of bookstock and catalogue facilities?

4. Has Canada Council a classification of the kind of university capital expenditures to which it will consider awarding grants?

5. If so, what is the classification?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these questions have to do with the Canada Council. Last autumn, on November 27, a question was asked by the hon. gentleman respecting the Canada Council and I refer to the answer appearing in Hansard at page 1558, where these words in particular are found:

Paragraph 23 of the act clearly specifies the manner in which the council is to report to parliament annually.

I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that when he asked that question last fall concerning the Canada Council it was pointed out that the council is not an agent of Her Majesty and that the Canada Council Act clearly specifies the manner in which the council is to report to parliament annually. The hon. member communicated with my office in order to ascertain how the information that he desires to secure might be procurable. I felt that it would be possible to make the request for the information to the council and for the council to be able to furnish it. However, the government does not have in its records the information requested, nor does it consider that it has the power to request information from the council other than that which will appear in the annual report.

It is impossible to give any answer to the several questions asked. Under the circumstances I trust that the hon. member will not press the government further for information of this nature. The annual report of the council will probably be tabled later this month, at which time hon. members will obtain detailed information as to the operations and policies of the council. I again say that I hoped we would have been able to secure this information but that has proven impossible, having regard to the legislation in effect.

CARSON STROUD

Question No. 18—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Is Carson Stroud of Glovertown, Newfoundland, employed in any capacity by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources?

2. If so, what are his duties and what is his remuneration?

3. If not, does he select persons to be employed in the Terra Nova national park?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the answers to these three questions are as follows: 1, no; 2, answered by No. 1; 3, no.

FISHERY GUARDIANS, NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 19—Mr. Batten:

1. What were the names and addresses of all fishery guardians employed on salmon rivers by the Department of Fisheries in the province of Newfoundland in 1957?
2. For how many seasons had they been employed in each case?
3. To what rivers were they assigned in each case?
4. What are the names and addresses of all fishery guardians employed on salmon rivers by the Department of Fisheries in the province of Newfoundland in 1958?
5. To what rivers have they been assigned in each case?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, to answer all parts of this question requires long lists of names, addresses and locations, 122 of them in one case. I think I should not take up the time of the house reading these lists. Perhaps it would meet the hon. member's purpose if I were to ask that the question be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Question No. 19 is made an order for return.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FISHERY GUARDIANS, NEWFOUNDLAND

3. To what rivers were they assigned in each case?
4. What are the names and addresses of all fishery guardians employed on salmon rivers by the Department of Fisheries in the province of Newfoundland in 1958?
5. To what rivers have they been assigned in each case?

Question No. 72—Mr. Houck:

1. What are the names and locations of highway bridges in the province of Ontario to which the federal government has contributed financial assistance in building or repairs from July 1, 1957 until May 1, 1958?
2. Which of these bridges carry both highway and railway traffic, indicating railway in each instance?
3. What was the total expenditure on each bridge for the above-mentioned period?
4. How was the cost shared?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

PROHIBITED BOOKS

Question No. 73—Mr. Fisher:

1. How many books were prohibited entry into Canada in the year ending June 1, 1958?
2. What were the respective countries of origin, the authors and titles?

HEART DISEASE AND CANCER—MORTALITY AND RESEARCH STATISTICS

Question No. 89—Mr. McMillan:

1. During the last five years how many persons in Canada, by provinces, have died each year (a) from heart disease; (b) from cancer?
2. Are grants provided annually for research into the causes of cancer and heart disease?
3. If so, (a) what amounts are appropriated for such purposes and in what manner have such amounts been distributed; (b) which institutions are entitled thereto?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

PREMIUM IRON ORE COMPANY

Motion No. 3—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Minister of National Revenue or any officials of the department, and officials of the United States, concerning the Consolidated Premium Iron Ore Company, the Premium Iron Ore Company, Cyrus Eaton, and F. Daley, from January 1, 1948 to May 12, 1958.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue may I make the following statement. The Minister of National Revenue has had several conversations with the hon. member who has asked for these papers, and as a result they have agreed as to what documents should be produced under the terms of the order, certain restrictions being necessary because of the secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act.

I want to emphasize, however, the minister says, that all of the correspondence exchanged between the deputy ministers of the Department of National Revenue (taxation) and the United States officials has been produced. Subject to that qualification, and also to the usual one respecting the obtaining of the consent of the United States government to such production, the order may be allowed to pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the explanation and limitations set out in the communication from the minister?

Motion agreed to.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

Motion No. 6—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government finds it necessary to oppose this motion, on the ground that "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958", is a confidential document.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: Take the cover off it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If my hon. friends will wait a moment they will hear the rest of the answer. It is believed that the publication of the report—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. May I draw Your Honour's attention to standing order No. 47, which reads:

> Notices of motions for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the Clerk on the order paper under the heading "Notices of motions for the production of papers". All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "Notices of motions".

Now, sir, if the Prime Minister would undertake to give us an opportunity for a debate on this motion, I would ask the Clerk under that rule to have this motion transferred to notices of motions. If the Prime Minister is not willing to do that, I do not think he should have privileges that are not accorded to other members of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: On the point of order?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I was just following the course that the hon. gentleman himself followed on January 20, 1954, when he set forth the reasons for his objection to certain productions. I was going to say we will produce it immediately after this year ends. It is a current report, publication of which would be detrimental until January, 1959.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is, of course, in accordance with the rules, a point of order. It is not a debatable motion. It can be transferred for the purpose of debate. Is that at the request of the house or the government? It is not a debatable motion. The only thing that remains is to dispose of the motion, and I shall now put it. All those in favour of the motion will say yea.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order, if I might crave your indulgence, it does not appear that it requires the consent of the house. The rule says:

> —if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "Notices of motions".

I request Your Honour to ask the Clerk to transfer this to notices of motions, on the understanding that the government will provide an opportunity for debate, an undertaking which I might point out was given by the preceding government in exactly similar circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the Prime Minister if he wishes to address himself to this provision of the rule:

> All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "Notices of motions".

Now I raise the question, at whose request will the motion be transferred for debate? If anyone can give me any assistance on the subject I shall be glad to have it. If the Prime Minister or any member has anything to say on that point I would be glad to hear him.

Mr. Green: I might point out that reading the first part of rule 47, we find this:

> Notices of motions for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the Clerk on the order paper under the heading "Notices of motions for the production of papers".

The hon. member has put this question on the order paper marked with an asterisk, yet now he thinks he will get some advantage by changing his mind and having a debate on the subject. I suggest the rule was never intended to enable a member to make such a request.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to submit to Your Honour that on one occasion about two years ago a motion was made by a member of the C.C.F. party for certain documents relating to the Caughnawaga Indian reserve at the time I was minister. I invoked this rule, the motion was transferred, and the government of the day gave an undertaking that there would be an opportunity for debate, which opportunity was provided.

Mr. Speaker: What does the hon. member say to the point made by the Minister of Public Works, that by placing the notice of motion on the order paper with a star he has elected not to have a debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: I submit that it is provided in the rules that this transfer can be made. The important word is "transfer". It would have been quite acceptable to me to have no debate if the government had been willing to comply with the motion. Since the Prime Minister has refused the information to the house it does seem to me, sir, that then I can invoke the second part of the standing order and ask to have it transferred for the purpose of having a debate on a matter which, as Your Honour will recall, relates to a document which the Prime Minister gratuitously brought before the house in a previous parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if I might be heard on the point of order. I want to draw Your Honour's attention to the different language used in the two parts of standing order No. 47. The first part deals with the marking of the question when it is put on the order paper. The second part deals with the transfer when it is called. In other words there are two different points of time, and I think that completely answers the argument made by the Minister of Public Works.

I should like if I may, then, to read the standing order in the light of these remarks. The first part reads:

> Notices of motions for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the Clerk on the order paper under the heading "Notices of motions for the production of papers".

Then there is a period in the standing order. Then this part comes:

> All such notices when called—

And I want to emphasize the words "when called".

> —shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "Notices of motions".

In other words, the point I want to make is that two different points of time are envisaged. There is nothing inconsistent in a member placing the motion on the order paper with an asterisk and, when the motion is called, asking for a debate.

Mr. Harkness: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it seems to me that this rule is quite clear. It states:

> All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired—

It seems to me it is quite clear that it is not the desire of the individual or the member who places the motion on the order paper which is meant, but rather the desire of the house. If the house desires a debate on it, well and good; it will be proceeded with.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think you can read anything else into this clause except that what is meant is that it is the desire of the house that debate be held.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Green: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. If the contention made by the hon. member for Ottawa West is correct, then on every single one of these notices of motions for the production of papers the member who puts that notice on the order paper can force a debate on it.

Mr. McIlraith: That is right.

Mr. Green: That would be a ridiculous situation if the house should have to debate every one of these notices of motions simply at the whim of the hon. member who happened to put it on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out what I feel would be the practical result of the request made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member may I say that I am not interested in the practical result. I am interested in what this rule means as it reads. If he will address himself to that point of order we shall dispose of it. We all know what the practical result will be.

Mr. Argue: As to what the rule means, may I say this. The standing order reads in part:

> All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the Clerk to the order of "Notices of motions".

I suggest that the hon. member who has made the request, because of the fact that the motion is in his name, is not in order in that request. I suggest further that this rule cannot be applied in order to bring on a debate merely by adopting it because, if we pass it, the motion will go to the bottom of notices of motions and would be No. 46. Those are private members' motions, and it would not come up for debate. Therefore the desired debate would not be achieved. I do not think either, with great respect, that the Prime Minister as such can himself say whether or not a debate may be held. It is up to the house at some future date to decide.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for the assistance he has given me. However, I am still finding some difficulty with this rule. I think it is open to any member to put a notice of motion of this kind on the order paper, under notices of motions, to which heading it will go if it is transferred at this time. As I understand the rule, the marking of the notice with an asterisk simply means that it is dealt with on routine proceedings with other matters that do not require an extensive expenditure of time, and where there is no debate. That is where we find it. If there is a change of mind and a debate is required on the motion, this rule apparently permits the notice to be transferred to the general heading "Notices of Motions" and, as the hon. member for Assiniboia points out, there it will go to the bottom of the list where it will likely be buried for the rest of the session.

However, I think that was the intention of the rule. The only thing that puzzled me was whether the mover of the motion could in effect change his mind. The question really is whose request or whose desire is to be given effect to. As there has been a request for a debate on this motion, I think effect should be given to that request and that it should be transferred to the order paper under notices of motions.

UNDERPASS CONSTRUCTION, MILE 41.05, MONTREAL

Motion No. 9—Mr. Rouleau:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged since August 10, 1953, between the Canadian National Railways, the city of St. Laurent and its solicitors, the transport commission of Montreal, the member of parliament for Dollard and the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, concerning the application of the city of St. Laurent for the building of an underpass at the intersection of Decarie boulevard and the Canadian National Railways line at mile 41.05, L'Assomption subdivision, bearing file No. 26782.193 of the commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I have obtained the information from the department, I wish to withdraw my motion with the consent of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw his motion, which is No. 9?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

RESOURCE ROADS PROGRAM, ONT.

Motion No. 15—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence since September 1, 1957, between the federal government and the province of Ontario respecting cost sharing of a roads to resources program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad to table copies of such correspondence, subject, of course, to provincial concurrence, once agreements with the provinces have been signed. I do not consider, however, that it would be in the public interest to table copies of such correspondence while negotiations are still being carried on.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house consent that this item stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CARSON STROUD

Motion No. 16—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged since January 1, 1958, between the minister of northern affairs or any member of his staff and any person or organization in Newfoundland regarding Mr. Carson Stroud of Glovertown, Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to.

ELECTRIC POWER, NEWFOUNDLAND—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Motion No. 17—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of any communications addressed to the Prime Minister by the premier of Newfoundland since February 1, 1958, regarding federal assistance in the provision of electric power and any replies thereto.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Subject to the usual reservations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister what reservations he refers to.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am just quoting my hon. friend once more.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the reservation referred to is the one which has been expressed as to correspondence. Subject to this reservation, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BRIDGES

SECOND NARROWS, VANCOUVER—COLLAPSE OF TWO SECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Was the federal government a financial partner in the construction of the second narrows bridge in Vancouver? If so, can he inform the house whether there will be a federal inquiry into the reasons for the collapse of two sections of the bridge, with the resulting heavy toll in dead and injured?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. The agreement under the Trans-Canada Highway Act does not cover this particular bridge. Much as we regret this unfortunate accident, the dominion government has no jurisdiction.

FINANCE

RELEASE POLICY RESPECTING HUNGARIAN-POLISH-ROUMANIAN ASSETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister of which I gave him notice. Has any further consideration been given to establishing a release policy with regard to Hungarian, Polish and Roumanian assets vested in the custodian similar to the so-called victims' policy applicable to German assets, whereby individuals who prove that they themselves were subject to nazi persecution can have their property rights restored?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This matter is receiving extended consideration by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche), and when a decision is arrived at it will be communicated to the house.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—INQUIRY AS TO TRADING IN PAGE-HERSEY COMPANY STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that yesterday, shortly before the announcement of increased tariff protection on certain steel products, trading on the Toronto stock exchange in the stock of Page-Hersey Company, Canada's largest manufacturer of steel pipes and tubes, was according to press reports unusually heavy and was accompanied by a marked advance in price, does the minister feel that an investigation of the circumstances would be desirable?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I have no knowledge of this alleged activity on the stock market and I do not know whether the tariff action proposed last night, had it been known in advance, would have had any bearing on any activity in the stock market. The fact is, as everybody knows, that there has been newspaper speculation for days as to what action the government might propose in the light of recommendations made by the tariff board with regard to tariffs on pipes and tubes, which recommendations were made months ago on a reference directed to the board by the former Liberal government.

CRIMINAL CODE

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS—REPORTED PROGRAM OF BULLFIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Having in mind his interest in the humane treatment of animals, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of newspaper reports to the effect that a certain Ontario chamber of commerce intends to stage a program of bloodless bullfights for the August 2-4 holiday week end, would the minister inform the house if he considers the present provisions of the Criminal Code stringent enough to prevent any cruelty which might occur as the result of the introduction into Canada of this undesirable and exotic form of entertainment?

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind the hon. member to consider that he is really asking for a legal opinion, but I do not wish to prevent him from getting such a legal opinion if the minister is prepared to answer his question.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have an answer ready to this question because I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member in having given me notice. I would, however, point out that I can neither give a firm legal opinion nor do I know what a bloodless bullfight is or might be.

My answer is therefore even more hypothetical in this case than is the hon. member's question. The Criminal Code makes it an offence for a person to wilfully wound or injure cattle, including bulls, and also makes it an offence for a person to wilfully cause or, being the owner, wilfully permit to be caused unnecessary pain, suffering or injury to an animal. It is also an offence for a person in any manner to encourage, aid or assist at the fighting or baiting of animals.

I have seen some of the newspaper reports to which the hon. member has referred, but I do not think it would be proper for me as Minister of Justice to attempt to express in advance any opinion on the question of whether a proposed performance of this kind would or would not contravene the provisions of the Criminal Code to which I have referred. I have no doubt that the local law enforcement authorities will, in accordance with the Canadian tradition in such matters, keep close watch on the situation and will be ready to take appropriate steps at once if, in the course of such a performance, it appears that any violation of the criminal law is involved.

FISHERIES

SALT CODFISH—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries when the government intends to establish a floor price for Newfoundland salt codfish, as promised by the Prime Minister prior to March 31.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): A similar question was asked on May 29 last by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Granger). The question and answer are to be found at pages 610 and 611 of Hansard, and I have nothing to add to the answer I gave at that time.

TELEVISION

MOOSE JAW—GRANTING OF LICENCE TO STATION CHAB

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of a successful application made by radio station CHAB at Moose Jaw to the C.B.C. board of governors for permission to operate a television station. Could the minister say whether his department is likely to grant such a licence expeditiously, as the people in that area are anxiously awaiting the establishment of this station?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of the particular instance to which reference is made, but I will look into the matter and advise the hon. member.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF SLUM AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Does the announcement of the Prime Minister in regard to the supplying of money for the purchase of land outside the city of Ottawa to enhance the prestige of our national capital also include provision for removing out of the city of Ottawa many of the slum areas and fire-trap houses which now exist in the heart of the city?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I made it perfectly clear as to what was the purpose of the legislation to be brought before parliament, and I see no reason why there should be any agreement whatsoever with the suggestion that Ottawa is in the condition described by the hon. member.

TRADE

FISH—INQUIRY AS TO EFFORTS TO FIND NEW MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would advise this house whether any steps have been taken to explore new markets for Newfoundland fish, in view of the fact that there is likely to be increased production resulting from the large number of unemployed persons returning to the fishing industry?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to find an earlier question similar to this but I cannot locate it, though I feel sure it has been asked before.

Every effort is being made to extend the markets for Newfoundland fish. We are fully aware of the problems facing the fishing industry. A first class presentation of the facts has been made to us by a representative of the provincial government, and we have also heard from people in the fishing industry. We will be hearing from other groups, I think, this week or next, and we are getting all available information respecting the industry generally. We are aware of the fact that a number of people have returned and are now actively engaged in fisheries, and also that there is a surplus stock of fish on hand from last year's catch.

With these facts in mind every effort is being made to discover new outlets for Newfoundland fishery products, and these efforts will continue to be made as vigorously as is possible.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

"HANSARD"—SUGGESTION AS TO PRINTING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I would like to draw the attention of the house to a matter which might concern many hon. members. It is with respect to the printing of Hansard. If a member rises on a question of privilege during orders of the day, it occasionally happens that his remarks are printed on pages 1 and 2 under the classification "Contents". In that case they are not included in the bound edition of Hansard. I would therefore suggest that this matter be given consideration.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE CONTRIBUTIONS TO PARTICIPATING PROVINCES, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-30, to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, section 1 (1) of this bill merely clarifies the view which has been generally accepted by both the provinces and the federal government to the effect that drugs, biologicals and related preparations as provided in the agreement may only be considered as insured services when these items are actually administered in the hospital. It is obvious that if drugs were made available on a take-home basis the control of expenditures would become very difficult. The matter of control is as important to the provinces as it is to the federal government.

The suggested amendment will not, therefore, alter the present arrangements with the provinces in any way. It will merely clarify the existing situation. In explanation of subclause 2 of clause 1 of the bill I would point out that the original paragraph contained in the act relating to out-patient services, excluded drugs, biologicals and related preparations as well as accommodation and meals as a part of out-patient services. The provinces have requested that this amendment be made since it is considered that such services form an essential part of out-patient treatment. As in the case of in-patient services, however, it is proposed that drugs should not be provided on a take-home basis.

In so far as meals and accommodation are concerned it is felt the availability of these services on an out-patient basis will tend to deter admissions to hospitals. It is considered, therefore, that by expanding out-patient services in this manner the volume of in-patient services can be reduced in certain circumstances.

With respect to clause 2 of the amending bill I have already mentioned that five provinces have expressed their desire to commence operating provincial programs in accordance with the federal legislation as of July 1, 1958. The federal government would be precluded from making contributions to these provinces unless the present section 6 (2) of the act were amended. From the discussions which have taken place in this house it is obvious that the government's initiative in expediting the program is welcome.

Following my announcement last January of the government's intention to propose this amendment, provincial planning has been stimulated with the result that almost half of the provinces will be enabled to commence programs at least six months earlier than would otherwise have been possible. Prior to this debate some mention was made in the house concerning the costs to the federal treasury arising out of this amendment. While a precise determination of these costs is difficult without reference to prior experience, officials of my department estimate that the cost to the federal government of making contributions as of July 1 to the five provinces which have indicated their readiness to commence on that date will amount to approximately $30 million for the remaining six months in 1958.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago when I made a speech in this house on this bill I deplored the fact that the minister up to that point had obtained the signature of only one contributing province which would take advantage of this bill. The minister has since announced that he has obtained the signature of the province of Newfoundland and that that province has now become entitled to the full benefits of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I congratulate the minister on having obtained this signature and I hope he will succeed in obtaining many more so the act can come into effect on July 1 in respect of at least five provinces.

The minister mentioned a moment ago that five provinces have expressed a desire to come under the terms of this act. This is about the third or fourth time he has said they were desirous of doing so but I cannot understand why they do not sign an agreement. Surely the provinces have had sufficient time to sign and I cannot understand why they should delay. Up until last week only the province of Ontario had signed an agreement.

Another thing which we on this side of the house would like to have explained is how the plans are going to operate. I understand that Ontario has a limited plan which will include diagnostic services for in-patients only and not for out-patients.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, that is not so. Diagnostic services for out-patients in accident cases are being provided in the Ontario agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But only for that; that is very limited.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is not what the hon. member said.

Mr. Bourque: I stand corrected, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression that in the Ontario agreement there was included diagnostic services only for in-patients. The minister says that is not so and I stand corrected. However, I believe that Newfoundland has a more complete health scheme than Ontario which includes diagnostic services for in-patients as well as out-patients. We on this side of the house are wondering therefore just what kind of schemes the provinces will have. Will it be a plan to cover the same services in each province or will each province have a different scheme? That is very important to the average person because if a citizen in Newfoundland is going to receive more than a citizen in Ontario under this plan we should know why and what the differences are.

I have another question for which I would like an explanation. I read in this morning's paper that Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia were intending to sign an agreement and would take advantage of the provisions of the amended act on July 1. If they have not signed as yet how can the minister tell this house that these provinces will have agreements in effect on July 1?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I said that the indications were that they would be; we have every expectation of that.

Mr. Bourque: Well, Mr. Minister, you have not signed them up as yet. I am sorry but as an old salesman I am keenly aware of the fact that unless you get a signature on the dotted line you cannot consider that you have made a sale and you cannot collect your commission on the transaction. If we are going to live on promises we will not get very far, you know.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You have had lots of experience with that.

Mr. Bourque: You have already told us that three other provinces are going to sign. What about the other five provinces? As a member from Quebec I would be very much interested in knowing how far you have progressed in obtaining the signature of that province.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If you had been in the house on the debate on the resolution you would know about these things.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He was here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the discussion is getting a trifle informal for such a serious matter. There will be an opportunity in committee to discuss the details of these clauses of the bill. If we could continue the debate and relate it to the principle of the bill and try to get into committee, it would be helpful.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that we could ask the minister questions on his statement at this time as to what the plans were and what progress had been made. We are very interested in having the plan put into operation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have an opportunity in committee to ask questions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if it could be understood that there would be no denial of the right to discuss the principle of the bill as well as the clauses, that could be done. In other words, this is a small bill and if we could proceed with it at this particular stage of the proceedings on that basis we would have no objection but it could be done only on that understanding.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in finding out if the minister had personally approached the premier of each province. As a member from the province of Quebec I was just wondering what the reaction of the premier of that province had been with regard to signing this pact. We have in this house a very large number of pseudo-Conservative members who belong to the Union Nationale and I am sure they must have something to say about this affair although we have not yet heard from any of them.

So far as British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan are concerned, I cannot see how the minister can say that he expects them to follow on July 1, because so far he has not been able to tell us that these provinces have signed. The closest he has come to that is that he has said they expressed a desire to sign. There is a great difference between signing and expressing the desire to sign. When we were in power and on the other side of the house the minister of national health and welfare at that time said that we could not include tubercular and mental cases. As I said before—and I have no answer to it yet—all those tubercular and mental cases which were in provincial institutions were under the care of the provinces. The contention of the previous government was that tubercular and mental cases were the responsibility of the provincial governments. At that time the opposition, now the government, maintained that they should be under the act. Of course, the Liberal government at that time felt—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again but I do not see anything in the bill about the matter which he is discussing, namely tubercular and mental cases. It seems to me the principle of the bill is narrower than that and he is beyond the point of relevance when he attempts to discuss tubercular and mental cases.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I with respect suggest to you that is hardly the case. The point the hon. gentleman has in mind is that when hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches were on this side they thought that the measure introduced by the government was deficient in that it did not include certain insurable illnesses. What the hon. gentleman is now doing is pointing out this fact and indicating to the administration that it has the power and the opportunity of doing those things. It is not doing what it proposed when it was on this side of the house should be done. I have no doubt that the observation and the argument the hon. member is making are quite correct.

Mr. Speaker: I am not questioning the correctness of what he is saying but I am questioning whether it is relevant to this bill which is an amending bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, it is an amending bill.

Mr. Speaker: It is a bill amending an act passed by the previous administration. The fact that it amends certain sections does not open up a discussion of the whole act. As I remember the act, it excluded mental and tuberculosis cases. That is another clause of the act not affected by this bill. I would think that we would be going far afield if we permitted discussion of principles other than those involved in the amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect, I can very well understand Your Honour taking that position, but the hon. gentleman has made the argument that five provinces may sign before July 1, 1958. He has said he hoped that they would and that others might. Some of the provinces take a very strong position that tuberculosis and mental illness should be included and it may well be—I intend to ask pretty searching questions on this—that one of the reasons why they have not signed is that the present administration is adhering to the very practice and policy followed by the previous administration with regard to these exclusions. We would be precluded from discussing what is one of the essential elements in this whole matter of progress if the hon. gentleman and others were prevented from making that kind of observation.

Mr. Speaker: I am not convinced, I must say, that we can broaden out into that. I will allow the hon. member to proceed. Perhaps he will not find it necessary to get too far afield.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think there is too much danger of that.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Speaker, you said a few moments ago that this was an amendment to the original legislation. There is little change in the legislation that the previous government introduced and this amending bill. It really is a tribute to the Liberal government for having introduced such a measure.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I believe that tuberculosis and mental patients form part of the bill and their inclusion is a very important part of the bill because if they are to be left out—

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If it forms part of the bill can the hon. member refer to any clause?

Mr. Bourque: I am coming to that if the hon. member will wait only a few minutes.

Mr. Small: You are the ones who promised it 40 years ago.

Mr. Bourque: Forty years ago. That is before you had power. You were in power in 1930. If you thought it was such a good measure then you could have brought it in.

The opposition at that time made an issue of it, Mr. Speaker. They complained about the fact that we did not include tubercular and mental cases. I believe they had two votes on the matter at that time. Why did they not put it in this bill? If they thought it was such a good thing when they were in opposition why did they not include it in this bill? Not only did they make an issue of it in the house but they made it an election issue. It was one of the election promises of the government across the way. Today we see nothing in the bill about tubercular and mental cases. They talked a lot about it but they are doing nothing about it today.

I want to follow your ruling, Mr. Speaker. As I said, the government across the way when they were in opposition brought up all kinds of things when we tried to present this measure. When I read the bill I was surprised to find that they are not carrying out what they said should be done when they were on this side of the house. This amendment makes only a slight change to the legislation brought in by the previous government. I think it is a tribute to the Liberal government to find that now that these people are in power they see so little to change in the legislation originally presented by the Liberal government.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I, as you did a few minutes ago, fail to see anything about tubercular and mental patients in this bill. I would have liked to see something in the bill in that regard. Following your suggestion, I will refrain from getting into that phase of hospital insurance coverage. Needless to say, we are in favour of the principles embodied in the bill, the main part of which appears to me to be the advancement of six months in the application of it and the removal of the restriction which required a certain number of provinces representing a certain portion of the population to have such schemes in operation before any federal participation would take place.

I was very pleased to hear the minister, not only on the resolution stage but on second reading of the bill make reference to the expectation that five provinces would have signed agreements and would be covered by July 1, with the added information that other provinces are contemplating establishing plans by way of legislation and that in the immediate future we hope to have another three or four at least, and I hope 10 eventually, participating completely in such a plan.

I think we might ask ourselves this question. Why was it that after the enactment of the legislation which this bill is intended to amend there was a sudden increase in interest on the part of the various provincial governments in instituting hospital insurance plans whereas in prior years some of them, at least so far as public knowledge is concerned, did not appear to be too interested in establishing hospital insurance coverage plans such as the one that has been in effect in my own province for a number of years? I think we can find the answer to that question very easily. The mere fact that the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was placed on the statute books a few years ago indicated to the provinces that here was a source of financial assistance to them if they wanted to put hospital insurance programs into effect. It acted as a stimulus to those provinces to think in terms of providing provincial schemes. If it were not for the fact that the former Liberal administration introduced such a measure, even though it did not go far enough toward meeting the over-all problem of health care, whereby they would participate with the provinces, some of the provinces that are indicating interest today would probably not have either plans in effect or plans for enacting legislation within the next little while in order to achieve this purpose.

I am sure that it was only because the act was put into effect and the federal government indicated a desire to participate that provincial interest was stimulated to the point where, as the minister indicated, there will be five provinces participating, he hopes, by July 1, and in the not too distant future a number of other provinces, including the province of Quebec which has indicated interest. Therefore in the not too distant future, I hope within a year or two, all ten provinces will get into the picture because of the fact that the act was a stimulus to them. The result will be that we will have fairly uniform, all-inclusive hospital insurance coverage across the nation.

As I said earlier, the principle of the bill is acceptable. It is all right but it is lacking to a great degree. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will refrain from calling me to order for a few minutes and I will try not to say things that will cause you to call me to order. In dealing with the principle of the bill I feel I must express our view that the bill is deficient in that, as has been stated by the C.C.F. for many years, it does not go far enough toward providing the type of all-inclusive health coverage that the people of Canada should have and that we should give to them.

Because the present act was a stimulus to a number of provinces to enact legislation providing hospital insurance plans, surely we can expect that if any leadership at all is shown by the government in providing for all-inclusive medical and dental care under the present act there will be an equal stimulus to the provinces to expand their present hospital insurance schemes in order that they will cover medical, dental and other care necessary under an all-inclusive health scheme. In that respect we think there is a great deficiency not only in the bill but in the original act. I can only hope that a Conservative government will be a little more speedy in its acceptance of ideas put forward from this corner of the house than was the former Liberal administration and will not wait until they may think it is politically advantageous to expand the act to provide medical and dental services and an all-inclusive health scheme. I trust that they will do so at the earliest possible moment so that we can provide leadership and stimulate the provinces to expand their schemes. In that way we will not merely be providing hospital insurance coverage or participating in paying bills for people who become ill but will be taking definite corrective measures in the first instance to prevent them from becoming ill and having to go to hospital.

I hope the few remarks I have made will be taken to heart by the minister and government. I know that it will not take place during this session but I hope that between now and the next session of the house the government will undertake a study and provide the necessary leadership in order that we may have an all-inclusive health plan in Canada.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in listening with great interest to the debate as it has developed and the arguments about the proposed amendments, I think it has become quite clear that about all that opposition members have been able to do is to say that we should go further. I think that view is perhaps shared by every member of the house, but on that basis I do not think it would make any difference to what length the government might go at a particular time because there would always be those who would say, "It would be nice to go further."

In my opinion there is one thing we must consider particularly at this time when the budget has been brought forward, and that is cost. I think it is quite obvious to all of us that if we are going to urge the government to go farther in one direction we must be prepared to suggest curtailment in another direction or propose some other means of raising money for the purpose of going further with hospital insurance.

It gives me pleasure this afternoon to be able to suggest a new means of raising money for these purposes. It is a means not being used now by the government and I believe it would not cost the people of Canada or the government one cent more than they are paying now. It is something that is clearly desired by the people of Canada. I refer to a sweepstakes for hospital purposes. There have been many editorials in various newspapers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member does not propose to embark on a debate in support of sweepstakes because that has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I think the question of financing should be an aspect of concern to all members. It is perhaps the main consideration behind the advancement of any social welfare measure. We must be concerned with the cost of doing these things. As many arguments have been put forward that we should go further, I think it is certainly fair to suggest a means of financing.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. member. While costs and the means of raising the money are important, that is not what is before the house. The principle that is being discussed is the principle of a rather narrow amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I would ask the hon. member not to venture into the field of sweepstakes this afternoon.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Perhaps I have already made my point, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I say we should not continually urge the government to go further with these measures without suggesting some means of financing them.

Perhaps now that I have made the point, the government will give consideration to using that means to finance it.

(Translation):

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I only have a few brief remarks to offer, first of all to point out that this unemployment insurance legislation was originally brought forward by the preceding Liberal government and meets the urgent needs of the people of Canada.

When in 1948 Mr. Mackenzie King introduced his national health program, he pointed out that grants for hospital construction throughout the country were to be considered as the fundamental basis of a national health insurance program. In the years that followed, the former prime minister stated clearly, on more than one occasion, that the Canadian government's policy still consisted in supporting a contributory health insurance plan to be administered by the provinces. This was an excellent formula, one requiring no constitutional amendment, and which allowed the federal government to give financial assistance to provincial administrations, thus respecting provincial autonomy in the fields of public health.

It is a plan financed by all Canadians. The object of the hospital insurance act is to serve the interests of every province. Let us hope that all provinces will avail themselves of the benefits of the act and of the proposed amendment since it would obviously be unfair if the people of one province, who, in the last analysis will be called upon to pay for the plan in operation in another province, cannot enjoy the benefits of this legislation within their own province.

Now, with regard to this act and the proposed amendment, I would like to offer a few remarks about the hospital needs of the province of Quebec. Some years ago, the Quebec deputy minister of social welfare said that about 80 per cent of the citizens of our province cannot afford the costs of a prolonged stay in hospital. About a week ago, a delegation of the hospitals council, made up of 39 institutions, sought financial assistance from the city of Montreal. Dr. Turner, who was heading the delegation, said that the hospital problem is so acute that, unless they get immediate assistance, many hospitals will close down.

We have debts and salaries to pay, he said.

Under the circumstances, the people of the province of Quebec were entitled to expect a more positive and progressive stand on the part of the provincial government.

Since 1955, and 1956 too I believe, we have offered the provinces to join this plan and to get ready for it so as to make it available to the people of our province. Today, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, we are no further ahead than we were at the time. Indeed, I shall quote a statement made by the premier of the province of Quebec, which I think has a bearing on this subject. It is from a Canadian Press report dated October

25, 1955. It shows in a few words how the premier of the province of Quebec feels about this hospital insurance plan. "The premier of the province of Quebec today discounted the possibility of the province joining in a national hospitalization insurance plan. It was stated by the premier that the system of charitable institutions now existing is better adapted to the people of his province."

And there we have the reason why on this 18th day of June 1958, the people in Quebec have no inkling as to when this legislation will apply to their province. I sincerely hope that authorities—busy though they be at the moment patching up certain gas leakage—will manage to find time to allow hospitals to benefit from this hospital insurance plan.

Mr. Speaker, I have therefore shown that this legislation is one of the most beneficial steps taken by the previous Liberal administration and that it meets urgent needs. Accordingly I hope that Quebec authorities will soon take positive steps so that, like other provinces, we might enjoy the benefits of this act. However, even if Quebec authorities do act, I believe that the loss of time of the last two or three years has been so great that, in due course, the provincial government will have to answer for its serious dereliction of duty in this regard.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, since remarks at this particular stage are confined to the principle of the bill, my remarks will have to be very brief. I do not believe there is too much principle about which to talk. Hon. members of the Liberal party to my left have made particular comments on the narrowness of the amendment before this house. I too, Mr. Speaker, feel that the amendment is indeed very limited, especially when we consider the important amendments that could have been made to this very inadequate act. Certainly, I feel the government did not extend themselves on this particular amendment.

However, I am afraid that I cannot agree with the conclusion to which members of the opposition came, that the only reason for the limitation of the amendment was the excellence of the previous bill, and they take this as a special tribute to the previous government. I fail to agree in that respect, and I would say that rather than taking it as a tribute to the previous government it is more in the nature of discredit to the present government.

In line with that I feel that the first proof of the inadequacy of the bill itself is the fact that it had to be amended six months before it came into operation. I believe that is proof beyond doubt that the bill itself was not very good. I should like to remind government members, as they well know, that it took 40 years to take this first step. Certainly, when a baby ceases to creep and starts to walk, he should not start creeping all over again. It would be much better if he could improve his walking and start walking upright. I would suggest that we could have amendments of the nature of the one we have before us today every month for the next 40 years, and we would still be far from having an adequate health insurance bill.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to make a few comments on this bill. Having been made aware of Your Honour's alertness today, I would suggest that Your Honour read yesterday's Hansard to see the circumstances under which, on behalf of those of us on this side of the house, it was generally agreed we would give quick passage to the resolution. If it had not been for that, I suppose we would still be discussing the resolution.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), in expressing his disappointment at the extent to which this amendment goes, forgot I believe the tremendous expenditures that are now being borne by all levels of government in Canada in the matter of health and welfare.

Mr. Howard: But I remembered the expenditures that people make.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Quite so. I am not saying this critically. However, I think it is important to realize the extent to which —even above that, if my hon. friend wishes to put it that way—progress in this very important field has taken place. I note that in the 12 years from 1946 to 1956-57 expenditures of the federal government in the field of health and social welfare rose from $41 million to $1,331 million. I note also that on a per capita basis the 1956 figures of health and welfare benefits paid by three comparable governments—the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada—show $121 million for Canada, $97 million for the United Kingdom and $138 million for the United States. From those figures it is apparent that our expenditures cover a wide range and, to put it in a very conservative way, certainly are comparable with those of other countries.

I believe it is not generally recognized how the cost of health benefits to the Canadian people through all of their governments, federal, provincial and municipal, compare with corresponding costs in other countries. I know that comparisons are difficult to make but the best information available indicates that in 1956 benefits paid by all levels of government in Canada cost 6.5 per cent of the gross national product as compared with 8.5 per cent in the United Kingdom and 5.7 per cent in the United States. While I agree with the hon. member for Skeena who, in my opinion, the other day, made one of the best speeches in this debate, I do not think that it is objective treatment to overlook the great progress that has been made, as I am prepared to argue, within the last decade or so.

As the minister indicated, the purpose of this bill is three-fold. It is to bring in basically three amendments, two of which are relatively minor in character and are covered by one section of the bill and a third and more important one dealing with the conditions under which the federal government may begin to share with the provinces in the cost of their hospital insurance schemes.

I may say to the minister that so far as I am concerned little can be said about the first two amendments. As he indicates, the one is clarifying what was really intended and what I think is still implicit in the actual wording of the original measure. With regard to the other, that providing for meals and the like, I think that is a necessary step. I have looked over the section and I still think it could be argued that such provision is included in the present bill; but if the provinces find that it is desirable to have that provision clearly stated, of course there can be no exception taken for the reasons the minister has mentioned. Those who will take advantage of the diagnostic services within the hospital will require to spend some time in a hospital and that procedure will include necessarily, under certain conditions, taking meals in the hospital. Making that provision possible and authorizing the federal government to share in the cost of such provision is one way, as the minister has stated, of avoiding any abuse in the matter of bed occupancy. But with regard to the main amendment, I think that we must give some consideration to the circumstances—again I am not disagreeing with it—and to point out that the fact that this measure is now being introduced confirms the assertion made by hon. members on this side of the house that the government has not prosecuted this particular matter, in so far as other provinces are concerned, with the vigour it is felt on this side should have been employed. As the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) pointed out, the minister has indicated that he hopes he will be able to sign agreements not only with the provinces of Ontario and Newfoundland but by July 1 with the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, three more provinces.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): And Manitoba.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And Manitoba. I am sorry to have overlooked that province. He therefore hopes that by July 1 of this year he will have signed agreements with six provinces. I can assure my hon. friend that I join with all other hon. members in expressing the hope that there will be no doubt that on July 1 that will be the case. But it is a little bit difficult to understand why there should have been any delay whatsoever in having agreements signed long before this with the province of British Columbia, the province of Alberta and the province of Saskatchewan. In the case of the province of Alberta I note that when Dr. Ross, the health minister from Alberta, was in Ottawa some time about the end of May he was reported as saying that one of the stumbling blocks was the requirement that the provinces provide both technical and professional costs for diagnostic tests. The principle involved, he thought, was that insisting on this requirement meant that the federal government was dictating levels of service.

I should be greatly interested in what the minister has to say about that matter because I am fairly familiar with that argument. Is that the only reason why Alberta has not been able to sign the agreement? Or is it because—as I think the minister last night suggested—some examination was still being made of the character of the scheme itself in Alberta? The minister now nods approval, that that is the real reason. I can understand that, although I wonder why that is the case in Alberta. Is it because of the necessary participation, under the Alberta act, of the municipalities in terms of sharing the costs? Or is it because the scheme covers only a percentage of the population of Alberta and consequently does not come within the condition of universal availability, the phrase envisaged in the proposal made by the federal government?

What about British Columbia? British Columbia has had a hospital insurance scheme in being now for a long time. What is the difficulty? What is the attitude taken by the province of British Columbia? The minister last night, in the report that he gave, did not give us the reasons why British Columbia has not yet signed an agreement. I think the house should be given that information. It may be that arguments have developed which formerly were not thought to be valid but which might on reconsideration be thought to be valid today. I am not saying that is the case. In any event, my curiosity in this matter I think will be understandable when I say that we ought to be informed as to exactly why provinces with schemes now in being have not yet signed agreements with the federal government.

What is the situation with regard to Saskatchewan? That is a province which has had a scheme in being now for some considerable length of time, longer than any other province. It is a province that has acquired considerable know-how and experience with regard to this matter, and one that needs this additional money. Why has no agreement been signed with this province to date? We will be able to judge from the replies given by the minister with respect to the reason why no agreement has thus far been signed and as to what assessment we really should make of the likelihood of an agreement being signed before July 1. It may be that the minister will find very considerable support for the positions he may have had to take with respect to these matters. In any event, as he knows, for some time now I have been asking him in this house, both during the present session and more particularly last fall, as to the reasons why agreements have not been signed and were not signed last fall with any province and only now are they being signed with two provinces.

The same kind of interrogation might be pursued with respect to Manitoba, although the hon. minister says that Manitoba will be coming into the scheme, and I hope that the events of Monday last will not cause any delay in that particular.

I would like to know, for instance, why Prince Edward Island has not been able to come in and why is it that Nova Scotia, while announcing that it will come in by July 1, 1959, has not yet found it possible to sign an agreement? The same is true of the province of New Brunswick, that province having announced that it proposes to begin a scheme on January 1, 1959. Why is it, if that is the case, that that province has also not found it possible to sign an agreement up to the present time?

I do not say this in any critical way, and I hope the minister will not misunderstand me, but I take it that the reason for this amendment being introduced at this time is because the province of Ontario, having decided to embark upon a scheme must not be put into the position where, having taken all the necessary steps to implement this huge undertaking in what is the largest province of Canada, it cannot be assured of a contribution being made to the cost of that scheme by the federal government at the starting date of January 1, 1959.

I take it that that is the main reason for this particular legislation, and I do not quarrel with that reason. As I have mentioned on another occasion, I indicated to Premier Frost in the spring of 1957 that if six provinces had not complied with the terms of section 2 of the main act, we would by the end of September have taken steps to make it possible to pay our share to Ontario as well to other consenting provinces in a manner different from that provided by section 2 of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I think therefore it is a fair argument—as has already been suggested—that if the government had pursued this matter with vigour last fall, and if it had really urged the provinces as it is apparently now doing to sign these agreements, it would not have been necessary to bring forward this legislation. Instead of having six provinces sign this agreement by July 1, 1958, we would perhaps have had the actual signatures of two other provinces thereby making this scheme more nation-wide in scope than will now be the case. To show that this is not mere fancy, I would like to turn to what I said in this house on October 17 last, when we were discussing inter alia the matter of interim supply. I quote from page 81 in volume 1 of Hansard of that date, when in addressing the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) I said as follows:

> Now, we are surely entitled to know whether any progress at all has been made in this matter. The province of Ontario has indicated that it proposes to implement its scheme on January 1, 1959, and when I last conferred with them in my own capacity as Minister of National Health and Welfare I was informed by the premier of Ontario that not later than the end of September he should be in a position to know definitely whether or not the federal government would be able, pursuant to the act, to provide the government of Ontario with its share of the cost of the operation of the Ontario scheme.
> Unless some progress has been made I am afraid this situation is not calculated to give much encouragement. If Ontario is going to begin its scheme on January 1, 1959, unless it is to bear the full cost itself it must immediately know whether the other five consenting provinces will have conformed to the requirements of the hospital insurance act, since that legislation provides that the federal money shall be paid only when these six consenting provinces have schemes in being and in support of which the proclamation of the measures under which they operate has taken place. In other words their legislation must be in force and their scheme must be in force.

And then later on I said—and this is significant:

> If no agreements have been signed, well then, it is clear that Ontario's position, in so far as the starting date announced by the premier is concerned, is in great jeopardy unless the minister is prepared at some later date to suggest to this committee that there should be an amendment to the act to provide for payments on a basis not now envisaged by the hospital insurance act itself.

I think that clearly indicates and confirms the situation which I have just pictured. The reason for this legislation is, quite properly, in order not to embarrass the province of Ontario which has taken such steps. This legislation has become necessary but could have been avoided if this government had taken vigorous steps during last summer and fall to bring about the signing of an agreement with the six provinces which had consented prior to the election of June 1957 to the scheme introduced by the previous administration.

There is another point which I think should be made by those of us who are on this side of the house. That is with respect to those provinces which will now be the beneficiaries of this particular amendment. If it is justified for this government to now pay out money to the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia, how does the minister justify not having paid moneys out to Saskatchewan, to British Columbia and to Alberta long before this? By what principle does this government arrive at this particular type of payment to these provinces? It could be argued, in so far as the last administration is concerned, that payments were conditional upon the existence of six schemes being in force, but that condition does not appear in the present amendment. So how does the minister justify not having paid out this money in advance of this situation which has developed to those three provinces which had schemes in being long before July 1, 1958?

It is not for me to champion the cause of these three provinces, none of which is my own province, but as a citizen of Canada I believe we have a right to expect that all provinces will be treated on the same basis of principle and equity and I suggest that having refused to take this position from June 25, 1957 until the present time it will now be very difficult for the administration to explain to the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan why it is now taking steps to provide for a sharing of costs by the federal government only as of July 1, 1958.

The minister does not find this to his liking, and possibly when he replies he will indicate exactly what he means when he expresses disagreement with my point of view. If I am wrong, I would like to be told, but I am sure that is a perfectly defensible position and hon. gentlemen opposite who were on this side of the house argued that the existing provision in the act was not fair to those provinces which had schemes then in being. If it was unfair a year and a half ago surely under circumstances that are much less restrictive it would be difficult not to argue that the provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Alberta should have been reimbursed by the administration long before this.

