Mr. Regier: Perhaps I should ask this question under item 362 and the minister might advise me if that is so. However, it will only take a moment. Could the minister bring the house up to date on the situation with regard to the Oak street bridge or the only bridge connecting Sea island and Lulu island? Has a settlement ever been arrived at with the government of British Columbia, and if so what was it?

Mr. Green: There was a payment provided in last year's estimates of $400,000 which was to be applied to the cost of the bridge over the Moray channel, and that has been paid to the provincial government.

Mr. Regier: It has been paid?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Item agreed to.

362. Perley bridge, between Hawkesbury, Ontario and Grenville, Quebec—improvements, $55,000.

Mr. Caron: Can the minister tell me if the Perley bridge was built solely by the federal government or did three governments share in the cost?

Mr. Green: This bridge was built by the three governments jointly, the dominion, Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. Caron: There is another bridge that is badly needed, and that is a replacement for the present Alexandra bridge which is too narrow for today's traffic conditions. As the present minister has said many times, the federal government would be prepared to accept its share of responsibility. The provincial government of Ontario is also prepared to accept its share. However, we have never had any response from Quebec on this matter.

I should like to ask the minister today if he would take the lead in this matter, which is important in the development of the national capital, and try to convince Mr. Duplessis that this bridge is needed. The answer we have always received has been that if Ottawa wants a bridge, they can build it. I would not be offended if Ottawa were to accept responsibility for the whole of the cost. However, if Ottawa wants to continue the custom of sharing the costs with the provinces, I should like the minister to take the lead in attempting to convince Quebec to accept its share of the responsibility, just as Ontario and the federal government have accepted their share.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, we deal with the provincial governments on these matters as equals, and we are not in a position to tell them what they must do. The developments with respect to the proposed new interprovincial bridge between Ottawa and Hull are as follows: In December, 1955, an interprovincial bridge committee was set up on which were represented the province of Ontario, the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the federal district commission, and the federal Department of Public Works. The province of Quebec was invited to be represented, but did not send a delegate to any of the meetings. A proposal was prepared and reviewed by the committee for a new bridge crossing the Ottawa river downstream from the present Alexandra bridge. A preliminary estimate of the cost was $10 million, which included the cost of the approaches as well as the bridge. Subsequent to this letters were sent to the premiers of Ontario and Quebec stating that the federal government would be prepared to build the bridge and pay one-third of the cost, if each of the provinces would also contribute one-third. The position taken at that time was it would be a matter for the provinces to determine how their one-third share should be distributed between the provincial and municipal governments. There has been no further action taken with the provinces.

Mr. Caron: I well remember what the minister has read. At the time, the lead was taken by the then minister of public works in Ottawa to attempt to convince the others to accept a share of the responsibility. At the time the views of the two ministers, the federal and Quebec, were quite different. I believe that the present minister would be more at ease in dealing with the Quebec government than was the former administration.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Hull should not be too optimistic about that.

Mr. Caron: Would the minister accept the responsibility of trying to communicate—I do not know if he would succeed—with the Quebec government to see what could be done? If we cannot reach an understanding, I think the bridge is so badly needed we would have to ask the federal government to take the lead in building it.

Item agreed to.

363. Towards an investigation to determine the feasibility of constructing a proposed causeway across Northumberland strait, including the opening of a test quarry, $200,000.

Mr. Regier: Have any estimates been made at all of what such a causeway might cost? Can the minister also supply us with the mileage involved? What would the length of the causeway be?

Mr. Green: The causeway would be approximately nine miles in length. Estimates of the cost are, of necessity, very general at the moment, but they are between $50 million and $60 million. As the hon. member will have noticed, there is $200,000 in the main estimates and $160,000 in the supplementary estimates for a feasibility study. As a result of interdepartmental discussions it was decided that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys would undertake the tidal and land use studies. It was estimated that their work on this project would cost $100,000 and provision for such an amount was not made in their estimates as it was decided to consolidate the supply of the moneys under the Department of Public Works. To this end an item of $100,000 was placed in the supplementary estimates and some revision of the preliminary estimates was also made with respect to general engineering costs. The breakdown of the estimated total cost of $360,000 is as follows:

Consulting engineers fees	$174,500
Equipment rentals for field work	55,500
Test quarry operations (testing for stone)	30,000
Detailed studies by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys	100,000

I believe the two engineering firms who have been engaged to do this work of a general engineering investigation are now actually on the job.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister if the engineers of his department originally estimated that this survey as well as the opening of a test quarry would cost $200,000, or was a private firm of engineers engaged to prepare an estimate of what the cost would be?

Mr. Green: No, all the estimates were made by officials of the department.

Mr. Regier: I do not quite appreciate how the same officials would, only a few months apart, add another $160,000?

Mr. Green: I left out a paragraph of my instructions which would perhaps explain the situation. At the time the main estimates were prepared which, of course, was very many months ago, a very preliminary figure was available. The amount of work which could be undertaken by the various government departments had not yet been definitely established, and neither had the total scope of the work to be undertaken by consultants. We then found out just exactly what had to be done and it became apparent that more money would be involved.

Mr. Regier: Is it the estimate of the department that this would be the complete cost of the survey or is the survey looked upon as one which will be extended over a number of years?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, we are expecting the survey to be completed by April of next year.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Chairman, we are expecting the survey to be completed by April of next year.

Mr. Regier: I wish to thank the minister for that information, and I would like to ask him whether he or his department have given any consideration to the building of a causeway to connect Vancouver island with the mainland of British Columbia? I am not saying that I am prepared to recommend this at the moment but, in the light of recent events in that area, I would like to know whether any consideration has been given to this matter or whether a rough estimate has been made of the cost. I am asking this in all seriousness because if in an area which is not very heavily populated we can build a nine-mile long causeway, or we can even begin to consider that type of causeway, surely for the area connecting Vancouver island with the mainland of Canada we might be prepared to consider finding out whether such a causeway is feasible and how much it might cost. There are many places where the island is less than nine miles away from the mainland, as the minister well knows.

Mr. Green: The department has made no attempt to carry out such a study, Mr. Chairman, but one never knows in these days what is going to come up next. The first thing we know, the hon. member will be having us conduct a survey for a causeway across to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps before the minister does that he might give consideration to the matter of the straits of Belle Isle. It is not very far across those straits and it might change the whole climate of the gulf and make the north shore ports all year-around ports if such an undertaking were to be considered for that area.

I would, however, like to ask a question with respect to the Prince Edward Island causeway which, after all, is the item under consideration. Could the minister tell us when these departmental studies first began and how far they have progressed.

Mr. Green: The preliminary studies began about two years ago and, as I have said, we are now at the stage where the consulting engineers have actually been engaged to make the detailed surveys.

I am rather surprised that the hon. member wishes to make any change in Newfoundland, because I thought he was very happy with it as it is.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are certain aspects of it with which I am very happy.

Mr. Green: And after the big shelf of public works he gave me for Bonavista-Twillingate I presume he would want to have them completed before we do something about the straits of Belle Isle.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is right about that. In respect of the causeway in Prince Edward Island, however, has the minister yet found suitable materials? As far as I understand it, this is one of the big difficulties.

Mr. Green: We have found good stone for the core and part of the work of investigation now being carried on is to ascertain whether good stone is available for the outside works.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is quite a problem, as I understand it.

Mr. Regier: I can assure the minister that he need not look for suitable materials because we have lots which would be suitable for causeways. I do not wish to oppose a vote of this kind, but I am very, very surprised indeed that the government is considering the building of a nine-mile long causeway and the spending of almost half a million dollars to investigate the feasibility of this causeway for the use of 100,000 people. In Burnaby alone we have over 100,000 people and we cannot even get a post office out of the government. However, that is beside the point.

There are four members in this house from Vancouver island and I think they should be entitled to the same consideration as the four members from Prince Edward Island. As the minister has said, the department has never given serious consideration to the causeway I have suggested but in all seriousness I would like to propose to him the engaging of one engineer for the period of one year for the purpose of doing some preliminary investigating as to the feasibility of such a project. It would not cost more than $15,000 or $20,000 and he might whisper some advice into the ear of the minister a year hence. We all know there is another election coming up four or five years from now which might be a suitable time for the minister to be well advised on the possible cost so that he could go forth at that time with a great announcement that one of the greatest engineering works in the history of Canada was about to be undertaken and Vancouver island would at last become part of the Dominion of Canada.

I hope the minister will seriously consider at least having one of his engineers spend some time on this proposition. It is not something new; it has been talked about ever since the danger of Ripple Rock became known to the people of British Columbia, and if the 100,000 people of Prince Edward Island are worthy of an investigation costing $360,000 surely the people of Vancouver island are worthy of the services of one engineer for a period of one year.

Item agreed to.

Trans-Canada highway—

366. To provide for construction through national parks, $12,500,000.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am still not sure, when we come to these statutory items, whether to proceed while we are still considering the numerical vote or to wait until it passes.

I have a number of comments to make regarding the construction of the trans-Canada highway, more particularly on the lines of the suggestion which has been made from many quarters about starting a so-called second trans-Canada highway or the building of an east-west interprovincial highway in the north-central part of Canada. It seems to me that traditionally there is a continuing conflict of interest between people living in urban areas and those living in rural areas, and we notice it especially when it comes to highways, roads, bridges and ferries. The interest of the great majority of the people here in Canada, of those who live in a path approximately a hundred miles north of the United States border, seems to have been given far more consideration in relation to that given to the needs of those living north of this belt than appears to be expedient, and as a consequence the outlying areas, the rural areas, the parts of the nation which are in the northern three-quarters of Canada, those areas in which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is interested through his resources program, those areas which were brought into the limelight by the Conservative party during the recent campaign, those areas which are apparently the subject of this vision that was—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but we are discussing at present estimate No. 366, which reads as follows:

Trans-Canada Highway—to provide for construction through national parks, $12,500,000.

I believe the hon. member is actually discussing a statutory estimate. He should confine his remarks to this particular estimate, No. 366.

Mr. Green: I think, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member would be at liberty to discuss the statutory item as well as item 366.

Mr. Howard: If that is permissible, I should like to proceed. These areas in the northern part of the province have up until now been left out in the cold. They have not been given due consideration with regard to programs of road construction, and I sincerely hope, with all due respect to the hon. gentlemen seated on the treasury benches opposite, that they will undertake to give effect to their vision of the north to a greater extent than has been indicated up to the present time by entering into an arrangement for joint financial participation in building an additional east-west highway across the north-central portion of at least the four western provinces.

The application of such a program to the larger provinces in Canada and to the maritimes is a question I should not care to enter upon at this time because I am not too familiar with the geography of those provinces, but as far as the four western provinces are concerned, the building of a second trans-Canada highway is long overdue. I say this although I know that the first trans-Canada highway is still not complete, with the exception of a section in one province, but I understand that one or two other provinces will either complete their sections this year or will come very close to having them completed. I do not think we should wait until the present trans-Canada highway is completed before we embark on an additional one.

If I may keep closer to home and refer to the northern part of British Columbia where I live, I can say without hesitation that our problem is one of the worst which confronts any of the western provinces. We had the honour of a visit by the Minister of Public Works a few months ago and I hope this will not be the last visit he will make before the next election. I hope he will come back before then to get to know a few more of the people and a few more of the problems, and if he will let me know when he plans to come I will try to act the part of host as far as I can.

As I say, we have been completely neglected when it comes to road building. Until a few years ago there was only a very small percentage of the 500 miles of highway between Prince Rupert and Prince George that was black topped. Much of it was not even gravelled; it was merely a rough path through the bush. Parts of that highway are being reconstructed at the present time and additional black top is being put on, but it is still far from adequate.

In recent years there has been a marked increase in industrial development in this region, a marked increase in population, a marked increase in tourists visiting that part of the country and an increase in appreciation by people who live in the southern part of the province of the fact that there is something more up there than trees, hills, mountains, lakes and wilderness. I hope that out of consideration for the people who have moved into this area, people with a great deal of the pioneer spirit, some consideration will be given to meeting at least their need for highways.

Not only should that section of the road which we already have in British Columbia, that is the east-west highway from Prince Ruper to Prince George, be brought without delay into a satisfactory condition, but also that area between Prince George east toward Alberta through the Rocky Mountain trench could be opened up and a highway constructed through there so that people who wish to drive to Calgary or Edmonton may not be obliged to make detours which take them many hundreds of miles out of their way.

The need for highways in British Columbia is even greater than it is in the other three western provinces. The other provinces have many more roads already in existence; their engineers are not faced with the mountainous terrain with which we have to contend and costs of construction are correspondingly less.

Every municipality, board of trade, chamber of commerce and organization representing working men or a general economic group in the constituency I represent has had an interest in this highway for some time. They are becoming increasingly interested in having it built under federal-provincial participation. I also know that in presenting briefs to the previous Liberal administration in years past the province of British Columbia has made a similar request for that kind of participation in the building of a second route through that part of the country.

The minister might not wish to disclose the plans that exist at the moment in his department with respect to this suggestion and in all probability he would rather make the announcement at a more appropriate time when all details have been cleared away, but I now draw his attention in more detail than I was able to on another occasion in this house in different proceedings to an article which appeared in the Vancouver Sun recently setting out that these thoughts exist in the mind of the minister and his officials and that plans are being made for a route embracing the area I have mentioned and suggesting that some thought had been given to financial arrangements. I hope the newspaper article was not pure speculation as some are and while I hope it does not delve too deeply into the detail that is in the mind of the minister at the moment and which he may not wish to disclose at this time—although I wish he would—I nevertheless trust that the article is as factual as it possibly can be and reflects the true attitude of the minister, his department and the government in so far as the construction of a second trans-Canada highway is concerned.

Nothing would make me happier at this stage of the committee proceedings than to have the minister indicate if only in a general way that he agrees with the many people who have urged that there be federal-provincial participation in the construction of such a road. If he agrees only to the extent of saying that negotiations are under way I would be perfectly happy as would be the people who have lived in that part of the country for many years and the people who have just moved there. The people of that district for many years have been neglected by both federal and provincial governments not only with respect to highways but in many other fields.

I hope the minister will undertake to make a comment even if it is of a general nature or the expression of a pious hope to the effect that this will be undertaken. This will bring happiness to the hearts of the people who have long been residents of the area and it will make the new people coming in feel a little more proud of the fact that they have located in that part of the country which is so rich in potential and beauty. This will assure them that they will be able to live there and drive their motor cars without having to wear out a set of tires every 12,000 to 15,000 miles, without having to buy a new gas tank every time they drive more than a few hundred miles, without losing oil pans and without having their cars depreciate in value probably at least twice as fast as is the case with automobiles that are driven only on hard-top roads.

I think I know the minister's inner feelings fairly well. If it were possible for him to do so without violating the confidence of his colleagues and his department I know he would stand up and assure us that this project will be undertaken immediately. I know that is what he wants to say but I also appreciate that he has to respect the government and his colleagues and he may not be able to go that far in giving his answer. I trust the minister will say something that will be of encouragement to us in this respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the minister yields to the importunities of the hon. member for Skeena I should like to say a word or two on this item. In the first place I should like to congratulate the minister and his department on the marvellous job that is being done in the construction of the trans-Canada highway in the Terra Nova national park. I was through there somewhat less than a month ago and as I believe I have already confessed I hi-jacked one of the minister's vessels on one occasion out of working hours to get across Clode sound. The road is the best in Newfoundland, as far as it has been completed. As far as I could see they are working very hard at it and as the minister probably knows, and certainly as his officials know, when that link through the national park is completed it will be possible for the first time in history to drive a motor car across Newfoundland and that is going to be a very great day. I do not mind how many times the minister visits Newfoundland and I hope he will come down and drive over the road in the first cavalcade when that part of the road is completed.

What I did want to say was prompted by the observations of the hon. member for Skeena. My remarks are not confined exclusively to Newfoundland. I was in the legislative assembly in Halifax not long ago and heard the minister of highways—or whatever is his designation in that province—speaking about the section of the trans-Canada highway through Pictou and Antigonish counties and he mentioned the difficulties the province had faced in financing its share of that work. My remarks will therefore apply to all the eastern provinces. Desirable though I feel it would be to have a second trans-Canada highway in western Canada, the original project of having one road right across this country should be completed first. The real reason why some provinces have been able to complete, or nearly complete, their share of the construction of this highway is that the 50-50 basis of division does in fact make it relatively easy for some provinces to complete their sections but much more difficult for others. As the hon. member for Skeena very properly pointed out, there is a great deal of difference between the cost of completing roads in one part of the country than in another. I can share the hon. gentleman's feelings about gas tanks and tires because I drove a borrowed car on a section of the first 50 miles of the trans-Canada out of Port-aux-Basques last summer and at the end of the 50 miles there was no bottom left in the car.

As the hon. member for Skeena very properly said, the building of roads is a constitutional responsibility of the provinces. The conception of the trans-Canada highway was to have one great national road across the country. Since I assume the government's resources are not inexhaustible I hope consideration will first be given to completing the trans-Canada highway before we begin to use limited resources for building other roads, desirable though they might be as well. Surely the most important and urgent thing is to have one national highway extending from coast to coast that enables us to get from one end of the country to the other.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Are you speaking now as a sailor or a landlubber?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments on this item before it passes. I must first of all disagree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The provinces of western Canada are landlocked, and this is perhaps particularly true of northern Alberta. On the other hand the eastern provinces already enjoy the benefit of the St. Lawrence seaway and other coastal seaways.

Since I am a member of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines I can assure this committee that the government is now spending considerable money in subsidizing seaways, and I do not feel that we are asking too much to encourage the government to go ahead right now with providing surveys and doing the brushing for the second trans-Canada highway.

I should also like to go on record by saying that in the province of Alberta the northern section of the highway should run from Lloydminster to the gates of Jasper national park. The road to the park is in very good condition and we are very proud of the highway. Unfortunately, when we get to the gates of Jasper national park our highway runs out.

I am very pleased to hear that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is happy with the construction of the road in his national park. I am very sorry to say that the construction which the previous administration undertook in Jasper national park is a disgrace to the government of Canada. Every spring they have to send in a ranger to saw off the roots of trees that come up through the pavement. That is an established fact. I would like to commend the government on the survey work and brushing which took place in the park last winter. We are also very happy with the announcement of the construction which will take place on the Banff-Jasper highway connecting the two greatest national parks in Canada. We would like to encourage the government to speed up that section of the Yellowhead highway, so-called, from the Jasper national park. It is the bottleneck at present. We would encourage them to speed up the surveying, brushing and constructing of an all-weather road through Jasper to the eastern gates. Then, we would like to encourage them to enter into negotiations with the province of British Columbia for the completion of the Yellowhead highway.

If I may, I would like to go on record as saying that this is a highway which we in the northern parts of the prairie provinces are glad to support. I am sure that all my colleagues agree with me. I do not need to worry about their political affiliations in northern Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We would like to see the highway built as soon as possible, because at the present moment there are places in our province from which we would have to travel approximately 500 miles to reach the present trans-Canada highway. I do not think it is fair that we should be bottled up in the north, and I earnestly and sincerely recommend to the government that they proceed with all haste and survey and construct the Yellowhead highway, which is the easiest road to build. It is the road that will be the freest from avalanches and rock slides. At present there is a good road across the prairies practically to the gates of Jasper. We would appreciate government action in this regard.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the vote we are considering has to do with construction of the trans-Canada highway in the national parks. Then, there is a statutory vote dealing with the contributions made by the dominion to the provinces toward the construction of the trans-Canada highway where it is not in the national parks. I think it would not be appropriate for me this afternoon to take any time to discuss the trans-Canada highway other than to say that it is coming along splendidly. We expect it to be completed by the end of 1960 and I know it will be a highway of which every Canadian can well be proud. As a matter of fact, that is the situation today over a very large mileage of the trans-Canada highway. The government is very much interested in this highway and also in the further steps to develop the country. For that reason the remarks made by all three members who have spoken on this item this afternoon have been extremely helpful. I am not in a position to announce any policy at the moment but I can assure hon. members that the federal government has no intention of breaking up the dominion-provincial partnership in the construction of roads once the trans-Canada highway has been completed. We are vitally interested in work of this type because we think it means so much in building this nation into one of the great nations of the world.

Mr. Howard: First, I would like to ask one question. I understood the minister to say that this was not the appropriate time to discuss the trans-Canada highway in detail.

Mr. Green: What I meant was, if I started to make a speech on the trans-Canada highway it would take me two or three hours. I think it would not be very wise to make it.

Mr. Howard: This is the item under which it would be done. I misunderstood what the minister said but I did not misunderstand what he said when he made reference to the fact that this government is going to wait until the first trans-Canada highway is completed before they start on any additional federal-provincial co-operative road-building projects.

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Howard: That is what I heard.

Mr. Green: No, I did not say that. I said that the government had no intention of leaving the dominion-provincial partnership in the construction of highways once the trans-Canada had been completed.

Mr. Howard: If I can substitute my own words, the government has no intention of breaking up the federal-provincial co-operation in highways once the first trans-Canada has been built.

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the ray of hope.

Mr. Howard: I still hope the minister does not mean he is going to wait until the first trans-Canada highway is completed before he enters into arrangements to start an additional one.

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Howard: The minister did not mean that?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Green: I did not say that.

Mr. Howard: When does the minister intend to start the second trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Green: I explained to the committee that I cannot announce policy at the present time. The hon. member should not be discouraged.

Mr. Howard: Very seldom do I get discouraged, Mr. Chairman. I find that if one has a tendency to become discouraged he would have been discouraged because of what happened many days ago. You know, Mr. Chairman, the number of occasions upon which we have had expressions of opinion by hon. members standing in their places and indicating yes or no on various subject matters, and you also know there was a sort of preponderance of the votes on one side. If I was easily discouraged I would have been discouraged a long time ago. Is it the intention of the minister to present to the house on some future occasion during this session amendments to the Trans-Canada Highway Act? I understand the act should be amended in order to permit the government to enter into arrangements for the construction of a second trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Green: Like many other questions of policy, Mr. Chairman, it would be inappropriate for me to make any statement on that point at the moment.

Mr. Fisher: The questions that I should like to ask are not questions of policy; they are related to performance. Can the minister give us any explanation as to why the province of Ontario has not been able to move faster to complete its section of the trans-Canada highway, especially the very large link between Sault Ste. Marie and Marathon, Ontario? Can he give us any sort of time schedule for that region as his engineers have been able to determine it?

Mr. Green: The gap in the trans-Canada highway in Ontario is from Agawa river to Marathon following generally the north shore of lake Superior for a distance of approximately 164 miles. This is very difficult country in which to build a road. In some cases it has been necessary for the contractor to go by boat and land materials and men on the shore of lake Superior in order to reach the right of way. Very satisfactory progress is being made, and I believe the work is going ahead exceptionally well during the present year. We believe that the gap will be closed by the end of 1960. The dominion is paying 90 per cent of the cost of 136 miles of the gap with Ontario paying 10 per cent, although Ontario is actually doing the construction work. The cost of the remaining portion, of course, is being shared on a 50-50 basis. I understand that the total mileage has either been cleared already or is under clearing contract. One hundred and fifteen miles are under grading contract and the whole of the gap will be under grading contract before the end of the present month.

Mr. Fisher: The minister is probably aware that several years ago there were serious repercussions in connection with the building of the trans-Canada highway in the province of Ontario which caused somewhat of a turmoil. Since the new administration came into power, is the minister satisfied with the general integrity of performance as the work is being carried on at the present time and can he guarantee that there is no likelihood of any repetition of the previous unsavoury situation?

Mr. Green: A close check is kept by the federal officials and we have no reason whatever to believe that the work is not being done in an efficient and honest manner.

Mr. Fisher: I have one last question which is a political one. Would the minister undertake to explain to the house why that magnificent Conservative government in Ontario, paralleled by the magnificent government we have federally, has not been able to complete the highway? I understand there is one province somewhere in Canada that has completed its section of the highway, and maybe the minister can explain why.

Mr. Green: I am very glad to have this tribute to the federal government from the hon. member. It might be very helpful some day. Construction along the shore of lake Superior is extremely difficult and I try not to compare the achievements or obligations of the different provinces so far as the trans-Canada highway is concerned. Some undoubtedly have easier construction than others. The question of population also comes into the picture. In some provinces or portions thereof the highway runs through settled areas. In others, portions of the highway run through what is practically virgin territory. That is the case with the highway along the north shore of lake Superior. From our point of view all the participating provinces are doing a good job. They are all co-operating very well. This project is one example of how Canadian governments can get along together no matter what their political beliefs may be.

Mr. Howard: I know that the minister does not really need the advice I intend to impart to him. From developments since he took office and more particularly just before that time I am sure he knows that one of the quickest ways he can get into trouble in certain parts of the country is to follow the advice of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. As I said, I am sure the minister does not need advice from me not to pay too much attention to what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said. He will get into difficulty, particularly with the people who live in the four western provinces, if he follows the advice of the hon. member to wait until the completion of the present trans-Canada highway before commencing construction of the second trans-Canada highway that has been proposed.

I know that the minister has a great deal of sense and understanding of the forces at work among the general public, especially when it comes time for the people to cast their ballots. I am sure that if the minister will look ahead to the next election and will undertake to enter into arrangements for commencement of construction of a second trans-Canada highway following the general route I have mentioned there is a possibility that he may be able to add one more seat to the Tory ranks from British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are many more possibilities in Newfoundland.

Mr. Howard: If, in an effort to get a second trans-Canada highway constructed through the area I have mentioned, Prince Rupert, Terrace, Hazelton and Burns Lake, the area in which I live, as part of the payment I have to relinquish my seat, involuntarily, of course, on election day, I would be more than pleased to do so. The minister should keep it in mind that he may be able to add one additional member from British Columbia, and if that is the payment I have to make I will be more than pleased to do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: A most immoral proposition.

Mr. Green: This is a very tempting offer.

Mr. Dumas: We are all very proud, of course, of the trans-Canada highway and appreciate very much the excellent work which has been done by the minister's department in this respect. We are also aware of the co-operation existing between the federal government and the different provinces. I should like to know whether the minister can report something new regarding discussions which may have taken place lately between his department and the province of Quebec respecting the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Green: There have been no discussions since we took office. I would point out again that we must treat the provincial governments as equals. They make their own decisions and we try not to interfere with those decisions.

Mr. Caron: We hear quite a lot said about the trans-Canada highway. A short time ago a western member said that roots were poking through the pavement in a certain section. Has the minister been advised of that fact by his engineers?

Mr. Green: I think the remarks made by the hon. member have to do with a highway in Jasper national park, which is not the trans-Canada highway. The trans-Canada highway goes through Banff national park.

Mr. Hardie: I am wondering if I could receive any answers to the questions I asked earlier?

Mr. Howard: What is your province doing?

Mr. Hardie: I would suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia and others who spoke about the next trans-Canada highway, that if I were to follow the vision of the present government during the last election campaign I would say that the next trans-Canada highway should be built north and south to give some breadth to this country instead of length.

I am wondering if under this item of trans-Canada highway I can get an answer to some of the questions I asked about road construction in the north which is supervised by this Department of Public Works?

Mr. Green: No, that has nothing to do with the trans-Canada highway. Those questions should be asked on the estimates of the department of northern affairs.

Mr. Hardie: When I asked those questions originally, I was told there was an item in the public works estimates upon which I could ask those questions. I am now asking for answers under the only item I see in the public works estimates that I could expect a reply. The Department of Public Works calls for tenders for road construction in the north, regardless of whether it is the department of northern affairs or anyone else who pays for it.

On June 13 at page 1132 of Hansard, I think although I am not too sure, I asked which company received the contract on the Yellowknife to Fort Rae section of the road in the Northwest Territories. What was the amount of the tender, and what amount was paid to the contractor up to now? How many miles of road did the contract cover, and how many miles were completed? I am wondering if the minister could answer these questions now which I asked on June 13?

Mr. Green: Those questions certainly do not come under the trans-Canada highway. However, I have three pages of answers here to the questions which the hon. member asked on June 13, and I would be very glad to let him have them.

Mr. Hardie: I imagine the minister has had these answers for some time. These answers may give me the opportunity of asking further questions. If I could have those answers now, and if this item were to be held over, possibly I would have some other questions to ask.

Mr. Green: This trans-Canada highway item is in no way connected with these questions. I am sure that when he has the answers the hon. member will be in a splendid position to ask a lot of questions of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Regier: I should like to ask the minister for some information about the progress of this highway in my province. Just what portion of the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia has been designated and agreed upon between the two levels of government as being eligible for the 90 per cent federal contribution towards the cost? Where does it begin?

While we are referring to British Columbia, I have a few more questions. Has an agreement yet been arrived at between the two levels of government on the rerouting of the highway in the lower mainland, the portion running through Surrey, Burnaby and so on? If an agreement has been arrived at on the new route, what is the basis upon which the federal department agrees to a change in the route once payments have been made for a highway? I understand that in years gone by the federal department paid a portion of the cost of the Pattullo bridge across the Fraser. I believe the minister was a member of the house when the federal government agreed to pay a portion of the cost of that bridge. I believe also that part of the trans-Canada highway running immediately east of the bridge has been paid for by the federal government. Now, exactly what happens if there is an agreement reached that this highway shall be relocated, and shall possibly include a new bridge? I have reference, of course, to the much talked about Port Mann bridge.

Mr. Green: In that event, the money that has been spent would be credited to us when the route is changed. I believe that the route through the lower Fraser valley has been agreed upon in principle, but the survey has not yet been completed so I cannot say exactly where the road is to run. The portions of the highway in British Columbia, apart from national parks in which of course the dominion pays everything, on which we pay 90 per cent are; 26 miles from mile 474.63, to the western boundary of Glacier national park to Donald; 11 miles from the eastern boundary of Glacier national park; 11.77 miles from mile 183.9 to mile 195.67, including the Alexandria bridge which is I believe in the Fraser canyon. I suspect that in most of the provinces the 90 per cent ends up as the most expensive portion of the construction. Then, there is 8.1 miles from mile 202.73, China Bar, to mile 211.6, and that again is in the Fraser canyon. There is a total of 56.78 miles.

Mr. Regier: I thank the minister for that information. I know that this portion has not yet been completed. The minister says the relocation has been agreed upon in principle. Can the minister say whether or not this involves the signing of a new formal agreement or is it only done by an exchange of letters?

Mr. Green: The agreement just covered in general terms a road from somewhere in the vicinity of Abbotsford to a road in the vicinity of the south bank of the Fraser river where the new bridge is to be completed.

Mr. Regier: That was the formal agreement?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Regier: I take it, then, since the minister mentioned the south bank of the Fraser, there is not yet any agreement about a bridge across the Fraser on the highway through Burnaby?

Mr. Green: That is also included in the agreement.

Mr. Regier: Could the minister say how far west it goes; does it go all the way to Horseshoe bay?

Mr. Green: The agreement covers a bridge over the Fraser river and then a route to the south shore of Burrard inlet. It does not cover a bridge over Burrard inlet but it does cover the upper levels highway to Horseshoe bay?

Mr. Winch: Might I ask the minister a question on a matter which I consider is most important to the government of British Columbia. In view of the developing volume of traffic on the lower mainland of British Columbia, is his department prepared to pay half the cost of a bridge, whether it be for a four, six or eight-lane highway? I understand the department will pay only half the cost of a four-lane highway and that, of course, is ridiculous when considering such a matter as the building of a bridge over the Fraser river.

Mr. Green: We have to have the same agreement with all the provinces and I would like to point out that the trans-Canada highway was never designed as a highway to take care of heavy traffic in the vicinity of large cities, it was designed as a trans-Canada road. In so far as a bridge is concerned, we pay for a 24-foot roadway on the bridge itself and a 10-foot shoulder on either side of it, which would be a total of 44 feet. If the province wants to build a very much wider bridge then the additional cost is their responsibility.

Mr. Winch: I know I do not have to remind the minister—he knows Vancouver and the lower mainland of British Columbia so well—but any bridge across the Fraser river is not an inter-city highway; it is a trans-continental road. Does the minister say that he will not through his department pay more than a 24-foot contribution with a 10-foot shoulder on each side, and that the rest must be covered by the province or the municipality?

Mr. Green: British Columbia has to be treated in exactly the same way as the other provinces and in some instances a very much wider bridge is required, not at all because of trans-Canada highway traffic but because of local traffic. In the case of the crossing of the Fraser river much of this traffic comes up from the United States and there would be no reason why the dominion government should pay, for example, 50 per cent or 90 per cent of the cost of the bridge to provide for all that traffic.

Mr. Hardie: With respect to the department of northern affairs' estimates, and here we get back to the question of whose responsibility it is to answer questions in this house in regard to those estimates, a year ago $55,000 was set aside to complete the building of a spillway over the Hay river at Hay River in the Northwest Territories. Plans for this purpose were drawn up by the department of the minister and at that time I understood that tenders were to be called in July for the construction of the spillway. Construction was however, not proceeded with and I am wondering just which department changed its mind with respect to this construction; was it the department of northern affairs or the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Green: This matter is under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Hardie: That is true, the department of northern affairs did include in their estimates the amount of money required to build this spillway but at the same time that department is not responsible for the drawing up of plans for this spillway or for the preliminary survey work—

The Deputy Chairman: I must inform the hon. member that he is out of order. We are discussing the trans-Canada highway and I cannot find anything in the remarks of the hon. member with respect to that subject.

Mr. Hardie: Perhaps the Chairman would be kind enough to tell me under which item I might question this department on the moneys which they have spent for other departments or for preliminary surveys or the planning of bridges, spillways or anything else for any other department?

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid I must advise the hon. member that we do not make those decisions from the chair.

Mr. Hardie: If the Chairman cannot make those decisions—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are discussing this item and I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks strictly to the item under discussion.

Mr. Hardie: No, Mr. Chairman—the supervision of every bit of work carried on on highways—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hardie: —on the Mackenzie highway or the extension of that highway to Yellowknife and the spillway is supervised and the plans are drawn up by the Department of Public Works and tenders are called by that department.

The Deputy Chairman: I would ask the hon. member to co-operate with the chair. We are now discussing the trans-Canada highway and I must keep the hon. member within the scope of this item.

Mr. Hardie: Could the minister then tell me under which item I can question his department?

An hon. Member: Order—do your homework.

Mr. Hardie: You fellows had better do some homework.

Mr. Regier: He is absolutely right.

Mr. Hardie: Empty skulls.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hardie: I cannot question the department on any other item or votes.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Regier: I would like to say something on a point of order. However, I will not, but I am sure after some consideration the chairman will reconsider his decision with respect to the hon. member for Mackenzie River.

Could the minister explain how it is that an agreement has been reached for federal cost sharing of the bridge across the Fraser river which, I take it from the minister's words, is in fact federal cost sharing only as it applies to a two-lane bridge. The minister knows that such a bridge will not be built —no one is going to build a two-lane bridge across the Fraser river—it would be ridiculous.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence pursuant to standing order 15 (3).

PRIVATE BILLS

BURRARD INLET TUNNEL AND BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-4, respecting the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give authority to the shareholders of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company to authorize, if they so desire, the payment of directors' fees to the directors of the company within the modest limits contained in the bill and also to authorize the reimbursement of expenses incurred by the directors in furthering the company's interests.

Hon. members may like to know who are the directors of this company. They are all well-known west coast gentlemen. One is Alderman Cornett of the city of Vancouver, long experienced in municipal matters; others are Mayor Goldsworthy of the city of North Vancouver and his associate Alderman Gostick; there are also on the board Reeve Sam Macrae and Councillor Fraser of North Vancouver, and Reeve Richards of West Vancouver. Hon. members may also like to know who the shareholders of this company are. Mr. Speaker, the shareholders are as follows: first, there is the city of Vancouver, then the city of North Vancouver, the district of North Vancouver and the municipality of West Vancouver. They own between them some 8,000 shares. These are the total shares outstanding, except 25 additional shares owned by the Cotton estate.

I wish to point out also that the board of directors of this company is charged with the responsibility of operating the company as a profit making company as opposed to, say, a school board or other like institution.

The board has requested that the company charter be amended. Whether or not directors' fees will be paid will finally rest with the municipalities to decide. This bill merely enables fees to be paid. It is up to the shareholders to decide the rest. No director is a shareholder, and thus a director is not entitled to vote unless he acts as proxy. In running this bridge company the directors must give additional time apart from their other duties. They are out to make a profit for the company; it is a commercial business.

I think it might be best if I gave hon. members a short history of this company. The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company was first incorporated in 1910, giving authority to a private group to build a tunnel in Burrard inlet, Vancouver, British Columbia, at what is known as the first narrows, or a bridge at the second narrows in the same inlet. It was considered at that time that the cost of a tunnel was too great to justify its construction and, in fact, it was too early for the building of a bridge across the second narrows.

The purpose of the bridge was to join the city of North Vancouver, the district of North Vancouver, and the municipality of West Vancouver to the city of Vancouver by roadway. The population of Vancouver at that time was only in the neighbourhood of about 90,000 with the other city and districts very small. Eventually the company's rights of building were taken over by the two cities and two municipalities to which I have referred. The bridge was completed in 1925.

The fixed span of the bridge was carried away in 1930 and replacement was completed in 1934. It was at this time that the federal government made available one million dollars with the proviso that management of the bridge would be assumed by the national harbours board pending the repayment of the loan from the federal government.

Upon the return of the bridge to the bridge company in March 1951 its finances were in extremely bad condition. The company had made default under a trust deed mortgage to the Montreal Trust Company to secure $630,000. No interest had been paid for several years; no sinking fund had been set up for several years, and coupons outstanding in default amounted to $642,600. A similar default existed in regard to a second trust deed mortgage of $70,000. The bridge company had no funds to meet a temporary loan from the national harbours board of $98,000.

The company's financial position had been poor from the time of the construction of its bridge over the second narrows. The supreme court of British Columbia had appointed a receiver upon the application of the Montreal Trust Company, the trustee under the two bond mortgages.

Under the management of a very able directorate the company's financial situation has greatly improved since March 31, 1951 when the company took over the railway and bridge from the national harbours board.

I have a copy of the company's financial statement for the year ending December 31, 1957, as certified by the company's auditors. The statement shows that the company paid a dividend for the year 1957 of $321,000, being 40 per cent on the capital stock outstanding. The huge amounts of unpaid arrears of interest, coupons and sinking funds referred to have been paid and provided. The company's operating profit before fixed charges for the year ending December 31, 1957, amounted to some $613,000, and after deduction of fixed charges, including depreciation, the company's net profit for the year amounted to some $529,000.

In my opinion, time and ability on the part of the directors will be required in the next few years in excess of the usual time devoted to carrying on the company's business. In view of the construction now proceeding of a competitive bridge at the second narrows, sponsored by the provincial government, I am of the opinion that a new deal with the Canadian National Railways will come up for consideration by the directors of the bridge company. The nature of any new deal cannot be defined now. The formation of it undoubtedly will require considerable study and will require a board of directors sufficiently interested in their work to devote the necessary time and effort. I do not see why they should not receive some reasonable remuneration.

Finally, I mention by way of comparison the fact that members of the greater Vancouver water district, which is a corporation created by provincial statute in 1924, have always been paid. For many years they have been paid—small sums, it is true—but they have received remuneration. The corporation which I have referred to was not constituted for the purpose of making money and paying dividends. The corporation under review at the present time was constituted for making money.

I feel that the directors have been most fair in considering the welfare of the shareholders. The directors could have drafted the bill in such a way as to have provided that they alone could have set the amount to be paid to them by way of remuneration but if hon. members will peruse the draft bill they will see that it is the shareholders and the shareholders only who have the power to determine the amount to be paid.

I should also like to commend the board of directors. As I mentioned, most of them are senior officials in western Canada and most have had long experience in municipal affairs. They have set extremely reasonable sums to be paid as remuneration. They have stipulated that the maximum amount that may be paid to a director shall be the sum of $500 with provision for payment to the president of the sum of $1,200. I am convinced that hon. members will share my feeling that these are most reasonable sums.

The directors are not shareholders of the corporation. They do not even have the right unless appointed as a proxy to be present at the annual meeting. Therefore they do not necessarily have to be at the meeting in order to vote upon this important matter. Such authority is vested solely in the shareholders which, as I explained earlier, are the municipalities concerned. This is an added safeguard over the usual company practice whereby the directors themselves determine the amount of directors fees to be paid. In this instance any fees would have to be authorized by the shareholders meeting which would be composed of persons holding proxies from the shareholder municipalities and, under the Railway Act, such proxies need not be themselves shareholders. Nor is it any requirement whereby a proxy must even be a member of the municipal council. In other words it is quite possible that the directors would not even be present at the shareholders meeting, as I just mentioned, at which the matter of directors fees was determined.

In summary I wish to stress that I feel the directors have acted in good faith, they have drafted a reasonable bill, the sums involved by way of remuneration are not great and there is the added safeguard that the shareholders shall have the right to determine whether or not they shall be paid.