The minister was good enough to table the agreement made with Newfoundland and the one made with Ontario. He will recall that when he announced the agreement with Newfoundland I asked him in this house whether or not the agreement with Newfoundland was on the same terms as that with the province of Ontario and the minister's reply was that both agreements were under the act. That was not my question as I indicated by my comment which went unnoticed and uncommented upon by the minister. I do find that the agreements are not the same. It is not that I am criticizing the differences in the agreements but I think it should be pointed out, as was remarked upon by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Vivian) and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan)—and quite properly so—that the two agreements do not provide exactly the same benefits in the case of Ontario and Newfoundland. There is no quarrel in so far as the federal government is concerned. It is up to each province to decide the extent to which it wishes to take advantage of the federal legislation and I am not criticizing my hon. friend but it is interesting to point out that in the case of Ontario the province only accepts the diagnostic services program to the extent of in-patients and with regard to emergency cases in the category of out-patients.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Are you criticizing the province of Ontario for that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I certainly intend to comment on it. As a citizen of Ontario I do not see why the province of Ontario does not take full advantage of the hospital and diagnostic services provisions just as Newfoundland has taken full advantage of those provisions in its agreement and just as I am sure the provinces of Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Manitoba—the latter being the only province that now has a complete diagnostic services program for both out-patients and in-patients—will take advantage of the federal offer. It is not up to us to require any province to do this. As a parliament or a government we cannot force our will on the provinces. The diagnostic services proposal which is a feature of this legislation is an extremely important matter. It is true that the total costs of the diagnostic services are not as great as the hospital insurance feature, costing some $48 million as compared with a minimum of $180 million—assuming the ten provinces participate—and any one who has given this matter great care and thought such as has the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) will agree with me that if there is any real reform and service needed to give assistance to the ordinary people of this country in the matter of health services it is in placing at their disposal the most complete form of diagnostic services so that rich and poor, all classes in the community, can have the advantage at this time of the great skills and knowledge of medical science. The only way that can be done is by an adequate system of diagnostic services.

I have my own reasons for noting the limitation in the Ontario agreement and these I discussed with the appropriate authorities in Ontario when I held the portfolio of national health and welfare. The two agreements are not identical in that one does accept fully all the diagnostic services provided by the federal government and the other accepts them with limitations.

I note that in the case of the agreement with Ontario the provisions for coverage are not as immediately complete. I am not criticizing this but I do wish to point out that the provisions with regard to Ontario are not as complete as they are in the case of Newfoundland. I am not quarrelling with that in so far as Ontario is concerned because the job of preparation in Ontario is a gigantic one and certainly much more difficult than the assignment that is placed in the hands of the government of Newfoundland, a smaller province. The fact is that the principle of universal availability is given immediate effect in the agreement with Newfoundland and that principle in the sense of immediate association with the scheme in Ontario is not open to every citizen. The principle of compulsion extends to a limited group in the preparatory stage with voluntary participation being open and available in succeeding periods.

By the way, if there is any disagreement between the minister and myself on the extent of coverage between the two agreements that have been tabled relating to the provinces of Ontario and Newfoundland I would refer my hon. friend to the press release which he made on June 9 in which he observed that:

> The in-patient services are the same—
> With respect to the province of Newfoundland.
> —as those to be made available in Ontario as a result of the agreement signed with that province on March 3, 1958.

The significant point there is that my hon. friend mentioned only the in-patient services and not the out-patient services.

There is one other feature of this measure on which I believe the minister should inform the house. The costs of this proposal are great. We believe—and I am sure the minister agrees—that with proper care and administration on the part of the provincial governments the increasing costs need not involve any more than those considerations that would add to the cost of any commodity in our society and that by careful administration the total cost of this all over the country need not be any higher than the present cost of hospitalization administered either through provincial hospital insurance schemes or, in most provinces, through voluntary schemes or by private participation.

The hon. member for Durham in the excellent speech he made a few weeks ago pointed out that one should not anticipate the millenium with regard to this kind of measure and that there would be many problems attendant on the administration of this act, such as hospital construction, the supply of the necessary personnel and other things. I admit all that but I am sure he would be the first to agree that if we waited until we had every facility at our disposal we would never make any progress in these matters at all. The fact is, however, as the hon. member for Welland said, the national health program about which the minister had something to say today in reply to a question was responsible in co-operation with the provinces in laying down the necessary and preparatory work towards the justifiable realization of hospital insurance in Canada.

When we had this measure in hand it was anticipated, if I remember correctly, that the total cost of this measure to the federal government apart from diagnostic services and assuming the participation of all provinces would be $180 million. The whole scheme is to cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $400 million, the federal government assuming roughly 50 per cent of the cost of the scheme based upon the formula of 25 per cent of the average per capita cost in the province and 25 per cent of the average per capita cost in the nation itself. I have been wondering what the cost figures are today since hospital costs vary from one province to another. My hon. friend will agree of course that the formula for distribution of the federal share endeavours to take into account the cost factor as well as providing incentive to efficiency and economy of operation.

The proposed federal contribution on a nationwide basis amounted to 50 per cent, as I said, of the total estimated shareable costs, or a minimum in the first year by the federal government, as I said, of some $180 million when all provinces were in. Therefore, the scheme is one that will cost the nation as a minimum in the first year of operation, assuming the participation of all 10 provinces, something in the neighbourhood of $400 million. Is that still the estimate of the government? It will be interesting to know whether or not that estimate is now higher. If it is higher—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been allowing the hon. member a good deal of latitude in this particular matter but I think he goes beyond what is under debate in dealing with costs of the scheme and asking questions about the cost of the whole scheme.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, so far as the last observation is concerned I will not quarrel with you. What I am seeking to do is to ascertain from the minister the reason why some provinces have not yet come in. Undoubtedly, the cost involved is one of the reasons. For instance, I would like to know from the minister whether or not the allocations to the various provinces will continue to be the same. Under the scheme as originally proposed—and the formula still obtains—Newfoundland is actually to receive an estimated 72 per cent of the shareable cost; Prince Edward Island, 65 per cent; New Brunswick, 59 per cent; Nova Scotia, 57 per cent; Quebec, 53 per cent; and Manitoba, 51 per cent. On the other hand, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario were to receive slightly less than 50 per cent of their total costs. When the minister replies I would like to know—and this has a very great bearing—whether or not these figures have changed because of cost factors. If they have changed, did it in any way contribute to the attitude taken by any one of the provinces?

I think the house welcomes this amendment, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons that I have stated. We on this side of the house think this amendment could have been avoided if the government had pursued this matter earlier with the vigour which I know the minister himself would like to have pursued it. What are the reasons why we are in this particular situation today? What are the reasons for the attitude taken by the three provinces which have schemes in being? Why is it that they have not signed agreements up until the present time? The answers to these questions will not only satisfy my curiosity, which I think is understandable because I lived with this question for some time, but it will also give the house an indication as to what are the prospects, for instance, in the province of Quebec. The premier of that province said the other day that the hospital construction program of Quebec was a preparatory stage to the hospital insurance project being realized in the province of Quebec. Has the government received any indication, as was asked a moment ago by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, from the premier of Quebec in this regard? Have there been any contacts between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his opposite number in the government of Quebec, or has it been thought that the best way to deal with that situation was to do it vicariously through officials. The answers to some of these questions will be of great interest to the house and will contribute to the day when we shall have a nationwide scheme of hospital insurance all over this country.

This amendment is an amendment to an act introduced in this parliament in 1956, and the very fact that the government brings forward an amendment only in the terms that it does, without any provision to cover the things which it alleged on this side of the house should be included, such as those things referred to by other hon. members, is perhaps the best tribute to and confirmation of this matter that the previous administration could possibly receive.

(Translation):

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I would not like to prolong this debate unduly but, considering the importance of this matter, and as a young member representing a new constituency where the average age is relatively low, I take this opportunity to make a few brief remarks.

When the hospital insurance program was introduced by the Liberal government and adopted by the house, a section was inserted in it to the effect that the plan would not be implemented until six provinces, representing half of the population of Canada, would join the plan. The aim of that section, as was explained by the then minister, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) was to encourage the provinces to join in without delay and that section, as the present Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) has himself admitted, got results for he told us, on May 30th last, that all the provinces, except Quebec, were prepared to join. In fact, he stated that the province of Ontario was ready to join as from January 1st, 1959, while British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfoundland were willing to implement that program from July 1, 1958. Moreover, he asserted that the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were ready to come in as from January 1, 1959 while Prince Edward Island would do so a few months later.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare now asks us to repeal the said section and to replace it by another which would authorize the payment of contributions to all the provinces having a hospital insurance plan in effect on July 1, 1958. This amendment, Mr. Speaker, has become necessary because this government has shown no interest in the matter since it came to power on June 10, 1957. Indeed, since that time, this government has done nothing to encourage provinces to join in the hospital insurance plan, and the amendment moved today by the minister is in itself an admission of government inefficiency.

In view of the urgency and great importance of having the hospital insurance plan in force throughout this country, I cannot do otherwise than support the amendment moved by the minister. In the Canadian family, especially the average income family, illness is a tragedy. For instance, I know in my constituency a family man who has had some of his many children hospitalized on repeated occasions. He had to go heavily into debt to protect the health of his children and provide them with necessary care. Today he is desperate. Unable to pay his debts or to stand his predicament, he had a nervous breakdown.

Mr. Speaker, as I said just now, illness is a tragedy for these families. Very often, when someone in the family takes sick, people put off sending the sick one to the hospital, because they lack the money. At times, the person dies as a result.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I mentioned the lack of interest of the present government in not encouraging provinces to join this hospital insurance plan. I wonder what it has done, since it has come to power, to encourage the provinces to do so.

To my mind it has done nothing and yet it has not lacked encouragement along those lines if we are to believe the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Bissonnette) who on May 28, 1958, said, as can be seen on page 606 of the official report of the debates of this house:

> I cannot help being interested in our federal hospital insurance act.

He added further:

> I offer my full co-operation to the Minister of Public Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)—

Well, Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member for Quebec West, as well as to all members of the Union Nationale sitting on the government side of the house—

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Rouleau: —to kindly insist—

Mr. Ricard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would remind the hon. member for Dollard that we are here as Conservative members and not as representatives of the Union Nationale and while there are no grounds for being ashamed of the Union Nationale, we were elected under the sponsorship of the Progressive Conservative party. The hon. member for Dollard is well aware of this and he should stick to that fact.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how the hon. member could make it a point of order, and I don't know whether I should construe his statement as a denial of the policy of the premier of Quebec.

Mr. Ricard: Not at all, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Habel: Gas included?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! I have to point out to the hon. member for Dollard that the Union Nationale party has nothing to do with this house, and that recently elected members to the federal parliament were labelled as Progressive Conservatives and sent here under the auspices of that party. Consequently, I would ask the hon. member for Dollard to refer to them as Conservative members.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly comply with your ruling. But I was also speaking about the co-operation which should exist between the federal government and the provincial governments, and especially the government of the province of Quebec which is ruled by the Union Nationale, and which, I understand, has friends amongst hon. members from that province in this house. I would therefore ask those hon. members who are thus on friendly terms—

Mr. Ricard: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Rouleau: —with the present government of the province of Quebec to urge the leader of that government to accept the hospital insurance plan and give the citizens of the province of Quebec the same benefits as are offered to the people of other provinces.

Just as much as people of other provinces, Quebec people need the benefits provided by that act passed by the Liberal party. The premier of the province of Quebec has no right to deprive them, the citizens of his province from the benefits of that act. In fact, did he not say, not so long ago, that there were too few hospitals in the province of Quebec to allow for the adoption of an hospital insurance plan? Is he not the one who often says, at his weekly press conferences, that he provided for the construction of more hospitals in the province of Quebec than were built in any other province of Canada?

Well, if so many provincial governments felt that there are enough hospitals for the implementation of the hospital insurance scheme, I do not see why the Quebec government would not participate in the program put forward by the federal government. I do not believe that Quebec people, any more than people in other provinces, would take undue advantage of the implementation of an hospital plan. I make a special appeal to the present government and to Conservative members, since we must call them by that name,—I hope that it will please the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) —and ask them to exert pressure on Mr. Duplessis, the premier of the province of Quebec, whom they respect and honour, to have him agree to join, as soon as possible, in the hospital insurance program so that the people of that province may enjoy the same benefits as their fellow citizens of other provinces.

Mr. Speaker, this hospital insurance plan would be a great deal healthier for the province of Quebec than natural gas.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to note the absence of the former member for Montmagny-L'Islet who would certainly be shocked by the remarks of some Liberals who believe themselves to be federalists, but who are more provincially minded than those whom they attack in this house.

Mr. Speaker, I have no wish to ape the opposition which, since the session started, has been indulging in provincial politics in the federal house. The matters we have to deal with here are somewhat different from those that are being talked about elsewhere and, because members of the opposition were reduced both in numbers and in quality at the last election, they should now begin to realize that it is a bad practice to indulge in provincial politics in the federal parliament.

If I may be allowed to do so, Mr. Speaker, and since our opponents have already raised the matter, I would like to deal with this health insurance plan in so far as it concerns the province of Quebec.

[Mr. Rouleau.]

No one, I believe, is justified in criticizing the policies of the Union Nationale in the field of public health. It is one of the governments which have done most in Canada for the development, and the building of hospitals, and for the improvement of medical services—

Mr. Martin(Essex East): With federal assistance.

Mr. Valade: With provincial assistance.

Mr. Habel: With federal assistance.

Mr. Valade: However, when the hon. member was a member of the Liberal cabinet, I do not think he did anything, since 1911, to urge the province of Quebec to join in a hospital insurance plan. Now that this problem is urgent and concerns practically all Canadian taxpayers, our Liberal friends opposite spare no effort in trying to delay the passing of this measure and talk, not in the interest of their taxpayers, but for our friends in the press gallery.

Mr. Speaker, this question—

Mr. Rouleau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member who has the floor is imputing to me motives which I did not have, when he says that I spoke first to delay unduly the proceedings of the house and secondly for other reasons he just mentioned.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind hon. members that we are currently discussing a bill which has nothing to do with federal-provincial relations between the federal government at Ottawa and the province of Quebec. To put the point absolutely in its true perspective, may I say that I believe the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) should adhere in his speech to the matter being discussed which is the bill he has in front of him. I believe also that the same applied to the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau) who in his speech undoubtedly concentrated more on federal-provincial relations between the government of Canada and the province of Quebec than he did on the bill. Therefore may I ask hon. members to discuss the bill under debate at present and leave federal-provincial relations in their proper sphere.

Mr. Valade: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having given this opinion because I am sure if this matter had not been raised before by our Liberal friends we would not have had any discussion of the provincial government. I am going to continue in English, Mr. Speaker, because I wish to be understood very clearly on this question by my friends from the other provinces and those from the province of Quebec. If I get up to speak on this question it is because I want to say to the minister that I am completely agreeable to a scheme of health insurance in Canada. However, I notice in the bill an implication of the law concerning that part of the bill which states that drugs supplied shall be administered in the hospital. I know that it never entered the minister's mind to cause the people to have any doubts concerning pharmacists. As a pharmacist, I should say we enjoy a very good standing in society. As a result of the amendment in this bill, there may be some people who would question the equity of it in relation to pharmacists.

We are authorized to distribute prescription drugs, pharmaceuticals and biologicals. It is for this reason I am speaking on this question. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the fact that many of the patients who would benefit from this insurance plan are people who may sometimes have to leave the hospital for a period of convalescence or for other reasons. Perhaps these people would need drugs and certain substances in the treatment of their condition. At the moment these persons would have to go back to the hospital in order to obtain these drugs from the hospital itself instead of being able to procure them from the pharmacist.

While I agree with the general principle of the bill, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister that, in this particular respect, the bill may cause certain disagreements between the pharmaceutical profession and others in connection with the administration of these drugs. It is for this reason I have intervened in the debate, and I hope my observations will be given consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind hon. members that if the minister speaks now he will terminate this debate.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think that probably the first thing I should say is to thank the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) for this fine bouquet which he sent across the floor to me a moment ago. Incidentally, I am not too sure whether or not he expected I would wear it. I do appreciate it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to thank the minister for graciously accepting and wearing such a beautifully coloured carnation.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There have been many suggestions made during the course of this debate this afternoon, all of which I am very pleased to hear. Of course, I would point out that I have to disagree with some of the comments that have been made. The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) indicated that he hoped there would be more than two provinces that would have signed by July 1. I think it was this member who indicated that a salesman does not feel he has closed a deal until he has a signature on the dotted line. I quite understand that approach. I would assure him, however, as I did earlier that I have every expectation there will be five provinces that will have signed by that date.

There were several speakers from the official opposition who took great pleasure in giving some credit for this legislation to the former government. I have no hesitation in agreeing that it was the former government that brought this legislation into force in April, 1957. I would point out, however, and I have mentioned this previously, that it is my firm belief that if the old government had been returned to power the federal government would not be participating in hospital insurance in any province in Canada until January 1, 1959.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A mere statement is not proof of what is said.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think I could apply that to a lot of the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All my remarks were statements backed up with authority.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would be glad to mention the status of the three provinces which the hon. member for Essex East queried. As he knows, there have been two agreements signed. In so far as Manitoba is concerned, the agreement is in readiness for signing. It occurs to me that there should be no reason to doubt the intent of the government of Manitoba as a result of Monday's events because it is obvious that when there was a change of government at Ottawa federal moneys were available for hospital insurance in Canada at an earlier date and I think that is an indication of what might well happen with the government of a similar party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is my hon. friend certain that the old government will not continue?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am certain of that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister had better read tonight's newspaper.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I will be happy to do that if I can get out of here.

The Alberta legislation is being studied. As I indicated yesterday, we expect the minister and his officials from Alberta to be here tomorrow and the next day in consultation. So far as British Columbia is concerned, that agreement along with Saskatchewan's is before the government for consideration. Agreement in principle has been reached, and I have every reason to expect that those agreements will be signed by July 1.

The hon. member for Essex East tried to demonstrate that we were dilatory in forwarding the cause of this particular piece of legislation. Of course, I cannot agree with him. I think the exact words he used were that he did not want the house to consider that this would be fancy. Frankly, it did sound rather fancy to me, because it was quite a hypothetical argument he was building up. I can only repeat what I said before that there are two minor amendments in this bill for clarification purposes, and one primarily to get the federal contribution towards hospitalization in Canada under way.

I would mention that these are ten different schemes, or are very apt to be quite different in some respects. I do not expect that, necessarily, two out of the ten will be identical, if as and when ten are signed. As a consequence, there are bound to be differences, but whatever differences there are they will be according to the terms of the act. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think I will take my place. If there are any questions later in committee, I would be happy to answer them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to ask the minister whether the province of Ontario is taking full advantage of such diagnostic services as are ordinarily given in a hospital. Then under section 1, which deals with subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (f) of section 2 of the act having to do with the provision of drugs, I should like to know what is meant there by "when administered in the hospital". If a patient is brought in, for instance, for an X-ray, is he considered to be an in-patient while he is there, just while the X-ray is being taken? Then, in connection with certain diagnostic services, a person may come to the hospital just for X-ray diagnostic services. Such patients are often given dyes which are ordinarily supplied by the hospital and which must be taken at regular intervals outside. If the hospital supplied those particular dyes for the patient to take, would it be covered under this act?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I feel that there has been somewhat of an attempt to leave the impression that the province of Ontario is not—what should I say—taking sufficient advantage of the terms of the federal act. I should like to repeat again what I have said on one or two occasions earlier in this debate, namely that the agreement with Ontario is fully in agreement with the terms of the act. I cannot go any further than that. As to the X-ray, either an in-patient or an out-patient comes under the terms of the act. I understand a technical term which the hon. member used means tablets, in other words. Am I right?

Mr. McMillan: Yes; or dyes.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand that these would be given only while the patient is in the hospital. That is one of the clarifications that we have in this bill this afternoon.

Mr. McMillan: In other words, these dyes would not be supplied to the patient, to be taken outside in a course of X-ray diagnostic services?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No.

Mr. McMillan: Is that right?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No; they would not be supplied.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister does not do himself justice when he says that the province of Ontario, in so far as diagnostic services are concerned, has taken full advantage of the proposal made by the federal government and embodied in the act. He says that what Ontario has done is within the terms of the act just as the agreement with Newfoundland is within the terms of the act. Of that fact there is no doubt. But the question is this, and this is not being offered in criticism of the minister. The question is simply one of clarification. What Ontario does is the responsibility of Ontario and the minister cannot be charged with any action taken by any provincial government. However, the question is this. Does Ontario take full advantage of the diagnostic services proposal? I submit that the minister is wrong in saying that it does so.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I did not say that. I said the agreement was completely within the terms of the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister keeps repeating that statement, but that answer does not at all address itself to the question. The fact is that Ontario only accepts diagnostic services for in-patients, in accordance with the terms of the amendment, in a hospital; and with regard to out-patients, it accepts the diagnostic services plan only in so far as emergency cases are concerned. The whole series of diagnostic services that are contemplated in the case of out-patients providing for people who do not go to hospital at all, such as provisions for the use of those modern instruments used by the medical profession to give good diagnosis, are not being accepted by Ontario in so far as this agreement is concerned.

Mr. Carter: I have one question on which I should like to get clarification from the minister. It is understood that the agreement with Ontario is in some respects different from the agreement with Newfoundland. What is the position of the person who moves from one province to another?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am sorry but I was getting some information while the hon. member was speaking, and I did not follow his question.

Mr. Carter: I am wondering what is the position of a person who moves, say from Ontario to Newfoundland. In Ontario under the agreement he would be entitled to one set of benefits. In Newfoundland he would be entitled to a different set of benefits. Suppose a person moves from Newfoundland to Ontario or vice versa and requires services. What would the position be?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There will be reciprocal arrangements so that no resident of one province, when moving to another, will lose out on any benefits. He will be covered when he moves to another province.

Mr. Carter: That does not clarify the question completely. Suppose a person living in Newfoundland is entitled to more benefits than is a person living in Ontario, or to a different set of benefits. Then suppose the person moves from Newfoundland to Ontario. In that case can he get the full benefits that he would get in Newfoundland or is he restricted to the benefits of Ontario?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I imagine he will be restricted to the benefits of Ontario when he becomes a resident of Ontario.

Mr. Carter: I am not speaking of a resident; I am speaking of a visitor. I am speaking in terms of a person who just comes on a short visit and requires these services.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand there will be three months' out-of-province benefits in that case.

Mr. Carter: But just to what extent? During those three months in Ontario, if he requires services, he cannot get the same benefits he would get if he were in Newfoundland. Is that true?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. For the first three months he will get the same benefits as he would have received in Newfoundland.

Mr. Howard: The minister mentioned the word "resident" which indicates a qualification as to what is and what is not a resident. I wonder whether he would like to clarify that matter for me. For the purposes of this act, when is a person a resident of a province? Is he a resident after so many months or what is the situation?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, this may differ in certain provinces. In Ontario, for instance, a resident is a resident of that province immediately he comes into it, but there is a three month waiting period in respect to the availability of hospital insurance.

Mr. Howard: That is in the Ontario act?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes.

Mr. Howard: I would like to take that a step further. As I understand it, the qualifying period before a person becomes a resident may vary from one province to another. It may be three months in Ontario or six months in Manitoba, or something of that nature?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, there will be no difference in establishing residence; there may be a difference in benefits during that first three months period.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I can put the question in more basic terms. I am thinking in terms particularly with respect to the plan we have in the province of British Columbia, which requires one year's residence before you can be covered. I should like to know whether it is the hope of this government in dealing with British Columbia that before the agreement is signed that province will reduce the one year qualifying period?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand there will be no province which has more than a three months' period and that while the agreement has not yet been signed with British Columbia it is actually drawn up and ready to be signed.

Mr. Howard: Then, as I understand it, this three month arrangement would be a uniform definition of residence across the country?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, it is reciprocal and for the purposes of the act and the regulations a resident of a province means a person legally entitled to remain in Canada who makes his home and is ordinarily present in the province. It does not include tourists, transients or visitors to that province. The waiting period, however, will not be more than three months in any province.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to pursue that a little further, particularly in view of the fact that this act provides for an agreement between the federal and provincial governments in so far as hospital insurance is concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And diagnostic services.

Mr. Herridge: And diagnostic services. One can always rely on the former minister of national health and welfare to put a frame around it, although sometimes it is a bit too wide a frame for me.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a very important part of the service.

Mr. Herridge: I know it is. I have known of cases where the wives and dependants of service men who have served in Europe for some time, those wives and dependants having been born in British Columbia, upon their return to Canada have been deprived of hospital insurance owing to the present regulations in that province, namely, the one year residence requirement. This has proved to be of great expense to them, and I know of one case where a man incurred on behalf of his family some $1800 in hospital expenses shortly after he returned home. I know of another case where a wife was taken ill and there were expenses of $500 or $600.

It seems to me that when these men are engaged in the defence of this country and are sent overseas and their wives go with them there should be a federal responsibility. They are defending this country and performing a service for the whole of Canada, and it seems to me that under the new arrangements these wives and dependants who are returning from overseas will still be denied the immediate benefits of hospital insurance under this act, which is in effect in the province to which they will return. I would therefore ask the minister, in view of the fact that the federal government is responsible for the welfare of the forces and their dependants and also of veterans, would it not be possible to have some clause written into the agreement between the provinces and the federal government providing for the serviceman's wife and his dependants receiving hospital insurance and diagnostic services immediately on their return to the province from which they left to proceed overseas?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member has referred to Briitsh Columbia, where I understand there has been a special arrangement in effect during the last two years to assist in taking care of that particular problem. I am given to understand that is the case, but this is essentially a provincial problem. I am concerned about it but actually there would be, as I understand it, a three month waiting period in whatever province is concerned.

Mr. Herridge: Does the minister think it fair that servicemen who have volunteered to serve their country and who are removed from the country should be penalized on that account with respect to their wives and dependants when they return to their home province, and be denied the benefits of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act for a period of three months? I believe that is a penalty resulting from voluntary service to Canada, and I think it is unjust.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I mentioned before that we are concerned with this problem and are continually studying it in an effort to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Bourque: This afternoon when I was speaking, Mr. Chairman, I stated that the province of Ontario was signing for in-patients only with respect to drugs and diagnostic services, while the province of Newfoundland would extend that service to out-patients. The minister said this was not so.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I did not.

Mr. Bourque: I may be a little green in this matter and possibly may seem ignorant with respect to it, but I would like the minister to tell us just what he had in mind when he said I was incorrect. If the situation is as I outlined, then Ontario citizens will get very much less than the citizens of Newfoundland.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think this is a similar proposition to the one mentioned a few moments ago. Newfoundland and Ontario have both signed agreements according to the terms of the act. Newfoundland has taken full advantage of all possible diagnostic services. Ontario is having out-patient diagnostic services on an emergency situation basis.

Mr. McMillan: In reference to the reciprocal agreement which would apply when a person moves from one province to another, in replying to questions the minister said that if an out-patient under this act moved from Newfoundland to Ontario he would be entitled to benefits in the same way as he would in Newfoundland. How would Ontario be able to provide those benefits when it was not providing them to the other citizens?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The Ontario people would collect from Newfoundland for the extra services.

Mr. McMillan: Is there an arrangement to that effect between the provinces?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This is a reciprocal agreement.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, will the house leader indicate what the business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall conclude the debate on the NORAD agreement and then continue with consideration in committee of the hospital insurance bill. We shall then take the estimates of the Department of Public Works and, after we have concluded them, the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

VETERANS AFFAIRS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris) presented the first report of the standing committee on veterans affairs, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. J. M. Forgie (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent is not given. We suggest that this motion should be placed on the order paper.

Motion stands.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds) presented the first report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman the unanimous consent of the house to proceed with this motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion stands.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North) moved that the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, presented to the house on Tuesday, June 17, 1958, be now concurred in.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this motion provides for the committee to meet while the house is sitting, and similar motions will apply to other committees. We of the opposition want to be as co-operative and as constructive as possible in this matter. We realize that there is a great deal of work to be done and that there may be occasions, as there have been in the past, when committees will have to meet while the house is sitting. But surely, Mr. Speaker, that need has not yet been demonstrated, and until the occasion arises when the need is obvious we do not think a motion of this kind providing for this procedure should be passed.

We are especially worried about this matter, Mr. Speaker, because of the number of committees that are being set up and the matters that are being referred to those committees. We share the worry which has been expressed in the house in previous sessions, notably by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), about the inadvisability of taking matters from the house and committees of the house and referring them to standing committees to meet at the same time the house is in session. Therefore we hope the government will not proceed with this particular motion at this time.

As an indication of our anxiety in this matter, which seems to have been appreciated by the house leader the other day, I should like to quote from page 697 of Hansard of May 30, where the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) had this to say:

> Some members also asked whether the committees, I presume not only these two but all committees functioning this year, would be sitting while the house is sitting. There again common sense will have to prevail. We have had occasion to complain in the past about being dragged out of the house to committees all over the parliament buildings when we should have been in the house.

That is our worry at the present time, Mr. Speaker, and until the need for this procedure has been demonstrated we do not think it should be followed. We do not think that need has been demonstrated yet.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we in the C.C.F. group also have a similar view relative to the motion now before the house. We do not feel it is right that members of the house should be asked to reach a decision at this time on such a motion.

Before us at the moment is a motion moved by the hon. member for York North on behalf of the standing committee on banking and commerce. There are three recommendations brought forward by the chairman of that committee, two of which we desire to comment upon. Those are the recommendations that the committee on banking and commerce be permitted to sit while the house is sitting, and that the quorum of the committee be reduced from 15 members to 10.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of being a member of that committee. Thus far the committee has met only once, and that one meeting was for the purpose of organization, and organization only. Yet out of a strictly organizational meeting of that important committee on banking and commerce there comes a recommendation to reduce the quorum from 15 to 10, as well as the recommendation to meet while the House of Commons is sitting.

I know that you, sir, recognize the importance that parliament places on the standing committee on banking and commerce. It is of such importance that under standing orders the committee is allowed a membership of 50 and the quorum is set at 15. Surely, sir, 15 members out of 50 is a sufficiently low number to be in attendance in view of the fact that it has already been intimated that very important legislation is going to be referred to this committee.

As a matter of fact, two pieces of legislation have already been referred to it, and the Minister of Finance in his budget presentation on Tuesday night informed the house that some very important legislation, including in particular the bill on estate taxation, is going to be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. Surely a committee of that importance, with that important legislation coming before it, should not be permitted to function with a quorum as low as 10. It would seem that 15 would be the least membership that we could insist be in attendance while the committee is discussing matters referred to it by the House of Commons itself.

On this basis I want to oppose the motion now before us. In addition, I have a second reason, and that is the recommendation that the committee meet while the House of Commons is sitting. As I said before, I think it is rather peculiar that a committee which so far has only had an organizational meeting, before it has even dealt with any business referred to it and has a full understanding of the problems it is going to have to face, should ask for authority to sit while the house is in session.

The matter is one of major principle. Every one of us is here only because we were elected by the vote of the people. We are only here because we stood as candidates to be members of parliament, and when we stood as candidates I take it for granted that we accepted the responsibilities of being members of the House of Commons. Top priority amongst our duties goes to being a member of the House of Commons and being in our places in the house. Of a secondary but important nature is the work of the committees of the house, because they only deal with matters which are referred to them by the house.

I am certain, sir, that all members want to fully accept their responsibilities, both in the house and on committees. However, you cannot possibly be in both places at the same time. It may come about eventually, by reason of the exigencies of the moment and the pressure of business, that the committee may have to sit while the house is in session. Until that time, and the necessity for it is proven, we submit there should not be a request to this house for that power.

In particular we would draw to your attention that such a request should not be made so long as two out of the five sitting days each week are not being used by the select standing committees of this house. I appreciate the fact that two out of the 18 committees are going to make an effort to sit on Mondays. But it has been the practice, and it still is, that committees of the house do not sit on Mondays and on Fridays, mostly as a favour to what are known publicly as the T. to T. members. Mr. Speaker, the house does not meet on Monday morning. Monday morning is just as good a morning for a meeting of a select standing committee as is Tuesday or Thursday. Until such time as select standing committees are taking advantage of the opportunity to meet on Monday and Friday, as they do on Tuesday and Thursday, we say they have no right to ask that the house give power for a select standing committee to meet at the same time as the House of Commons.

Mr. Fraser: The house sits on Friday morning.

Mr. Winch: That definitely was the viewpoint taken for as long as I have been here by the hon. members who previously sat on this side of the house. I can very well remember time after time the present Prime Minister standing in his place on this side of the house and expounding, as only he can do so eloquently, to the effect that select standing committees should not meet at the same time as the House of Commons. We are asking that he use his eloquence now to stand by the same principle in government that he stood for when he was in opposition.

He was not alone, Mr. Speaker. I just want to add that I have here the statement made by the previous leader of the opposition, Hon. George Drew, as found at page 4343 of Hansard of June 2, 1955. It is as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, it is certainly our wish to facilitate the business of the house in every way this can be done with due regard for the efficient dispatch of public business. I would point out, however, that a number of committees are still sitting, and that they will be sitting in the mornings next week. If this motion is adopted, it will be a practical impossibility for the members of this house to perform their duties both in the house and on committees in the manner in which public business demands.

The same principle was expressed by the Minister of Finance when he also was on this side of the house. As reported at page 5619 of Hansard of July 4, 1955, we find this very pertinent statement. I only wish he were here to be able to say it himself in the same manner in which he delivered his budget speech the other night. He said this:

—and it is simply impossible to do justice to the business of the house if committees are going to be sitting at the same time.

Need I say any more, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Winch: The members of the government know that all opposition members of the house will do everything possible to facilitate the business of the people and the business of government, but until the absolute necessity arises we ask that no motions be accepted in this house calling for a committee to meet at the same time as this house, and that no recommendation be accepted in this house to reduce still further the very small quorums of the present committees of this house.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, these heartrending appeals are extremely touching. As hon. members know, some of us now on the government side—

Mr. Winch: Did exactly the same thing.

Mr. Green: —served in the opposition for many years. In the first place I should like to assure my neighbour the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) that we have not changed a bit. We are just as good parliamentarians and democrats now as we were when we were sitting over on his side of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we would agree with that statement.

Mr. Green: There is one great art about being in opposition in respect of which the hon. member for Vancouver East is an expert, and that is the art of whining.

An hon. Member: What was that?

Mr. Green: Whining—w-h-i-n-i-n-g. I know that very well, because I was pretty good at it myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: But these Liberals; they still have a lot to learn about this art of whining.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will never learn that.

Mr. Green: Oh, you are learning fast. One of the first things you have to learn is that you must have something to whine about if you are going to do it. Here we have the Leader of the Opposition getting up today with a long face and protesting about this report brought in by the committee. What does the report ask? The first paragraph asks that the committee be empowered to print such papers and evidence as may be ordered by the committee and that standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto. Second, it asks that it be granted leave to sit while the house is sitting.

Mr. Pearson: That is the point.

Mr. Green: And third, that the quorum of the committee be reduced from 15 to 10 members and that standing orders 65 (1) (d) be suspended in relation thereto. These are standard reports—

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, no, they are not.

Mr. Green: —brought in by committees. The hon. member had never looked at them when he was on the government side, so he would know nothing about it. There is nothing out of the ordinary in one word of that report; this is the practice which has always been followed.

Some hon. Members: No, it is not.

Mr. Green: It has been followed since I came here in 1935, and now hon. members are trying to blow up a great big complaint about the fact that a routine report is being brought before this house for approval. We have assured hon. members on more than one occasion during this session that these committees would not be asked to sit while the house was sitting unless it was absolutely necessary. Not one of them has been asked yet to sit while this house has been in session, but there come occasions in the later days of every session when it is necessary for a committee to sit. It has never been the practice to come back to the house then and ask for leave to sit while the house is in session.

An hon. Member: It has, over and over again.

Mr. Green: We are simply following the ordinary practice; and these complaints made by the official opposition, backed up, of course, by the professional whiners of the house, which by the way have already been made on more than one occasion, are merely a smokescreen designed to try to convince the Canadian people that we are being unfair to parliament.

Mr. McIlraith: And so you are.

Mr. Denis: As far as our publicity is concerned, we have no television set installed, as has the government.

Mr. Green: Oh, you are hardly ever here; I have not seen you here, but the people are in possession of the actual facts which are to exactly the opposite effect. There has never been a Canadian government so careful of the rights of private members. Here we are giving these committees the opportunity to go into the business that is to come up; estimates being referred to them, committees being given the power to call for witnesses and send for documents, and in many cases the former government absolutely refused to have any of these powers given to committees. We have gone to the very limit, taken the maximum step, to help parliament in its own work and to treat the members of the opposition parties with every consideration. They know this deep down in their hearts, but they just like to make a little row in the house, hoping that they will get a little publicity.

The Liberals now are weeping and wailing because there are only 47 or 48 of them. I would remind the Leader of the Opposition that from 1939 to 1945—at least at the election of 1939 and the election of 1940—we elected less than 40 members on each occasion. We came in with 39 members. In 1945 we elected 67 members; in 1949 we were back to 41 and in 1953 we elected about the same number as the Liberals have at the present time.

Now their trouble is this, that we have these four ex-ministers sitting in the front row, these four horsemen of the apocalypse. They have to be on every committee. The Leader of the Opposition has to be on the estimates committee, because I suppose he does not know anything about what has been going on in the house and he is taking this as a means of finding out. But it was on very rare occasions when we were in opposition that the Leader of the Opposition served on any committee at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: He may not have attended, but he was on them.

Mr. Green: And some of these former ministers think nobody in the Liberal party but themselves can do anything around here. I hate to give them any advice, because from our point of view they are doing very well right now. I do not know how they could do better as far as we are concerned than the way they have been carrying on so far this session. But I will venture to give them one trade secret of how to function in opposition. If the Leader of the Opposition had a little more confidence in some of his private members, and gave them the responsibility on some of these committees instead of trying to run from one to the other himself and do all this work, he would not be getting up in the house complaining about not having time to attend committees.

[Mr. Green.]

Apart from this, those private members on the Liberal side of the house might come up with some constructive criticism which would be of some help to the country. They have not been spoiled by this power complex which was developed by the ministers in the last government for so long. These younger men, these new minds might, I suggest, bring about a great improvement in the functioning of the opposition if they were given more responsibility.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come back to my opening remarks. This is a routine report from a standing committee which should be treated in that way, and we are not going to be bluffed by all this phony talk about the rights of parliament being interfered with in any way when we ask that the report of this committee be concurred in by the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, as one of those ex-ministers who supposedly has no confidence in the rest of the members of his party, but who happens to be one of the members who attended the only meeting of the banking and commerce committee which has yet been held, I want to make one or two observations which I would not have made if the leader of the house had not made the political speech to which we have just listened. I do not intend to make any such speech; I do not intend to do anything whatever but deal with a few simple facts.

The leader of the house said the Leader of the Opposition was rushing about from committee to committee. If the leader of the house was paying attention to his job he would know that the Leader of the Opposition was on only one committee, and it would be pretty difficult to rush from one committee to the same committee.

The leader of the house talked about this being a routine motion. If this were a routine motion it would not be necessary at all because in 1955, when the rules were changed, it would have been put into the standing orders. The plain fact is that it is not a routine motion at all, and that, until very recent years, it was a rare thing indeed for committees to sit while the house was sitting.

I notice that since hon. gentlemen opposite began to occupy the treasury benches they seem to have developed one very serious failing, namely a failing of memory, as the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out this afternoon. I was very glad that he demonstrated that with reference to some of the things they used to say when they were over here.

In the committee—and I believe, sir, it is quite proper on a motion for concurrence to refer to what was said in the committee—the hon. member for Vancouver East and I both objected to this motion, not on the ground that it might not have to be made some time; and we both gave the assurance that if a demonstrated need could be shown we would not oppose the committee meeting while the house was meeting. But we added we did not see the slightest necessity, when there was nothing at all before that committee except two relatively unimportant private bills, and at that time no prospect of anything else, why the government supporters should be rushing in and trying to get this power at this stage. I went so far as to suggest that the conservative position—and I use that word with a small "c", of course—that one should not cross bridges until he comes to them should be adopted in this case.

I do not think there is anyone on this side of the house who would be so unreasonable as to oppose a motion for the committee to sit while the house was sitting at a time when some urgent business was before that committee. But, in this instance, there is nothing before it at the present time except two small private bills, and there is nothing in prospect except a bill mentioned by the Minister of Finance the other evening, which he has not even introduced. Therefore obviously it cannot come before the committee for some considerable time, so there is no question of any smokescreen or anything of that sort. We simply believe that the committee should wait until the time arises when it is necessary to sit while the house is in session. If that time does arise, then we should deal with the question at that time and not now.

Furthermore, sir, as the hon. member for Vancouver East did, I raise the point about sitting on Mondays and on Fridays. There is no reason on earth, of course, why the committee should not sit on Monday except that it seems to suit the convenience of a certain number of hon. members to be somewhere else than in Ottawa on Monday mornings. Indeed, the hon. gentleman who moved this motion himself confessed that it would be inconvenient for him to be here on Monday.

In these circumstances, sir, it seems to me that no case whatever has been made out for bringing this motion forward at this time, and I would ask the mover of the motion to let it stand for the time being.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the banking and commerce committee since 1940, I wish to say that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is entirely wrong; because at every first meeting of the banking and commerce committee back to 1940 we have always had a motion that the committee sit while the house is sitting. If the Liberals now think that is wrong they certainly were wrong for the 22 years they were in office.

It has been suggested that we sit on Friday mornings. On account of the change in the rules a few years ago the house sits on Friday mornings, and it would not be possible or practicable to call a meeting on a Friday morning, because even if it were called at half past nine it would give only a matter of an hour and a half to sit, and when a committee calls witnesses it is unfair to those witnesses to call them in for an hour and a half.

Mr. Winch: How about Monday morning?

Mr. Fraser: Monday morning would be all right for some committees. I have no objection to Monday mornings, but there are occasions when a member has a great deal of correspondence to look after on Monday morning.

Mr. Pickersgill: He can do that while the house is sitting.

Mr. Fraser: Yes, it is true that some of it can be done while the house is sitting. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate suggested that the work be done in our offices, but if the house were sitting an hon. member would not be in the house where he is asking us to be.

I know that all members of the House of Commons in general, including the Liberal members, feel that we should sit in the mornings and I am agreeable to that, but there are emergencies. That specifically refers to the sessional committee on government-owned railways and shipping at which officials of the C.N.R. are called. It would not be fair to those officials to have the committee sit for just half a day.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not a standing committee.

Mr. Fraser: That committee sits morning, afternoon and night, and has for years. There are other committees to which we call people from out of town, from miles away. It would not be fair to them to sit say on Tuesday morning and then not sit again until Thursday morning, because each party has its caucus on Wednesday morning and the committee could not sit.

I believe it is only right, Mr. Speaker, that this motion should go through as is. It might not be put into effect, but it should be there for an emergency.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): Since my name has been referred to by the opposition I think I should add just a word. To the best of my recollection, comments I have made have been not upon this particular point but on the question of referring estimates to committees. I think that is the subject on which I spoke. In any event, what I wish to say is that it seems to me that what the leader of the house has said this afternoon about this being a well recognized practice, followed for many years, is sufficient justification for its being followed again. Moreover, there has been no answer that I have observed from the opposite side questioning that statement of the leader of the house. Further, I have no reason to believe, nor has anyone in this house, that this power, if it is given, will be used unfairly or improperly.

Mr. Cathers: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for York North speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two comments to make before the debate does close. May I say at the outset that I, as a comparative newcomer here, enjoyed the humour of the house leader, the Minister of Public Works. Certainly we need that sort of levity regularly to ease the tension. The minister, besides being humorous, did give us an insight into why he has been continually successful at the polls during the number of elections in which he has run as a candidate. Obviously the reason is his ability to spread a smokescreen over something and so confuse the issue that people generally just do not know what they are voting for.

But what the house leader has done is to admit in effect that when he and the other members of the cabinet were sitting on this side of the house they were completely insincere in raising the objections they did to committees sitting at the same time as the house sat. If the minister does not admit that, then he is admitting that he is insincere at the moment in following the lead of the Liberal party which did substantially the same thing when they were in office. Sometimes raising a smokescreen is pretty effective, but no matter how the minister tries to smile or wriggle his way out of the situation he is trapped. He cannot have it both ways at the same time.

It is not a matter of whining, as he likes to put it; not a matter of raising objections just for the sake of trying to create the impression that the government is doing away with the rights of parliament, but purely and simply a matter of whether this or any other committee should sit while the house is sitting.

Finally, may I congratulate the hon. member for Peterborough for at least speaking to the subject.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, when dealing with this subject I do think it is somewhat strange to hear from the mouth of the hon. member for Vancouver East the words we heard this afternoon. The members of his group complain that they cannot be present in the house and at committees at the same time, but I call to mind last Friday as an example of their assiduous attention to the business of the house. I would draw to the attention of hon. members of that group and others on the left of the Speaker that last Friday was an example. When private bills came up there was only one member of the C.C.F. group in his seat, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). Yet most of the private bills have originated with that group. We have an idea where these members were. I may be wrong but my information, and I think it is correct, is that they were out looking at an aircraft.

As far as the Liberals are concerned, on Friday and Monday afternoons there are horrible gaps in their ranks, and we know where they are.

Mr. Bourget: What about your side?

Mr. Howard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: People who live in glass houses should not throw rocks.

Mr. Howard: Would the hon. member permit a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. Lambert: Certainly.

Mr. Howard: I wonder whether the hon. member is aware that what we were attempting to do was to give the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) an opportunity to proceed with his bill respecting company directors.

Mr. Winch: That is the reason we did not proceed with ours.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put on record the attendance at the standing committee on mines, forests and waters.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Murphy: It so happens—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that the hon. member would be in order in referring to the attendance at a committee whose report is not before the house.