Mr. W. H. Payne (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against the bill as presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor). The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company is a concern which, as has been previously stated, operates a very essential bridge connection between the south shore of Burrard inlet, across the Second Narrows to the north shore. The north shore, I might point out, is one of the major areas represented in my riding of Coast-Capilano. The bulk of the ownership of this company is likewise represented by holdings held by the municipalities on the north shore. Sixty per cent of the shareholdings are held by the city of North Vancouver and the municipal district of North Vancouver. The small amount of the balance entitles the municipality of West Vancouver to seat one director on the board of this company and also to participate in its control to a very small degree. The city of Vancouver itself holds a small share interest and is entitled to the seating of one director on the board.

On the surface it would appear that the purpose of this bill is in order and in keeping with normal, good business practice. However, as the mover has pointed out, since the incorporation of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company in 1910, some 48 years ago, it has had a checkered and quite colourful career. Indeed, in the earlier years it was out of operation more than it was in operation. This has been a matter which has direly affected the life and interest of the people living in the north shore area. For a great many years, other than for ferry contact, it provided the only access to the north side of Burrard inlet.

It is faulty and quite incorrect to consider that it was established and eventually controlled by the municipal areas on the north shore for the purpose of making a profit. It was established for and has been administered by the municipality and city council of North Vancouver for the sole purpose of providing access to the north shore area. Its administration by its directors falls well into the category of a normal operation through a council of aldermen or councillors being named to committees to administer this public utility. The subject of its operation has formed the basis of active and heated debate throughout the more populated area of my constituency, not for just a few years but for many years.

I think it is important to point out the matter of its earning power at this time. Much has been said about the management of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. I wish to pay tribute to those who have been appointed by the three councils and the council of the city of Vancouver in connection with the operation of this essential public utility. However, I wish to stress the fact that its earning power at this time has developed only through the tremendous increase in population in the three municipalities it services on the north shore. It is by virtue of the bridge tolls paid by the taxpayers of that area that those revenues are garnered. The taxpayers of these communities are the very people who for well over two and a half decades have been called upon, through tax assessments, to pay deficits on the operation of this bridge company. The load has fallen heavily on the people living in Coast-Capilano. They are, as has been pointed out, the shareholders, and in the course of the last seven years these shareholders have protested vigorously on two grounds.

One is that council should be able to appoint a man from their midst to act on what virtually is a municipal committee and receive remuneration denied a committee man serving on other essential jobs while in office and a member of council. They have also strongly voiced the opinion that any revenues garnered from the operation of the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company represent basically overcharges placed upon the citizens of the north shore and are a clear indication that rather than operating on a profit basis the bridge tolls should be reduced.

Further to these factors, I would like to point out that if after this strange interim period, being almost 48 years of history, this company shows large profits, those profits are entirely of a temporary nature since a new second narrows bridge, which has already been mentioned and which suffered dire damage and was the scene of a great disaster in my area not many weeks ago, is under construction. It is a 6-lane high level structure. When it is completed, certainly in a period of not more than three years from now, the second narrows bridge will again face financial disaster and the people who will be obliged then to pay for this administration charge if now permitted will be the citizens of my constituency. Mr. Speaker, they have protested and I support them in their protest.

Further, I submit that in three years time this company will be faced with very serious and tragic deficiencies, and I trust that it will be possible through discussions with our federal Department of Transport to see that the old second narrows bridge span, which must be kept in service, as it will still remain at the time of the opening of the service of the new second narrows bridge, as the only carrier of rail traffic, is again brought under the control of the harbours board to form the first portion of an integrated harbours board rail connection and distribution system throughout the north and south sides of Burrard inlet.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this bill. Quite frankly, I am amazed that we who are members of the House of Commons from constituencies that are concerned did not know anything about the introduction of this bill until it was introduced by the hon. member. I have a particular interest because one end of the bridge is in my constituency. I wish to say first of all that I regret that if the shareholders were interested in this the representatives of the constituencies and the municipalities concerned did not see fit to speak to us about it. I can only go on what has been said already by the hon. member who introduced this bill and also from my own knowledge.

I wish to join with the hon. member who has just taken his seat and say that I oppose the passage of this bill in this house. I am afraid that the hon. member who introduced it unintentionally confused the issue. The only shareholders are the municipalities, and the only representatives of the municipalities on the board are the elected members who represent those municipalities. We have this extraordinary situation. The only votes that can be cast are the votes of the elected representatives who represent the shareholders who are the municipalities. In other words, there is no other voice whatsoever at any meeting except that of the elected representatives who represent the shareholders who are the municipalities. That, I think you will agree, is a most extraordinary situation. Of course, I am a little bit wrong. I understand there is one person who controls 25 votes out of 8,025. Who the lady is I do not know. Perhaps the hon. member who has moved the second reading of this bill might inform us at the appropriate time. She is the representative of an estate. But the hon. member who moved the motion and has asked our support for it said that this was a profit-making company. As a Vancouver representative and one who represents a constituency in which one end of this bridge is, I deny that statement.

This company was not originally formed in any way whatsoever as a profit-making organization. The company was formed because there was a dire need for a bridge over the second narrows to serve Vancouver and various municipalities on the north shore of Burrard inlet. The company was organized and the bridge was built as a service to the people on both sides of Burrard inlet. Admittedly, it lost money for some time; admittedly, it is now making money. If one is to be completely honest, admittedly in a very short time it may start losing a great deal of money because only a matter of about 100 feet from that bridge a new bridge is being constructed. Unfortunately, that new bridge will not be opened when it was expected it would be because of a calamity we all heard about and spoke about just a matter of a few days ago. Inside of 12 months the engineering defects will be taken care of and a new bridge will be in operation which will take care of every item of transportation in the second narrows area, excepting on a railway basis. That being so, it becomes more important than ever before to recognize that the original construction and continued operation of the bridge was a matter of service and not of profit.

Private Bills

May I just add to what I mentioned a few moments ago that outside of the estate represented by one woman who owns 25 shares out of 8,025, all representatives are directors appointed as elected representatives of the city of Vancouver and the various municipalities which put up the original money for the construction of this bridge. Being elected members they are in the same position as others with similar responsibilities. If you are a member of a city council, a municipal council or a rural municipal council your work is designated by the council. You may be called upon to serve on a library board, a sewer board and undertake all the various responsibilities that go with election to office. Quite bluntly, I cannot see why there should be any differentiation between the responsibilities of a member of a council serving on a library board or sewer board and those of a director of a bridge company engaged in rendering a service. The council member's service is just as great and he also has to attend many more meetings than those who are members of the directorate of this bridge company.

Apparently the city of Vancouver did not think this matter of sufficient importance to draw it to the attention of Vancouver representatives other than the one who has introduced the bill. Nonetheless, while I do not necessarily hope that the bill will be turned down at this time I do think it should be referred to a standing committee of the house for a complete investigation and survey of the situation.

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make one or two observations on the bill and perhaps to facilitate the matter by directing hon. members to the principle that is involved in the bill. I think the principle is particularly important since it involves not only the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company as an ordinary corporate entity but also because of the fact that the company is in effect being run by the municipality. Municipal councillors are elected by the municipality to sit as councillors and to serve on various committees, and in serving on this particular board they are in fact serving on another committee.

The point that bothers me with respect to the matter raised by the hon. member is that the remuneration suggested for the directors and the president is extremely small and because it is so small it would seem to me that the municipal council, if it had seen fit, could have awarded an amount directly to the individual members.

To take a look at the history of the company, the company was incorporated on May 4, 1910 by an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company." Section 7 of the original act of incorporation stated:

The number of directors shall be not less than five nor more than nine, one or more of whom may be paid directors.

I think it is interesting at this time to follow through the statutes and see what happened to the provision as to paid directors. We turn to the Statutes of Canada, 1924, chapter 76, section 2 where it is stated:

Section 7 of the said act is repealed—

That refers to the act I just mentioned.

—and the following is substituted therefor:

"7. The board of directors shall consist of six members, and shall be made up as follows: Two representatives from the district of North Vancouver, one of whom shall be the reeve, and one councillor to be nominated by resolution of the council; Two representatives from the city of North Vancouver, one of whom shall be the mayor, and one alderman to be nominated by resolution of the council; One representative from the city of Vancouver who shall be the mayor for the time being of the said city; One representative from the district of West Vancouver who shall be the reeve of the said district."

There is no reference made anywhere throughout this section as to the directors being paid. Following the matter through, we turn now to the Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 56, section 1, where it is stated:

Section 7 of the act to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company, chapter 74 of the statutes of 1910, as enacted by section 2 of chapter 76 of the statutes of 1924 is repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

"7. The board of directors shall consist of six members and shall be made up as follows:

Two representatives of the corporation of the district of North Vancouver both of whom shall be members of the municipal council of the district to be nominated by resolution of the council;

Two representatives of the corporation of the city of North Vancouver both of whom shall be members of the municipal council of the city to be nominated by resolution of the council;

One representative of the corporation of the district of West Vancouver who shall be a member of the municipal council of the district to be nominated by resolution of the council;

One representative of the city of Vancouver who shall be a member of the city council to be nominated by resolution of the council."

It is interesting to note that in all the amendments up to 1952 no consideration was given to payment and it would have been possible at the time of these amendments to bring in a provision for payment of directors. But evidently the people who were bringing in those amendments thought it was in the best interests not to have such a provision. I would also refer to section 2 of the same statute which reads as follows:

Section 8 of the said act, as enacted by section 1 of chapter 63 of the statutes of 1931, is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(2) In addition to its right to charge tolls under the provisions of the Railway Act the company may charge and collect tolls in respect of the use for pedestrian and vehicular and other like traffic of the said bridge or the bridge as reconstructed, or the ways and approaches connected therewith and owned or operated by the company."

Actually in 1952 we had the first confirmation that the company was entitled to collect tolls on vehicular traffic and pedestrians making use of the bridge. There was a certain amount of confusion in view of the various amendments to the act. I think it is of interest to note that the company was incorporated in 1910 and yet it was not until 1923 that actual construction of the bridge started. In the Statutes of Canada, 1913, chapter 80, an amendment was made to the original act for the purpose of extending the time for construction of the bridge. This was followed by subsequent amendments. Perhaps I should take the time to read the 1913 amendment.. It is found in chapter 80, section 1 and reads:

1. The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company may commence the construction of its bridge—

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member whether this relates to the principle of the bill which seems to be a relatively simple one of whether or not the company shall have the power to pay its directors? I do not think he need spend time on the history of the company except in so far as it relates to the principle which is the subject matter of the discussion on second reading.

Mr. Drysdale: I have brought up this matter because I wished to refer to the length of time before the bridge was actually constructed. Perhaps I might just refer briefly to the citations as a matter of convenience. The time for construction was extended in the Statutes of Canada, 1913, chapter 80; 1914, chapter 73; 1916, chapter 34; 1918, chapter 61; 1920, chapter 74; and 1922, chapter 54. As I mentioned earlier, construction of the bridge was started in 1923 and carried on through 1924 and 1925. The bridge was first opened on November 7, 1925. The bridge had not been designed to be a threat to navigation but shipping interests said that it subsequently would be. As a result of the mistake made by the people constructing the bridge, the steamship Eurana struck the bridge in March, 1927 and a 300 foot span was thrown into Burrard inlet.

This resulted in a very interesting case which went to the privy council, the Steamship Eurana vs the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company. It is reported in 1931 Appeal Cases at page 300. If I may be permitted, sir, I should like to read the headnote in that case.

Where a special act of the dominion legislature has authorized the construction of a bridge carrying a railway over a navigable channel "so as not to interfere with navigation", and has incorporated the Railway Act, an order made by the railway board under section 268 of that act, which empowers the board to authorize the construction of a bridge over navigable waters according to plans approved by the governor in council, affords no defence to a claim in respect of damage caused to a ship by reason of the bridge constructed being a substantial interference with navigation and therefore a public nuisance. The protection of the public right of navigation being dealt with both in the special act and in the general act, the express provision of the special act overrides those of the general act, both having regard to section 3 of the Railway Act and apart therefrom.

This particular judgment reverses the Exchequer Court of Canada and the decision of the admiralty court in British Columbia.

In order to remove the difficulties in which the company found itself chapter 63 of the statutes of 1931 was enacted, section 3 of which reads:

Notwithstanding anything in this or any previous act of the Parliament of Canada, it is hereby declared that the bridge heretofore constructed by the company across the Second Narrows of Burrard inlet shall be deemed to be a bridge constructed in accordance with the terms of the act incorporating the company, chapter seventy-four of the statutes of 1910, and amending acts, and of the Railway Act, and shall not be construed as an interference with navigation.

Section 4 is particularly important, and it states—

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see what these references have to do with the principle of the bill. The hon. member is giving a lot of interesting information, but the only thing the house has to decide is the principle of whether or not the company shall be given the power to pay its directors. Now the hon. member may relate all this to the question of the payment of directors, but if he is not heading in that direction I would ask him to get back to the point.

Mr. Drysdale: Perhaps the argument is a little tenuous, but nevertheless I would assure you, Mr. Speaker, I am leading up to that point. The difficulty I was trying to illustrate there, is that, as a result of the collision, it would cost approximately $1 million to put in this new 300-foot span. The municipalities, who had guaranteed the bonds necessary to finance the new span, and indeed the company, got into a very serious position. The federal government under R. B. Bennett came to the rescue in 1935. At that time the federal government advanced the $1 million necessary to continue with the construction of the bridge. The bridge was constructed and the connection between North Vancouver and the city of Vancouver was renewed following a disruption of some three or four years because of the litigation.

The bridge was taken over by the National Harbours Board until 1951, and at that time was returned to the municipalities. As I mentioned, 1952 was the first time that the tolls on the bridge realized by the municipalities were confirmed as the actual property and entitlement of the municipalities. We have now reached the position, where the bridge is under the complete control of the municipalities. As a matter of fact, I believe last year a profit of some $321,000 was realized, and there was a 40 per cent dividend returned.

As some of the previous speakers have mentioned, adjacent to this bridge there is the Second Narrows bridge which suffered an unfortunate accident recently. When that bridge is completed it will be diverting revenues from the existing bridge. We have a situation, and I am coming to the point, where the directors are taking the attitude that they will give themselves remuneration. Although the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) gave us an excellent dissertation on the background of this particular bill, at no time did he state that the councils of the respective municipalities were in unanimous agreement that this remuneration be paid to the directors. I feel that I cannot support the bill until I am assured that the municipalities are giving their whole-hearted support to it.

I am not inquiring as to the position taken by any member of the council, but we are rather in this position where the directors are suggesting the granting of an increase to themselves, and in all likelihood the municipal councillors will be the individuals who will be receiving the proxies from the municipalities so they will, in effect, be voting this amount of money to themselves. In view of the relatively small amount, which is approximately $1,200 for the president, who is also a director, and the $500 a year for the other directors, I cannot see the necessity for this bill. If it is felt that the directors should receive remuneration, I would be glad to give my whole-hearted support on the basis that, first of all, the councils give a unanimous indication they are supporting this measure.

Mr. Winch: As shareholders.

Mr. Drysdale: Yes; I thank the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). I would support it on the basis that the councillors give their whole-hearted support as shareholders to the idea of these payments and, secondly, I would go so far as to say that the amount to be paid to the directors would be unlimited. Then the municipalities would have the discretion as to the amount to be paid.

[Mr. Drysdale.]

I have risen to speak on this measure because I feel that the councillors and municipalities are performing a public service, and we will have a situation where one or two members of the council will become directors and therefore entitled to extra remuneration as compared with the other members of the council. I feel that this will breed a sense of inequality, and take away from the finer service functions which the councillors perform. I feel, therefore, for the reasons I have stated, and because of the reservations I have made, I cannot support this bill.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the excellence of the arguments that have already been put forward, I shall have very little to say. I think you will have noted that this is the first time for many long years that a private bill has really been considered as a private bill by the members of this house. Thus far, we have had one member speaking on behalf of the bill and two members of the same political party opposing the bill. I feel that this attitude towards private bills is to be heartily welcomed. I say that this is unique, at least over the past number of years.

I, like the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) was very surprised indeed at being faced with this bill at the present time. I have not heard of any representation made by the city of Vancouver, the district of North Vancouver or the district of West Vancouver for endorsation of the principle of this bill. I feel there is a vital principle involved in that one appointee of a municipal council is going to be placed in a preferred position over other appointees. When I think of the appointee of a council to a hospital board I immediately realize that that appointee has more work to do, has far greater responsibility and—certainly over the last few years—has had much more anxiety than has the appointee representing the council on this bridge company's board.

I very much regret this bill has come before us in this manner. I find it almost beyond my ability to vote against a request made by public servants, especially municipal servants. I do not like to vote against the principle of the bill until I have had the chance to examine it much more closely and it is for that reason that I move:

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

We in this group have a tremendous respect for our municipally elected officers and I do not like to vote against something for which they have asked without having thoroughly convinced myself that the principle is in fact wrong. If it is wrong we would, of course, have to vote against it but if we find the principle is not as we imagine it to be we shall be most happy to support the bill when it comes before this House of Commons for second reading.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker; I would like to take issue with one or two things which have been said during this debate and to put forward one or two proposals.

First of all, we have heard from two previous speakers of their concern for the taxpayers. I realize, of course, that it is the duty of every one of us to protect the interests of the taxpayers but, at the same time, I feel if these directors are entitled to remuneration for the job they are doing, if they are earning that pay, this argument on behalf of the taxpayers is not a legitimate one. If they are doing a good job they are entitled to remuneration.

Mr. Winch: How about the hospital boards, the library boards and the school boards?

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have not said anything about them, but if the hon. member would just wait for a moment I will tell him what I have in mind. I feel that protection of the taxpayer is not a legitimate argument against paying the remuneration to which such directors are entitled. What we must find out is whether they are so entitled and in looking back over the history of the legislation I find in the early days of its existence provision was made for the payment of directors in such a case. Perhaps the mover of the bill might let us have some information on this aspect of the matter because somewhere along the line, in connection with the amendment as to who would comprise the board of directors, that particular provision seems to have been dropped.

I have looked back over all the discussions which have taken place with respect to this act since its inception in 1910 and I cannot find any particular reason as to why this provision was dropped. We have been told that the shareholders are the municipalities and the city of Vancouver and as shareholders, the municipal councils and the city council are apparently the authorities which will be setting these payments. I can therefore see no reason why we should place any limit upon such payments as has been suggested. If these bodies will be deciding who the directors should be and how much they should be paid, the setting of a limit would also be their responsibility.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) mentioned that this board should be paid directly by the city or the municipal council concerned, but I think the imbalance of shares makes this proposal impractical. We have been told that they will not all hold an equal quantity of shares and that although Vancouver will appoint a director that city has only a very small amount of shares. I would also like to point out that although this company has been formed since 1910 it apparently did not start operating until 1925 and so far the directors have not been paid—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Winch: Hang on for 60 seconds and you can talk it out.

Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): It has also been said that they have been incurring expenses. I would like to know if such expenses have been incurred what they have been doing all these years with respect to reimbursement and just what expenses have in fact been incurred. Perhaps the mover of the bill could inform us in this respect, and what further expenses might be expected to be incurred.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, is there anything to be said about the business for Monday?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nixon: I wonder if the house leader would indicate the business of the house for Monday.

Mr. Green: On Monday we shall have a supply motion and after we get into supply we will have the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Speaker: I take it there is no arrangement about this matter; it is just a supply motion?

Mr. Green: Yes.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

Question No. 70—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What number of prevailing rate civilian employees are in the Department of National Defence?
2. How many are veterans of the armed services?
3. How many of these veterans will qualify for three weeks vacation under the proposed regulations that the period in which they served in the armed forces will be taken into consideration in computing 15 years of service?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. 21,535.

2. 9,233.

3. As of July 1, 1958, 195 veterans qualified for three weeks' vacation under the new prevailing rate regulations.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—TRAVELLING ESTABLISHMENT COMMITTEE

Question No. 93—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Is there a travelling establishment committee or a complement committee for the Department of National Defence which makes periodic inspections of national defence establishments and which recommends decreases or increases in (a) civil service staffs; (b) civilian prevailing rate employees?
2. If so, how many members comprise this committee and what departments do they represent?
3. At what intervals does this committee make inspections and are the inspections made on the ground at each establishment?
4. When will the next inspections be made at (a) Renous naval ammunition depot; (b) Chatham R.C.A.F. station; (c) St. Margarets R.C.A.F. station, New Brunswick?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. Each of the three services has its own establishment or complement committee. The personnel of these committees varies as between the three services, but all contain a representative of the deputy minister's office, and a representative of the civil service commission staff. These committees make recommendations regarding numbers and categories of both service and civilian personnel. The recommendations of these service establishment or complement committees regarding increases or decreases in the numbers of civilian positions, both annual salaried and prevailing rate, are considered by the Department of National Defence and the civil service commission before the Minister of National Defence formally requests treasury board action to amend establishments.

3. There is no fixed interval for making establishment reviews, although such reviews are normally conducted at intervals of two to three years. In some cases, on the ground inspections are made by investigators who report to the committee; in other cases, such inspections are carried out by one or more members of the committee; in still others, on the ground inspections are not deemed to be necessary.

4. (a) Autumn 1959; (b) a study was carried out at this station in May of this year and it is anticipated that a further study will be made in 1960; (c) summer 1958.

POSTAL STATIONS, DOLLARD COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 129—Mr. Rouleau:

1. Since June 10, 1957, has the government received representations from Mr. Maurice Cousineau, mayor of the city of St. Laurent, requesting the building of new postal stations in the county of Dollard, Quebec?
2. If so, in what locations?

Answer by: Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General):

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

EMPLOYMENT OFFICE, WATERLOO, QUE.

Question No. 133—Mr. Boivin:

1. Have representations been made to the Minister of Labour or any officials of his department asking for the establishment of an employment office at Waterloo, Quebec?
2. If so, by whom?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Yes.

2. (a) To the Minister of Labour by the secretary-treasurer of the corporation of the town of Waterloo; (b) to the chief commissioner of the unemployment insurance commission by the hon. member for Shefford, Mr. Marcel Boivin.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND, N.B.

Question No. 136—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What are the names and addresses of the New Brunswick members of the army benevolent fund board?
2. What amount of money is now on hand for disposition of this board?
3. What has been the annual decrease in the New Brunswick army benevolent fund, each year since 1947?

Answer by: Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

The army benevolent fund board reports as follows:

1. The army benevolent fund is administered in the province of New Brunswick by the New Brunswick committee of the army benevolent fund. Members of this committee are not members of the army benevolent fund board. The names and addresses of the New Brunswick committee are: Chairman, Lt. Col H. G. Crocker, ED, Newcastle, N.B.; member, Major H. R. Sheehan, Saint John, N.B.; member, Major A. E. Bruce, Saint John, N.B.; secretary, Mr. B. R. Doucet, Saint John, N.B.

2. The net worth of the army benevolent fund as at 31 March, 1958 was: $7,517,395.

3. As no allocation of the moneys held by the fund was made to provincial committees, it cannot be said that there has been a decrease in respect of New Brunswick. However, the following table shows disbursements of the fund in the province of New Brunswick since inception by fiscal year:

1949/50	13,447
1950/51	22,934
1951/52	23,354
1952/53	36,528
1953/54	44,060
1954/55	49,856
1955/56	39,183
1956/57	39,635
1957/58	46,606	$338,759

*Expended by army interim benevolent fund.

The figures reported in the above table are taken from ABF claims review analysis.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

350. Ontario, $11,642,900.

351. Manitoba and Saskatchewan, $215,000.

352. Alberta and Northwest Territories, $219,000.

353. British Columbia and Yukon, $2,739,000.

354. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $200,000.

355. To provide for remedial works where damages are caused by, or endanger, navigation or Federal Government structures and to complete protection works already under way, $800,000.

356. Repairs and upkeep, including reconstruction and replacements for the maintenance of services; to provide for wharf repairs at Ste. Angele de Laval, Quebec; and to authorize commitments against future years in the amount of $420,000, no new works to be undertaken, $3,000,000.

Dredging—

357. Maintenance and operation of plant and contract and day labour works, $3,465,000.

358. Construction or acquisition of plant and equipment, $900,000.

359. Maintenance and operation of graving docks, locks and dams, $1,050,000.

Development Engineering Services—

360. Canada's share of the cost of international and interprovincial bridges, as detailed in the estimates, $500,000.

361. Towards replacement of low level Burlington canal bridge, $500,000.

362. Perley bridge, between Hawkesbury, Ontario and Grenville, Quebec—improvements, $55,000.

363. Towards an investigation to determine the feasibility of constructing a proposed causeway across Northumberland strait, including the opening of a test quarry, $200,000.

364. Roads and bridges—maintenance and operation, $178,745.

365. Testing laboratories—operation and maintenance, $869,022.

607. Ontario, $271,000.

608. British Columbia and Yukon, 964,500.

Dredging—

609. Construction or acquisition of plant and equipment—further amount required, $333,500.

610. Maintenance and operation of graving docks, locks and dams—further amount required, $76,000.

Development Engineering Services—

611. Towards an investigation to determine the feasibility of constructing a proposed causeway across Northumberland strait, including the opening of a test quarry—further amount required, $160,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 7, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

WELCOME TO VISITORS IN GALLERY FROM NIGERIA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members of the house would want me to direct their attention to the fact that in the diplomatic gallery there is a parliamentary delegation from the house of representatives of the Federation of Nigeria. The delegation composed of eight parliamentary members is under the leadership of Chief Oweh, parliamentary secretary to the minister of internal affairs. Their visit is one of a continuing series of visits first to the United Kingdom, now to Canada and later to the United States of America, and their purpose is the study of the parliamentary institutions in those countries.

I am sure I speak for all hon. members in welcoming them, and in expressing the hope that their stay in our midst will be profitable and enjoyable.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party I should simply like to join the Prime Minister in the very fitting and warm welcome he has extended to the distinguished representatives of a sister country in our commonwealth.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate hon. members of this group with the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition in welcoming this very distinguished group of members of the house of representatives of Nigeria.

My colleague from Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and I had the privilege of having lunch with them, and we learned a great deal at lunch time about the workings of democracy in this new nation which is part of the commonwealth. We learned from them that they share some of our experience, in that they are looking forward to an election in that country within the next two years and, being a democracy, they are looking forward to that election with keen interest. It is a real pleasure for us to see Nigeria taking its place amongst the democratic nations of the world, and we wish these representatives and their nation the best in the years ahead.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth) moved that the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations, presented to the house on July 4, 1958, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I ask that a correction be made according to my demand of the other day that it was not unanimous but on division.

Motion agreed to on division.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

BEAM STATION ROAD, TERRACE AIRPORT, B.C.

Motion No. 20—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any of its departments, and the government of British Columbia or any other organization or person, dealing with the use of the beam station road at the Terrace airport by the British Columbia provincial government or by any other person.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this motion with the hon. member and he has indicated that it will be satisfactory to him if the correspondence since July 1, 1957, is produced. Subject to this, and the usual reservation as to the consent of the province, I have no objection to the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion agreed to, subject to the qualifications stated by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER—INQUIRY AS TO SUBJECTS TO BE DISCUSSED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the President and the Secretary of State of the United States have indicated in some detail the nature of the visit they are making to Ottawa and the subjects that will be discussed, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister himself made a statement about this over the air last night, would he now inform the house as to the nature of the visit and perhaps in a general way the subjects that may be discussed?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that Canadians as a whole are looking forward with anticipation to the visit of the President of the United States, renewing, as he will, the relationships which were so close during the days of war, and also on this occasion renewing the friendships that he made on previous occasions, first when he was here immediately after the war and then again in November, 1953, when he addressed members of parliament.

I think in general one might summarize those discussions as being informal, designed to achieve an exchange of views between our countries. There will be no set agenda, as I am sure my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition will realize, but of course consideration will be given to various matters which are of immediate interest and importance, both internationally and nationally.

In the international field I would expect an exchange of views regarding the present situation as between the free world and the U.S.S.R.; consideration of the question as to summit talks and the possibility of those talks being inaugurated; the general subject of disarmament with particular reference to our own country and collaboration existing between Canada and the United States, and the matter of Arctic inspection.

Then, too, in the economic field I would anticipate that there would be very considerable attention paid to the economic offensive of the U.S.S.R. everywhere in the world, the effect of which, unless there is a large degree of co-operation among the member nations of the free world, might be apt to be detrimental to that degree of unity so necessary today.

In so far as our relationship with the United States directly is concerned, trading problems will of necessity receive consideration. In that connection I would consider that some of those matters that have received the attention of members of the government, as well as those dealt with in recent speeches by the Leader of the Opposition, will be of foremost importance. The disposal of surplus wheat and other agricultural products by the United States is one matter, of course, that will again receive consideration. The marketing of Canadian oil in the United States is another. The question of the export of zinc and copper to the United States is another. I would also think that aluminum and nickel are two other commodities to which reference will be made and representations considered.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Personally I should like to see agreements arrived at whereby there would be a more continuous exchange of information on cabinet level than has been the case heretofore; in other words, that the joint United States-Canadian cabinet committee should meet more regularly. Indeed, I feel that once a year is insufficient to assure that full discussion and consideration which the economic problems between our countries deserve and demand. My hope is that consideration will be given to the setting up of an informal committee of members of parliament and members of the congress of the United States, to the end that in meeting together from time to time many of the problems which are difficult of solution will be accelerated toward solution by each of us realizing the problems of the other country.

In short, the purpose of this meeting as I envisage it is simply one of exchange of opinions and, above all, that each of us will do our respective part to resolve any difficulties that exist from time to time between our countries. I hope that agreements to be arrived at will be beneficial not only to our own countries but to the maintenance of freedom everywhere in the world.

STATEMENT ON TABLING OF PROCEEDINGS OF U.S. SENATE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to answer a question asked of me by the Leader of the Opposition on May 20. He said:

> I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs would consider tabling the hearings before the special committee of the United States Senate on Canadian-American relations, in view of the widespread interest which I am sure exists on the part of all hon. members in this matter?

At that time I replied that I did not have these papers in the department, and I did not know how I could then comply with the proposal. However, the proceedings of that particular session of the United States Senate committee on foreign affairs have now been published. They were published at the end of last week, but the final text was not available to the department before last Thursday.

Hon. members will recall the proceedings to which the Leader of the Opposition referred; that is, those held on May 16 at which the ambassador from the United States to Canada, Mr. Livingston Merchant, and Professor Percy E. Corbett, of the centre of international studies at Princeton University, testified.

I should like to inform the house that copies have been made available in the library of parliament. I consider that it would not be proper to table the official text in the house, because it is stated in the printed proceedings that are now available to us that the text is printed "for the use of the committee on foreign relations."

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF ALL-CANADIAN ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister tell the house if the government intends to act soon on Premier Frost's suggestion that Canada should proceed as quickly as possible with the construction of the remaining parts of an all-Canadian route of the St. Lawrence seaway?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not that I am objecting to it, but the hon. gentleman did not give me any notice of this question. I will take it as notice. It is rather too comprehensive for an off the cuff answer. I shall reply in due course.

VISIT BY PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR AIRPORT AT CORNWALL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct another question to the Prime Minister, of which I did not give him notice but I do not think he will require notice in this case. My question is based upon a press release emanating from his office in connection with the inundation ceremonies visit which he made to Cornwall on Friday. The press statement gives the reasons why the Prime Minister decided to go by motor car, and with those reasons I certainly am not one who will find fault. But the press statement contains this amazing declaration:

> Mr. Nelson explained that Mr. Diefenbaker could not use a DC-3 for the flight to Cornwall because the Cornwall airport is not large enough to accommodate this twin-engined aircraft.

My question is this. In view of the fact that there is no airport at Cornwall, will the government give consideration to including in the further supplementary estimates an item to cover construction of an airport for this seaway city, which is now extremely important because of the fact that it finds itself in the centre of power and navigation facilities?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an obvious error in that statement. The place of landing was not Cornwall and the difficulties of landing had no reference to Cornwall; I think it would have been necessary to land in another country. In reference to the warm request by my hon. friend for an airport in Cornwall, may I say this. I can appreciate the hon. gentleman's tremendous interest in this matter. I am just wondering why a similar interest was not shown in the past. Ever since 1954 the importance of Cornwall and the St. Lawrence waterway was apparent. I am just wondering once more why there should be the sudden interest additional to, of course, the difficulty that I would have experienced in landing in Cornwall where there is no airport.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the former administration included in the estimates an item for an airport at Cornwall, will the Prime Minister see that the government carries out that project?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall look over those estimates of the former government, and they will receive the attention they deserve.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT ON CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN AGREEMENT AS TO USE FOR DEFENCE PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Friday last the Leader of the Opposition addressed this question to me:

> In view of the pattern of three-power co-operation developed during world war II on atomic matters, could the minister inform the house whether Canada will be invited to join in the agreement signed, I think, the day before yesterday between the United Kingdom and the United States for co-operation on the use of atomic energy for defence purposes?

If I may quote the words of the Prime Minister, that request was too comprehensive for me at the time and I took it as notice. The simple answer to the question is that Canada, while kept informed of developments by both London and Washington, did not join in what according to my understanding is a bilateral agreement between the United Kingdom and the United States. It is true that there was tripartite co-operation during the war on atomic energy matters, and I feel confident that such co-operation would be reactivated if and when necessary.

Since the war, however, co-operation with the United States in this field has for the most part assumed a bilateral form. As the Leader of the Opposition will undoubtedly recall, Canada and the United Kingdom have had bilateral agreements with the United States in the atomic energy field, both civil and military, for some years. My understanding is that the United Kingdom requirements, which are different from Canadian requirements, are such as to call for a new agreement at this time between those two countries.

The new agreement has been made possible by recent amendments to the atomic energy act authorizing congress to expand the areas in which United States information could be given to a friendly country which has made substantial progress in the development of atomic weapons. When and if Canadian requirements call for a supplementary agreement with the United States, the house can assume that a similar course will no doubt be followed. Canada at this time does not qualify for that type of agreement prescribed by the amendments to the atomic energy act of the United States congress.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer which my hon. friend has given, could he give the house the assurance that the bilateral arrangement to which he referred as between the United Kingdom and the United States will not interfere with the pattern of three-power co-operation in atomic matters which developed during the war and was continued after the war?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I can give that full assurance, as I endeavoured to say in reply to a question relating to the amendments to the atomic energy control act last week. We are hopeful in Canada that the amendments will be liberally interpreted and that the co-operation between the United States and Canada in this field will be even greater.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour; I am sure he will not mind my not having given him notice. I wonder whether the minister could make a report, even if it is only an interim progress report, of the meetings which I understand were to be held today between representatives of Canadian Pacific Steamships and the seafarers international union with regard to the strike on the west coast?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, meetings have been held with the C.P.R. and the representatives of the S.I.U. They have been adjourned until 3.30 p.m., at which time we will again resume our talks.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—INSTALLATION OF AIR CONDITIONING IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As he is the minister directly concerned with the welfare, morale and contentment of the civil service, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that Canadian military and civilian personnel work in the latest air-conditioned comfort in Canada's new $2,800,000 military joint staff building in Washington, D.C., would the minister inform the house if the government is giving consideration to the installation of the equipment required to provide similar working conditions for the Canadian civil service in Ottawa?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should have asked that question while the estimates of the Department of Public Works were under consideration.

REPORTED NEGLECT BY PRIME MINISTER TO ANSWER COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a Canadian Press dispatch of July 5, according to which Mr. Fred Whitehouse, president of the Civil Service Federation of Canada, made the statement that three letters and telegrams addressed to the Prime Minister relating to three proposals, including an increase in the salaries of civil servants, have not yet been acknowledged or replied to.

In view of the need to keep morale in the civil service as high as possible, can the Prime Minister say what consideration has been given to these requests?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I received a telegram from Mr. Whitehouse, and I should like to contradict a statement attributed to him which is as follows: "Angry at what he described as the discourtesy of the Prime Minister." Mr. Whitehouse said in this telegram: "I emphatically deny making such a statement and offer an apology for any embarrassment such a report...may cause you."

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the Prime Minister could say when a decision is likely to be made on this and the other questions, including collective bargaining?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not like to say. That is a decision that will be arrived at after full consideration of all the pertinent factors.

TRADE

COMMUNIST CHINA—REPORTED PROSPECTIVE VISIT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of a Canadian Press dispatch in the Montreal Gazette of July 5 which stated that Canada is beginning a big push to build up trade with communist China, and that it had been learned that the minister might visit Peking in the fall. Can the minister say whether such a visit is planned by himself? Does he intend to take with him a substantial delegation, such as went to the United Kingdom, and would he consider strengthening the delegation with other senior members of the government in order that this big push might come off and trade with China be expanded?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am very much afraid I shall not take the hon. member for Assiniboia along with me on this projected tour which, as he knows, is based on press speculation, as I pointed out in a television broadcast that same evening. There is no question at all about the desire, and the will, and the activity of the government with regard to promoting trade all over the world, and if it is possible to increase our trade with China we will do that. Whether it can be best done by this method or by some other method is a matter for consideration.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in view of the somewhat hopeful final sentence used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in replying to the last question. Has the government of Canada given any reconsideration to the recognition of the government of China, as the first necessary step toward building up the trade so urgently needed by Canada at this time?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): That is a matter of government policy. If and when a decision is reached it will be duly announced.

Mr. Argue: There is no big push.

WAR SURPLUS EQUIPMENT—INQUIRY AS TO IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister or the government received any protests from any associations in Canada regarding the importation of war surplus equipment, especially with regard to the case of two recent shiploads of such American equipment received in Canada by way of Japan. If so, what consideration has the government given to such representations?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is a question which does not directly concern the Department of Trade and Commerce.

[Later:]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, since my question is not one for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, may I direct it to the Prime Minister and ask him to take it as notice.

Has the government received any protests from any associations in Canada regarding the importation of war surplus equipment, especially with regard to the case of two recent shiploads of such American equipment received in Canada via Japan? If so, what consideration has the government given to such representations?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): These matters come under my direction. There have been representations to the government, at least to the Department of National Revenue. I have received several telegrams and communications on this matter within the last few days. These questions are now receiving consideration by the government.

TRANSPORT

OLD WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO CLEAN-UP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. I may say that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Smith) is also greatly interested in this question. I am glad to see that he is fully recovered and that he has returned to this house.

When does the government propose to proceed with the old Welland canal clean-up, and rehabilitation of lands in the municipalities of Thorold, Merritton and St. Catharines?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Engineers are preparing plans for this operation, and tenders will be called in the course of the next few months.

POSTAL SERVICE

REQUEST FOR TWICE-DAILY DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I also would like to say a word of welcome to the hon. member for Lincoln

(Mr. Smith) as one who comes from the Niagara district, and say how happy I am to see him back in his seat.

I should like to ask a question of the Postmaster General. Would the minister care to advise the house whether the government intends to institute twice-daily delivery service in residential districts of Canadian communities?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Not in the next few weeks, at least.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. I regret not having given him notice, but it was only a few minutes before coming to this house that I read the article which appeared in one of the Newfoundland local papers on July 4 which prompted the question.

Will the Minister of Finance inform this house if the McNair commission report on term 29, which I understand is still in the hands of the printer, is expected to be tabled in this house in approximately two weeks?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have had no indication as to when the report is likely to be received.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

GLACE BAY, N.S.—REPORTED REDUCTION IN STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question the Postmaster General. Would the minister care to comment upon reports that the mail carrier staff in the town of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, is to be reduced?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I have had no notice of this question. I will be glad to get this information and inform the hon. member.

FISHERIES

BUCTOUCHE BAY, N.B.—REPORTED CLOSING OF QUAHAUG BEDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the relative importance of the quahaug fishery in the Buctouche bay area, and in view of prevailing reports that this fishery henceforth will be closed due to the recent transplanting of disease-resistant oyster stocks in that same area, could the minister inform the house what action, if any, is contemplated by the government relative to this issue?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I am happy to inform him that the reports to which he refers do not accurately reflect the situation. While it is true that the Department of Fisheries has closed quahaug fishing in the immediate areas where disease-resistant oysters have been transplanted, there is still a large part of Buctouche bay open to quahaug fishing.

[Later:]

Mr. Michaud: Mr. Speaker, supplementary to my question of a few minutes ago may I ask the following. The minister indicated that part of the Buctouche bay area is still open for quahaug fishing. I take it from his reply that it is still the intention of the department to keep that section open in the future.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is correct. The only areas that will be closed to quahaug fishing will be those in the immediate vicinity of where disease-resistant oysters have been transplanted.

MIRAMICHI, N.B.—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CHANGE IN SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. On Tuesday last the minister stated in answer to a question that no request had been received seeking a change in the New Brunswick fishing regulations to eliminate the two-week lift period for Atlantic salmon net fishing. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received any representations since he gave that answer.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I will check, and give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

COAL

DOSCO—INQUIRY AS TO CONCLUSION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Would the minister tell us whether a formal agreement has yet been concluded with Dosco with respect to assistance in carrying the company's coal stockpile and, if so, could it be tabled in the house?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): A formal agreement has not yet been reached; nothing official has been done. However, we expect to be in a position to inform the house with regard to this matter in a very short time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Might I ask the minister whether, in the course of negotiations or conversations with the company, any representations have been made urging the company to establish its additional steel making facilities at Sydney?

Mr. Comtois: Not to my knowledge.

HEALTH INSURANCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON ALLEGED SIGNING UNDER PROTEST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, further to the question asked by the hon. member for Welland on July 2 concerning the reported protest of British Columbia in the signing of an agreement under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, I have received approval from the minister of health for that province for the tabling of the relevant correspondence. I will now table these communications, which I think the house will agree provide a satisfactory answer in this connection.

As for the second point raised by the hon. member for Welland, I would inform the house that none of the provinces voiced any specific protest in signing hospital insurance agreements. They had, however, made representations from time to time concerning certain aspects of the program, all of which have been discussed on a number of occasions in this house.

By way of comment, I can do no better than refer to the assurance I gave to the minister of health of British Columbia on June 13, contained in my letter tabled today, to the effect that the federal government will be at all times prepared to give consideration to any changes which require to be made in the light of experience, and particularly as they may involve a common measure of justice and equity for all the provinces.

PIPE LINES

ALBERTA-MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on July 3 I asked a question relevant to the Alberta-Montreal pipe line. On that occasion the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Green) told me that he would take the question as notice. Is an answer possible today?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not.

Mr. Caron: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the Prime Minister in a position to tell me when he will be able to answer that question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer is also no.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this motion gives me an opportunity to raise a matter of very great importance, namely a national development policy, and at the conclusion of my remarks to move an amendment concerning it. I hope to deal with this matter myself in fairly general terms, and subsequently my colleagues who are participating in this debate will deal with somewhat more detailed matters arising out of the question.

In a young and rapidly growing country like Canada—and we are young and rapidly growing—it is essential to have a flexible national development policy adapted to the changing needs of our people. If indeed flexibility in this field is not preserved, if the aims and contents of our national development policy do not rest upon a systematic national assessment of our changing economic and social requirements, overexpansion may result in certain sectors and certain regions while others may suffer from stagnation and underdevelopment. In other words, unevenness of economic development is a major danger to our economy. Indeed, our history shows that it is also a danger to our unity.

It would be useful in opening this discussion, I think to review very briefly the historical evolution of our national development policy which, as I see it, has been marked by three distinct periods. The first, of course, is the Macdonald era, from 1867 to, I suppose, about 1895. It was characterized by the acquisition of Rupert's land and the Northwest Territories, by the construction of railways and canals and the implementation of the national policy in 1878. In spite of the unfavourable impact of that policy on our maritime provinces, the aims and contents of the policy in other respects were, I think, adapted to the economic circumstances of that period. Indeed, it was essential at that time to create an economic frontier and for that purpose to provide transcontinental transportation facilities which were of vital importance not only economically but also politically.

Nevertheless, in spite of what I think we might fairly term Sir John A. Macdonald's dynamic—and, if you like, imaginative—policy, economic development throughout that period was very slow. It has been estimated that over one million Canadians emigrated to the United States from 1860 to 1890. Yet I think we must all recognize, wherever we may sit in the house and whatever our political views may be, that the basis for our future growth was laid during that period. The Canadian people, I am sure, will always admire and be grateful to Sir John A. for his great vision and his great achievements despite the unfavourable economic climate of that time.

Then from the end of that period, 1896, to the great depression of the 1930's we had, I think, another period in our national development, a period during which of course there was no uninterrupted succession of Liberal governments because we had the government of another great Canadian, Sir Robert Borden, during that time and we also had the first world war. I think, however, it is not unfair to characterize that second period as the Sir Wilfrid Laurier-Mackenzie King era.

That was a very great and active period in our history marked by the opening up and the settlement of the west. During that time wheat production became complementary to the manufacturing production of the east and indeed, I suppose, during those years it is not an exaggeration to say that wheat dominated the economic scene. It became of vital importance in our international balance of payments; and the wheat economy, the opening up of the west, became of very great importance also in providing a market for the manufactures of the east.

That period perhaps came to an end in 1930, with the transfer of natural resources to the provinces and the great depression of that decade. During that decade of the 1930's—we all remember those years—the country was preoccupied with getting out of the depression; and then came the second world war, when main emphasis of course had to be placed on defence and indeed on survival.

During those two earlier periods our national development policy was, I think, bold and imaginative; but we must not forget, especially in regard to the problems of the present and what we should do about them, that that policy often lacked proper balance and that occasionally it put the emphasis in the wrong direction, with the result that at times we were overextended or, if you like, overequipped in certain sectors and that we perhaps unnecessarily imposed some heavy overhead burdens on the Canadian economy.

The principal of Queen's, Dr. Mackintosh, for instance, has written about our railway policy in those years; that it had been fantastically optimistic and misdirected. It is generally recognized that some areas in the west which were developed during those periods should not have been devoted to wheat production. Our overexpansion in certain fields unduly increased our overhead costs generally in this country and also prevented us from promoting more desirable projects perhaps in other sectors or regions of the nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to the third great period in our development, which coincided with the years after world war II. We still remembered then the achievements of the earlier years, but we also coupled with those achievements, as any government I think was bound to do, some of the miscalculations of the past. I maintain that our national development policy during those years after world war II was vigorous, constructive and successful, in spite of heavy public expenditures for defence, unprecedented in our history in peacetime, and in spite of very heavy expenditures for social security. But our development policy during those years was not only vigorous; it was, I think, somewhat better balanced and better planned than it had been before.

Perhaps the main new element in this third period of development was the greater impetus given during those years to the opening up of the northern economic frontier. New transportation facilities were made available for that purpose by the federal government, or with its assistance or permission. I am not going to detain the house, Mr. Speaker, by going into the detailed record of transportation developments during those years; it is there for all to see, and I know that hon. members are aware of it. There was not only road transportation and rail transportation to northern areas, but right across the country there was a vast program of airport construction carried on in the northern part of our territory.

Then we recall that in 1953 a new federal Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources was set up in recognition of the growing importance of our northern regions. Under able and energetic leadership that new department took a very active interest not only in economic development of that vast territory but also in the greater well-being of its population.

The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources also gave active consideration to the planning of long-term development in the north. This did not begin last year, Mr. Speaker; it began when this department was set up, and only two years after the creation of the department, at the end of 1955, the department presented, through the commissioners of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, two briefs to the Gordon commission outlining long-term plans for the next 25 years, the implementation of which had begun at that time. These are the two briefs which were presented to the Gordon commission at that time and which provided the basis for planning and development in the Arctic, planning and development which had indeed begun.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these two briefs also formed the basis of the famous vision that we heard so much about during the election campaign. However, during that time we did not hear any mention of the fact that this vision was merely an adapted version of a plan which had been drawn up a few years before and which was being implemented. After the election, however, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources did state—and not very long ago, a few days ago—that there was nothing new in the content of the vision except that the implementation of the Liberal plan on which it was based was speeded up.

I shall come back to that point later, Mr. Speaker. For the moment I just want to say that the Liberal party is proud of its post-war record in the north, both in terms of realization and in terms of planning for the future, but I would add—and this is important to get the matter in perspective—that our national development policy when we were in power was not merely centred on northern development. During the post-war period an impressive program was initiated in the field of transportation and communication generally which is vital to our development, and in the more settled areas of our country. We know what that has included. It has included the transcontinental television system, improved airports and facilities and construction of oil and gas pipe lines. However, the two great projects which perhaps were most characteristic of the bold action taken in this sector during that period were the trans-Canada highway and the St. Lawrence seaway, which is very much in our minds these days and to which the hon. member for Laurier made so great a contribution.

Our national development policy also provided special encouragement to the utilization and conservation of our resources. Extended geological surveys and the special three-year tax exemption period certainly contributed to increased mining operations in Canada. A most spectacular development in that field, one concerning which I have perhaps more knowledge than I have of some of the others, was the development of uranium mining brought about by carefully worked out policies between the producers, the federal government and the provincial governments concerned and also—this is most important—brought about because marketing arrangements were made, satisfactory to the producers, with the government of the United States, which was the only government at that time that could serve as a market for our uranium production. So successful, so spectacular, has that development been—and perhaps the most spectacular part of it is centred around the Elliot Lake-Blind River area—that if it were not for the increased exports of uranium to the United States in the current year our figures for exports to that country would not be nearly as high as they are today.

Then there was federal assistance to the provinces for forest inventories, reforestation and fire prevention, all of which led to a better knowledge of our forest resources and to more efficient measures for the conservation of those resources. Special legislation was introduced to make sure that water resources would be used in the best interests of Canada, and we know the increasing importance of that subject. A special program of assistance for the Atlantic provinces was inaugurated, which certainly comes within the field of national development. This involved coal subventions, mechanization programs, increased assistance under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, the construction of thermal power plants and interconnecting power lines, and the establishment of an interdepartmental committee to make recommendations on the integration and provision of transportation facilities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a new element altogether was added to our national development some years ago by assistance to housing and to municipalities. Under the National Housing Act and other legislation the former federal government participated in the construction of several hundreds of thousands of houses throughout Canada. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is an important phase of national development. Provision was also made under that legislation to pay 75 per cent of the cost of constructing low cost housing for rent, and there was federal participation in redevelopment projects and slum clearance programs.

This review—and it is a very cursory review omitting many things—shows that our post-war period of national development was vigorous and dynamic despite the special circumstances of that period. Those special circumstances, which made the discharge of federal governmental responsibilities in national development not easy, were outlined by Mr. St. Laurent, prime minister at that time, in his opening remarks at the federal-provincial conference in October, 1955. Among other things he said:

> In its own fields of responsibility the federal government has followed a vigorous policy of public investment since the end of the war, tempered, of course, by the overriding needs of defence in the past five years and also by the need for restraint because of the dangers of inflation and our desire to postpone what could reasonably be postponed so that it would not compete with a high level of private investment.

That was the situation which confronted us in those years when the government attempted to assist by public projects in national development, at a time when the great danger to the economy of the country was inflation, when it seemed undesirable for the government to interfere with private development except in so far as that interference was necessary to facilitate such private development.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What date was that, or what page?

Mr. Pearson: That was in October, 1955 and it is either on page 11 or page 12 of the proceedings of the federal-provincial conference of 1955. The national development policy of the new government was announced in the speech from the throne in October, 1957, but no indication was given then as to its general aims or content or the principles that underlie it. Specific references were made in that speech only to further assistance to power development in the Atlantic provinces, to the South Saskatchewan dam and to the negotiations initiated by the Liberal government with the United States on the question of Columbia river power development.

Since then, Mr. Speaker, nothing has been done as far as we know with respect to new thermal power developments in the Atlantic provinces apart from the signing of a master agreement. Certain Nova Scotia mines are temporarily, and we hope only temporarily, closed. No agreement has yet been reached on the South Saskatchewan dam, a project which we were led to hope would begin last autumn. No report has yet been made to the house on the negotiations with the United States respecting the Columbia river matter. Nor have we heard anything at all about the activities of the interdepartmental committee of officials on transportation in the Atlantic provinces which was set up by the previous government more than a year ago, and which we thought could do useful work in those provinces in developing co-operation between the federal and provincial governments on transportation matters.

During the election campaign the Conservative party put particular emphasis on a so-called special public investment program to meet the recession, and we heard a good deal at that time about the vision of northern development. We contended at that time, and I think the Canadian people now realize, that the special public works program for unemployment relief amounting to over a billion dollars announced by the Prime Minister never in fact existed. In fact, government expenditures for this purpose in 1958-1959 will be roughly about the same level as they were in the previous years of so-called Liberal neglect and postponement. Of course new projects will be initiated in 1958-59, but there is nothing exceptional about this, especially if you take into account the fact that most of these projects were planned and prepared by the former government. Apart from the very limited action taken by the government in co-operation with the provinces with regard to access roads, we are left with vague pronouncements and a post-election works mirage.

Therefore it appears to us, Mr. Speaker, that the government record, especially viewed in the light of the perfervid words of the election campaign, has not yet been very impressive in this field. Certainly so far as the use of these methods for unemployment relief and for curing the recession is concerned the results have been very meagre indeed. But, Mr. Speaker, we are quite ready to wait and give the government a fair chance to show some creative imagination in the pursuit of this national policy. We are ready to help in this regard and make what we think are concrete, constructive and practical suggestions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: From igloo to igloo.

Mr. Pearson: I will come to that also.

Mr. Churchill: You had better crawl out.

Mr. Pearson: I do not have to worry about that, and I will be able to convince my hon. friends without any difficulty.

Now, our only purpose in presenting today the amendment I am about to propose is to call the attention of the government to the need for a new development policy in line with the current economic and social requirements of the Canadian people. These current economic and social requirements have changed even over the last two years.

Up to now, Mr. Speaker, when we have attempted to make any constructive suggestions the government or a spokesman for the government, instead of discussing these proposals on their own merits, usually has asked the question, sometimes jocularly and sometimes in a worse than jocular way, "Why did you not do it before?" Such a reaction, Mr. Speaker, is not very intelligent nor very serious. It will be more than usually unjustified during this debate because very important changes have occurred in the economic conditions governing the aims and content of our development policy in the last year or so.

These changes, which should be obvious to everyone, are the result of several factors, two of which I should like to mention. In the first place, Mr. St. Laurent asserted in the statement I quoted earlier that our post-war development of this country was tempered by our desire in those years to postpone what could be reasonably postponed so it would not compete with the high level of private investment, and we certainly had a high level of private investment during those years. That factor has disappeared since private investments, for the time being, are certainly declining. Government action now becomes necessary to fill the gap in a way which was not the case two, three or four years ago.

In the second place, some of the major projects in the public investment program initiated by the former government have been completed or will soon be completed. This is true, for instance, in the case of the construction of the seaway, the trans-Canada pipe line, the trans-Canada highway, and several airport and harbour improvements. Other major projects, therefore, must be planned and initiated if the level of public investment in Canada is to be maintained or increased. There is greater necessity for that at the present time than there has been at any time since world war II.

These factors, then, are changing the public investment picture in this country quite drastically at the present time. They call for a new orientation or a new emphasis in our national development policy if we want to maintain the kind of balance and dynamism which we have achieved in the past.

We on this side of the house, Mr. Speaker, feel as we did in the past, that the development of the far north above the 60th parallel is directly the responsibility of the federal government and would continue to be one very important aspect of the national policy. Government assistance to the population in the north is not only desirable but it is necessary.

I do not for one minute, however, accept the contention of Conservative spokesmen in the last election campaign that this kind of program in the Arctic about which they talked at that time, a road program, a transportation program, would have any considerable effect, if any effect at all, in the immediate emergency which confronted us, which was unemployment. It is one thing to put forward a program for national development in the Arctic, but it is another thing to put forward a program of that kind, especially when it is contained in estimates which have already been drawn up, as a cure for the unemployment emergency.

This kind of claim during an election campaign or subsequent to an election campaign, and even if it is made in this house this afternoon, does not make sense. A program of national development in the north to improve transportation and communication for national development purposes, carrying on the planning and development which has been going on for years, does make sense.

There are a good many reasons now, Mr. Speaker, why government action is necessary in this respect in the north to a greater degree than it has been in recent years. In the first place, there is the growing number of companies already located in that region, and their workers, who are entitled to government services. These companies have not come in within the last 12 months. They have been coming in during recent years.

Moreover the local population, the Indians and Eskimos, is now increasing and it is more difficult for these aboriginal people, these earliest inhabitants of our country, to adapt themselves to new conditions. They see their traditional methods of livelihood disappearing. They see new activities coming into their country. They see the basis of their previous existence changing. There is, therefore, a special obligation on the government to help them adapt themselves to the new conditions for which we are largely responsible. This means the government will have to assist the native population to learn new trades and create for them new employment opportunities.

There are also political as well as military reasons which justify a continued emphasis on the development of the north. We are claiming, and rightly, our sovereignty over that portion of our territory. Indeed, we have claimed sovereignty under what we call the sector theory over the prolongation north, right to their meeting at the north pole, of the east and west extensions of our boundary. If we are to make that claim stick, and it certainly is important we should make it stick, we have to do everything that is possible, everything that is practical, to develop those areas and reinforce whatever rights we may have in law with the right of occupation.

Then, finally, such development is justified because we will, in time, need the vast resources found in this area for our future prosperity and expansion. The Canadian north is now fairly well known for its abundant and diversified natural resources. Some of them are already being exploited. It must be recognized that the world demand for minerals of all kinds is rising steadily. On the other hand, lest our enthusiasm for Arctic development run away with us, we should remember also that a good many of these metals, under present conditions, are in surplus supply. I know that in the long run we have no reason to be pessimistic about the future of base metal production in this country. The Paley report—and we always quote the Paley report when we discuss a question of this kind—has shown that the mineral reserves of the United States are becoming depleted. For these reasons, and because the Canadian north is one of the last economic frontiers in the world, long-term prospects for its development are very bright indeed.

However, there are also very good reasons why we as a nation should not proceed too fast with the opening up of the Canadian north, why we should not speed up its development in disregard of economic conditions. Indeed, I am reminded that the minister of northern affairs himself, and I think he was quite sound in this statement, said the other day that it would be unwise for instance to bring a road through for a commodity before there was a market for that commodity.

There is a common fallacy about the impact that accelerated northern development could have at this time on the Canadian economy. It is often urged that this impact would be similar to that which resulted from the opening up of the west. Surely we would be unwise to try to carry that parallel too far. We should remind ourselves that wheat production was supplementary at that time, in opening up the west, to the industrial activity of eastern Canada. Mineral production in the far north at the present time, in most cases and for the time being, will be merely a supplement or an addition to what we have already in relative abundance in the northern portions of our provinces.

For some time to come, therefore, the mineral production of the north will not be complementary to but will be competitive with similar production of other Canadian regions on world markets. A very good example of that, of course, is the uranium mining industry itself. We have perhaps the largest single uranium field in the free world, at least, in the Elliot Lake-Blind River area, and there is a good deal more uranium up there that has not yet been brought under production. It is accessible to the consuming centres in the United States. Indeed, the only consuming centre in the United States is the government of the United States. Therefore to spend energy and money at this time in trying to open up new sources of uranium say in the far north, when we have so much closer to home and closer to markets, would not, I believe, be an economic or wise proposition.

In order to be competitive with other sources of supply on world markets at the same price, most of this increased mineral production in the north would have to be subsidized in one form or another because of its relative geographical remoteness from world markets. The basic problem raised for us by accelerated economic development in the north at this stage—and I am sure the minister will agree with me in this—can be defined very simply. Production and transportation costs in that region are much higher than they are in other areas of our country and in other parts of the world. Yet products originating in the north must be sold on world markets at competitive prices.

I was reading the reports of the meeting of the Royal society in Edmonton which was held a few weeks ago. One of the papers, given by Mr. Legget of the national research council, pointed out that it cost as much to transport building material from Edmonton to Aklavik as to purchase the building material in Edmonton. In view of these circumstances, therefore—high transportation costs, the situation with regard to world markets, the fact that in some cases we are producing in surplus supply some of these materials in other parts of Canada—it would seem to me unwise, without most careful consideration of the economic problems involved, to rush into the development of the north at this stage through subsidized transportation, especially when the resulting increased production might depress production in other parts of Canada and therefore might interfere with the production with the well-being of those other parts of Canada.

As I see it, what we should do is not slow down on the planning and development which have been going on in recent years but carry that forward wherever economic consideration would justify it, to take the necessary action but to be very careful indeed in present conditions that economic circumstances justify the action before that action is taken. We do not have to worry about these resources; they are there, and they will be of great value to the world in the years ahead. Surely the thing to do now is to plan and develop for those years ahead carefully and soundly and with all the vigour which is required by any particular policy.

I believe that we should continue to emphasize the importance of the north and treat it as I have suggested it should be treated in regard to economic development, moving vigorously but moving carefully. I think also that a very important part of national development policy remains in those other areas and those other sectors of the Canadian economy which have been the subject of governmental help and intervention over the years.

For instance, an extremely important aspect of national development is research itself. In 1956-57 the government spent $106 million on research. I suggest that we can do better than that. I suggest—and this suggestion has already been made officially by our party—that there should be set up a national science commission to promote, sponsor and co-ordinate scientific development and research in Canada upon whatever government level it may be conducted. I suggest also that a very important aspect of national development is assistance by the federal government to the provinces so they may be in a position to develop their own resources to the maximum possible extent.

I am thinking particularly at the moment of communications and transportation. I am thinking of the proposal which our party has already made that the federal government should become responsible for 95 per cent of the cost of the remaining parts of the trans-Canada highway in the four Atlantic provinces. I am thinking of the assistance that we have proposed should be given to those provinces for trunk highways which would increase communication between the Atlantic provinces and other parts of Canada and the United States. I am also thinking of a railway to Great Slave lake which is now very much under consideration, I know, by the government. I am also thinking of the building with federal assistance of a second trans-Canada highway through Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Edmonton, and the Peace river district to the Pacific.

I am also thinking—and perhaps there is no more important aspect of national development where the federal government can be more immediately helpful—of assistance to the municipalities in the problems that face them, which are a part of national development because national development is the sum of local development. What more important form could national development at this time take than federal assistance to the municipalities in slum clearance and urban redevelopment projects? We therefore propose greater federal participation in such projects. Raising the proposed federal share to 50 per cent or 75 per cent of the cost of slum clearance projects would be justified on the grounds of national development.

I should like to put forward another proposal which is part of our party platform. I am very happy to mention these party proposals which we put forward in the election campaign, and to put them on Hansard as something we think should be done, not merely to be put forward for election purposes but put forward after the election is over as something that we think is constructive. For that purpose I suggest to the government they should consider the establishment at this time—and they are going to have a municipal-provincial-federal conference one of these days or one of these months or one of these years—of a municipal loan fund by which capital could be made available to the municipalities on a long-term basis for major municipal improvements, for the expansion of urgently needed municipal services.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did my hon. friends not turn that down when they were in power?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think it was ever turned down when we were in power. But what difference does that make? Every time we make a proposal over here in the opposition somebody on the other side, instead of examining the proposal and seeing whether it fits the situation, immediately says, "You didn't do it in 1935" or "You didn't do it in 1945". I suggest to the Prime Minister that he look ahead occasionally and not keep looking back into the record of the past.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: If he will look ahead and consider these problems that the municipalities face—and we hear a good deal about them these days—perhaps he will find something worthy of support in the establishment of a municipal loan fund for the purposes I have indicated. The scope and administrative set-up of that fund would, of course, have to be settled in consultation with representatives of the provinces and municipalities, but it is something which my hon. friend might well take up with the provinces and municipalities when he next meets them. If they could work out something like that we, of course, would be glad to give him and his government all the credit for it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Within limits.

Mr. Pearson: Within limits, as my friend the hon. member for Essex East cautions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Repentance is good for the soul.

Mr. Pearson: There is one other proposal that I should like to make. This also is one that we have put forward more than once, one also that we were not in a position to implement over the years when we were in power, and it also has a very special relationship to the circumstances of today, which in this regard are much different from what they were five or ten years ago. That is the establishment of a national advisory board on economic development and automation for dealing with long term problems of production and employment. We suggest that such an advisory board be established, staffed by representatives from labour, industry, agriculture and the universities as well as government. One principal duty of such a board would be to study the long term measures required to ensure a high level of employment and to minimize for workers the consequences of automation by providing for re-training programs, better mobility of workers and other progressive measures.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Could he explain the difference between this proposed board and the Gordon commission?

Mr. Pearson: This board, in the terms in which I am putting it forward was not, so far as my recollection goes, recommended by the Gordon commission at all. I do not think the Gordon commission report had anything to say with regard to it in terms of a recommendation to deal with it—

Mr. Green: The hon. member has misunderstood me. Will he explain the difference between the commission he is now recommending and the commission which his government set up known as the Gordon commission.

Mr. Pearson: I find it easy to do that. The Gordon commission was a commission set up by the government to investigate and report, and as a result of its report on general economic conditions, as a result of its general economic survey of the country it was hoped that whatever government might be in power at the time the report was received would find recommendations which would be useful if embodied in the permanent machinery of government. I am suggesting that this proposal is very different indeed, that this commission should become an agency of the government to consider the problems I have mentioned and one or two which I should like to mention. The Gordon commission was a fact finding body set up to report to the government. We are suggesting to the government now that they should set up a piece of government machinery which would, I think, be of a constructive and useful nature.

Among other things, the duty of this board would be to plan programs for long term development which would ensure the steady progress of the Canadian economy and help to sustain full employment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How far would its powers go?

Mr. Pearson: I am making this recommendation to the government. The government will undoubtedly desire to look into it and consider how far its powers should extend. Its powers would have to be circumscribed in the legislation setting up the board. I do not think the Prime Minister would wish me to go further into the matter at this time, but I throw the suggestion out to him and to the government since they have to face not only the immediate problems of recession and unemployment but also the longer range problems of economic planning and development which in the long run may be even more important.

I think I have said enough to show that national development covers a great many subjects, and that while national development in the north is important, national development in other parts of Canada is equally important. There is much to be done, and I suggest to the Prime Minister that while it is of first and immediate importance to deal with the problems immediately before us, the recession and unemployment, it is of almost equal importance in the long run, if not even more important, to look ahead and plan to deal with the problems that will be facing us in the future. It is in that spirit that I put forward these suggestions. Because we on this side of the house do not feel that the government is tackling these problems of national development with the constructive energy and purpose which we think to be desirable in the present circumstances, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the following amendment:

> That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: "this house is of the opinion that, in present circumstances of declining private investment, a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and other facilities to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada."

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I must say that we in this group have listened with the greatest interest and delight to the words uttered by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in the very good speech he has just made.

When we hear the leader of the Liberal opposition using such words as "economic planning and development" and stressing the need for social capital in the amendment he moves, and in the remarks he made during his speech; and when he suggests, as he obviously does, that in order to rescue this country from the deficiencies of private enterprise we should use the national credit, then I can only say that I have sent to my office for an application form to be sent to the Leader of the Opposition in order to give him the opportunity of joining the C.C.F.

As I say, we were delighted and amazed. Only time will tell whether these are just words, or whether they are words that will be followed by action. But we were delighted to hear this point of view put forward and we support many of the suggestions he made with respect to the need for a national development policy, the need for social capital and the need for economic planning. It pleases us very much to realize that this small group at this end of the house is so effective in its presentation of the policy and program of the C.C.F. that it has now succeeded, in the short time of slightly more than two months, in inoculating the hon. gentlemen on our physical left—whether they are on our ideological left will only be determined after the passage of time.

However that may be, Mr. Speaker, I must say that we have repeatedly in this house urged many of these things which have been advocated by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, and we shall continue to do so. We realize that if we are going to have a balanced national development we must have economic planning as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. We need, also, the social capital mentioned in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, and we have always preached the necessity for the use of the national credit to this end.

A national development program from our point of view would require participation by the federal government, by the provincial governments and by the municipal governments. We think that a balanced national development program would include the building of large hydro projects. When such projects are mentioned we, in British Columbia, immediately think of the development of the Columbia river and its hydro resources.

We think of the necessity of a greatly expanded national highways program in this country, of the necessity of a second trans-Canada highway, of the need for a national conservation policy, the necessity of greatly extended assistance through some type of fund perhaps as suggested by the leader of the official opposition to the municipalities and of the necessity for taking advantage of opportunities to put to work idle Canadians in the development of our national parks and recreational facilities. But in addition to these things we in the C.C.F. believe we should also utilize the national credit for the assistance of small business in Canada because we realize that small business is a very important part of the economy of this country.

Other hon. members in this group who will follow me as this debate proceeds today and tomorrow will deal with other aspects of this problem—the federal, provincial and municipal aspects—and will possibly deal with some of the details which I have previously skirted but it is my intention in the brief time I will detain the house to deal solely with the need for social capital being used in the development of small business or small free enterprise in Canada.

Quite recently, I believe, I mentioned that the philosophy of the policy and program of the C.C.F. recognizes the importance of the small business sector of our economy as part of a mixed economy. I judge from the smiles on the faces of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the official opposition that they are somewhat under the delusion that all our policies are becoming mixed during this debate but what I am suggesting today has been the policy of the C.C.F. for a considerable length of time. That is to say, we believe in the great opportunity for social planning and the use of national credit in public ownership in the federal, provincial and municipal fields in a mixed economy, and the great opportunity for the development of the co-operative movement in this country whether it is in the form of a service co-operative, a consumer co-operative or a credit co-operative. In addition to that we believe in the great opportunity for the expansion of what we term as legitimate free enterprise where the real and genuine element of competition enters for the protection of the Canadian consumer. There is a great opportunity for the development of free enterprise in small industry, in distribution, retail outlets, and things of that type and in certain transportation and services generally.

Small business, generally speaking, is usually a community enterprise. It is established in its initial stages by local capital and employs local labour. Consequently there is an interest on the part of these local citizens of the community and a sense of responsibility on the part of the small business to the local community in which it operates. It participates in community activities, development, affairs and administration and differs somewhat from foreign capital or large scale investment in a significant way. In most cases the profits made by a small business or free enterprise undertaking remain in the local community and are normally re-invested there so there is no net loss in profits to the community by their being exported to a country other than Canada. With the development of our country grows the opportunity and the need for a greater expansion of what we in this group call the legitimate free enterprise sector of our economy and that is the point I intend to deal with briefly this afternoon.

The bugbear, shall I say, or the major problem of small business, particularly in recent years where rapid expansion occurs and requirements have to be met fairly rapidly in our modern industrial society, is that there is a lack of long term credit. As hon. members know bank credit is too short to frequently satisfactorily serve the long term needs of small business and small industry. In that respect I want to speak from my personal experience and when I say that I refer to observations I have made in the district in which I have had the good fortune to live for over 50 years. I realize from what I have seen there that over and over again the efforts of hardworking, capable people have been frustrated and there has been a great deal of effort lost and wasted because they lacked the advantage of long term low interest capital to carry on their small business or industry.

I refer particularly to two aspects of small industry for which there is a major place in the economy of the district in which I live and in the general economy of British Columbia, and that is the need for and the value of small industry in the logging, sawmill and lumber processing industries. Regardless of the efficiency of large companies and the capital they can accumulate there are certain types of timber, certain locations and certain areas that can only be—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I take it he is leading up to a further amendment because his discourse is not on the subject that is now before the house?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I am dealing with one aspect of the need for social capital.

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see how this dissertation on long term credit for small business comes under the heading of social capital, in the words of the amendment:

> —especially in the form of transportation facilities municipal improvements, and other facilities to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada.

If the hon. member is leading up to an amendment I will not object, but if he is speaking to the amendment now before the house, I consider him out of order.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I was leading up to an amendment and you pushed me right in the door. At this point I shall move my amendment so as to bring myself in order. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

> That the amendment be further amended by inserting therein after the words "in the form of" the following words:
> "long term loans to qualifying small businesses,"

Mr. Speaker: I will put the motion when the hon. member completes his remarks.

Mr. Herridge: Having now regularized the proceedings and having once again received your beneficent glances, Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate that the amendment as amended would now read:

> That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that, in present circumstances of declining private investment, a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of long term loans to qualifying small businesses, transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and other facilities to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada.

Before placing my amendment, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with my personal experience with respect to the need for long term low interest capital for small industry and small business. I was dealing particularly with the need for it in small logging and sawmill enterprises. I mentioned the importance and necessity of maintaining these small enterprises in the forest industry particularly because of their social value and significance and because there is no other form of organized economic activity—except where it is possible to utilize a small co-operative organization—that can harvest this timber under certain circumstances and manufacture it to the mutual advantage of the state and those operating the industry.

I have known a number of men who have had the ability, the necessary small mill, the available timber and the market and yet they have failed for one reason only and that was the lack of adequate long term low interest capital. In the circumstances in which they were able to borrow capital there was not sufficient time for them to continue to operate and reinvest any surplus they might make in the industry which they were operating. It is therefore necessary in these circumstances, particularly in the forest industry—and I am dealing with an industry of which I know a little—because capital has to be invested in roads, in decking logs in the winter and so on. Under certain conditions logs cannot be towed or trucked out until spring, or lumber has to be piled up over a period of months in order for it to dry before it can be sold. Therefore, inevitably a relatively large amount of investment is required, over which the operator himself has little control. Therefore, he requires this long term low interest capital in order to satisfactorily function and have an opportunity to get on his feet.

As I said before, I use those two illustrations in particular because over a period of 50 years I have seen so many capable, hard-working men finally lose what they had invested over a long period of years because they had insufficient capital to carry on until a surplus could be accumulated. This problem affects the small businessman across Canada in whatever type of business he may be, and it affects the small farmer for the same reasons I have outlined.

This group has given considerable study to this problem as a result of its experience and its observations and as a result of consultation with people who have done a considerable amount of research on the problem along monetary lines and discussions with the people directly concerned. For years I have been of the opinion, as have other members of this group, that one of the things that is sadly required is an opportunity for long term low interest capital.

About a week ago the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) spoke on this problem, presented our proposals and gave some details in that respect. I am not going to deal with that aspect of the situation this afternoon. I simply outline our general approach to it, our firm belief that small business is an essential part of the mixed economy which we as democratic socialists believe is the next step in the economic evolution of our society. For that reason we are particularly pleased to support the proposals made in the amendment by the Leader of the Opposition, and in order to complete the picture, in order to provide what we would term a truly balanced economy, we have amended the amendment in the way I have just placed before the house. That is all I have to say at this time, Mr. Speaker, and as I said before other hon. members will deal with other aspects of this problem from our point of view during this debate.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. Martineau: In the hon. member's opinion, when does a qualifying small business, which he mentioned in his subamendment, become a big business and no longer qualify?

Mr. Herridge: I think the border line would be this. A large business is able to accumulate capital by the issuance of shares on the market and bonds and debentures, and things of that kind. The type of business that we speak of has no access to that capital in the same way because of its local and personal management and the lack of general knowledge by the public concerning the operation of the business in question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and the amendment which he proposed, as well as to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who has moved a subamendment. I should like to tell him at once that I find myself in sympathy with the proposal he has made and I would also like to tell him that because of his solicitude for small business I think I will send him an application to join the Liberal party.

We on this side of the house have always felt that particular attention should be given to small business. We have advocated that—

Mr. Green: Since you got over there.

Mr. Chevrier: —down through the years and over the long term of years that we were in office—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You did nothing about it.

Mr. Chevrier: —we paid particular attention to that sector of the economy. For that reason, I think we will have no difficulty in supporting the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

I now turn my attention to the amendment moved by my leader and in order not to read it I summarize it by saying that it seeks a balanced policy of national development, requiring active measures to meet present-day needs in the form of transportation facilities. While it goes much farther than that, it is to that aspect of the amendment that I should like to direct my attention, namely that part which has to do with transportation facilities. Such a policy of national development did exist when the former Liberal government was in office. Indeed my leader dealt with the three periods since confederation and paid particular attention to that period which followed the war. In the field of transportation alone the policy which was advocated by the previous administration was not only a dynamic one but it was a forward-looking one.

All one has to do in order to come to that conclusion is to look at the measures that were placed on the statute books of parliament. As a matter of fact, in the short time that I was in the Department of Transport as its head there were a large number of such measures that were advocated, put into effect and now are in operation in this country. I think of the construction of the various railway branch lines across this country; I think of the branch lines from Terrace to Kitimat, from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, from Barraute to Kiask Falls in the province of Quebec, and later from Kiask Falls to Beattyville, and later from Beattyville to Chibougamau and now under construction, by virtue of legislation passed in those years, the line from Chibougamau to the lake St. John area. The Canso causeway was a project that took a considerable time to put into effect but, following surveys which were made, action was taken upon it and that causeway has now been completed. Then there is the Canadian National Railways hotel and the aviation building in Montreal; airport development from one end of this country to the other, from Gander, following the entry of Newfoundland into confederation, right out to the west coast; harbour improvements in the national harbours of this country; the Prince Edward Island car ferry; the studies into the construction of a causeway from the mainland to Prince Edward Island, which are being followed by the present government and which have been mentioned on more than one occasion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others during the past few months.

There are also the new car ferry from North Sydney to Newfoundland, the terminal facilities at Port aux Basques and North Sydney, the construction of the Bluenose to operate a service between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor, the construction of new icebreakers for service on the St. Lawrence and elsewhere in the gulf and studies leading to the construction of a railway to Great Slave lake.

Here I should like to reiterate a point made by the Leader of the Opposition. In a brief submitted to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects by R. G. Robertson, commissioner of the Northwest Territories and deputy minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, he advocates the following at page 24 thereof:

> May I submit for the consideration of the commission three methods by which transportation facilities into the Northwest Territories might be improved. The first is the construction of a railroad to Great Slave lake. The second is construction of roads into promising resource development areas when and as indications suggest that these areas, given highway transportation, would be economic to develop. The third is the adoption of the policy of supplying the newly constructed defence stations in the Northwest Territories by commercial air services and the establishment of a network of scheduled commercial air lines in the Arctic.

I compare this with a paragraph in the speech from the throne reading as follows:

> In order to promote our national development on the frontier in the north you will be asked to authorize the construction of a railway to Great Slave lake. My ministers regard this as a major step in the establishment of productive industry on an economic basis in the Northwest Territories. You will also be asked to provide for the construction of important roads needed for development in the Yukon and Northwest Territories and in the provinces, with the co-operation of their governments.

The brief to the Gordon commission is dated November 27, 1955, and unquestionably was the basis for the action which the government now proposes to take as outlined in the speech from the throne read in the other place on May 12. There is no question, but that many of the projects which were outlined and begun under the former Liberal administration are being continued now. I can understand how it is that in the time our friends were in office following the election of June 10, 1957 there was not much time for planning. In fact, there has been little time for planning because we have either been in session or in the midst of an election campaign, and if one believes the statements made in the house and outside by members of the government that the last session of parliament was nothing more or less than preparation for the election which took place on March 31 it then becomes quite clear and logical that there was no time for planning. Therefore our friends on the other side of the house have had to have recourse to a number of projects which were in the course of preparation by the previous administration.

I could go on and talk about other projects such as the trans-Canada highway but I have reason to speak particularly today about a great project, about a project which to my mind represents the greatest project that has ever been undertaken by two nations. I refer to the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one has done more for that than you have.

Mr. Chevrier: It is the greatest international project ever launched by two nations.

Mr. Cardiff: What did you leave it for?

Mr. Chevrier: I gave the reasons before why I left and I am not the slightest bit sorry that I left in view of the fact that many public servants, one after the other, are leaving the service of the government of Canada.

Mr. Cardiff: I am glad you are not.

Mr. Chevrier: However, I rose to speak on the St. Lawrence seaway for two reasons. First, I wish to indicate that, in my opinion, no other project comparable to it has been brought forward by our friends on the other side of the house, and I am sure there will not be one comparable to it for some time to come. The other reason I rose was to take issue with some of the statements that have been made recently by certain individuals in connection with it.

The St. Lawrence seaway is a power and navigation project. It consists of a 27-foot channel extending from the port of Montreal to lake Erie. It also consists of the joint development by Canada and the United States through their respective agencies of 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy in the international rapids section of the river. During four days of last week we witnessed the ceremonies which took place at Cornwall to mark the blowing up of the cofferdam and the creation of an artificial lake or pool above the dam indicating the beginning of gradual power development in that area. We witnessed the changeover of 14-foot navigation from the Canadian side to the United States side. Twenty-seven foot facilities will not be ready until the opening of navigation in 1959.

I should like to pause for a moment to pay tribute to certain individuals who had a great deal to do with the construction of the project. I should like to pay particular tribute to the officers and men of the hydro-electric power commission of the province of Ontario. I do not think any men contributed more towards the successful construction of the power aspect of this scheme than did the officials of Ontario hydro. They are, of course, extremely competent. In the Niagara peninsula area and on the Ottawa river they have built power projects of tremendous importance and I can do nothing else than to pay to these men who built the facilities in the international section in conjunction with the St. Lawrence seaway authority the tribute of competence and understanding.

I should like to single out the late Bob Saunders, a former president of Ontario hydro, who had a great deal to do with the negotiations leading to the agreement between the province of Ontario and Canada. I should also like to mention the name of Dr. Otto Holden, chief engineer of Ontario hydro, who in part designed many of the structures which went into this development. Last but not least there is that kind, understanding, able and competent project engineer stationed at Cornwall, Gordon Mitchell, who did a tremendous amount for the success of this enterprise.

I have nothing but commendation for the manner in which the officials of Ontario hydro built the plant. If I had a complaint it would be that it seems to me that Ontario hydro should have given consideration to setting aside a block of power for development of industry in the eastern Ontario region. The New York state power authority on the United States side gave consideration to that aspect of the question and set aside blocks of power so that today there are two large industries located just east of Massena along the south shore of the St. Lawrence river opposite the city of Cornwall.

One is Reynolds Aluminum, a large industry, and another is an automobile manufacturing plant, both of which came there because of the inducement they had in regard to these blocks of power set aside by the New York state commission for that purpose. It seems to me that Ontario hydro, instead of feeding all of this power into the grid for the development of the metropolitan areas of Toronto and Hamilton and the southern Ontario peninsula, might well have given consideration to the setting aside of a block of power for the development of industry in eastern Ontario.