An hon. Member: They do not want to hear it.

Mr. Speaker: The question is the following one: Mr. Cathers, seconded by Mr. McBain, moves that the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, presented on June 17, 1958, be now concurred in.

Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Pearson: On division.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Cathers) which was agreed to on the following division:

ESTIMATES—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) moved that the second report of the standing committee on estimates, presented to the house on June 17, 1958, be now concurred in.

NORAD—Canada-U.S. Agreement

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we have the same objection to this motion being proceeded with at this time as we had to the previous one. I will not delay the house by repeating that objection.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add one further word. We had a similar vote in the committee on miscellaneous private bills. At that time I was pleased to see that members on the government side sided in with the same arguments that were used here today, with the result that this particular motion was turned down in committee. I thought it rather strange that the same hon. members who not only voted against a similar motion but spoke very strongly in that regard—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member, by the rules, is not permitted to reflect upon the vote of any other hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to say that we do not want to delay the business of the house in any way but that we should merely like to register our protest on this particular vote. We certainly will not force a division of the house in that respect.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pearson: On division.

Mr. Speaker: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HALIFAX—REPORTED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT CITADEL HILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour. In view of the unemployment situation in Halifax will the minister arrange to have deferred the lay-off of government employees at Citadel hill, which was to be effective on Saturday next, June 21, following very short notice?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): If the hon. member will give me particulars of this matter I will have it investigated.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—APPROVAL OF EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve an exchange of notes constituting an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United States of America concerning the organization and operation of the North American air defence command (NORAD) signed at Washington May 12, 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is always very difficult to resume debate after a break such as has taken place in the discussion of the matter now before this house. For the purposes of the record I would like to refer to the fact that on June 11 last I was dealing with this matter for only a few moments before the house adjourned, and what I intend to do today is simply to review one or two of the reasons for the course of action adopted by this government. Thereafter I will answer certain general questions which have been asked, and finally I will deal with the stand taken by the Leader of the Opposition and the rather tortuous course followed by the opposition from the time this matter first received the attention of this government to date.

It will be recalled that during the course of the debate reference was made to the perils faced by the free world and to the position of Canada vis-a-vis that of the United States and that of the U.S.S.R. In addition to the mover, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have spoken on this very important matter, the Minister of National Defence, of course, having addressed his remarks mainly to defence. The two ministers dealt with the special necessity for the implementation of this arrangement between Canada and the United States, and may I say that they reviewed the facts in a manner which clearly indicated their appreciation of the dangers facing our country and of the necessity for this action to be taken.

I particularly wish to emphasize, in view of statements made by various hon. members opposite, that NORAD is strictly defensive in nature and in operation. I realized, as I listened to the speeches of hon. gentlemen in all parts of the house, that there exists deep concern with respect to the tensions and the dangers which are even more apparent than at the time of the adjournment one week ago. This is because during the intervening period free men everywhere have been shocked to learn of what happened to the former Hungarian prime minister and those associated with him, which events indicate that the so-called soft attitude of the U.S.S.R., which seemed to have been apparent during the last two years, has now been supplanted by a form of Stalinism brought up to date.

I am not going to enter into an argument as to whether or not NORAD is part and parcel of NATO, but I would point out that Mr. Spaak, when speaking before the parliamentary association, did say with reference to this matter that the military plans of NORAD are known to the standing group in the military committee through the Canadian-United States regional planning group, and are studied there. This relationship supplies a base for co-ordination between the plans set up by the supreme commanders directly under the standing group and the plans of NORAD. He went on to say that it is in this context, therefore, that NORAD's role in the general framework of the over-all defence of the North Atlantic treaty area can be defined.

I would furthermore repeat that in so far as NORAD is concerned, it represents the extension of the principles of NATO to the North American continent, in that it makes provision for the joining together of free nations within the concept of NATO and for the purposes of NATO. Without discussing the connection between NORAD and NATO I wish to say that I believe, whether it is a part of NATO or not, it does strengthen NATO, which is all that matters.

It is defensive and not offensive. It will give muscles to NATO in North America. Indeed, in view of the recent reports to which I have just alluded, added strength has been given to the wise words of Sir Winston Churchill, who on December 31 last referred to the Atlantic alliance and suggested its members should give assistance and sympathy to any member state having problems in overseas territories. He said, as reported in the New York Times of January 1, 1958:

> It is on the unity and strength of the countries of the alliance, and particularly Great Britain and the United States, that the future depends.
> The North Atlantic treaty should not limit to Europe the scope of mutual assistance and sympathy among its members. We cannot have the closest exchanges here, and be indifferent to the interests of our friends in their overseas problems.

I repeat that all the arguments as to the actual legalistic position or otherwise of NATO in its relationship to NORAD in no way answer the problem with which we are faced, namely that with the American interest in North America—and by "American" I refer to the United States—with its large numbers of troops and other armoured personnel, whether or not they are in fact within the contemplation of the operations of NATO, they comply with the principle dedication of NATO to the preservation of peace.

I am going to refer to some of the questions that were raised at the very beginning before I say something on what to me is a very difficult problem, namely the strange and mystifying attitude of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in connection with this matter. The Leader of the Opposition asked on the basis of some report from Washington, which he did not identify, whether or not Air Marshal Slemon could exercise authority over United States forces under NORAD. He wanted to know how much of the time NORAD would be under the command of the Canadian air marshal. This question was answered by the defence news branch of the office of the assistant secretary of defence and public affairs of the United States, Allan A. Howell, when in respect to the question whether Air Marshal Slemon could commit United States forces without consulting the United States government but be unable to commit Canadian forces without consulting the government of Canada, he used these words on January 10:

> Air Marshal Slemon, in accordance with the agreement with the Canadians, is deputy commander in chief of NORAD, and in the absence of the commander in chief, exercises all prerogatives of command in the event of war or any other time.

There is no doubt about it. This was the defence news branch in Washington setting forth the position of the United States with regard to this matter. The only veto of any sort is that applied by the United States everywhere in the world, that nuclear weapons shall not be used excepting as authorized by the President of the United States, and that proviso applies everywhere in the free world in consequence of the position of the United States and of legislation in effect in that country.

The question was asked, does the agreement involve Canada in any action outside North America? The obvious answer to that is no.

Another question was, what will be the basis of financing the operations of the integrated headquarters of the command. The answer to that question is that the cost of the pay and allowances of the Canadians at NORAD is met by Canada, and no other costs have been considered to date.

Then the hon. member for Essex East asked —barring security—what was the relative strength of American and Canadian forces in the United States serving under General Partridge. An answer to that question had already been given on June 3 in reply to a question by the hon. member for Ottawa West, when it was stated that the strength of the Canadian forces serving at NORAD was eight officers, seven other ranks and two civilians, and in the reply it was also pointed out that the release of strength figures other than Canadian is not the responsibility of the Canadian government.

Among other questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition was this. Did the original decision made last summer to establish NORAD take into account the entirely new strategic situation created by the intercontinental ballistic missile. Well, I would hope that the hon. gentleman had the answer to that question. As yet I have not referred to all the items in connection with the memorandum on steps in the development of integration of operational control. I referred to early discussions in connection with this matter on May 14, 1956, when the Canadian chiefs of staff and the United States joint chiefs of staff agreed to refer to the joint study group the integration of operational control. On February 18, 1957 there was a memorandum prepared to the cabinet defence committee on integration of operational control of Canadian and continental United States air defence forces in peacetime.

It is interesting to note that two days after that event of June 10, 1957, the following appears in the record, and it strikes me as passing strange, although it is not the first time the Leader of the Opposition did not know what was going on at the time he was secretary of state for external affairs in connection with military matters. He revealed that much in June, 1956, in connection with the shipment of arms to Egypt, but I will not refer to that unless forced to do so.

Mr. Pearson: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But on June 12, 1957, two days after the election, an aide-memoire was forwarded to the then minister of national defence, Mr. Campney, by the chairman, chiefs of staff committee, outlining the position on integration of operational control with regard to the air defence of North America. I am not going back to the events when the matter was brought to the attention of the cabinet defence committee by memorandum on March 11, 1957, but even after the election this matter was raised; and it is passing strange that it did not receive any attention by the then government between those dates, when the aide-memoire provided the information necessary for the cabinet to act.

And then, on June 18, this memorandum reveals the degree to which complete consideration had been given to this matter by the chiefs of staff and also, I presume, by the minister of defence. The chairman, chiefs of staff, instructed Major General Sparling, Canadian joint staff, Washington, to see Admiral Radford, chairman of the United States joint chiefs of staff, and inform him that the Canadian chiefs of staff had placed the question of the integration of operational control before the government on Friday, June 14; that the outgoing government regretted to state that they did not consider they were any longer in a position to finalize any international agreement, and that there would therefore be some delay in the finalization of the matter.

In others words, consideration had been given to this question as a result of two years' discussion between the chiefs of staff and also with the minister of national defence of the previous government, with whose activities one would think the former secretary of state for external affairs would have been fully conversant. Only in the last few days evidence was given before one of the committees of parliament—the estimates committee—by one of the officials of the Department of National Defence to the effect that there was the closest possible relationship in the matter of exchange of information between those two departments.

The question was asked, did the original decision made last summer take into consideration the strategic situation created by the intercontinental ballistic missile. Those documents show that every consideration was given to all those factors, and I summarize by saying that all factors relating to the strategic situation, including the improvement in the manner of delivery of nuclear weapons, was fully considered prior to the establishment of NORAD.

Another question asked by the Leader of the Opposition was what functions were being given to NORAD to prevent any mistake in intelligence or in detection of aircraft, a matter which could be vital. It was vital in 1956; it was vital in 1957, before June 10. Well, such precautions as are necessary are set forth in the rules of engagement and included in the document entitled "Authority to Intercept and Engage Hostile Aircraft" which I tabled on June 10.

Another question was, can the commander of NORAD at his discretion move reinforcements across the border to meet operational requirements and, if so, under what conditions. Again I was surprised at the questioning attitude of the Leader of the Opposition. These things had been discussed; these things had been fully covered over a period of almost one and a half years.

And yet the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), with surprise in his eyes, says: "I wonder what was done in connection with this" when, as a matter of fact, he either knows what the minister of national defence in his government was doing or if he does not know it does not show that degree of co-operation which should exist between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is just one bit of further evidence of the reason why, in January, 1956, the hon. gentleman did not know that Harvard aircraft were being shipped to Egypt. But we carried the thing on day by day and week by week and found out finally that there was an order in council which was passed on January 10, 1955. He said that it was considered by cabinet; that it was a serious matter and one wherein every consideration should be given to the realization of the danger spot in the Middle East. It was considered by cabinet and the decision was the decision of cabinet. Then, they ended up by saying, well, in the first place there is not an order in council; in the second place it was never considered; and in the third place we did not know anything about it until after the shipment took place. This is just one more example of that failure on the part of the Department of External Affairs to have a knowledge of what the Department of National Defence was considering in connection with a major international matter. I refer to the question of whether the commander of NORAD at his discretion can move reinforcements across the border.

I would refer the hon. gentleman to the exchange of notes tabled in the House of Commons on May 19, 1958, which we are now debating, in which it is set forth in full as follows:

> Temporary reinforcement from one area to another, including the crossing of the international boundary, to meet operational requirements will be within the authority of commanders having operational control.

The next question he asked was:

> Is Canada going to negotiate directly with Washington a bilateral pact for bases of nuclear projectiles.

That question has not been raised or considered.

In a very beautiful speech the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Macnaughton) placed his views before the house. He asked two questions in particular in addition to those that have already been answered:

> Will the United States commander of NORAD have authority to order the R.C.A.F. to shoot down planes which the commander considers hostile, without first clearing his order with the Canadian government?
> ...has General Partridge been given authority to shoot first and ask permission later from Washington and Ottawa? If so, where is this shown in the agreement?

I have already stated in answer to these two questions by way of anticipation that action against hostile aircraft is covered by the rules of engagement which I tabled earlier in this house.

I have had the questions gone through most carefully to ascertain what questions have not been answered. These have not been answered and for that reason I have taken the time of the house to answer them.

I am now going to refer to what I said in the beginning as to the dangerous and uncertain courses adopted in this matter by the Leader of the Opposition on behalf of his party. First, as a member of the government he knew what was going on. Since the minister of national defence who was negotiating throughout was a member of that same government, the Leader of the Opposition knew what was going on. If he did not know, there is only one conclusion one can come to. However, the attitude that he has taken on this matter since last September or October is to me out of keeping with what might have been expected. As far as the asking of questions, as far as the most careful analysis of every matter that could possibly be revealed, and within the limits of security may be asked, are concerned, in that he discharges the function of a responsible opposition. But, sir, when he produced straw men to knock down, bogeymen to scare and arouse suspicion in the hearts of Canadians, I say that he went farther than that.

On reflection, to use those immortal words of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) I am sure he will regret it. I think it was Winston Churchill who once said, "I do not resent criticism even when for the sake of emphasis it parts for the time with reality", and I think that pretty well sums up the need of criticism and also the limitation. But I say it is an altogether different thing when criticism departs from the facts for obvious political purposes.

I intend to deal with the course taken by the Liberal party on this matter. First, in the fall of 1957 the arrangements in general were attacked. The hon. gentleman said that he had no knowledge of the arrangements when, as a matter of fact, if he had not, there was no connection between departments, or whatever information was available he for some reason or other was unable to secure it.

Then, the next step was to arouse fears in the hearts of Canadians by playing the tune in every part of this country that we had deserted Canadian rights by sacrifices of Canadian sovereignty and had brought about a state of United States control over Canadian forces. I have a number of speeches that were delivered by the hon. gentleman pointing out the dangers of this. Well, he knew that the position of affairs was no different from having a NATO commander with the power over Canadian troops as today the United States commander has power over Canadian and United States troops.

Then he produced—and I have often wondered the reason for his doing it—that outrageous doctrine that Canada should notify the United States that unless their trade arrangements were brought in line with Canada's wishes we could not fully co-operate in defence. Not only he, but the former associate minister of national defence, Mr. Paul Hellyer, at the Liberal convention at the city of Ottawa said this:

I think that when they do come to us and ask for them—

And he was talking about defence concessions.

—we should be very tough with them and say to them: Look at our adverse balance of trade. You help by buying as much from us as we buy from you and we will go along 100 per cent in our mutual defence.

That is a strange doctrine, in a world where freedom is challenged, when we are in the position, as an hon. member said, of a Belgium, that we should advance to the United States a doctrine such as that. Is it the voice of responsibility to say that if we in Canada cannot have from the United States what we want in trade—and incidentally that tremendous trade in balance exercises the minds of my hon. friends opposite today to a degree that it did not when it was being piled up during their days of office—they should say to us that we in Canada should place ourselves in the position of committing international suicide and not be a partner unless the United States couples its actions respecting defence with those in respect of trade? I say I was amazed to hear the Leader of the Opposition raising a similar argument in this house.

What was the next step? First, we did not know anything about it. Second, we should act only under certain circumstances. Then, they said, "Well, you have got the agreement but it has not been sufficiently discussed, although they themselves had their experts and military officials discussing it, as I say, for a period of a year and a half. Then they raised the suspicion that war might start by the mistake of some officer although they themselves had produced the rules of contact in order to prevent that from occurring.

Now, as far as discussion is concerned, there must have been full discussion, not for the twenty or thirty minutes referred to by my hon. friends but a discussion over a period of two years. Why did they not go ahead? The Leader of the Opposition said that the reason they did not go ahead was that the election campaign was beginning and ministers had to go back and forth across the country. That is the first I knew that the election campaign began on March 11. The first knowledge that the House of Commons had was about April 20 that year and there was never any question during that period of time of ministers going back and forth across the country during an election campaign.

But I think my hon. friend rather revealed these facts, these fears and the reasons why action was not taken between March and June when he said, as found at page 1003 of Hansard of June 10:

For some reason or other—perhaps to obscure the bilateral character of the agreement; perhaps because they—

That is the government.

—were a little bit sensitive about the reaction in the country to the placing of part of the R.C.A.F. under a United States commander . . . they went out of their way to emphasize that this headquarters was an integral part of NATO—

I can only conclude that these words apply with even redoubled force as the latent reason, the direct reason, why this matter, the general purport of which had to all intents and purposes been determined by the former government, was subject to postponement of finalization until after the election was over.

Mr. Pearson: I wish to rise on a point of order. I have already explained to the house, and the Prime Minister will surely accept my word, that far from its being finally considered by the cabinet it had never been considered by any cabinet meeting at any time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, naturally I must accept my hon. friend's denial in so far as he himself is concerned, which indicates once more that while he did not know other ministers of the then government did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, my statement refers specifically to the cabinet. This matter was never discussed at a cabinet meeting at any time. The Prime Minister must accept that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have read the record and I will allow the record to stand. The minutes of the defence committee—

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister now stating that he has read the record of cabinet meetings of the previous government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Pardon?

Mr. Pearson: Is the Prime Minister now stating that he has read the record of cabinet meetings of the previous government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have stated what I was reading from, namely the memorandum of steps on the part of the defence committee.

Let me say to my hon. friend that the first step I took on becoming Prime Minister was to direct, without any other consideration, that at no time should we ever examine any records of the cabinet proceedings of the last government to the end that those proceedings, having been discussed in secret, ought not to be available to a succeeding government regardless of any doubts that might arise.

Mr. Pearson: That is the normal practice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am simply quoting from the defence committee minutes and no one can challenge their correctness. Having first said that they did not know anything about it, having first said that no consideration was given, and there is no doubt whatever that consideration was given for about two years or a year and a half in any event, the next step was to say, "Well, you flouted parliament." My hon. friends opposite, Mr. Speaker, have suddenly developed an interest in parliamentary procedure which was not theirs during a period of 22 years. They have learned that much. They say that we should not have entered into the agreement without prior parliamentary consideration and approval. Did they do that? Does any responsible government do that? I point out first that I can give example after example in this connection since 1945 when agreements were first entered into between the executive and the foreign country in question and thereafter submitted to parliament. I refer to the protocol to NATO on the accession of the Federal Republic of Germany. That was in 1955. I refer to the interim agreement regarding international civil aviation on December 7, 1944, which was not tabled in the house until September 7, 1945. Then there is the convention on international civil aviation signed by Canada on December 7, 1944, and tabled on September 7, 1945. There is also the international air services transit agreement signed by Canada on February 10, 1945 and tabled on September 7, 1945, with a motion being made for approval later on in the second session of 1945.

I mentioned the agreement on civil aviation. The motion in that case was simply that it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the interim agreement on international civil aviation and that this house do approve the same. First the signature and then after signature presentation to parliament. Indeed, in 1926, as my hon. friend said, a type of wording of resolutions of approval was adopted, and by a simple reading the words of approval indicate that it was the intention of Mr. Mackenzie King, the then prime minister, first to enter into agreements and then, having done so, to submit them to parliament. Here are the forms of resolution that answer the specious argument advanced by my hon. friend opposite:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve—
> Such and such an agreement.
> —signed at . . . and that this house do approve the same.

Alternatively there is this form:

> That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve ratification of the . . . agreement and that this house do approve the same.

That was the next step. Bogeymen and smoke screens. First, we did not consider the matter. Then there was condemnation by my hon. friend of the terrible danger to the people of Canada. Then there was the fear aroused in the hearts of Canadians that we had sold out Canada. Finally, there was the argument of the hon. member for Essex East who, in stentorian tones, said at page 1028 of Hansard that the question of the potential use of Canadian forces outside of Canada made it necessary to have the agreement submitted to parliament. Apparently he forgot what had taken place during the days when he was in the government, for on September 7 and 8, 1950, when the Canadian Forces Act was being amended, a question was asked regarding this matter of the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, by the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). That question is found at page 495 of Hansard of September 8, 1950, and was:

> May I ask the Prime Minister whether there will be a resolution authorizing the sending of troops to Korea?

This was the answer:

> No, sir; that would be something which has never been done. The government announces to parliament what its policy is, and asks parliament for the ways and means to carry it out. It is for that reason that we have our appropriation bill. If parliament does not authorize the ways and means to carry out the policy, it cannot be carried out. If parliament, on the other hand, on any motion of non-confidence, expresses its disapproval of the conduct of the government, of course the government resigns and some other group forms a government to carry out the will of the Canadian people as expressed by their representatives in parliament.

The next question was asked by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) who said:

> An order in council will be tabled?

Mr. St. Laurent replied: "An order in council will be tabled." There is the record, a record of change and alteration, but always raising behind it a dust screen in order to conceal the actual facts from the Canadian people. But it finally remained for the hon. member for Essex East to speak.

He really came along at the end. He did not say there was a treaty or an agreement. He said there was no such thing. He said it was not an agreement, it was simply an agreement to agree. I marvel sometimes at the power of his language. Mr. Speaker, I enjoy hearing him in debate when he raises these great issues. His leader said that there was an agreement, but not the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). He said it was simply an agreement to agree.

Even that was not original. I do not know where my hon. friend got that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): From the same place you get a lot of your speeches.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall deal with that in just a minute. I marvel at his language. I marvel at his memory. He delivered that speech the other night, to all intents and purposes, without notes.

Mr. Deschatelets: It was a good one too; much better than yours.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I find it was, but I find it was not original. I find that my hon. friend got a Free Press editorial, and without referring to the Free Press used the same words as the Free Press used. No, that is not fair to my hon. friend. With the house in such good humour today, I do not want to be unfair to my hon. friend. It was not the same. He left out one "but". He said this is where I got my speeches, but, Mr. Speaker, the Winnipeg Free Press—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) who used to use the Free Press.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This suggestion was made to me, and I think in fairness to my hon. friend every opportunity should be given to hon. members to really appreciate the memory of my hon. friend, the genial member for Essex East. I have heard of photographic memories, but I do think it fair my hon. friend should go back to March 20, 1958, to the Winnipeg Free Press editorial, which has as its heading "Agreement to agree".

An hon. Member: He has it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is one time when we are in agreement. But I want to be fair to my hon. friend. At page 1027 of Hansard for June 10, 1958, the first paragraph, he uses these words, and mind you, they are not from the Free Press, they are right out of the mind of the hon. member for Essex East:

> This agreement is not an elaborate one; in fact, it is not an agreement at all. The material before us does not represent an agreement, it represents—

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

And so on. The Winnipeg Free Press used identical words, and then a little later on that page—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would refer your honour to Beauchesne and ask, is it not contrary to the rules of this house to read from an editorial and to attribute to that editorial in the newspaper the very words used?

Mr. Harkness: You did it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not mention the newspaper. I would suggest to you, sir, my point of order is well taken. I did the other night exactly what the hon. gentleman did when, without referring to it, he quoted words on one occasion from a secret and confidential government document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now, that is old straw. We are dealing with something up to date. Who ever heard of such an argument, Mr. Speaker? He quotes Beauchesne to the effect that you should not refer to editorials in the House of Commons. My hon. friend did not ascribe this to the Free Press, he used these as his own words. All the way through the editorial, from paragraph two to the top of paragraph three—I will not quote this but I will allow my hon. friend to check me up—the only change was that where "written agreement" was referred to in the editorial, my hon. friend left that out because he is a lawyer and the editor of the Free Press is not. He put in the word "but" in order to clarify and improve the language and left out "yet". I have no doubt he wishes he had left it all out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am merely congratulating my hon. friend upon his ability to memorize. Oh, there was one other change, "U. S.", in the editorial became "United States" in the speech. All the way through, Mr. Speaker, it was the words of Paul and the thinking of Tom, and that is the reason for Beauchesne's rule that editorials should not be used in the House of Commons, much less as though they were the thinking and the words of the individual who uses them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have three other good examples of yours I shall use very soon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no doubt my hon. friend has other examples, because I have never reviewed these statements before. No doubt there are some that are the same as this.

I am simply pointing out that the course was one of change and vacillation, always designed to sow the seeds of distrust and suspicion in the hearts of the Canadian people. Then, they end up, and this is what I cannot understand; after they criticized, ridiculed, castigated and condemned, I wonder how they are going to vote? My hon. friend, after ridiculing everything that had been entered into for the defence of Canada, then said that the agreement referred to in the resolution is not objected to by us. Then, why all the criticism? They conceived it in their days in office.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They conceived it and their protests cannot deny it. The record speaks for itself. Even when the matter came before the cabinet, apparently, on June 14, and these are the words:

—the Canadian chiefs of staff had placed the question of integration of operational control before the government on Friday, 14 June;—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is saying that this matter was decided by the government of Canada. He also said it was a matter that was decided by the defence cabinet committee. As a member of both of those bodies I say, in confirmation of what the former secretary of state for external affairs has said, that is not in accordance with the facts. Under the rules of this house, the hon. gentleman has no alternative but to accept that without any comment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I naturally have to accept the denial of my hon. friend. Then having accepted it, may I read these words:

—the government on Friday, 14 June; that the outgoing government regretted—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Wait until I finish this sentence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my right hon. friend tell us—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor. I gave place to the hon. member once. I read these words:

—that the outgoing government regretted to state that they did not consider they were any longer in a position to finalize international agreements; and that there would be some delay in finalization of this matter.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask my hon. friend what he is reading from?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from a copy of the memorandum of the chiefs of staff committee setting out in detail what took place. My hon. friends, having endeavoured to place before the house and the country a transparent plan—should I call it that?—to lead the people to believe that this was something new and that we had brought about conditions detrimental to Canada's sovereignty, while they spoke they must have had some realization of what the chiefs of staff committee was recording. It is singular, but the last cabinet meeting that I recall was on June 14.

I am surprised that since last fall this matter should have been treated in the manner in which it has been treated. Throughout the election campaign it was mentioned frequently. The Canadian people were shown a terrible bogey man. My hon. friends tried to frighten the people with this kind of thing, and the same attitude has been shown in this house. Now, after all the smoke screens that have been raised, I ask my hon. friends opposite to support the motion. They have spoken derisively of this agreement; they have ridiculed it. They have stated that it is not an agreement. It is an agreement. Then the hon. member for Essex East, quoting the Winnipeg Free Press without giving to the editor the honour of the quotation, said it is not an agreement, it is an agreement to agree. Mr. Speaker, it is an agreement to provide for the salvation of the people of North America against a situation that far transcends any other reason or consideration and for the welfare of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite having said all these things, having determined to make this a political issue by arousing in the hearts of the Canadian people that fear that permeates the hearts of people everywhere in the world, I ask them now to rise and, by their vote, to strengthen the alliance which they have ridiculed for six long months.

Mr. Speaker: Is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Diefenbaker) which was agreed to on the following division:

HOSPITAL INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE CONTRIBUTIONS TO PARTICIPATING PROVINCES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-30, to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act—Mr. Monteith (Perth)—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Commencement of Payments

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I have before me a copy of the agreement with Newfoundland, and clause 12 of schedule B outlines the arrangements in respect of the cost of services provided for insured persons at hospitals situated outside the province, and in that clause it is stated that such payments will be made as specified under regulation 12. I wonder if the minister would tell us what regulation 12 is?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am sorry, but we do not appear to have a copy of the Newfoundland regulations here but if the hon. member would agree to state his question I think we might be able to provide an answer.

Mr. Carter: Perhaps I can get the information by putting the question in another form. The minister stated yesterday that if a person from one province was treated in another province; to be specific, if a person from Newfoundland received treatment in Ontario, then the government of Ontario would charge the government of Newfoundland for that service. Is there any agreement on the rates of charges for those services? Would the Ontario government charge the rate prevailing in Newfoundland, or would they charge their own rate, or is there a mutual agreement about those rates?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There would be mutual consent or agreement as to the charges. The Newfoundland rates would undoubtedly prevail. In other words, they would pay on the basis of the Newfoundland rates.

Mr. Carter: The Ontario government would pay Newfoundland at the rate which prevailed in Newfoundland? Is that it? Is that what I understood the minister to say?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the hospital in Ontario would collect directly, not the government of Ontario. The hospital in Ontario would collect either from the government of Newfoundland or from the individual patient who then, on his return to Newfoundland, would collect from the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, that seems an extraordinary way of doing it, for a person to pay the cost in one province and then be under the necessity of collecting it himself. What would happen if a service were provided in Ontario to a person from Newfoundland which is not ordinarily provided to a person living in Ontario? Who sets the rate? Are they regular hospital rates?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think I mentioned this last night, Mr. Chairman. He would get the same service to which he was entitled in Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: But who charges for that and at what rate, the rate prevailing in Ontario?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, so I understand, Mr. Chairman; it is at the Newfoundland rates, what they would pay for the service in their own provinces.

Mr. Carter: If a person were hospitalized in Ontario, then he would not have to pay Ontario rates if the Ontario rates were higher; he would pay the lower Newfoundland rate to that Ontario hospital?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. I understand, Mr. Chairman, there would be circumstances where he might have to pay extra. It would depend upon the point of view of the province of Newfoundland. In other words, if he were hospitalized in Ontario he might have to pay some charge over and above what similar hospitalization would cost him in Newfoundland. He would pay to the hospital in Ontario and he would then claim against the government of Newfoundland. Whether or not he would collect that extra I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to say last night that the provinces would pay directly from one province to the other and the individual himself would not have to pay his bill.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If that is so, I was wrong at that time because the hospital would undoubtedly collect from the individual. I think that is the way it would work out practically and the individual would then collect from his government when he returned.

Mr. Mitchell: May I ask the minister a question and probably he realizes why I am asking it. It seems to me that the explanatory notes are slightly ambiguous in connection with in-patients and out-patients. According to the explanation, no medication is available to a patient on a take-home basis, but (b) of the explanatory notes reads:

> To permit necessary accommodation, meals and drugs being provided in the hospital as part of out-patient services—

The explanation I would like to get is whether a patient needs to be confined to the hospital to receive this medication, or whether an out-patient can come back and forth to the hospital, to the dispensary or to wherever it might be where his medication is obtained. I realize that if it is in the form of hypodermic injections it would be handled in the hospital but if the medication is in the form of a daily dose of a certain type of drug could the patient come back to the hospital every day, or would that be considered in conflict with no medication on a take-home basis?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand that this particular type of service would be medical treatment and as such would not come under the hospitalization plan at all. If I understand what the hon. member wishes me to deal with, it is, can the patient come back to the hospital on an out-patient diagnostic basis for one, two or three days in a row? Is that the thought? Well, he can, as I understand it, in Newfoundland but in Ontario it is only on an emergency basis.

Mr. Mitchell: That is what I wanted to clear up.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell the committee the reason why he has not been able to obtain the signatures of the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Britisb Columbia? I have already asked this question two or three times, and so far I have not been able to get a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I will try to run over it all again, Mr. Chairman. I think I have given the answer half a dozen times to the best of my ability. First of all, let me go back a little farther. Immediately I assumed office last August 22 I did start to study the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. The work had been going on in the meantime before I ever took office. My officials had visited in the provinces; there had been provincial officials in Ottawa, and this thing started to roll. Certainly, as I intimated when we took office, we were going to continue to give it impetus, which we did.

As time went on we had a technical conference. We had a technical conference last December 13 and 14, or some date in there, at which time all officials of provinces were invited to attend. At that time all provinces did attend except one, namely the province of Alberta. The province of Quebec, I believe, had an observer there. From then on there were several visits to and from the provinces, all toward the development of an agreement and regulations. There was another technical conference held in April of this year at which Alberta officials were present and again Quebec had a couple of officials there as observers. All of the provinces were faced with the problem of making sure that their legislation was in conformity with the act.

There is a great deal of work attached to the preparation of one of these agreements and the necessary regulations, and I do happen to know something of that because I know how assiduously my officials and the officials of all the provinces concerned have been working toward the development of these agreements. But certain legislation had to be changed in some of the provinces to conform with our act. The whole program, has been developing. It was obvious last January when I made the announcement of this amendment that July 1 could be the date for some. As a consequence I announced at that time that we would move the starting date forward to July 1. We are working to that end now. Agreements have been drawn up and completed and are before the government for consideration with the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and, as I mentioned yesterday, officials of the province of Alberta are in Ottawa today and tomorrow. I do not think I can say any more.

Mr. Denis: With respect to Quebec, can the minister say whether the province of Quebec has said no, yes or maybe? I know that when there was a Liberal government the premier of Quebec said no, but there was an election and the Tory party came into power. We have seen reports in the newspapers that maybe he will enter into an agreement. I saw in the newspapers recently that he was supposed to be preparing some kind of agreement to submit to the federal government. As the legislation before us will come into effect on July 1, does the minister not think that the premier of Quebec is rather late in trying to take advantage of this wonderful legislation?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I do not think it is for me to say what I think. All I can announce is that there has been no indication from the province of Quebec as to what their intentions may be.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Mr. Denis: There was no letter, no telephone call, no correspondence between the premier of Quebec and the federal government?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No indication.

Mr. Denis: Nobody took the chance of writing to him or sending a telegram as was done with regard to the dominion-provincial conference on fiscal matters?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. I mentioned earlier that officials from Quebec were at both technical conferences as observers. They are quite well aware of what is available to the province.

Mr. Bourget: If my information is correct I do not think that Quebec has drafted legislation so far that would comply with the bill we have before us now. Is the minister aware of that?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are not aware of whether or not they have been working on any agreement or draft legislation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to come back to the question put by the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, which is the kind of question we have been asking now for some time. I think the minister has advanced his position somewhat this afternoon but I do not think he has fully satisfied the committee as to the reasons why, with respect to certain provinces, no agreements have yet been signed. He has mentioned the fact that his officials have been very diligent and have worked very hard. Of course I would readily confirm this statement because of my own experience with the officials of the department, all of whom are very outstanding people who give great service to the country. This is the point of the question of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean. Can the minister tell us why there is no agreement signed today with the province of Saskatchewan, for instance?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There has not been time for these things to be developed and completed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am going to analyse that. The minister says there has not been time. The province of Saskatchewan has had a hospital insurance scheme in being for longer than any other province in our country. They have the necessary legislation to authorize them to enter into an arrangement with the federal government and they have had that authority for several years. That being the case, having a scheme in being, having the necessary authority to sign an agreement, can the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell us now why the province of Saskatchewan has not signed an agreement? Have they not found our terms satisfactory? Have they been negotiating with regard to some of the terms? Surely it should be possible to tell us why a province like Saskatchewan, with all of these necessary conditions fulfilled, has not signed an agreement.

The same is true of British Columbia. British Columbia has had a scheme in being for a long time. It has the necessary authority to sign. In the case of British Columbia it may be that some necessary amendment was required with regard to out-patients, I believe it was, but my recollection is that British Columbia passed that amendment last fall. If that is the case, why has no agreement been signed between January 1 and the present time? I have made the statement, and I am not saying this in an acrimonious way, that from the progress that has been made I am satisfied it should have been possible to have agreements with those provinces that have hospital insurance at least by the end of last September.

What the committee is trying to ascertain from the minister in a friendly way, not with a view to making it difficult for him because we all realize how heavy his responsibility is, is the reasons why. Is it that some of the percentages of grant have altered because of the rise in costs? I have been looking over Hansard for yesterday and I find that some 59 questions were put that have not yet been referred to by the minister.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): So many of them were repetitious.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "repetitious". They are repetitious because we are seeking to impress upon the minister the questions that we have in mind. Look at the number of questions the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo put to the minister. True, he repeated questions but that was because the minister first of all did not seem to appreciate their nature and, second, when he gave an answer it did not seem to be satisfactory. As a matter of fact, I am going to deal later with one particular question because I do not think the minister's reply can be correct. If it is correct, then there certainly has to be some change made at once because the people of Newfoundland will be given the impression that they are getting from the federal government something they are not getting. I do not think that can be the situation.

However, the simple question before the committee now is why no agreement has been signed with Saskatchewan. The minister should tell us. Is it because Saskatchewan does not want to take the responsibility for Indians? Is that the reason? If not, what is the reason?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I mentioned a moment ago that the agreement is complete and now before the government for consideration. Consequently, there is no reason. The agreement has been decided upon between the province and the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the question. Why was this not done months ago? I said that Saskatchewan has a scheme in being.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is not starting until July 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know, but if my hon. friend had got an agreement with Saskatchewan eight months ago, if he had got an agreement with the province of British Columbia eight months ago he could have come to the house and asked for the authority that he is asking for today.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are getting back to the old question. It would not have been done until the first of January 1959 if you had been in power.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If my hon. friend wants to get this measure through he must do two things. He must first of all listen to the questions and then patiently try to deal with us curious members who have the obligation of asking him why more progress has not been made in this matter. I do not say by him but by the government of which he is such a distinguished member.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What is the immediate question?

Mr. Small: If I may answer the hon. member for Essex East, the reason it is not signed is the same reason that he could not get it signed. The province would not sign it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. and genial friend obviously does not know what he is talking about when he makes that observation. Would the minister answer the question?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What is it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said there is an agreement now before the federal government for signature. My question and that of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean is why that agreement was not before the government many months ago.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I tried to explain a few moments ago the amount of work involved in developing these agreements. All of this takes time on the part of provincial government officials and federal government officials. It happens that at this exact time the agreement has been developed to the point where it is ready for signing. I cannot answer in any other way.

Mr. Bourque: I have no doubt the officials of his department are trying to do a good job, and are doing a good job. I should like to know, has the minister been in communication with the premiers of the provinces himself?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): In several instances, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bourque: But not in Quebec. Yesterday, the minister told us Ontario had signed an agreement which included diagnostic services for in-patients and for out-patients it was confined to accident cases. He also told us previously that the agreement signed with Newfoundland included diagnostic services for both out-patients and in-patients. My question is, can any province sign an agreement and include only the services it wants, that is for partial services or for full services?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): So far as out-patient services go, they have diagnostic services. They have that part.

Mr. Bourque: If this is so, has the minister given any consideration to the amount of bookkeeping this is going to require, or the staff he will need, if each province is going to have a different system?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There will not be any difference at all. The hospital charges are paid by the province to the hospital, and then we, in turn, make a monthly payment to the province covering our share of the hospitalization charge in that particular province. At the end of the year when we have all our costs assimilated, we will work out the exact position and make an adjustment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said monthly, and I think it is quarterly.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot swear to that; monthly or quarterly.

Mr. Hardie: Can the minister tell the committee—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): May I correct that impression? I understand it is actually an advance payment monthly.

Mr. Hardie: My question is this. Has the minister submitted to either the territorial council of the Yukon or the Northwest Territories an agreement for signature?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I understand that the subject has been before the commissioner and the council and the staff of the department, and is being studied.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Mr. Hardie: Can the minister tell me whether the agreement submitted to the commissioner is the same type of agreement as that submitted to the provinces?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, there has not been an agreement submitted. It is rather a matter of working out some scheme which will be suitable for the territories.

Mr. Hardie: Is it the intention of the government to submit to these people plans along the same lines, say with the same percentage, 50 per cent, to the territorial governments?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This will all have to be worked out. After these discussions which are taking place, are complete and a report is received, undoubtedly there will be some sort of agreement with the territories drawn up. At the moment, I cannot say what the percentage would be.

Possibly I might point out to the hon. member that at the moment, as the hon. member for Essex East has pointed out, the percentage which is being borne by the federal payment does vary as between the provinces. In Newfoundland, actually it is going to be 68.3 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those are the figures for which I asked.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is 68.3 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is four per cent less than the original estimate.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): These figures are for January 1 to March 31, 1959. A monthly payment will be made for operating costs based on 68.6 per cent—I said 68.3 per cent—for Newfoundland; Nova Scotia, 57 per cent; New Brunswick, 57.9 per cent;—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is two per cent less.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —Ontario, 48.8 per cent; Manitoba, 47.4 per cent;—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a reduction of four per cent.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —Saskatchewan, 42.2 per cent; Alberta, 48.8 per cent; British Columbia, 50.2 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What would the Quebec percentage be under the new estimate of costs?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have not got a figure for Quebec.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was 53 per cent before.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have not any figure for Quebec. These figures are apt to vary, as we have mentioned before. The basis on which we participate in the shareable costs is 25 per cent of the per capita costs in the province, plus 25 per cent of the per capita cost across the country. Naturally, this is going to adjust the figures in the provinces from time to time, and the figures I gave represent estimates from the figures available.

Mr. Hardie: My point is, if this formula of 25 per cent of the provincial costs, plus 25 per cent of the national costs, is applied in particular to the Northwest Territories we will find a great difference. For instance, in the Northwest Territories today one-third of the population would be considered the responsibility of the provincial government, and the other two-thirds of the population is made up of Indians and Eskimos who come under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I quite appreciate that. As a consequence there would have to be some special arrangement worked out.

Mr. Hardie: Can the minister tell me whether this report which is to be presented will be presented to the territorial council at its July session so that the territories can come into this scheme on January 1, 1959?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It will be a report to me, but I am not sure whether it will be ready for the July session of the council. Then the government will have to decide what steps are to be taken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister tell us what the situation is now with regard to the share of the federal government and the provincial government with respect to moneys paid by a patient who comes under a hospital insurance scheme with regard to semi-private or private rooms? I think the old formula was 60-40. Has there been any progress made in the negotiations on that point?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is at present 50-50.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the objection that is taken now by the law officers of the crown to the hospital insurance scheme in Alberta, which makes it difficult to give it ready acceptance?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It would be rather out of place for me to comment on that at the moment because negotiations are now taking place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think it is a question of negotiations.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It is not a question of negotiations, it is a matter of coming to an agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then there is no difficulty, so far as the federal government is concerned in accepting as such, the hospital insurance scheme in Alberta?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I made this statement earlier also, and this is probably one of the 60-odd questions to which the hon. member referred. I did say that the question at issue was as to whether or not the Alberta legislation fitted in with our act, and that has been before the law officers of the justice department for consideration. While these discussions are going on, I do not think I care to make any further comment on the matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend will realize that this is the parliament of the nation, and parliament has the supreme right to be told exactly what the policy of the government is towards this scheme in Alberta.

Mr. Small: As the Liberals told us when they were in power.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There is no doubt about the policy. It is simply to reach an agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did not catch the interjection of my hon. and genial friend.

Mr. Small: I say it was the same sort of thing that happened when you were in power. When we asked you a question we could not get an answer to it. As a matter of fact, they were questions of the same class. You said it was government policy and you would not answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right. Now that we have disposed of this interjection, perhaps I might elicit certain information from the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I can understand how the minister could say "Well, the scheme in Alberta is not the kind of scheme to which parliament has authorized the payment of public money".

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I did not say it was not; I said we were studying it.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Essex East is having a bad day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that he is studying it. We are going to be here for a long time until we know precisely what it means. We are now giving the minister power to pay out money. I cannot understand why there should be any difficulty about the Alberta scheme if other modified schemes are being accepted. For instance, as to the scheme in Manitoba, is it a full hospital insurance plan? Does it cover every individual in the province? Is it confined to certain cases under certain contingencies? If that is the case, how does it differ in principle from the kind of objection that my hon. friend would raise as against the province of Alberta?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There is nothing irregular about the agreement with the province of Manitoba. There are absolutely no special concessions or anything of that nature whatsoever. It is fully within the terms of the act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend keeps saying that it is within the terms of the act. I am glad to know that. Then why is the Alberta scheme not acceptable? The Alberta scheme is a scheme that provides for insurance for limited numbers of people. It is based on financial contributions made by the provincial government and the municipalities. But those are the only particulars I know of in which it differs from any of the others. That is why I want the minister to give us some explanation.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot go any further than I have gone, Mr. Chairman. I have tried to explain that there is a difference in the Alberta act and legislation. We have studied the matter and we have been studying it for some weeks. There has been discussion back and forth between officials of the province of Alberta and ourselves. We have been trying to determine whether or not we can accept it. We hope and we rather expect to find that the Alberta legislation is satisfactory. Certainly our main policy is to sign an agreement at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Bourque: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I cannot really understand this amendment. We read in clause 1:

1. (1) Subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(iv) drugs, biologicals and related preparations as provided in an agreement when administered in the hospital,"

(2) Paragraph (i) of section 2 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(i) "out-patient services" means all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f) to out-patients as specified in an agreement; and"

Then in the explanatory notes on the opposite page we find this:

(2) Section 2 (i). This amendment removes the existing exceptions concerning accommodation, meals and drugs. The present paragraph (i) reads as follows:

"(i) "out-patient services" means all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f), except subparagraphs (i) and (iv) thereof, to out-patients as specified in an agreement; and"

If this amendment means what it says, I cannot see how the government can make an agreement with any province for out-patients.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I will try to explain this matter. It does take a little homework. I think I spent an hour or two on it myself before I had it entirely straight, not being a lawyer. Section 2 (f) of the act states as follows:

(f) "in-patient services" means all of the following services to in-patients, namely—

(iv) drugs, biologicals and related preparations as provided in an agreement,

Then subsection (i) of the act reads as follows:

(i) "out-patient services" means all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f), except subparagraphs (i) and (iv) thereof,—

Subparagraph (i) of paragraph (f) reads as follows:

(i) accommodation and meals at the standard or public ward level,

In other words, out-patient services mean all or any of the services set out in paragraph (iv) except; so as a consequence, by a strict interpretation, it has been argued—and I agree with the hon. member for Essex East; I am not too sure that this maybe is not all right but it is for purpose of clarification—that out-patient services are defined to cover all these in-patient services except those set out in paragraph (f) (i) and (iv), which would mean that out-patients could not get accommodation and meals or drugs, biologicals and so on as set out in (i) and (iv). Does that explain it?

Mr. Bourque: Yes, to a certain extent. But it is going to be an extremely complicated affair to interpret.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. I think it is rather simplifying it. The amendment states now:

1. (1) Subparagraph (iv) of paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(iv) drugs, biologicals and related preparations as provided in an agreement when administered in the hospital,"

This first part simply means that when drugs, biologicals and related preparations are as provided in an agreement which is under paragraph (f) of section 2, then they must be forthcoming in the hospital and must be treated in the hospital. Paragraph 2 states:

(2) Paragraph (i) of section 2 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Instead of:

(i) "out-patient services" means all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f), except subparagraphs (i) and (iv) thereof,—

It reads at the moment that all these in-patient services except accommodation and meals at the standard or public ward level and except drugs, biological and related preparations as provided in an agreement—except those—would be included in out-patient services. That is being repealed and there is being substituted the following:

(i) "out-patient services" means all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f) to out-patients as specified in an agreement; and"

So it will simply include (i) and (iv) as amended. In other words, all of these in-patient services will now be available on an out-patient services basis.