I would not like to leave the question of the construction of this project without recalling to the house the name of another great public servant who had a great deal to do with the St. Lawrence seaway and who, in my estimation, is probably the man who knows more about the project than anyone else in this country, a man who, I am sure, has contributed tremendously to the negotiations as well as the preparations for the navigation aspects of the project. I refer to Mr. R. A. C. Henry, a consulting engineer now in the city of Montreal. The government of Canada appointed him as head of the special projects branch of the Department of Transport. He was a man with a great deal of experience; a former deputy minister of railways and canals; a former deputy minister of the department of reconstruction. He was responsible, in large part, for the setting up of the department of reconstruction and supply, following the war years, and he became chairman of the air transport board. Few men, I say, are as well informed or as conversant as he is with all aspects of both power and navigation. I could not rise at this time without making some reference to the tremendous contribution made by Mr. R. A. C. Henry, not only to the economic development of Canada but to transportation development in Canada generally and more particularly to the St. Lawrence seaway project.

There are other aspects of this problem to which I should like to refer. In making these references, I should like to stress the magnitude of this enterprise. I said at the outset that I did not believe there was any project that compared in magnitude. I said that because it is not only a great engineering project, but you have dams that were built across streams; you have power structures that were built on the bed of the river; you have islands that were excavated and dredged in order to make way for the navigation channel; and in some areas you have the level of the water being raised 50 feet above the present level. The seaway is not only a great engineering project, but it is a great social achievement. It is a great social achievement because whole communities were wiped out by the formation of this lake in the last few days, and in their stead modern communities have arisen on the new shoreline. Parks and parkways have been built for recreational purposes on both sides of the line.

The seaway is first and foremost however, a great international project. It is one thing for two governments to get together and decide upon the construction of an international project, but it is another thing for that project to be put into effect. There are groups on a lower level than that of government who must co-operate in order to bring about the successful accomplishment of a project such as this. In this case there were no less than four international bodies composed of Canadians and United States representatives who had to work hand in hand in solving the problems that confronted us. There is the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers, which approved of the plans and specifications and which supervises the work during construction. There is the international St. Lawrence river board of control whose duties relate to the water levels and regulate what the discharge of water will be from lake Ontario and the flow of water through the international rapids section. There is the international lake Ontario board of engineers which recommended a plan of regulation for the water level in the international section, and which today the government accepts. Finally, there is the international joint commission on whom the obligation is laid by the governments of Canada and the United States for the approval of the project. This body gave approval to the project and it keeps today a watchful eye over it.

It goes without saying that the parliament of Canada and the congress of the United States are the supreme authorities on this international project. Their will has been expressed by the designation of an entity to construct the power phases of the seaway in the international section. By agreement with the province of Ontario—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I suggest to your honour that the line the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) is now following has nothing to do with the amendment?

Mr. Chevrier: May I be heard on the point of order? The amendment, and I hesitate to read it because it is of some length, reads:

> That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: this house is of the opinion that, in present circumstances of declining private investment, a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of transportation facilities—

I will not go on any farther. I stop there because I am now discussing one of the greatest transportation projects, the St. Lawrence seaway. I want to talk about some of its effects, and to take issue with some of the statements that were made recently in connection with it. I am now laying the foundation of that, and this certainly has to do with a national development program, namely the amendment which you have had an opportunity of reading.

Mr. Green: May I point out that the hon. member was not dealing with transportation, he was dealing with the development of power between Ontario and the state of New York. I suggest that has nothing whatever to do with the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: After reading carefully the amendment which is before me, I do not believe this amendment permits a discussion of one specific venture, and especially a venture which has already been partially realized. This amendment deals with measures which it is suggested the government should take to meet the urgent needs of social capital, especially in the form of transportation facilities, et cetera. I do not believe the hon. member for Laurier is actually covering the point in his comments about the St. Lawrence seaway. I would suggest he keep his remarks more in the form of suggestions to the government concerning action in the future.

Mr. Chevrier: What I was trying to do was to show the magnitude of this project which, I assure you, is far from completion. There is a tremendous amount yet to be done before it can be completed. In fact, it will not be completed until the opening of navigation in 1959 and I doubt whether the full facilities will be completed then. But if my hon. friend feels that I am not in order in dealing with the power facilities—although I think that I am in order because they are still not completed—then I will relate my remarks to the navigational aspects of the seaway.

Here I should like to draw your attention to some of the facts of this project from a navigational standpoint. The advantages that will derive from this project from a navigational standpoint are widely dispersed and will be felt in the whole of the Canadian economy. There will be great economies and savings of no less than $48 million per year in transportation costs. This has been estimated to mean a reduction of anywhere from three cents to five cents per bushel in the cost of transportation thereon. I believe the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), in announcing the tolls the other day, made some reference to that matter. This project will add not less than $100 million per year to the national income. It will increase total volume of traffic from 10 million to 35 million tons on the St. Lawrence. It will, it is estimated, bring down the St. Lawrence route no less than 200 million bushels of United States wheat. This is an advantage that had not been envisaged when the seaway was in the course of preparation. The statement which I have just made—

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a point of order. The hon. member is completely ignoring the ruling made by Your Honour just a few moments ago. He is going on to discuss the St. Lawrence seaway project at great length. If it is in order for him to do that, it would be just as much in order for him to discuss the construction of the C.P.R. across Canada—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course it would be.

Mr. Green: —or any other project that has been done in the past. I suggest that the hon. member must comply with Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might be permitted to say a word on the point of order?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the leader of the government, in his new role as an exponent of the restriction of debate, would still not go as far as to suggest that in order to urge, as the hon. member has been doing, that projects of great importance for the improvement of transportation are necessary for the future, he could not illustrate them even by reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, much less something that is far from being completed and about which the hon. gentleman has indicated he has some suggestions to make.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must remind hon. members that the amendment reads as follows:

—a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital—

I must ask hon. members to restrict their remarks to constructive measures to be used by or suggested to the government. Having regard to this particular amendment, I believe it is really out of order to discuss or to outline at present what has been done unless it is in line with the terms of what should be done by the government in line with this amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I may do so I should like to suggest to Your Honour, with great deference, that the terms of the resolution permit a wide latitude of discussion not envisaged in the restricted words which Your Honour has just used. I make that suggestion not in direct disagreement with what you have said but by way of seeking to bring Your Honour to a better understanding of the privileges of the house in respect of a resolution in these large and generous terms. In order to do that, I think one should read the full resolution, something which Your Honour did not do. The full resolution reads as follows:

That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

this house is of the opinion that, in present circumstances of declining private investment, a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government or active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital—

And these are the essential words which are at the basis of the right which we on this side of the house say the hon. gentleman has to discuss this matter.

—especially in the form of transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and other facilities—

I would ask you to note the words "other facilities".

—to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada.

In other words, for the purpose of this argument the important word is "especially". There the word "especially" is intended simply to indicate or to suggest the character of the discussion but it is not by any means exclusive in any way. It is simply descriptive of the kind of measures that might be used in order to bring about the purposes which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had in mind when he proposed it.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) is discussing perhaps one of the most important projects ever conceived of by the government and the people of Canada. It is a scheme that is not complete, and one that is still capable of meeting the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of transportation facilities.

I would suggest that in taking the position which he has taken the leader of the house ought to bear in mind that the Speaker, for whom we have the greatest of respect and whose intentions we all recognize as being in the common interests of our deliberations, nevertheless is one who has not had the long experience of the Leader of the Opposition and others in this house in trying to ascertain the traditional freedom that is afforded to hon. members on a resolution of this kind. I think it is particularly true in the case of my friend the genial Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Pickersgill: The leader of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —or rather the leader of the house for whom we all have the greatest respect. I was thinking of my friend a few years from now when I referred to him as the leader of the opposition. My hon. friend objected the other day to the hon. member for Laurier discussing this very question on his own estimates. In the light of that fact and in the light of words of conciliation which I have used, I would hope that we will be allowed to go on unfettered in this discussion.

Mr. Green: On the point of order may I say this, Mr. Speaker. As usual, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is very persuasive. However, may I point out to Your Honour that this is not a debate on the St. Lawrence seaway project. If the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) is allowed to go on and make the kind of speech he has been making, then any other member of this house is entitled to get to his feet and answer him about the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly he is. Why not?

Mr. Green: In fact, one hon. member has already asked me about rising to point out the mistakes that the hon. member for Laurier is making.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish he would do so.

Mr. Green: It only shows all too clearly how far out of order the hon. member is in trying to turn this debate into a debate on the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Mr. Pickersgill: The leader of the house is apparently afraid that this might degenerate into a debate.

Mr. Green: The debate must be confined to the wording of the amendment which was drawn up by my hon. friends opposite over the week end. I do not doubt that they burned the midnight oil in working out this form of amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We always work.

Mr. Green: However, now that they have submitted it, they are bound by it and they must keep to the terms of the amendment itself. As a matter of fact, there is one portion of the amendment itself which is out of order, namely that portion which refers to municipal improvements.

I refer Your Honour to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) during the debate on the address, which reads:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that in the opinion of this house consideration should be given to the advisability of passing legislation at this session to relieve the very heavy financial burden now carried by the municipalities of this country.

That, of course, is another point of order. But I would repeat that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) had no right to turn this debate into a debate on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Argue: On this point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that since the amendment is couched in very general terms it is one which enables the house to engage in a very wide ranging debate. That, of course, is perfectly proper and it is not necessary for hon. members when they engage in the discussion to stick to the wording of the resolution; they can bring forward examples to emphasize why they think the terms of the resolution should be adopted. And from our experience in this house on previous occasions I should think that any amendment which is moved asking that active measures should be taken to make available social capital in connection with transportation and other facilities would cover discussion of the St. Lawrence seaway project. Should other hon. members wish to reply to the hon. member for Laurier, I think they would be perfectly in order. Should any hon. member wish to make a reference, say, to Trans-Canada Air Lines as another example of transportation facilities which should be extended and increased, I believe he would be in order, though I am not thinking of doing so myself. It would seem to me, however, that a detailed review of what has gone on in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway in the past is not covered by this—

Mr. Green: That is what he has been doing.

Mr. Argue: I do not think, however, that the leader of the house raised this as his point. My understanding is that he went a good deal further and said the St. Lawrence seaway could not be discussed under this item at all. I think the seaway can be discussed to the extent that it is an active project today and to the extent that it may be increased and expanded as an active project in the future. As to a historical review of the project in the past, however—

Mr. Green: That is what we have been getting.

Mr. Argue: —I think the leader of the house has a point. But surely projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway and the extension of the seaway, and the extension of other transportation facilities are precisely what this resolution is about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That makes quite a number of points of order to deal with at one time. The amendment itself clearly states this:

> —a balanced policy of national development requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and other facilities to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada.

I believe transportation facilities may be discussed in relation to the urgent needs of social capital such as the amendment mentions, but I believe it is out of order at present to start a debate uniquely on the St. Lawrence seaway, and that it is out of order to review all that has happened in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway unless it is in relation to the suggestion relevant to the urgent needs of social capital mentioned.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, you made the point a moment ago that you thought I should not direct my remarks to what has been done but rather to what is being done, and that is what I am trying to do. I am trying to relate my remarks to what is being done; to relate them not so much to the past as to the present and to the future in relation to the urgent needs of social capital and in relation, also, to transportation needs. In that respect I was discussing the benefits that would derive from the seaway.

However, if you feel I should not dwell on that, I will pass to another part of my remarks which I think is pertinent to the amendment now before the house. The point I wanted to make is that although there has been a large amount of capital expenditure on the St. Lawrence seaway, because of what has happened from one end of it to the other there has now been more money spent for industrial development between the eastern end and the head of the great lakes than on the seaway itself. I am informed—and I relate this to the amendment—that the expenditure of large sums is being planned with respect to capital development, and that large sums of money have already been, in a large part, spent for industrial development on the south shore in the Montreal area, in the Niagara peninsula and in other regions of the seaway from its eastern extremity to the head of the lakes.

The second purpose I had in rising was to take issue with a certain statement which was made recently on the subject by the premier of the province of Ontario.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house a report which appeared in the Cornwall Standard Freeholder of July 2, 1958, as follows:

> Premier Leslie Frost has sounded a "battle cry" for an all-Canadian seaway.
> Immediate indication is that he intends cashing in on Prime Minister Diefenbaker's "works program for Canada."

The premier of Ontario is reported as having said:

> Ontario hydro has built the first part of an all Canadian seaway with construction of the $14,000,000 closure structure at the powerhouse.

The report continues:

> Mr. Frost is actually picking up the reins from Hon. Lionel Chevrier, former member of parliament for Stormont and once president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, who fought for an all-Canadian seaway.

And then the premier is reported as saying that the time had come for the construction of an all-Canadian seaway, and that he supports that project. Now, I should like to say a word in connection with that, and to state that as far back as 1951—

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I again rise on a point of order. Here we come back to the same old subject. The hon. gentleman is going back to rake over the coals in connection with this St. Lawrence seaway project, and I suggest that is not in order in this debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the leader of the house is carrying things to an extreme. What the hon. member for Laurier had begun to do was to talk about a new project, the creation of an all-Canadian seaway which is not part of the scheme at present under contemplation, and surely that comes completely within the purview of this resolution; and, surely, it is impossible to start with tomorrow. One has to give some background to a project of this kind, as hon. members will discover when they start planning.

Mr. Green: I suggest that the hon. member for Laurier is just trying to carry on an argument with the premier of Ontario here in this house on the particular amendment that is now before us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely it is against the rules to impute motives.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going on to say, if I may, that the premier in his statement in Cornwall advocated the construction of an all-Canadian seaway. What I wanted to bring to the attention of the house was that the previous government, as far back as 1951, had laid the foundation for the construction of an all-Canadian seaway; in fact, the cabinet approved the so-called all-Canadian seaway project in 1951, and at that time it was arranged that the then prime minister of Canada would discuss the project as it was then envisaged with the then president of the United States.

In the first place, when Canada saw that it was not possible to proceed with the 1941 agreement that had been signed by the two countries, another attitude was taken by this country, that of using the International Boundary Waters Treaty Act. Prior to making an application by both Canada and the United States for the development of power in the international section, Canada agreed to provide all of the navigational facilities on its side of the boundary line. It was then that the then prime minister went to discuss the matter with the president of the United States who agreed that if congress did not give its approval to the 1941 agreement he would approve of the all-Canadian seaway as second best.

It was decided, however, that parliament should introduce legislation providing for the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act and providing also, by agreement between Ontario and Canada, for the development of power. Later on, in 1954, congress passed what is known as the Wiley Dondero act. That act instructed a United States entity to build all of the facilities in the international section on the United States side of the line and so, at that time, we had two statutes. We had the Canadian statute authorizing construction wholly within Canada and in conjunction with a United States authority alternatively and a United States statute authorizing construction of a project on the United States side. Therefore it became important that the two governments meet which they did in July of 1954 when it was agreed that Canada would build the Canadian facilities at Iroquois and the United States would build in the international section opposite Barnhart island with the distinct understanding that as and when the volume of traffic warranted Canada would build the Canadian facilities.

The point I wish to make now is that perhaps the premier of the province of Ontario did not think of it at the time, but there is today the Iroquois canal which is built exclusively on Canadian territory. There is also the structure of the dike built at a cost of $14 million and pursuant to the agreement between Canada and Ontario by Ontario hydro and which provides for 27-foot facilities in the future. There is also the construction of channel facilities leading up to two Canadian locks opposite the city of Cornwall. As the matter now stands approximately half of the all-Canadian seaway is completed. All that remains to be done is the construction of two locks, one opposite where lock 18 used to be in the old Cornwall canal and the other a short distance upstream. There will then remain only the excavation between the two locks the whole of which should cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 million.

The point I wish to make at this time is that I take issue with this statement which appears to ignore the fact that a large portion of the all-Canadian seaway is already in existence. I also wanted to take issue with it because of the fact it has been stated that Ontario hydro had built the closure in the dike at the cost of $14 million. It is true that Ontario hydro built the structure in the dike at that cost but it was done by virtue of an agreement with the federal government. By virtue of that agreement with the federal government Ontario hydro had to provide for 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side of the boundary line. When it was decided that the seaway would be built on the American side of the line in the international section, it therefore became unnecessary to provide for 14-foot navigation facilities and the agreement was amended in order that the structure be placed in the dike so that at any future time if it became necessary because of the volume of traffic the provisions would be there to complete the all-Canadian seaway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order and say that the other day in a similar debate when there had been a number of interruptions the Speaker allowed extra time. Because of the series of interruptions I wish to be allowed to continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that his time had expired at twelve minutes past five o'clock. It is now approximately 18 minutes past five. However, if it is the pleasure of the house that I permit the hon. gentleman to carry on I shall be very pleased to do so. Does the house give unanimous consent to permitting the hon. member to proceed with his address?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe I can complete what I have to say quickly. I had some points which I shall have to leave because of the point of order which was raised but I shall complete the thought I was expressing. While a large portion of the all-Canadian seaway has been completed, what the house, the premier of Ontario and the government should be reminded of—and I remind them of it as respectfully as I can—is that what has been done thus far has been done in co-operation with the United States and I am sure the government would want that co-operation to continue. Certainly it would want it to continue in view of the agreement which was made originally, namely that if the circumstances were such, because traffic reached such a point, that parallel or duplicating facilities were required, these could be built on the Canadian side of the line after consultation with the United States. The former government made all the provisions necessary for this to be done. I did not want the premier of the province of Ontario to make the statement he did without, at least, there being a reply to what had been said.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, when I came to this house last session I had hoped, like many new members, to make my opening speech on a subject that is very dear to my heart and one in which I have taken a keen interest for many years. Until this moment I have never been given the opportunity of delivering my maiden speech, as it were, on this subject but now I must thank the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who, by means of his motion today, has made it possible for me to say something that I have dreamed of saying in the House of Commons for many years.

Before turning to an outline of the government's position with respect to a national development policy, there are a few comments which have been made by the Leader of the Opposition which should not pass unchallenged. The hon. gentleman referred to the Gordon commission and mentioned that two briefs were presented to that body, one by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories and the other by the commissioner of the Yukon. One of the later speakers read a paragraph from those submissions. By introducing that remark into this debate the barrenness of the position of the official opposition on the matter of national development has been exposed.

If you read the brief to the Gordon commission as submitted by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, and if you read the Gordon commission report, you will find a great absence of information in the report about the impact of that brief on the members of that commission. If you look at the index of the Gordon commission report you will find that the members of that commission thought that the north and the maritime provinces were so unimportant that they put them in the last chapter and grouped the two together like taking kittens and putting them in a sack along with a rock and throwing them into the river. Read that chapter in the Gordon commission report on the north and the maritimes. I would be hesitant ever to mention the Gordon commission report and the north in the same breath.

This submission to the Gordon commission by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories did mention certain things. It did mention that we should proceed with the Pine Point railway. But what the Leader of the Opposition forgot to tell this house was that no decision was made by the previous government to go ahead with the Pine Point railway. My department got no encouragement to make such a proposal which was necessary to the opening up of such a vast area of our country. The facts tell the story. The Pine Point railway was never recommended by the government of this country and I do not think we would have got a recommendation as long as the previous administration stayed in office. I will come to that in a minute.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke also of the fact that these two submissions to the royal commission outlined a grid system of roads in the territories. That is precisely true, but once again the record is clear and plain. The men in the department, some of them with a generation of interest in work in the north, put their hearts, their knowledge and their courage into suggestions that would build this country but year after year they saw their suggestions filed away in the brief cases and in the filing cabinets of their department. They saw their work, sometimes done at great difficulty and danger to themselves, pushed aside in the interest of looking after the people who lived in what the previous government called Canada where there is somebody. What they meant by "there is somebody" are nothing else but plain voters, with no thought of the future of the children of those voters. It was an appeal to their prejudice and their selfishness in the hope of being re-elected over and over again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is an awful statement to make.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have the record here. In this submission to the royal commission there is a recommendation for roads.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is a dreadful thing for the minister to make a statement like that.

Mr. Cardiff: You don't like it.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I look at the record of expenditures. I look to the pledge that the former government made for the development of this road pattern in the north. I find that in 1954-55 the previous government, always interested in the north, spent the magnificent sum of $2,501 in the territories; in the year 1955-56 it spent the sum of $86,770 on roads in the north. Then, in 1956-57 the amount increased, and in 1957-58, thanks to the extra boost that we gave it last winter, the amount reached $3.8 million, and for 1958-59 it is still $3.8 million, but a big proportion of that vote is on planning and surveys to complete a grid system through the Northwest Territories, recommended by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, to extend until 1980 as a program for the government, but this government plans to do it in from five to seven years. That is the difference on emphasis on these northern roads.

I did not bother to bring the figures for the Yukon. Suffice it to say this, Mr. Speaker. In this year in the Yukon the expenditure on roads and bridges and similar construction, such as culverts and so on, is four times greater than it was last year and that pace will be kept up until in five years we have a road right through to the Arctic ocean, the first in Canada's history, laying claim to our country along that coast, which should have been done many years ago.

I might digress for a moment to point out that after all the years that those pioneer people have been in the north with very little radio and very little news of the rest of this country, a decision was made just recently to send Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's programs into the north with the building of a big transmitter at Vancouver and eventually one at Winnipeg and a series of 12 small transmitters, scattered through the north.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Who were the pioneers of the C.B.C. in this country, not the hon. gentleman opposite?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, and you know that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Before this debate is over there will be many diversions thrown across our trail. If anyone thinks he can get me off this subject by mentioning the C.B.C. he is sadly mistaken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister mentioned the C.B.C.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The pioneers to whom I am referring are the people living in the north who wanted to hear some news of this country. We have made a recommendation to the C.B.C. and have gone forward and brought this news and entertainment to them.

I want to go on and mention just a few more points and I shall move rapidly because there are certain things I want to get at that are positive and in the interests of this house. The Leader of the Opposition mentioned the Liberal record and he gave as an example of that record their work and interest in water resources. Let me inform the house, that the previous administration passed the Canada Water Conservation Act in 1953 to help local districts, to help provinces develop and conserve their water in the various drainage basins of Canada. How many projects have gone forward under that act? Not one. That is an example of the Liberal record. The Canada Water Conservation Act went on the statute books in 1953 and has never been used to this day.

I go on and discuss another point.

Mr. Pearson: Who controls the resources?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): As I listened to the hon. member he spoke with words of praise and mentioned the fact that the Liberals had always been in favour of northern development. He mentioned the need of establishing our sovereignty in the north. As I heard him speak what a conversion I heard. This is the same hon. gentleman who not so many months ago went up and down this country and referred to this program in the north as a program of building roads from igloo to igloo, building roads where there is nobody, and all the little echoes and all the little parts of Canada where all the little minds come from answered in tune. Here is one of those little echoes. This is a man who comes from the north, and he said: "Up there we knew it was pure baloney." That was a remark of the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie), who is a follower and supporter of the official opposition. Here is another remark from the north: "The good northern people may have mistaken this vision for just another example of the northern lights." This is a remark by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin).

Let us have a word or two about this question of our north in so far as sovereignty is concerned. This is a subject which must appeal to all Canadians, regardless of political conviction; this is a subject which must appeal to all those who believe in the future of this nation. Sovereignty is not painting a colour on a map that you publish and put in a history book or geography book and let the children in the schools look at it and read it.

Sovereignty is the effective occupation of an area by a country which has command or control over it. It is no misstatement of fact that it is a matter of national chagrin to some of us that across this, our territory, which we paint in red in the geography books and show to our children as Canada, roads have been built without our permission and without our knowledge by people not bearing allegiance to this country. It is a matter of common knowledge that this whole northern area is an area of much interest to the world and it is a matter of chagrin to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources that when I want information on the northern part of my country I have to read documents from other countries. Our friends to the south and our friends to the north have more knowledge about the northern region of our country than we who live in the country have.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question? Is he suggesting that the Russians have more knowledge of our Arctic than we have?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If the Leader of the Opposition will follow carefully the words of the Arctic institute, a group supported by both the United States and ourselves, he will find this country condemned for knowing so little about the north when Russia knows so much.

Mr. Pearson: Their own north, not our north, surely.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is no secret that when we want to find out the depth of the water off our coast we go to Russian charts.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose that is why you decommissioned the Labrador.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I say that is a matter of national chagrin. I want to point out that at our present rate of progress in measuring the depth of the waters off our northern shores it will take us 250 years to know how deep those waters are. It is a matter of national chagrin that with the great need for this information we have not the facilities to get it fast enough. I simply point out that when any person starts to talk in the house about the question of sovereignty in the north this is a matter that appeals to all Canadians and there is no political division on this point. If we are to maintain our sovereignty in the north we must face up to the fact that we all have a duty and a responsibility to pay the price in order to get this information so that we will know something about our own country.

The main point made by the Leader of the Opposition was that there was no hurry to develop the wealth of the north. He mentioned casually the Paley report and the Gordon commission and said that they indicated that there was going to be a deficiency in the United States in respect of certain strategic materials and energy fuels. Then he went on to say, "We will wait until the demand comes and then we will move."

If he would read the submission of the commissioner of the Northwest Territories to the Gordon commission he would find there the answer to that argument. In the north you must move five to ten years in advance before these great sources of wealth can be made available. He will also find that we have to have some consideration for the people who live in the north. If there is anything that has divided this country it is the frustration that pioneer people have felt at all times in our history towards those in government controlling their destinies because of their lack of consideration for the men who first went into these areas.

From the history of this country I could relate example after example. I could tell of how the people of western Ontario rose in revolt in 1833 and 1838 on that same issue of frustration and neglect of their needs. I could speak of the dissatisfaction of the people of western Canada in 1870 and 1885 at the neglect we suffered at the hands of those who had control over much of our destiny. In the same way it is true in the north that those who have pioneered there have a sense of frustration and neglect in that even after representations are made on their behalf by men who at least know something of their problems they are still overlooked.

It strikes me that the Leader of the Opposition is in this position. He is the leader of a party which is in the wilderness and as their Moses he must seek for a message to bring to the people. But I should like to suggest that in this case he is a Moses without a message. Never in the history of the nation has it been so imperative that we do not overlook the opportunities before us, not only the development of our national wealth but the mere basic fact of maintaining our sovereignty so that generations to follow will have the future to which they are entitled. These matters demand tremendous interest in the north and this interest is not divorced from the needs of the people in the settled areas of Canada and the largest cities. I hope to make that clear.

Before leaving the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, may I deal with what he had to say about an investment program. To listen to various members of the opposition one would think that the government has given no thought to the matter of public and private investment and the interplay of forces between them. I hope that my remarks, and I will give some figures, will indicate to the Leader of the Opposition that a great deal of thought has been given to the question of public investment, its expansion and contraction and what it has to do with the over-all economics of the country in the present economic situation. I hope that as a result of my remarks some of these statements about the north will not be made in the future because they do harm to the interests of Canada.

The development of the north is not divorced from the needs of the people of every one of our towns and communities throughout settled Canada. I should like to discuss in detail some of the other observations he made but I think I will leave it at that.

I want to start now on the speech I have waited to make for a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope it will be more accurate than what has happened so far.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. gentleman is not going to start with George Brown.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will have a word about George Brown in a minute.

Mr. Green: It will not be with Pickersgill anyway.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Over the years some of us in the Conservative party have advocated a development policy for Canada. We played our part in the convention of 1948 and again in the convention of 1956. To many of us the election of 1957 was the vindication of a policy for which we had worked for a quarter of a century. We knew instinctively that the one thing that could distinguish this party and enable it to fulfil its destiny in the political history of Canada was for it to turn its attention to its great historic mission in Canada, the development of Canada and the building of a nation in the northern half of this continent truly patterned on our own way of life. The last parliament, which was short, was a period of getting ready. I would have liked, if there had been a second session of that parliament—

Mr. Pickersgill: So would we.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —to introduce many of the proposals which have since been introduced. I should like to refer to a few of them as found in the opening campaign speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made in Winnipeg on February 12. I want to list ten points taken from the report of the speech as found in a Canadian Press dispatch in the Edmonton Journal of February 13, 1958. Here are the ten points of the development program as outlined at that time. It is the first time they have been placed on the records of the House of Commons and I am very proud to do so. They are:

1. A $100 million roads program in the Yukon and Northwest Territories to open exploration of new oil and mineral areas.
2. A joint federal-provincial plan to build access roads to the north, tying in with the Territories roads, costing $75 million and perhaps double that amount if all provinces join the program.
3. Federal aid to "economically-sound" rail lines to resources, including the proposed Pine Point railway from northern Alberta to Great Slave lake.
4. Exploration of the Arctic archipelago aimed at developing Arctic sea routes "with the prospect of developing atomic icebreakers in the future."
5. A 10-year, $105 million scheme for thermal power plants in the Atlantic provinces, provided in legislation last session.
6. A $75 million development at Frobisher Bay on Baffin island, in the Arctic.

Then, seventh, there is the possible second route for the trans-Canada highway in western Canada via Saskatoon and Edmonton; eighth, the federal sharing in Saskatchewan's power-irrigation development of the South Saskatchewan river; ninth, Canada would also press for hydro power development of British Columbia's Columbia river, now awaiting an agreement with the U.S. on the sharing of downstream power benefits; and, tenth, a national conference would be called later this year to map a national conservation policy. The principles of the prairie farm rehabilitation plan, begun in the 1930's in the west, would be extended to all parts of Canada. I have read the points—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are those items covered in the estimates for the present fiscal year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was going to deal with them in detail, and I would be answering the hon. member's question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think there are any of them in the estimates. Those are all part of the vision.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have read to the house the ten points mentioned at that time. Now I should like to give some of the reasons why those ten points are mentioned, and this is the point I want to drive home to every Canadian who hears or reads these remarks.

We have in Canada as a national task the necessity of delineating our resources. If any person knows the history of modern industrial states he will find that their whole success or failure rests upon the supply and regulation of energy sources. We have neither an inventory nor a continuing inventory or any form of usable data of our energy resources in Canada. We do have some knowledge of our resources, but it is incomplete. We do have knowledge of potential gas reserves, but that is far from complete. We do have some knowledge of propane and butane, but very little information is available on these subjects. We do have some knowledge of our coal reserves; we do have some knowledge of our uranium and nuclear energy, but we have much to learn about other energy sources. It must have been clear to any person who was thinking—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. I am sure the leader on the other side will agree with me it is very difficult to relate the minister's remarks now to the motion before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the minister who presumably has some justification for his remarks.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member is being facetious, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all, sir, I was most serious.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Assuming the point of order was serious, Mr. Speaker, I say that anyone will realize that because the government has been elected on its basic development program it is in order for me to put on the record our reasons for embarking on such a national development program in order to make clear every one of those points I have raised.

Mr. Speaker: The only hesitation I have about the minister's speech is that the amendment appears to be limited to the settled areas of Canada. The reference is that in northern Canada as well government measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital, especially in the form of transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and the field of small business has been added by the other amendment, and other facilities to stimulate the economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada. It seems fairly broad, and I doubt if it would be possible to limit discussion.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think if you had been present at the beginning you would have realized that the Leader of the Opposition in introducing his amendment spent most of his time on the question that we were foolish to do anything in the north at the present time.

Mr. Pearson: I never made any such statement. I would not like that to go on the record. I said, and the minister must remember, that we would be foolish to go ahead with projects in the north unless we gave them careful economic consideration, and I quoted the minister in approval of that approach.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): We will leave it at that. I was discussing the reasons why we introduced this program. The first thing, and I will repeat this, was to delineate our resources in both the fields of energy and strategic materials. I should like to mention the Paley report. The significance to Canada of the Paley report, outlined in five volumes, is the fact that strategic materials and energy fields in the United States are getting into a precarious position. Various metals and various sources of energy will either run out or become limited at different times. Generally speaking, this is the position. The United States today, instead of being a resource surplus country is a resource deficit country, and the present percentage is given at nine per cent. In a few years from now, 1975 or 1980, it is expected the United States will be running 20 per cent behind their ordinary needs for resources.

Now this means that the people of the United States, both public and private investors, must seek different places in the world from which they can replenish those needs and maintain their industrial machine. Obviously the place to look is to the north and to the south, and they are doing just that. I point out that today Canada is one of the last great resource areas, still unexplored and undeveloped. The Leader of the Opposition would have us move cautiously before we find out anything about these resources in case we repeat the mistake made 60 years ago in the building of two railways across Canada at the time of the Laurier government.

The first purpose, Mr. Speaker, was to delineate these resources, and the reason for that is obvious. When we have the resources that the world needs, we should know where they are and of what they consist. This is the first purpose of the program of roads to resources. We have to know what we have. We have no inventory and we have no group of people fully qualified or able to look after them. When this government took office and met this house on October 14, 1957 the first thing it did was to set up a royal commission on energy called the Borden commission. This royal commission, and this national energy board are 10 years overdue. I have heard suggestions that we do not need a national energy board; that the federal power commission in Washington knows enough about these resources that we can take their advice. If this is the attitude of Canadians, if this is the attitude of the majority of members on this side of the house, they should not be here. I am sure they do not believe it. We want and we need a national energy board. The Gordon commission has recommended it, and it is 10 years overdue.

Any government that sat here from 1945 onwards without recognizing the need for some form of national energy board was unaware of or completely indifferent to the suggestions that are made all across this country. This country today stands completely helpless in this respect. We have no body of opinion here in Canada qualified to say whether we should export or import energy, whether we should delineate more of our resources or whether we should hold it back. There is no such board or body available here in this country.

I now want to go on, Mr. Speaker, to some of the details of these roads to resources, in answering the point made by the Leader of the Opposition, and I hope that he takes these figures to heart. I am going to give him an example of public investment and private investment interrelated. This projected road from Flat creek in the Yukon, 30 miles this side of Dawson city, projecting north and northeastward to the Arctic coast some place in the neighbourhood of Fort McPherson,will be finished in the next four or five years. It will cost the people of this country between $5 million and $8 million in a five-year period. Is this house aware of the fact that already behind that road private investment has pledged in hard dollars and cents a minimum expenditure, I would estimate, of something about $150 million to $250 million? As the hon. member was speaking I sent over for the latest information. Let him read these facts. Let him tell the people of Canada that this is a road from igloo to igloo. Since September 23 when I notified the oil and gas industry of our change in regulations pending with respect to exploration for oil and gas in the territories, permits for the exploration of 36,452,214 acres of land have been taken out in the Northwest Territories, mostly along the route of this road.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. gentleman not say that the road was in the Yukon?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Starting in the Yukon and going into the Northwest Territories. I might add some more figures. Before September 23 last land for which permits were taken out and reservations made amounted roughly to 20 million acres. If you add all these things together you get a figure much higher than the one I have just quoted. I have put these figures in the public record, Mr. Speaker because I think the mere restatement of them is sufficient to show the situation. If the taxpayer is asked to put up

$5 million or $8 million in public investment in this area, and if private investment from all over the world is willing to risk a sum extending up to $250 million, I would say as a minimum, it shows that that investment was timely, was well thought out and was made with due caution. I used the word "minimum". Of course information comes to me that is not available to the house.

I used that word advisedly. I am going to ask my fellow colleagues on this side of the house to remember this one little fact. During the election campaign to my knowledge, no member on the government side including the Prime Minister ever used a figure higher than $25 million to $50 million as the expected investment of private enterprise. That was my advice to the Prime Minister last February, namely that the expected amount of private investment for exploration in this area was $25 million to $50 million. But I now stand here in the middle of the summer of 1958 and inform this house that the bare minimum will be between $150 million and $250 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was announced in this house about three years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was announced by Mr. Howe three years ago as a possible estimate.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am not finished yet. We have another project going into the north which is to tie up with the territorial program in the north, that of going to the provinces and asking them to join with us in providing roads leading into the north. At the time the Prime Minister spoke in Winnipeg he estimated that $75 million would be spent on this program over a five-year period. We had no way of knowing how willing the provinces would be in co-operating with the federal government in the opening of resource areas in their provinces where they, the provinces, owned the resources and had complete responsibility for their management. Since the Prime Minister spoke, it is now no secret that nine provinces have joined up in the scheme and not only have they asked for amounts which will send the total up to the maximum but they have asked for amounts that go beyond the maximum. I think the people of Canada in all the provinces will be proud to know that their provincial governments are co-operating with the federal government in this program of making resources available to the people of Canada for opportunity and development at this time.

Another one of these programs was the Pine Point railway. I hope the Leader of the Opposition will listen to these figures. There has been no secret about the fact that that railway will cost between $60 million and $65 million. Obviously, as is traditional, the federal government will be asked to put up a subsidy. It is quite possible that subsidy can be measured—using millions of dollars—on the fingers of two hands. That will be our contribution as a people and as taxpayers. But there are facts that are not generally known, Mr. Speaker. The total of public and private investment on this Pine Point railway is not $65 million in the ties, the bridges and the steel rails; the total investment at the present time is reaching the figure of $400 million. This government has letters of intent from private business with respect to putting up private capital to the amounts roughly that I have just indicated. If at any time any government can spend a handful of millions of dollars and produce so many tens of millions of dollars of private investment, then I say that government is aware of the relationship between public investment and private investment.

I see that the clock shows that it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had been discussing the reasons why we had to inaugurate in Canada a program of delineating our resources both with regard to energy and with regard to strategic metals. I mentioned how as the first step in this program we had inaugurated a program of building a big system of roads in the territories to help delineate both the oil and the metallic ores. I spoke next of the uselessness of building a great system of roads in the territories unless there were roads in the south to join them to the settled areas. I spoke, too, of the necessity for moving carefully with regard to these programs, and I gave some examples where the public taxpayer was asked to spend several millions of dollars which resulted in many millions of dollars being advanced by private enterprise to carry out their part of this joint public and private investment program.

The main point which, I think, the Leader of the Opposition made in the course of his remarks was that the question of timing was important. I believe it is fair to say that he was aware that every Canadian knew that in the northern areas we have tremendous wealth, but that we should wait until the economics of the need for these materials are absolutely clear before any program is started to open them up. I countered by referring to the statement made by the commissioner for the Northwest Territories to the Gordon commission in 1955 in which he developed the argument that in the north when you needed resources you have to begin five or ten years before they could be made available to the economy of the country. I should like to emphasize this point by reminding the house that the preliminary report indicates that by 1975 or 1980 in the great republic to the south the shortage of certain raw materials will be quite urgent. The report specifically mentions certain strategic metals and it is believed that the great industrial machine in the United States will be facing severe difficulties in obtaining supplies.

We in the northern half of this continent have a responsibility to our people. We are sitting here on what is probably the greatest treasure house of the world; certainly, there is only one nation that can rival us in this respect, and that is the U.S.S.R. If we sit here and wait for prices to rise above their normal economic level to indicate to our mining people and to our oil people that it is time to move in and develop these areas, we should in my opinion be failing in our responsibility to this growing nation. I believe that if we are to have any control over the discovery and development of these resources it is in our interest that we find out and find out soon where they are, what they are and how much we have of each.

Mr. Hardie: Could I ask the hon. gentleman a question? How would he find out where these resources are?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There are several well known methods of finding out. If you are looking for oil and gas, you drill holes. If you are looking for minerals you do a certain amount of preliminary aerial reconnaissance using magnetometers and gravity meters, then you make a ground survey, and finally you have to drill holes, too.

In this delineation of resources there are three steps. The first is to discover where a deposit lies. That gives you the location, but it does not give you the extent; it gives you the type of metal you have, but it does not give you the potential or the probable reserve. Therefore, the first step in our program of opening up our resources is to build railroads, or to use water navigation or aerial navigation to find out information about an area which, by formula projection or by other devices used by survey engineers, can lead to an estimation of future tonnages or deposits in reserve. As a matter of fact, the province of Alberta has done a great deal of work in estimating not only its proven reserves in oil and gas but in trying to work out its potential and probable reserves. That is the only area in Canada where anything resembling an inventory has been carried out, and if we do not have an inventory we can have no policy with regard to handling these resources. That is the situation behind the national energy board set-up.

I wish to go on now to discuss further this question of research with reference to the Winnipeg speech. I do not think there is any hon. member in this house who could argue more strongly than myself in favour of the necessity for research. Here in Canada we need research not only into basic aspects of an exploration program but research into techniques concerning the handling of these minerals and energy sources.

On this question of research, I am amazed at the slow rate of progress we are making. If we keep up the present progress in Canada it will take 250 years of hydrographic survey before we find out the depths of water around the northern shores of this country. We have no gravity meter surveys of the northern islands; we have made no survey of 80 per cent of British Columbia; we have done almost nothing in the Yukon, yet this is the vital geophysical information we need in order to get some idea of the extent of our exploration program.

In the months of February, March and April, representatives of this country attended a meeting of the United Nations in Geneva on the international code of law for the sea, and at that meeting one of a series of resolutions passed, which was accepted by the majority of the nations present, dealt with the continental shelf.