Mr. Hardie: Since the minister stated that discussions were going on between officials of his department and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources or the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, I wonder whether he and his officials would consider this suggestion? Because of the special provisions that will be required to give to the people of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory the same benefits as those which will be derived by the people in the provinces, may I ask that special consideration be given to the problem of transportation. In the Northwest Territories, for instance, we have hospitals at Fort Smith, Fort Resolution, Yellowknife, Fort Simpson and Aklavik. A person breaking a leg or faced with some sickness that cannot be dealt with in a nursing station or by the R.C.M.P. is required to travel to the nearest hospital. This problem is a very serious one, especially when we are considering hospitalization for the people of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. I would hope, therefore, that the minister and his officials will consider including transportation costs in the special provisions which he has mentioned would have to be made for the people of these areas.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): These things will be considered, and when I receive the report I will be very happy to look into the matter.

Mr. Winch: Now that the minister is in this mood for considering all these things, I wonder whether he would tell us whether consideration will be given to an arrangement between the federal and provincial governments for the care of those who need hospitalization but who are not eligible owing to the lack of one year's residence in particular provinces. I have in mind those people who would normally be the responsibility of the federal government, namely the thousands of women and children who are the families of those men in the armed forces who have taken their discharge on returning to Canada. Such people have lost their right to hospitalization and in fact the men themselves, upon taking their discharge, are not eligible unless they have resided for the preceding twelve months in the province concerned. Numerous cases have been drawn to my attention where they have incurred very heavy hospital bills during such a twelve-month period, and where no one can be held responsible for their welfare. I do think some provision should be made in that case.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am very happy to inform the hon. member that no province has a greater waiting period than three months under this new scheme.

Mr. Winch: That is under the new plan but it is still twelve months in British Columbia, or it was.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): It was at one time, but I understand an arrangement was made with the Department of National Defence. I may be mistaken.

Mr. Winch: No, I am referring to those who have taken their discharge from the armed services. The arrangement to which the minister refers applies to those who are still in the armed services.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): In any event there is no longer waiting period than three months in any province.

Mr. Bourque: The answer the minister gave me a moment ago would have been satisfactory and I thought it was at the time he gave it, but I have now read the explanatory notes. The purposes of this bill are set out as follows:

(a) to specify that the drugs, biologicals and related preparations which may be provided as part of in-patient services may not be given to patients on a take-home basis;

It therefore becomes very complicated for the out-patient, and I understand it is a matter of discretion which might give rise to difficulties when trying to make arrangements.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member will notice in section 1 (1) of the bill, item (iv) of paragraph (f) is being changed to indicate that these preparations as provided in the agreement are to be administered in the hospital. The explanation in the explanatory notes under (a) includes the words, "may not be given to patients on a take-home basis", and the addition under (iv) includes the words, "when administered in the hospital". The limitation is therefore included to provide for administration in the hospital only.

Mr. Bourque: I think it is important that this should be interpreted for the house, because out-patients are not provided for in this amendment. The amendment refers only to patients in the hospital.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): If the hon. member would refer to subsection 2 of section 1 of the bill, I think this matter might be clarified for him. Subparagraph (iv) of the first section provides:

(iv) drugs, biologicals and related preparations as provided in an agreement when administered in the hospital,

In-patient services are set out in the act itself but subparagraph (iv) to which I have just referred changes the wording to say these preparations must be administered in the hospital, so that covers in-patient services.

Section 2(i) of the act defines out-patient services as meaning all or any of the services set out in paragraph (f) and, as I pointed out, paragraph (f) defines in-patient services. In other words, all in-patient services are included except sections (i) and (iv), and the amendment deletes (i) and (iv). In future therefore out-patient services will include all of those in-patient services under (f) excepting that drugs and biologicals must be administered in the hospital.

Incidentally, out-patient services are as set out in the agreement, and that is why some may differ.

Mr. Batten: It may be quite feasible that under the present formula of 25-25 there will be fluctuations in the percentage of cost paid to any province. This is evidenced by the fact that the percentage paid to Newfoundland, which would have been 72, but is now 68.6. Having decided what the percentage is to be for any one province, for how long will that percentage obtain?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Just for one year. The figures are adjusted when the actual costs are presented.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Shall this bill be read a third time now?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh no. I think we have been very generous with the minister. No doubt he will wish to look at some of the questions he has not answered, and I think we ought to defer third reading.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

341. Improvements generally—not more than $25,000 to be expended on any one project without the approval of treasury board, $700,000.

Mr. Bourget: I think the minister was about to give us a breakdown of this amount of $700,000.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Mr. Green: When this estimate was under consideration the other day I read off some examples of the expenditures covered by the item. Today I have a much longer list. I would be very glad to let the hon. member see it at any time. As a matter of fact, even this list is not a full list because some of the items go down as low as $100.

Mr. Bourget: I do not ask the minister to read all the projects but if he would be good enough to give us the breakdown by provinces.

Mr. Green: I have not got it now, but I will get that information. The hon. member will notice that in the details of the estimate it is divided between expenditures in Ottawa and expenditures elsewhere; $150,000 for Ottawa and $550,000 for other centres.

Item agreed to.

342. Maintenance and operation of public buildings and grounds, and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $1,300,000, $44,000,000.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to bring up at this time a point I did not have the opportunity of raising on a previous item in the estimates. I refer to the operation of the central heating plant and its relationship to the question of public buildings. I understand that two years ago an extension was made to this heating plant and that two more boilers were put in, and yet anyone who visits the plant at the present time will discover there are quite a number of boilers not in use. The question that comes to mind immediately is why more boilers are needed; how many boilers were operated last year of the boilers in service; how many boilers have they altogether; and how many will they have altogether.

Mr. Green: The position is that there are three boilers known as the Leonard which are modern boilers, thoroughly efficient and two of a smaller type known as Kidwell boilers and four old Babcock boilers which are used as standby boilers. I am wrong. The Kidwell boilers are the standby boilers. The four Babcock boilers are obsolete. They are very small and make a lot of black smoke. We are going to buy one new Leonard boiler.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister's reference to black smoke leads me to inquire whether the Department of Public Works maintains that smoke-belching equipment behind the national research council and to express the hope that the Prime Minister will not have to drive through the smoke very much longer.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been driven through it too.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been driving there, too, yes.

Mr. Green: Apparently this is the first complaint we have had about this smoke. We should be very glad to look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the minister knows, I walk along there every morning and I have more opportunity to see this smoke than the people who are whisked by in motor cars.

Mr. Green: I would not like the hon. member to get more smoked up than he is.

Mr. Fisher: How many of the boilers operated last winter. Did any of the standby boilers that are not efficient operate last winter?

Mr. Green: The four Babcock boilers were only operated in times of emergency.

Mr. Fisher: Are we to assume that because these boilers are inefficient they must be taking up space? Are the new boilers to have new housing, or are the Babcock boilers being removed to put these in?

Mr. Green: No, the building is large enough now to accommodate all the boilers we have at the present time and two in addition.

Mr. Fisher: The two in addition are the ones that were inefficient.

Mr. Green: No, there is room for two new ones.

Mr. Fisher: Are we going to carry on with the inefficient boilers or are they going to be scrapped?

Mr. Green: As soon as we have acquired a new Leonard boiler the four old Babcock boilers will be taken out.

Mr. Fisher: What is the situation with regard to the staff looking after these boilers? Are a certain number of people working on each boiler permanently, or are people added to the staff as more boilers are brought into use?

Mr. Green: No. The Babcock boilers are only put into use when some of the other boilers are out of use.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to make a final suggestion to the minister. I have heard complaints and very serious criticism in connection with the whole operation of this plant and these are the sort of things which, as referred to earlier, put the whole civil service and especially the Department of Public Works in a bad light. These criticisms are circulating, and though I am not suggesting that they are in every way well founded they have been made to me by people in Ottawa who seem to know a certain amount about the situation, and they suggest that this is a very bad example of government inefficiency. Will the minister check into the situation personally to see whether there is anything to this?

Mr. Green: We shall be very glad to have a look at it. Sometimes we do get those complaints from people who may have been told by someone else, or they may have a spite against somebody working in the plant. I doubt whether the information given to the hon. member is accurate. We shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, before you call it six o'clock I ask the permission of the committee to ask the minister for information which should have been asked for on item 328. Will the minister be kind enough to give me the number of new engineers and new architects who have been employed by the department since July 1 of last year and where they are located, either in Ottawa or in district offices.

Mr. Green: I will be very glad to get that during the dinner recess.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

343. Furniture and furnishings for government departments, $1,818,650.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Bourget: No. I thought the minister was going to answer the question I asked at six o'clock.

Mr. Green: I have not yet got the figures for engineers and architects who have been employed but I do have a breakdown of vote 341 having to do with improvements generally. The figures are: Ottawa, $150,000; outside Ottawa: Newfoundland, $36,450; Nova Scotia, $15,000; New Brunswick, $7,400; Prince Edward Island $2,375; Quebec, $300,045; Ontario, $107,580; Manitoba, $10,400; Saskatchewan, $35,510; Alberta, $10,500; British Columbia, $24,740, a total of $550,000 outside Ottawa and an over-all total of $700,000.

Mr. Bourget: Under item 343 I should like to ask the minister if any new centres for the supply of furnishings or materials needed for the different public buildings have been established. I recall that in the past there were centres established at Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg. Have any new centres been established?

Mr. Green: No, there has been no increase in the number of purchasing agencies.

Mr. Bourget: Was I correct in saying that there are supply centres or warehouses at Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg? Are there other centres I have forgotten, such as possibly Vancouver?

Mr. Green: In addition to the ones the hon. member has mentioned there is a small purchasing office in Vancouver.

Mr. Bourget: Centres have not been established in Quebec city, Windsor or Hamilton, for example?

Mr. Green: Purchases in the Quebec area are handled from the Montreal office. The Toronto office handles western Ontario.

Mr. Bourget: There are some cities where the department buys locally from local suppliers such things as soap and so on needed in public buildings.

Mr. Green: There would be some small items but practically everything is bought under the tender system and in the form of bulk purchases.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does that mean that when the customs building is completed in St. John's, for example, the furnishings for it will be bought in Montreal?

Mr. Green: The tender call will come from Montreal but, mind you, it will be advertised in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would hope so.

Mr. Green: So would I.

Mr. Bourget: Is it the intention of the department to establish a centre of distribution in Newfoundland, for instance? I think it would be a good idea in order to help the local suppliers.

Mr. Green: In due course we hope to be able to make this extension. Eventually there will probably be about six centres in Canada.

Mr. Bourget: Taking Newfoundland, for instance, if a warehouse were established in Newfoundland would tenders for supplies then be called for only within the province or outside the province?

Mr. Green: No, they would probably be called over a larger area.

Mr. Bourget: From the manufacturers.

Mr. Green: Yes.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Bourget.]

Harbours and Rivers Engineering Services—

Acquisition, construction and improvements of harbour and river works.

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, harbour and river works listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be assistants, was so limited that the department expended on individual listed projects—

345. Newfoundland, $3,640,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations to make on this item. The other day when I spoke on item No. 1 of the minister's estimates I had just started to say something about the great value of small public works that require very little planning and very little advance organization. It so happens that all around the coast of Newfoundland and particularly in my riding there are many such works that are still very badly needed.

It is true that in the nine years since confederation the most urgent works have been done. But there was, as the minister knows, a long period before that when, first because of economic difficulties and then because of the war, marine works such as wharves, break-waters, slipways and other services, which under confederation the federal government has the responsibility for supplying, were seriously neglected, and I think I will offend nobody by saying that. The result is that, despite the magnificent and untiring efforts of the minister's department over the last nine years, there is still a great deal of this work to be done, as the minister is well aware. As I said the other day, part of the reason that more has not been done in the last few years is that the availability of supervisory personnel, engineers and engineers' assistants, was so limited that the department simply could not redouble its efforts.

But, at a time like this when, according to the latest figures we have been given, 24 per cent of the working force of Newfoundland is unemployed, surely something extra could be done. Those are figures which the bureau of statistics gives us, so no hon. members should suggest I am exaggerating. We are hoping that when the figures come out for May they will not be quite so bad. The improvement, as I know from having been there only last week, is not anything like as encouraging as we would like it to be. Anything the minister can do to speed things up this year, or toward planning for next year, would be very welcome indeed.

I have told the minister twice, and I do not think it will do me any harm to say a third time, that I welcome his suggestion he is going to build a real shelf. I have a few items that I should like him to put on the shelf. I believe the simplest way would be to start systematically at one end of my riding and go through it very quickly. It will be an interesting tour, and it would make me happy if the minister would come along and make the tour with me.

An hon. Member: On your boat?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know whether or not that would be the minister's idea of a holiday, but I am quite sure if he did it he would be completely convinced.

Mr. Green: Would there be a real sailor on board to look after the ship?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, and I can assure the minister there would not only be a good sailor on board but a good cook as well. The minister looks as though the ministrations of a good cook would not do him any harm.

Mr. Green: I have gained 20 pounds since I got over here.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the minister that his experience is not the experience we had when we were over there. We worked so hard we lost weight.

Mr. Green: You lost more than weight.

Mr. Pickersgill: Happily at any rate, in my case I did not lose a very important part of my anatomy, my seat.

Being here as a representative of the constituency of Bonavista-Twillingate I feel that my constituents would expect me to indicate some of the more urgent of these marine works that the minister could undertake. We would all be grateful if he were able to undertake them, if not this year, then next year, and in some cases it might take a little longer than that.

I am going to start at Twillingate, which is one of the largest and also one of the most historic fishing settlements in Canada. there are 35 families. At Bluff Head cove, Twillingate in addition to the main harbour. As the minister is undoubtedly aware, a considerable dredging operation has been under way, perhaps I should say was under way for a while but was suspended because of what was felt to be a more urgent need at Port-aux-Basques. I have no complaint about that. However, I do hope, at the earliest possible date, the minister will find it possible to have the main dredging operation at Twillingate resumed.

In addition to that there is the need for a breakwater at Jenkins' cove to protect the fishermen's boats. I may say there are about 75 fishing families involved there. A similar breakwater is needed at Ragged point, where there are 35 families. At Bluff Head cove, there are about 35 fishermen, most of them heads of families. In addition to that, the minister's department did an excellent job last year with a bulldozer dredging one of the coves in Twillingate. This was a relatively small job, but the appreciation of those fishermen would touch the minister's heart deeply if he had a chance of meeting them.

There are several other coves, Jenkins' cove, Durrell Bottom Maidment and Hillier's Bottom, and Shoal Tickle, where only a little dredging with a bulldozer would improve the situation immensely. Then, moving from Twillingate island to New World island, it is true that the main settlements at New World island have excellent wharves, but there are a number of smaller places where wharves are needed. Bridgeport, Tizzard's Harbour, Hillgrade and Carter's Cove, are places that just come to my mind quickly on thinking it over.

In addition to that, there is a small dredging operation which I would hope the minister might find it possible to get done at Whales Gulch. I am very glad to see that it is proposed to go on this year and finish the Pikes Arm canal, because it is going to be of immense advantage to the fishermen in that area. I may say that, when I was there on other business in March, I saw the new wharf at Birchy bay, and the lobster fishermen especially are tremendously pleased with that wharf. However, like Oliver Twist, they would like a little more. They would like another block on the wharf so that they would be able to reach deeper water. Then, Boyd's cove is an important place. It is a jumping-off place for the islands and it very badly needs a wharf. If this would touch the minister's heart any more, I would say that Boyd's cove was one of the few places where I did not get a majority, so perhaps the minister would undertake to build a wharf there right away.

Mr. Green: What did the hon. member say they needed there?

Mr. Pickersgill: A wharf; this would be a relatively expensive wharf, but it is very badly needed. Then, a smaller wharf is needed at Port Albert. Port Albert is at the end of the line of the road being built, and when the road is built a good part of the traffic to Change islands and to Fogo island will come up the road from Lewisporte to Port Albert and by boat across to these islands. In addition to providing for the needs of the fishermen, such a wharf would provide for the needs of the traffic both of persons and of freight.

Then, going into Gander bay, there is a perennial problem of getting a coastal wharf at Gander Bay. The minister's officials will tell him what a vexing problem this is, and if the minister can solve it we will all be very grateful. There are, in addition, two or three places in Gander bay, the Gander Bay settlement itself, Main Point and Davidsville, where landing wharves would be of immense help to the people. Then, there is a wharf at Frederickton, which is well known to the minister's officials. This is the Frederickton in Newfoundland, of course. At Frederickton, the view in the community is that a small block at the end of the wharf is what is needed. I do not presume to offer a professional opinion on that, but there is an improvement needed at Frederickton. Then, at Carmanville there is one of the greatest antiquities in Newfoundland and one of the longest wharves. I do hope the minister's department will get around to replacing it before it collapses entirely. Carmanville is a big and growing settlement and this is a great need of the people.

Then, going back to Change islands, there is a long standing need for a wharf. This is an important fishing settlement as well as an important place of transit. In the greater part of Fogo island wharves have been built recently. At Seldom Come By, the minister's department has done a wonderful job, and at Fogo itself there is a relatively new wharf. At Joe Batt's Arm there is a new wharf, but they would like an improvement to the wharf.

At Tilting a small wharf would be very helpful. But the place I should like to appeal for most of all is a place sometimes called Deep Bay and sometimes called Hare Bay—that is near Fogo—where the people have no place to land at all. It is a very hard place. It is a place where one could not build a very large structure. But there are a good many fishermen there and they encounter great difficulty. At times it is impossible for them to launch their boats and get them into the water.

Then going back to the straight shore, I understand the minister is planning to go ahead this year with the breakwater at Aspen Cove and I hope with some dredging as well at Ladle Cove. There is a need for a slipway for the fishermen at Ragged harbour. There is a petition that I believe the minister received—I know the Minister of Fisheries did—for a breakwater at Flin Point at Musgrave harbour. One of the leading merchants of Musgrave harbour is a very well known and celebrated person in Newfoundland named Mr. James Way who on one occasion contested an election in Newfoundland for the minister's party against the premier of Newfoundland. Mr. Way has said he would build a fish plant if the minister would build this breakwater. I commend this project to the minister's sympathetic consideration.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Then there is a certain amount of dredging needed at Deadman's Bay. I am pleased to say that the minister is going to build a wharf this year at Lumsden North. At Lumsden South what is needed is a breakwater. Lumsden is one of the greatest fishing settlements in the world and it has some of the finest fishermen in the world but it is a terribly open place. If this breakwater could be constructed, it would be a tremendous boom to these fine God-fearing people. Then we come to Cape Freels.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): What did the Liberal party do when they were in power?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member for Hamilton South would like me to give a list of the things the Liberal party did while in power I am afraid the minister's estimates would not get through tonight. It would take too long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was just indicating the supplementary things that still needed to be done notwithstanding what had been done. At Cape Freels North there is a splendid wharf. As a matter of fact, I carved my initials in it on one occasion just so the people would not forget. However, they need a small slipway, it would not cost very much. Here again is a great fishing settlement.

Then at Newtown the minister is doing some dredging this year which is badly needed, for which the people are extremely grateful indeed. At Pound Cove a wharf would be of great help to the settlement. I am afraid there is nothing I can ask the minister to do in Wesleyville that he has not already done. In the main the same thing applies to Valleyfield-Badger's Quay. The minister is building a big shed on the wharf at Valleyfield. That is badly needed. It will be of great assistance and I am very grateful to him for it.

Then we come to Greenspond. As the minister knows, Greenspond is an island. In Greenspond there are people who would like a causeway built to the mainland. I am not going to make any such extravagant request of the minister this evening. However, there are a certain number of rocks in the channel into Greenspond that for some reason or another we cannot seem to get removed. I think there is the best will in the world but somehow or other the rocks keep on being there. If they could be removed this year, it would be deeply appreciated. Then in addition, the people of Greenspond West feel the need of a wharf in that part of the island. I think that request will be familiar to the minister's engineers as well. Then at Fair Islands last year a splendid wharf was built. A slipway is needed. I would not put this in the deep urgency class but it is something that would be very much desired. A wharf is urgently needed at Silver Fox Island.

Then moving along the coast we come to Hare bay. The minister and I have had a certain amount of correspondence about Hare bay and I have the feeling that he is gradually being softened up about Hare bay. It is a big settlement, an important settlement and a growing settlement. Although it is not generally regarded as a fishing settlement, the decline in the woods operations in the last year or two has made many people anxious to go back fishing if facilities are available. Therefore, on those two counts this would be a good project for the minister to undertake.

Then I come to St. Brendans. St. Brendans again is an island. I regret to say that for some reason or another the people of St. Brendans do not seem able to give me a majority.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Notwithstanding that fact, they are very fine people. One recognizes the fact that there have to be some Conservatives in the world.

An hon. Member: You don't have to worry about them.

Mr. Pickersgill: These people have a wharf that is not adequate to this important settlement. There is one of the other coves in which they would also like a wharf. If the minister could do something to improve the wharf facilities at St. Brendans, that also would be greatly appreciated.

Then we come to Gambo. I might say that Gambo is the birthplace of the premier of Newfoundland. It is celebrated in a good many other ways as well. It is the railhead of the whole of the north side of Bonavista bay. There is tremendous traffic in and out of Gambo. There is a good deal of local feeling that the wharf that is now there is not really adequate.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you build it when you were in power?

Mr. Pickersgill: Because we were building other wharves that were even more urgently needed, and in very great number.

Then I come to Glovertown. In Glovertown there is a spendid wharf where the Millie Ford is tied up from time to time. Glovertown is a big settlement. It stretches all the way around Alexander bay. It is a large place, larger than most settlements in Newfoundland. The people on the north side of Glovertown also feel the need of a wharf.

Then there is a certain need for repairs to the wharf at Traytown. I do not think that anything is needed at St. Chads. There is a fine new wharf there. But at Burnside they do need a breakwater. This is a relatively small structure and it would also be very helpful to the fishermen in that rather exposed place.

Then, of course, there is Salvage. Salvage is a great historic fishing settlement, one of the most picturesque places in Canada. It is a place which people would travel thousands of miles to see if it were a little better advertised. It is also a splendid fishing centre, but it is also in need of a wharf. I think the minister has some of the particulars. There is one wharf there but, because of the configuration of the place, there is need of another wharf.

Then I understand some repairs are badly needed to the wharf at Sandy Cove. Also a small wharf would be of tremendous help to the fishermen in Upper Happy Adventure. A small slipway would also be of great help in Powell's cove in Happy Adventure. It is all the more important in Happy Adventure because, as the minister well knows, many of the people in Happy Adventure in the past have made their living at working in the national park. Until the park gets thoroughly organized, facilities for the fisheries would be especially helpful.

Then there are two places, one at the edge of the national park and the other across Clode Sound, called Charlottetown and Bunyan's cove. I am going to tell the minister a secret. I got a lift across the sound the other day on one of the minister's boats. I do not know whether the minister knew he had a fleet down there. However, they were kind enough to run me across the sound. I hope he will not discipline them for doing so. I may say it was not done in working hours. I can assure him of that. In both these places it is apparent that they need small wharves. A wharf would be greatly appreciated also at Port Blandford and would be all the more necessary, I should think, on account of the increased traffic that there will be because of the establishment of the national park, I would not pretend that Port Blandford is ever likely to be a fishing centre, but it is a big place and it is going to be a big tourist centre, and I would have thought that this would be a suitable project.

Some hon. Members: How big?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is big enough that I would hope the minister, in his spare time, would build a post office there, too. A couple of years ago we built a wharf; I beg the minister's pardon, his department built the wharf at Canning's Cove, and this wharf has been a tremendous boon, not only to the people of Canning's Cove but also to the people of Musgravetown and the people of Bloomfield. Musgravetown and Bloomfield are farm settlements. In fact, they are two of the largest farming settlements in my district which, perhaps, is not the leading agricultural constituency in Canada. These people, however, produce a large quantity of potatoes and other vegetables which they sell all along the northeast coast. At the present time they have to truck these vegetables over some very high hills and steep grades for quite a considerable distance to the wharf at Canning's Cove. In the old days there was a public wharf at Musgravetown. Of course one wharf would serve that place and also Bloomfield; I would not ask the minister for two.

An hon. Member: How about a subway?

Mr. Pickersgill: This wharf would more than justify itself. A small wharf was built on the other side of the bay at Portland last year and it is surprising to note how much use has been made of it. It has stimulated the fisheries in an area which has not been a fishing area. When the minister can get around to it, a wharf would be very helpful at Winterbrook, which is a large centre for the fishing and collection of lobsters. A wharf is very badly needed, indeed, at Southern Bay and also at Charleston. Though these places are fairly close together one wharf would not do for both of them, because there has been a good deal of development in recent years in this whole area with the pothead whale fishery and the squid and herring fisheries. These marine works there would really enormously assist the people to exploit these riches of the sea.

Wharves are needed at Princeton and at Summerville. A wharf was built at Plate Cove West only last year, and there is a wharf at Openhall but the people feel it would be much more useful to them if they could have another block on it. The people of Tickle Cove would like a wharf. I admit that this is a difficult proposition because Tickle Cove presents many problems. It is right on the Atlantic and it will tax the ingenuity of the minister's engineers to produce the kind of structure which will stay there.

I am pleased the minister is undertaking to replace the wharf at Duntara which was regrettably destroyed by a storm about a year ago, and by so doing he has given heart to the fishermen. I believe Knight's Cove is another place where if a wharf were built there could be considerable development of the fishery, and Upper Amherst Cove is a great fishing settlement. It would be of great assistance to the people there if a wharf could be built to assist in the prosecution of the fishery, making it not only easier but more profitable, and it would enable them to carry on their activities for a longer period each year. At Newman's Cove I know there are again great engineering difficulties but assistance is also required. In this latter place there is exposure to the Atlantic, but extensions to the present wharf are needed. At the other side of the cove a slipway is badly needed, which I am very hopeful the minister will be able to look after this year. At Birchy cove there is a smaller settlement but everyone who lives there is a fisherman and it would be very helpful if there could be a small slipway and a block built on which to tie the boats.

I am very grateful for what the minister is going to do this year in Bonavista and the people of Bonavista are also very grateful. The completion of the dredging of the pond and the work on the public wharf will be of great help and I hope it can be commenced at an early date. There is, however, one other project at Bonavista which has been under discussion for quite a long time. It is not a big job, but it is something which is clearly a federal responsibility and I hope it might be possible for the minister to consider taking steps in this regard this year, because it certainly is not one of those big works which would have to appear separately in the estimates. I refer to the fixing up of O'Dea's Pond. If my time had not just about expired and if the minister's patience was not wearing a little thin, I could go on to mention a lot of smaller works. I think perhaps I have suggested enough to keep the minister's department busy for the rest of this year and to indicate to him a few of the more important projects which people in Bonavista-Twillingate are very hopeful it will be possible to carry out next year.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in fairness to the other members of the house, I think I should point out that the practice of my department is to construct projects in inverse ratio to the time taken up by members representing the various constituencies.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this subject, firstly to thank the Minister of Public Works for what his department has done and is planning to do in my district. I have in mind particularly the wharves at Tarrington Haven for Happy Valley and Conche.

I would also like to make mention of the high calibre of the officials of his department. I would, in fact, like to pay tribute to all civil service officials in their sincere and patriotic endeavours. The nation, indeed, owes a debt of gratitude to these faithful persons who devote their lives to the public service.

I would now like to mention a number of urgently needed public works for my own riding; firstly, a wharf and shed are needed at Botwood and at Lewisporte. These ports are busy shipping points and such accommodation is vital to their economic health. An extension is also needed to the wharf at Nain, and a fishermen's wharf is required at North West River slipway and a winch at Pinware. Wharves, at Hopedale, Pacquet, Fleur de Lys and Seal Cove need to be lengthened. The canal at Pilley's Island needs to be deepened and consideration should be given to dredging Jim's Cove. At this latter point a wharf is needed or, in the alternative, at Card's Harbour.

Wharves are needed at Embree, Hampden, Baie-Verte, Budden's Tickle in Sop's Arm and extensions are needed at Burlington and Wild Bight. A shed is needed on the wharf at Raleigh. Shove Tickle in Little Bay islands needs dredging and the breakwater should be raised.

In many cases the wharves are more than mere facilities for the handling of freight. They are vital so far as fisheries are concerned and the loss of a landing wharf can mean the ruination of the fisheries for a whole community. Conversely, the provision of such a wharf can mean a real increase in the quantity of fish caught.

Viewed from any angle wharves are of the utmost importance to a riding such as my own, where the sea provides both the means of livelihood and the means of transportation.

Mr. Carter: Hon. members may not realize it, but in a modest way I am a shipowner, too, although not quite one of the same magnitude as my colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate. Nevertheless I can invite the minister to make a tour of my riding, and I can assure him that the cooking will compare with any he could get on any other ship in Canada, because the cook is my own wife. So I invite the minister to come down and travel with me any time he wishes, and I am sure he will find a lot of appreciative people in my riding of Burin-Burgeo, particularly the fishermen, who will give evidence of their gratitude for the work that has already been done.

There are 260 settlements in my riding. I think the minister has made a sufficiently long tour for one night, so I will not take him over the whole length and breadth of my riding at this time, but I can assure him when I was elected in 1949 and travelled my riding for the first time I compiled a whole shelf full of works to be undertaken, so there is no shortage of requests for public works as far as the minister's department is concerned. In fact I am sure that the district office could provide a whole long list of works which could be put on his shelf, and I think that some have already been on the shelf for a considerable time now.

I wish to make a plea for several settlements in my riding where the people have been obliged to return to the fisheries but cannot carry on the fishery successfully because the harbours have deteriorated to such an extent that they cannot keep their boats in shelter at all. Perhaps hon. members do not realize just how hard a fisherman has to work. In my own birthplace—a little fishing settlement which is typical of others all around the coast—the fishermen get up well before daylight, sometimes around two or three in the morning, get their gear ready and set sail for the fishing grounds. It may take about an hour or two to reach them before daylight. They return at about six o'clock, get a bite to eat, and then have to cut the fish, an operation which takes them until eight o'clock at night. Then, probably, they have to get into their boats and travel ten or 12 miles to get bait for the next day. They return at ten o'clock, or later, and are able to sleep for three hours, or four at the most, before beginning the next day's work. That is one of the reasons why our people grow old before their time and, of course, it is impossible to keep this up indefinitely.

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but we are at present discussing the items of the public works estimates. I would ask the hon. member to adhere to the question under debate.

Mr. Carter: I was only illustrating the need for these minor works which have been referred to by my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate. They may seem trivial to some hon. members, but they are of the utmost importance to fishermen for the reasons I have outlined.

I have in mind, particularly, a place called Seal Cove where there are about 500 people all of whom now are dependent upon the fisheries because those who were formerly engaged in the woods operations can no longer find employment there. This is one place where they cannot do anything this year unless something is done to deepen the water in the harbour.

Around the Lamaline area there are a number of fishing settlements with about 1,000 fishermen. There are scarcely any harbours around that coast and a real need exists for dredging, building breakwaters and erecting other installations to make it possible for these people to carry on the fishery without unnecessary hardship. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister the need for sheds at Grand Bank and Fortune. During the election campaign the Minister of Transport announced that these two sheds would be built, but I see that no appropriation has been made for this purpose in this year's estimates. I assure the minister that these sheds are very urgently needed and I hope that the completion of these structures will not be too long delayed.

Before I sit down I should like to say one or two words about St. John's Harbour. I referred to this on the first estimate, but only in a general way. The minister is in possession of a plan which has been prepared by an engineering company and I suppose all plans are based on facts, forecasts and assumptions. The facts would result from surveys which would reveal the actual tonnage of shipping using the harbour, the actual volume of freight handled and the movement of freight between various points; the forecast would be an interpretation of those facts in so far as they might indicate the growth of shipping in the future, increases of freight handled and changes in the movement of traffic; and the assumptions would be with respect to future shipping trends. The assumptions also would relate to what shipping firms would be carrying on business in the harbour and also as to what effect certain harbour installations might have on the ebb and flow of the tide and the undertow in the harbour itself.

In all these factors there is room for a certain margin of error; there is room for error in interpretation of the facts and there is certainly room for a large margin for error in the area of forecasts and assumptions. This was our sad experience at Port aux Basques, though I do not think the Department of Public Works should shoulder all the blame for what happened there. The primary error there was the construction of a ship far too large for the harbour, and the second error was the selection of a site for the terminal which was located in the only place where it should never have been put. If that was done on the advice of engineers, I think we have the right and the duty to question plans that engineers may bring forward because they certainly are not infallible.

The shipping trend in the future must of necessity be in the direction of larger ships because smaller ships cannot operate economically in the light of present day operating costs. As I understand it, the present plan has certain defects in that it provides for the dockage of the larger ships in the narrowest part of the harbour. If the pattern in the future is to get away from small ships and have larger and larger ships in that harbour, then we cannot accommodate all the ships in that place where the one large dock is to be located.

The other defect in the plan is that it reduces the area of the harbour available for anchorage, and this is a serious defect as far as St. John's is concerned, because St. John's is the one harbour where the banking fleet will rush for shelter whenever a hurricane occurs and in the past several years we have had several experiences of that kind when the harbour filled overnight with ships, all sorts of shipping including the banking fleet and coastal ships which had rushed there for shelter. Any plan which would diminish the water surface of the harbour available for that would, in my opinion, be a serious disadvantage.

In addition, the other defect as far as the present plan is concerned is that it reduces considerably the amount of linear footage available for the docking of ships. I do not think that criticism is intended in any way to condemn the present plan, but it indicates that other possibilities should be very carefully looked into before any firm decision is arrived at. The present plan seems to me to have developed either because the company had in mind a fixed expenditure and tried to keep the plan within the limits of that expenditure, or else its survey did not envisage any great future expansion of commerce for the harbour. I do not think any of us can foretell what is going to happen in the next 50 or 100 years, and it would be most unfortunate if we did anything at this time which does not have to be done, and which might turn out in the future not to be for the best.

I do not know what defects the alternate plan has, but I understand it to be much more comprehensive and a much more expensive plan. Furthermore it corrects some of the defects that I have already mentioned. I would certainly urge the minister to give it very careful consideration and if it means expending $20 million or $50 million, not to let the amount of expenditure stand in the way of doing the very best possible job.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the time of the committee for a few minutes to point out to the minister some of the discrepancies in the remarks of my colleague from Newfoundland, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. He concluded his remarks by saying that the narrow portion of the harbour—I presume he meant the west end of the harbour—would be narrowed down considerably by the construction of a large pier.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the sort; I am sorry.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps my hon. friend would clarify it.

Mr. Carter: I said the present plan makes provision for the docking of ships in the narrowest part of the harbour, in the western part of the harbour.

Mr. McGrath: The point that I would like to clarify for the benefit of the minister and the departmental officials particularly is the fact that deep sea shipping, that is shipping of fairly heavy tonnage, have always in previous years—and there is no reason why they will not do it in future years—used the eastern end of the harbour. I am sure the hon. member will also agree with me when I maintain that there is no reason to believe that, with the construction of this large jetty in the western end of the harbour and the breastwork which will form the basis of the northern side of the harbour of St. John's, there will be anything to stop heavy ships, if any heavy shipping comes to St. John's in the near future, from using the eastern end of the harbour and which now uses the premises of Furness-Withy and Harvey and Company.

By the same token, it has been pointed out by engineers of the Foundation Company of Canada, and various other experts, that the jetty is being built in the western end of the harbour to facilitate the handling of ships up to 10,000 tons. I am sure the hon. member is fully conversant with the facts, and I am sure he is fully aware that since the end of world war II there has been little or no shipping in the harbour of St. John's over 10,000 tons. I am sure the same critics of this plan that the hon. member has quoted and he are aware of the fact the suggestion has been made that this development will make St. John's a sixth rate harbour. I would like to point out that right now we are not even a tenth rate harbour. What I maintain is that when the present plan is implemented it will not be the answer to all of our problems but it will be an improvement and it will, I hope, be the beginning of many more improvements to the harbour of St. John's. I certainly would like to see this plan started as soon as possible.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, what the hon. member for St. John's East has just said I pointed out at the beginning, namely that this survey was based on some facts, forecasts and assumptions. One of the assumptions is that the shipping firms now operating in the eastern part of the harbour will always be operating there. I think that is not a valid assumption. More than that, the very fact which he mentioned, namely in the western end of the harbour there is to be accommodation for 10,000-ton ships, is going to tend to put those shipping firms in the eastern part of the harbour out of business altogether. If it is possible to expand this plan to utilize the eastern part of the harbour, as we are doing now for the western part, then St. John's will not have to be a sixth rate harbour; it will be a first rate harbour.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, it would be very unkind of me if I were to say that the people of my riding are not grateful for the work that the Department of Public Works has in hand this year, but I must say that we are not satisfied and we hope that the doors are not closed. We hope that many improvements which could be done at very little cost will be taken in hand. Also, there are many projects which I sincerely hope will receive sympathetic consideration in the not too distant future. At this time I want to publicly thank the Minister of Public Works for the prompt replies that I receive to requests made to him on behalf of the settlements in Trinity-Conception.

In my riding the Department of Public Works proposes to spend $110,000 this year on new construction work in the settlements of Elliston, Little Catalina and Old Shop. But there are many more communities needing facilities to assist fishermen in the carrying on of their work at the fisheries.

I should also like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the urgent need of an extension to the wharf at South Dildo, near the premises of the Arctic Fisheries Products Limited, and where the provincial government owns a co-operative plant and O'Brien Fisheries carry on a fisheries business. Here is a very important industry which creates considerable employment for the residents in that area. As a matter of fact, when there is a good fishery there are as many pounds of sea products put through these plants as in many large fishing plants in other parts of the island.

I have presented to the Minister of Public Works several petitions from settlements in my riding. However, in addition I have a few more. For instance at Hibbs Cove, Port de Grave, a breakwater is badly needed. The fishermen there have to travel as much as 50 miles per day to get to the fishing grounds

Hibbs Cove is one of the biggest fishing settlements in Newfoundland.

There are also many places where wharves should be constructed such as Green's Harbour, Hillview, Lady Cove, Little Heart's Ease, Long Beach, Queen's Cove, Sunnyside, Thornba, Western Bay, Melrose and Trinity East. Trinity East is a growing settlement because many families are moving there from remote areas.

Slipways are required at Blackhead, Lead Cove, Gull Island and Clarenville. Extensions to public wharves are required at Caplin Cove in Trinity bay Cavendish, Chance Cove, Freshwater in Conception bay, Gooseberry Cove, Hant's Harbour, Deer Harbour, Lead Cove, Lower Island Cove, Low Point, Monroe, New Harbour, Old Pelican and Winterton. Dredging is also necessary in many places in my riding, particularly at Cupids where John Guy founded a colony in 1610.

I am sure that the minister of public works will consider these requests. I know that he is unable to fulfil all the requirements of my riding but I feel confident that these requests will receive consideration by his department and what cannot be done this year or next year will probably be done in the near future.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I realize that by this time there is not much room left on the minister's shelf. He said a few moments ago that the amount of work done would be in inverse proportion to the length of the speech and I will take him at his word. I hope when I am finished that the possibility of getting done what we want done will be a probability of at least one project. When the minister is making up his estimates for the coming year I would be very pleased if he would have a look at the need for harbour installations at Port au Port, Ship Cove, Parson's Pond, Corner Brook and St. George's. I have made my remarks short, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

348. New Brunswick, $4,060,500.

Mr. McWilliam: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take the minister on a tour of all the coves and inlets in Northumberland-Miramichi, but I notice that in the estimates there are only two items, one for $32,000 and the other for $40,000. However, there are a number of places along the coastline of Northumberland-Miramichi which are in need of facilities and in some cases improvements to existing facilities. The fisheries of Northumberland-Miramichi are very diversified, including all the delicacies that come from the sea, and the people of that part of the riding derive their livelihood from fishing. The minister may not be as familiar as the department is with the requests that have been made in the past for improved facilities and in some cases new facilities where no facilities exist. I urge the minister to take a look at the requests that have been made from time to time in the past. I too would invite the minister to come down to the famous Miramichi river which is often referred to as the Rhine of America. He would probably enjoy his visit very much, much more than he enjoyed the trip he made last March.

I should like to refer to a matter which, while it has nothing to do with any particular item, would, I think, come under rivers and harbours. I would ask the minister to advise me, not necessarily in the house, with regard to the inquiry I made to him concerning the department's policy as to responsibility for the construction of a bridge over the Miramichi river at Chatham. I do not think there is anything more I want to say. I have spoken in general terms. I realize that everything cannot be done in one year but I find that the estimates covering Northumberland-Miramichi are probably less this year than they have been for many years. It may be that will be offset next year by a very good vote and the provision of money for those facilities needed by the fishermen of that area.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I too do not want to take too much time of the committee at this time but I have a few questions which I should like the minister to answer. Instead of making a statement I will simply ask a few questions which I hope the minister will be able to answer. Could the minister advise the committee what the program of the department is in connection with the wharf extension at Maisonnette? I brought this up in my remarks on the first item of these estimates. I mentioned at that time that the minister had a golden opportunity to provide employment in a fishing community. By extension of the wharf at Maisonnette I am sure the fishermen of the area and others would be provided with employment.

I should also like to ask the minister what the present plan is with regard to improvement of Bathurst harbour. I notice an item of $100,000 covering dredging of Bathurst harbour this year but I understand that this item is to cover work done in previous years by departmental dredge No. 4 which I understand has been scrapped by the department this year. Would the minister answer these questions?

Mr. Green: First of all, with regard to Maisonnette; the situation there is that the department estimates that the cost of providing a 208-foot extension to the existing 290-foot structure, including a small quantity of very costly rock dredging, would be approximately $164,000. Preliminary reports indicate that the commercial activity there would not justify an expenditure of this amount. However, we are having another look at it in order to get a more detailed report.

With regard to Bathurst, the situation there is that shortly after the new government took over we decided that it would be of great advantage to northern New Brunswick if a smelter were to be built at Bathurst. As the hon. member knows there have been very important finds of zinc, I presume in his county or perhaps it is in the adjoining county. However, there was a very promising mine in the province, in a place where it was not expected there would be such large base metal reserves. The mine was in operation, and we decided that we would spend up to $3.5 million for dredging at Bathurst to make it possible to use the wharf to the full extent, providing that the mining company would undertake to erect a smelter, and wharf.

We had very high hopes that they would agree, and I think for some time they were about to commence this project. However, as hon. members know, the price of zinc has fallen a great deal in recent months, and for the time being there is no prospect of the company building a smelter at Bathurst. In fact I think they have closed down their mining operations in recent weeks. This offer by the government still stands. We believe that a base metal smelter at Bathurst would be of immense value to the whole of the maritimes, and would be one of the most important developments that could be undertaken anywhere in Canada. There is power now being produced at Beechwood, and the fact there is cheaper power available is very material in this whole picture.

We have not lost interest in Bathurst harbour. The vote of $100,000 does not replace the other development. As I have already pointed out, we still have in mind going on with the full scale harbour development provided a smelter is erected in Bathurst. I would point out that this $100,000 is to be expended for dredging in Bathurst. There are other expenditures in the hon. member's riding. For example, harbour improvements at Blue Cove will cost $110,000 and breakwater repairs at St. Mary's, $50,000. There may be others, but we are very much interested in Bathurst.

Mr. Robichaud: I am pleased to hear the minister say that the offer for improvement of Bathurst harbour still stands pending action by the mining company. I would hope that in the meantime consideration would be given to the immediate improvement of this harbour, especially wharfage facilities. Bathurst is a shipping port and at the present time there is no public wharf which could be used to advantage by shipping interests.

There are two more questions which I should like the minister to answer. Has any consideration been given to the removal of the old breakwater at the entrance to Tracadie harbour? I mentioned this in my remarks when these estimates were introduced. This old breakwater is definitely blocking the entrance and it is a menace to navigation which could result in the loss of life.

Mr. Green: In so far as the possible menace to navigation in Tracadie harbour is concerned, our officials are now estimating the cost of removing the existing north breakwater ruins, and following a review of the report consideration will be given to whatever action is indicated.

Mr. Robichaud: Again I wish to thank the minister for this action being taken by his department in relation to Tracadie harbour. My last question is this. On June 13 the minister said that the Chignecto canal was being studied by his department. Is the minister now in a position to report to this committee on what action has been taken by his department in connection with the Chignecto canal?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, the study is still under way.

Mr. Robichaud: How far has the study been carried? Have any engineers of the department been instructed to make preliminary plans?

Mr. Green: This study is being carried on within the department, and I am afraid I cannot go any further than that.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister also report now as to the progress which has been made in the survey in connection with the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island causeway?

Mr. Green: I would be delighted to talk about that. There is a substantial vote for this item, but I have mislaid my notes. I will be glad to deal with it, when we come to that vote.

Item agreed to.

349. Quebec, $4,036,100.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I see that in vote 349, the province of Quebec will receive $4,036,100. The province of Newfoundland will receive $3,640,000; Nova Scotia, $4,057,500; New Brunswick, $4,060,500. I am certainly glad to see that these provinces are going to get a substantial amount. I see also that Ontario will receive $11,642,900. No doubt the province requires that amount, and I am glad to see they are going to get it. But you will notice that in four provinces you have 74 per cent of a total amount of $31,919,500.

Toronto harbour itself is going to get $4,438,500, which is more than the whole province of Quebec is going to have, namely $4,036,100. I see there is no appropriation for Montreal harbour, for Quebec harbour or for the Three Rivers harbour. As we have a very large number of unemployed at the present time in Montreal, I find it to be rather funny that Montreal and the whole province of Quebec are going to get such a small sum. I was wondering what the minister had to say on that point.