The first of those three resolutions or conventions denied the right of any nation to attach reservations to them. I am very proud to report that this country, through its representatives there, played a very active part both in proposing the resolution and in establishing the fact that no nation could attach to that reservation. This grants to this country with land off its shores not only the right to develop and explore the territory but the right to exploit it to the degree one can with the improving techniques of this day and age. The advantage to our country of this natural resource area is hard to estimate. I have used the figure of 25 per cent although it may be 20 per cent or more than 25 per cent. But if the country acquired a territory of an additional 25 per cent by the ordinary means of acquiring land it would cause great headlines in our press. Quietly, at this meeting of the United Nations, meeting for peaceful purposes, we added to our resources an area of tremendous acreage. I point this out because it emphasizes the need for research in this country by means of which we can measure the mineral and oil potential of these lands beneath the sea.

It may interest hon. members to know that the techniques of exploration beneath the sea are improving almost month by month. We think we have an answer to the question of conducting gravity meter surveys by vessels on the surface of the ocean. We also think we have an answer to the question of conducting gravity meter surveys by using helicopters. This will assist in overcoming the difficulties we presently encounter in working in a troublesome terrain. As I have said, I mention these things to emphasize the need for research in the north. As a younger Canadian I quite frankly admit I am somewhat ashamed that with all the effort and energy many of us expended on this question last year we were able to mount during the summer of 1958 a research program in the Arctic costing only approximately $50,000. That can be found in the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I should like to have seen a sum ten times that large but I hope and expect that if we can get the men and equipment mounted we will have ready for next year a program costing in the neighbourhood of half a million dollars for research in that area alone. Even with that amount being expended it will take us years to acquire the vital information we require on which we can base an extensive exploration program of the far northern islands.

Some of you here may wonder why it is that these far northern islands are of such interest to us. There are many reasons and I could possibly best illustrate my point by mentioning Frobisher Bay. Frobisher Bay is situated on the southern part of Baffin island. Baffin island is an island which in years to come will become as well known to Canadians as is the Mesabi range to the people of the United States. It was on the basis of the development of the Mesabi range in the United States that the great industrial economy of that nation was built. From the information that we have available—I admit it is sketchy—we expect that in the whole area of the eastern Arctic we will find anywhere from two to six times the amount of iron ore that was available to the people of the United States in the Mesabi range in the last 100 years. When you are dealing with resources like that you realize that there is no time for timidity or extra caution. Not only must there be boldness but imagination as well both in the broad sense and in the technical sense of reaching in and finding out by research and hard work how to best use these resources.

Frobisher Bay came to our attention not through anything this government did but due to the fact that it was halfway between the western coast of the United States and Canada and the capital cities of Europe. It is the natural stopping place on a direct route from the orient to the west coast of Canada and the United States and the centres of population in Europe. Therefore it has developed spontaneously and economically as a base of refuelling for commercial aircraft. At the present time in the neighbourhood of 1,500 passengers a week stop over at Frobisher Bay. It lends itself to strategic defence in the northern areas of the eastern part of the continent. Therefore, from these two sources, civilian and military, comes a source of revenue to help us finance and build up this area which in future will become the centre of administration of the eastern Arctic. But let me point out this to hon. members. Baffin island is not forever going to be financed by defence and through servicing passengers on polar routes. The basic economy is going to be iron ore and other minerals that exist on the island. This great source of wealth is accessible to ourselves and the nations of the world through sea transport. I fully expect that before many years have passed Frobisher Bay and other communities in that area will be the centre of an extremely thriving extractive industry producing iron and other minerals for Canada.

The next point in our program deals with power. On this matter I can understand the confusion of hon. members opposite. When this government took office there were three requests for assistance or aid in the development of power in Canada. One of these was in the maritime provinces. The other was on the Saskatchewan river. The third was on the rivers that make up the Columbia system. Naturally, because these were the requests before the federal government, it was on these three power development projects that the government first took action. The requests had been placed before the previous Liberal administration and all hon. gentlemen know the record in that regard. The record of the previous government was fully debated in this house in the last session of parliament with respect to the project in the maritimes and I hope the record of the request concerning the Saskatchewan river project will be discussed in this house at a later date.

I wish to say a word or two concerning the Columbia river project. It was our hope on the basis of the information we had to move quickly in working out the economics as well as the engineering aspects of the Columbia river system to make this vast source of power available to the areas of western Canada and the United States where power is scarce. We thought that with a little energy and some intelligence we could advance this program very rapidly. It was not long before we discovered that we lacked the necessary information to deal effectively with the question of the Columbia river project.

I recently watched a television program emanating from the United States during which the United States head of the international joint commission pointed out that the United States people had the figures on the Columbia river project for the last 25 years and that Canada did not have the figures. That, Mr. Speaker, is the answer. When you begin to deal with the resources of a great international river like the Columbia you do not enter a game of that sort playing with the cards of the fellow across the table. We had to get figures based on Canadian engineering and economics. We have put the energy and intelligence to work on this project. I can assure the house that at this time we are coming very close to knowing what figures we have and what the economics as well as the engineering facts are, and that we are moving toward a position where we can enter into any negotiation that may take place with all the facts at our command that we require to ensure that this great wealth and resource which is Canada's will be protected to the fullest extent in the national interest.

Mr. Hardie: How did you learn the facts?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My hon. friend asks me how I learned the facts. They were gleaned from engineering reports which were started about two years ago.

Mr. Hardie: By the former ministry.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): That is true. They were learned by the economic studies which we have undertaken and I recall last session when the then member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) asked me in this house why I did not go down to the United States and have more powwows with them, I just thought of an old rhyme that we used to sing to ourselves during the days of the first world war:

Kaiser Bill went up the hill
To take a look at France;
Kaiser Bill came down the hill
With bullets in his pants.

That is what happened to the previous minister of northern affairs and national resources when he went to discuss without the facts and figures, and that would have happened to the present minister if he had gone there unprepared and without the arms—

Mr. Hardie: What new surveys or economic surveys has the minister started since June 23 of last year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member will find out the answer very shortly. One was started in the month of January, 1958, and that is the one I was referring to. I just mentioned this fact about the Columbia to show that here is another great resource where the Americans can speak on their national television hookups and boast that they have had the information for 25 years, and the Canadians have not. I am simply pointing out that we have not the facts in Canada as yet; we are still getting them.

The next point I would like to discuss in this over-all program is this. Our first purpose was to delineate those resources and discuss research and the necessity for it. I have used the example of Frobisher Bay. We are moving into the north and carefully, with great planning, to take advantage of the situation as it now is, but thinking forward to the day when the economics of the area, of mining, will support that whole community and other communities as well. I could have taken a good deal of time of the house to point out the efforts we have made in research to cut down the cost of heating homes, to cut down the cost of providing water for those homes, to cut down the cost of providing sewer services for those homes. I could tell the house, as I told the committee in another place, of the amount of savings that we think we have achieved already by simply applying the basic knowledges of engineering and economics to very simple mundane problems.

I know that this is not the end of our difficulties but it does show that we are going into this with great care and great planning. One of the final points is the question of conservation mentioned by the Prime Minister. I know hon. members will understand me when I say that it is only by the grace of the divine Deity Himself that we have been saved in this regard.

If one looks at the history of the economic development of the United States and realized the great importance of the contribution of the first Roosevelt to the handling of the resources of that great American republic, one will recognize the significance of the step that we are now prepared to take. Conservation of resources means the best and most efficient use of those resources. It means that all the facts of wild life, of power, of land, of water, of various minerals, of the forest industry, the health of our people, all these assets which make up our resources in this country are put together and looked at and certain principles evolved, principles under which the federal government must operate; principles under which the provincial governments must operate; principles under which municipal governments must operate; principles under which regional conservation boards must operate; principles under which the research people of our universities must operate, and all those many public-spirited citizens who make up the great rank and file of our conservation groups in Canada. This country has never sat down and established over a wide range of resources a fundamental policy on the handling of those natural resources. After I spoke on this program last fall for the first time my mail came in from many sources, from the universities, from the people interested in wild life and in forests, from people interested in minerals and from people interested in the forest industry, and from people interested in land uses. They pointed out to me how pleased they were that at last somebody was giving direction to this program.

We have written the provinces on this matter; we have been in touch with other departments and I would like to say that this conservation conference will possibly be going forward this fall; but such has been the multitude of suggestions, and such has been the volume of old reports that we have stacked up, trying to study what has been done in the past, and such has been the tremendous complexity of this whole problem, that I have confessed publicly I doubt the wisdom of calling the conservation conference next fall. More likely it will be some time next spring or next summer when we can have the agenda boiled down and crystallized to the point where the people who can assemble there can take a worthwhile forward step. On this question of conservation, if this government comes forward with this program of calling the people of Canada together who are interested in the most efficient use of the resources, and does come out in the next three or four years with a series of principles that can guide all levels of government and private groups in the future, if it does nothing more, it would be well worth the confidence of the people of Canada for many years to come.

I have spoken at some length on this program, Mr. Speaker, because above all this is the one feature of this government that distinguishes it from the official opposition.

Mr. Fisher: The only one.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If we are to embark on a program of national development not only must we draw the first faint lines on a blueprint and carefully fill out the lines that go step by step in natural sequence, but we must know where we are heading and where we are heading is in this direction. We think that some day we will have on the northern half of this continent a nation of from 50 million to 100 million people. If we are to have a nation of 100 million people in Canada, then it is about time we did some thinking about how this is going to come about. There is no use talking about all the oil resources under the continental plains reaching out into the Arctic and out under the Arctic ocean, and possibly under the lands beneath the sea in the Arctic; it is no use talking about our wonderful wealth of forests—and it is wonderful—it is no use talking about all the future mineral wealth; it is no use talking about the great character of our people unless we put these things side by side, with our people as one part of the equation and their energy sources another part of the equation, and those various other resources such as minerals and forests. We must put this energy to work.

If we act so that the energy, the natural resources and our people in this equation are opened up to private enterprise so that by the juxtaposition of those resources and this power and of those people and of this market there is an economic development possible in that area, I think we would be measuring up to the philosophy that this government holds concerning private enterprise and public expenditure. Or, to put it another way, we believe that the state, the government, has the duty and responsibility to provide that social capital mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition in his amendment, in the form of roads, railways, power plants, airports and all those things that aid and benefit private enterprise to enter in and develop those resources for the good of the people of Canada. If we point out in this House of Commons where we spend money in public investment to yield much larger investments by private enterprise, I think we have demonstrated down to earth principles of good, sound government, following a philosophy which we see quite clearly. If we are to be measured in the future by the tests of history it will be by what extent we succeed or fail in building processing industries here in Canada.

There is iron in Labrador, iron in Baffin island, iron in Ungava, iron in the western Arctic. It is of no use to us if it all goes to feed the industrial plants of nations all over the world so that we in Canada can buy back the finished products. We will have to export tremendous millions of tons to all these countries because that is part of our responsibility in the world but we must make sure that large supplies are available to be manufactured and processed here in Canada without increasing the cost. But on the contrary, because of the juxtaposition of energy and natural resource, produced here cheaper than in any other part of the world, in the decades ahead we will be the greatest supplier of iron and steel products in the world. I repeat that this must be done by careful planning and by creating situations whereby economics will result in the cheaper production that will give us an advantage on an economic basis without restraints or artificial subsidies of any kind.

I think I have made my point clear. We on this side of the house do have a national development policy. I was going to quote a question asked me last October by the former minister of northern affairs and national resources at which time he challenged me to produce this national development program right when I was busy trying to work out some of the details of it. I have sat here ever since waiting for an opportunity to give the house a few ideas of what the program is all about. You have got it now.

I am going to remind the Leader of the Opposition of a few facts about our history. The other night I mentioned casually the name of a man called Brown. This man lived roughly 100 years ago. I praised his contribution to Canadian political thought in connection with development and the opposition had great fun pointing out the fact that he also believed in legislative union. They could have pointed out a few more things about George Brown. He had other dogmatic convictions which I am going to leave unmentioned. I do not care what a man believes in every aspect of his thinking. However, I am going to put before the house just a few of his words because, wherever George Brown is now, I hope he will know that someone a century later appreciates these thoughts. I read from an editorial he wrote in the Globe roughly 100 years ago:

> The non-occupation of the Northwest Territory is a blot upon our character for enterprise. We are content to play drone while others are working. We settle down quietly within the petty limits of an insignificant province while a great empire is offered to our ambition. . . . If Canada acquires this territory it will rise in a few years from a position of a small and weak province to be the greatest colony any country has ever possessed, able to take its place among the empires of the earth. The wealth of 400,000 square miles of territory will flow through our waters and be gathered by our merchants, manufacturers, and agriculturists. Our sons will occupy the chief places of this vast territory, we will form its institutions, supply its rules, teach its schools, fill its stores, run its mills, navigate its streams. . . . We can beat the United States if we start at once. It is an empire we have in view and its whole export and import trade will be concentrated in the hands of Canadian merchants and manufacturers if we strike for it now.

Those are the words of George Brown. He was a clear Grit. If hon. members opposite would go back to the fountainhead of the words of George Brown and forget all this division and diversion that has come along in the last 100 years they would put their party on a much sounder footing for the future and be much more in tune with the Canadian people than they are now.

It is significant, that in 1858, 100 years ago, a young man by the name of Alexander Tilloch Galt was invited to join the cabinet. He was invited to do so because he had a plan to bring confederation into being for the colonies on the northern half of this continent. It is significant that just 100 years ago in 1858 a young man from Toronto went to the west, up the Qu'Appelle river to the South Saskatchewan river and recommended that a dam be built. His name was Hind. Today, 100 years later, we may see a start on what he recommended. One hundred years ago men did have vision. They did have courage and some of them had the energy to go out and do something. It was Macdonald who led his government through those terrible 15 years of building the transcontinental railway known as the Canadian Pacific. If you read the speeches of the men in opposition at that time you see that they said, "Where does this road go? Who will ride on it? Indians and buffalo." I have seen a few "Indians" on those trains in recent years but very few buffalo.

Those were the words of caution by our Liberal friends 80 years ago. Everyone knows today that this railway through the bush and muskeg of northern Ontario has opened up a mineral industry that produces over a billion dollars of new wealth a year, that produces over a billion dollars of new forest wealth a year. That line ran through the west they talked about, through the prairies which they had defined as a desert. Now we have there one of the greatest bread baskets in the world.

Then, what horrible things they said about British Columbia. In the short time I have had since we adjourned at six o'clock I am sorry I was not able to dig up a few quotations of the things they said about British Columbia. They called it a most inhospitable land and said that people could not possibly exist there. Yet we have 22 members in the house today representing that province, and if Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba move a little faster they will soon have as many.

I mention these things to make clear the background of our thinking. As a party we felt that we should bring our party back to its traditional theme of developing and opening up the country. Naturally in starting this program we tended to think of the immediate needs of the people of the maritimes and the prairies because they have fallen behind the national level of income. So we brought forward programs in those two parts of Canada because it was a part of our policy to bring about equality between groups and regions in Canada.

But I want now to emphasize the point that every time you spend a dollar to make power cheaper in the Atlantic provinces, bring industry there and make the people there prosperous, you help every other person in Canada. I say these things to the people in the Atlantic provinces and I say them here too. Every time you spend a dollar to bring some security of living to the people of central Saskatchewan it helps every part of Canada, not just the people of that part. As a Canadian I am very happy that much of the leadership for this type of thinking came from the city of Toronto. At times we do have some fun among ourselves referring to that city, but when the chips are down the people of Toronto have always measured up in the building of this nation. Just as George Brown said, all the benefit does get back there but I do not think we should quarrel about that because what helps one of us helps all of us.

Our program, therefore, is to build this nation by helping those regions which have fallen behind. We are doing this in the interests of Canada, but primarily to provide an opportunity for the people of this generation, our sons and daughters who are born here in the future, as well as the people who come to this great dominion. This is the fundamental social purpose behind what we are doing. I should like to recall, if I may, some of the words of men much greater than I. I have often heard a phrase by Edmund Burke quoted in this house, and that phrase is this:

> If there is no vision the people perish—

I do believe, Mr. Speaker, this this government has a vision, a vision which the members of this government are determined to carry out. I am going to read the rest of the sentence I have just quoted.

> If there is no vision the people perish, but if the vision is blurred, the people perish faster.

I am going to suggest that if the people of Canada follow the lead of the Leader of the Opposition and those who support him in this cautious, timid approach to the development of our resources, not only will there be no vision, but what little vision there is will be so blurred that this country will perish much faster.

I know the Leader of the Opposition is suffering from the great burdens of the traditions of the Liberal party in following this course of timidity. Blake, their leader of 80 years ago, speaking about immigration into western Canada following the railway used these words:

> They (the Conservatives) said the immigrants would pour in and were pouring in rapidly. I asked them, when did these people come in? If it is true that they did come in, where are they now? Did their bones whiten the prairies?

Is this the confidence, the boldness and the imagination that the people of Canada—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about Sifton?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This is Blake at his most pessimistic. I should like to quote another one of the remarks of the Liberal leaders, Edward Blake. When he was speaking in 1886 he used these words:

> I was speaking in 1874 of the bargain made by Sir John A. Macdonald to construct a railway within the limit of time; I was pointing out the difficulties tending its construction; and discussing B.C. from an engineering point of view, as a country through which the railway was to be pushed, I called it a sea of mountains. And now, after 11 years, I repeat the phrase and maintain its fitness.

That is what the Liberals thought of British Columbia back in 1886. I could go on and quote from their various spokesmen to demonstrate that the whole tradition of the Liberal party, with that one brief exception when Laurier accepted the Sifton policy on immigration, shows that they have forgotten those stirring words of George Brown. They are content to stir up division between the various groups in this country. They are content to play the selfish ends of one locality as opposed to the interests of the nation as a whole. After 22 years the people chose to follow the course of building a nation that would provide opportunities for their children and their children's children. Then, the Liberals wonder why the double defeat struck them.

I would suggest to them that any party in defeat must learn that humility which comes only from an examination of their own sins. I have suggested in all deference to them before that they would be well advised to re-examine their place in the history of this country. They would find that Canadian tradition has always been one of looking for new frontiers. We still have great frontiers to conquer in Canada. We have spent 80 years moving to the west to give this country dominion from sea to sea, and now we are going to give this country dominion over the area from the south to the Arctic ocean. This great northland of ours is not ours because it is coloured red on a map. It will only be ours by effective occupation. We feel it is our destiny, manifest by our geography, our history and the character of the people. If we lose this vision, if our vision is ever blurred, this nation will perish. Without this vision, Canada is nothing.

The things I have outlined here today are just the first lines on a blueprint of our future. We will take great care to look after the economics, but we reject the historic timidity and caution of the Liberal party. We must not be deterred from a bold, imaginative policy for the development of Canada which would provide for the future of our children. We know that in the world picture we will always be a great partner of the nation to the south. We know that our resources will never do us any good unless we realize that they must also be used for the good of nations all over the world. Therefore, we must dedicate what we do not only to our own material gratification but to the good of mankind in all parts of the world.

I have been asked, why move now? I feel I have made it clear that we have no choice with all this wealth, all these resources, but to move now. Someone may ask me why private enterprise has followed in behind these roads and these railways to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, compared with the few millions we put in. The answer is that they have taken the Paley report, the Gordon commission report and all the other available information. They know that when these railways are completed, when these roads are completed there will be not only all these resources but we will be in a position to direct their use for better purposes than just serving to provide a hole in the ground without any processing here in Canada.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): It is delightful, Mr. Speaker, to have this history lesson. One point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister, as a former history teacher, is that Sir John A. Macdonald's great development program was not really successful until Sir John was dead. I hope that does not happen to the minister or to his administration. I hope that it is not the Liberals who finally come along and reap the benefits of the program, as happened in Laurier's time.

Before I move on to the subamendment, I should like to say, in connection with the vision of this development program, that tremendous changes have taken place in our society. The minister does not seem to have mentioned these changes at all. In so far as the previous transcontinental development was concerned, it was based on the desire of the people to have land and to develop farms. I would submit that that factor does not operate so far as the north is concerned, and that is why the development is going to be of a different type. It is for this reason that the subamendment, dealing as it does with small business, should form part of the program.

The minister talked about the tremendous amount of private capital that is going to flow into the north as a result of this policy. I should like to point out that by the very nature of the development the capital will have to flow in tremendous amounts; and will have to be supplied by huge corporations. I hope that these corporations see the vision. I should like to point out that the same driving element is not present in connection with the northern development as it was 50 or 60 years ago. It does seem to me, therefore, that that is going to be one of the difficulties when it comes to getting people into the north.

An hon. Member: What about George Brown?

Mr. Fisher: Poor George Brown was murdered. I do not know why he was murdered. But in addition to the subamendment with reference to small businesses, on June 11 the Canadian Press carried a dispatch out of Ottawa stating this:

> The government will shortly provide small businesses with technical assistance but no direct loans, it was learned today.
> The reluctance to provide federal credit may be a blow to retailers. They had urged the administration to set up some form of federal credit facility to help the corner store compete more effectively with the big chains and supermarkets for the customer's dollar.

Shortly after this date the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was speaking on the west coast and from there there was a news release to the effect—or this is what I gathered from reading the news release; perhaps the Minister of Justice can correct me—that the main point of the government's program in relation to small business was that it was going to set up a technical advisory service especially to help small business in the field of research and other marketing problems. There is no use in belittling this step or program. I think it is very much worth while. As a matter of fact, I should like to go further. I note that according to tonight's newspaper it has been announced that an associate deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce has been appointed, namely Mr. James Roberts and it is speculated that he is to be the head of this branch. Whether or not he is the head of this branch, I know that in Mr. Roberts the government has a man of exceptional ability. He was a lieutenant colonel in the regiment in which I was a trooper; and as someone who had a parade of lieutenants colonels including the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) I can honestly say that Mr. Roberts as a lieutenant colonel was an exceptionally able one. If he is going to be the man to head up this bureau I am sure he will be able to do something with it. But I would suggest that to restrict the bureau merely to technical advice and to research assistance is to limit it to too narrow a field.

I notice that the Canadian tourist association submitted a brief to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) a short time ago with regard to a tourist establishment improvement loan act, and that the very first paragraph of it states this:

> The Canadian tourist association respectfully requests that the government of Canada submit to parliament legislation which will relieve Canada's tourist industry of a serious disability caused by lack of financial credit and so by such legislation make it possible for our tourist industry through expansion and modernization to compete effectively in the world tourist market.

Of course the tourist industry is only one facet of small business but obviously they feel that there is a need. One of the lessons the United States has learned and is learning about small business is that the very idea of support or aid by government for small business has a tremendous emotional appeal. I am not that partial to small business—

Mr. Fulton: You have not been very slow in learning that yourself.

Mr. Fisher: I am sorry but I did not catch that remark.

Mr. Fulton: I say that the hon. gentleman has not been very slow in learning that himself either.

Mr. Argue: He is learning it too.

Mr. Fisher: I am going to be fair and qualify.

An hon. Member: Get aboard.

Mr. Hees: Everybody gets aboard in this debate.

Mr. Fisher: The experience in the United States indicated that almost every year in congress, in the house of representatives or in the senate, some congressman or some senator will rush in with a bill to aid small business and usually the administration—that is the executive—manages to shift it to one side and keep it from going through both chambers until the legislative year is over. I think the reason for the appeal of small business goes back to the political position that it appeals to all. I think it might be Jeffersonian democracy in essence. It is the whole idea that the small man, working within his own scope and framework, trying to raise himself by his boot straps and to develop a small business, is perhaps the most worthy of all individuals in the whole economic framework.

In this particular matter I do not think we should allow emotion or sentiment to get in our way. The small business man has tremendous political power in both the United States and Canada. We often hear that huge corporations have great political power but the fact of the matter is that, as far as most members of parliament are concerned, they are much more easily approached by small businessmen and in their communities they hear much more about the problems of small business and the needs for help for small business.

I think one of the reasons that in Canada we have not had the pressure to help small business that has been experienced in the United States is that we are in a ten-year to fifteen-year lag behind the United States in the development of our general consciousness of what is happening in the economic framework. In the United States it has generally been discovered, as a result of a great deal of research into small business, that perhaps the fundamental weakness of small businesses is not credit or the failure or the inability to get money—although that matter ranks very high—but is just the question of lack of managerial ability or, if you want to use the favourite jargon of the businessman, lack of know-how. There is no doubt about it that some form of advisory bureau might be of some aid. As a matter of fact the government has published a very handy little manual of advice for the small businessman.

However, the factor of money is quite vital. In the United States the small business administration has been operating for five or six years. It now has a capitalization, I understand, of $230 million. The largest loan that a small businessman or a small manufacturer can obtain at the present time from this small business administration is $300,000, although efforts are being made to raise this amount to $500,000. One of the other points in connection with these loans is that no manufacturer or anyone else can get a loan from the small business administration unless he can produce proof that he has already been rejected by the banks at least twice or at least by two different banks, which means that the businessman has gone through some effort anyway to obtain his money from other sources. Usually the interest rate on these loans varies from 4½ per cent to 6 per cent, depending on the kind of background or collateral that is available to the small businessman. In essence, when you compare the total value of the United States gross national product and their annual investment, the small business administration has not been a fantastic success. After all, $230 million is not a great deal in an economy such as that of the United States.

But there are more and more indications that help for small businesses is necessary because of the fact that large corporations have such great advantages in financing, especially in debenture financing, over small business and because on the market side of their operations they have advertising budgets that can cover a whole national field. I think that point applies particularly in Canada. In Canada our small manufacturers tend to compete regionally and it is very difficult for a small manufacturer or even a small service organization to spread beyond its region because of this lack of advertising. In the manufacturing industry it is especially difficult for them to spread and develop further because of the lack of research facilities. Advertising and research are built into the operations of large corporations.

In the particular area from which I come, namely the lakehead, we have had a tremendous change in our business structure in the last 20 years; and if you take it over the last 30 years, the change has been even greater. Thirty or forty years ago the lakehead's primary industry was tied in with transportation and being an entrepot between the west and the east. Naturally we had these large organizations, the transcontinental railways and very large shipping lines. But in our indigenous industry we depended upon the bush and woods products. In most cases those organizations were fairly small.

But now that situation has changed drastically with the buildup of the tremendous capital formations that are necessary to support pulp and paper mills, and these very large corporations have developed through using crown leases of very large limits of land. One of the results has been that the role of the small timber operator has almost disappeared except as a jobber living from hand to mouth and from year to year, very much dependent on the good will he may have developed with the particular large company concerned, and in that particular field all these small jobbers and operators are up against a tremendous financial problem when it comes to buying equipment. The breakdown of one large cat or Drott loader can make the difference between a successful operation and being completely wiped off the books. One of the reasons for this is that they have to carry so much credit at a very high rate of interest to obtain these capital goods, or else they cannot obtain loans of sufficient size and at a decent rate of interest to enable them to keep their equipment up to a proper and economic level.

In addition, at the lakehead we have noticed another phenomenon which has happened all across the country, and that is the disappearance of the family store, especially the family department store, and the moving into the area of the large chains. We now have Loblaws, and A. & P. and supermarts and all the rest, and from the reaction of the population to these stores I gather that they are popular; I do not believe anyone consciously wants to go back to the small establishments we had formerly. But this displacement of the small operator has pinpointed the difficulties of people in the retail trade who are not tied in with national organizations such as Simpsons-Sears or Eatons in competing and operating in our economy. It seems to me that at the present time we have to examine the situation and try to make up our minds whether these small businesses are worth helping, and I think the answer that most of us will arrive at is that they are. There is nothing wrong with a large organization just because it is large, but there is something wrong in Canada in the fact that so many large corporations are putting small business organizations out of business.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask the hon. member for Port Arthur a question. I was just wondering whether the policy of the C.C.F. party has changed since they socialized that small business in Prince Albert, the box factory. That put a lot of lumbermen out of business.

Mr. Fisher: That point has been brought up several times, but I do not want to deal with it now. I want to make a point that I come from Ontario and represent an Ontario riding in this house.

Mr. Woolliams: Could I ask another question?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: You have not given the hon. member a chance to answer the first one yet.

Mr. Fisher: We do not make a practice in this house of asking, say, Conservative members from Ontario to defend the policies of the provincial government with respect, for example, to the Northern Ontario Gas Company, and I hope the hon. member will extend the same courtesy to me.

Mr. Woolliams: I asked whether the C.C.F. policy had changed.

Mr. Fisher: It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker, that the C.C.F. has climbed on to the bandwagon. We have not seen much of a bandwagon as far as small business is concerned, but I am glad to recognize that there is some merit in this policy of help for small business.

[Mr. Fisher.]

One of the other problems which is very evident at the lakehead is that whenever a small manufacturer does develop his plant and his organization to the point where he can expand his market area he discovers that just at that time he is invaded, usually by a larger organization that comes in and seeks to buy him out. That happened to a rather efficient concrete block factory that was developed by local people and had reached a very promising stage of development. Just when they were ready for a further step in expansion they were approached by a much larger factory from the Winnipeg area which pushed into this market and finally tried to force them to sell out to them at a price which was of great disadvantage to them. They were very anxious to expand in order to meet this threat, but they ran into the standard difficulty of not being able to raise enough capital to expand their plant so that they could compete. Here was an excellent case for small loans being available under the scheme suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) in this house about ten days ago. If such a scheme had been in operation they would have been in a much better position to have carried out that particular expansion.

Another fact that will probably raise certain questions from certain hon. members in certain parts of the house and one which I think needs to be faced frankly is that small manufacturers as they are developing their organizations, just when they reach a stage where they are moving from a small operation to a medium-sized operation, have discovered that they have become attractive to a union or to a union organizer, and just at a time when capital difficulties are most severe they find they are faced with the problem of signing an agreement or a contract which would require them to spend money beyond what they had planned as far as normal operating expenditures are concerned. This happened in connection with a veneer plant in the Port Arthur constituency. Just at the time when it was ready to expand it was faced with negotiating a contract with a union that wanted to nail this very small operation down to the same standards as those of much larger units in the pulp and paper industry in that area. In this particular case it was possible, through a little discretion on the part of the union, to stave off almost immediate bankruptcy for the company, but the man in charge of the company made the point that his primary difficulty was not that he did not want to meet the conditions which the union presented but that he was operating on so much borrowed capital at such a high rate of interest that it just was not feasible or economic for him to do so. He is one of the people who made the point that he very definitely needs some form of loan for small business backed by the government.

Now the hon. member for Vancouver East made the point quite clearly: in Canada we have a situation different from that in the United States in that we have a branch banking system. The point has also been made that we already have a semi-framework to work on in something that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) took a certain amount of credit for, that is, the Liberal institution of the industrial development bank. Since we have this situation there seems no reason why this example could not be pushed further, using the bank and setting up loans of a relatively short term—I suppose five to ten years would be the maximum on them—at relatively low rates of interest, I imagine somewhere between 6 and 8 per cent as a maximum, and that some sort of guarantee should be given by the government to the lending institutions.

The experience of the banks since moving into the mortgage lending field in connection with the national housing program has not been disastrous in any sense although a possible disaster was preached and forecast by some of the opponents of that legislation. As a matter of fact, the banks have successfully operated in this field although I know there are certain qualifications from the point of view that it does tend to tie down some of their money for longer terms than usual and in areas that are not quite as fluid as the banks perhaps might like.

All these examples tend to suggest that a good case could be made for setting up a small business administration scheme with a loan fund to be administered by the chartered banks and with the loans at least to a certain percentage guaranteed by the federal government. This might be of great advantage to the small businessmen in our community.

There are a number of other possible steps that might be taken to help small business that are not related to the establishment of a loan system. One that has been suggested is that the scale of income tax for small business be set at a less progressive rate than for larger corporations, on a graduated scale such as applies as far as personal income tax is concerned. The difficulty in that situation would be attempting to define what is a small business and probably in setting certain levels at which the tax would move upward, you would leave the door open for a certain amount of finagling on the part of the concern to keep below the level.

Another suggestion that has been made as a means of helping small business will probably be discussed very fully when the legislation concerning the estate tax comes before the house for discussion. There is no question but that when there is a death in a family which operates a family organization or manufacturing concern—be it the death of one of the partners or perhaps the sole owner—the death duties in many cases lead to the dissolution of the whole business. We had a very fine family department store in Fort William that suffered the loss of its family head a few years ago. It was amazing how quickly the whole thing went to pieces and the store is now in the hands of a national concern. There is nothing the matter with that but the fact remains that the children of this gentleman were simply not able to carry on the business and also meet the death duties. That is another phase of the problem of small business which should be examined by the government.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Certainly, providing it has nothing to do with Saskatchewan.

Mr. Hees: A little ashamed of Saskatchewan, are you?

Mr. McIntosh: Are you ashamed of Saskatchewan? It is obvious that the hon. member has done a lot of research into the topic he is now discussing. I was just wondering if he could tell the house the number of small businessmen his research indicates need assistance from the government and who, although they are good businessmen, cannot secure assistance from the banks?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I have seen nothing in that respect concerning Canadian businessmen. One of the difficulties of doing any work in this particular field in Canada is that we are so far behind the United States in carrying out this kind of study. I have to be frank about it and I hasten to admit I found nothing. You can search very widely through the literature on Canadian business and economics and you can find no cold, hard statistics about the problems of small businessmen. I can only say that is why I chose to speak from the constituency point of view. I am aware that in my own constituency amongst tourist camp operators, retailers and timber operators and especially the small jobbers there is a very definite need.

Now, as to how necessary it is for the government to make some preliminary study of this is a question I leave to the judgment of the ministers concerned but the point that should be made in my opinion in this particular connection is that the United States experience—and our economy does parallel theirs—is that the small business administration has worked, that it has encouraged many businesses. If the government proposes setting up a technical bureau to give advice to small businessmen I must also in fairness say that the technical advice aspect of it and the research aspect of it have worked in that country. Also, the question of information for small businesses in the United States to help them in getting in on defence procurement programs has been extremely valuable. Perhaps again this is something that will be one aspect of what the government is going to introduce in this connection. But if the hon. member who asked me the question can provide me with any literature covering that phase of the question with respect to Canada I should certainly like to see it. Thus far I have not been able to locate any such material.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member yield to another question? I have two questions and perhaps the hon. member would prefer to answer one before dealing with the other. However, since the hon. gentleman has undertaken so much research in this field, could he give us his definition of what a small business and small industry might be?

Mr. Fisher: I do not want to be accused of or credited with having done a great deal of research in this respect. I have read three or four books and approximately 15 or 20 magazine articles on the subject. If that is your idea of research, you may accept it for what it is worth but I do not class it that way.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Fisher: The United States figure is for a business doing business totalling $5 million or less annually.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: By the way, the experience of the small business administration has got down as far as loans of from $6,000 to $10,000 for businesses that have assets of from $25,000 to $50,000. The point that has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. MacLean) certainly does require a certain amount of definition. The following question comes to mind: Are you going to make loans to small businesses that have already been established or are you going to make loans to young men who have a good idea, a certain amount of capital and who want to get their business underway? To my way of thinking that is a point that can be decided only at that time when the bureau or administration that is set up knows considerably more about the number of small businessmen or small groups in Canada that are hoping to get such businesses established. But if you try to choose a feasible figure to determine what is a small business for the purposes of any Canadian scheme that may come into being, I would say one that has an annual production of less than $1 million.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question. I think he has been extremely fair in attempting to answer the questions that have been put to him. Is my hon. friend supporting the small business with assets of any amount from $5 million down for loans from the government because they are the true representatives of free enterprise? Is that his object in supporting that particular point? What is his object?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, that is a question designed to lead me into certain philosophical definitions of what is free enterprise and what is not. The point I wish to make is that I think there is nothing in the socialist program that is antagonistic to what I would call true free enterprise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: Do not let these hon. gentlemen mistake me, Mr. Speaker. Their definition of free enterprise is a very shifting one.

Mr. Ricard: What is yours?

Mr. Fisher: I said shifting, not shifty. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that the Conservative campaign in the last election in my constituency was fought on the basis of what I call socialism. What was the Conservative candidate selling? Perhaps this also happened in other constituencies. He was selling increased old age pensions.

An hon. Member: Are you a socialist?

Mr. Fisher: Of course, I am. But I should like to point out—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is allowing himself to be led off the subject.

Mr. Fisher: With a certain amount of pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I always feel that when you engage in a discussion of a topic such as small business or small businessmen it gives a great opportunity for a discussion revolving around the whole question of free enterprise. The fact that one of the great trends of our society and our whole economy for the last—well, ever since the days of Teddy Roosevelt and his trust busters —has been to build up larger and larger enterprises that become safer and safer and have less and less risk involved and the narrowing of the opportunities for the small man really to get anywhere and to bite off any chunk of this massive economy that we now have. Of course, if this Jeffersonian attitude—I call it that—of myself and the other members of the C. C. F. is free enterprise and if we be damned for that, well, let us be damned, but I do not think there is anything in it that is antithetical to socialism as I certainly know it. I notice that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has a most quizzical look on his face. I suggest to him that probably he has not been following the latest developments of the socialist program.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask a question? I know little about Jefferson but I should like to know whether the hon. member would call himself a Jeffersonian. It would be a great surprise to me if he did.

Mr. Fisher: The particular views of Jefferson have a great deal that appeal to me, but not the view that every 20 years there should be a bloody revolution. Mind you, I think Jefferson is one exemplar for almost anyone interested in politics, because he does show the value of keeping things on a small scale wherever possible, and that whole idea can be taken into account on such questions as centralization of our constitution, or the provincialist approach. Of great importance as far as business is concerned is that Jefferson himself always was aware of the point that the larger the business grows, the farther away it gets from the roots in a certain community, the more difficult it is to control and the less appeal it has for the people whom it is serving. I certainly think that at the present time we are being served by far too many large corporations who through their advertising agencies are engineering our wants. I do not think we are being served nearly enough by small groups, small business and small manufacturing organizations who can be closer to and more intimate with us.

There is one other aspect of this whole program of small business. Not only have we ignored small business in recent decades, or not only has small business fallen by the wayside, but the whole idea of public business and public service has fallen by the wayside, and we are quite justified in including in the gross national product such things as the manufacture of a tremendous number of cars and a tremendous variety of cosmetics, great wealth in terms of alcohol or, as the Toronto Star would call it, booze; but we do not really feel that developments such as roads, better schools, better hospitals, things like these, are part of genuine production. We somehow feel that they are not quite as worth while, or as profitable. That is why I think that if I return to the speech by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) I find there indications that he at least can see that there has to be almost a predating of the government expenditures on public services before we can get any worth-while development of the private services which, of course, is something that has quite a bit of historical justification. The whole question of whether the private services that we are going to get following this northern development program is still very much with us.

One of the phases of this program that the minister announced was a railway from Churchill to Moose Factory. Most of that railway would run through the constituency of Port Arthur. It would touch approximately 15 to 20 white men and maybe 600 Indians. I would just like to suggest that if that is a part of the vision I do not think it will do particularly well for our constituency. In this connection I would like to say that if we are to develop the northern parts of the constituency of Port Arthur it is not going to be done through the north; it is going to be done from the south and what we are going to have to do is to exploit very large stands of timber and very large supplies of low-grade iron ore and base metals. In order to do this we do need very definitely a development program but not one of the Northwest Territories. I would suggest that that part of the development program really needs to be looked at again; that is, the development within the northern parts of the provinces as they exist now. I do not want to diminish the effort in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon but certainly I think that the northern regions of the provinces are much more important than those areas in terms of immediate possibilities of settlement and of development of our economy.

In our constituency in the last year or so we have closed down several base metal operations that have been considered by geologists to be pretty good bets. They have been closed down because of the drop in prices on the base metal market. I know that another look needs to be taken at Pine Point. But why worry about railways to Pine Point when we have not roads or railways to base metal properties much closer to us? That, of course, may be taken as an attitude of gloom or small vision, but I know it certainly applies to the area from which I come. It is very hard for us to understand the genuine northern vision when we have a frontier that extends into the north and we see that practical development as a very slow movement forward, north and south development from the bases that we already have rather than any Arctic development.

Having touched, Mr. Speaker, on both the amendment and the subamendment, I—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up very much time of the house tonight. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) in a very able, in fact a brilliant speech, tonight outlined to the house and to the country what the government is doing to make the vision a reality. Today I think can be classified, because of the speeches we have heard from the opposition, as bandwagon day. The Liberals, at long last, after 22 years of neglect, are trying to climb aboard the national development bandwagon. They have found out that the people like the idea of their country being developed nationally and they are trying to clamber aboard. Then we see the C.C.F. climbing aboard the free enterprise bandwagon. Now they are grasping to their breasts small business as though they had always been brothers. They are trying to out-free-enterprise the free enterprisers. I guess one of these days we will see the formation—I understand there are feelers out on both sides now for a new party, the Liberal-Socialist party. They are trying to get together and in that way perhaps stop going down together. As I say, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources dealt very ably and brilliantly with what this government is doing in the way of national development.

I am simply going to mention a very few of the things which the government and the department are doing to provide transportation facilities to assist in the development of the country because, as anybody who has studied the history of Canada knows only too well, in a country of this size the provision of transportation facilities must precede development. A country of this magnitude must have roads, must have seaways, must have railways and so on before the country can be developed properly, and it is the job of the Department of Transport to provide these facilities.