Mr. Green: It is not possible to allot money on the basis of the proportionate size of the provinces. These problems, of course, are completely different in every province. Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia, with their long coast lines, have many maritime harbour problems. Then they may vary from year to year. One year there will be a big project under way in one particular part of the country and smaller ones in another part. It is therefore not fair to review the estimates on the basis of setting out one province against another.

In so far as Montreal is concerned, much to my surprise the hon. member has completely overlooked the fact that Montreal is under the national harbours board and is not under the Department of Public Works at all. The moneys spent on the St. Lawrence river there are spent by the Department of Transport and not by the Department of Public Works at all. If we had all the figures of all the government expenditures on Montreal and Toronto, I think there might be protests coming from Toronto rather than Montreal. However, I do not want to get the members from those two cities fighting it out on the floor of the house. Nevertheless I point out that both Montreal and Quebec are under the national harbours board which does not come under the Department of Public Works at all. This is true also of Three Rivers and Chicoutimi.

Mr. Bourque: Am I to understand from the minister that Toronto harbour comes under the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Green: Toronto harbour is under the Toronto harbour commission. It is like quite a few other harbours across Canada. There is a bill coming up at this session to establish a harbour commission at the lakehead which will cover the harbours of Fort William and Port Arthur. In all fairness to Toronto I must say that although this city has been on fresh water and has been an inland port and will be one, of course, until the seaway is completed, the people there have spent millions and millions of their own dollars to develop the harbour of Toronto. I do not suppose there is another city in Canada which has paid so much good hard cash to build up its own harbour. They do not want to be under the national harbours board. Apparently their wish is to run their own harbour. But the harbour of Montreal, like the harbour in my home city of Vancouver, has had millions of dollars spent on it by the national harbours board. I do not think that any criticism can be made of Toronto by way of comparison of federal money that has been spent on the Toronto harbour and on other harbours.

Mr. Bourque: The minister says that the port of Toronto comes under the Toronto harbour commission. But if you have $4 million coming from the Department of Public Works there, what would be the equivalent that Montreal would get? If Montreal does not get anything from anybody—and they must, of course—it would be unfair.

Mr. Green: When the hon. member says that Montreal does not get anything from anybody—

Mr. Bourque: Pardon me, but I did not say that.

Mr. Green: —may I point out that Montreal is getting millions and millions of dollars. This St. Lawrence seaway development is meaning an expenditure of many millions of dollars in Montreal. As I say, these estimates do not come under the Department of Public Works; they come under the Department of Transport.

Mr. Bourque: That is the point I wanted to make. What would be the equivalent? If you give the port of Toronto $4 million, then Montreal would get the equivalent from the harbour commission. You are not giving Toronto something that you do not give to Montreal.

Mr. Green: We are not in a position to know that because we have no jurisdiction over the harbour of Montreal.

Mr. Bourque: No comparison can be made?

Mr. Green: No.

Mr. Cardin: May I first of all tell the minister that I am happy indeed that the government has decided this year to carry out the several projects that were conceived and planned by the previous government. As hon. members know and as does the minister, my riding lies along the St. Lawrence river, and owing to the heavy navigation a considerable amount of damage has been done to the shore. Over the years a series of retaining walls has been built in order to protect the shore from erosion. I am happy to see that this year the program with respect to retaining walls is being continued. I am particularly happy also to see in the estimates an item for the St. Anne retaining wall. That particular project is an urgent one. It is a residential area of greater Sorel and the shore is quite close to the channel. Over a period of years the lapping of the waves has deteriorated the shore to such an extent that some of the buildings in that particular area have been in danger of being affected by the erosion.

I recall that there were to have been negotiations between the Department of Public Works and the municipality of St. Anne with regard to the reconstruction of that particular wharf. I do not know at what stage the negotiations may be at this date. However, if it were useful for the department, I should be happy to try to arrange for negotiations between the municipality and the department so as to try to get this work done as quickly as possible and certainly, if it were possible, before winter sets in.

There is another item that I should like to mention at this time. It has to do with the improvements of harbours in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway. The seaway, of course, has been expected to bring into Canada an economic potential that we did not have previously. We have a right to expect that the ports all along the seaway will benefit from this great project. Sorel, of course, is one of the ports which does not come under the national harbours board and apparently has not received a great deal of attention in the sphere of harbour improvements. I understand that a secret survey has been made of the different ports that will have to be improved in connection with the seaway. I certainly hope that Sorel is included in that particular survey.

The other day the hon. member for Laurier mentioned the usefulness of having some of the ports increase their grain elevator capacity. I understand, of course, it is not up to the Department of Public Works to increase the capacity of grain elevators already in existence, but in Sorel the North American elevators have plans to double their grain capacity. In order to do so they would have to make some changes on the wharf upon which these elevators are built. As a matter of fact, the North American elevator wharf takes the form of an L, and in order to be able to accommodate the larger vessels which we expect will sail on the seaway, one part of that wharf will have to be cut off. This will mean that a new wharf will have to be added in the port of Sorel.

Some years ago preliminary work was done in order to bring about this improvement, and I understand that soundings have been taken in an endeavour to figure out where would be the best location for the new wharf. I would indeed be happy to know what progress has been made with respect to the re-arrangement of the wharf.

I would like to mention very briefly one last point, which subject has been a sore spot for some years. I refer to Ste. Anne's in the St. Lawrence, where there is a series of islands used for a number of generations for the growing of hay. During winter months this hay has always been transported from the islands to the mainland but, as the minister knows, some years ago there was a decision to bring in the icebreaker between the islands to keep the channel open during the winter months. The farmers, therefore, can no longer transport their hay over the ice. This cannot be helped and we would not want to stop progress but it does cause some difficulty because, in order to transport the hay over the water the farmers have to take barges and, owing to the irregular shoreline, it is very difficult for them to put the wagons on scows. I would hope that the minister and his department will seriously consider building some slips at a strategic point so that the farmers can transport their produce in a relatively easy fashion.

This question has been raised previously and has been bounced around between the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport. I appeal to the minister to try to find some solution. It is all very well to have these legal conflicts between different departments but it is most unfair for the farmers to be left holding the bag with a very serious resulting loss of crops.

I would conclude by saying that I am very grateful that the department is continuing with the program of public works in this particular area, particularly with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway. If it does what it is expected to do it will bring about a position where navigation will be doubled, as will the erosion along the shore line. It would therefore be wise, in my opinion, to do as much of the work on the retaining walls as is possible in the shortest possible time.

Mr. Green: We will be very glad to look into the projects mentioned by the hon. member. He has mentioned a wharf at Sorel, and on that I would inform him that a few days ago I interviewed a representative of the North American elevator company. This is a very big project and if the dominion government were to do as the hon. member suggests it would cost us from $1.5 million to $2 million to change the wharf. While the wharf does belong to the government it is rented to that company, and is used by that company. Whether we would be justified in spending this amount of money under these conditions I am not yet sure.

Mr. Cardin: Has any economic survey been made before arriving at that particular conclusion? Of course, it is a large amount of money to be spent but, on the other hand, I also feel that one cannot expect to improve harbours without spending money. I had understood that besides the seaway itself, serious consideration was being given to improvement of harbours, and I feel this would certainly be a practical way of improving Sorel harbour, which would bring a good deal of business to that particular area. In this connection I would point out that Sorel is at the junction of the Richelieu and St. Lawrence rivers. There are great possibilities in this area which I hope the minister will seriously consider.

Mr. Green: No conclusion has yet been reached, but there is only one company concerned. This is not a question of a general wharf for everybody's use; it is a wharf used by one company. It may be possible to work out some plan under which the company would pay a portion of the cost of any alteration. However, we have the matter under consideration.

Mr. Bourget: Along the same line, the minister has said that his offer of $3.5 million for Bathurst still stands, and I wonder why a similar offer should not be made for the port of Sorel, even if the private company has to pay a share. I do remember the policy of the department has been to ask private concerns to pay at least a share of the cost of a wharf such as this but, surely, if the minister is ready to pay the whole cost of a wharf in Bathurst, New Brunswick, there should be no reason why at least half that offer should not be made to help the port of Sorel.

Mr. Green: The work at Bathurst is dredging, and in this case the mining company would be constructing a smelter and would spend something over $20 million.

Mr. Cardin: Could the minister tell the committee whether the preliminary work on the new wharf, such as soundings, etc., is continuing?

Mr. Green: Apparently there are many engineering problems in connection with alterations to the pier and the studies have not yet been completed.

Mr. Cardin: But they are continuing?

Mr. Green: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Bourget: I have just one more question, and it is about retaining walls. I suppose that regarding this item the same rules apply to the protection works and the retaining walls.

Mr. Green: Protection walls as they are ordinarily described come under the vote for remedial works.

Mr. Bourget: If the minister will look in Quebec he will find many retaining walls. I do remember that in the past we had the same kind of item, and I am not questioning it, but I would ask the minister to explain his policy with regard to retaining walls. I know that in the past they were attached to the item of protection works, but there were some big items which were separated.

Mr. Green: The larger items are provided by a special vote but the great bulk come under remedial works vote.

Mr. Bourget: My question was, do the same rules for protection work apply for retaining walls built on navigable water. There are many items—

Mr. Green: The limitation is described in item 355; to provide for remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or federal government structures. That would apply to the items which are listed under the provincial votes as well as to the items which come under 365.

Mr. Bourget: Do they come under the same rules as protection walls?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister explain if the retaining wall in St. Joseph-St. Hyacinthe is built on navigable water?

Mr. Green: That work is necessary because of changes brought about by a federal structure which was placed on the opposite side of the river at this point. It comes in the category of federal government structures.

Mr. Bourget: I remember that item very well because I took a personal interest in that case, and it was studied two or three times by engineers and it was found out that it did not come under the jurisdiction of the federal government. We had three reports on that work in previous years. I remember the minister telling me once that we were building some protection works to protect some Liberal farmers. Now I can tell him he is building one to protect Tory farmers.

Mr. Green: I think the situation is that you were building a protection wall on one side of the river, and we are building a wall on the other. I went into this whole question very carefully; we met a delegation from down there and we looked into the matter very carefully, and what I have said is actually a fact. Because of the work on the other side of the river erosion had been caused on the side where we intended to put a wall, and we decided it was our obligation to do it for that reason.

Mr. Bourget: I want to tell the minister that I am not against it; I am glad this has been given to St. Hyacinthe, but I remember well that two or three studies were made, with the results which I have stated. As an engineer I do not think the technique of engineering has changed in so short a time, and I am quite confident in saying that it has been done this year to protect Tory farmers.

Mr. Green: This is just one more case where we have been improving on the policy of the former government.

Mr. Bourget: Not improving. You have been making accusations about patronage, but here is one example of waste and extravagance.

Mr. Ricard: I should like to submit to the committee that the necessity for this protection wall has been sustained by independent engineers who have stated that the federal structure is responsible for the erosion at St. Joseph.

Mr. Bourget: In reply may I say that the independent engineers are not in charge of the Department of Public Works, and it is not the independent engineers who apply the rules and policy of the department but the chief engineer, the deputy minister and the officials of the department.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the minister.

Mr. Ricard: Well, Mr. Chairman, the recommendation of the independent engineer has been accepted by the minister and by the department and it is all to their credit.

Item agreed to.

350. Ontario, $11,642,900.

Mr. Fisher: One month from today, on July 19, there is a community in my constituency that is going to be having a tremendous influx of people for the very well known lake Superior Rossport fish derby, and every year the remarks are generally the same, that the dock facilities in that particular place are very bad, and inadequate for Rossport even as a fishing village, but in view of the tremendous increase of tourist traffic we have coming in there we are quite dissatisfied. Now I do not think the people of the Port Arthur constituency are wharf lovers, dock lovers or breakwater lovers such as they are in Bonavista-Twillingate, but there are a few improvements which are certainly needed, and if the Minister of Public Works would care to provide them and visit the fish derby at Rossport we could give him the honour of presenting the prizes; he might even win a trip to Jamaica, Hawaii or some other interesting place. This is one item I hope the minister's department will look into—at least repair the dock and, possibly, extend the quay.

Another place in the constituency, outside Port Arthur, where some work needs to be done is the Nipigon river where it flows into the bay. The erosion caused by the tremendous amount of pulp that goes down is presenting a serious problem. Almost every spring the C.P.R. has to post slow orders on its bridge there because of the risk, and I feel, strongly supported by the members of the community of Nipigon, that an investigation should be made at this particular spot to see if some form of retaining wall cannot be put up where the river goes down into the bay. It would have to be a very extensive retaining wall because the river flows very swiftly; the Nipigon river is the largest flowing into lake Superior. This is something that needs to be done because I think eventually it is going to cause a great deal of trouble to the bridges there and of course it increases the silt flowing into Nipigon harbour and increases the dredging problem there.

I wanted earlier in the minister's statement to ask him to give us the distinction between harbour improvements and dredging and I hope he will find time to make it clear, because people at the lakehead cannot quite follow that distinction and it is impossible to follow it from the estimates.

There is one point in connection with dredging that I should like to make. If the minister does come up to the Port Arthur constituency for the fish derby I will try to get him introduced to two gentlemen who claim to be the official representatives of the government in that area. These are the two defeated Conservative candidates. One of those defeated candidates made the announcement before the last election that he had obtained an extension of a dredging contract in the turning basin of the Fort William harbour. I happen to know that the former member—you all remember the Reverend Dan McIvor—had been very active in pressing for this and I remember that this particular incident got Mr. McIvor's Irish dander up, and I did not blame him.

Again I would like to return from this specific example to the problem that I presented to the minister before. I know he takes a certain partisan glee in tossing things back and forth, especially to the official opposition. It seems to me there is a definite point of political morality involved in this whole question of announcements of government projects throughout the country. No one could object to the government making an announcement, or to the party which composes the government taking credit for doing things, but when you have defeated candidates posing as the people who actually obtained these things I think you are introducing the whole idea of patronage which the minister is trying to stamp out. I was stunned to read in the paper tonight that the hon. member for Carleton has come out with the statement—and this is on this very point—that he cannot handle all the problems that come to him because the rest of the members in the city of Ottawa are from the Liberal party. Again there is the insinuation that in order to get things done you have to go to a government member; that is the only way you can get something done.

It raises the whole question of patronage, and if the minister is really going to stamp out patronage why can he not stamp out this practice of having defeated candidates make announcements and let us have the announcements made in Ottawa, or made by the divisional engineers in the area, rather than carrying on this old idea? I think in terms of political morality it is necessary that you move that one step farther. After all, it is a very small and pretty cheap advantage.

In connection with harbour improvements at the lakehead, I have already made representations to the department that certain kinds of rock work will have to be done within the next two years in the lakehead harbour. I know that that will by and large be a problem of the lakehead harbour commission that is to be set up. I hope you are not chatting about political morality with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. He set us back a decade in some ways by that long oration of his tonight.

The rock work that will have to be done in the lakehead harbour is such that it has been proved feasible in the past to do it in the winter time. As hon. members know, we have an unemployment problem every winter in Port Arthur and Fort William and the truck work and the rock-breaking work and the placing of the rocks could be done quite adequately in the winter. I would like to remind the minister that this is something I hope he is planning for right now in so far as next winter is concerned because the work will have to be done sooner or later and we are going to have an unemployment problem.

There is one point on the lakehead terminals which I would like the minister to clear up and it is in a sense a harbour improvement. Why is there nothing in the estimates for that project? When the minister made his opening remarks on his estimates he made the announcement that Port Arthur and Fort William were going to get $3 million or $4 million spent on them, and also that there was going to be a group of engineers working on the project? Where is the money for those engineers and for that engineering study? It is not that I am distrustful of the minister, but I would like to know where the money is coming from for the initial work on this project? It is very important.

I should like to touch on another point which I brought up earlier and on which I was unable to get an answer from the minister. I can speak on it in connection with this wharf or dock at Kenora. It has to do with the question of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and prevailing rates on public works projects and the liaison between the Department of Labour and the Department of Public Works. When a contractor puts in a tender is it perfectly clear in his mind that if he does not pay the prevailing rate he can be forced into it by the government, and that cost will be added to the contract, or will it be added to the contract and be recoverable, or is it a loss that he will have to absorb himself? These are the general questions I wanted to put to the minister. I would like to ask him some further questions. I see the hon. member for Fort William is in his seat; he can ask his own questions.

Mr. Green: The Department of Labour polices those contracts. In so far as the questions of losses that the hon. member has mentioned are concerned, if it is necessary for the contractor to pay a higher rate, then that is his loss; the Department of Public Works does not have to make up the difference.

With regard to the harbour developments at the lakehead, we have already engaged an engineering firm to draw up plans and the reason there is no vote is that the expense of the engineers is covered in one of the other votes. There is no vote for the actual construction yet because the plans have not been completed. The hon. member need have no fear, we are going ahead with the development at the lakehead and a very large and important development it will be.

In regard to defeated candidates making announcements, here I think the hon. member is being a little hypersensitive. Nobody knows anything about those jobs until the tenders are called and then they are common knowledge, printed and published in the papers. The tender call is published and some people are active and interested in the work of parliament, interested in getting themselves elected, and they naturally try to follow these things very closely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Green: Perhaps if the hon. member had kept closer to the proceedings he would have got the information himself. Certainly there is nothing secret about it. The work of the department is an open book. The hon. member obviously was not hurt very much by anything that the defeated candidate did to him in Port Arthur.

Mr. Fisher: I think the minister is shying away from what I still think is a point of political morality.

Mr. Green: We do not make a practice of notifying defeated candidates, but if anybody wants to write in and make inquiries we do our best to advise them of what is going on.

The hon. member for Levis asked me for the number of additions to the staff of architects and engineers since July 1 of last year. There are 36 more engineers, 11 of them being in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. There is an increase of seven in Banff-Edmonton and 10 in Ottawa. Then there are other minor changes.

Mr. Bourget: Are they full-time engineers?

Mr. Green: Most of these were three to five years. As to the architects, there is only one more now than there was on July 1 of 1957.

I misinformed the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo about what would happen where tenders were called for furniture in a government building in St. John's, Newfoundland. I said that the tender call would go out from Montreal but it goes out from Ottawa.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that was my question.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman,—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, just before you call it ten o'clock, I think we on this side of the house—I speak at least for the official opposition—would be prepared to go on a little longer if the minister would like to.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: Ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the leader could tell us what is proposed, not merely for tomorrow, because I think that is common knowledge, but for the beginning of the week.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, an arrangement has been reached among the three parties that the private members' day set for next Monday will be postponed. That will make it possible for us to take the budget debate all next week. I am hopeful that we can get agreement to a one day supply motion on the following Monday. Then we would go on and finish the budget debate a week from next Wednesday. July 1 comes on Tuesday and while it is the intention to sit on that day there may be an adjournment for a period of time. I believe a ceremony is taking place on the grounds and we do not want to have the final vote on July 1. That is just tentative. It may be that we will not be able to reach agreement with the parties concerning a week from Monday, but all next week is to be the budget debate. As the first business tomorrow we would like to get third reading of the bill to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRIME MINISTER OF UNITED KINGDOM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the Leader of the Opposition asked whether I might say a word or two with regard to the meeting that took place last week with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. I say to him at once that I undertook to do so the next day, but in the course of the debate that arose I omitted to do so.

The discussions I had with Mr. Macmillan provided an opportunity to renew at first hand the understanding of our respective points of view. As both the late Mr. King and former prime minister Mr. St. Laurent said on more than one occasion, such consultations are a feature of the unique quality of the commonwealth. It is one of the privileges of membership in this commonwealth that prime ministers who share these ties can hold friendly and forthright discussions with each other from time to time about the problems which affect their respective countries, and also in a broader world context.

In the talks we reviewed a number of international problems, ranging from the proposed summit conference to developments in the Middle East and the problems at the moment being faced by the republic of France. We also spent some time in exchanging views on economic developments, particularly those relating to the forthcoming commonwealth trade and economic conference.

As hon. members know, the Canadian government has felt that a summit conference might resolve some of the issues affecting relations of the free world and the communist bloc. But we also believe that before any such conference is called there must be full preparation on the lower levels in order to assure a reasonable degree of success. Many there are who look with anticipation to the holding of a summit conference as though it would resolve all of the problems, or many of the problems, that have existed between the free world and the communist countries since 1945. For that reason everything must be done, if a conference is to be called, to assure that it shall not fail in its objectives when it is convened. This would, I think, be worse than not having a conference at all.

As hon. members know, technical discussions will commence at Geneva on July 1 regarding atomic inspection and the detection of nuclear explosions, in which conference the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R. will participate, as well as other interested countries. If in consequence of this meeting in Geneva tangible progress is made, I think we might then be more optimistic about a summit conference taking place. Mr. Macmillan and I hope that a summit conference will take place, but both are aware of the fact that the west has not yet had any very encouraging indications from the U.S.S.R. that would lead the free world to believe confidently that the cold war will cease. When I make that statement I do so as well in the light of events that have taken place in the last few days in Hungary, and also the extent to which Mr. Khrushchev has added to the propaganda warfare that has existed for the last year or so, and to an intensified extent in the last few days.

Reference was also made to the political developments in Lebanon, and recently my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on the part Canada could take in co-operation with other members of the United Nations in assisting the security council in its efforts to bring about an end to the disorders in that country. It was agreed among us that respect for the ideals of the United Nations in the Middle East, as elsewhere, would be a help to the observers of the United Nations in their task in that area.

Another political development in the Middle East which has disturbed the free world, and particularly us in Canada because of our membership in the commonwealth and in NATO, has been the disorderly situation in Cyprus. I can only say that as a result of the initiative being taken by the United Kingdom government in its latest proposals that were revealed yesterday in the House of Commons there it is to be hoped that a solution of this problem may be worked out within a framework of conciliation and compromise.

Discussions also centred around the situation in France, our close friend and valiant ally, and I think there is reason to be optimistic that the worst of the difficulties in that nation is over and that under General de Gaulle, our loyal and brave friend during the dark days of the last war, Canada will be able to look forward to seeing France resolve its present problems and to a continuation of intimate collaboration with France under General de Gaulle.

As well we discussed the economic outlook on both sides of the Atlantic and its relation to the main problems and issues of policy that the United Kingdom and Canada are now considering. These discussions involved trade and economic development, not only as regards our two countries directly but also in respect of our relations with other countries as well. The main subjects of economic discussion were the policies to be followed at and the preparations being made for the commonwealth trade and economic conference. This included a review of a number of matters that are being studied by officials from all commonwealth countries in London at the present time, to the end that proper foundations will be laid for a successful conference.

Throughout these discussions there was a full realization of the ever-growing Soviet attack on the vulnerable and comparatively weakly defended economic front of the free world. It seems clear that this economic challenge is designed to outflank the political and military defences of the west. I believe that counteraction will be required in this field and can only be taken by co-operative measures to meet this new Soviet offensive. During the next few months the Canadian government jointly with our friends and allies will take steps to meet this new Soviet offensive.

Discussions are already under way with the North Atlantic treaty council, and I believe the result we hope will be achieved at the forthcoming trade and economic conference in September will tend to strengthen the economies of the free world.

That in general represents in summation the matters that we considered and discussed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I thank the Prime Minister for his summary of the discussions he had with the United Kingdom Prime Minister, which I am sure have emphasized and strengthened the feeling of friendship and close relationship between our two countries, not only in respect of their bilateral nature but in their working together to reduce tensions and strengthen the chances of peace. I am sure Mr. Macmillan's visit was helpful in that regard.

May I ask the Prime Minister one question arising out of his statement. In the discussion of economic matters with the United Kingdom Prime Minister, was advantage taken of the occasion to go into the United Kingdom free trade offer made to Canada last year?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the statement that has just been made by the Prime Minister. I think we have all welcomed the statement he has just made. We feel that having meetings from time to time between the Prime Minister of this country and the prime minister of any other commonwealth nation is an excellent thing and should be promoted. I was interested in his statement on the forthcoming commonwealth conference, but I felt the statement was somewhat vague and inexact and that it did not give us any great hope that real accomplishments might come from that conference. I am hoping that recent action taken by this government will not make the work of that conference more difficult.

We realize that throughout the world today there are many areas of great tension, and we hope the free nations of the world will have success in easing this tension and promoting freedom and democracy throughout the world. Along with the Prime Minister we in this group are concerned with recent events in Hungary, and we are afraid these may spell a change of tactics in the Soviet union itself. We hope also that the forthcoming conference in July on the control of atomic explosions and atomic inspection will prove fruitful.

As to the summit conference, we hope without reservation that one will be held, and held soon. I am not one of those who feel we should give undue weight to preparations being made in every single detail as a prerequisite to such a conference being held. We feel the west should seize the initiative now by agreeing readily to such a summit conference and, if it is a failure, allot the blame where it is due. But we could err by insisting there should be too much in the way of detailed advance preparation, thereby laying ourselves open to the accusation that we were making it more difficult for such a conference to be held. We hope such a conference will be held, that it will reduce world tension, and that it will result in the strengthening of freedom and democracy throughout the world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank both hon. gentlemen for their contributions. I want to say, in so far as the latter remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia are concerned, that all of us are desirous of having a summit meeting, but that a meeting called without adequate preparation would inevitably lead to unsuccess. This government has strongly supported the need for action with regard to a summit conference being called, but after all it is of prime importance that everything should be done in anticipation to assure that the issues will be properly placed before that conference, and the necessary preparations made for this purpose, so there will be no excuse for failure.

As far as the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to trade policy is concerned, we did discuss United Kingdom negotiations with the various European countries in the European free trade area, but there was no discussion of the United Kingdom plan for forming a free trade area with Canada.

Mention was made, I think the other day, with respect to the plans for the commonwealth conference. An agenda is being worked out; consideration is now being given to all the phases of the matters which should and will be discussed. As I said a moment ago, a meeting is now being held in London among the nations affected, to the end that the conference will have beneficial results.

HUNGARY—CANADIAN PROTEST RESPECTING EXECUTION OF FORMER LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has conveyed to the Hungarian government the detestation which I am sure all Canadians feel at the brutal execution—perhaps murder would be a better word—of the former premier of Hungary and three of his associates in the Hungarian people's revolt for liberty in 1956?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has not yet sent that message, but I join with the Leader of the Opposition in the words he has used to describe and portray the diabolical action that has taken place in this case. I certainly will follow immediately the suggestion of communicating the feelings of Canadians as a whole at the institution of the unjustifiable terrorist policy that has just borne its latest fruits.

COMMUNIST CHINA—REPORTED GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARD RECOGNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister has seen an article by Mr. Charles Lynch in the Ottawa Citizen of June 19, which states that the reason the Canadian government will not diplomatically recognize China is that the government is in fear of embarrassing the United States. If so, would he care to indicate whether this article is a true reflection of the policy of the government in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not for the government to comment on such articles. The attitude of this government has at all times been a realistic one undominated in any way by any other government, and so it will remain.

GRAIN

ANNOUNCEMENT OF BASE PRICES FOR ONTARIO WHEAT, OATS AND BARLEY

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to announce that, in accordance with the requirements of the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the agricultural stabilization board has established base prices, based on the average prices for the last ten years, for wheat, oats and barley.

The Ontario basis is as follows: Ontario wheat, $1.77 per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality; Ontario oats, 72 cents per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality; Ontario barley, $1.04 per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality.

Using the above mentioned base prices the board has established a mandatory 80 per cent support price which will be in effect for the 12-month period starting July 1, 1958, as follows: Ontario wheat, $1.42 per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality; Ontario oats, 58 cents per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality; Ontario barley, 83 cents per bushel on track for No. 2 C.E. or better quality.

In the case of other provinces, outside the designated Canadian wheat board areas, where any of these grains are grown in commercial quantities, the support prices will be established in appropriate relationship to the above mentioned Ontario prices.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): With regard to the mandatory price of $1.42, am I not correct in saying that this is not the figure which has been urged upon the minister by a number of representative groups of Ontario farmers, who have discussed this matter with him within the last few months? Is it not also a fact that they have indicated the great danger in the future of a price at this level being construed as and developing into a ceiling price rather than a floor price?

Mr. Harkness: As I indicated to the hon. gentleman the other day in connection with soybeans, every group of producers naturally asks for a very high support price and the wheat producers through the Ontario wheat board did, of course, ask for a considerably higher price than the mandatory support price provided under the stabilization act.

As far as this price becoming a ceiling is concerned, I do not think that will be the case, and I certainly hope it will not. The Ontario wheat board, in addition to having this support price provided for them, have applied to us under the Agricultural Products Marketing Act for authority to collect an equalization fee, as it might be called, or to make a levy of up to 9 cents per bushel to provide them with working capital to be used for taking care of this crop, paying storage charges and looking after the general handling of it. Their object, and I think this is what has been needed more than anything else as far as the marketing of Ontario wheat is concerned, is to prevent all this wheat from coming on the market in the fall.

The hon. member for Essex East will perhaps remember that shortly after the harvest season last summer this wheat was down to $1.12 per bushel. This present action provides an absolute floor of $1.42 per bushel; and I think the Ontario wheat board, by the use of this 9 cents levy which we have authorized them to collect, will be able to handle the crop, to feed it out gradually during the year and, I hope, to secure a considerably higher price than the $1.42. That, of course, is their objective.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I think the statement of the Minister of Agriculture and the question of the hon. member for Essex East clearly demonstrate that floor prices under this legislation do not in any way meet the wishes of the producers themselves, for the very obvious reason that the prices are based on 80 per cent of the average price for the last 10 years, so that the floor price is relatively low.

Mr. Harkness: What is your question?

Mr. Argue: I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a statement—

Mr. Speaker: In order to clear up exactly where we are, I take it that we have reverted to motions and the Minister of Agriculture made his statement under motions. It would therefore be in order for both opposition parties to comment upon it. I do not think it is in order to ask questions. I believe the practice has been to comment briefly on a statement made by a minister under the order for motions and to reserve questions until the orders of the day. Otherwise we tend to get into a debate, which is obviously not desirable at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Argue: I thank you for your comment, Mr. Speaker. If I made an error it was in failing to rise following the hon. member for Essex East. I was saying that the statement of the Minister of Agriculture indicates that these prices have not met the demands of the producers of eastern Canada. In view of your statement I will reserve my further comment until the orders of the day.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED SHUTDOWN OF MINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I understand that the Dominion Steel and Coal Company has announced a five-week shutdown of its coal mines in Cape Breton and on the mainland of Nova Scotia due to lack of markets. In view of the hardship this step will cause to the 8,000 or 9,000 miners involved, can the minister assure the house that he and the dominion coal board will render every assistance toward reaching a solution to this very serious situation?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. This situation has been under study by the government and the dominion coal board for several weeks and is under continuous study and consultation with the company, but due to many factors we are not too hopeful that we can prevent the idle time which has been planned by the company.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister advise the house if any definite action has been taken by the government on the request of the Dominion Steel and Coal Company for financial assistance?

Mr. Comtois: I am afraid I cannot give a definite answer to that question today, but I am most hopeful of making a statement in this regard within a short time.

REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF CASH ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the critical situation of the coal industry, will the Prime Minister take under consideration making cash advances on surplus coal similar to the cash advances being made to western farmers?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question indicates that my hon. friend does not understand the system of cash advances to western farmers. So far as cash advances to western farmers are concerned, they are made in respect of a commodity, the monopoly privilege of dealing with which is a matter under the control of a government agency.

Mr. Robichaud: The mine workers understand it, though.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

HALIFAX BOARD OF TRADE REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret that he is not in his seat, but I assume the acting minister will take this as notice. Have representations been received by the Minister of Transport from the Halifax board of trade for a meeting between representatives of the board and the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Revenue to discuss the proposed sale of Canadian National Steamships vessels with a view to having the matter reconsidered, in view of the economic importance of the steamships service to Halifax and the future potential trade which might arise as a result of the West Indies federation?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

POSTAL SERVICE

MISTASSINI AND DOLBEAU, QUE.—DELAYED DELIVERY OF "LE DEVOIR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. I received a complaint this morning from Mistassini and Dolbeau. Would the minister inquire why Le Devoir did not reach subscribers in Mistassini on Wednesday, June 18, and those in Dolbeau on Thursday, June 19? On account of the declarations being made in the newspaper they are very anxious to get it every day.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I will be very glad to look into this important matter which the hon. member has drawn to the attention of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL TRANSFERRED—MOTOR VEHICLE LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the repeatedly expressed interest of the Minister of National Defence in economies in his department, to the advantage of the public purse and the pocketbooks of the armed forces personnel, I address a question to the minister. In view of the fact that many members of the Canadian armed forces, when transferred from one province to another, are required to register and obtain new motor vehicle licences, and in view of the fact that United States servicemen are allowed to use the registration and licence of their home state in any part of the United States, would the minister consider seeking the co-operation of the provincial governments for the purpose of making arrangements that would save members of the armed forces this extra and unnecessary expense?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of this problem. I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the hon. member for his interest in the welfare of the armed services. Of course the problem is associated with the compulsory transfer of servicemen from one province to another. We have already taken up this matter with the provinces and several concessions have been made, for which I should like to express my appreciation to the provinces concerned. The problem is not merely restricted to servicemen, and it is possible that even some hon. members may be suffering from the same hardship.

TRADE

PURCHASE OF U. S. BUSES BY TORONTO TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Labour I wish to direct a question to the acting minister. Has the acting minister received a communication from the united automobile workers, local 1075, of the Canadian Car plant at Fort William and the Fort William city council, protesting the purchase of United States buses by the Toronto transportation commission? If so, in view of the still serious unemployment situation at the lakehead will the acting minister inform the house if she intends to suggest to the T.T.C. that they should consider placing the order with the Canadian Car company, which is the only company, incidentally, manufacturing buses in Canada? I might add—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has explained his question sufficiently. I am doubtful whether it is a proper question because, as I understand it, it asks about the purchase of buses by the T.T.C.

Mr. Badanai: The Toronto transportation commission.

Mr. Speaker: That is not an organization under the direction of the Minister of Labour, and I doubt if the question can properly be asked of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Badanai: My question is whether the minister intends to use the influence of her office to suggest to the transportation company that the buses be purchased from the Fort William plant of the Canadian Car company. It will accomplish two things—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am doubtful whether the question, as finally expressed, is a proper one, but I do not object to the minister saying what she proposes to do with her influence.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the first part of the question, which inquired whether or not I had received these representations. They may be in the department but they have not yet reached my desk. I think, Mr. Speaker, you answered the second part of the question.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to address a supplementary question on this matter to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is there any possibility of the minister's department taking action through some form of embargo in the case of this particular order so the Canadian manufacturer will have the opportunity of filling the contract?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Unlikely.

Mr. Badanai: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that buses now manufactured in Fort William are equipped with diesel motors manufactured in Britain? That being so, would the minister not consider that it would be a good thing, in view of the policy of the government to divert purchases to Britain—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Badanai: —to promote the sale of buses manufactured in Fort William, thus increasing—

[Mr. Badanai.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the hon. member take advantage of the budget debate, upon which we are going to enter this day.

PIPE LINES

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF GAS CORPORATION SHARES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister consider having an inquiry made into the grave charges by Le Devoir that consequent upon the purchase of a provincially owned gas pipe-line company by the Quebec Natural Gas Corporation, shares in this company were purchased by the legal firm of which the present lieutenant governor of Quebec is a partner?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member is departing from the field of jurisdiction of the ministry in asking a question of that kind. I am willing to hear on what basis he proposes to ask the question.

Mr. Argue: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I read the rules of the house one cannot refer to Her Majesty or the Governor General but I did not realize—I may be in error—that this extended to the office of lieutenant governor. Since the lieutenant governor is appointed and paid by the federal government I feel this is a very proper question, inasmuch as no one would want action that would reflect on that office. I think we would all agree that the conduct of anyone occupying the important position of lieutenant governor of any province should be beyond reproach.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot accept that question. It seems to me that if any mention or reference to the conduct of a representative of Her Majesty is to be made in the house it should be by a substantive motion. That is the only proper way to bring such a matter before the house. It could be done that way, but I feel it should not be done by an inferential question.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORIZE CONTRIBUTIONS TO PARTICIPATING PROVINCES, ETC.

On the order:

Third reading of Bill No. C-30, an act to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.—The Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that by unanimous consent the house is prepared to consider this order, third reading of Bill No.

C-30, notwithstanding the fact that this day has been set aside for the budget debate. Is that correct?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-30, to amend the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday night the Minister of Finance paid tribute to the blue news in the budget. I think I should like to pay a suitable tribute to the record-breaking overtones of red that were in the annual financial accounts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I approach this task I want to say I noted, as probably did the minister, the correspondent Adelphi's comment in the Financial Post last week when he was referring to the Prime Minister of Great Britain in complimentary form. He said this:

—Only a fool likes criticism, only a fool resents it.

I, of course, have received in the past a fair amount of criticism from the minister when he was sitting on this side of the house. Before too much criticism, may I say that there are naturally some features in the minister's proposals that I think will receive fairly general endorsation, although not too many in this particular budget. I can think of his proposal with respect to a gift to a spouse of real property up to a limit of $10,000. I think of certain additions to the list of sales tax exemptions to municipalities. I commend the minister for his references to the amendment to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I appreciate that, coming from a mining area as I do. However, I would point out that the assistance still would be at least $5 million short of the maximum assistance provided in one of the years of the previous administration. I think perhaps I should commend him for taking the tax off cut flowers; probably it helped me to some extent this morning.

But on the whole I do not think anyone could better the present Minister of Finance, good orator that he is, in driving home small talk with a sledgehammer. I think of his peroration and I think also of his remarks last December 6, when he was speaking to the estimates of his department. At that time, as recorded on page 2009 of Hansard for that date, he said:

—We trust that the committee will however recognize the boldness of the government's program and the extent to which it will contribute to confidence and prosperity.

He was referring to tax reductions, Mr. Speaker, from that date to the end of the fiscal year, some five months, amounting to only $26 million. Again on Tuesday night in his speech to this house he referred to his "bold" budget. I refer to page 1250 of Hansard. The Minister of Finance said:

We have sought to face our difficulties squarely and to prescribe bold courses to meet them.

The tax reductions total only $8 million for the fiscal year. Mr. Speaker, I want to assert that in my view people are fast becoming disenchanted with rhetoric and thespian appeal only, and this dodge of too much government by bluff and by bragging.

I should like to refer to the deficit. This has received a considerable amount of attention in the press. I said on Tuesday night in my few remarks that I should like to say more about the prominent figure of $640 million produced by the minister after I had an opportunity to examine the complicated figures in Hansard. Out of office the Conservatives professed themselves in favour of less spending and balanced budgets. One can certainly argue for spending and deficits if they are not aimless but rather are planned, comprehensive and vigorous enough proposals to provide incentive, to provide lift, to perk up the economy. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that an analysis of this budget will show that the deficit is more attributable to political commitments than to economic theory or for the relief of unemployment.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): How about the old folks?

Mr. Benidickson: There was nothing in this budget with respect to the old folks. It results from piecemeal and unrelated measures. A deficit we can understand, but a deficit plus record unemployment shocks the country. The minister's financial leadership, now for almost a year, I suggest has solved neither deficit nor unemployment. He has added to both.

In so far as the gross national product is concerned, while the minister used a lot of words in his budget the other day he referred to it in a very passing way, and with what I felt was an inadequate build-up of the base to give confidence that the figure he finally produced is one upon which we can rely. It is quite possible to juggle accounts with respect to expenditures, as we saw the other night, but you cannot juggle accounts of revenues. "What will be", as the song goes, "will be."

The minister forecast revenues in 1958-59 of $4,660 million, down $387 million. Now, if this is to be realized the minister must be reasonably good as a prophet with respect to his estimate of gross national product, which he suggested on page 1235 of Hansard would be $32 billion.

I want to raise the question before the members of the house, is he a good prophet? First of all, has he made out any real case for his estimate? I want to compare his presentation, before tossing out this figure, with a similar presentation prior to a prediction of the gross national product made by his predecessor on March 14 of last year. I refer to Hansard pages 2216 and 2217 of March 14, 1957.

Before suggesting in any way what the gross national product might be the finance minister at that time referred to some of the components in the gross national product. He made reference to capital investment, and to the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, by his white paper, showed that capital investment was likely to increase by 7 per cent. Another component, namely commodity exports, according to Mr. Harris "should continue to increase through 1957." They did increase in 1957. Another component was consumer expenditures, and Mr. Harris said "these should continue to grow in 1957." He referred to the fact that a considerable increase in wage rates was built in through wage agreements recently made. Another component was farm income, and the minister of finance of that day said this should be maintained unless the grain crops in the west were disappointing. He referred to the labour force, and said he did not believe he "could count on as large an increase as in the previous year."

What in this budget have we had to establish the minister's estimate as a base for the gross national product? As reported at page 1235 of Hansard, blandly he said this:

—there are hopeful signs that we have reached the end of the recent decline.

With respect to investment intentions—I see nothing to justify a prediction of a rise in the gross national product—the minister said this:

Present investment intentions of business for capital outlays in 1958 are about 11 per cent below the 1957 level.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

He went on to say that housing and governmental expenditures would be up perhaps 14 per cent, but I draw attention to the relative volume of investment in both accounts. Here we have, then, little to build up confidence that the gross national product estimate is something that we can rely upon. As reported at page 1235 of Hansard of last Tuesday the minister starts off by saying this:

Assuming—

And it is a big assumption.

—normal crops, stable prices and no untoward external events, I am basing my revenue forecasts on a gross national product of $32 billion, which is about 2 per cent above the level achieved in 1957.

As I say, he does that without giving us an explanation of the components of that very important figure. He says "assuming normal crops". We all hope that normal crops will prove to be the result in 1958, but already we are getting not too optimistic reports as to moisture conditions in the western provinces.

With respect to capital investment, we normally get from the minister of trade and commerce at this time a revised estimate of the white paper that we had to smoke out of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in March, but which in its first page made clear that the calculations were based on information obtained at the end of 1957, in December of that year.

I wonder whether we are to expect in this debate the usual revised estimate of capital investment from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I know that last week before a congressional committee in the United States a new figure was produced, and it by no means held up to the expectations produced at the beginning of this year respecting business capital investment plans.

In addition, I think some doubt is cast on the probability of the minister's forecast when we look at his own forecast of revenues for the coming year. I refer to page 1241 of Hansard of last Tuesday. He referred to personal income tax. He suggested that this tax would be down $129 million in the coming year. He referred to corporate income tax. He suggested that this tax would be down $215 million. He referred to sales tax. Sales tax, of course, would be related to consumer expenditures, a component of the gross national product. He suggested that this tax would rise, despite a population increase, by only 2 per cent for the coming year.

Another component of the gross national product, or having a very important effect upon it, would be exports. As the house knows, in the period January to April of this year exports are down $21 million. So where out of any of these figures does one get comfort in thinking there will be a rise in the gross national product of 2 per cent, unless it comes—something which the minister discounted—from an increase in prices?

I suggest that the minister seems to have taken probably the most optimistic of all advice in calculating the gross national product. That leaves some doubt in the first instance, when we consider this matter of deficit, as to whether the revenue estimate of $4,660 million is attainable. But on the expenditure side we had this striking sentence in the minister's speech:

> —we propose to eliminate the balance remaining in the national defence equipment account.

That amount was $165 million. That is an item to which a considerable portion of the press did not give very much prominence. This fund was set up by the predecessors of the minister in order to help NATO. I suggest that this is an item that is being raided at the present time in a bookkeeping manner to help the Conservative party. In looking at this budget in ensuing days I suggest that we confine ourselves to current operations. This particular kind of calculation is just about the equivalent of the minister saying, "Well, in days past my predecessors Mr. Harris and Mr. Abbott had surpluses; we will use them". That is just about what the result is when you take advantage of this $165 million in this particular account.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But they drew on this account.

Mr. Benidickson: In addition there is a very interesting thing that I think could be said. I thought the minister was very casual in his arithmetic the other night. On careful reading we find that he produced a figure which established that in the main estimates we had $5,179 million; in the supplementaries, $58 million; in the hospital insurance act provision, $70 million; and for old age security deficit, $190 million. These add up to $5,497 million. He made reference to the possibility of a deficit on the Canadian National Railways, but he did not put it in his accounts. We already have the budget proposed for this year by the Canadian National Railways. The railroad itself suggests that its deficit in the coming year will be $55 million. Why leave it out? Adding this amount to the $5,497 million we come to $5,552 million, versus revenue of $4,660 million.

To me that provides a deficit of $892 million. Even if one takes the $5,497 million and even assuming there was any justification for the minister utilizing this $165 million as a transfer item and relating that to his proposed revenue of $4,660 million, I suggest that he was rather casual indeed in ending up with the round figure of $5,300 million, because there is a difference of $32 million in that arithmetic, as I see it. But the minister may say "What's $32 million?"

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no; he does not.

Mr. Benidickson: He had some other items without any price tags. He said that we must expect some payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. That remains with a question mark. In addition he said there would be further "statutory requirements," whatever that means. Again there is no price tag. He said as well that the house can expect the usual final supplementary estimates. I think this will be in the minds of hon. members when they consider the deficit figure that was presented to the house and the country.

This presents, I admit, quite a guessing game to any person who is now examining these accounts. As I pointed out the other night, there is nothing here to suggest that the friend of the government, Mr. Frost, can expect his $78 million which, if he were to obtain, it would mean that an additional $150 million would have to go to the other provinces on the basis of equalization.

Another interesting point is that no mention whatsoever was made in the budget with respect to civil servants' salaries. They are negotiating with the government, I understand, for a 12 per cent increase, but supposing the figure were 8 per cent the cost of that increase would be $100 million. There is nothing here about the oft-discussed pensions for superannuated civil servants. Even the new item, produced with a considerable flourish the other night—the additional subsidy of $2½ million for gold mines—does not seem to have been provided for.

The other night the minister made much of the appropriateness of the timing of proposals presented by him as financial leader of the country within the last year. I suggest that, on the contrary, the failure to realize what was happening, months after he took office, has resulted in the failure to act. As far back as last November the Trades and Labour Congress of this country called for action; they predicted that during the winter 500,000 persons would be unemployed. The Prime Minister brushed off this estimate, suggesting that these people were alarmists. That prediction, as everybody knows, proved to be conservative. I say the minister was so busy charging other people with thinking us into a depression that he did not do all he should have done, in conjunction with his budget advisers, to think us out of the depression.