First of all, in the Atlantic provinces we are carrying out a survey of transportation problems to find out how we can provide better transportation facilities in that region. We are examining the coastal service in Newfoundland to see if the service can be improved over and above what is and has been provided for some years past. We have already decided to provide three new coastal ships, with a possibility of a fourth. We are also planning the new terminal facilities which I mentioned in the house earlier this year. When the William Carson resumes service from North Sydney to Port aux Basques we will examine the service to see if it fills the needs of Newfoundland for a service to the mainland. If it does not we will then examine into what further facilities might be needed for that service. In conjunction with Canadian National Railways we are studying to see if improvements can be made in the rail service generally throughout Newfoundland.

In Prince Edward Island we are studying to find out whether future requirements are for additional ferry services or if a causeway would provide a better connection to the island. In New Brunswick and Nova Scotia we are studying, in conjunction with Canadian National Railways, to determine how rail services in these two provinces might be improved. We are also reviewing subsidy payments under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. With regard to rail line extensions—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question before he goes on. Could he tell the house when this study of transportation in the Atlantic provinces was undertaken?

Mr. Hees: I would say shortly after we took office in June of 1957.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not true that it was undertaken by the previous administration immediately after the presentation of the preliminary Gordon report?

Mr. Hees: If it was, Mr. Speaker, it was done in such an insignificant way that it really did not start to have any effect until the Conservative government took over.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister's memory is failing.

Mr. Hees: As I was saying before I was interrupted, as far as rail line extensions are concerned, a survey was completed in March of this year and the work of construction has now started on a spur line running from Optic lake to Chisel lake in Manitoba, a distance of 52 miles. It will cost $8,500,000 and will link up properties of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company with the Hudson Bay Railway. As has been mentioned tonight by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, we are studying at this very moment the proposed new railway line in northern Alberta, a line which will be over 400 miles long and is estimated to cost well over $65 million exclusive of terminal facilities.

With regard to the seaway, in conjunction with various cities with harbours on the seaway we are studying what their needs will be as a consequence of the seaway and have already entered into arrangements with such cities as Hamilton, Port Arthur and Fort William, Three Rivers and others to see what we can do to help them provide better facilities to be able to handle the traffic which it is confidently expected will develop with the completion of that inland waterway. Recently we sent a team to Kingston from the public works and transport departments to see about additional dredging there to make it possible for ships to pass easily into the excellent harbour of Kingston.

So far as airport construction is concerned, this year we are budgeting for an expenditure of $61 million compared with $35 million budgeted by the late Liberal government in their budget of March 31, 1957. This greatly expanded program, a program almost double that undertaken by the former Liberal government, will include new and enlarged air terminal buildings, additional runways and the lengthening and reinforcing of runways to handle the faster and heavier aircraft which will be appearing in our airways during the next few years. This will, of course, greatly assist exploration and the development of our resources. The new air fields we are building will in many instances be used by exploration companies which fly over otherwise inaccessible stretches of our northland examining areas where it is believed there are mineral resources, thereby making it possible for ground crews to make much more detailed inspections on the ground and actually locate the ores which we believe are there.

With regard to steamship construction, our program this year will cost $22 million compared with a mere $9 under the former government a year ago. This program includes the building of icebreakers and supply ships, all of which will make it possible for navigation to move more easily in icebound waters and will greatly assist the development of our northern areas by making it easier to bring in supplies, equipment and the many other things that are needed for development work in the northern part of our country.

Mr. Bourget: And all this prepared by the Liberal administration.

Mr. Hees: All of this was not prepared by the Liberal administration. I have quoted to you what the late lamented Liberal administration put in their last budget and I have told you what we have put in our budget. So far as airport construction is concerned, our program is nearly double and in steamship construction it is more than double. Our whole program is vastly increased over anything the Liberal government thought of or contemplated and it has been thought out and put into operation by the Conservative government.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Hees: Certainly.

Mr. Bourget: Would the minister be kind enough to give a break-down listing the ships they are going to build during this fiscal year.

Mr. Hees: I would be very glad to answer on my estimates or the hon. member might like to have some of his Liberal colleagues on the transport committee ask this question. I would be very glad to answer. There is no secret. It is all there to be seen. In fact, we are very proud to talk about it. It is only the modesty of the Conservative government that makes us not bring these things out each time we stand up but if you want to know about them we will be glad to let you know in great and minute detail.

These are the only remarks I intended to make tonight. I did want to mention these things in view of what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said this afternoon when he tried to create the impression that only under a Liberal government were development plans formulated and put into operation. As you will have decided I feel sure, having listened to the very able speech delivered by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, quite the reverse is true. National development was neglected for 22 years under the Liberal government, and under the Conservative government of today quite the reverse is taking place. A national development policy is being put into operation. It is going to develop this country in the manner it has been waiting to be developed for over a generation.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the gross national product is going down.

Mr. Hees: Just as the first great Conservative prime minister recognized only too well, and just as our present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) recognizes so clearly, you must provide transportation facilities in this country to make development possible. This government is going to provide those facilities.

Under the first great Conservative prime minister, the Canadian Pacific railway was built against the vitriolic attacks of the Liberal opposition of that day. The Liberals of that day looked upon development in somewhat the same light as the late Liberal government did. Today, fortunately, we have another great Conservative Prime Minister, who sees development as the most important facet of any government's policy. The policy of this government, so far as providing transportation facilities is concerned, is simply this. We examine every possible need for the provision of additional transportation facilities. We will continue to do so. Whenever a need can be demonstrated and the fulfilment of that need can be shown to be economically feasible, additional transportation facilities will be provided by this government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the modest and resourceful Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Hees: With great pleasure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What would be his comment about this statement concerning Canada's development which appeared in a 1956 issue of Fortune magazine? They said:

> Canada's progress during the past dozen years is one of the economic marvels of the age. Thanks to the extraordinarily high and well-distributed volume of investment, public and private, she has undergone an all-around development not matched even by that of the United States.

I would be very grateful to the minister if he would tell me whether or not he agrees with that statement.

Mr. Hees: I would simply say that that is evidence of the fact that one of Cockfield Brown's writers had an article accepted by that magazine.

Mr. Howard: I should like to know if the minister would permit another question?

Mr. Hees: Yes, with great pleasure.

An hon. Member: Is this fortune telling, too?

Mr. Howard: No, this has nothing to do with fortune telling. I wonder when the minister is going to be just as generous, just as lavish with his grants for shipbuilding, his subventions for the assistance of shipping facilities on the west coast as he has just indicated he is on the east coast?

Mr. Hees: I believe one of the hallmarks of this government is that we are equally fair with all the ten provinces.

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I feel quite sure that no Canadian, either of a previous or present generation, has ever really doubted the remarkable future that is in store for Canada. I do not believe that anyone who knows Canada or has lived here has ever underestimated the economic potential of our great country, with its vast, fertile lands, its industrious, ingenious and reasonable people, as well as the abundance of natural resources which providence has bestowed on our land. I feel quite sure that with all these things in Canada we will be able to realize the vision which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had in the early part of this century when he foresaw that the twentieth century would belong to Canada. I am safe in saying that no one will deny that the first half of the twentieth century has indeed belonged to Canada. We have every reason to expect that if the administration of this country remains sound, the second half of this century will equally belong to Canada.

Mr. Ricard: This will happen under a Conservative government.

Mr. Cardin: I think this leads one to have a justifiable pride in our country. I believe it is significant also that a great number of nations in the world have looked with envy on our great land. They have not looked upon it with envy merely because of the beauty or fertility of our landscape, nor because of the abundance of our natural resources. They have looked upon our country with envy because we have been able to maintain a stable economy in the past. This afternoon I was very pleased to hear the members of parliament from Nigeria, who are now visiting Ottawa, tell me that they thought one of the best things they could say about Canada was that we were not taken in by our tremendous resources. We were able to administer our country wisely and seriously without going to any extremes. We have maintained our stable economy. This we have done in spite of the growing pains from which every young nation must suffer, and in spite of the very heavy war commitments as well as the difficult task of rehabilitating and expanding our industry. We have done this in spite of the increasing demand for social and national security; in spite of economic depressions and recessions, such as the one through which we are now going. The economic stability of our country has indeed been the envy of the world for the past 25 years.

There are reasons why we have been able to administer the country with stability in spite of the pressure that has been put on the government in the past, either from external sources in the field of national security or from internal sources from demands for increased national development. In the past it has been Canada's policy to make sure that she could walk before she tried to run; to make sure also that every step forward was not only desirable and justifiable under economic conditions prevailing, but also that she would not be obliged to take a step backward.

I agree with all members of this house and all Canadians that Canada's true economic potentiality is as yet undreamed of. But I also believe that that economic potentiality is possible only on certain conditions. The first is that the people of Canada must continue to believe in the elementary and basic principles of the natural law which is that you do not get anything for nothing; you must earn it. Just as whatever accomplishments have been made in the past half century in Canada are due to the efforts and even to the sacrifices of the Canadian people, so are we now moulding the type of future that we are going to leave to future generations. We can either make that future great or we can spoil it. It is within the hands of the Canadian people to mould that future, and it is not easily done.

The second condition—and it is an important one—is that the administration of this country must be based on sound economic principles, with the country's interest as its only objective. There again, this is something which is not always easy of achievement nor is it something which is generally understood throughout the country. But I say that any administration that frames its policy in order to achieve political prestige or popularity alone can indeed jeopardize our whole economic potentiality.

A third condition, I would say, is that we as Canadians must not waste one particle of our national resources, no matter how fabulous or how widespread they may be. I maintain that we must exploit our natural resources systematically and to the fullest possible extent at all times, and that we must not act like spoiled children who, out of greed, take a bit out of several pieces of candy without having either the appetite or the capacity of finishing one. It seems to me that although we have a great economic potentiality we must earn it and that it can be achieved only through reasonable and sound administration.

No one man, or no one political party has the monopoly on the hopes and aspirations for and the faith in Canada's future. Although we all believe in this future, we in this house have differences of opinion as to how best we can achieve this worth-while aim. Recently we have heard a great deal about the largely publicized Conservative vision. It has been presented to Canadians as something completely new, something completely original. Yet it is a vision that has been held by Canadians ever since confederation. This Conservative vision is an indication that the Conservatives are only now discovering Canada and are seeing our country's future.

Mr. Ricard: We discovered Canada a long time ago, much longer ago than you did.

Mr. Cardin: Of course it is a good thing for the government to be forward looking, but it also has its dangers because, blinded by the vision and blinded by the greatness of our great future—and I am speaking more particularly of the north—and with the inexperienced energy of the neophyte, this government may well try to run before it is sure it can walk on its own two feet without stumbling backwards. On first looking at this Conservative national development program and at these remarkable speeches on northern development at this particular time and under these particular circumstances I cannot help having a vision and it is a vision of a small child biting into huge pieces of new candy but without having finished or digested the several pieces that it already has in hand.

Mr. McIntosh: Is that what your leader meant this morning when he said "Look ahead"?

Mr. Cardin: If you take a closer look at the development program brought out by the Conservative party you get the impression that the northern vision may indeed remain in the realm of future possibilities but that the northern development program itself is definitely an illusion.

Hon. members will recall that the national development program that we hear so much about now was introduced not during the last session, at a time when unemployment was prevalent and at a time when the immediate expenditure of public money might have been indeed useful in checking this unemployment and this recession; oh, no, the development program was not introduced at that time. The government waited until parliament had been prorogued, and immediately afterwards they made this program known. As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) kicked off the last election campaign with his national development program.

I am now embarking on a new subject, Mr. Speaker, and I wonder whether I might call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: One minute to go.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might ask the leader of the house what the government contemplates for tomorrow when the actual business under discussion is disposed of?

Mr. Green: After we get into supply we will take No. 14 on today's order paper, which is the motion to set up a sessional committee on government-owned railways and shipping; then item No. 5, an act to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners, which is to go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines; item No. 10, amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act, which legislation is to go to the standing committee on agriculture; and items Nos. 16 and 17, both of which are to go to the standing committee on veterans affairs; then the resolution dealing with the installation of a simultaneous translation system.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it contemplated that these matters will be gone on with on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to say definitely, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

WINTER EMPLOYMENT PROJECTS, ONTARIO

Question No. 80—Mr. Benidickson:

To what specific projects in Ontario for winter employment related to (a) development of camp and picnic areas; (b) construction of forest access roads, has the federal government agreed to make a financial contribution?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

(a) Improvements to or development of campgrounds and/or picnic areas at:

1. Tecumseh park (4 miles east of Thamesville).
2. A roadside park located at the junctions of highways 401 and 59.
3. Park development highway 2—115 and 28, Electoral Durham, Peterborough.
4. Beaver lake park (1 mile south of Erinsville).
5. Roadside parks in the Huntsville district.
6. Park site on highway 11 at Ardie creek (5 miles north of Englehart).
7. Roadside parks on highway 11 in the Cochrane district.
8. Lake Despair park on secondary road No. 613 (29 miles north of Fort Frances).
9. Aylmer—(a) Rondeau park, (b) Pinery park, (c) Ipperwash park.
10. Parry Sound—(a) Grundy lake park, (b) Castler lake park, (c) Eagle lake park.
11. Maple—(a) Sibbalds point park, (b) Bass lake park.
12. Windy lake park (Sudbury).
13. Lindsay—(a) Presqu'ile park, (b) Burnham park, (c) Serpent Mounds park, (d) Emily park.
14. Swastika—(a) Kap-Kig-Iwon park, (b) Esker lakes park.
15. North Bay—(a) Antoine park (Mattawa), (b) Martin River park, (c) Finlayson park.
16. Inverhuron Park (Hespeler).
17. Fort Frances—(a) French Lake park, (b) One Sided Lake park, (c) McCrosson park.

PUBLIC WORKS—CANCELLATION OF PROJECTS

Question No. 91—Mr. Batten:

1. Has the Department of Public Works cancelled any projects for which tenders were requested from June 10, 1957 to the 31st of December, 1957 inclusive?
2. If so, what were these projects, and the amount involved in each case?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. (a) Glacier national park, B.C.—construction of five Pan-Abode dwellings to accommodate employees of trans-Canada highway division, Department of Public Works. The amount involved was $90,408.

(b) Montmagny, P.Q.—construction of protection works. The amount involved was $15,500.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 8, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON STRIKE SITUATION

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): On Wednesday last, Mr. Speaker, I informed the house of the recommendation conveyed to me by the commissioner of inquiry in the British Columbia coastal shipping strike to the effect that the disputes now at issue between Canadian Pacific Steamships and parties represented by the seafarers international union, the Canadian merchant seamen's guild and the national association of marine engineers be referred to an arbitrator appointed by the Minister of Labour.

On Friday I was able to announce that the recommendation made by Mr. Eric Taylor had been accepted by the Canadian Pacific Railway, by the national association of marine engineers, and by the Canadian merchant seamen's guild. The proposal was rejected by the seafarers international union. Late Friday I therefore invited representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the seafarers international union to meet with me in my office in the labour department to discuss the situation and explore the possibility of finding some ground for mutual agreement.

Present for these talks were Mr. Duncan McNeill, vice president of personnel, and Mr. S. M. Gossage, assistant vice president of personnel for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and Mr. Hal C. Banks and a number of advisers representing the seafarers international union.

I wish to assure the house that all possible avenues of settlement were exhaustively discussed. Unfortunately, however, the parties were unable to agree on a formula for the settlement of the dispute. The government is now taking further steps to reconvene the parties in the dispute for a further meeting in my office within the next few days.

BRIDGES

NUNS' ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO NAME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. May I ask him whether he has yet arrived at a decision upon the new name for the bridge which crosses from Montreal to the south shore over Nuns' island?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The bridge will be known as Champlain bridge.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO NEW EDITION OF BOOK ON PENSION PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the minister whose recent oratorical efflorescence has been the admiration of friend and foe alike, namely the Minister of National Revenue.

In view of the continued interest of thousands of industrial workers in the publication of the revised "Blue Book on Pension Plans", can the minister inform the house when the administrative tortoise, mentioned in his reply to my question on June 2 last, is likely to finish the course and the long awaited blue book be published?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the tortoise in this case, like all tortoises, is making reasonable progress toward the finish line. Of course there are many difficulties which it has to overcome, but it is making progress in that direction and I can assure the hon. member that the blue book will be produced in due course and without undue delay.

PREMIUM IRON ORES—REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister concerning the Premium Iron Ore case. In view of the question asked in this house by the Minister of National Revenue last July 3 on what can be done in the Premium Iron Ore tax case, would the Prime Minister consider canvassing the situation with the distinguished United States visitors in order to determine why the strongly worded protests of this present and the preceding government have not brought a change in United States procedure?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the discussions between the President of the United States and myself which will begin this afternoon, various matters will be discussed. Whether this will be included in that group will depend upon the length of time available for the discussions, and also the relative importance of this matter as compared to that of other matters that are going to receive attention.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CAMP GAGETOWN—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENT OF USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister care to inform the house, in view of reports that Camp Gagetown is two-thirds empty, what plans the government has to make full use of this military base?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the report that Camp Gagetown is two-thirds empty is quite incorrect. The troops who are normally in Camp Gagetown, permanently stationed there, are at present in another part of the camp area under canvas doing some special training. They will be moving back in about a month's time. Further than that, Camp Gagetown was designed to hold three major units. Three major units are now allocated to Camp Gagetown. In the event of hostilities, accommodation at Camp Gagetown could be doubled, thereby making provision for twice the number of men assigned to the camp today, but it is not the intention to crowd men during peacetime operations.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell the house what is the total number of men expected to train at Camp Gagetown at one time?

Mr. Pearkes: There are about 5,500 men training at Gagetown today.

AGRICULTURE

AMHERST, N.S.—DESTRUCTION OF FAIR BUILDING BY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. C. Coates (Cumberland): May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the disastrous fire which destroyed the maritime winter fair buildings in Amherst, Nova Scotia?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I learned of the fire this morning just after returning from the west, and I was extremely sorry to hear that such an unfortunate event had taken place. I have asked officials of the department to make an investigation, in view of the fact that the department has put up funds to assist in the construction of the buildings there, to find out just what the situation is in that regard. As the maritime winter fair has been one of Canada's major agricultural exhibitions for the past 44 years, I know this loss will mean a serious blow to agriculture in the maritime provinces.

Last year I had the privilege of opening the fair and had an opportunity to see at first hand the tremendous amount of time and effort spent on this undertaking by representatives from the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I would certainly hope that steps can be taken to restore the buildings so the fair can continue.

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST THAT PRICES BE FIXED AT JUNE 1 LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture based on the concern of farmers' union officials that increased cattle marketings forced by drought conditions may result in a collapse of cattle prices. Has the Manitoba farmers' union requested the minister to fix cattle prices at the level of June 1 in order to prevent a disastrous drop in these prices in Manitoba and other parts of Canada?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we received a telegram from Mr. James Patterson, president of the Manitoba farmers' union, a few days ago asking that cattle prices be frozen at the market level of June 1. That, of course, is the highest level at which they have been for some considerable length of time, in fact for several years. I replied stating that there was no power I knew of under any statute of the dominion government by which we could freeze cattle prices at that market level short of proclaiming the War Measures Act, which I think everybody agrees would not be possible, and that therefore this was not a practical or possible solution to the difficulties which the farmers' union was afraid might develop.

I might point out, however, that they also said that a serious weakening of the cattle market was becoming evident and various people have informed us by telegram that there had been a considerable fall in cattle prices. This is not borne out by the figures of cattle prices on the main markets in Canada during the past month. I have a compilation here which I will not read in full. It indicates what the prices were for the weeks ending June 7, 14, 21, 28 and July 3. During that period good steers have fallen approximately 1 cent a pound at Toronto, from 24.09 cents to 23 cents. At Winnipeg they have fallen from $23.03 a hundred to $22, again approximately a cent a pound. At Calgary they have fallen from $22.40 to $21.60 a hundred or less than a cent a pound.

I might point out also that for the two weeks ending June 28 and July 3 the Chicago price for good steers has increased, the first upward movement there for several weeks prior to that time. Of course, essentially our cattle prices depend upon cattle prices in the United States.

There has been about the same kind of drop in the price of good feeder steers. As a matter of fact, at Winnipeg and Calgary there has been no appreciable drop. At Winnipeg the price was $22.09 on June 7 and it was $22.31 on July 3. Actually, therefore, the prices of feeder steers have gone up at Winnipeg. They are down about half a cent on the Calgary market, and there has been a drop of just under a cent in the price of good cows on all three markets.

This statement to the effect that already there has been a considerable drop in cattle prices as a result of the drought is not borne out by the prices being realized on these various markets. Furthermore yesterday, when I was in Calgary, I talked with a considerable number of cattlemen. They told me there was nothing in that whatever, and they did not anticipate there would be any serious drop in cattle prices.

Mr. Argue: May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister, as a result of his inquiries, assure the house that the packers are not following a policy of downgrading cattle as they come off the pastures, a policy which they frequently follow? My second question is, is it not possible under the agricultural prices stabilization act to set floors above the base price, and a floor at the level of June 1 if the government wished to do so? I think that is a different matter from freezing them.

Mr. Harkness: The request I had, Mr. Speaker, was to freeze those prices at these levels of June 1. So far as setting a support price considerably above the mandatory 80 per cent is concerned, that could be done. However, I do not believe any of the cattlemen in western Canada would approve of it being done. As a matter of fact they are anxious that it not be done, because it would immediately remove our best hope, and our only hope, of getting rid of the surplus cattle we will have. If we put in a support price at that level it would be impossible to export cattle to the United States. We would be cut off from that market. We would have surplus cattle here and would have no place to go with them. In other words we would be cutting our own throats.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister's statement now based on the opinions of the big cattle ranchers or the opinions of the farmers' union which represents the farmers of this country?

Mr. Harkness: These opinions have been expressed to me several times over the past several months by representatives of the Canadian beef cattle association and the provincial associations who, I think, are the best representatives of the producers of beef cattle in this country.

Mr. Argue: I disagree.

INDUSTRY

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION ON DECENTRALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the house leader who would be the appropriate minister to whom to direct an inquiry about the industrial decentralization program of the government in the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member has just awakened from a long sleep.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps, since the minister is not aware of the program of his party, I might ask the Prime Minister if any representations have been made by the government to the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation with a view to inducing that company to establish their additional facilities at Sydney rather than on the St. Lawrence?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Apparently the information furnished to the hon. gentleman is never considered sufficient, because the other day he asked that question of the minister of mines and received his answer. It is apparent that the observation made by the Minister of Public Works a few moments ago had some reasonable grounds.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the Prime Minister not aware that the question I asked the minister yesterday was whether something had been done? The question I asked today was whether something was going to be done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can only say that when matters of government policy are determined they will be brought to the attention of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN ESTABLISHING ALL-WEATHER PORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the importance attached to northern development, and in view of the fact that the premier of Ontario today is in northern Ontario for the purpose of examining the situation at Moosonee with respect to installing there permanent all-weather docking facilities to make Moosonee on southern James bay an all-weather port, would the government give consideration to assisting the provincial government in this matter if it proved to be feasible?

Mr. Speaker: I think the Prime Minister might allow me to suggest that this question is fairly hypothetical and is dependent on a couple of "ifs" that might well be allowed to happen before the hon. member brings it forward.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR HOLIDAY WITH PAY ON AUGUST 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that classified civil servants receive Monday, August 4, as a holiday, can arrangements be made to have prevailing rate employees receive this holiday with pay as well?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will take the matter up with the authorities and let the hon. member know tomorrow.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—REPORTED INTENTION TO PURCHASE NORTHERN SECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I regret that I was unable to give him notice of it. The question arises out of a news report in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday. My question is this. In view of the announcement by the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited that the northern Ontario section will be purchased "very soon" from the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, and in view of the present scandals and investigations into various natural gas transactions, can the Prime Minister assure the house that this sale will be held up at least pending the results of investigations?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, that is part of the contract, and as such the answer to my hon. friend's question is clear.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

CANADA COUNCIL—REQUEST FOR LABOUR REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether any decision has yet been made with respect to the request of the Canadian Labour Congress that labour representation be provided on the Canada Council?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, this party during the last year has consistently advocated that there should be representation on the council of the various parts of our economy. We have in fact advocated this course ever since the creation of the Canada Council. We have, of course, already given representation to labour on commissions which have been set up, and when we are in a position to make an announcement in this regard we will do so. I can say that there will be representation of labour and, I trust, of agriculture, on the Canada Council so that these two very important phases of our economy will have the representation to which many feel they are entitled.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, July 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT POLICY

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last night I was saying I felt certain that the national development program of this government was indeed a political illusion. I recalled that the government did not use the opportunities offered under its national development program during the last session of parliament when immediate expenditures of public moneys would have been very helpful in allaying the serious unemployment problem. As a matter of fact the Prime Minister waited until parliament was prorogued and, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of February 13, 1958, he kicked off the election campaign with his national development program. In the Ottawa Journal of that date one reads:

P.M. Kicks off Campaign
Plans Development Program to provide Jobs for Thousands

Prime Minister Diefenbaker started his election campaign last night with a speech outlining a proposed national development program which he said would make jobs for hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

And further down it says:

But the Conservative government had acted with a national program of public works "to provide for the future development of Canada and to assure jobs."

The works program would total $1,185 million of which $270 million would be spent in the first three months of this year.

Although I could use far stronger words than I will use, and I would be quite justified in doing so, I submit that cleverly worded half-truths were deliberately used in order to create the impression in this country that the $1 billion works program was indeed a new plan to put into effect new and economic development projects, and that the spending of the $270 million in the first three months of the year would mean the expenditure of additional money specifically aimed at solving the unemployment problem.

That is not so. The $1,185 million program is, of course, merely part of the ordinary yearly estimated governmental expenditure—

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but I must ask that members in all parts of the house moderate their conversation so we can hear the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres.

Mr. Cardin: This amount of $1,185 million constitutes part of the ordinary yearly estimated amount which governments have spent over the years, and as a matter of fact it is only some $34 million more than was spent in the previous fiscal year. Furthermore, the $270 million which was supposed to have been spent in the first three months of the year is the normal amount of money which a government would spend in the first quarter of any fiscal year, and I certainly hope that no one is trying to explain or write off the $1 billion deficit by the existence of a new public works and national development program because, of course, there is no such new development program.

I respectfully submit that this practice of using half-truths and subterfuges in some of the official statements which are made is a very dangerous policy which undermines the very existence of our democratic system. The people of Canada cannot possibly be abreast of all the administrative details of government, and as a matter of fact they have no alternative but to have faith in the words of our political leaders. I say that it is not only an undemocratic but it is an intolerably iniquitous and dangerous practice for the government by a shrewd juggling of figures and words to make the people of Canada believe something which is not in accordance with the facts.

The sum of $1,185 million for a national development program as tabled in the estimates and supplementary estimates for 1958-59 can be divided up in this way. For public works we find expenditures, including the erection and maintenance of public buildings such as post offices and other buildings, and construction and maintenance of wharves, docks, bridges and roads in national parks, amounting to some $145 million. Expenditures for the Department of Transport include such items as construction and maintenance of airports, some work for the Department of National Defence, the national harbours board and construction and maintenance of deep-sea piers, wharves and grain elevators at major ports and expenditures for the St. Lawrence seaway and Trans-Canada Airlines totalling $244 million.

Last night the Minister of Transport in an intervention, told the house that this government had spent more than twice the amount spent by the previous Liberal government; yet according to the estimates and the supplementaries the department plans to spend $260 million. Last year $220 million were spent by that department, which makes a difference of $40 million, which is a far cry from being more than double the amount spent by the previous government.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to correct the hon. member, as I am sure he would like to have the facts straight. What I said last night was that as far as steamship construction was concerned we were spending $22 million this year as against $9 million spent by the Liberal government as recorded in the estimates of last year, and that as far as airport construction is concerned our estimates this year are nearly double.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hees: I did not say that the Department of Transport over-all was spending twice what the department had spent a year ago.

Mr. Cardin: Well, Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no question of privilege in that—

Mr. Hees: The hon. member merely deliberately misquoted me; that is the only question of privilege.

Mr. Cardin: —nevertheless I am happy that the Minister of Transport saw fit to make that statement. I was eager to ensure that the impression was not created in the public mind that this department is spending twice as much this year as was spent last year under the Liberal administration.

Mr. Hees: If the hon. gentleman would listen and pay attention to what was being said he would not be under a misapprehension.

Mr. Cardin: To continue the discussion of the estimates, the expenditures for defence include expected construction and maintenance expenditures by the Department of National Defence itself and Defence Construction Limited totalling $80 million. The expenditures for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation include expected expenditures on construction and maintenance of public housing units including some buildings for the Department of National Defence and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation loans totalling $308 million. The items for the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources include expected expenditures on projects in the farthest northern parts of Canada, including those of the northern Canada power commission, the development of thermal power units in the Atlantic provinces and construction in the national parks totalling $50 million. The items for crown corporations include expected expenditures connected with construction and maintenance by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the northern Ontario pipe line, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Canadian Arsenals and Polymer Corporation totalling $72 million. For the Canadian National Railways there are items covering expected expenditures on construction and maintenance during the calendar year 1958 totalling $140 million.

Federal financial support to other works projects include works projects carried out co-operatively with provincial and municipal governments which are not included under items of federal support such as the trans-Canada highway, hospital construction, railway grade crossings, technical schools and other expenditures totalling $100 million. Other departments and agencies include the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Justice, the federal district commission, the South Saskatchewan project and others totalling $46 million. The particular item for the South Saskatchewan project is shown as $8 million. That is about the only new project that is included in the estimates; of course we know it has not been started as yet and indeed there seem to be some difficulties which must be overcome before it can be commenced.

When the hon. member for Essex East asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources when he was explaining his northern projects how much had been included for them in the estimates, the minister did not immediately answer. It was only after a considerable length of time that we learned that there was an amount of $3.8 million for surveys and an additional $50,000 for research included in the minister's departmental estimates of $50 million. This breakdown of the $1,185 million for new development projects differs greatly from the story that appeared in the Ottawa Journal on February 13, 1958. In that article we read:

> Mr. Diefenbaker emphasized the north as he talked about Canadian development. He mentioned his hopes for a "self-governing north".
> Under the development plan would come:
> 1. Arctic research and exploration of the Arctic archipelago aimed at developing resources that Canadians little realized.
> 2. A $100 million roads program in the Yukon and Northwest Territories to allow exploration of new mineral areas.
> 3. A federal-provincial plan to build access roads to the north, tying in with roads in the Territories. It would cost $75 million and perhaps twice that if all provinces joined.
> 4. Aid to economically sound railway projects, such as the proposed line from northern Alberta to Pine Point on Great Slave lake.
> 5. A $75 million development at the northern community of Frobisher Bay on Baffin island.
> The program would mean jobs for "hundreds of thousands of Canadians" and would open the way for investment "by Canadian and foreign investors of hundreds of millions of dollars".

Let me hasten to state that the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are still without work and who had hopes of being able to find employment in the north are doomed to bitter disappointment because, as a matter of fact, not one of those items is included in the estimates the government has brought forward this year. May I also point out that even if these huge sums had been included in the estimates an obvious question arises. Where is the economic logic of opening new resources in the north at this time when we cannot find sufficient outlets for similar resources that are at hand and which we have as yet hardly tapped? Why should the government spend hundreds of millions of dollars in the construction of roads leading to resources that are as yet undiscovered, when private enterprise and private investment capital are not as yet even exploiting the newly-found resources they have at hand?

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources yesterday bandied about hundreds of millions of dollars. He mentioned of course, that those were sums that private investors and private capital would invest. However, he did not give any authoritative source for the figures which he placed on the record. He did not say whether these represented binding commitments on the part of specific corporations. He mentioned vaguely letters of intent without, of course, referring to the date of these letters of intent. Need I point out that something that might have been economically sound three years ago may not necessarily be economically sound at the present time under existing economic conditions.

To my mind the majority of the provinces are already overburdened with more pressing and more vital commitments at this time and simply cannot afford to engage capital in such long-range projects as proposed by the minister of northern affairs. There will come a time when economic and social conditions in Canada as well as in the provinces will not only warrant but will necessitate such expenditures, but to my way of thinking we have not yet arrived at that day; and any serious attempt to make the northern vision come true at this time would indeed be trying to run before we can walk.

There are too many lacunas in our economic and social set-up and too many urgent economic development projects of all types to be realized in the inhabited area of our country to embark on a huge building program in the uninhabited area for resources for which there seems to be no urgent need at this time, and which we might well leave to those generations of Canadians yet unborn who may have a far greater need for them than we have. Any attempt now to make the Prime Minister's vision of a self-governing north come true would be taking a bite out of a huge piece of responsibility without having half digested that very heavy responsibility which the government has to face at the present time.

There are hundreds of segments of our economy in the immediate area which are in urgent need of projects which come within the jurisdiction of the federal government, and which I claim might more easily provide work for the hundreds of thousands of people who are still unemployed in our country. There are bridges; there are tunnels, causeways, underpasses, railroads, airports, port facilities, which are urgently required from one end of our country to the other and which I am sure would contribute greatly to the economic growth and stabilization of our country.

There is, of course, another great economic problem that arises out of the relationship of the federal and the provincial governments, and more particularly the municipal governments. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not forgotten about the municipal problem. At page 29 of Hansard of January 9, 1957, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> There are many things with which we agree. We agree—

He was speaking of Mr. Harris' budget.

> —as to the need for assistance to the municipalities across this country.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the budget that has anything to do with the municipalities. There is nothing either in the vision or in the government's national development program that may be construed as assistance to municipalities. There is a vague promise of holding a federal-provincial-municipal conference at an indeterminate time and also with an undetermined agenda. I submit that is not assistance; that is merely procrastination.

I certainly hope the conference will take place soon and that concrete solutions will be found to the inter-governmental fiscal policy; but surely, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, with all the experience he has had and with the innumerable briefs that have been submitted to him on this problem, is aware that apart from this very difficult fiscal problem the municipalities are confronted with a multitude of problems for which government assistance could and should have been provided under a national development program.

The government national development program might have given special attention to the construction of projects coming within its jurisdiction which would have been of particular economic value to the municipalities. I do not know all the projects that might be useful to municipalities, but I do know of one in my own riding, where the project would be not only of national value but of extreme help to the municipalities in one whole area. I am referring to Sorel, which is a port on the St. Lawrence seaway about 50 miles below Montreal, at the junction of the Richelieu river which, as hon. members know, is a direct water route to New York by way of lake Champlain.

Ever since before confederation this route has been used for trade by small boats, and we had always heard and read about the project for an internal waterway in that area. It was only in 1938 that the then member for Richelieu-Vercheres, the late Hon. Mr. Cardin, actually started the project by having the Richelieu river dredged to 12 feet in several of its areas, with a dam at St. Ours and Fryar island to enable ships with a draft of 12 to 14 feet to go through.

The war came along and the project had to be stopped. Since then the Richelieu river has become a forgotten waterway. Yet, in spite of very difficult conditions, where the river is only six feet in depth in certain sections, and in spite of the interminable dams and locks at St. Johns, this river has been used in the past for a considerable amount of trade. I would like to pay tribute here to what I believe to be one of the pioneers of this new water route, the Guy Tombs Company Limited, which under very serious difficulties has continued over the years to have a fleet of ships travelling along that particular waterway.

The United States is equally interested in realizing this waterway, and recently when a delegation from my riding presented a brief to the Prime Minister concerning this project there were indications that representatives from the United States were willing to effect their part of the work on the Hudson river, to realize an international waterway of a depth of 12 feet. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with the industrialization that has taken place below Sorel this would be an economically sound project.

I would also say this. Since Canada is now engaged with the United States in the joint defence of the North American continent, I submit that it would be extremely useful to have an inland water route to New York by way of the Richelieu river and the Hudson river. This project would not only bring more into the Canadian economy and national security than it would take out of it from a national point of view, but it would also, I believe, be of tremendous assistance to a countless number of municipalities along the Richelieu river.

This is but one example, Mr. Speaker, of a national development project which would be useful to the national economy and which would at the same time be of tremendous help to the municipalities. Another municipal problem, apart from the taxation problem and apart from their insufficient revenue potential, is that practically all municipalities have arrived at the point in their evolution when serious attention should be given to the elimination of blighted and substandard areas that exist, unfortunately, in most municipalities and which are not in keeping with the economic and social development that has taken place in recent years. It seems to me that before trying to conquer new fields, a national development program should be helping our municipalities to get rid of those dwellings that are not only veritable firetraps but are completely incompatible with the moral and physical health standards that we have a right to expect in a country like Canada.

A well balanced national development policy should include an urban redevelopment program such as the Liberal party and my leader advocated yesterday under which, because of the staggering costs of acquiring and clearing substandard areas, the federal government should bring in an amendment to the legislation which was introduced by the previous government so that the federal government would assume 75 per cent instead of 50 per cent of the cost of acquiring substandard areas, and also to furnish additional help to the municipalities by sharing the cost of water, sewers and other municipal services.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Apart from this program there is another serious and urgent problem facing municipalities, namely the problem of providing municipal facilities and community growth requirements which alone impose such financial burdens on the municipalities that they have to have recourse to means other than taxation to meet their obligations. They are forced to borrow money at rates which in most cases are prohibitive. The Prime Minister is well aware of this problem because on March 28, 1957—

Mr. Green: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that this question of municipal finances has already been debated and decided on a subamendment which was moved during the throne speech debate. Your Honour will find the subamendment at page 626 of Hansard, moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in these words:

> We respectfully represent to Your Excellency that, in the opinion of this house, consideration should be given to the advisability of presenting legislation at this session to relieve the very heavy financial burden now carried by the municipalities of this country.

May I submit with great deference, Your Honour, that discussion along the line now being followed by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres is not in order, and that the amendment before the house is not in order in so far as it refers to municipal improvements. I am not raising the same objection to references to transportation and other facilities, but the amendment, in so far as it includes municipal improvements, is a repetition of the amendment moved by the members of the C.C.F. group on May 29.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, If I may I should like to say a word on this point. The leader of the house seems to have declared himself on behalf of the government as the one who rises repeatedly to object to our participation in debate.

Mr. Green: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: He specialized in that yesterday.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member for Laurier to address himself to the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I will, Mr. Speaker, but I was prefacing what I had to say with the statement that it seemed to me there had been too great an attempt on the part of the house leader and the government to stop members on this side of the house from speaking. The leader of the house has stated—

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member for Laurier that we are only dealing with the specific point of order which has been raised at this time. I think it is inappropriate to refer to previous points of order, though the hon. member may perhaps have a right to comment on a course of action.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I believe there were two points raised by the house leader. The latter one I will not deal with, namely that the amendment is out of order. The first one is that the hon. member was out of order in dealing with the subject he was discussing at the time he was interrupted. My point is that the amendment moved yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition is so broad and so wide because of the terms used such as "transportation facilities" and the reference to "social capital" as to include a discussion such as that which the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has been carrying on. For that reason and with respect I submit to Your Honour that he should be allowed to continue his remarks.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that while we have been debating the point of order the hon. member's time has expired, but I shall give him the time taken on the point of order. I think it would be inappropriate to deal with municipal finance on this amendment, but it is appropriate to discuss the amendment in so far as it deals with municipal improvements as a form of social capital. There is a distinction there. If it is a question of the fiscal relationships of municipalities, the house has taken a decision on that point, as has been pointed out, and I would ask the hon. member to keep to the material side of municipal social capital, that is works and improvements.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I had the impression that that was in fact what I was doing at the time.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that the Clerk, who has kept the time taken by the point of order, indicates that the hon. member has four minutes more.

Mr. Cardin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It might be interesting to read what the Prime Minister had to say on this problem as found at page 2777 of Hansard for March 28, 1957. He said:

> Cities across the nation find themselves actually in a position where the costs of borrowing are making it impossible for them to carry on the ordinary and requisite expenditures to meet an ever-increasing population. What is the government going to do about it? What action does the government intend to take? It superintended the imposition of higher interest rates. It refuses to reduce its wasteful expenditure. It refuses, as I said a moment ago, to permit the setting up of either a commission or committees to recommend action. All of us agree with the objective, namely, that this situation must be met. The only difference between us is that we do not believe it can be met with a government that persists in spending and increasing its expenditures without regard to the effects of these increases.

I recall very well, Mr. Speaker, all the eloquence and finger shaking that accompanied the Prime Minister's words pronounced just a little over a year ago. But when we examine at length the billion dollar deficit, and when we realize that in spite of all the very fine oratory no mention was made of the municipalities' difficulties in borrowing money in the Prime Minister's national development program or elsewhere, we can very well wonder whether the Prime Minister is not placing much too much emphasis on oratory and not sufficient emphasis on logic.

The Prime Minister, of course, might have done a great deal worse than take the suggestion made by my leader yesterday of creating a municipal loan fund in order to make additional money available to municipalities at a reasonably low cost. This, I submit, would not only have provided money to permit municipalities to engage in necessary municipal projects, but also would have enabled them to provide work for the countless numbers of unemployed now plaguing each municipality. Certainly legislation along this line would not only have assisted municipalities in facing up to their increasing responsibilities but would have been an effective part of a practical, if not of a visionary, national development program.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise with mixed feelings. I am happy that I am given the opportunity to perhaps educate some of the hon. members opposite as to what is actually going on in parts of the northern territories of Canada. It rather made me a little sad while I was listening to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) to think that he thought we in the Yukon and Northwest Territories are something less than Canadians.

Mr. Cardin: I never said that.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres stated in his remarks that these areas are uninhabited. I can assure him that they are inhabited, and I will have more to say about the remarks of some other hon. members of the Liberal party in that regard later. There are people there. These people are Canadians and they are proud of that fact. These people are pioneers. In some cases they have been there for 60 years waiting for someone with a little aggressiveness and gumption to come along and do something about developing the country.

National Development Policy

All through the debate on the speech from the throne various hon. members opposite rose and ridiculed the vision we have been speaking about, not just in the weeks leading up to the last election but for years. They have ridiculed it as electioneering. They have reviled it out of jealousy that they did not have the foresight to plan it before this aggressive group did. They have scorned it as unimportant compared with other areas of Canada. They have scoffed at it so as to belittle its true importance to unity and to the necessity for national development. They have dismissed it as some sort of illusion or mirage. All these terms have been used.

But all along these same people who have used these terms have claimed the credit for the plans that are now being put into effect in the northern regions of Canada. They have claimed credit for these plans because they thought it was of some benefit to them to do so. Despite all this invective coming from the opposite benches they claim these plans as Liberal, as something good, so why do we have all the criticism? If the plans are good, and they must be good if they claim them as Liberal, then why do we have all the criticism?

I thought I might, for the benefit of some of the members, do a little take-off on the poems of Robert Service. I have four such compositions for which I should like to ask your forbearance. One of these I have composed concerns the lack of Liberal policy in the north, and it is a take-off on "Sam McGee", with apologies to Robert Service:

There was lots undone in the midnight sun
By the government of old
The people up there had heard great tales—
For twenty-two years they were told!
The northern lights have seen queer sights
But the queerest they ever did see
Was June the tenth—the reckonin' day
Still no Liberal policy!

Now this great land for so many years
Had heard these promises all
And the trusting souls who lived up there
Thought the Liberals on the ball
But nary a plan was ever in sight
Mapping northern development
'Til the P.C.'s came along one day
And formed the government.

There are now things done in the midnight sun
By the men who have the power
Soon Arctic trails will tell their tales
Of Yukon's finest hour.
For a national policy just can be
We differ from Mr. Lesage
And Lionel, there are others up there
Excluding poor Sam on Lebarge.

Bold and fearless, sound and strong,
Must be our policy
Impossible said Minister Lesage
And Liberals all agreed.
Those in the north, they're just not there
Said Mr. Chevrier too
But the biggest mistake that was made by far
Was Mike's famed igloo.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Let me return to serious discussion for a moment and see what the policy was, or lack of policy, under the former administration. I refer to Hansard for February 12, 1957, page 1197—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. Yesterday the leader of the house took exception to discussions of a retrospective character in this debate. He said that the motion dealt with the future and not with the past. It seems to me I shall have his full support in raising the question as to whether or not these discussions about the past have anything to do with the motion before the house.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is stretching my representations out of all recognition. What I objected to was the attempt by the hon. member for Laurier to make a speech on the St. Lawrence seaway project.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend wants me to raise the point of order before the house, I will do so now.

Mr. Speaker: I seem to recall that the motion introduced by the Leader of the Opposition contained a reference to two or three stages of development in Canada, going back to confederation. I do not believe, therefore, we can rule out the past entirely if we are going to be consistent. With respect to the latest intervention by the hon. member for Yukon, perhaps we have different views about his poetic effort, and I appreciate there is some difficulty in working in such words as "the hon. member for Laurier" in any of Service's meters, nevertheless he should refrain from naming members by name. While perhaps I can look upon it as poetic licence, I hope he will not repeat the offence.

Mr. Nielsen: My apologies to the hon. member for Laurier, if he did take offence at my poetic licence.

Mr. Chevrier: On the contrary, it was willingly accepted.

Mr. Nielsen: The former minister, Mr. Lesage, had this to say at page 1197 of Hansard for February 12, 1957:

> Therefore, it is really since the post-war period that it has been possible to look forward to our northern development.

He further said that most of the development was made possible after the Liberal administration had been relieved of the pressures generated by the second world war. On page 1198 he went on to say:

> Then there is the human problem of this population in the north. We cannot develop 40 per cent of Canada in five years—

No one has any quarrel with him there.

—I do not believe we can have people who are still living in the stone age transferred overnight to the atomic age.

Apparently this statement is along the same lines as the thinking of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres. I should like to reiterate that we are not in the stone age in the Yukon. I am happy to see that the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) has just entered the chamber. I am sorry he was not here while the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres was speaking, because I am sure he would have been disappointed to hear a member of his party advocate the position his party takes with respect to the north.

Then on page 1199 of Hansard, to which I have referred, Mr. Lesage said:

So the Leader of the Opposition wishes to have a national plan—an over-all master plan for the development and management of resources in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is up to the federal government to initiate, produce and administer such a national policy according to such a master plan.

We see here, clearly elucidated in the statement by the minister of northern affairs in the last administration, that a national development plan is impossible. Time after time the present Prime Minister has referred to the need for a national development policy. A brief sketch of the history of the proposals put forward from time to time when this party was in opposition is contained in a speech made by the present Prime Minister on February 11, 1957, commencing on page 1153 of Hansard. The Prime Minister went briefly over the history from the most recent representations back to June 16, 1952, when certain amendments were recorded containing statements connecting this party with definite policies.

At that time also the Gordon commission was discussed. The Prime Minister had this to say about it:

There has been a thunderous silence on the part of the government with respect to the action that it intends to take in this regard.

The reference is to the various proposals put forward by the Gordon commission with respect to national development and development of the north. It is only now that the Liberal party has come forward with anything concrete in the way of a national development policy, and that is in the form of this amendment. We have the former minister's statement that there can be no such national plan, yet we have the anomaly of this amendment which, incidentally, is being supported by the C.C.F. group and which is directly contrary to the policy expressed by the previous minister.

I might say that that announcement of policy was made by the former minister during the throne speech debate during February of 1957, and the amendment was put forward by the present Prime Minister. This amendment, calling for a national development plan, was supported by the C.C.F. group. I realize that it is not proper to comment on the way in which any particular member of the house voted, but I may say here that at that time the amendment proposed by the Prime Minister was defeated by a vote of 121 to 67, the C.C.F. group voting as a whole with us.

We have also heard from the Leader of the Opposition and from the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres that the truth is, if the truth were known, that these plans concerning the north were not our plans at all but were the policies of the former government. I wonder whether they were the policies of the former government. Inasmuch as statements of the facts are not a monopoly of hon. members opposite, perhaps we might put some facts on the record as well.

I am now going to quote from a speech made by the hon. member who had the honour to represent the riding of Yukon in 1957 and who, as is obvious, was subsequently defeated. Perhaps this quotation which I am about to read will give an explanation why. I have spoken about the ridicule which has been heaped upon this idea of a vision of northern development. Let me read from the speech by Mr. Simmons on January 15, 1957, as reported at page 264 of Hansard of that date:

Just at this point I might say that the previous financial agreement between the federal government and the territorial government will expire on March 31 of this year. A new agreement will then come into effect. The agreement presently in force has most certainly failed to meet the present needs of this fast-developing territory because of the shortsighted, penny-pinching attitude of those people in the department who formulated the policy contained in the agreement when it was drawn up about five years ago. It is to be hoped that improved vision and better understanding will be displayed in connection with the drafting of the new fiscal arrangements.

That was a member of the Liberal party speaking about his own government of the day and their approach to northern development. He went on to say this with regard to the outlook for the north:

I have no doubt that the persistence which these oil explorers are known to possess, their skill and the money which they are willing to venture will lead to the discovery of further oil fields in this area.

Speaking about this risk capital, which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources spoke about yesterday and which the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres has dismissed as figures which are being bandied about, may I remind hon. members opposite that the hon. member for Essex East has said that Right Hon. Mr. Howe, when he was in this house, said that this was a possible estimate as far back as three years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Three years ago there was a boom.

Mr. Nielsen: Hence when the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres makes statements to the effect that there are half truths and subterfuge, and when he perhaps accuses this party of creating misconceptions in the public mind, if I were that hon. member I would have regard to these facts.

Further as to this vision, and going back to Mr. Simmons, as reported at page 266 of Hansard, in speaking of the road program we find him saying this:

> The road would be one of the most important projects that could be undertaken to promote the economic welfare and stability of the northern Mackenzie river district,—

He is speaking of the self-same road that has received so much criticism, the one going through to the vicinity of Fort McPherson.

> —as well as the northern Yukon areas. In fact it would be nothing less than culpable neglect on the part of the government to sidestep further this highly significant and very practical measure.

This is Mr. Simmons speaking, a member of the Liberal party.

> If our north country is to be opened and developed in the way it should be, the federal government should assist the companies and individuals who are willing to risk capital in such ventures, especially in areas which are favourable to mineral development....Development of its mineral resources has been retarded throughout the years by the lack of roads, the result of a lack of administrative vision....
> The arrangement with the federal government on the Canol road—

About which I will have further remarks to make later.

> —promised a maximum of $2,500 a year for maintenance, provided the company expended $2,500 a year. When it is considered that this sum was to provide for the maintenance of 150 miles of gravel road, including 21 timber bridges and 40 culverts, it can be seen how niggardly this assistance is.... The indifference of those responsible for the maintenance of this asset is difficult to understand.... As far as is known, no maintenance has been provided by the federal or territorial governments during that time with the exception of the paltry sum I have previously mentioned.

Then at page 268 we find this:

> Official thinking here in Ottawa has in the past fallen far short of meeting the real problem. There has not been the necessary vision on the part of officials to grasp the requirements of the situation.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the previous Liberal member for Yukon expounding what have long been Conservative policies. Perhaps that is the reason for his acute criticism of the lack of action on the part of his colleagues who formed the last government.

As to national development and the national development policy itself may I say this. The Leader of the Opposition says that national development should not merely be centred on northern development. Again I would draw the hon. member's attention to the speech that was made by the Prime Minister as reported in Hansard of 1957, where over and over again he stressed the fact that a national development policy must have regard to a co-operative program of development entered into with the provinces and the territories. Hence it is wrong to create the illusion that this party is attempting to centre national development policy on Canada's north. Our policy is not centred on the northland. Certainly there is an emphasis which is being given to northern development, but there is not a centring there of all national development. One has only to look at such projects as the Beechwood project, the South Saskatchewan river dam and others that are in the making.

The Leader of the Opposition also stated that we should have a balanced policy. I do not mean to offer criticism of the Leader of the Opposition simply for the sake of criticism, but I say this. Even if it cannot be said, "Why didn't you do it", certainly one cannot stand idly by and hear a brand new policy being expounded by the Leader of the Opposition without drawing attention to the glaring fact that if this amendment which is now before the house constitutes a policy, it is the first time that any policy of national development has been expounded by anyone in the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the hon. member will want to be very fair in his observation. The Leader of the Opposition expounded a policy which was predicated in part upon the decline in public investment in Canada at the present time, which is quite a different situation.

Mr. Nielsen: I was coming to that in a moment, and I was only making the point that the Leader of the Opposition did go so far as to say that there was now a change in the economic situation and that therefore we must have a flexible national development policy. That, indeed, is true, and I concede that much to the hon. member for Essex East; but I think he must agree with me that this is still the first time that any national development policy, as such, has been expounded by any member of the Liberal party.

The Leader of the Opposition gave a short review of what the policy had been in the past, and he spoke of the great advance in the development of the north immediately after the second world war. He spoke of housing and forest inventories, reforestation and fire prevention and all the grants therefor. Again I do not know whether a series of such accomplishments can be lumped together and called a policy. I do not believe so but I believe we can have a firm national development policy such as that expounded on February 12 by the present Prime Minister, and as recounted in the house yesterday by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources; firm but flexible. Indeed, I do believe that the program set forth by the minister is flexible enough to cope with any economic fluctuations which may occur in the national economy.

I only have to think of the possibility of the projected development at Coppermine, which I believe is what the Leader of the Opposition had in mind. When the economic situation develops to a point which would warrant such development a road will be extended to that area. That is the way the minister explained it; and when one speaks of a national development policy and national housing development I can only say that until this government came along there were, I believe, three units constructed under the National Housing Act in the whole of the Yukon territory. One can see how marvellously that legislation worked out in the Yukon. There are changes in sight which will enable low rental housing schemes to be put into effect, and in fact one such scheme has been authorized very recently by the present government and undoubtedly it will be implemented in the very near future.

The Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres have both said that these plans are not new, and the hon. member for Mackenzie River interjected during the speech of the minister attributing certain advances in the north to the previous administration. At that time I wondered where was the Liberal plan for the Flat creek to Fort McPherson road; where was the plan of the previous administration for that road? Where was the plan for the construction of the bridge over the Yukon river at Carmacks? Where was the plan for the construction of the Pelly river bridge? Where was the plan for the construction of a bridge over the Stewart river, and where was the plan for the construction of the Flat creek road into Dawson by Rock Creek Bluffs? Where was the plan for the new schools which are going to be built in the Yukon and where was the plan for the airport improvements which will be going forward up there? Where was the plan of the last administration for the improvement of the Elsa road and where was the plan for the improvement of the Dawson-Stewart road and the Tatchun creek bridge? The hon. member for Mackenzie River was holding up a map a moment ago; were these plans mere lines on a map?

Mr. Hardie: I am looking at the report of the commissioner of the Yukon Territory to the Gordon commission.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is this declared policy of the previous government? Where is the declared policy of the Liberal government to actively put these projects into effect? I defy any Liberal member to say that these projects had been planned actively by the past administration.

Mr. Hardie: The Stewart-Cassiar road, did you say?

Mr. Nielsen: No, I did not. I mentioned the Flat creek to Fort McPherson road, the bridge at Carmacks, the Pelly river bridge, the Stewart river bridge, the Flat creek road to Dawson, the schools, the airports, the improvement of the Elsa road, the Dawson-Stewart road and the Tatchun creek bridge. I might add that the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources have been increased by 400 per cent this year. These estimates have been increased by this government and not by the previous administration; and if these plans are Liberal plans, why did they not appear in the previous administration's estimates? Again I challenge any one of the Liberal members to show me the estimates where these projects are shown.

I would now like to read from Saturday Night of January 19, 1957, as follows:

> Northerners stress that the mineral resources of this vast hinterland should not be measured by the mines and prospects that have already been found, but by the geology of the region. Roughly a third of the Canadian shield, the area in which are located the Sudbury, Timmins and Noranda deposits, lies in the Territories—
> And, northerners add, they are hampered by an outdated government policy. They charge government officials still are trying to make work the "rule of thumb" used 25 or 30 years ago.
> "People on the outside look on the north as a romantic country developed by the government," said Norman Byrne, a mining consultant and veteran of 20 years in the north. "But what has the government done to develop the country? All the development here has been by private enterprise and not the government. Their policy seems to be 'You spend the money opening up the country, and then we'll think about helping you or paying you back'—just the opposite to the point of view the government should have."

And that point of view is held by this government.

Mr. Byrne charged the government seems to think mining is a promotion which doesn't always pay for itself. "The government seems to base its thinking—"

He is here speaking of the Liberal government of the day, of course.

"—on the premise that a mine must have a 10 or 20 year supply of ore in sight before it does anything to help the industry. The current thinking of leading mining men is that if a company has three or four years in sight, it is justified in bringing a property into production if production will pay for the gamble and provide a return on the money invested."

He stressed mining companies need help when they are struggling to get into production, when it is difficult to get the needed finances.

I would just like to make one comment while on this article in Saturday Night about the total lack of foresight and lack of policy on the part of the previous administration. During the war, a road and a pipe line were constructed up there, namely from Johnson's Crossing in Yukon Territory to Norman Wells. This road was constructed at a cost of roughly $500 million, and it was given to Canada at the end of the war. On this subject Saturday Night has this to say:

An example, now almost forgotten, is the construction of the Canol pipe line and road to carry Norman Wells oil to a refinery at Whitehorse, Yukon, during the second world war. Roughly half a billion dollars were poured into the mammoth task of pushing the line and road over the saw-tooth Mackenzie mountains and across the muskeg and turbulent rivers.

When the war ended, the refinery was dismantled and shipped to Edmonton. Before the bridges were washed away and the roadbed crumbled, crews salvaged as much of the abandoned equipment and pipe as possible and disposed of it at distress prices. All that remains of this defence effort is an impassable road along which is strewn some obsolete and worthless equipment.

I am very happy to say that this road will be rehabilitated this year. In all fairness to the previous administration, they did plan to do this work and laid out about one-third of the money necessary for this purpose. They planned a visionary, active and aggressive three-year program for rehabilitation of this kind while there were ore beds in the territory awaiting development. It will be done in one year. This is a perfect example of the so-called planning that was conducted under the previous administration.

I promised the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that I would deal with what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) said yesterday. At page 1963 of yesterday's Hansard the Leader of the Opposition is reported as having said:

—our post-war development of this country was tempered by our desire in those years to postpone what could be reasonably postponed so it would not compete with the high level of private investment.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

He went on to say:

I do not for one minute, however, accept the contention of Conservative spokesmen in the last election campaign that this kind of program in the Arctic about which they talked at that time, a road program, a transportation program, would have any considerable effect, if any effect at all, in the immediate emergency which confronted us, which was unemployment. It is one thing to put forward a program for national development in the Arctic,—

That is stretching the truth of the program, in effect.

—but it is another thing to put forward a program of that kind especially when it is contained in estimates which already have been drawn up as a cure for the unemployment emergency.

I submit that this argument is fallacious. In attempting to explain away the reason why the Liberal party did not have a policy the Leader of the Opposition said that it was the desire of the Liberal administration—to quote the hon. gentleman's words:

—to postpone what could be reasonably postponed so it would not compete with the high level of private investment.

We can see how false that argument is because by not postponing the construction of the Flat Creek-Aklavik road we now have an investment of between $150 million and $250 million of private money being pumped into our economy.

Mr. Hardie: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Would he tell us when this sum of between $150 million and $200 million will be spent?

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member for Mackenzie River had been here throughout the entire course of the speech made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) yesterday, he would have the answer to his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no answer to that question.

Mr. Nielsen: I might mention that I cannot understand the hon. member for Mackenzie River having the temerity to criticize this program, coming as he does from an area of Canada which is so very much in need of the type of development for which this program provides.

Mr. Hardie: I asked you a question, my boy.

Mr. Nielsen: I must also admit that I cannot understand either why hon. members of the C.C.F. group would support the motion they did during the throne speech debate on the last occasion on which the Liberal administration brought down a throne speech because in essence it was opposed to what they are supporting today.

Mr. Argue: Not at all.

Mr. Nielsen: It is on the record and you have only to read it. This political flexibility of the Liberal and C.C.F. parties has always amazed me. I sometimes like to refer to it not as a schizophrenic split personality but as a split morality.

The Leader of the Opposition also dealt with the national development program which was first expounded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on February 12, and as reported at page 1963 of yesterday's Hansard the Leader of the Opposition said:

> This kind of claim during an election campaign or subsequent to an election campaign, and even if it is made in this house this afternoon, does not make sense. A program of national development in the north to improve transportation and communication for national development purposes, carrying on the planning and development which has been going on for years, does make sense.

"A program of national development in the north," was not what was said by either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. They and other hon. members in this party have all along referred to a truly national development plan involving the co-operation of the provinces and the territories. Again I remind hon. gentlemen in all parts of the house and members of the public generally that the national development program of this government is not confined to the north.

One has only to look at the figures to realize how much development has been going on in years past. The expenditures by the previous administration in the construction of new Yukon roads in 1944-45 were $20,500; in 1955-56, $152,500; and in 1956-57, $75,000. The estimates for this year for the construction of roads in the Yukon territory total $452,000. The estimates of the previous administration for the last fiscal year for the construction of roads and bridges in the Yukon territory amounted to $480,941. The estimates for this year represent an expenditure of $3,138,600.

While time still permits I wish to refer to a pamphlet published by the national Liberal federation for use in the last election campaign entitled "For Jobs, for Peace, Vote the Pearson Plan". I have read it from cover to cover and it contains this interesting statement:

> Northern Development—A long-term program of northern development including prompt construction of a railroad to Great Slave lake.

This is the national development policy which was expounded afresh by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday? I thought perhaps hon. members opposite would eventually come to believe that the north represented an area worthwhile of development but on the basis of the statements they have made I am disappointed. Perhaps I should not have been disappointed in view of an article which appeared in the London Free Press on February 18, 1958 under the headline, "Charges 'Panic' of PC's Forced Winter Election." The article reports on a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition on an occasion when he shared the platform with the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). The article reads in part as follows:

> Joining him on the program was Lionel Chevrier, one-time transport minister and the federal Liberal party's top man in Quebec.
> Mr. Chevrier suggested the party's election pledge of $400 million in tax cuts was a far better solution to unemployment problems than the Conservatives' national works program.
> Unemployment was found in heavily-populated areas, such as Quebec. But the Conservatives were planning construction in far-off places, such as a $100 million highway in the Yukon vicinity "where there is nobody....and therefore no unemployment."
> "Do the Conservatives intend to force the unemployed of our cities to leave for the far north of our country to find jobs?" he asked.

His remarks imply that the hon. member for Laurier does not feel that this is the way the people are thinking. We have already heard a great deal about the "igloo to igloo" statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, there was some time taken up in discussing a point of order while I was speaking and I wonder if I have been given credit for that time?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Actually I was out of the chair so I cannot say. I am told that you already have had two minutes additional time. However, if you confine your remarks to a minimum and if it is the pleasure of the house to permit the hon. member to carry on I suppose this would be all right.

Mr. Nielsen: I have just three or four minutes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to permit the hon. member for the Yukon to continue?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you. I just have one word left concerning the demand for minerals, and I refer to an article in the U.S. News and World Report in support of the proposition of ours that as the demand is increasing, it is not wise to wait for the maximum development of that demand before this government starts to think about development roads. We have to keep ahead of the game. We cannot start building the roads when the demand is there; we have to anticipate the demand. This is only prudent. This article in the U.S. News and World Report, a United States publication, describes the area of northern Canada and it goes on to say that:

> United States planners heave a sigh of relief when they look at Canada's northwest.
> In that great wilderness is a treasure trove of oil, nickel, copper, uranium and a host of other minerals that the United States needs in ever increasing quantities.

I quote this, Mr. Speaker, because we must look not only to the development of our resources for all Canadians in all parts of Canada but we must anticipate the demand and we must anticipate it in such a way that we shall maintain for Canadians now and in the future our economic sovereignty over the host of minerals that will be developed as a result of this program.

I close on this note, Mr. Speaker. We, in the Yukon at any rate, have long awaited the aggressiveness and the farsighted and visionary policies that this government is now putting forward and certainly the Yukon as well as the Northwest Territories, is just waiting to spill those riches into the lap of the waiting world. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, after having listened to the speeches of hon. members of the opposition so far in this debate, that we in the north can thank our lucky stars and the intelligent exercise of the franchise by the Canadian electorate on March 31 when they decided to accept the development policy of the present government, without which we would still be languishing, and I am sure in the future we would maintain, our position as a second-rate mineral producer. Thank you.

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to support the amendment proposed by my leader. In spite of expansion there seems to be a tendency to tighten and to restrict trade. This seems to be the appropriate time to get on with some of those works and needed facilities which could not be done during the golden age of Liberal prosperity because people were busy doing other things; but I would like to speak particularly on transportation and specifically at the moment on the trans-Canada highway in the Atlantic provinces.

Even with the 50-50 formula, the building of the trans-Canada highway places very heavy burdens on the Atlantic provinces. The 90-10 support policy was not sufficient to relieve the pressure of this burden. My leader promised that if elected he would build 90 per cent of the mileage of the roads through the Atlantic provinces. I would like to request that if the government cannot see its way to carry out that policy, it at least consider giving additional help. In my own province of Newfoundland I would suggest that perhaps if the government would take over a hundred miles of the trans-Canada highway, that is an additional 100 miles, it would give a great deal of aid which would be of great value in completing a very badly needed facility. It would aid in the speeding up of the building of the trans-Canada highway from coast to coast and would permit the provincial government to give more attention to roads leading to the smaller and more remote settlements where road transportation facilities are badly needed.

In addition to the trans-Canada highway as it is now, I would like to suggest that a road leading from Grand Falls up the great northern peninsula be built and considered as a part of the trans-Canada highway and that some means of transportation across the strait of Belle Isle might be considered. Perhaps the most feasible would be a ferry on the strait but the possibilities of a causeway, which has already been mentioned, or of tunnelling under the strait, should not be overlooked. I know that in the future direct road communications between the island of Newfoundland and the mainland would be of great value.

In addition to roadbuilding in the island itself, there is strong reason to believe that a road built up the coast of Labrador would be very desirable. Perhaps for more immediate consideration we should think of air strips in Labrador. The forerunner of development is the float plane. After the float plane come the larger land planes which are required to bring in equipment needed to develop natural resources, and that indicates airstrips. Airstrips could very well be the forerunners of the roads to resources, the roads to development of the north, and I must admit I am particularly interested in the Labrador which, in a big way is my part of the north. It is also probably the oldest part of the north as far as our nation of Canada goes.

Then the matter of highways to supplement coastal services should be considered. This is not a new idea but I do hope that the idea, although it germinated during Liberal days, will not be overlooked. At the present time, at enormous cost, coastal steamers are built and operated, giving water transportation which has been traditional in Newfoundland for many years; but as roads begin to finger up the various and more remote parts of the island people are more and more desirous of having road communication. It is faster and more practical. Mail delivered by roads gets there faster than by boat, and I am not so sure that roads are more expensive than steamers. I would respectfully ask the government to consider the possibility of using highroads to supplement at least in part coastal services by steamer.

Again, in connection with transportation, I would like to mention the harbour development in St. John's. My reason for mentioning this is that the schooner operators from White bay and Green bay are just as much interested in what happens in St. John's harbour as the people of St. John's themselves or anyone else.

Everyone seems to have a different opinion as to what should be done at St. John's and I suppose it requires a certain amount of temerity to mention the subject. But I am convinced that the plan prepared by the Department of Public Works is not only a good one but the correct one. There is only one possible criticism I can see, that it does not extend around the harbour far enough. But that is scarcely a criticism because if time and circumstance should make it desirable to extend it there is nothing to stop extension of work already done. Even the criticism that the wharf commonly called the Finger wharf, I believe, would restrict the room for schooners in the harbour at St. John's is not valid. Under this plan there would be room for schooners to berth instead of anchor and there would be the ideal harbour where every vessel could tie up and have access to the shore instead of anchoring in midstream. I hope the government will find it possible to go ahead without delay with the harbour work. It will not only facilitate trade but should mean lower handling costs and, finally, lower costs to consumers.

There is something else I should like to mention with regard to St. John's or, for that matter, any suitable port. That is the construction of a grain elevator with a flour mill. St. John's or any other suitable port in that general area would be ideally situated for the distribution of feed grains as well as flour. I would say that roughly a million people could be served by a flour mill in St. John's. Not only the maritimes but the West Indies and South America and Europe also could be supplied from the Newfoundland port during the winter when the St. Lawrence is closed to navigation.

Far from hurting Nova Scotia it should promote and improve trade between Halifax and St. John's because it would provide return trade. Two-way trade would bring down freight rates generally and should stimulate trade between the maritime provinces and Newfoundland. The result would be that all the Atlantic provinces would benefit. One point often overlooked particularly when looking at a flat map but which is easily understandable when looking at a globe is that the port of St. John's is nearer to South America by several hundred miles, I believe, than is the port of New York.

I mentioned air strips a minute ago and I should like to come back to the matter of air services in Newfoundland. Air services in a province such as ours are much more important than in some of the other provinces of Canada. Quite frequently the only reasonably fast communication is by air. Eastern Provincial Airways, the local air line, has done a magnificent job in providing a triangular service in Newfoundland as well as service right down the whole coast of Labrador. The stories of their many mercy flights are legion. Suffice it to say that they have rendered a service unequalled and have brought much needed amenities to the people they serve which heretofore they had to do without. Their big handicap is that during the seasons of freeze-up and break-up it is impossible to operate on either floats or skis. Therefore their service is restricted with considerable discomfort to the public. What is indicated is either the building of air-strips or, what is probably more feasible, the provision of helicopter service during the periods I have mentioned.

Some of the projects I have named are of considerable magnitude and will be costly but I am sure that in a world which is actively considering colonizing the moon it is not too much to ask that development take place within our own realm.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I listened with great interest to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and also to the wording of the amendment. You know, it is strange what great changes come over one when he moves across the floor of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: We have noticed that.

Mr. Green: I suppose that works both ways.

An hon. Member: It certainly does.

Mr. Green: But here we were yesterday listening to the leader of the Liberal party moving by way of an amendment what he described as a national development policy. My thoughts went back to the amendments we moved on several occasions when we were in opposition urging the government of that time to adopt a national policy. We thought we had a patent on national development policy. Therefore it is quite a shock to find the Liberals of all people now coming forward and making a great outcry in support of a national development policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Our provocation is greater than yours was when you were on this side.

National Development Policy

Mr. Green: I am interested to see how the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) turns himself into a chameleon when he speaks on this amendment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, I have no intention.

Mr. Green: Our proposals for a national development policy, of course, were a great deal more—

Mr. Pickersgill: Nebulous.

Mr. Green: —Canadian, vigorous and beneficial to the country than this milk and water amendment brought in by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday. I have here a copy of a real national development policy amendment which we moved about a year and a half ago on February 11, 1957. It was in these words:

—that the welfare of the Canadian people requires the adoption now of a national development policy which will develop our natural resources for the maximum benefit of all parts of Canada, encourage more processing of those resources in Canada, correct the present serious unfavourable trade balances, foster wider financial participation by Canadians in the development of our resources, and promote greater opportunity and employment for a steadily increasing population.

That amendment, Mr. Speaker, represented the thinking of the Conservative party when in opposition. It represents our thinking today and it emphasizes what we have been trying to do as a government during the last 12 months. It also points to the path that we shall be following in the years that lie ahead. We really do not need any amendment such as that proposed by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday to help us on the way. I refer members to this strange amendment which reads:

This house is of the opinion that, in present circumstances of declining private investment, a balanced policy of national development—

Just what he means by "a balanced policy" nobody knows, unless it was intended to appeal to different parts of the country in the way in which those different parts would prefer to interpret it.

—requires consideration by the government of active measures to meet the urgent needs of social capital—

We did not get a definition of that. I believe this is a favourite expression of Professor Lamontagne—

Mr. Pickersgill: And also of the minister of northern affairs.

Mr. Green: —economic adviser to the Liberal party at the present time. The use of these words makes me wonder whether or not he wrote the speech the Leader of the Opposition gave yesterday. Here we have:

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

—the urgent needs of social capital especially in the form of transportation facilities, municipal improvements, and other facilities to stimulate economic development and to promote social well-being in the settled areas of Canada.

Mr. Cardiff: Perhaps it was Knowles who wrote the speech?

Mr. Green: I never thought of that. It is now suggested that perhaps Mr. Stanley Knowles wrote the speech. He may have had something to do with it, but I believe he would have written a much better one if he had had anything to do with the drafting. This reference to social capital had one strange effect which perhaps hon. members might have noticed. It was just like a great big piece of bait on a fish hook for the C.C.F. group and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) rose to the bait and swallowed it, hook, line and sinker, without batting an eyelash.

Mr. Garland: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if he would care to say how many times his own Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) referred to this term "social capital" in his budget address?

Mr. Green: I do not keep track of how many times my colleagues refer to social capital. They may have caught this bad idea from the other side of the house. In any event, it would be extremely helpful to have a definition of just what social capital means. If it means the same thing to the Leader of the Opposition as it means to the members of the C.C.F., then we are witnessing quite a change across the floor of the House of Commons. We may be witnessing the first exciting hours of a courtship between these two forlorn opposition parties.

However, I would point out to the Leader of the Opposition and his social capitalists that he had better be careful about getting too friendly with these people over in the corner.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what got you into office, was it not, under the leadership of Stanley Knowles?

Mr. Green: I am afraid the Liberal party is never going to get into office on an amendment such as the one it moved yesterday. I have here a statement of just what this group in the corner stand for, and what they mean when they talk about social capital. The heading is "Capitalism still target of C.C.F.". The article is from the Vancouver Province of June 2, 1958. At that time, at their provincial meeting, they passed the following resolution:

The C.C.F. will not rest content until capitalism has been eradicated and the full program of socialistic planning has been instituted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order. The leader opposite has been very eloquent on subjects which are not germane to the amendment before the house, and certainly an academic discussion of socialism could, by no stretch of even the ingenious imagination of the leader opposite, be considered to be germane.

Mr. Green: I was commenting on the fact that these two opposition parties rushed into each other's arms so quickly yesterday when this amendment was put forward. I am simply trying to warn Liberals of the great danger of this courtship. In so far as the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is concerned, he has said some peculiar things at times, Mr. Speaker. I have here a statement he made on April 15, 1956, which is headed "Liberals victory good for mankind, Pickersgill says":

Immigration Minister Pickersgill said Saturday—

Speaking to the Young Liberals in Toronto.

—"It is not merely for the well-being of Canadians but for the good of mankind in general that the present Liberal government should remain in office."

This illustrates the lack of judgment and what a false prophet the hon. member really is. Mankind seems to be doing much better now than it was two years ago under the government of which he was a member.

Mr. Garland: Whom do you think you are kidding?

Mr. Bourget: It has been good for 22 years.

Mr. Green: I have something that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) said, too. Two years ago these ex-ministers were riding very high. Speaking to some Liberals in Vancouver—they are hard to find now, but at that time there were quite a few—the hon. member said:

The smiling minister told a rally in Mount Pleasant memorial hall the Conservative party is "already bankrupt". He foresaw little opposition to the Liberals in the next national election.

"There is no Conservative party today", he said.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since the minister is in a good mood, I may tell him I was seeking to say that the Conservative party, under men like Borden and Bennett, had disappeared and the Conservative party, in its effort to get into power, had simply adopted Liberal policies and, I might say, quite cleverly Liberal tactics.

Mr. Green: The hon. member, naturally, is very clever, but this alibi two years later does not ring true at all.

In any event, here we are considering this very pale imitation of a national development policy amendment. I do not believe that very many people across the country, or even across the floor of this house, are going to take it very seriously. There has been a good deal of discussion about whether the government has done this or has done that to bring about the development of the country. Naturally, there are differences of opinion. We believe that a great deal has been done in the few months we have been in office. Certainly, no one ever tried harder to get things done, and I think that is true of the officials in the departments. I doubt if there has ever been a time in Canadian history when a more honest, genuine and sincere attempt has been made to further developments of every kind across the nation.

In spite of the weeping and wailing we hear from across the way, there has been quite a bit of comment. We have heard from various members of the opposition that all these works projects were a myth, that they will not be undertaken for months or perhaps for years and that there is nothing to be seen of them across the country and nobody is being put to work. I have here a dispatch of June 20 from the "Daily Commercial News and Building Record" dealing with the construction that is actually going on in Canada:

Canada's 51 builders' exchanges in the near future probably will be more active than ever due to a shot in the arm in the shape of current predictions that the nation's construction program for 1958 will total a record $7,136 million. The official prediction makes the 1958 total top last year's $7,048 million by 1.3 per cent.

Surely, in all fairness, Canada having a record year in the construction industry in 1958, the government is entitled to some credit for that result. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the actions of the government have played a large part in that result. Then in yesterday's Gazette, under the heading "Canadian Construction Record Set as 20 p.c. Gain Reported", we find the following:

Canada's construction industry is continuing to set records. The total cumulative dollar volume of contract awards for the first half of 1958 is the largest ever listed.

This is in a time when business is not as good as it had been, a time when we are in recession. Yet we find the construction industry this year doing more than it has ever done before in the history of Canada. The article continues:

Statistics compiled from Hugh C. MacLean Building Reports show that the 1958 six-month total of construction contract awards is $1,683,261,700, 20 per cent higher than it was at the end of this period last year, and four per cent higher than it was in 1956, the previous record year for the first six months' total.

So much for construction generally. We are very proud of those figures and I think we have good reason to be proud of them. We hope they will be even better as 1958 goes on.

Then I wish to say a few words about one branch of the construction industry, and incidentally I may say it is a branch in which there has been the greatest increase since this government took office. I refer to the house building branch. Here I suppose we have an example of social capital. I presume that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) would agree that money advanced by the government for purposes of house building would be included in this mysterious classification of social capital.

As hon. members know,—and I do not intend to repeat at any length today—the government decided last August to initiate a small home loan policy. That policy has been extremely successful. The figures for loans under this policy, up to the time when we practically ran out of money in May, are $255,009,800 for a total of 26,030 units. This money would not have been spent had the government not adopted the policy we did adopt for small home loans.

Mr. Bourget: You cannot say that.

Mr. Green: I can say that. Practically none of it would have been spent had it not been for the policy adopted by this government.

Mr. Bourget: You have not shown that.

Mr. Green: Moneys were being spent for other types of housing but this was a brand new policy devised by a brand new government which was a great improvement on the old government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has unlimited time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was this policy not embodied in the statute which the minister found on the statute books?

Mr. Green: This policy was embalmed by the former government in the statute books and that is exactly where it would have been if the former government had continued in office.

There are certain features about this small home loan plan which deserve comment before I go on to show what has happened since May. In comparing the average income of the person who benefitted under the small home loan plan with that of the home owner taking out an ordinary insured loan, we find that under the small home loan plan the average income is $4,986 whereas the income of the average person getting a loan under the insured provision is $5,997, over $1,000 a year higher. The average cost of this small home is $12,905 compared with $15,337 for the person getting a loan under the ordinary N.H.A. provisions. These comparisons are for the first quarter of 1958. The average loan under the small home loan plan was $10,706 and under the N.H.A. ordinary provisions it was $11,609. The average down payment—and here is the greatest difference—under the small home loan plan in the first three months of this year was $2,199 and under the insured plan under the ordinary N.H.A. provision it was $3,728, a difference of over $1,500.

As hon. members know we came to the house in May, shortly after this session commenced, and asked for additional funds. We were given another $350 million. Since May 22, which was approximately when the funds first became available—and mind you, there was roughly $10 million remaining of the old fund—to July 4, which is a period of six weeks, money has been lent for cleaning up the small home plan as it formerly was—that is the money being lent out with the lending institutions and banks acting as agents—to an amount of $23,328,451 for a total of 1961 units. This is within the last six weeks.

Mr. Garland: Does that mean that only $13 million of the new $350 million that parliament approved has been used? The minister said $10 million was carried over.

Mr. Green: No, approximately $23,300,000 has been put out in order to wind up the old agency loan plan. In addition to that, $16,177,299 has been put out under our new residual plan which could really be divided into three parts: First, that part for cities and towns with populations of under 55,000, for which part the figure is $6,114,309; then for home owners in cities of over 55,000 population, the figure is $1,615,414; for builders both in cities of over 55,000 and centres under that figure—mind you, in the case of those builders the loans can only be made on small homes—the total is $8,447,576. That means a total of residual loans under our revised plan since May 22 of $16,177,299.

There is a third category under the limited dividend corporation plan which, as hon. members know, provides rental accommodation for the lower income groups, under which $10,816,738 has been put out. Those figures, to provide for the winding up of the agency loan plan, the new residual plan and the limited dividend plan, give a total of $50,322,488 since May 22, 1958.

Mr. Garland: Is it correct, then, that $40 million was used out of this figure of $350 million?

Mr. Green: Yes. That amounts to something around $40 million already used of the $350 million voted by this house in May.

We have tried, as a result of the debate which took place in this house when we were getting this additional money, to make the new residual loans available to a far greater extent in the smaller centres. With that objective in mind officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have written to the mayor or the reeve of every centre of over 1,500 people in this country pointing out that this plan is available for the Canadians who live in those smaller centres, forwarding leaflets to them and offering to have officials visit those centres to speak to meetings or to advise city or town councils and render whatever assistance is possible. This, I believe, is having the desired effect, and it now looks as though we will be doing a great deal more lending in the small centres across the country.

In addition, steps have been taken to popularize the smaller home. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation participated in the construction of two sample cheaper homes, and we are hoping that there will be a move towards the building of such homes which will bring the benefit of our housing policy within the reach of a group of Canadians with much smaller incomes than those receiving loans at the present time.

Mr. Garland: Would the minister permit a question on this point. Is it the intention that these lower cost or lower quality homes will be made available throughout the country or only in rural areas?

Mr. Green: We are hoping they will be adopted in all parts of Canada, in the smaller centres as well as in the rural areas.

Mr. Garland: The minister will recognize that they will not always be acceptable.