There is no bold new program provided by this government. I think it is most evident that the thinking which has taken place in past months has been preoccupied with elections, past and forthcoming, and not with matters of economics. The minister would say the bad signs were not there, and we have heard some suggestion that the previous administration was unduly optimistic; but allow me to point out that in the papers presented to us the other day the minister himself confesses that he, fairly early, had information upon which I consider he should have acted promptly. At page 1232 of Hansard for June 17, 1958, the minister said:

> Some slow-down in economic activity was to be expected after the excessive pace of 1955 and 1956, a pace which was straining our resources of men and materials despite very large borrowing abroad.

What was there in the budget of 1957 which would have given good counsel to the minister? At page 2217 of Hansard for March 14 of that year Mr. Harris, who was then minister of finance, said:

> All in all, I believe, there is a good possibility that the inflationary pressures which have been present throughout the past year may begin to moderate during the coming year.

He went on to say in a cautionary way that the increases in exports might not be as great as they had been, and again in that same speech he said:

> I do not believe we can count on obtaining as large an increase in the labour force.

At page 2217 again, in the 1957 budget report, Mr. Harris also said:

> Corporate profit margins show signs of narrowing.

We have found that that was indeed a pretty good prophecy. The minister, however, boasted the other night of good timing. I suggest that during last fall and winter we in this country had very little except soothing words from the new ministers, particularly from those most identified with the recession, namely the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Labour, and indeed the Prime Minister himself. The Minister of Finance said on November 23, 1957, that there was no national emergency in unemployment. "The number of people employed in mid-October is the highest in Canada's history." He said if this was a national emergency all he could say was that practically every country in the world would like to have a national emergency like it.

I contrast that with what the minister said the other day in his budget papers, and I refer once more to page 1232 of Hansard for June 17. In reporting upon the affairs of the country under his administration he said:

> By mid-1957 the value of large capital projects being started began to run behind the value of projects being completed.

On the same page he said:

> —during 1956 capital expenditure was rising at a rapid rate while in 1957 investment outlays as a whole first levelled out and then declined slightly. The slow-down in the rate of capital investment was accentuated by the inventory liquidation which developed toward the end of the year.

That is to say, toward the end of 1957. Again, with respect to unemployment, was the minister not aware of these things? At page 26 of the white paper provided to this house the day before the budget speech we find the following words:

> There were more persons with jobs in each month of 1957 than in the corresponding period of 1956, but in the fourth quarter of the year the gains became progressively smaller as employment began to show the effects of the levelling out in production.

And at page 27 of the white paper we find the following words:

> The low in unemployment occurred in June, 1957, when 162,000 persons were jobless, compared with 117,000 during the same period in 1956. From the third quarter to the end of 1957 unemployment just about doubled and there were 386,000 jobless persons in December compared with 186,000 a year earlier.

What was the Minister of Finance really saying to the country? This surely is indicative of his thinking at that time. On December 8, when speaking to the Dominion Commercial Travellers Association meeting, he is quoted as saying that "a decline in the volume of our imports is too fractional to be a cause of concern." On December 6 last, in presenting the estimates of his department to this house, he said he was still prepared to accept the estimates of revenue of his predecessor. The Minister of Labour, as late as March 8 last at a press conference in Vancouver, said, "We are over the peak."

With what did these words meet within a matter of a few days? The figure for unemployment produced by the dominion bureau of statistics showed there were 35,000 more unemployed people in the month of March than there were in February. Once again we hear soothing words from the Minister of Finance. The other night he said that hopeful signs are here, that "we have reached the end of the decline." There is no one in this house who does not hope the minister is correct; but the ministers I have quoted, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Finance and indeed the Queen's first minister, have misread the economic signs so often in the past that there is some doubt cast upon the assertions now being made. I do not want to be a Jeremiah continually today, but we have to be realistic.

Another item which I think should get more attention than simply the absolute reduction in the number of unemployed is the rate of reduction. I find that registration at the unemployment commission's offices in the worst previous year of our post-war depression, which was 1955, went down between mid-March and mid-April from 633,000 to 556,000, which is a drop of 12 per cent. But this year at mid-April the figure was 884,000, down 30,000, it is true, but the rate of drop instead of being 12 per cent was 3 per cent.

I should like to say a few words now about trade, although during the forthcoming debate many others in this party will have something to say on this all-important subject. I referred to it briefly on Tuesday night. I spoke then of what I regarded as the seeming ham-handedness and the casting of a pre-conference chill over such things as the forthcoming commonwealth conference, particularly with respect to the proposed tariffs affecting British wool imports. I said that the same thing had been done, in my opinion rather ineptly, just prior to the Mont Tremblant conference last year. It does not seem to me that actions of this kind are likely to be very encouraging to the delegates to this assembly. We also remember very recently how vigorously we all cheered—and none of us more than the government members of this house—the speech of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. If anything I think his visit to North America, stripped of economic jargon, was basically intended to suggest ways of making the capitalist system work in the cold war. He wanted to persuade us all that we needed some new economic thinking on the part of the west. This, I think, has bread and butter implications for Canada.

I think, again in relation to the budget the other night, of the forthcoming visit, not far off, of President Eisenhower. But despite this approaching visit, which is of great importance, the Minister of Finance unnecessarily, I think, took time out in the usual hot-headed way he has with respect to the United States to introduce this subject which was so much discussed during the recent political activities. To me this business of stirring up anti-United States sentiment played up as an election issue is not desirable. I refer to the remarks of the Minister of Finance as reported at page 1237 of Hansard.

What is the basis of all this? Can it be that it is largely personal pique? Time magazine of April 26, 1958, referred after the election to what it called the flying visit to Washington of the minister for external affairs and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and then the article said:

> Since they were in town, the two ministers decided also to drop in on their two U.S. counterparts. Commerce Secretary Sinclair Weeks turned out to be too busy to see Churchill in his office, but that evening the two managed to link arms at a cocktail party.

I have no critical reference to make to the latter part, but I wonder if it is pique that is responsible for continued affronts to a country which continues to be Canada's best customer. I think there is still rankling in the mind of the government this phrase, after their last attempt to do something constructive and important in this field, when so much emphasis was given to the phrase "we fixed 'em".

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if you were a businessman with one big customer and a number of smaller ones and you wanted to enlarge your business, you would try to be nice to all your customers; you would not tell your big customer, "I want to do business with more people, so I want to do less with you". That would be very unwise and I suggest not likely. The Gordon commission suggested in its report that in times of recession—and we have such times now—it would be found that our exports to the United States would hold up better than our exports overseas. This happened in 1957 and it is happening today. In 1957 our exports to the United Kingdom fell by $75 million, while our exports to the United States rose by $51 million.

I have no doubt we will have a further opportunity to consider what the government has in mind by its reference in the budget speech to dumping. We will have a statute and be able to examine the language of that statute and debate it in due course, so I do not propose to go into this subject to any great extent. The announcement of the change in the dumping laws will have to be examined in the light of the legislation when it is brought down, but on its face it appears to be another "back to Bennett" item repeating his very special kind of dumping laws which consumers in this country will remember. From what the minister has already said it appears that there is great danger that these dumping laws will be used as a weapon to harass producers in other countries rather than as a legitimate instrument of government economic policy.

One of our most serious and justified complaints against the Americans—and this was referred to in the minister's speech the other night—is that they use regulations of various kinds to keep out our exports. The minister's remarks with regard to this appear on page 1237 of Hansard. Today it looks as if, with this new weapon which the minister is adopting, we are in danger of doing exactly what so angers us when the United States do it; and we are doing it just prior to this very important visit by the President of the United States and Mr. Dulles.

This is typical of some of the ineptness which has preceded conferences of the greatest importance to this country. We are not fooling anybody by this, particularly our best customers. The other day in Washington the United States ambassador to Canada, Mr. Merchant, appearing before the Senate foreign relations committee had this to say:

> Mr. Diefenbaker can be expected to continue to protest eloquently and with vigour what he considers protectionist action by the United States, while at the same time yielding to protectionist pressure groups in Canada by imposing restrictions on certain categories of imports.

How is trade to be enlarged by this kind of procedure?

Now I should like to make reference to a subject which has been discussed several times this session, namely the public works program of this government. I said when speaking on the first interim supply bill that one can of course argue for spending and deficits in a recession. The government would like the people of Canada to believe that the new high expenditures and large deficit are due to deliberate planning and an unusually large public works program. With the present government's Madison Avenue technique to which we have become accustomed, I think they have been somewhat successful in attaining this objective. Articles in the press have certainly tended to foster this idea. A big play was made by the Prime Minister with the word "launch" when he spoke of the launching of a vast program of public works. Of course he linked with it a big program to combat unemployment.

Careful examination of the figures, as I have pointed out previously this session in the house, quickly reveals that the figures presented are largely normal spending by a government, expenditures that would be presented by any government. They are not new; they would be provided in good times or bad. In confirmation of that statement I wish to make reference to table 3 in a press statement presumably put out by the Minister of Finance on May 13, when he was releasing the main estimates in this house for the coming year. This table has been broken down into four headings: "Administration and operation", "Building, works and equipment", "Grants, subsidies and other items" and "Recoverable items". The total allotment for "Buildings, works and equipment" for the period 1958-59 is $927.3 million as compared with $923.5 million for the 1957-58 period provided by the previous administration in a time of economic inflation and with very little thought when under preparation of the more difficult winter ahead in 1957-58. This indicates that on May 13, 1958, there was nothing very planned or striking in the public works proposals of the present government.

In addition I remind the minister that when he spoke on his estimates on December 6, 1957, he said very clearly that where there are expenditures that involve construction which means employment, items would not be reduced. I draw his attention to the fact that not long afterward he was called upon to approve a warrant to be presented to the Governor General for expenditures for the balance of the year. The warrant is dated February 15, 1958, and it discloses reductions in construction votes totalling almost $20 million. There is a reduction in construction votes of $11,501,636. From that must be deducted some increases in construction votes but they amount to only $66,576, leaving a net reduction of $11,435,060 in the ordinary accounts, plus reductions for construction in the loan accounts of $8,501,490 making a total of $19,936,550.

There is altogether too much rhetoric and not enough reality in some of the actions of this government, and as I have said the public will soon realize this. Too much of what we hear proves to be pretty empty, almost phony when it receives careful examination. I want to bring the house right up to date. If there is anything the government has done about which we have heard much in recent weeks it has been the steps it took with regard to the housing program. Reference to housing has predominated from the time of the speech from the throne on, and we have heard a great deal about the housing program of this government in terms of it being a work-creating measure.

After the speech from the throne was announced nothing received more attention from the press than the government's $350 million housing program. Indeed with typical flair and a typical sense of publicity value the throne speech debate itself was interrupted to permit the house to deal with amendments to the National Housing Act. It was said to be an emergency measure, and it was most important that the amendments be passed involving the expenditure of $350 million for housing which would make available work for the unemployed. Within a matter of a week or perhaps two weeks after this splashy and very well-huckstered window dressing we found that this proposal was just as empty as are so many other proposals that are well advertised; as empty as a bird's nest in December.

After the bill was passed by this house the subject of the government's housing program could only command from the press and from the public the usual yawning. But the truth comes out. I want to read what the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had to say with respect to this additional $350 million, when he appeared before the standing committee on finance of the other house on Thursday, June 5, 1958 as recorded at page 29 of the minutes of proceedings of that committee. Mr. Bates said:

> —we are standing merely on residual loans . . . It is my opinion . . . that by the end of the year, if we got into it again in September—

He was referring to direct lending.

> —we might have spent $30 million or something of that kind—

—by the end of the year. What a contrast between rhetoric and deeds, promises and performance.

If there is anything in the new budget that probably had a chance of making an appeal to the average member of the public I think it was the reference to deducting for income tax purposes certain prescription drugs. Actually this again is a window dressing item, because in the budget brought in by Mr. Harris last year a standard deduction of $100 was provided to all taxpayers, and at that time on advice of the officials of the department the minister said that about 75 per cent of the taxpayers of the country had not put in claims of this kind and therefore it was a clear, new deduction.

I think the Minister of Finance has been found out on this, too. Just yesterday the Financial Post, a very authoritative and highly respected financial publication in this country, commented on the new budget in these words:

> There is flashy political appeal in some of Finance Minister Fleming's tax changes, but when citizens get them digested and when they figure out what the changes could actually mean to them, there will be widespread disappointment.
> Making drugs and medicines, eyeglasses and artificial eyes, ambulances and laboratory services exempt from income tax, will catch popular fancy.
> But the 3 per cent of income limit on such income tax deductions, which Mr. Fleming retains, still means that very few people will be sick enough to get any benefit whatever from the change. If the Tories wanted to do anything significant on reducing this human burden, they should have lowered the 3 per cent figure so long recommended by tax experts and then the sick would have had an honest benefit.
> The same thing applies to some of the other income tax changes announced. These gestures will look and sound good in the constituencies, but they will mean very little or nothing to all but a very few people—and very, very little of them.

I will have additional opportunities in the further stages provided in the budget debate to comment on some of the other items of the budget, but I want to repeat what I said on Tuesday evening; that contrary to what the minister said then there is nothing in this budget which suggests bold courses. We have a deficit not by design but by default. There is nothing new in the budget either for jobs or for business. I therefore move the following amendment, seconded by my deskmate, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill):

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house regrets that the government, in its budget proposals, has failed to cope satisfactorily with the problems of the recession in spite of the largest peacetime deficit in Canadian history and that it is moving towards greater trade restrictions at a time when other countries in the western world are moving in the opposite direction."

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think the wording of the amendment should recommend it to the house and to the country. Certainly our group is quite happy to support the amendment as it has been moved. I believe that by the time I draw to the conclusion of my remarks my colleagues, who are very good draftsmen, will be able to hand me a subamendment which will also commend itself to the country.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance on his facility in both languages and I say to him quite sincerely that I envy him in this regard. I was most interested in his budget speech. I can only say that I wish he had presented such a comprehensive budget statement in the last parliament a few months ago.

I also want to commend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) on his effort as financial critic for the official opposition. I enjoyed his remarks. In fact when there was a lot of punch in them I enjoyed them exceedingly. I congratulate him on the effort he made.

I think this budget will be taken by the people of Canada as something of a shock. One hears of shock treatment being used at times by the medical profession. I think the budget is shock treatment for the people of the country. It demonstrates that we on this side of the house were right when we said in the last parliament that the government owed it to the country to present a comprehensive budget that would hide nothing and would show the true financial picture of the nation. That was not done. There was no budget in the last parliament. There was no comprehensive statement as to what would happen in the ensuing fiscal year.

What did we have last session? When the government was criticized about economic conditions the main thing we had was the waving before the house of a so-called secret document that had been presented to the former government and not divulged by them. We had a motion in the house the other day asking that the up to date version of the same secret document be now divulged, and the government would have nothing to do with it.

I think the document that should have been divulged before the election is the budget speech of the Minister of Finance. If that document, which was kept secret until after the election, had been available to the people of the country I have no doubt that the results of the election would have been a great deal different; because the government, by refusing to disclose the economic facts facing the nation, was able to camouflage the true position of the country and to benefit in a political sense. This is an ice water budget which I think will awaken the people of Canada to the fact that on March 31 they were cheated, as has been proven by the government's lack of action since that date.

I sat on this side of the house for many years with members of the present government, and I was just as energetic in criticism of the former government as I am now. I had expected until a very few weeks ago, as a matter of fact, that the government would continue for some time on the road it took last session, a road of progressive legislation, a road to improve the economic lot of the ordinary people of the country. But I have been fooled. They have now halted that forward progress. The Conservative party which goes by a hyphenated name—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not hyphenated. There is no hyphen in it.

Mr. Argue: A double name, two separate names.

Mr. Pearson: Double-barreled mediocrity.

Mr. Argue: Last session we saw the progressive face of the Progressive Conservative party but now we see the conservative face, the Tory face with the mask off. This is a Tory budget, this is a depression budget, this is a recession budget. The best the Minister of Finance can forecast in the budget is that things are going to stay as bad as they now are throughout this year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no.

Mr. Argue: He forecast a 2 per cent increase in the gross national product. The increase in the population of the country is ordinarily about that figure, so we are going to remain just where we are with widespread unemployment, with the agricultural industry in a state of depression and in many parts in almost total collapse, without any policy, without any action by the government to improve the economic position of the people of the country.

The Minister of Finance is a great master of words. He has shown us that he can champion either side of a cause with equal ease and facility.

Mr. Pickersgill: And equal volume.

Mr. Argue: He has contradicted himself so often in the budget that it is a double-barreled budget with the barrels pointing in opposite directions. What did he say before he had completed one full page of his address as it appears in Hansard? As found on page 1231 of Hansard of June 17 he said:

> Foremost among the factors which we must keep in mind in reviewing the year 1957 is the record population increase of 552,000, an increase which brought our population at year-end to 16.9 million. About half of this growth was the result of natural increase and about half was due to the exceptionally high level of immigration.
> Some idea of the economic importance of this great increase can be gained from the fact that there are only three Canadian cities with a population in excess of half a million people.

Then he went on:

> Population growth of itself does not ensure progress, but in a country such as ours it has a special significance. It provides a greater market for our agricultural produce and for the products of our factories and reduces our vulnerability to changes in external demand. It brings us a greater diversity of talent and the means of employing it to better advantage. It reduces the per capita cost of supplying essential services in this great land.

Here we have outlined all the advantages of an increase in population, half of which was brought about by natural increase and the other half from immigration, yet the government chokes off immigration as one of its first actions on taking office. They choked off immigration which, according to the words of the Minister of Finance, had done so much for the economic welfare of this country. We have double talk from the Minister of Finance.

During the last session we heard a great deal about the improvement that was to be made in the old age pension, the improvement in the position of people obtaining social security benefits. We welcomed the improvement. What were we told? We were told that the improvement for the old age pensioner was not the end but was only the beginning. The Prime Minister said he was having an inquiry made into the social security system in the United States, and he was in a hurry to have this inquiry made. He appointed Professor Gordon Huson and set out a tight timetable of three or four months for the work. The professor said it was not long enough, so he was promptly dropped and another man, Dr. Robert Clark of the University of British Columbia, was appointed. The aim was to get a report within three or four months so that Canada would have the advantage of an improved social security system.

Well, the report has not yet been made, though it is more than four months since Professor Clark was appointed. More important, when I asked the Prime Minister on May 30 when a report would be received, and whether when it was received action would be taken this session to improve the old age pension, what did he say? He said, as reported at page 677 of Hansard for that date:

> As to whether or not action will be taken at this session of parliament, I must say that having regard to the tremendous amount of work yet to be done as set out in the speech from the throne, I would not expect it would be possible to give consideration to the report, even if received now, to enable any legislation to be brought in at this session.

The people of Canada have been fooled and hoodwinked in this regard, because they expected an early report. They expected early action. Why should parliament not sit for another three or four days this session—let us assume it would be a long debate—to discuss and pass legislation providing for an improved system of social security? The reason there is no hurry now is not that there is so much legislation before the house, the reason is that the election is over. The urgency is over, and there is plenty of time to consider the matter during another session of parliament at some time in the future. I ask the Minister of Finance if he has anything to say as to when such action will be taken.

How much did we hear from the government before the election about the need to increase commonwealth trade? This was the big pitch of the Conservative party. They were going to increase commonwealth trade, and they were going to call a conference. They did call a conference, and they received an offer which they have not yet answered. It made them dizzy when they heard it, and they have not yet recovered sufficient equilibrium to provide a reply. We thought we were going to hear something about the government's plans for freer trade, but we did not hear anything in the budget last year. We thought there might be something in the budget this year. However, the budget contains the same old Tory policy all the way through of higher and higher tariffs, more and more obstruction to international trade. This policy is not going to help industries or the people who work in industries. I suggest it is directed toward helping some of the management; it may help a few of the owners. The report of the tariff board on the woollen industry says this policy will not save the industry.

If the government wanted to take action, instead of putting up the tariff why did they not remove the excise tax on clothing? This would have increased the home market for woollens and other goods. Why not provide full employment, with the resultant tremendous increase in demand for textiles that would follow such a program? There has been no planning on trade. There is nothing in the budget except a reversion to the old Tory policy of higher and higher tariffs.

I thought last session that perhaps the new look of the Conservative party might stay. I thought perhaps the Prime Minister would use his influence, and would have sufficient influence in the cabinet, to break down trade barriers and to overcome the Tory members of the cabinet. He lost out if he did try, and I do not know whether or not he did. This provision in the budget for higher and higher tariffs has all the earmarks of being made on Bay street, or having been written in the board room of the Toronto stock exchange. Certainly the budget contains nothing for the ordinary people of this country.

I know the Minister of Finance took a long time to outline the various reductions in excise taxes, the increased exemption for medical expenses, the little here and the little there. However, there is not very much in total, only $8 million over a year as compared to the $26 million in the legislation brought in last year. I have a statement here, the source of which I shall give a little later on. It was made about similar reductions in a budget not so long ago. The statement is as follows:

> It is an illusory budget. It proposes changes, large in number but small in individual extent in every case, and seeks to create the impression of importance by their mere multiplicity. The banquet table is long. It is well dressed. The best silver and china are used. The lackeys are well-trained. But the fare is thin. The guests have left unsatisfied.

This was a statement by the present Minister of Finance in this house on March 21, 1957, as recorded at page 2553 of Hansard. I believe that is a far more appropriate and more accurate description of this budget than I am able to give. This government, with its double talk, with its progressive face of last year and its Tory face of this year, is just as inconsistent in all its actions.

We heard a great deal about the government wanting to help education in this country by providing further grants to assist young people in obtaining an adequate education.

There is really nothing in this budget except to coax the corporations to do some of the things that the government itself could be doing by way of grants for education. The Minister of Finance had this to say as far as the application of income tax law is concerned, as reported at page 1244 of Hansard:

> It is important that income tax law should receive constant attention to ensure the greatest degree of equity in its operation.

Yet the dividends from investments in corporations are still, to a very substantial extent, not taxable. We find that a married person can earn $11,350 without paying any income tax whatsoever with the exception of $60 old age security tax. Is there any equity amongst Canadian taxpayers with this provision still remaining in the budget? Have any steps been taken to tax into the federal treasury some of the enormous speculative profits that are being made in the gas pipe-line corporations of this country? How roundly the Conservatives criticized the Liberal government for their actions in connection with gas pipe lines. If we pick up almost any paper in recent days we find that Conservatives all over this country, whether they be high-placed Conservatives in Ontario or high-placed Conservatives with another name in the province of Quebec, have all got their elbows or their arms into this very lucrative deal, or as somebody says, their nose in the trough. They are still exempt. There is no capital gains tax. Yet the minister talks about equity in taxation.

Here is another instance where we find the government talking both ways. Before the election they said they were going to call another conference or reconvene the federal-provincial conference. That categorical statement was made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Finance. But there is not a word about it in the budget, not a sound or a breath. Before the election the calling of a conference was announced. After the election no interest is shown in the conference.

The agricultural producers of this country expected fair treatment by this government. They put great stock in the Agricultural Stabilization Act passed in this house last year, and in the clause which said that floor prices would be established in relation to the cost of production taking into consideration the farmer's investment and a fair labour income. The farm organizations came down here a few weeks ago after the election and said to the government, "What are the cost of production figures?" The government said, "We do not have any; there are no statistics available". The legislation says the farmer is to have the cost of production, but the government are not trying to find out what the cost of production is.

As I said earlier in the session, the western producers expected that deficiency payments on grain would be made. To show their confidence that something would be done, after the election was over they came to Ottawa and asked for deficiency payments of something in excess of $220 million in total on two crops of grain. But in the budget there is not a word about that, not a breath.

In calculating this huge deficit, no account has been taken of the possibility of deficiency payments on western grain for the last two crops. I say that at this moment this government has turned thumbs down on the farmers' request for deficiency payments. I say that the government has failed to fulfil that promise, and at this moment has no intention of fulfilling that promise; because if they had, the deficit forecast would have been much greater. The only hope for western producers at this time is to join their farm organizations in greater numbers and put a great deal more pressure on this government by way of submissions and by way of interviews.

Mr. McFarlane: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: Yes; and by way of mass delegations.

Mr. McFarlane: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: It is absolutely apparent that this government has no intention of meeting that commitment. Why would they? Apparently they lost their interest in keeping their promises on March 31.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Of the 48 prairie members, they have 47, so there is no interest in it any longer. They have all the seats now but one.

An hon. Member: Talk for your own party.

Mr. Argue: I am going to speak on behalf of the producers of western Canada, who unanimously want deficiency payments at this time. The government talks one way in that regard before the election and the other way afterward. They blamed the former government for widespread unemployment. They said they had a public works program that would put people back to work.

An hon. Member: We have.

Mr. Argue: They said they had a public works program to relieve the unemployment problem. The Minister of Finance, by his forecast of the gross national product in the present budget, says he does not expect there will be an improvement in employment and a reduction in the general unemployment picture or in the numbers of unemployed this year. If the Minister of Finance had expected unemployment to be reduced, if he had expected the unemployment situation to be solved, of necessity he would have been obliged to forecast a 5 per cent increase in the gross national product in order to have everyone working.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is with regret that I must interrupt the eloquent speech of the hon. member but, it being one o'clock, I now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

ATOMIC ENERGY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE AT FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE ON NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house, has the Prime Minister leave to revert to motions to make an announcement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in reverting to motions at this time I would like to make an announcement concerning a matter of immediate importance respecting the projected talks on the technical methods of verifying compliance with an agreement on the suspension of nuclear tests.

Exchanges on this question have taken place in recent weeks between the United States and the Soviet union, the latest of which was in the form of a letter dated June 13 last from the Soviet union, to which the United States has delivered its reply as of today's date.

Hon. members will understand that it is not for me to make public the text of this communication, which will be released in accordance with procedures agreed upon between the United States and the Soviet union. It is, however, appropriate for me to announce that Canada was invited to nominate a scientist to participate as one of the experts on the western side. It is therefore a pleasure for me to announce the appointment of Dr. O. M. Solandt, who for many years was chairman of the defence research board and is one of Canada's great scientists. Dr. Solandt is now vice chairman of the Canadian National Railways in charge of research, and has agreed to make himself available for this important and exacting assignment. Dr. Solandt's name has therefore been included in the list of western scientists contained in today's communication from the United States to the U.S.S.R.

I felt that this announcement should be made in the House of Commons simultaneously with the announcement in Washington, and that hon. members should learn of the appointment in this way rather than through the medium of the newspapers.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the house will have heard with great satisfaction the announcement which the Prime Minister has been good enough to make to us. It seems to me entirely proper that a Canadian scientist should take part in these discussions because of the advances which have been made in this country in the field of atomic science. I for one am very glad that the Canadian claim has been recognized, and I can imagine no one better qualified for this assignment than Dr. Solandt.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group may I say we are very pleased to hear the announcement by the Prime Minister, and to know that Canada is going to take such an active and direct part in assisting to solve this most complex and difficult problem. We are furthermore very glad that such an experienced and well-known Canadian citizen has been chosen for this purpose.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson.

Mr. Argue: At one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out that the Conservative party was a much different party from the Conservative party before the election as evidenced by the budget. One of the great problems remaining unsolved is the very widespread unemployment in our country. The budget is bare of any policy designed to put the unemployed back to work, and I think it is a shame and a disgrace to a nation such as our own that so much technical know-how and such a vast amount of plant and men should be idle at a time when many of our people are in great need.

The Minister of Finance brushed aside this aspect very quickly and lightly in his speech the other night. but he did not always brush the unemployment problem under the carpet in this way. In years gone by he was very concerned about the question of Canadian unemployment, and on March 22 of 1955 he had this to say, as reported on page 2261 of Hansard:

> When we entered this debate several weeks ago I am sure that all hon. members expected that the government would avail itself of this opportunity to make an announcement of whatever policy it proposed in order to grapple with a situation which is assuming emergent proportions.

He went on to say:

> This session opened two and a half months ago with a statement by the government contained in the speech from the throne as follows:
> "Some unemployment of a regional and seasonal nature is being experienced."

He said that the statement in the speech from the throne was a palpable and grotesque absurdity of understatement. That is what he said about the unemployment situation in March, 1955, at a time when there were 327,000 persons without jobs and seeking employment. However, in his budget speech, when he described the present unemployment situation as a fairly mild recession, there were no less than 556,000 persons at that time without jobs and seeking work. The minister, when he was a private member in 1955 and when unemployment was a great deal less, said something should have been done, but certainly this budget is bare with respect to action to alleviate the unemployment situation.

There are many things which should have been done in this budget; one thing certainly was to increase the income tax exemptions. The present exemptions of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married couple are completely inadequate. Because we feel there should be an increase in income tax exemptions, I wish to move a motion seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) as follows:

> That the amendment be further amended by adding thereto the following words:
> "This house further regrets that the government contemplates no action at this session to recognize the loss of purchasing power to the majority of Canadian citizens because of the lowered value of the dollar as related to consumer goods and prices, by amending the Income Tax Act so as to raise the amount of permissible income to single and married persons without taxation.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Argue: We have left it as a general principle rather than putting in an exact figure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I do not mind answering questions; as a matter of fact I agree with the statement made by a very prominent member of this house—the present Minister of Finance —on January 24, 1956, wherein he said that if the minister of finance was not prepared to go as far as Conservative policy advocated in this respect, namely $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons without dependants, then at least he hoped that he would take a generous step in that direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What did we do last December?

Mr. Argue: That is precisely how far we would like to see the government go. I feel the words of the Minister of Finance back in 1956 were well chosen—when he said that if the government would not go that far they should at least take a generous step forward. In the hope that there might be a single Progressive Conservative of this house who will support the motion, we have made it in general terms, trusting that it would command the greatest amount of support. However, as a direct reply to a direct question, I think the Minister of Finance was right in those days when he said the exemption should be raised to $1,500 for a single person and to $3,000 for married persons.

Mr. Chown: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Has he figured out what such an exemption would add to the present budget deficit?

Mr. Argue: I have looked into this very carefully in the light of the considered statement by the Minister of Finance back in 1956, and I feel that the statement he made at that time was correct. The statement the Minister of Finance made in the past was that this government would not hesitate to finance by means of a deficit. We are quite prepared to see the deficit go to any extent necessary to put people back to work, and we are prepared to increase exemptions to this amount. We would go one step further. We would start taxing some of the millionaires and some of the multi-millionaires who in recent years have made millions of dollars profit, without tax, under the policy of the former Liberal government, and who are doing the same today under the policy of the Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Assiniboia has the floor.

Mr. Argue: The official opposition was tried as the government of this country for 22 years and was found wanting, and was very rightly turned out of office on June 10 last, but the new government that has taken office since is no different. They took a short step forward when they were only a minority in this house, but they are now back to the economic policies which resulted in their predecessors being turned out of office. We say to the people of this country at this time that there is only one movement that should be supported by people who are progressively minded, or liberally minded and that is the C.C.F. movement, and we look forward to the day when the people of this country will accept our policies. We are quite pleased with the results of the elections in the province of Manitoba which showed that the C.C.F. party is the only party in that province which is growing at this time. We ask this house to support the proposition that income tax exemptions should be increased.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Would the hon. member permit a question? He said he looked forward to a day when the people will accept his policy, but in the tirade we have just heard I did not hear much about policy. I heard a good deal of criticism but no constructive suggestions.

Mr. Argue: Is that your maiden speech?

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the amendment to the amendment, may I say a word about the amendment itself, which reads, in substance:

> That this house regrets that the government in its budget proposals has failed to cope satisfactorily with the problems of the recession in spite of the largest peacetime deficit in Canadian history—

I accept the amendment to that point, but I raise for consideration the latter part of the amendment which seems to me to duplicate an amendment moved on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The latter part reads as follows:

> —and that it is moving towards greater trade restrictions at a time when other countries in the western world are moving in the opposite direction.

Now the amendment moved by the official opposition on the address in reply to the speech from the throne read:

> We respectfully represent to Your Excellency that a high level of employment and prosperity in Canada requires a high and expanding level of international trade, and that this will be promoted more effectively by vigorous measures for the expansion of trade with all countries than by efforts to divert from one country to another.

It seems to me that the second half of each amendment is essentially on the same subject, and I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) would agree, in the absence of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), to the deletion of the second half of the amendment.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, with great respect I should like to call to your attention the fact that our earlier amendment dealt with the question of the expansion of trade as opposed to the diversion of trade. This amendment deals not with one form of trade restriction, which might be diversion, but with trade restrictions generally, and puts those trade restrictions in the context of the general policies of other countries leading in the opposite direction. In other words, the amendment seeks to draw a contrast between the trade policy embodied in this budget and the policies which are being followed by other countries in the world, and I should have thought with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that this distinguishes it from the amendment we raised to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I call this to your attention in case you may wish to give the matter further consideration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would wish something to be said from this side of the house on the question that has been raised. As I understand the rules of the house, it is that there may not be duplication of debate in the sense that when there has been a debate on a subject, that debate may not be revived during the session by the introduction of what is in substance the same question. It is not necessary that the second motion or amendment be in precisely identical terms; it is a question whether debate on the subject is, in essence, revived by the second measure, motion, amendment, or whatever it may be, which it is sought to introduce.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has sought to distinguish the motion he introduced on May 13 from the second part of the amendment introduced this morning by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) by saying that they both relate to trade but that the earlier motion relates rather to the diversion of trade, thus seeking to contrast diversion of trade with expansion of trade, whereas the second half of this morning's amendment purports to condemn the government because it is said that there has been a movement toward greater trade restriction.

Looking at the matter, not in terms simply of the words but in terms of the substance, it is perhaps clear that there will be some duplication of debate. At the same time, I believe that it will be the desire of all hon. members that there should be the fullest opportunity for the discussion of trade policy during this debate. In response to previous requests I reviewed the position and policy of the government in relation to trade, with particular reference to our trade relations with the United States and the efforts we are making to expand trade within the commonwealth, and while it may well be that the amendment could be more happily worded to allow the fullest discussion on those points, I for one would not wish to see any undue limitation of the discussion of the trade questions and policies that are directly presented to the house by the budget. I may have my own opinion about how far this particular amendment strays away from those policies that were put before the house in the budget speech or which are raised directly or by implication in any of the budget resolutions. But, Mr. Speaker, I do think in this debate, as long as there is no trespass on the matters that were included in the earlier debate, it would be the wish of the house to have a full opportunity to discuss those questions of trade that were raised by the budget.

Mr. Speaker: I am prepared to accept the view as expressed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) with the reservation that he claims there is a distinction and perhaps I may try to find a distinction in the course of the debate. No one wants to proscribe a free-ranging debate of the kind of the budget debate and I accept the second part of this amendment as relating to the fiscal policy of the government related to trade and therefore opening the door for this kind of discussion.

May I now put the motion moved by way of amendment to the amendment. It is moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

That the amendment be further amended by adding thereto the following words:

This house further regrets that the government contemplates no action at this session to recognize the loss of purchasing power to the majority of Canadian citizens because of the lowered value of the dollar as related to consumer goods and prices, by amending the Income Tax Act so as to raise the amount of permissible income to single and married persons without taxation.

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the house has heard two vigorous speeches from hon. gentlemen who take their roles as critics rather literally. As I listened to their rhetoric—indeed to their declamations—I was reminded of Disraeli's remark, "How much easier it is to be critical than to be correct". Such congratulations as I may extend to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) I must reserve first to congratulations upon the confidence his party has demonstrated in him, and properly so, in designating him for the important and onerous role of financial critic, and second upon the pleasant manner of his speaking in this house.

From the gallery of this chamber it has been my privilege to hear every financial critic since the year 1927: Guthrie, Bennett, Ralston, Lawson, Hanson, Harris, and more recently the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the latter I suppose being the veteran budget critic of all time. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in taking this role has joined distinguished company and I extend my wishes to him in the words once used by the late Ernest Lapointe, "I wish him luck, but not too much".

I spoke of the onerous role of financial critic that now falls to the lot of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Onerous and arduous that role will be for the hon. gentleman as long as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) occupies the treasury benches as Minister of Finance. But what disappointed me in the speech of the new financial critic—and I must confess it immediately—was that he fell into the same error as his immediate predecessor, the former member for Coast-Capilano, in attempting to substitute angry scattered jibes and epithets for reasoned consecutive argument. May I say with respect that his was a speech conceived in angry frustration and delivered with a sense of bitter repression and electoral disappointment for these are the qualities which regrettably have characterized hon. gentlemen opposite since June 10 last.

Not yet have they reconciled themselves to the facts of political life. Not yet have they recovered from the complex they have of their divine right to rule. Perhaps it is because of that that in his speech and in the amendment which he moved the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has succeeded in getting on both sides of every issue, has succeeded in begging any question and has succeeded in blowing hot and cold on every problem. When he was speaking I set out to refresh my memory of the words of Samuel Butler, and these are they:

He was in logic a great critic
Profoundly skilled in analytic
He could distinguish and divide
A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.
On either which he would dispute,
Confute, change hand and still confute.

The speech of my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was merely a political stump speech, a warmed-over election hustings version. What serious contribution did the hon. gentleman make to this debate?

Some hon. Members: None.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In the midst of his tirade of abuse—and that is all it was—he did make one suggestion. He suggested removal of the excise tax on clothing made in Canada. He was apparently oblivious to the fact that under GATT we must not discriminate and the tax would have to be removed from all goods whether Canadian or imported. How would that help? That is but a sample of the confused economic thinking of hon. gentlemen opposite. I could multiply it many times but I will not take time this afternoon to do so.

An hon. Member: It isn't so much confused economic thinking as ignorance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I said that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River blew hot and cold. It seems to me that the Liberal critic was in favour of balanced budgets, certainly he was opposed to the deficit in this budget but equally he was in favour of larger deficits under existing circumstances. On Tuesday night he waxed indignant and sarcastic about the present deficit yet did he not then and does he not today advocate policies which would result in a much larger deficit? He appeared to be in favour of what he called quick economic stimulus by way of tax cuts, yet at other times he appeared to be in favour of tax maintenance. I thought I detected today that he was in favour of reduced expenditures but he was equally in favour of and called for higher payments. He was in favour of protection for Canadian industry and against all means of protecting Canadian industry. He was in favour of the expansion of trade within the commonwealth and against all means of achieving such expansion.

He was in favour of additional assistance to the provinces and to the municipalities yet rigidly adhered to the policies of the former government, rejected and discarded by the electorate, which prevented additional assistance to the provinces and the municipalities of this country. He was against dumping but in favour of the legislation which permits it. Never in such a short period of time did I ever hear one speaker gore himself on the horns of so many dilemnas and I reflected, "Oh, Consistency, thou art a jewel!"

As I listened in incredulous fascination to the hon. gentleman I realized that the Liberal party continues as a house divided against itself. I realized how delicately and indecisively the hon. gentleman had to walk the tight rope in order to satisfy at the same time the Winnipeg Free Press and the party's eastern moguls.

The amendment moved by the Liberal party which apparently is to have the support of the C.C.F. consists of what? It is nothing but sophistry, hollow equivocation, and nothing could better demonstrate the political bankruptcy of the Liberal party. The C.C.F. sub-amendment certainly does not improve upon it.

Mr. Deschatelets: What about unemployment?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What about unemployment? I will tell you plenty about it and I will make it clear who is responsible for the present situation in unemployment before I am done if that is the issue the hon. gentleman wants to raise.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River laboured long and hard this morning to have this house and the country believe that the conditions of recession and unemployment have been a direct result of the economic and fiscal policies of this government. In fact, he would have us believe that it was contributed to by the failure of the government to present its budget earlier, perhaps last autumn, and by other alleged deficiencies which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River described in terms rather more vivid than accurate. Let us examine these allegations. Let us put the situation in perspective. I suggest the best way to do this is to ask ourselves this question: What would have been the situation in Canada today if on June 10 last, by peradventure or misadventure, my hon. friend's party had been re-elected?

I can tell you exactly what the situation would be. First, there would have been no budget or financial accounting of any kind at least until late this spring. This government did give a financial outline on December 6 last. Hon. members opposite have screamed for an autumn budget knowing full well that there would have been none if they had been in power. Actually all they were doing was administering another kick to the already well-bruised Walter Harris.

Second, there would have been no tax reduction as occurred last December. The Canadian people would have been deprived of the benefit of substantial tax cuts in personal income, corporation and excise taxes amounting to $178 million. These present advocates of tax reductions, of a tax holiday indeed, though that was not mentioned today, would have pursued the unrealistic policies laid down in the last Harris budget. I say, that that budget was as complete a miscalculation of the then existing economic position of this country as it was of the mood of the Canadian people.

Third, there would have been no increases in old age pensions beyond the Walter Harris-William Benidickson figure of $6 a month. There would have been no increases in disability pensions, in blind pensions, in war veterans allowances, no change in the Pension Act, no change in the Unemployment Insurance Act. Hospital insurance could not conceivably have become effective anywhere before January 1, 1959, and probably not then. The advantages of these additional large sums in alleviating a Liberally inspired and created recession would not have been available.

Fourth, there would have been no additional money for housing. Housing starts had almost ceased when my hon. friends opposite went out of power. Under their policy recession would have become full-out depression. This morning the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River called the $400 million for housing, "splashy and well-huckstered window dressing." The people who are now and will be living in these homes will long remember that outrageous comment from the hon. gentleman.

Fifth, I say that the tight money condition, the unwise credit restrictions, the discouragement of capital works and investment, basic causes of the recession, would have continued and plunged us ever deeper into an economic decline. We would have continued with the highest interest rates in our history and a general scarcity of credit.

Sixth, there would have been no additional moneys made available for stepping up the program of public works and for national development.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where are they?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The impact of these additional amounts upon the national economy would have been lost with disastrous results to the people.

Seventh, there would have been no additional assistance to the provinces. The old take it or leave it attitude would have persisted.

Mr. Habel: By telegram.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): By telegram. That is exactly what my hon. friend understands. He understands nothing else but that type of operation.

Mr. Habel: Take it or leave it, by telegram.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have observed my hon. friend in the house for a long time and I say he ought to have lived in the days of the sailing ships because he generates enough wind to blow a ship across the Atlantic.

Eighth, I say that the Atlantic adjustment grants would not have been provided. Those sections of our economy most in need of help would have been deprived of $100 million.

Ninth, there would have been no program of stabilization of agricultural prices and recession would have struck the farmers of Canada in a much more vividly pronounced fashion.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Tenth, the wheat surplus would have continued to pile up. Sales of wheat would have continued to decline and the amount in storage would have increased. There would also have been no trade or economic conference. The old policy of drift, the old policy of wait and see in relation to trade with the United Kingdom would have continued.

Mr. Pickersgill: No tariffs against the British.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The old policy of diverting trade from the United Kingdom to the United States would have continued. Finally, I say that without the benefit of the new policies adopted by the present government unemployment would have mounted to figures at least double those which actually occurred.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As I have said, under the Liberal policies of credit restriction recession would have become depression. These are but a few of the consequences which might have occurred without a change in the direction of the fiscal, monetary and commercial policies of the nation. It was a change of government, a change from the principles of the last Harris budget, with which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was so intimately connected, which saved this country from a major economic disaster. It was and is the realistic policies set forth in the speech from the throne and in the budget of last Tuesday night which will direct the paths of the Canadian people to greater and more challanging development, more challenging accomplishments and goals.

On Tuesday night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said, in an attempt to catch the headlines, that the budget was a sick budget. Did anybody in the house fail to realize on Tuesday night that all the sick faces were on the opposite side? More properly the hon. gentlemen ought to have called it a physician's budget, a budget designed to heal the many ills to which this government fell heir from its predecessor. He claimed that it was a wait and see budget, a slow motion budget. What nonsense! Never in the whole history of our country has there been a government which has attempted so much in such a short time. Yes, never has a government moved so rapidly its objectives to accomplish.

Then the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River used harsh words about the government respecting the projected deficit. He said this morning, I believe, that it was directly attributable to political commitments rather than to economic policy. What are these commitments? Which of these commitments would he like us to abandon? What things has the government done involving financial outlays that he would seek to have undone? I think he should have told us that. I think hon. gentlemen opposite who speak later in the debate should tell us.

But, if I interpret my hon. friend correctly, and I think I do, if his policies were followed, certainly if his leader's policies had been followed, there could be no doubt that the deficit projected would have been at least $500 million more than what it is. How can he have it both ways? How can he manage, Janus-like, to face in both directions at the same time? Actually my hon. friend, I venture to suggest, resembles John Bunyan's great grandfather, "but a waterman, looking one way and rowing another".

No one denies that $648 million is an exceedingly sizeable surplus.

Some hon. Members: Surplus?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Deficit, I am sorry. But it should cause dismay to no one. It represents 12.2 per cent of our total expenditure this year. There have been many times in our history, both under Liberal and Conservative governments, when the deficit has represented a very much higher percentage of expenditure.

To go back to 1909, if you will, to the great Liberal finance minister, W. S. Fielding, he had no concern over a deficit which represented 35 per cent of the total expenditure of that day. Nor had Mr. Dunning when his last budget before the 1930 election showed a deficit of 19 per cent of expenditure or when his first budget after the 1935 election showed a deficit of 14.6 per cent. Related to the gross national product, there have been many occasions when we have had larger deficits than that now projected. Nor are we alone in this country at this time with this particular problem. In the United States the best recent forecast indicated a deficit of between $11 billion and $13 billion, figures substantially higher on a per capita basis than that forecast in this budget.

But the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River reserved his harshest strictures for the calculation of the amount of the deficit. In effect he alleged a type of juggling of accounts to achieve a bookkeeping deficit smaller than the actual one. He bases this upon the winding up or liquidation of the defence equipment replacement account. On Tuesday night he went overboard in alleging incorrectly that provision had not been made in the deficit figure for $190 million for the old age security fund or $70 million for the hospital insurance scheme, but that he corrected today. He did try, however, to bring in the C.N.R. deficit and other non-budgetary items although I am sure he is well aware from his experience that these have not been included in budgetary deficits on previous occasions.

But what of his strictures regarding the defence equipment replacement account? This account was nothing more than a bookkeeping kitty that the former government tucked away for convenient purposes to avoid parliamentary control of certain defence expenditures. At one time it was as high as $310 million. It is now $165 million. If the hon. gentleman suggests that the liquidation of the final balance of $165 million in this account distorts the budgetary position, then what does he say about the distortion when the former government reduced it by over $100 million? His argument, if it is logical and it is not, applies equally to the former government and he condemns his own colleagues by his ill-considered blasts in this respect.

I suggest to the house that there is no doubt that this account should have been eliminated several years ago. Indeed, at one time a former minister of finance ordered that it be liquidated within a period of three years. If his orders had been obeyed, what would my hon. friend have said? Would he then have charged the minister of finance with distortion, his own minister of finance with whom he served in such close relationship? Would he have charged him with distortion of the position? This government considered, in accordance with what is its universal policy, that parliamentary control of defence expenditures ought to be restored and that this bookkeeping device for circumventing parliament ought to be abandoned. It was, therefore, an honourable, honest course and was stated clearly, specifically and openly in the budget speech.

No one in the press gallery misunderstood, although my hon. friend may have done so. There was no concealment. The minister came right out in the open so that he who runs may read. I suggest this course was in refreshing contrast to the way in which previous ministers of finance were accustomed to tucking away $310 million in this account for the purpose of distorting the budgetary picture. What I want to emphasize is that this account has been a non-budgetary account used, however, by previous governments for budgetary purposes. This will be ended, and it will be liquidated as a non-budgetary cash requirement. The cash position of the government is not changed, but the position of parliament and parliamentary control over the expenditure is greatly changed.

My hon. friend spoke at some length about giving a quick, economic stimulus to our economy. How much additional deficit would he think would be required to meet his objective? Certainly, the election objective of his leader was tax cuts, both permanent tax cuts and tax holidays. This objective could be achieved in only two ways, either by substantially increasing the amount of the deficit or substantially reducing the amount of other expenditures. My hon. friend makes no suggestion today that would eliminate any of the major expenditures of the government. He has not told us, but I assume he would not want to go back to the $46 per month old age pension for which he and his minister of finance were responsible. I assume that there are no public works he would want to eliminate. I assume, therefore, that the only way my hon. friend would go about achieving the election objectives of his party would be by substantially increasing the deficit.

Would he tell us what would be a proper amount of deficit, under existing circumstances? Suppose my hon. friend were minister of finance today, what would his deficit be? What would he have done? Perhaps he could have some of his friends who sit around him tell us. In the recent election campaign the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) definitely achieved an all-time record for election promises and commitments. It is strange that during the six weeks of this session he has not repeated a single one of those election promises, those election panaceas. The hon. gentleman repeated not one of them today, either.

Mr. Pearson: That does not happen to be true, but that is all right.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will establish that in just a moment. What did he promise? First, he promised a tax cut of $400 million. Then when that did not seem to be catching on, he raised the ante to $500 million.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true, either.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I have the press clippings here if my hon. friend would like me to take the time to read them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go ahead.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has not denied either of these proposals. I have the press clippings here if the hon. gentleman wishes me to refer to them. He raised the ante to $500 million.

Mr. Pickersgill: Produce the evidence.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It is on the record plenty of times. Here it is:

> Liberal Leader Pearson has boosted the ante on his party's tax cut proposals to "perhaps $500 million from the original $400 million".

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

This article is dated March 13, 1958.

Mr. Pearson: Who said that?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This is Liberal Leader Pearson speaking, at least, I assume it is.

Mr. Pearson: From what are you reading?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This particular clipping I have here is by a most responsible press gallery reporter, Clark Davey, and the dateline of the article is Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia. I believe this quotation has been used thousands of times, and the hon. gentleman has not denied it once.

Mr. Pearson: I have.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): When even the $500 million additional fell flat, what did he do? In a last desperate strategem, he promised an additional plan, a tax holiday. This tax holiday was to be for at least six weeks. Did the hon. gentleman not say that? Would he like me to read that to him, too?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will be glad to read that to him, but I am not going to be diverted from this speech. Personal income tax collections during the past fiscal year were about a billion and a half. A tax holiday of six weeks would represent, as a minimum, about $175 million. There would be possibly a total additional deficit, with what the hon. gentleman suggested himself during the election campaign, of at least $675 million, and I think I am putting it at a very modest figure.

What have we heard of this tax holiday? Have we heard it mentioned in this house since the session opened? Did we hear about it today? Has it been confined to limbo? What have we heard about the doubling of the marriage exemption allowance? The Leader of the Opposition promised the marriage allowance would be increased from $2,000 to $4,000 for the first three years of married bliss. I thought that was a sheer stroke of political genius. Would anyone in this house doubt that was the beloved brain child of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)? I am sure the hon. gentleman will not deny the paternity of that. I said in the election campaign that the voice was the voice of Pearson, but the hand was the hand of Pickersgill.

At first I thought that this was an insult to the young women of Canada, that such an additional incentive to marriage should have been required. Then I was told that it applied equally to the first marriage or to the number of joys which apparently Tommy Manville has achieved. What would be the mundane life of a member of parliament with these anticipated tax exemptions as promised by the Leader of the Opposition? For this great boon to the newlyweds, both new and renewed, apparently the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition ascribed a figure of $25 million. The experts with whom I have consulted disagree with him. They ascribe to this delectable proposal a cost of $100 million to $125 million, but I am unable to discover whether they are bachelors or whether they are widowers beyond redemption. I confess that my mind is so taken up with just the contemplation of the delights of these proposals that I cannot pay much attention to the beliefs of experts on this subject. After all, they probably would seek to controvert the well-known fact that two can live as cheaply as one.

The temptation to tarry on such a subject is great, but I must hurry on to what my hon. friend said on the subject of trade. Since this government was formed 364 days ago it has been subjected to a barrage from the heavy artillery opposite on its trade policies. No other subject seems to have so delighted the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as the subject of trade. Whatever steps the government has taken, these hon. gentlemen have attacked the government. On no other subject have they ventured into so many inconsistencies; indeed, on trade the opposition in this parliament has been consistent only in its inconsistencies, and it has been given delightful leadership in that respect by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask my hon. friend this question. What does he think about the British proposal?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will tell my hon. friend before I am finished.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Tell me now.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will tell my hon. friend what I think of his reaction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Tell me what yours is.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will tell you what I think of his reaction. In what he said he reminded me of the statement of Henri Bourassa that the only policy of liberalism is to have no policy and the only principle of liberalism is to have no principles.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is yours?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Over the years hon. gentlemen opposite on many occasions have voted against the holding of a commonwealth trade and economic conference.

Some hon. Members: Rubbish.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will produce the evidence on another occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Produce it now.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Year after year hon. gentlemen opposite voted against—

Mr. Pickersgill: Produce the evidence.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I will produce the evidence on another occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: You will not produce it because there is none.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No one knows better than does the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the evidence is there. This party succeeded in having a commonwealth trade and economic conference called through the inspiration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and because of the Prime Minister's faith and the faith of this party in the commonwealth and its future as a political and economic force in today's world. Since that conference was arranged hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to play it down, to minimize it as much as possible. Did anybody ever see such glum faces as there were a week ago this day when the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in this chamber spoke of the forthcoming commonwealth conference as working "a great advance in commonwealth co-operation in trade and commerce." Their faces were even glummer when Mr. Macmillan spoke of the remarkable results of the trade mission to Britain. By every means, direct and indirect, they have sought to minimize and destroy the effect of that mission. I quite agree that nothing has been more calculated to set the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate agiggling.

Mr. Chevrier: Why can we not get the report?

Mr. Pickersgill: What has it accomplished?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No one should be surprised at these inconsistencies. I had hoped to take a little time to speak about some of the past record of hon. gentlemen opposite of the fact that they piled up the greatest trade deficit in Canadian history, how they piled up the greatest trade deficit with the United States and allowed it to rise to the astronomical figure of $1,280 million. Yes, Mr. Speaker, these were the men who were responsible for the shifting of our trade from the United Kingdom to the United States. They were responsible for the loss of our markets in the United Kingdom for our agricultural products. These were the men who sold the textile industry down the river, who sacrificed it on the altar of expediency and jeopardized the jobs of tens of thousands of Canadian workers. That is the record that can be produced at any time.

I want to speak of the refreshing contrast to that record there is in what this government has done in under a year and, may I say, a year spent in an atmosphere which was almost entirely one of crisis and emergency. Our trade deficit with the United States has been reduced by one-fifth. Again this year imports have fallen off much more sharply than have exports. Our pattern of trade with the United Kingdom is moving quietly but effectively toward its former tradition. The convening of the commonwealth trade and economic conference, the trade mission to Britain, the reduction of the huge wheat surpluses are constructive, dynamic forward steps, the full import of which will make themselves felt in the coming fiscal periods.

Attempts have been made—and they are made in the Liberal amendment—to paint the present budget as moving towards greater trade restrictions. That is what the amendment states.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what the budget says.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): By some it has been suggested that this marks a turning of our backs upon the principle of multilateral trade envisaged by GATT. In my opinion nothing could be further from the truth. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River says that the budget proposals went back to Bennett. I am one member who is not ashamed of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, the man who saved this country from economic ruin. Some day I will take the time of this house to set the records straight. No hon. gentleman knows that better than does the Leader of the Opposition because he was an integral part of the policies which were propounded by the Bennett government. Yes, the hon. gentleman knows very well that that is true for he occupied a senior—

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. member what he means by saying that I was part of the integral policies of the Bennett administration?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I want to say this to the hon. gentleman. No member of the civil service of Canada played a larger part than did the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition in setting policy or formulating and outlining policies for the then Bennett government. Everyone knows that to be so. It ill behooves him to deny it.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks that civil servants are responsible for the policies of the Canadian government?

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I want to say to my hon. friend that, so far as he is concerned, he was given a special status in the Stevens commission. He was given a status in various matters where his opinion was made known profoundly on the policies. As I say it ill behooves him to deny what I have now stated.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Stevens left Bennett.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, yes. I can tell the hon. gentleman something in respect to that.

Mr. Denis: Talk about Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not know that there is much that I could talk about that the hon. member for St. Denis would understand.

Mr. Pickersgill: You can include the rest of us too.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In a full year of office this government has taken no steps to give tariff or valuation protection to any industry except agriculture. Does my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) object to that fact? With the exception of a group of miscellaneous tariff items in this budget, some of which involve small increases, but more of which involve duty reductions, and none of which have any major economic significance, all the tariff changes which have been made in this budget have been made on the recommendation of the tariff board. These tariff board reports, with one exception, were made at the request of the previous government.

When supporters of that former government say to us, as they have said today, that these tariff changes are restrictions on trade—and that is what the amendment says—what do they really mean? Are they saying that they would have declined to implement the reports of the tariff board on references which they themselves made? Are they admitting that these references were intended by them as purely dilatory tactics to get them over the embarrassment of dealing with these matters until after an election or what in fact does my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River really mean?

The changes which have been made are changes negotiated in accordance with GATT and in full conformity with GATT. Wool fabrics are in a class by themselves. The desperate condition of the textile industry after years of Liberal neglect compelled some action, the full nature and import of which was clearly set forth in the budget address. My hon. friend would weep crocodile tears for the British exporters. To what extent will they suffer from the increase that has been put on in this budget? My hon. friend said that it would cast a chill on the conference. I have greater faith in the British people and greater faith in the commonwealth than to believe, as he does, that this would cast a chill on what I believe may be the greatest movement forward in trade that we have had in many a year.

I want to say a word in respect to the prospective amendments to section 35 of the Custom Act. My personal view is that Canada made a grave mistake in 1948 when she amended the then provisions of that key valuation section of the Customs Act. Bit by bit, under pressure from many parts of Canada—and nobody knows this better than does the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—the former government tried to restore some of the teeth in the former section. They did not succeed.

Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy for any Canadian industry which cannot face reasonable and proper competition from imported goods. There is no use in having an industry in this country which has to be pampered and petted by excessively protective measures and which cannot face foreign competition on reasonable terms. But what this amendment is designed to do—as the Minister of Finance has outlined—is to eliminate foreign dumping. Surely there is no member of this house who wants Canadian industry, Canadian workmen, yes and Canadian agriculture, to be compelled to compete with foreign goods sold at less than their cost of production plus a reasonable amount for selling costs and profit. Yet, that is what my hon. friend the member for Kenora-Rainy River appeared to say this morning.

If preventing goods from entering Canada at less than their cost of production, thereby destroying the jobs of Canadian working men, is protection, then as far as I am concerned I am for that type of protection. As long as I have a vote in this house I will not vote to compel Canadian working men to compete with foreign dumped goods.

I have taken a substantial length of time on trade and tariff matters, but for that I do not apologize because the next few months will be critical and crucial ones for this nation's trading future. I believe it is the hope of all hon. members, wherever they sit in this house, that those who will assemble in Montreal on September 15 next for the great commonwealth trade and economic conference may have the wisdom and guidance to enable them to bring about a successful conclusion to that conference, one which will be advantageous to all nations.

(Translation):

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of representing in this house the great riding of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. Therefore I would like to stop a minute or two at the very beginning of my remarks, to recall to hon. members the memory of the Hon. Alcide Cote who for many years was member for that riding before being appointed postmaster general on February 13, 1952. Unfortunately, the Lord deprived us too soon of his many loyal services not only to the riding he represented, but to the country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, before tackling the budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I would like to stress a particular fact which is of interest to the riding I represent in this house.

You are aware that the Liberal party which guided this country's destinies until June 1957, had endowed St. Johns with a development that we had earnestly wished and that we highly appreciate; I refer to the Royal Military College of St. Johns. However, Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss in my duty if I did not seek redress on behalf of the cadets now attending that college. Mr. Speaker, we have three military colleges in Canada and you know that at Kingston a cadet who begins his studies there is allowed to finish them at that college. Now, it is different in the province of Quebec where we are facing a situation that should end at once; that of having French-speaking Canadians start their course at St. Johns and then having to expatriate themselves to Kingston to finish their studies and obtain their diploma. It is a flagrant injustice and that is why I rise today to claim justice on behalf of our French-speaking fellow citizens.

Very often, French Canadians who have been getting high marks in their final exams at St. Johns are seriously handicapped when transferred to Kingston to finish their studies, frequently because of their inadequate knowledge of English. I am pointing out this injustice and I know that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), who was in St. Johns recently, will look into the matter in so far as his responsibilities warrant. Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that if justice is not done, I will rise in this house as often as necessary to claim equal treatment at Kingston for the young French Canadian graduates of the Collège militaire royal de Saint-Jean.

The Budget—Mr. Dupuis

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) on his scathing and forceful rebuttal this morning, to the first budget speech of the Minister of Finance. The other evening, all eyes in this country were turned on the Minister of Finance. It was the first Conservative budget since 1935 and, as you will see in a moment, Mr. Speaker, it does indeed deserve the name "conservative", for it stuck to some old practices of previous Tory governments.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance was one of those who, until 1957, were financial critics of the opposition. I would not like to go over all the statements made by the Minister of Finance when he sat on the opposition side. He was often vehement, sometimes sarcastic and seldom clear. I will limit myself to one extract of a statement from the Minister of Finance, who, speaking in the name of the opposition in March 1957, and addressing himself to the Liberal government, said:

> He has debased and humiliated parliament which has become the pawn of the government and its friends. He has crushed under a heavy taxation burden the population of Canada which this year will have to pay an unprecedented amount of taxes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, those words of the Minister of Finance when he was in the opposition would apply very well today to the present government. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the then financial critic of the opposition blamed the federal government for taking what he called the lion's share in the tax field. And you will remember that some premiers of the provinces united their efforts with our present Minister of Finance to claim their fair share of the tax fields in this country. You have heard the premier of Ontario, and the premier of Quebec complaining loudly of injustice, misunderstanding and inadequate funds to administer their provinces.

I still remember the voice of the premier of Quebec when I was a member of the provincial legislature. Every day he used to say to the Liberals in the opposition: "Tell your friends in Ottawa to stop taking 73 cents out of every tax dollar, leaving us only 27 cents to administer the provinces and the municipalities!"

An hon. Member: There's a real punch!

An hon. Member: There's a fine speech, for you!

An hon. Member: A very, very telling point!

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Mr. Dupuis: Well, Mr. Speaker, today I ask those who wish to interrupt me that they kindly ask their friends to return to the provinces what is rightly theirs and is being refused to them under this budget.

The sacred Frost-Duplessis-Diefenbaker union has given a show which today has but pitiful results. And now we have heard the Minister of Finance who, for years, flailed the Liberal regime, came out for balanced budgeting and every year, in the budget debate, indulged in such solemn promises as: "bring us to power and we will settle that ourselves".

Well, the people of Canada have returned the Conservatives to power. It has been said in this house and elsewhere that the present government was put into power because of the vision of a great man. So, the people of Canada expected a great change, a great deal of good from the promises made by our friends opposite, and it is finding out today, not only that the Prime Minister had visions, but that the people itself also had visions in believing that the government would do it justice.

Mr. Speaker, we have—

An hon. Member: The hon. member has obsessions—

Mr. Dupuis: Does anyone wish to ask me a question?

Mr. Parizeau: I said the hon. member has obsessions.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I would beg my hon. friend to allow me to finish my speech. Should he wish to have his own obsessions, he may take time out to have them. I wish he would let me finish my speech.

Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask hon. members to allow the hon. member for Ste. Marie to finish his speech.

Mr. Dupuis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I represent the constituency of St. Jean—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I beg your pardon. The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville has the floor.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you have mentioned the constituency of Ste. Marie; I am not ashamed of it; it is one of the finest in the province.

Mr. English: You could not manage to get re-elected there.

Mr. Dupuis: Frankly, I was not resorting to the electoral methods of the Union Nationale. Since you indulged in petty politics as deputy minister of colonization in the Quebec government, you should be the last one to raise your voice here—

Mr. English: Mr. Speaker, I never was deputy minister of colonization. The hon. member should brush up on his history; he would then learn that I was, at the time, deputy minister of game and fisheries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Once again, I would beg hon. members to kindly let the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville go on with his speech.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, when we probe this budget and think of all the election promises made during the last campaign—

An hon. Member: By the Liberals.

Mr. Dupuis: —we notice quite a difference. We had been promised substantial tax cuts—

An hon. Member: They were cut.

An hon. Member: Mr. Pearson had promised them too!

Mr. Dupuis: But then he would have done so.

They had promised to take care of such problems as those of the small wage earner, unemployment and federal-provincial relations.

Now, what sort of budget have we got? Mr. Speaker, while there is need in this country, we are presented with a budget which I would call funeral budget, i.e. a lower tax on cut flowers, a permissible deduction of ambulance costs, and a tax rebate on rat poison. That is what the Minister of Finance is submitting to us in a period of emergency.

Mr. Ricard: Remember bubble gum?

Mr. Dupuis: This budget also shows up what I would call an inflated and pointless love for England.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Minister of Finance that, in his past speeches, which, as a matter of fact, I have studied very carefully believe me, he often referred to French history. Now, you remember, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Finance too will remember, as he knows French history so well—that Marie Antoinette when she was told that the people of Paris were pressing round the palace gates, replied: "What are they growling about? Let them eat cake!"

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are living these times over again. We have, at the gates of parliament hill, unemployed people, farmers, provinces, asking for a fair deal. And the Minister of Finance replies: "What are they growling about? I've just reduced the sales tax on rat poison." Mr. Speaker, some people think problems can be solved in that way.

In 1957—

An hon. Member: Now, that was pretty good!

Mr. Dupuis: Good enough to be member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville for much longer than my hon. friends would like.

In 1957—of course I again revert to the last Liberal budget—when my hon. friend—

An hon. Member: Look out for bubble gum!

Mr. Dupuis: —when my hon. friend was financial critic—

At least, bubble gum is of some use to some people, whereas I do not know that rat poison is.

An hon. Member: The Liberals can use it.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, then financial critic for the opposition, stated in 1957 that the Liberal surpluses were shocking. He estimated at $382 million the surplus that the Liberal government had actually accumulated for that year and said: "Why not divide up the $152 million surplus forecast by the government among the provinces?" That was easy for him to say, Mr. Speaker, speaking as a Conservative financial critic at the time of the Liberal government. It was no hard task to ask for the surpluses to be divided up among the provinces because, under a Liberal administration, there were surpluses. At that time, Mr. Speaker, Conservative leaders, Tory leaders, Union Nationale leaders, call them what you will, in the various provinces aligned themselves with the present Minister of Finance, in the hope of obtaining their fair share of federal government surpluses. However, at this time, much to their discomfiture, they understand and will find that they will necessarily be forced—to use a redundant phrase—necessarily forced—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dupuis: Some hon. members find this a laughing matter. But Mr. Duplessis generally speaks that way in Quebec. The provincial governments will necessarily be obliged to share not a surplus, but a deficit which is well on the way to reaching one billion dollars.

Mr. Speaker, the great man has had a vision, a vision based on the promises made by the present government when it was sitting in opposition. We are back to the dark days of Conservative regimes and I am very sorry for my hon. friends opposite. This is hurting them, as I well realize. I would not like to be in their shoes. However, when Conservatives are in power we have depression: For instance, under the Borden administration, we had the depression, unemployment and difficulties, and the same under the Bennett regime. On the other hand, under Liberal administrations we had unprecedented surpluses, unprecedented prosperity. And now, we have just had the first Conservative budget since 1935 and we are on the way to a deficit of one billion dollars.

Why were so many promises made? Why so much criticism? Why were they professing to be the champions of all classes when at present the government is protecting no particular class of society. No solution is found to the problem of unemployment or to the problem of trade relations with the United States. No solution is found to the urgent problem of agriculture, to the problem of small wage earners.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us a budget that is absolutely worthless at this time. We, Liberals, were the only ones to give this country social legislation; I said at the beginning of this session and I now repeat that the Liberals have been dismissed from power no doubt through a natural need of every human being for a change but, as soon as the change was made, all the citizens of this country were disillusioned and, at this time, I would rather represent the people of the constituency of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville from this side of the house because I am sure that, after four years of a Tory-Conservative government, the people will bring us back to power for 25 years, to restore the economy of our country.

Mr. Speaker, the old age pension, the pensions for the disabled and the invalids, as well as the family allowances, are social measures which were enacted by the Liberal party. The Unemployment Insurance Act, which now saves the life of our friends opposite, was also enacted by the Liberal party. When, Mr. Speaker, I see these people boast about a $9 increase of the old age pension, under an act which they consistently opposed in the past, I cannot help laughing.

But, in fact, what are they doing now? In the province of Quebec they promised to raise family allowances. They have not and will not do so. It was a Liberal government which upheld in this house the cause of large families and it was a Liberal government which enacted the Family Allowances Act while the Conservative leader of that time, Colonel George Drew, said that they were a "baby bonus" for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, this budget does not settle any problem. In fact, it makes the situation worse. I would therefore echo the words of the former financial critic of the opposition who, in 1957, said that the government had neglected basic necessities in favour of other goods which were not necessary. As stated in the Holy Scripture, Mr. Speaker: "The tree is known by his fruit".

A moment ago the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) said: "Never has a government done so much in such a short time." True enough, Mr. Speaker, never has a government managed to build up such a deficit in so short a time. I will grant them that.

Urgent measures are required to solve unemployment in my area. There was talk this week of turning the Richelieu river into a seaway, an undertaking which would help solve the unemployment situation, which, at this time, is showing no improvement whatever.

From the agricultural point of view, many farmers in our area are complaining that our market is being flooded with American potatoes. I ask the present government to raise the customs duties on American potatoes, at least from July to September of each year, so that our Canadian producers may market their product before having to face competition from American producers, which is not as serious in the other months of the year, because of the milder climate in the country to the south. I therefore ask on behalf of our farmers the immediate raising of the customs duties on American potatoes so that never again shall we have to see warehouses where, each year, a tremendous quantity of potatoes are left to rot. I will now conclude my remarks—

Some hon. Members: Hear! Hear!

An hon. Member: That hurts.

Mr. Dupuis: When I begin speaking, they are jittery; and when I finish speaking they are more jittery still. They might as well get used to it, because I will be on my feet pretty often to deal with the problems facing the Canadian people in general and the needs of my area in particular.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I would ask the hon. members opposite—or more exactly those gentlemen who sit to my left, those who were elected under the Conservative ticket—I will not say under the Union Nationale ticket, because that is embarrassing to them—but to those who were elected as Conservatives in Quebec during the last federal elections, to remember that in all their speeches, in every corner of the province, they were most emphatic in claiming justice for provincial governments. However, since they have been sitting here, in this house, we have not heard any request on their part of fair treatment for provincial governments. Indeed, we no longer hear them talk of this problem which, in the last election, they pointed out as being of paramount importance. They keep silent on this problem, which they raised themselves, but they keep shouting to prevent a member of this house from speaking the truth, and it hurts them when the finger is put on this sore.

Mr. Ricard: But we have had $19 million.

Mr. Dupuis: They said everywhere and particularly in the province of Quebec that the federal government was not doing justice to the provinces. Well, let them now ask the Prime Minister to convene a federal provincial conference, as he promised he would, and let them make the claims they made in the past; let them claim justice for the provincial governments here in this house. Let the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), who just resumed his seat, show some spunk and forget for a minute his ties with the Union Nationale, and defend the interests of the people of the province of Quebec and of the people of Canada as a whole.

(Text):

Mr. G. M. Stearns (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, following so closely upon the brilliant speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) and the equally dynamic speech of the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) which dealt with cut flowers, rat poison and the province of Quebec I am afraid the poor words which I will speak in the next few minutes are going to sound like a cap pistol being discharged following the sounding of a 21-gun salute. Nevertheless my words will be sincere.

As this is the first occasion I have had the honour to rise to speak in this house I would like to congratulate Mr. Speaker upon his re-election to the high post which he fills. To a new member of parliament it has been and is extremely comforting and encouraging to watch him perform his daily duties so wisely and in such a pleasant manner.

To you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Rea) I wish to say I am both pleased and proud of the manner in which you maintain and preserve good order in the house.

As an English-speaking member from the province of Quebec I wish also to say how pleased I am at the recent appointment to ministerial rank of my two good friends, the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. O'Hurley) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche).

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for an English-speaking Canadian to have been chosen candidate in a constituency whose people are 75 per cent French-speaking. I can assure you that I was not chosen because I speak French well. You can readily realize that I speak this language with great difficulty. Therefore, I was not chosen on the strength of my ability as a speaker, I never was one, neither in French nor in English. I was chosen by the whole people of Compton-Frontenac which is a constituency of the eastern townships.

I appreciate French-speaking Canadians as much as I do English-speaking Canadians. I take advantage of this opportunity to thank all the electors who put their trust in me. We English-speaking Canadians of the province of Quebec are able to live in full harmony with our French-speaking fellow-citizens.

About a week ago, I read an article in one of the Ottawa papers in which the writer referred to the quality of the speeches made during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The writer apparently took a dim view of those speeches. I think it is a pity that he did not wait until today because he would have had a better foundation for what he said than he had then. I enjoyed what I heard during that debate. The writer went on to say that he did not think newly elected members to parliament should confine their remarks to subjects concerning their own constituencies but that once they had come to Ottawa they should try to speak on subjects of interest to the whole country. I do not agree with that view because the only way this country can continue to be fairly governed is to have the problems and ideas of each of the 265 members presented to the house. The government can then sort them out, adopt those that are ready for adoption, discard those which are of no use and put the balance in a little pile on the shelf. As time overtakes these projects our friends of the C.C.F. group will see their ideas fulfilled.

I should like to say a few words about matters concerning my own constituency. I want to thank the government for the measures it passed during the short session of the last parliament which were of great benefit to the people of my constituency as well as to people all over Canada. I want to thank the government for extending the period of seasonal unemployment insurance benefits because I know for a fact that it did a tremendous amount of good in a small town in my constituency where the only industry had closed its doors forever.

I wish to thank the government for having started work on the Sherbrooke airport. I understand that the government intends to spend $4 million there during the next two years. This will provide a great number of jobs and in the future will result in interest on the part of a large number of industries in building factories close to the airport. Hon. members may ask why I am interested in the Sherbrooke airport. The reason is that all the land comprising the airport is in the county of Compton. My constituency is composed of the counties of Compton and Frontenac and it is significant that the two great races of our country live there side by side. The origin of the name "Compton" is lost in antiquity but it is believed to have been the name of a famous Englishman. As to the name "Frontenac", it is easily remembered as being the name of one of the great governors of New France.

The constituency consists for the greater part of small farms and some woodworking industries. The farmers cannot grow enough crops in the summer months to make a living so they turn to the woods in the winter time. When there is not sufficient work in the province of Quebec they go across the line to the states of Maine, New Hampshire or Vermont. If they work in Vermont all winter they are entitled upon their return home in the spring to draw unemployment insurance benefits in the province of Quebec because Vermont has a reciprocal agreement with Canada. Up to the present time neither the state of Maine nor the state of New Hampshire has been willing to enter into any such agreement. I suggest that the government keep on trying to convince the governors and legislative bodies of these two states to enter into reciprocal agreements so that our people working over there may be treated just as fairly as any United States citizen who happens to be working in the same camp.

Still on the subject of our farmers, I should very much like to see pulpwood brought under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. In the first place, it might keep more of our farmers at home in the winter time if they had a winter crop which they knew they would be able to sell at a predetermined price. But most important is the improvement which would result in the quality of the pulpwood produced by the farmers if they had to follow standards and specifications laid down by the government in order to be protected by the floor price. The paper mills would certainly be prepared to pay a little more for the pulpwood if they could be sure that it was going to be usable when it got to the mill. At the present time almost anything is delivered to the paper mills of which there are three in the eastern townships. The wood is all mixed up and the companies buy it but they do not like it.

In the eastern townships we have 63 4-H clubs. Our 4-H clubs in the province of Quebec differ greatly from those in other parts of Canada and the United States where the emphasis is on dairy farming and crops. We cannot do that so well in the province of Quebec so our 4-H clubs are formed and maintained to teach the children forest conservation and to plant trees. We hope that as they grow up they will establish tree farms so that they will have a crop that they can sell in nearby markets during the winter. But it costs money in order to plant trees and protect them from disease and fire. Up to the present the farmers have not been able to afford to do very much about it. Some of the small forest industry companies give them trees and help them to get started. I know of one small company in the county of Frontenac that has been responsible for the planting already of over six million trees.

Having spoken about local problems, I should like to say a few words on the budget which has been brought down. I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for his courage in presenting a budget which is so realistic and in keeping with the difficult period from which we are just emerging. It is human nature to want to please as many people as possible and a give-away program would have been much more agreeable to present. However, I have never felt that the Canadian people really expected to obtain any more than they did in the present budget. I say this because up to March 31 the Liberals were offering the people a very nice immediate tax cut of $400 million. If the voters had wanted it that way, they would have voted for the Liberals. The Liberals would have been re-elected and the present estimated deficit of $648 million would have reached over $1,000 million.

One of the great difficulties in connection with manufacturing goods today is the rapidity with which they are produced. If industry could only be geared to operate efficiently at about 80 per cent of its capacity, inventories would not tend to pile up so fast when there is a lull in demand. I am hoping that one lesson we will learn from this recession is to explore the possibility of providing full employment for the labour force we have now. I hope also that management and labour may work closer together so that we may never see the frightening day when our Canadian goods will be priced out of the markets of the world.

I do not believe that the small increase in the tariff on textiles will drive our friends away from our markets. I sincerely hope that the anti-dumping clause will put new life into this industry which has been depressed for so long. So far as lumber is concerned, I am happy that the recent difficulties of definition of planed lumber have been resolved. I am hoping to live to see the day when all tariffs and duties will have been removed from lumber which passes between the United States and this country. The right given to corporations to increase their donations for charitable purposes up to 10 per cent is a step in the right direction. It ought to help our hospitals and universities a great deal, but it might not be enough. If this proves to be the case, I hope our government will increase the allowance to 15 per cent of income or more. I hope the day never comes when our universities become state institutions because of a lack of support from corporations and private individuals.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish this parliament, so well endowed with youth, and I include Conservatives, Liberals and the eight youthful looking members of the C.C.F. who are not present at the moment, a most fruitful session to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to express my views on the budget which was presented last Tuesday by paraphrasing a bit of a poem. "Something new, something blue", and I would add, "God, what a stew." As a matter of fact, it was something new. This was the first budget to be presented in two sessions of this parliament. The session last year was called to deal with matters generally, and at that time the minister did not dare bring down a budget. Oh, he brought in some changes, some cuts in taxes. I really believe he made a mistake because if he had introduced a budget last year with tax reductions amounting to $178 million and the increased pensions, it would have been presented to the people on the eve of the election in a very favourable light.

However, the minister preferred not to present a budget. He introduced one this year which is really very blue. There is nothing in it to help the situation in which we find ourselves. Really, I would say it is a gloomy budget. I said that it was some kind of stew because the minister spoke a lot of words for over two hours, but nothing emerged to help the Canadian situation.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, during this budget debate, we are called upon of course to criticize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for his presentation. Yet, knowing that there is nothing which is essentially good or essentially bad in this world, I take the liberty, at the outset of my remarks, to offer him my congratulations. I congratulate him for having been kind enough, for the first time in the history of Canada, when he presented his budget, to add a few sentences in French so as to show clearly that he recognized the bilingual character of Canada. It reminded me that I read the other night in the Sentinel an article entitled: "Says bilingualism unrealistic," published by Rev. John Douglas, of Paisley Memorial United Church, and I quote:

(Text):

Like most of what is said in support of bilingualism in Canada it shows, to my mind, lack of logic and realism. No real argument is presented.

(Translation):

He terminates the article as follows:

(Text):

Let us ask ourselves why we should be bilingual, and what real benefits there are and we shall see that only in special cases is it worthwhile.

(Translation):

That is why I should like to congratulate the hon. minister for clearly demonstrating that he recognizes the bilingual character of our country. His French is very good and we accept it with pleasure. I would like to congratulate also—but it will be in his absence—the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) who, on two occasions—in Hull some time ago and in Montreal last Sunday—gave in good French some explanations about his opinion on obscene literature in Canada. Those two hon. ministers showed that articles such as the one to which I have just referred and which was printed in the Sentinel, are written by a minority of narrow-minded people who do not seem to have a true understanding of our country's problem. I think that this is a bad thing.

While I was a member of a delegation of the Canadian parliament to NATO, I found that among the fifteen countries represented there, most Europeans spoke perfectly in at least two languages. The Belgians spoke from two to four languages; those from Great Britain spoke French and English to perfection. Unfortunately, English Canadians and Americans alone were unilingual, speaking only English. If, in the past, we had better understood the advantages of a twofold culture, there is no doubt that our representation abroad would have been in a more favourable position. Again I commend both hon. ministers.

(Text):

The other day I was reading Hansard for 1955, and I found these words spoken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), and they appear in volume III, page 3392:

> After the closest examination of the budget and of the minister's comments upon it, one can only conclude that this budget is the product of muddled thinking, confusion, indecision and fear on the part of the government to admit the existence of problems with which the taxpayers and the people of this country are all too familiar. It was therefore highly proper that The Economist in its issue of April 19, in a letter from its Ottawa correspondent, should make this observation upon the budget:
> "On the assumption that Canada needs some stimulus to get back to its proper rate of expansion after last year's modest setback, this financing of tax cuts out of deficit is easily defensible. The budget speech in fact made it perfectly clear that this was the intention. But the government refuses to say so explicitly. It has never admitted that anything was wrong with the Canadian economy that required artificial stimulus, and it will not do so now. It would rather do good by stealth. The result is to leave it without any logical defence of the plunge into deficit financing."

Could you find anything more realistic at the present time? I think we could have taken the whole speech of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) criticizing the budget of the Liberal party and it would be a speech that would be up to date after the budget we heard presented by the minister last Tuesday. As reported at page 3392 of Hansard he went on to say this:

> It is true that in the house, constituted as this one is at present, the government wins the vote. But it is equally true that in relation to the kind of budget we are discussing here today the opposition wins the debate. But what of the people? The Canadian people from this budget will glean but little benefit but they will glean something of benefit from the debate in which the proposals of the government are examined.

It is perfectly true that the people of Canada will not get very much out of this budget. But after the discussion is over they will certainly have a clearer knowledge of the situation in which Canada is at the present time. One of the problems that the present government did not want to recognize and which it refused to admit last year was the problem of unemployment. When in October 1957 the Liberal party and the rest of the opposition were telling the ministers that it was dangerous to go on in the way we were going, that unemployment was increasing every day and that they were not doing anything about it, the Prime Minister said at the time that the Liberals including our leader—and he especially mentioned our leader—were grossly exaggerating the situation, and this statement appeared in the Citizen of that day. It is true that unemployment has been recognized since that time but the government waited so long to recognize it that unemployment was given a chance to increase to a figure which the Canadian people had not been accustomed to since the crisis of 1930.

In the budget the minister admits—he admitted it the other night—that there was a slackening in the economy. I believe those are his words. In a speech made outside the house the Prime Minister said that in order to avoid recession and to create work he would not stop at any financial obstacle. But at the present time we have unemployment and it is still going on, and nothing is really being done to help the situation or to create a new economy so that everybody in this part of the year, the summer of 1958, will enjoy a share of work in this country. Instead of admitting the fact that unemployment exists; instead of admitting it clearly, as he stated in 1955 when he was blaming the Liberal party, the minister said the other night that there are more men at work in these months than there have been in any previous years. Nobody will refuse to admit that fact.

Certainly there are more men at work because the population has increased but the problem is that there are thousands and thousands of people not receiving anything from the unemployment department because their stamps are through, because they are not eligible for one reason or another. But those people are starving at the present time and the government is not doing anything to help them. I think of a doctor who is taking care of a sick person going into a hospital and for whom the only remedy he can find is to tell him that there are millions of millions of people on the street who are healthy and that he is one of the few in the hospital. Would such a remedy cure that person? That is what the Minister of Finance was doing in his budget last Tuesday. I come back to the opinions expressed in 1955 by the present Minister of Finance in criticizing the Liberal government. They are to be found in volume 3, page 3396 of Hansard. The minister said this:

> The second problem which has been ignored by the government is the problem of unemployment.

That is what he said then.

> This problem has been discussed at length in this session, or I would seek to go into it at greater length today. But let me content myself, in this limited time, with making this limited observation on the subject, that the government throughout this session has observed a conspiracy of silence in regard to unemployment;—

This can be said for today.

—and it has carried that conspiracy of silence into the budget.

That can be said for today.

It is still running away from the problem of unemployment.

This can be said for the budget of today.

This budget does not meet, in fact it cannot even make the pretence of meeting or even assisting to meet, the problem of unemployment. The government is still running away from that problem; they hope to ignore it.

That is what we can say today; we can say what he said at the time when he was criticizing the Liberal government. If I may go a little further, on page 3396 in the same volume we find him reading a quotation of what Mr. St. Laurent had said outside the house. The quotation is as follows:

We have a country where there should be work for everybody and if we are not smart enough to organize the economy of the nation to provide work for everybody we are incompetent.

The present Minister of Finance said at the time:

And we say to the Prime Minister, "Out of thine own mouth hast thou condemned thyself, and not only thyself, but condemned thy colleagues as well".

If there is anything true it is this. If we transport those phrases pronounced by the Minister of Finance when he was on this side of the house in 1955, that is exactly the situation today. I think he was trying to prophesy then what would come about today if he were in power. He said this:

This is a problem that is national in scope. It is beyond local responsibility. What we want on the part of this government, and what we still look for, are employment measures, some constructive and some effective approach to meeting the deterioration in the economic condition and the unemployment situation in Canada today.

Is there really anything being done with respect to public works in order to help anybody? The Montreal Gazette of February 19, 1958, reported that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) announced on February 18 expenditures by government departments and agencies on works projects totalling $280 million during the first quarter of 1958 and $1,185 million for the full calendar year.

The other day we studied the estimates of the Department of Public Works, but what did we have in those estimates? They were pretty nearly all concerning things started by the Liberal government, in fact all the big things were commenced by that government. Where is this expenditure of $1,185 million? The government seems to think it is doing a lot to help unemployment, but we cannot find any evidence of this.

We find instead a deficit which would be quite understandable if anything was being done to alleviate unemployment, but a deficit when nothing is being done along these lines is, in my opinion, due to maladministration of the affairs of the country.

I said in this house a few weeks ago that in the city of Hull 51 per cent of the unemployed were not receiving any unemployment benefits at all and the city itself has to accept responsibility in order to keep such people from starving. But, as the present minister said in 1955, this is not a problem for the local government, it is a problem for the federal government. Local authorities have no powers of taxation whereby they can obtain the money to help the unemployed. At the present time such people are being given a few dollars a week in order that they may have something to eat but they are not able to pay their rent and as a result may be thrown out on to the streets.

Mr. Nasserden: Would the hon. member state what tax he proposes might be used to take care of the situation?

Mr. Caron: I am merely proposing that the government should stand by the promises made during the last election, when they said they would help the unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caron: This they are not doing at the present time.

Mr. Nasserden: But what tax does the hon. member propose should take care of expenditures of this kind?

Mr. Caron: That is the problem of the government. When we are in trouble we do not mind a deficit provided such people are assisted, but when nothing is being done to help them that is a different matter. Our cities are in a very bad position; they cannot obtain the money to help them carry that burden. In the city of Hull, for example, expenses in respect of public assistance totalled $180,000 in 1953-54; in 1957-58, $480,000; and it is not fair for a city to have to spend such a sum. There is no sense in this situation—such expenditures are much too high for the municipalities and the government which promised it would help the municipalities has not yet done anything. Furthermore, they do not seem willing to do anything; they do not even try to do anything. All we can find in the budget are a few small reductions in the sales tax which will amount, as the minister said, to a total of $5 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The figure was $6 million for a full year.

Mr. Caron: Not for the municipalities. The minister said $5 million for the municipalities.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes, that is right.

Mr. Caron: When we divide that $5 million among all the municipalities of the country each one will get a peanut.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will be $5 million more than they would have had if there had not been a change of government last June.

Mr. Chevrier: They cannot take it.

Mr. Caron: The municipalities have a heavy load to carry. We thought the Prime Minister would live up to his promises. The Montreal Gazette of February 8, 1958 reported that the Prime Minister on February 7, 1958 said he planned to call an informal federal-municipal conference in 1958 to discuss the financial plight of Canadian municipalities.

On February 26 the Montreal Star reported the Prime Minister as follows:

> He also indicated prompt action on holding an "informal" meeting between the federal government and municipal representatives—he said it would occur after the election—to hear municipal views on their financial problems.
> Such a meeting, he said, would allow the federal government to draw up proposals to present to the next federal-provincial conference for easing "excessive" municipal real estate taxes.

These are not my promises; they are the promises of the Prime Minister and his government. In the Ottawa Journal of February 26 the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> Mr. Diefenbaker announced that he proposed to call a federal-provincial-municipal conference in the near future. He recognized that the municipalities come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but saw advantages of having them represented at an informal conference which would give them opportunity to put forward their own proposals and to explain their needs. Out of such a conference, he said, might come some plan to ease the "excessive" municipal tax burden on real estate.

Then there is a further translation I would like to quote from Le Droit of February 26, 1958, as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker stated that the government understands the difficult financial position of the municipalities of the country. "We shall see to granting them a reasonable share of taxes", he said, "so that they will be able to meet the new needs arising from their rapid growth."

According to the Prime Minister the question of division should be studied by the governments concerned, but his government is said to be ready with a plan for municipal aid in the light of such a study and the recommendations of the provincial governments. Those are the promises and the government is still making promises; but what do we get today? We get the same old promises. Nothing is being done for the municipalities who are asking for aid from the government. We need a source of employment and the government is able to provide that source right away. The municipalities have all kinds of projects ready and the only thing they lack is money. They are unable to get money on the market today at a fair price, and one thing this government could do is to lend the municipalities the money they need for their projects at an interest rate comparable to the one paid by the federal government on today's market. This would ease the difficulties of the municipalities.

An hon. Member: Who brought in the tight money policy and cut off the availability of money?

Mr. Caron: I would refer the hon. member to the governor of the Bank of Canada. He might be able to give you a good answer to that question.

An hon. Member: It would be better than yours.

Mr. Caron: The hon. member seems to believe what was said by the Minister of Finance, but let me tell him this: the Minister of Finance is often off the beam, and I showed that when I was showing what he said in 1955. He was speaking of tax reductions. Tax reductions last year amounted to $178 millions; this year in every department tax reductions amount to $26 million. And he seems to be happy with that, and the hon. member on my left seems to be happy with it too.

But let us look at what is being said all over the world. Governor Harriman speaking in New York with regard to the United States recession said there should be an emergency tax cut. He further said, and I quote his words:

> In my opinion it would be reckless to do little, and sensible and safer to take strong measures in this period.

I point out that Governor Harriman is a man considered to be an expert in finance; much better than some of the hon. members I see on my left. Tax reform in the United States to encourage individual incentive and promote the nation's economic growth has also been proposed by the Rockefeller brothers fund. The recommendation was made by a panel of 17 leading economists, and they urged an immediate tax cut to help expand employment and overcome the current recession. The panel emphasized, too, that the anti-recession tax cuts should be consistent with the more important long-term goals of tax reform.

This is from the United States, but we can find something in Canada. I have here the report of the general manager of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and I should like to place on record the following recommendation made by that association:

> With total taxation—federal, provincial and municipal—now 29.8 per cent of net national income as compared with 22.3 per cent in 1939, and with federal taxes representing almost three-quarters of total taxes, the association has urged that every effort should be made to reduce federal taxation, submitting, among other things, that if more money is left in the hands of individuals and corporations it will have a stimulating effect on business generally, and in particular, will make increased Canadian capital available for the much needed investment in our primary and secondary industries.

These are not men in politics; they are men in business, and they are looking after their businesses, and that is why they are pressing the present government to set up a tax system which will ensure that the money will flow to the people. With better purchasing power in the hands of the people, the factories will be able to start again and more of our people will be able to find employment.

How many people will benefit as a result of the government's tax concessions? Not many, I venture to think. With regard to the proposed assistance for education we must wait until the bill is presented before we see whether this is what we want it to be. However, we have the cut flower tax reduction, and this may prove an economy to the Conservative party when its members celebrate their anniversaries. But I am afraid this will be of limited benefit, because the carnations which are created so beautifully by nature have never been blue, they are always, red, pink or white.

Mr. Pallett: What about that pansy you are wearing? There is a lot of blue in that.

Mr. Caron: My pansy has a lot of yellow in it, and I am sure some hon. members would be very proud to wear it on July 12.

The Minister of Finance spoke the other day about ways of getting money, about loans to cover part of the expenditure. He spoke about the sale of bonds in Canada and expressed the hope that everyone would participate in the buying of such bonds. There is one thing which every hon. member has received by mail, namely the plan which has been submitted since 1941 by Mr. Laflamme for what he calls premium bonds. This is a way to get people to buy these bonds, with low interest but with a possibility of a prize to make them attractive. Some people will say that this is a mere gamble. I do not know, but let us suppose it is. Who is not a gambler at heart? We have been born gamblers. Who among us has given the order to be born here or there? It is an accident to be born; it is a gamble we have to take. One man is born in English-speaking Canada; another is born to be a French-speaking Canadian—

Mr. Nasserden: Is that Liberal fiscal policy?

Mr. Caron: It may not be that, but I will answer the hon. member a little further. Every time in life we have to make a choice, that choice is a gamble. I think the Minister of Finance should study this question of premium bonds very carefully, because such bonds would sell in great quantities in Canada and people would be glad to take a chance on winning $10,000 or $25,000 or $50,000 a month.

The government—the Conservative party—are keen to imitate everything that comes from Britain. They should recognize that this system has been accepted in Britain. I have here a copy of the London Times giving the numbers and the amounts which have been won by the drawings last month. There is a long list of them. And those bonds which are being sold in England are also being sold at the present time under this administration in Canada, and if it is legal to sell them in England and in Canada I think it should be legal for the government to sell them. Anything which would help the government of Canada to find the money to get out of the difficulties in which we now find ourselves should be accepted and tried. All I am asking the government to do at the present time is to study the question.

Experts on trade promotion have been telling the government that they have not been doing very much to help trade in Canada, and speaking of taxes the government is happy to say that on account of the recession they had a deficit of $648 million which will amount to over $1 billion before the year is over.

An hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. Caron: But after the last war we had to change the economy of the country because industry had to change from war purposes to peace purposes. In the 42 months from 1945 to 1949 the Liberal government made reductions in taxes amounting to $1,292 million; in 1945, $300 million; in 1946, $266 million; in 1947, $265 million; in 1948, $92 million and in 1949, $369 million. This is the reason that right after the war we were not subjected to a period of recession such as we experienced last year and this year and during that period of 42 months the debt of the country was reduced by $1,625 million.

Mr. Nesbitt: Overtaxation. Why didn't you cut taxes then?

Mr. Caron: The Conservative government should not be proud of its record. During this period of hardship what we need in Canada—a country with a small population of approximately 17 million that produces foodstuffs to support a population of over 40 million—is a firm policy that will develop markets for our products. What is the government doing to win markets for Canada? Nothing at all. The government criticizes the policies of the government of the United States and indulges in criticism of this and that, but is it really making an effort to sell Canadian products? Not at all. I admit the government held a conference at Mont Tremblant with the British government which brought in suggestions concerning free trade between the two countries. After this happened the government hastily closed the conference and sent the British delegates back home.

An hon. Member: Are you for free trade or against it?

Mr. Caron: The government should institute a public relations policy that will win markets for Canadian goods in other countries. With regard to the import restrictions in other countries Mr. J. C. Whitelaw, Q.C., in the report of the general manager of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association stated:

> Import quotas and exchange restrictions in commonwealth as well as other countries are limiting the export of Canadian manufactured goods. Some further relaxation in the United Kingdom import licensing arrangements were made in August 1957, while the token import scheme continues in effect in 1958 with very little change. The British West Indies liberalization plan for 1958 is unchanged. Certain commonwealth countries found it necessary in 1958 to further restrict their imports of manufactured goods, due to deficiencies in their balance of payments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Caron: I am sorry myself.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to belatedly extend my congratulations to the Speaker on his election to that high office and commend him for the tact and skill which he has displayed in guiding the deliberations of this house. I extend the same complimentary words to yourself and to the Deputy Speaker. May I express the hope that the patient attitude you have demonstrated with respect to new members will continue and that the sands of your good nature will not run out at least until I have completed what I have to say.

I would also like to extend congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in respect of his first budget and to say that in presenting it he has in an honest and competent way faced realities and has been able to come to grips with the fiscal facts of life and at the same time has been able to maintain benefits which have been derived from tax deductions introduced at an earlier date, to add something to them and also has been able to provide for the extensive public undertakings of this government. It has been a Herculean task and he should be given full credit for it. I would like in particular to comment on the proposal with regard to succession duties. This suggestion is most welcome and together with the companion measure permitting a tax-free gift up to $10,000 of a home or farm will remove inequities and injustices which have been apparent in the past.

I described the task of the Minister of Finance as a Herculean one and in so doing I had in mind that this government had to acquire some of the characteristics of Hercules in cleaning up after the previous administration by altering their unfortunate financial policies and doing what had to be done to remove the effects of such policies. I was thinking particularly of the task which was assigned to Hercules in cleaning out the Aegean stables for the first time in 100 years and I am sure the present Minister of Finance is thankful that he had only 23 years' accumulation to deal with.

I would now like to relate what was said in the conclusion of the budget presentation about the great destiny of this nation to observations I wish to make regarding a problem which affects the country generally and my constituency in particular, namely the question of the proposed construction of a railway to be built to the south shore of Great Slave lake.

The constituency which I represent is one of a tier of ridings lying at the northernmost extremity of the western provinces and occupying over one-third of the province of Alberta with an area of 80,000 square miles and containing a population of nearly 70,000 people. The people who live in the district constitute a reasonable cross section of Canada in the ethnic sense as here the two main streams of our population have joined and into the river which has resulted have been poured the smaller tributaries comprising the sturdy and fine people of every racial extraction who make up this country, all of us proud to be and to be called Canadians.

(Translation):

I am happy to know that the district which counts several thousand French-speaking voters supported me during the last election by awarding me 80 per cent of their votes. I hope that when I shall again ask for their support on another occasion, I shall be able to express myself in French, and I beg my hon. friends to pardon the errors I might commit when speaking in this language for the first time.

COMPANY DIRECTORS

BOARDS OF FEDERAL COMPANIES TO HAVE MAJORITY OF CANADIANS

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-16, respecting company directors (directors' qualifications).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require that all companies created by the parliament of Canada be managed by a majority of resident Canadian directors. The exception is where such a requirement already exists as in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and in part III of the Companies Act. As I say, there is an exception in the case of these acts because they already have this provision. There is also, I believe, a provision in the Bank Act passed at the last session of parliament whereby insurance companies by mutualization can retain their Canadian identity. Therefore at the present time companies having to do with financial affairs such as banks and insurance companies are able to retain their Canadian identity under an act of parliament.

For an understanding of the purpose and intent of the bill I should like to go back and establish the groundwork with regard to the present status of foreign investment in Canada and some of the conclusions which can be drawn from the amount of foreign investment. In doing so I wish to refer particularly to the Gordon report and to the report on Canada-United States economic relations by Messrs. Brecher and Reisman. In the late nineteenth century most foreign investments in Canada came from the United Kingdom and were mainly concentrated in railways, government bonds and the construction of basic utilities. In this regard foreign investment in Canada followed the pattern as it existed in the United States, a pattern which existed up to about the year 1914. However, in recent years foreign investment has mainly been in the form of equities, that is, in the form of investments participating in the growth of the country through investment in the petroleum industry, manufacturing industry and so on.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The extent of that investment is rather extraordinary. According to the report on Canada-United States economic relations, between 1900 and 1955 foreign, long-term capital invested rose from $1.2 billion to $13½ billion. Actually that is a little bit out of date because the latest bureau of statistic figures as reported in the Toronto Telegram of June 16 indicate that the foreign stake in Canada's economic future has climbed to more than $17 billion, an increase of several billion dollars over the figure given in this report.

At present nearly four-fifths of all this foreign capital invested in Canada is held in the United States which is in strong contrast with the position at the end of world war I when the majority of foreign capital was held in the United Kingdom. At the beginning of 1955 non-residents controlled 54 per cent of the investment in Canadian manufacturing and 59 per cent of the total in mining, smelting and petroleum exploration and development. In fact, the holding in the petroleum industry alone would approach the 90 per cent mark. In a large number of very important Canadian industries, including oil, gas, nickle, aluminum, asbestos, iron ore, automobiles, electrical, rubber and chemicals, a relatively few enterprises owned and controlled mainly in the United States account for a very large share of the business enjoyed in those industries.

This is not to say that foreign investment in itself is not something that we are intensely anxious to have. In fact, our standard of living and the development of our country evolve around an adequate supply of capital from all countries throughout the world. But there are many questions which do come up and which should be considered in considering the problem and the long-term effects of this rather large foreign investment in our productive industries and our natural resources. It has been said that it is just a question of the economic immaturity of Canada and that in the course of time this condition will rectify itself in the same way it did in the United States. Actually this will not happen because, as I have pointed out, the bulk of the investment in the United States was in the form of underwriting government bonds whereas the investment in Canada is in the forms of equity stock.

Government bonds mature periodically and there is a chance then to repatriate them. Equity stock is something different. There is very little chance of repatriation of such stock unless a whole company is bought out in a company merger and the usual thing is that the smaller companies merge with large companies rather than vice versa. Therefore a very large proportion of foreign investment in Canada involves direct ownership and control of productive enterprises.

In the past, with the growing maturity of the Canadian economy, a number of foreign corporations appear to have broadened the range of Canadian participation in their operations in a variety of ways because they found that the question as to how far foreign owned and controlled business enterprises should become integrated in the Canadian community was something which they should consider for self-interest reasons alone. As I say, many of these companies have moved in that direction and, to all intents and purposes, have become strictly Canadian enterprises. However, this report on Canada-United States economic relations goes on to point out the following:

> With the increasing Canadian concern over the extent of foreign ownership and control, it is perhaps safe to predict that some acceleration of this process—

That is, greater Canadian participation.

> —is likely to occur. On the other hand, there is no reason to believe that close integration will automatically become the universal pattern. While in many instances enlightened self-interest may stimulate further integration, in others the financial and operating advantages flowing from their present position may well continue to be the dominant consideration for non-resident enterprises.

This is a condition we must live with and it should be a cause of real concern. The extent of non-resident control has increased with the growth of Canadian industry and never in the economic history of any other nation as highly industrialized as Canada has there ever been such a large proportion of industry controlled by non-resident concerns.

That is roughly the situation as it stands today. It has been said that Canadian investment is an offsetting factor and that as other people invest in Canada so we in turn make investments in other countries. According to the report of the dominion bureau of statistics, as printed on June 16, Canada's investment abroad rose in the 1949-56 period to roughly $4.5 billion from $3.5 billion. However, as the bureau points out, a great deal of this so-called Canadian investment was really investment by Canadian companies which were really foreign-owned and which were returning money to parent corporations so that the parent corporation could make further investments in other areas of the world.

How did this situation come about? It is not the result merely of the fact that Canada has more than welcomed the investment of foreign capital here. This would not have been sufficient to attract the inflow of capital to this country of the magnitude we have had, nor would the availability of rich and plentiful resources and opportunities for growth have done so. I quote from page 385 of the Gordon commission report:

> But the mere fact that Canada has been willing to borrow abroad and has always welcomed the investment of foreign capital here would not by itself have been enough to attract an inflow of capital to this country. Nor would the availability of rich and plentiful resources and opportunities for growth. Fortunately in addition the "investment climate" in Canada has been favourable. Canada has had a long tradition of freedom for the flow of capital and income across its borders. Canada has also had a long history of orderly and responsible government. Moreover, a hard-working people with a strong desire for material advancement, a skilled labour force, a well developed educational system, adequate transportation and other social-capital facilities, reasonably stable economic and social conditions and positive encouragement by all levels of government have all helped to make this country an attractive outlet for private foreign capital.

There are other and much more positive factors than those which have encouraged the people of the United States as well as Europeans to invest their capital in Canada. For instance, the United States economy has developed to the point where it is generating large amounts of savings. There are many people in the United States, including those responsible for managing large United States corporations, who are looking outside the borders of the United States for a suitable place to invest capital. Secondly, another motive for the investment of capital in Canada is to secure resources, that is resources which may be needed for future development of the company concerned, resources which may be falling off in the native country of that corporation.

Then the motive for direct investment by non-residents in Canadian secondary manufacturing industries has been to expand the parent companies' operations into the Canadian market in the most desirable way. There is the wish to take advantage of commonwealth preferences which such a company could secure through Canadian operation. In addition, there are taxation considerations, particularly in the United States where income tax concessions are designed to encourage people of the United States to explore for gas and oil, not only in the United States but other countries of the world as well. These concessions have given many United States citizens a natural incentive to come to Canada and explore here for oil and gas. The advantages of such investment to Canadians are equally clear. The profits from direct investments by foreign concerns have a direct influence on the rate of economic growth and industrial development and on the Canadian standard of living for Canadians.

The point about access to markets bears constant repetition and continued emphasis. Most of the output of many of Canada's basic industries cannot be consumed at home and must be exported. In such circumstances the assured market which foreign parent companies can often provide to their Canadian subsidiaries may be imperative to offset the heavy risks which otherwise would be inherent in the large-scale capital investment which would otherwise be required to develop these industries. These benefits are very real and tangible. It is much more difficult to set down in precise terms what the dangers are. No nation has ever gone through the period of development through which we are going. No other nation has ever been in the same condition as we are in Canada in regard to the control of our resources and our manufacturing potential being largely outside of the country. It may be that much that has been said about foreign control has little, if any, validity and is simply an outgrowth of a rather youthful nationalism.

But on the other hand, there are many cases, many of which I know myself, where such control has not been entirely in the best interests of Canada. This concern has arisen because of the concentration of foreign ownership in certain industries, because of the fact that most of it is centred in one country, the United States, and because most of it is in the form of equities which, in the ordinary course of events, are never likely to be repatriated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what would be the solution? I am not claiming that this bill is the solution. Before I conclude, I should like to quote the recommendations of the Gordon commission. Their recommendations were as follows:

(1) wherever possible, such concerns should employ Canadians in senior management and technical positions, should retain Canadian engineering and other professional and service personnel, and should do their purchasing of supplies, material and equipment in this country;

(2) they should publish their financial statements and make full disclosure of the results of their Canadian operations;

(3) they should include on their boards of directors a number of independent Canadians and they should sell an appreciable interest in their equity stock to Canadians.

In so far as this bill is concerned, it states that the majority of the directors shall be resident Canadians. I checked with a very large firm which had business outside of Canada and they advised me that in their operations in Brazil the requirement they have to meet is that the majority of the directors shall be residents of that country. It may well be that the purpose of this bill could be equally well served if it said that these directors should be resident in the country rather than that the majority of directors should be Canadians. This is one of the reasons why I say I do not consider this bill is the final and complete answer. However, the debate which the bill will provoke will help to resolve, in a slight way, some of the problems that we have in this regard by the contribution that it will make. By the contributions which are now being made by Senate committees which are at present studying United States-Canadian relations, by special committees such as those mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) which are being set up or have been set up to discuss United States-Canadian relations and by the work which is being done in that regard by the companies which are more conscious of the problems in our relationship. I say that is the way in which this condition, which I have been trying to point out can be to the detriment of Canada, can be resolved in a way that is mutually profitable for both countries. It is a question of education and it is a quesion of fair treatment to all concerned.

I should like to point out two or three conditions under which we are at present suffering. For instance, I have here a report from the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 15, 1958. The heading on this report or this news item is as follows:

Subsidiaries Hiring U.S. Engineers, Report Canadians Squeezed Out.

This is an interview with Lieutenant-Colonel T. M. Medland, executive director of the Association of Professional Engineers in Ontario who said as follows:

"We have been raising the devil over the installing of these natural gas pipelines. But we don't object to U.S. specialists being brought in provided they add Canadians to their staffs for training purposes."

He added: "But some companies with subsidiaries in Canada are attempting to hold their engineering staffs in the United States together by replacing Canadians in this country.

"The bigger companies are O.K. They are beginning to see the light and are interested in their senior staffs here being Canadians. We are more afraid of the smaller companies."

Actually the point that he is driving at is what happens in connection with a great many United States subsidiaries; and when I say "United States" I should use the word "foreign" because it applies to all foreign-controlled subsidiaries; but as I have pointed out previously, the bulk of our manufacturing, our engineering and our resource industries are under the control of the United States and therefore they are the people who bulk largest in this problem. But the problem does apply to all foreign countries. The difficulty has been that the Canadian operation has in many ways been considered as a branch plant extension of the parent company and as such is operated as a branch plant extension with all policy decision being made at the head office of the parent company.

The operating personnel in Canada are just that, namely operating personnel, and they have very little to do with such matters as export markets, the degree of Canadian content and other matters which would be of interest if it was not a wholly-owned subsidiary or even a partially-owned subsidiary which was for all purposes controlled in a foreign country.

You may think that that matter is not too important. But the fact has been that—and when I say "has been" I am not referring to all companies—in certain areas and with certain companies, for instance, purchasing policy has a definite United States bias with regard to the supply of material, machinery and equipment. The question of markets in many cases has been controlled from a parent company in the over-all interest of the company but sometimes not in the best interests of the Canadian company. There are examples of Canadian companies which have been precluded from participating in foreign markets which they could reach, in which they could sell and in which they have sold in previous years. By a policy decision made outside of this country they have been told that they are no longer free to ship into that export market.

Perhaps the problem which bears most heavily on our shoulders is that of senior personnel. Many subsidiaries' staffs—their managerial staff, their professional staff—are brought in from the United States and Canadian engineers and Canadian managers are not given a chance at promotion within that company. This is a much more general condition than hon. members of this house imagine it to be. I have here a letter from a young engineer who is a friend of mine. I will just quote one paragraph from it. He is referring to the fact that in the petroleum industry there is a general disinclination to hire Canadian engineers and there is an inclination to demand that key engineering work either be done in the United States or that personnel be brought over from the United States to do this work in Canada. He says as follows:

> The state of affairs I speak about I realize is probably most noticeable on project work connected with the oil and gas industry but I suspect that the same thing holds for other parts of the economy as well. I am disturbed constantly by the number of surveys and investigations done by "a firm of American consultants". I was more disturbed recently while on a job hunting tour in Alberta to hear in the office of one American engineering firm in Calgary that Canadians couldn't be hired for work in Canada under present conditions when the company had plenty of Americans on its payroll trying to keep busy.

For those people who are from Calgary I might say that this firm said they had to make sure that their people in Denver were taken care of first. That is not an isolated case. I know of at least half a dozen. I am referring to highly specialized, highly trained technical personnel, graduate engineers, who could do the job but who will not be allowed to do so. This is along the same line of thought as that expressed in this newspaper comment that I read out a few minutes ago.

I was interested in putting a question on the order paper with regard to the value of automatic transmission assemblies and parts imported from the United States by the automobile industry. I found out that the Department of Trade and Commerce just could not give me that information. Then I asked for the duty rate and the answer is as follows:

> Complete automatic transmissions for use in the assembly of motor cars are ruled to be of a class or kind not made in Canada and are admissible under tariff item 438n free of duty when imported from the United States.

Then I asked with regard to parts for automatic transmissions and I was told that since they were not made in Canada they came in duty free also.

I also recall many years in the automobile industry when the empire content clause reacted in favour of increasing the Canadian content in automobiles manufactured in Canada so that the automobile companies could participate in markets which were closed to them if they exported from the United States and which they could only enter from Canada. Their export markets reached from Canada are not so important to them now. Branch plants have been set up in Australia, Malaya and so on. So the Canadian content part is not too important, but there is another point I would like to raise and that is that approximately $10 million to $15 million worth of automatic transmissions are brought into this country. These products alone would, if made in Canada, provide employment for at least 300 men, and I would suspect the figure might run as high as 500.

The tooling problems are not great, and neither is the problem of capital investment. However, it is to the advantage of the automobile company to concentrate the production of automatic transmissions; in fact, in one company of which I know production is confined to one plant in the United States. These components are shipped into Canada and we will never institute an increasing Canadian content in the automobile industry unless the industry has some incentive to build up that content. If they were given such an incentive I suspect that there would be many more jobs opening up in Windsor and Oshawa. It is certainly not in the Canadian interest that this condition should be allowed to continue. I can assure hon. members that such items as automatic transmissions can be manufactured in Canada as cheaply as in the United States. In fact, as much automobile manufacturing is done in terms of labour hours and less time is used—if you ignore tooling costs—than is the case in the United States. I have also known of cases where United States engineers come up to study Canadian production methods, for example, in the Fisher body corporation, because those methods were more advanced than the ones practised in the United States.

I see my time is drawing to a close, but I would not wish to leave the impression that it is only United States firms who are not hiring Canadian personnel, because I notice in the Gazette that the Royal Bank in Place Ville Marie has employed the services of architects and planners from the United States. In fact, if you read down the list, the first half dozen categories of architects, mechanical and structural engineers, indicate that most of this work is being done by New York organizations.

I believe, furthermore, that the Queen Elizabeth hotel was pretty nearly completely designed in New York. We are a nation which is apparently continually saying, "We do not have the know-how, the savvy, we lack the trained engineers and technical personnel." This is not so. We can tackle any job, and it is only in very few specialized fields that we do need outside help. My contention is that if somehow, through education, through bills such as this, or through modifications to such bills, we could create the general atmosphere in this country which would allow enterprises to make the greatest capital gain they can and to obtain the greatest share of the markets they can, generally to operate as a part of the Canadian community and industrial life, and indeed to pay their proper share of charitable contributions, this would be a great step in the right direction. I raise the last point because I understand that it is not possible for many of the operating heads of companies in this country to make a contribution to welfare or whatever the cause may be without first obtaining permission from their United States head office.

The whole intention of this bill is to create a condition, if not on the operative level, at least on the policy-making level between the operating heads of the Canadian and the parent companies, so that as the years go by the Canadian company will gradually increase its proportion of Canadian engineers, Canadian salesmen and indeed achieve a completely Canadian personnel, all working to the best of their abilities to make the Canadian operation a profitable one. These investments have come into our country and have helped to develop Canada and the Canadian operation should try to produce as much as it can and to sell in as many markets of the world as it can in free and open competition, if necessary with its own parent company, and in competition with foreign companies.

The purpose of this bill is not to try to dictate to anyone or to drive away capital but, on the contrary, to set up a suitable atmosphere of a continuing nature which will be of benefit not only to the Canadian people but to the organizations who have invested —it is true for the sake of profit—in our country. We hope to provide a general climate in economic and industrial operations in Canada which will be of benefit to everyone.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to assure the hon. member who has just taken his seat that our party supports his bill on second reading, which is the stage where principle is involved. We hope that the bill will be thereafter sent to a committee where it may be examined much more closely because, as the hon. member himself pointed out, there are many factors which should receive further consideration. We trust there will be an opportunity for a vote on this bill before six o'clock, although the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) probably has other intentions.

I wonder whether in introducing the bill the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) considered the fact that so many companies in Canada, especially those in the resources field, are not set up under the Companies Act or under letters patent from this parliament but come solely within provincial jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, I understand one of their main reasons for organizing on a national basis is because the federal service is better than that offered by some of the provinces. The fact remains that this bill could drive companies to let go their organization under a federal basis and concentrate on an exclusively provincial operation. I raise this point because I know that many of the pulp and paper companies in my own area operate entirely within the province of Ontario. This is a consideration which I think should be taken into account.

I wish the hon. member had made some further investigation of the files in the office of the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche) with respect to the situation as to subsidiaries and as to whether there is any indication from the addresses of the directors of certain companies of how many such directors do live in Canada at the present time.

The intent behind the bill seems to me to be identified with the party of the hon. member. One usually thinks of a bill brought in by a private member as being something which is particularly his own interest, but in this case, bearing in mind speeches during the last two election campaigns, there seems to be an absorbing fear on the part of the hon. member's party with respect to United States domination of the Canadian economy. I can only say that I wish a few more of the private members on the government side had been similarly inclined because we would especially welcome a bill which would require the subsidiaries of United States corporations to publish an annual report showing the relationship of the Canadian subsidiary to the total operation of the concern. We believe this aspect of the matter is perhaps even more important than the requirement so far as the directors are concerned.

Another point that perhaps we could welcome in relation to this bill is the whole question of giving Canadians the chance to share in the equity possibilities of Canadian subsidiaries without having to go into the parent company for stock purchases, and we would certainly welcome it if the hon. member who introduced the bill could develop the tone even a little more, perhaps in the party caucus, and perhaps a few of the younger members could assist him in taking the initiative with regard to these matters which are so closely related.

One of the difficulties, it seems to me, in principle about this question of directorships is the corporate structure. I think it has been very noticeable. Any of you who have been reading texts in the development of corporate structure will realize that more and more control is going out of the grasp of the shareholders, or directors elected by shareholders, and entering the grasp of management itself. Furthermore, we have had a tremendous development in the last decade of two other factors which make the position of a director much less important and so gives the purpose of this bill perhaps more meaning. I am thinking of a giant holding company which needs to purchase perhaps only a minority part of the stock of a company before it can control it and set up its own dummies. That is another question which could be considered in the committee, whether these directors would be any more than dummies. I know in particular of a mining operation in the area from which I come where there are a number of Canadian directors but where the effective control, as everyone realizes, is not in the head office in Canada but down in the United States.

I am reminded of another story—I hope it is apocryphal—in connection with one of the companies laying the trans-Canada pipe line. Apparently they were having difficulty in getting past the Department of Citizenship and Immigration in getting some Americans in to work, so they took these chaps who were waiting down south of the border and who they felt were needed badly, and they created them vice-presidents of the company. I understand these men are working, one as a truck driver and one in charge of a parts store, and at the same time they are vice-presidents of this construction company, and that is an example of how a dummies set-up can come in, no matter how well intentioned the legislation.

One of the other tremendous developments I referred to earlier and that I have not touched on in detail yet, is the development of these investment portfolios by such organizations as Investors Mutual and Investors Syndicate. More and more, so much of the equity control seems to be superficially getting into the hands of these big portfolio groups and companies that they are in a position to nominate directors and in many ways almost control the policies of the corporation. I was just wondering, and it seems a very good question, how is this development—and it seems to be going on every year; in the Financial Post in their annual review you can see how these portfolios are getting larger and larger, and so the question comes to mind—eventually going to be applied. Are these portfolio-holding mutual companies to continue to keep hands off appointing directors and actually taking an interest in management, or is there finally going to come a switch and will they begin to operate more like a holding company. This question affects the question of selecting Canadian directors and the general problem, of course, seems to me that we have been told often enough by supporters of free enterprise in this house that capital is international and knows no bounds, and we cannot consider very seriously whether Canadian directors of United States owned subsidiaries can do an effective job.

This sounds very much like a general criticism of the bill, but it is only intended to be some suggestions to lead us on after second reading to a study of the bill in committee. We think that would be extremely worth while.

I do not want to close without saying some good things about some of the United States subsidiaries we have in Canada. I realize, for example, from my own particular training of librarianship that we would be nowhere in Canada but for funds supplied by a United States corporation, the Carnegie Foundation, and I think also of the work that has been done by other large United States corporations. We have got to temper our criticism to a certain extent with regard to the way they operate.

We have in our area two United States subsidiaries, the Marathon Corporation and Kimberley Clark, that in many ways have set the pace and the whole standard not only for the communities they have developed but also for the advanced forestry outlook they have. And when I consider what they do compared with, for example, a Canadian corporation such as Abitibi which has largely Canadian directors, I begin to see that there has been a certain guided benevolence on the part of some United States corporations, and that this bill might cause such organizations difficulty.

Then again, Marathon Corporation only recently became in the United States a subsidiary of a much bigger organization, the American Can, and I do know that the community of Marathon and those engaged in the home operations there stewed and worried for a few months because they knew that control was vested in the United States but they had come to recognize that the control was benevolent and very often in their best interests. Now it has been removed by another of these gigantic shuffles in the corporation market, and perhaps if we had a requirement such as the hon. member suggested in this bill we would not have this kind of worry.

I certainly think the point the hon. member made with regard to corporate contributions by United States subsidiaries to our Canadian educational institutions is a very important one and it would not be right to single out any particular United States subsidiary that is giving a great deal or others that have given nothing, but this is an important point. It seems clear that if one had Canadian directors with a Canadian background and education they would be much more likely to call to the attention of the management of the corporation the need for helping Canadian institutions.

That completes the remarks I want to make. I would just like to close by congratulating the hon. member again on his initiative.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Before the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) spoke I had some misgivings about this bill. I have considerably more now, and in view of the well known and long standing love of private enterprise by that particular group my suspicions are naturally aroused by the sentiments he has expressed and by the congratulations he has extended to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome).

I should just like to say to him that the principles or objectives or intentions that he has in mind are indeed good if taken in proper doses but, as he says on his own admission, in effect the establishment of a majority of directors would not in itself cure the problem about which he spoke for some 40 minutes. It therefore seems unnecessary to make any comment on the bill as such because of its apparent weaknesses; first, that the aim he wishes to achieve could be completely defeated by provincial corporations or by establishing dummy directors, which makes it unnecessary to comment on the bill any further.

But he did raise one or two other interesting points with which I wish to deal, not in defence of foreign investment or United States citizens or United States companies but purely to set the record straight. In his remarks the hon. member made repeated reference to Canada's No. 1 industry, the petroleum and natural gas industry.

In dealing with the points raised by the hon. member the first comment I would make is this. We recognize perhaps as much as anyone the need for capital investment. We know that the capital requirements of Canada involving an investment of some $8 billion exceeds our ability in savings by a considerable degree. We also appreciate that we have vast areas of undeveloped sections of Canada and in western Canada in particular we have vast areas of undeveloped resources. It therefore becomes essential that if we are to enjoy the prosperity we have experienced these past years we must continue to develop these resources—yes, in the interests of Canadians first—and we can only do this, I suggest, with the aid of foreign capital.

The hon. member who introduced the bill said it was not designed to discourage foreign capital. I submit that the moment this bill was placed on the order paper it did exactly that.

Mr. Fisher: Nonsense.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You cannot say to anyone whether he be American, Belgian or Chinese that you are inviting capital from his country to Canada with strings attached to the invitation. It is tantamount to saying, "It is all right to send your money but do not come yourself." The hon. member for Port Arthur suggested that there are several ways of being absolutely certain that the rights of Canadians are protected and he itemized them. They are also contained in the report of the Gordon commission and have been enunciated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) on several occasions. They were also set out in the brief presented to the Gordon commission by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. As they have already been dealt with I shall only say this in referring to them. Protection of the rights of Canadians in participating in the equity of these companies can be safeguarded by ensuring that Canadians have the right to participate in their management, by ensuring that these companies will carry out the development of research in the industries concerned, by ensuring that these companies will contribute to various philanthropic societies and also by ensuring that these companies will in themselves be good companies. I believe that to a substantial degree the United States parent and subsidiary companies operating in Canada have followed this pattern although of course there are exceptions.

With a recession today in the United States it is quite likely that a number of citizens of that country will enter Canada to establish themselves in Canadian industry. I have no facts or figures in this respect but it is something that conceivably could happen. We in the petroleum industry recognize that and the industry itself—not government—are taking every precaution by informing these companies that if they hope to retain their position here under the same favourable circumstances they have enjoyed in past years it is good common sense to be absolutely certain that they are first of all good Canadian citizens operating as good citizens should.

I wish to make one point clear with respect to the development of resources—and petroleum and natural gas are perhaps as good an example as any—and it is that large expenditures will be necessary to ensure continued development. It is estimated we are going to require to expend about $25 billion in order to develop the petroleum and natural gas industry in the next 20 years. It is obvious that we have two choices in this regard. The first is to call upon our own savings which I have suggested are not great enough to meet the demand and the second is that we merely delay the day when these resources are going to be utilized. Let us keep in mind that in developing the resources of our country we will be providing literally thousands of jobs for Canadians and millions of dollars in consumer goods in putting these products into competitive markets for the use, first of all, of Canadians.

I suggest it is not necessary to become emotional in judging the advantages of foreign investment. I point out that this bill will do nothing to encourage the free flow of the required capital to our country. For some years we had no opportunity and little hope of obtaining capital from eastern sections of Canada with which to develop the resources of western Canada. It was many years before Bay street was prepared to invest capital in the development of natural resources in Alberta and consequently the province accepted foreign capital from the United States in substantial volume.

I wish to raise one other point before concluding because I notice it is almost six o'clock. I wish to stress the necessity of maintaining proper provincial legislation to ensure adequate control by Canadians of our resources. This legislation is already in effect in the provinces which illustrates that foreign investment does not mean control of Canadian industry itself. We have all the provisions we require to protect the rights of our citizens. I am quite certain that the law makers in Canada, both provincial and federal, will conscientiously endeavour to ensure that Canadian rights are adequately protected.

I suggest that the intention of this bill is good in that the hon. member was motivated by a desire to ensure the protection of the rights of Canadians through the application of the five or six safeguards listed in the report of the Gordon commission but I point out that the bill will do little else but discourage the foreign capital which we certainly require at this stage in the history of the development of Canada's natural resources.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I presume we will proceed with the debate on the budget on Monday and continue it throughout the week, as was announced last night?

Mr. Green: That is the intention, Mr. Speaker. It has been agreed among the parties that private members' day which normally falls on Monday will be postponed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that the business on Monday will be a continuation of the budget debate notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 15 (3) which would otherwise make it private members' day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

5. $2.50 per hour for truck and driver.

SPECIAL DELIVERY POSTAL SERVICE, OTTAWA

Question No. 68—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Are special delivery letters in Ottawa delivered by a contractor or by post office personnel?
2. If by contract, (a) who is the contractor; (b) what is the price paid for this service?
3. Were tenders called? If not, for what reason?

1. Special delivery letters are delivered in Ottawa by a contractor operating on a temporary basis, except for a limited number of items which can be delivered more expeditiously by letter carriers.

2. (a) Rod Service (Ottawa) Ltd.; (b) 20 cents per item, plus $45 per month for each of three vehicles. Payment at pro rata is made for any additional vehicles required.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-31, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Explain.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which will introduce certain amendments which will tidy up some of the features of the act, and in particular will make allowance for the delivery of seed grain and the delivery of malting barley so they shall not count as against procuring cash advances against wheat stored on the farm. Those are the main items in the amendments proposed. The other amendments are simply of an administrative character.

SHIPPING

B.C.—THREATENED STRIKE ON BLACK BALL LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Acting Minister of Labour if she has any statement to make on the threatened strike on the Black Ball line between Vancouver island and the mainland which, if it took place, would complete the isolation of that island from the Canadian mainland in so far as surface transportation is concerned?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): The negotiations between the Black Ball ferries and their employees come under the jurisdiction of the provincial department of labour, and I understand the provincial minister of labour is presently inquiring into that matter.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): May I ask the Acting Minister of Labour what plans the government is making for renewed efforts or more vigorous efforts to settle the work stoppage against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which matter comes under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the commissioner is presently on the west coast and I understand he is in Victoria today. Until we receive his report no further steps will be taken by the department, but we hope to receive that report very shortly.

POWER

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if he is now in a position to comment on the question I asked him on Monday, June 16, in regard to the statement made by the chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The hon. member for Gloucester asked me about this matter on June 16, and since that time I have had the press report translated. It states that the chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission would not comment on the type of fuel to be used at the East Saint John plant, that no agreement had yet been completed with the federal government with respect to the construction of this plant, and that he did not believe he needed the advice of Mr. Hicks in New Brunswick.

I have no comment to make on these statements, Mr. Speaker, apart from saying that the main agreements with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are designed to do two things.

One is to reduce the cost of production of thermal power in the Atlantic provinces. The second objective is to reduce the cost of power used in coal-fuelled plants of the Atlantic region. As it has repeatedly been made clear, this government is aware of the importance of using maritime coal in the Atlantic provinces. That is why this government provided a subvention to make maritime coal competitive in the Atlantic area with coal used in thermal plants in central Canada.

TRANSPORT

REPORTED CANADIAN OPPOSITION TO U.S. PROPOSAL RESPECTING GREAT LAKES PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This question arises out of a press report from Washington by the Free Press Chicago Tribune bureau on June 18 to the effect that Senator Warren G. Magnuson, chairman of the Senate commerce committee, in hearings on a Senate bill which would require all vessels operating on the great lakes to carry licensed pilots, announced that the state department, which had interposed no objections during house consideration of this bill, had telephoned him Tuesday to urge delay because of opposition by the Canadian government.

Could the minister inform the house of the reasons for this opposition, and what the suggestions of the Canadian government were in this matter?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, whether that report is true I do not know. I will accept the question as notice.

Mr. Fisher: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport on the same matter. Has the Minister of Transport received any proposals from the shipping federation of Canada that his department should press for intervention to retard legislation proposed by the United States coastguard which is now before the United States Senate?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

TARIFF OF TOLLS—APPROVAL BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Following the hearings which the St. Lawrence seaway authority intends to hold concerning the tariff of tolls, which the minister announced the other day, is it the intention of the government to seek approval of this tariff of tolls from the United States government?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I announced last Wednesday in the house, the tariff of tolls will be open for representations from shippers and other interested people starting on August 6, and at the conclusion of these hearings the St. Lawrence seaway authority will make certain proposals to myself. The St. Lawrence seaway development corporation will make proposals to the United States government; there will be consultation between both bodies, and we hope to make an announcement some time after that as to what the tariff structure will be.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. If a company or individual is aggrieved by the tariff of tolls, may a complaint be lodged with the board of transport commissioners under section 15 of the act?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Section 15 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act provides, among other things, that the final tariff and any amendments shall be filed with the board of transport commissioners and any person may, at any time, file a complaint alleging unjust discrimination in the tariff. There is no provision in the act whereby the seaway authority would hear applications alleging unjust discrimination, and the government does not presently contemplate making such provision.

TELEVISION

MOOSE JAW—GRANTING OF LICENCE TO STATION CHAB

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister say when the recommendations of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation following the hearings held by the board on June 12 and June 13 last with regard to the granting of a television licence for station CHAB, Moose Jaw, will be considered?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I appreciate the extensive work done and interest taken by the member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre relative to the television station at Moose Jaw, and assure him that as soon as my technical officers have completed their examination of the recommendations of the C.B.C. board meetings on June 12 and June 13 I will give this matter prompt attention.

MARITIME PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister inform the house what progress has been made toward the establishment of a French television station in the maritimes?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to speak to me about this early last week, in fact a week before that. I would have answered last week except for the fact that I was away, and I am sorry that in the meantime a story appeared in the press with respect to this subject. It is certainly not the fault of the hon. member that his question did not receive prior attention.

The fact is that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is concluding engineering studies with respect to a French television station at Moncton. These studies have been practically completed, plans have been prepared and it is anticipated that the work will progress to such a degree that at the end of this year or early in the next calendar year a French television station will be in operation in Moncton.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

KETTLE VALLEY, B.C.—TRANSPORTATION OF PERSONS HAVING COMMUNICABLE DISEASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the travelling public in general I wish to direct a question concerning national health and welfare to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that a certain hospital in Kootenay West has been informed by the legal officers of the Canadian Pacific Railway that persons suffering from communicable diseases may ride in the baggage section of the present Budd cars on the Kettle Valley railway, and in view of the fact that this section of the car is occupied by the baggageman, trainmen and the news agent with his sandwiches, buns and other delectable morsels provided for the sustenance of the company's patrons, does the minister consider this a suitable arrangement having regard to the health of the patient, the patrons and the railway employees; and will he investigate this situation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. It was handed to me just as I entered the house. I am not aware of the details he has outlined, but I will immediately get in touch with the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway and give him an answer as soon as possible.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MANITOBA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING TAX RENTAL AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would care to table the correspondence between the government and the premier of Manitoba referred to in the press respecting the tax rental agreements in a manner similar to the tabling of the correspondence with the premier of Saskatchewan last week?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the press contained with respect to this matter, but whatever letters have been received will certainly be tabled.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Can the minister confirm a Canadian Press report to the effect that Avro proposes a 47-day lay-off in Nova Scotia coal mines instead of a lay-off to last for 25 days, and that this 47-day lay-off as well as permanent closure of three mines will come about unless the government gives financial aid? If this report is correct, what is the company asking in the way of financial aid?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no; we have not made any proposal on that.

Mr. Robichaud: The company made no proposal to the government?

WATER POLLUTION

MONTREAL—REPORTED DUMPING OF OIL IN ST. LAWRENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Perhaps the minister may wish to take this as notice. Has any action been taken by the Department of Transport to stop ships that are sailing below Montreal from emptying their oil tanks in the river, thus causing a very serious water pollution problem in that area?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is the first I have heard that this is being done. I will make inquiries and give the hon. member an answer as soon as I can.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

STATEMENT AS TO HALIFAX BOARD OF TRADE REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SALE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question asked by the hon. member for Laurier in my absence on Friday. The hon. gentleman asked if I had received a telegram from the Halifax board of trade regarding the sale of the Canadian National (West Indies) steamships. I have received such a telegram, which I read with a great deal of interest, and these representations will be given serious consideration.

SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF VESSEL TO WEST INDIES FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is there any truth in the statement that Canadian National Steamships have sold one or all of their vessels?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have not been so advised, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is not correct, has the minister or the government given consideration to the transfer of one or more of these vessels to the West Indies federation in lieu of the construction of a passenger-cargo vessel for the federation at a cost of $2.5 million?

Mr. Hees: Yes, that matter has been considered, but according to the information we have the West Indies require a ship about half the size of the smallest Canadian National steamship, and those ships are not satisfactory.

BROADCASTING

KITIMAT, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO GRANTING OF LICENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. I should like to know what progress is being made with respect to the recommendation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation board of governors made on December 6, 1957, for the granting of a private radio station licence in Kitimat, British Columbia.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with that particular case. I will check up and get an answer as soon as possible.

TRADE

URANIUM—STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE TO JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on June 11 the Leader of the Opposition addressed a question to me with respect to a possible sale of Canadian uranium to Japan. I informed him on that occasion that I would discuss it with my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and there was an implicit undertaking in my answer to reply further to the question.

As the members of the house will recall, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I have informed the house on several occasions of steps being taken to promote the sale of Canadian uranium abroad. Among these steps was the negotiation with friendly governments of bilateral agreements for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. Although these agreements do not in themselves constitute contracts, one of their purposes is to establish conditions, satisfactory to the two governments concerned, under which such contracts may be concluded on a commercial basis.

We have been anxious to negotiate such agreements with like-minded governments and have taken active steps in this direction. In particular, we have prepared a standard draft which could serve as the basis for these negotiations, and this draft was passed on last year to governments which had expressed an interest in co-operating with us in this field. Since then we have entered into negotiations with several governments, and we have kept in communication with other governments about this matter.

Japan is among the latter group, and although negotiations for the conclusion of a bilateral agreement are not yet under way, we have kept in close touch with the Japanese authorities. We understand that they are as anxious as we are to co-operate in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. We hope they will shortly be in a position to begin such negotiations.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASE IN PAYMENTS DUE TO DROUGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the very threatening drought conditions in the three prairie provinces. Is the government giving any consideration to increases in payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to meet any such emergency?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if drought conditions continue to be serious—and no doubt they have been serious up to date—undoubtedly the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will be very much higher than they have been in recent years.

If the hon. member is referring to an increase in the rates, which I see he is because he is nodding his head, then we have not given consideration to an increase in the rates of prairie farm assistance.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO CONFERRING OF DEGREES BY ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence which relates to the important announcement made by an Ontario provincial official that the Royal Military College is to award degrees. Has the minister any statement to make which would indicate the reasons for this step, and its relationship to military training?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, for a number of years the Royal Military College at Kingston has been conducting courses very similar to degree-granting courses at various universities. I am pleased to announce that by arrangement between this government and the government of the province of Ontario agreement has now been reached whereby the Royal Military College will have the privilege of granting degrees.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question; will those degrees be granted with the same amount of academic training as exists at the present time, or will they require a further academic year?

Mr. Pearkes: No; they will be granted at termination of the fourth year at the Royal Military College.

PUBLIC SERVICE

HALIFAX—STATEMENT ON REPORTED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT CITADEL HILL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, on June 19 the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi asked the Acting Minister of Labour a question regarding employment at the Halifax citadel. Since this comes under my department I thought I could give the information the hon. member was requesting.

The number employed at the Halifax citadel in an average summer would be in the region of 30 to 35 persons, and of those we keep about 10 who are employed on a year-round basis. Last December, as a means of relieving unemployment in the area, arrangements were made to add to that number, and as a result a total of about 70 men were employed during the winter and early spring. The winter employment program came to an end on April 30, and since that time we have been gradually cutting back the staff until there are now 46 on the job.

It had been planned to make still further reductions to bring the employment level about to that pertaining in a normal summer. However, in view of the unemployment situation in the area, and also having established that there is still useful work that can be performed, I have authorized them to keep on this work as long as the money in the vote lasts. I am sure hon. members will be pleased to hear that employees at the citadel who had previously received notice that their jobs would be coming to an end will now have been advised that there will be continued employment for some months.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF SECOND ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government formulating any plans for entering into financial arrangements with the provinces for the construction of a second trans-Canada highway?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Any policy in this regard would be announced in due course.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister has read the newspaper account in last Saturday's Vancouver Sun which sets out in some detail plans for this highway, and refers to the financial arrangements?

Mr. Green: No, I have not read that, but I get quite a bit of advice on this question.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Friday, June 20, consideration of the motion of Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Benidickson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Argue.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I was attempting to relate what the Minister of Finance had said about the projected expansion of this country under this government to the question of railroad construction in the north country. I was making fairly heavy weather with my French when fortunately I was interrupted by Your Honour at five o'clock.