Mr. Green: If they are not acceptable we cannot do much about it.

Mr. Garland: In many of the urban areas they will not meet the required standards.

Mr. Green: If they are not acceptable what we can do is very limited.

Another very encouraging sign is that in the Atlantic provinces there has been a great increase in the number of requests for loans. We were worried last year because these small home loans were not being taken up in the Atlantic provinces in as large proportions as in other parts of Canada. In the first 25 weeks of 1958, 880 applications for loans of all kinds were received from the Atlantic provinces, in which the National Housing Act was involved, as compared with 357 applications last year. This is an increase of 146.5 per cent, and we are very much encouraged by this improvement.

Housing starts have shot up. You know, you would not think there was any recession within 10,000 miles of Canada when you consider the housing picture. Housing starts in urban centres during the first half of 1958 were 66 per cent higher than in the corresponding period in 1957. A similar increase is estimated for the rural areas and the prospect for the year as a whole is for starts in excess of 140,000 units.

We were worried as to whether these small homes would sell, and whether as a result of this policy we might find a lot of homes would be unsold across the country. Sales have been good despite a higher level of completions this year, and the inventory of unoccupied houses has declined. At the end of May there were 2,144 dwellings unoccupied for one month or more. A year ago in that category there were 2,662 dwellings.

This all goes to show that the policies of this government have been wise and that the country is not enveloped in a great black cloud as one would gather from listening to the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition and some of his colleagues across the way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Look at the level of unemployment and you will see.

Mr. Green: Oh, I know the hon. member takes a great deal of pleasure from that.

Mr. Pearson: The minister takes a great deal of pleasure from ignoring it.

Mr. Green: The Canadian construction association, which is a non-partisan organization and a splendid one, has this to say:

> 1957 was a difficult year for the housebuilding section of the construction industry and demonstrated the very considerable way in which the level of residential construction is dependent upon government policy. Had it not been for the timely and vigorous approach to the problem of a shortage of private mortgage funds by the government in August, it is apparent that the volume of house building and employment would have been much lower during the fall and winter months. Like most years, 1957 was affected by a number of conflicting influences in the housing field; some good and some bad. On balance, the favourable factors had won out by the end of the year. Completions rose to over 117,000 compared with a predicted total of 100,000, and the large number of housing starts in the second half of the year and a predicted decrease in competing demands for investment funds gave promise of an increased housing program in 1958.

I forgot to mention that the ordinary loans under the National Housing Act have also been greatly increased this year. Ordinary National Housing Act loans for the first twenty-seven weeks of last year numbered 13,002 and for the first twenty-seven weeks of this year they numbered 25,121, almost double last year's total.

I have outlined the attempts the government has made to implement a national development policy so far as construction is concerned and particularly housebuilding which is the biggest industry in Canada in these modern times. The government has taken the same approach in every other field of governmental activity including northern affairs, transport and defence production. The same approach was taken in all the activities that were undertaken by the government.

I plead with the Leader of the Opposition not to be so downhearted and pessimistic about Canada. It is terrible to see one with such a lighthearted, genial and cheery character trying to shed crocodile tears all over the House of Commons. It is not fitting. It is not in character at all for him to be acting like that.

Mr. Pearson: And it is not fitting for you to say that.

Mr. Green: I would ask him to take a look at the current issue of Time magazine. On the first page in the "Canadian Affairs" section there is a lovely picture of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) and an article entitled "Fading Recession" which appears in the column entitled "The Realm". The first sentence in that article reads:

> Canada's spring recovery was surpassing the brightest forecasts of the experts.

Under the picture of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and Mr. Burk the following words appear:

> The nation was building its way out of the slump.

And today we have the current issue of the U.S. News and World Report dated July 11.

Mr. Pearson: Can you not quote a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Green: I thought perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might more readily believe a United States magazine than a Canadian. I have here the current issue of the U.S. News and World Report and I think even the Leader of the Opposition will admit that this is one of the most reliable magazines printed today.

Mr. Pickersgill: You certainly got your signals mixed on the 15 per cent.

Mr. Green: Oh, you would not know anything about this. Under the heading, "Business Around the World" the following article appears in that magazine:

> To show you how fast Canada is bouncing back . . .
> More jobs opened up this spring than in any spring since 1952. Jobless total declined in May to 6 per cent of employables, is probably lower today.
> Consumer spending is running higher than in 1957.
> Housing starts shot up a sensational 84 per cent in first four months of 1958 over 1957. Housing expenditures in early 1958 were up 20 per cent.
> Capital spending in 1958 will probably top $8.5 billion—only $200 million below the high level of 1957. Industrial outlays for plant and equipment are under the 1957 rate, but government spending is offsetting private cutbacks.
> Canada's exports are running at the second-highest level on record.
> And Canada's dollar is up—in excess of four cents over the United States dollar.
> This gives you a glimpse of the record which Prime Minister Diefenbaker has available for President Eisenhower during his visit to Ottawa.
> The turn in Canada, actually, came early this year, just when the outlook for U.S. business seemed bleakest. Canada's slump began about six months before the United States recession—

The government of Canada at that time was worse than the government in the United States, I presume. I continue:

> —hit bottom in December, now is turning into recovery.
> Note this, though: From peak of boom to bottom of slump, industrial output in Canada dropped 7 per cent, but in the United States, 13 per cent. While housing has stayed up in the United States, it has zoomed in Canada. Then, while United States exports have dropped off sharply, Canada's have remained surprisingly high.
> Ottawa's explanation for the Canadian pickup: The Canadian government has gone in vigorously for pump priming. This has spurred housing, kept consumer spending and farm incomes high, boosted capital expenditures as well.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question. Does the minister know whether that magazine is contemplating a Canadian edition?

Mr. Green: I would not know about that, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues across the way are much greater experts on the question of United States magazines than anybody over here.

Mr. Garland: Maybe your picture will be in the next issue.

Mr. Green: You know, instead of being faced with a vote of no confidence for our national development policy and instead of the phony imitation move made by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday in bringing in his amendment, the government should have had a vote of confidence from hon. members opposite.

Mr. Argue: All Tories together.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but as I interpret standing order 31 the right of a minister to speak for more than 40 minutes was exhausted by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) and therefore I am obliged to advise the Minister of Public Works that his time has expired.

Mr. Green: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I had concluded my remarks, in any event.

Mr. Pearson: That was a good note on which to end.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, before launching my brief contribution to this debate I should like to make reference to a few points that were raised by hon. gentlemen opposite and particularly by those members of the cabinet who spoke. First of all I should like to make reference to something that was said yesterday by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton). The hon. gentleman was referring to remarks that had been made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) and myself, and as reported at page 1978 of yesterday's Hansard the minister said:

> —and all the little echoes and all the little parts of Canada where all the little minds come from answered in tune.

That is a classic example of the arrogance and insult that northern Ontario will not tolerate. That may be in large part the reason why no hon. members on the government side of the house represent ridings in northern Ontario. Northern Ontario may not have caught the vision expounded upon by the minister yesterday for a very valid reason. Perhaps the people in that part of the country have had a sorry experience in the past with visions similar to that outlined by the minister. They have seen a government open up a part of the country and turn it over to what government members like to describe as free enterprise. They have seen fortunes and resources cleared out of those areas leaving in their wake the wrecks of human lives which were employed and exploited in those areas and the fortunes and profits amassed there by so-called free enterprisers have gone to build up other parts of the country.

I recall the remarks of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the committee on mines, forests and waters when he pointed out the mistakes that had been made in the United States.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not believe the hon. member is entitled to discuss the evidence heard in a committee of this house until such time as the committee has completed its investigation and reported back to the house.

Mr. Robichaud: Sit down, junior.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member who has the floor is embarking on a discussion of matters before a committee of this house which has not yet reported he would not be in order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, let us put it this way. The errors made in the United States in the last 50 years and the way in which they have squandered their natural resources are common knowledge. It is to be hoped that this program of northern development will not be a repetition of what has happened in the United States. Let us hope that this government will have the foresight and the vision, if you want to call it that, to ensure that the same thing does not happen in this country; that we do not squander our wonderful wealth of natural resources as the United States has done.

There is one other small aspect of this northern development which was drawn to my attention just last weekend. I was talking to a gentleman from the Timmins riding who is a silicosis pensioner, living on a pension of roughly $102 a month. He happens to live quite close to the crossroads where highway 11 branches off highway 101 going north through Cochrane and Kapuskasing and the trans-Canada highway. As a result of the position of his home his house is the first place hit by the unemployed from southern Ontario and other parts of Canada who, hoping and trusting in this vision, may think there is some employment for them in the northern part of the country. When they hitch-hike a ride to this crossroads they get off to look for further lifts up the highway and they generally stop in at this old gentleman's place to try to get a cup of coffee or something to eat. He took the trouble last weekend to count the people who stopped at his house asking for something to eat and the number totalled 47. With his pension he does not have too much to feed himself and his family but fortunately, contrary to the present decision of the government which has refused to extend any unemployment insurance benefits to the people whose benefits have run out, at least he never turned them away. He gave them a sandwich before they went on their way.

An hon. Member: He must have been a Conservative.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): He happens to be a paid up member of the C.C.F. and has been for years.

We also had an interesting example yesterday of an interjection from the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) who seems to be carrying on a contest with the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) as to which one of them can drag up the old chestnut of the box factory in Saskatchewan. I must say that they make me a little bit homesick. They remind me so much of my mother-in-law's parrot. He is 31 years of age and he knows only one question, but he repeats it very often, very loud and very clear. It is not interested in getting an answer, just in asking the question.

We also had an example last night of the amazement demonstrated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees). I turn to page 1996 of Hansard, where I find the following:

> Then we see the C.C.F. climbing aboard the free enterprise bandwagon. Now they are grasping to their breasts small business as though they had always been brothers.

It is rather strange to see this amazement on the part of the minister because I know he was in the house at the very time that this matter was debated by Mr. Owen Jones, the former C.C.F. member for Okanagan Boundary, and also by Mr. Fred Zaplitny, the former member for Dauphin. If hon. members will take the trouble to look up page 3502 of Hansard of April 12, 1957, and page 3448 of April 11, 1957, they will see that members of this group very clearly expounded the case for the small businessman of this country.

I would also like to remind the minister that the amazement which he expressed yesterday was expressed better, I might say, by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), I think it was, as his contribution to the debate on that day. It seems so strange but hon. members know, or at least should know, that the very backbone of the C.C.F. party has been the small businessman across the country.

Then, of course, we had the reference by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) today. Like the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), he took great glee in referring to some decision made by the C.C.F. party of British Columbia. I find it very strange that their memories do not go back to a recent decision made by the Progressive Conservative party of British Columbia which apparently did not sit too well with the rest of the Progressive Conservatives across the country.

I was very pleased to hear the minister speak of the tremendous improvement in housing in this country. I would like to suggest, that possibly the same treatment might be handed out to small business that was given to the housing industry in this country. If the government could see its way to extend the same assistance to the small businesses in this country that they have given to housing, then we might see the same beneficial results accruing therefrom.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Contrary to what hon. members may believe and certainly contrary to what they state across this country, the C.C.F. party has never been against free enterprise.

Mr. McIntosh: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes.

Mr. McIntosh: The hon. member is asking for something, and as a matter of fact we had the question yesterday. What is the percentage of small business that requires the help the hon. member is speaking about? If the government does not know the percentage how can the help be given?

Mr. Argue: The retail merchants association says almost all of them.

Mr. McIntosh: To what did the hon. member refer?

Mr. Argue: The retail merchants association.

Mr. McIntosh: What authority has the hon. member for saying that?

Mr. Argue: I will quote it to the house the next day the subject is discussed.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; we cannot have a debate of this kind. The hon. member who has the floor may continue.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I recall hon. members on the government side appearing to be quite interested in questioning each and every one of this group who rises in his place as to what is his particular definition of a certain thing. I would suggest they look up the debate of April 11 and 12 of last year, which I mentioned before, where I think they will find much of the information and data they are requesting at the present time. I could have put it on Hansard again but there are other members who wish to speak in this debate and I do not want to take up any more of the time of the house than is necessary. Certainly, today the small businessmen in the country are in a very serious condition. They are being squeezed out right and left by huge corporations which are sprawling across the country. The point might be made that these large corporations may be more efficient, and I will not deny it. But I do not believe that efficiency and efficiency only should be the sole yardstick in this matter. I think the personal service of the small storekeeper, the small shop, is something that we should make every effort to hang onto in this country.

As I mentioned before, contrary to what is preached about this group, we are not against free enterprise as free enterprise. We are, and always have been and will continue to be, against monopoly enterprise which chokes the very life out of free enterprise.

Apparently, hon. members on the government side are unable to differentiate between the two.

I could go into further detail on this matter, Mr. Speaker, but I will merely refer to a chart prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics showing the percentage of increase or decrease in respect of independents and corporate chains in this country. For Canada as a whole I find that from 1951 to 1956 corporate chains increased from 35 per cent to 41 per cent and as a result independents decreased from 65 per cent to 59 per cent. I find that in my own province of Ontario the rate of change is even faster. In that same period from 1951 to 1956 corporate chains increased from 49 per cent to 56 per cent and as a result the independents were reduced from 51 per cent to 44 per cent.

I say it is high time that the government of the country should look into the matter and provide some form of assistance to the small businessman who really is the true, free enterpriser. The government should make sure that some effort is made to give small businessmen a hand before they become extinct.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words to point out some of the contradictions and confusion that certainly exist in the minds of some of the members of the C.C.F. group. We have before the house an amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). He wishes to add certain words to the motion of non-confidence of the Liberal opposition, those words being "long term loans to qualifying small businesses".

When the hon. member for Kootenay West first got up he congratulated the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) for his efforts, as he put it, to rescue this country from the deficiencies of private enterprise. He even went so far as to state that he would issue a membership ticket to the Leader of the Opposition. He had no sooner finished that statement than he started to expound how the amendment put forward by his party could save that same private enterprise about which he was talking.

There is also a considerable amount of confusion in the minds of the members of the C.C.F. party as to what may constitute a qualifying small business. The hon. member for Kootenay West stated that it was a business primarily interested in the local community. He also said it was a business that did not call on foreign or exterior capital and also was a business that would reinvest all its profits in the locality. In answer to a question at the end of his speech he said that a small business was a business that could not issue shares or float loans by means of debentures or bonds.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am not an exponent or particular friend of big business but I do know that big business as it exists and is organized today is certainly most vitally interested in the community in which it engages in its activities. As everyone knows, when a business locates in a particular place it employs local labour. Every effort is always made to find among the local population all the help that the industry needs. It is also the employees of so-called big business, which in the minds of the C.C.F. members represents such a menace to this country who are most active in all social welfare activities. You see them as heads and directors of social clubs. You see them everywhere taking the interests of the community to heart. Certainly they are the first contributors to all public campaigns where contributions are necessary to help worthy causes in the particular area.

If so-called big business has had to call on foreign capital it is because such capital was not available where the resource was being developed, the mill was established or the plant or industry happened to be. It is because capital could not be found locally that they have applied for and in certain cases obtained capital from exterior sources. There is absolutely nothing wrong about such a procedure.

The hon. member went further and said that the profits of small businesses are reinvested locally. That may or may not be so. In many cases the owners of so-called small businesses do not even live where the profits are made. These businesses, although small, may be controlled from a distance and the profits that the owners make may certainly be reinvested elsewhere, even outside the country. Therefore that is not a true definition of what a qualifying small business may be.

Nor is the definition any more accurate when the hon. member states that it is a business that cannot issue shares or raise loans by debentures or bonds. As we know, many small businesses today are incorporated. The shares may belong wholly only to one, two or three persons. Yet these incorporated businesses can issue shares and raise money by bonds while at the same time remaining small businesses. That was one definition given to us as to what constitutes a small business.

The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) gave another definition in answer to a question. He said that in the United States a small business is one that has a turnover of less than $5 million. He went on to say that in Canada it might be only

$1 million or a business that has assets valued at from $25,000 to $50,000. To my way of thinking, businesses that would be in the upper bracket of that category certainly would not be small businesses. Moreover, is it not logical to conclude that businesses with an annual production of close to $1 million or with assets worth from $25,000 to $50,000 can certainly negotiate at the banks any type of loan they may require? Therefore I suggest that before proposing any such subamendment the C.C.F. group should have got together on the basic tenets underlying it. It is indeed most surprising to see private enterprise being championed in the house by the C.C.F. group.

Again I cannot fail to note the rather startling contradiction in their thinking. They come before the house and tell us that small business needs assistance. Why does it need this assistance? It needs assistance to help it to grow. If it grows, then it becomes big business. If the C.C.F. party ever came to power, would they not then have to take measures to stop that so-called small business or industry from developing and becoming big business?

I really believe, Mr. Speaker, that the solicitude of the C.C.F. party for small business is of recent origin. I note that the hon. member for Kootenay West has declared that quite recently, and I emphasize those words "quite recently", the philosophy and program of the C.C.F. has recognized the importance of the small business sector of our economy as part of a mixed economy. He went on to say that some people might remark that he had become somewhat mixed in his thinking. I believe that is what has occurred. I feel that the particular consideration given by that group to small business has no other origin than the announced intention of the labour congress not long ago to form a new political party for which strength would be drawn from the labour, professional and farm groups and groups of small businessmen. I think that is the real interest. When such appeals are made in this house for support for small business, it is nothing less than a political move.

The party of which I am a member, and which presently forms the government, is really the party that has befriended private enterprise and small business for a great number of years. Surely, the members who sit on the government side are not business tycoons or business magnates. They are simply representatives of the spirit of small private enterprise which makes up the strength of this country. They do not need lessons from the C.C.F. group in order to support the interests of small business. The only remark I can make about this strange marriage between the C.C.F. group and small business is that politics will often make strange bedfellows.

The speech from the throne contained an announcement that a sort of advisory council would be created for small business to study the needs of this section of our economy. I have no doubt whatever that amongst those needs which will be studied will be the need of small business for long term borrowings. I submit that before we adopt measures extending loans to small business we should form this small business section, which will be composed of specialists, to ascertain what are the real needs of small business in the way of an expansion of credit. Once these things have been made known, then the appropriate legislative measures can be taken.

Again I emphasize the fact that small businesses do need a lot of help and a lot of consideration from this government. I submit that they have been getting it and they will get it in a form which is traditional to our way of thinking. This help certainly should not smell of socialism or of state enterprise. I believe it is not the role of government to go into the business of lending money in the way the subamendment suggests. Government should rather create the means, provide the climate, in which small businesses may find the credit that they need.

Recently an excellent brief was presented by the Canadian tourist association in which they recommended the government should guarantee loans through chartered banks to the operators of small tourist industries. Now that is one possible solution and it could be extended to other sections of small business. It may not be a sound solution because the chartered banks are not always ready, because of the way they are made up and because of the necessity to maintain liquid assets, to extend long term loans.

Perhaps another solution to this problem of extending credit to small businesses would be for the government to guarantee the debentures or bonds which could be issued by small businesses, much in the same way that some governments guarantee bonds that are issued by municipal or school corporations. However, before we can adopt any of these means, a thorough study must be made of the part that small businesses must play in our growing country, a country which, by the very fact it is growing, has become more and more complex every year to administer. I do not feel we should condone the habit into which the C.C.F. has fallen of looking upon big business as some kind of giant juggernaut that is overrunning this country. If we get down to the basic facts, if we get lists of the shareholders of the so-called big corporations, we find that in the great majority of cases the shareholders are made up of thousands of small investors and employees of these corporations across the country. Really, it is the people from every section that constitute the so-called big business.

I do not believe the need exists any longer, at least in this party, to condone any of the excesses of monopolies or of big businesses because our party has a record of rising in opposition at any time when big businesses overran the legitimate interests of other classes of our society. I believe the government is vigilant enough to stamp out abuses whenever they occur. I have said all I wish to say with respect to the subamendment.

I should like to say a word or two about the Liberal amendment. There is not very much that can be added after that most eloquent discourse given to us by the minister of northern affairs.

But the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition is again indicative of the thinking of the Liberal party which was the primary reason why that great party has now descended—to use the words of one of their former leaders, namely Hon. Mr. King—into the valley of humiliation. That is also the reason why it will remain there for a long time to come.

When the Liberal proponents talk about declining conditions in public investment and about recession and when they say that the north is so much waste land, I think of a famous French writer and philosopher of the 18th century by the name of Voltaire who once stated in France: Why worry about Canada? All Canada is is a few acres of snow. From the way the Liberal party has been talking, you would think that our vast north land, which offers so much promise for the future, is nothing but a few acres of barren snow land. I think what the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said this afternoon certainly shows that vital things are being done in our northland and that it is really not only a frontier but is already a great, prosperous and established portion of our country. It is right that, like the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton), we should look towards the future, towards the day when the population of this country will be 50 million or perhaps 100 million. In planning today, we are planning for that great future which has certainly the assurance of the continued greatness and the destiny of our country. That does not mean that we must today neglect local development or neglect the settled portions of our country. We are not doing that. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) as well as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) have enumerated to this house all the projects that have been initiated by this government since it took power. I think that is convincing proof that they are doing everything possible for the settled portion of our country but that at the same time they are maintaining that vision. I think that the word "vision" is one that we can very well use and that it should not be ridiculed by members of the opposition. We shall maintain that vision which will be the assurance that we can go on to greater and better things. I think the words of a great past leader of the Liberal party will some day become true and that this century will truly be the century of Canada.

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard Moses, in the cloak of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton), expound to us the ten commandments of the Conservatives' northern development policy; but like the Ten Commandments, they have not changed. On looking over the northern development policy of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources at the present time I would say that he has taken the former Liberal policy, with maybe a few extensions and projections, and has called it the new Tory policy.

Yesterday the minister stated that his government was taking the recommendations of the former government found in the briefs submitted by the commissioners of both the Yukon and Northwest Territories to the Gordon royal commission in November of 1955. Those proposals included a network of roads in both the territories and roads from the provinces linking the provinces with the network of roads recommended for the territories. These road proposals made by the commissioners projected the completion of these proposals over a period of 15 years to 25 years.

Let us take a look at the definite road proposals made at that time. I have here a map showing roads proposed at that time by the commissioner of the Northwest Territories, the deputy minister of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In the Northwest Territories these roads included an extension to the Mackenzie highway system from Hay River, Fort Providence, Fort Rae to Yellowknife, a road, I may add, that was started three years ago by the former administration and which we hope will be completed some time in 1960. This same extension on this map shows the extension of that road to Great Bear lake. Then in addition to that, we have a road from

Yellowknife to Thompson Landing on the east arm of Great Slave lake; another connecting the Mackenzie highway with Pine Point, Fort Resolution, Rocher river and Snowdrift on the south shore of Great Slave lake; another connecting the Mackenzie highway with Fort Vermilion, Alberta, Fort Smith and Fort Resolution in the Northwest Territories; also a road from Uranium City to Ferguson lake and Eskimo Point on Hudson bay; and another connecting this road with Lynn Lake, Manitoba; another from Fort Nelson, B.C. to Fort Simpson in the Northwest Territories. In the Yukon, in their brief and on that map you will find similar roads. Included in these recommendations were roads from Stewart B.C. to Cassiar—

Mr. Nielsen: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hardie: Yes; I will permit a question.

Mr. Nielsen: Is the hon. member saying that the lines on this map which he has in his possession constitute the extent of the Liberal planning?

Mr. Hardie: I say that the lines on this map, as stated by your minister yesterday, were proposals by the administrations of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon to the Gordon royal commission in 1955 and were to be completed in a period of from 15 years to 25 years, just as the minister said. That is what I said.

In the Yukon I said these recommendations for roads included one from Stewart, B.C., to Cassiar; another from Teslin to the junction of the Pelly and Ross rivers at the settlement of Ross River, then following the north shore of the Ross river to the Yukon boundary. The program at that time also included a road from Flat Creek to Fort McPherson along with another road from Mayo or Keno to the Wind river area. There were other roads, all of which have been mentioned, if not here, in the committee on mines, forests and waters. I will not mention them all, but they were all included in the former government's submission to the Gordon economic commission.

In addition to these roads that were suggested by the former government to be built over a period of 15 years to 25 years, the Conservative party in the last election campaign claimed that they were going beyond this and build a road from Ross River to Norman Wells; one from the north shore of Great Slave lake to Prince Albert; another from Pine Point to Eskimo Point on Hudson bay; one from Uranium City to Prince Albert; there was one from Prince Albert to Flin Flon, Manitoba, and others too numerous to mention. There was also a road from Fort Churchill to Moose Factory, Ontario, which has been referred to in this house by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) as "the railroad from wigwam to wigwam". You will note, however, that Prince Albert plays a very important part in the road program suggested during the election campaign.

These were the promises of the Conservative party during the election campaign and it is to all these promises that I have referred as being pure baloney. I still say they are baloney.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question? If what you have just said is true, how do you explain that the projects are going ahead in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Hardie: The former projects which I mentioned were in the first instance recommended to the Gordon commission and are those which are going ahead at the present time. Above and beyond that, the Conservative party during the election campaign—particularly in my part of the country—was promising to build roads as I have named them, and there is no use in going all over them again. They just drew lines on a map and extended them, and called that the Conservative road program.

In speaking yesterday of the development of our resources the minister stressed that we first needed an inventory of our resources and his suggestion was that we should build the roads and then find the mines. I agree with the minister that there is a definite need for an inventory of our mineral resources, but the first thing that needs to be done is to accelerate the pace of the geological surveys, the magnetometer and electromagnetic surveys and other scientific surveys to indicate to prospectors, mining companies and private investors the areas in which there is a possibility of finding commercial ore. We have an example just this week in the stock which has climbed from 18 cents, where it stood last week, to $7.25 yesterday, the New Hosco mine. How did they find that mine? There was only one small outcropping, as I understand it, on the whole property, no showing at all, but they found that mine by electromagnetic, magnetometer and other scientific surveys which showed there were anomalies present. The company went in, spotted some holes and started drilling. As a result of these surveys they hit ore. There is no road to Hosco.

I might say as far as geological surveys are concerned which are so important in finding these areas and pointing them out to private investors, that last year, this government cut back when the field parties in the Northwest Territories had completed 80 per cent of their work. They pulled them out—and this is the important thing—they were pulled out before they had completed their job.

Mr. Nielsen: A third of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is up in the north now.

Mr. Hardie: I am talking about what they did last year, and in my opinion if this is an indication of what this government thinks of geological surveys, then their program is a phony.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member should get up to date.

Mr. Hardie: After first having indicated that there are anomalies and prospects of commercial ore, the next step in development to my mind is the building of airstrips in those areas so that private investors, mining companies and prospectors may go in and explore the ground, do the drilling and find the mines, block out the ore. The next step is to build roads to those mines.

On this subject I would like to quote from a press clipping entitled, "Airfields, not Roads Need in Far North". This clipping is dated April 8, 1958, and appeared in the Toronto Star and it quotes Mr. J. J. Byrne, the Chairman of Consolidated Discovery Yellowknife Mine and reads as follows:

> We hear a great deal these days about plans for the Northwest Territories, principal of which is an extensive road-building program to open up these vast areas. Our organization has had a quarter of a century of experience in the area, and it is our opinion that rather than spend vast sums in road building, that a small part of this money be used in building a number of landing fields in strategic areas selected by geological survey of Canada as being the most promising for the finding of mines, then to build the roads to the mines when they are found. The present resources roads—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member permit me to interrupt him, it being six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at six o'clock I was quoting from a press clipping to substantiate what I had said previously to the effect that when embarking upon a road to resources program the first requirement was to undertake geological surveys, magnetometer surveys, electromagnetic surveys and other scientific surveys to indicate to private investors, prospectors and mining companies the areas in which there may be a possibility of developing mines. I wish to quote again from the clipping to which I have referred:

> The present resources roads already planned are quite necessary, and should be completed, but this is the air age, and this means of transportation appeals to the prospector and developer alike. As an example, Consolidated Discovery does not yet have a road.

I might indicate at this point that this gold mine is located approximately 60 miles north of Yellowknife. It has been producing for the past five or six years and paying dividends to the shareholders. The article continues in these words:

> In the past, supplies were hauled by tractor during winter months, but now all freight is being delivered at the mine by Bristol plane, at competitive rates.
> This could be accomplished anywhere in the territories if landing strips were established, and these fields would also have considerable value for national defence.

I submit that my argument—

Mr. Baskin: You have not got an argument.

Mr. Hardie: If I had as little to argue about as you have, my boy, I should keep quiet.

Mr. Baskin: Is that right? Thank you.

Mr. Hardie: You are the hon. member for Baskinville, is that what they call it? His home town named a road after him the other day and now the hon. member feels he has to interject, to have something to talk about.

I submit that my argument is irrefutable. No hon. member could deny the logic of undertaking geological, magnetometer, electromagnetic and other scientific surveys first in planning a roads to resources program in order to indicate the areas in which the possibility exists of finding mines. The second step, of course, is to build airstrips in those areas so that prospectors, mining companies and investors can enter the area, commence drilling operations and discover commercial ore bodies. Once the commercial ore bodies are established then roads should be built to take out the ore and utilize it for the benefit of all Canadians.

In the speech he made some time ago in this house the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Pugh) referred to Okanagan Helicopters Limited, one of the largest companies of its kind in the world. It has undertaken many jobs for oil companies in locating deposits of gas and oil in certain areas of British Columbia, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. I feel sure that the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary will agree with me that in undertaking a roads to resources program we must first have airborne scientific surveys. The hon. gentleman will recall that in his speech to which I have already referred he recommended to this government that university students who are graduating today and who are going to the United States because of the lack of employment opportunities in Canada should be given an opportunity of employment in this country. I say to this government that if we accelerate geological surveys in Canada we will be able to employ every university student who is graduating today and who requires work. They could be put to work in surveys of this kind. I appeal to the government to take steps to accelerate, first and foremost, geological, magnetometer, electromagnetic and other scientific surveys so that we can pinpoint for private investors those areas that should be explored for ore deposits.

I wish now to refer to a report in the Edmonton Journal of May 28, 1958, commenting on what was said by Mr. C. L. Merrill, district administrator of the Northwest Territories, an employee of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, when he spoke before the Canadian association of geographers in Alberta.

The article reads in part as follows:

"In the most general terms we know we have a large area with much promise geologically," he said. However, he added, "before we count our chicks, we must find our eggs."

Mr. Merrill said the search is already in progress. Large, well-established firms with capital available for long-term investment are engaged in extensive exploratory work in the Arctic and sub-Arctic, he said. Major exploration is being carried out in the Mackenzie region for oil, he said.

In speaking of exploration for oil he went on to say:

This summer, a major oil company, using six helicopters carrying geologists, will survey about 50,000 square miles in and east of the Mackenzie delta around Aklavik, he said.

Increasing exploration may reveal some deposits which can be worked economically today although large-scale measures are restricted to companies with long-term objectives, Mr. Merrill said.

Further on the article states:

Mineral production will start when known deposits become economically available, but this is a matter of demand and timing.

This is what was said by the administrator of the Northwest Territories, resident in Fort Smith, an employee of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In any event, as Mr. Byrne said, in the financial statement of the company which was reported in the Toronto Star, present resource roads already planned are quite necessary and should be completed. He was referring to the present resource roads, namely the roads which the former administration had started. He said they should be completed.

The road system connecting the Mackenzie highway with Yellowknife, Fort Rae and Rayrock mines and in the future possibly the Great Bear lake extension, should be completed. As I mentioned, this road was started three years ago by the former administration and we hope it will be completed in 1960. I hope the minister will make a connection between this road and the Snare river hydro while he is at it. We have lots of friends over there; I think most of them would agree with me that they have a plan.

Mr. Morton: You have more friends over here than you have over there.

Mr. Hardie: To get back to the former administration's road policy—

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Morton: Let us look ahead.

Mr. Hardie: That is what I am trying to do. Mr. Speaker, if those empty heads over there want to make a speech I would suggest that time be allotted for that purpose. I understand that there is no reason actually for a vote tonight because there will be 42 minutes left that we can use tomorrow on this debate. I think time should be allotted for some of those fellows to tell the house how they feel about this particular motion; but to go on, and deal with the Mackenzie highway system to which I just referred. In addition, a survey was initiated by the former administration of a road from Fort Smith with connections to the Mackenzie highway through Fort Vermilion. It was the intention of the government of those days to start construction of the road this year. In my particular riding those two roads would connect settled communities where there are known resources. This is different from building a road from Pine Point to Eskimo Point. As a matter of fact, the original proposal of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to build a road to Port Radium—I am speaking of the recommendation of the former administration to the Gordon commission, and here I have a map —was to connect the settled community of Port Radium where Eldorado Mining and Refining started in 1932 or 1933 to produce uranium ore, the first uranium mine in the world. It was suggested in 1955, as I said, to the Gordon commission that this road should go to Port Radium. I notice on the present minister's plan that the same road is going to Port Radium. I have read in the mining journals of this country that the Port Radium mine of Eldorado Mining and Refining have about three years' ore ahead of them and this mine will close in three years or very close to it. I point this out to show the house the need for careful planning before we go into a road-to-resources program.

I should also like to suggest to the house that before we go building the road from Pine Point in the Northwest Territories to Eskimo Point on Hudson bay that we build a road connecting Hay River to Pine Point, Resolution, Rocher River and the east arm of Great Slave lake. I say this at this particular time because we understand that a railroad is going to be built to Pine Point, something we in the north have looked forward to for many years. By building the road that I have just suggested we will make it possible for known mineral areas and known deposits in the O'Connor lake and Snowdrift area to be shipped to Pine Point and thus give this proposed railroad a larger volume of backhaul, which I am sure the railroad companies are very interested in. At the same time, such a road would connect settled communities on the south shore of Great Slave lake.

Another road which I consider should be built in the immediate future—it was also proposed by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the Gordon commission in 1955—is the one connecting Yellowknife with the east arm of Great Slave lake where at the present time Taurcanis Mines Limited have sunk a shaft and are drifting into a known ore body. I feel, as many other people in the north feel, that this mine will come into production within the next few years.

I should also like to suggest, as the former administration suggested to the Gordon commission, the building of a road from Fort Nelson to connect with Fort Simpson, connecting Fort Nelson with Liard and Nahanni where there are great prospects of mineral development, and in the Fort Simpson area where there are prospects of oil development. Also, I might add, this road that I have suggested to the east arm of Great Slave lake where Taurcanis, we feel, will be producing in a few years could be extended to reach a deposit of lead and zinc worth $55 million. I would suggest that we go ahead with this road to the known resources before we start building a road, as I have said many times, from Pine Point to Eskimo Point.

We in the north, Mr. Speaker, have been looking forward for many years to the building of a railroad to the south shore of Great Slave lake and we did greet with enthusiasm the reference made to this project in the speech from the throne. In my opinion this railroad is important to the development of my particular part of the country and should be proceeded with immediately. I would hope that the scrap now developing between certain factions in northern Alberta and northern British Columbia as to the route the railroad should take will not delay the start of the project. With regard to this project I might point out to the house that under the former administration the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources spent a great deal of time and energy on preliminary studies which it was hoped would bring about the building of the railroad. The railway companies and the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which controls the huge lead-zinc resources at Pine Point were not much interested in the development of this property until a year and a half ago.

At that time the former administration asked the railroad companies to make an economic survey of routes for the railroad. I submit that the information gathered in this survey, which was, as I said, initiated by the former administration, is now the basis for the mention of the building of this railroad in the speech from the throne. Of course, the former government could not go ahead with the building of the railroad because they had not received the report. As a matter of fact the house has not had the report yet but apparently the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) has. We are all happy that he has and that the government is going to go ahead with the building of the railroad.

Many persons in the north and the minister himself have said that transportation is the key to northern development. Transportation is the key but at the same time it has to be cheap transportation. Over the past four or five years the former government did do something in this regard. Aids to navigation were improved tremendously. Airports were paved at Fort McMurray, Fort Smith and Yellowknife, and a new airport was built within the last two years at Aklavik in the Northwest Territories. These better facilities in the form of improved aids to navigation and paving of airports made it possible for the air lines to reduce their passenger and freight rates.

The crown-owned Northern Transportation Company and the Yellowknife Transport Company, which transport the bulk of the water freight by way of the Slave river, Great Slave lake and the Mackenzie river system, have reduced their rates in the past few years. Improved roads between the provinces and the settled communities of the north will enable the trucking companies to cut their rates. Further reductions in air and water rates are required to lower the cost of living and the cost of production in the north.

I submit that if rail rates can be subsidized in the maritimes and other areas in Canada there is every reason why subsidies should be paid to air line operators, charter aircraft operators and water transport carriers in the north to decrease the cost of production and the cost of living and to accelerate the development of our part of the country. As everyone knows, air transport has played a very important part in opening up the north and air transport will continue to play its part in the future development of our country. It is important, therefore, that the government should investigate ways and means of reducing air rates because, as I have said before, this would accelerate development.

To summarize at this point, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the government that it should go ahead with at least part of the plan of the former administration and build roads to known resources connecting settled communities. When I say "settled communities" I point out that our amendment suggests that we should do something by way of national development in the settled areas of Canada and these include, of course, the settled areas of the north.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hardie: Go right ahead.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) intimated to the house during the course of his speech—

Mr. Hardie: Are you making a speech or asking a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Inasmuch as the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) was not here during the course of the speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, I was advising the hon. member of what he said before putting the question.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member made a speech and after using up his forty minutes he asked for extra time to conclude it. The house was unanimous in giving him that extra time. If the house wants me to answer questions for hon. members on the other side I will do so if they will allow me to continue until ten o'clock this evening.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hardie: I did but you did not ask one.

Mr. Nielsen: I was trying to, Mr. Speaker. Does the hon. member for Mackenzie River agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres?

Mr. Hardie: The hon. member answered that question for me a moment ago because he said I was not in the house when the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres made his speech.

Mr. Nielsen: Will the hon. member permit a supplementary question?

[Mr. Hardie.]

Mr. Habel: Get another speech ready.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has now expired.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder whether the house will be good enough to do as was done in the case of the hon. member for the Yukon this afternoon and allow me extra time to finish my few, short remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What happened this afternoon and yesterday was actually an exception. There was a debate at one point yesterday which lasted ten minutes and another this afternoon which lasted five minutes. Consequently additional time was granted but that cannot become a practice. I wish to ask hon. members to please adhere as much as possible to the time allotted to them for their speeches. However, in the present instance, if it is the wish of the house that the hon. member for Mackenzie River be permitted to continue his remarks—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fraser: There are only 12 more minutes left before the vote.

Mr. Baskin: Tell us something new. Go on.

Mr. Hardie: If one looks over the records of the house since the hon. member came here one will see that he has had very little to say.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must repeat the question. Is it the unanimous wish of the house?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I therefore regret to advise the hon. member—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the house unanimously accorded the hon. member for the Yukon an extra five minutes, I believe. I would suggest that, in view of the fact the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) represents a northern constituency, the house, on reflection, would want to accord to him the same opportunity.

Mr. Nielsen: May I rise at this point—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to advise the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that this afternoon when permission was granted to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) to carry on with his remarks, there was unanimous consent. In the present instance the unanimous consent of the house to permit the hon. member for Mackenzie River to carry on his speech is lacking. I must, therefore, give the floor to the next speaker.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member might be permitted to continue so that perhaps he might reach one or two conclusions. But I appreciate, of course, the rules of this house, and within the short space of time I have I shall endeavour myself to reach some conclusion. I should like to refer back to comments which were made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in his most interesting dissertation when he moved his amendment. I shall quote but one paragraph, as reported on page 1964 of Hansard for July 7, 1958:

> We do not have to worry about these resources; they are there, and they will be of great value to the world in the years ahead. Surely the thing to do now is to plan and develop for those years ahead carefully and soundly and with all the vigour which is required by any particular policy.

The experience, in the development of resources is such that, sound as that policy may be, one cannot take any section of resources or development in any country of the world and say that it will be there in the years to come if we do nothing more than develop or exploit it to the point that it will be there when we require it. The fact of the matter is that in Alberta, as an example of one area which is developing its resources, we have learned by sad experience that unless you are in a position to make an assessment of what your resources are, unless you are able to determine the length and breadth of the resources, you are not able to introduce those conservation measures which are so essential. We find today, for example, that in Alberta we have mineable coal to the extent of 48 million tons; we are discovering oil at the rate of 300 million barrels per year; the remaining proven recoverable reserves of natural gas are estimated to be between 25 trillion and 27 trillion cubic feet.

Our experience has been this. Unless you are able to make an assessment of what you have, unless you can determine the area you have yet to develop, it is absolutely impossible to develop any conservation methods to apply to those areas, and I refer to the north in particular. Let us look and see what has happened since this government introduced certain measures to encourage the exploitation or development of our northern assets. I have not the current figures, but my information is sufficiently current to give an indication. We know that it is estimated that there are 750,000 acres available in the great pre-Cambrian shield for geological research in connection with oil reserves. We have added practically a new continent by encouraging people under the new oil and gas regulations, of the N. W. T. by making available new transportation facilities and by making available new access roads to these areas, to initiate probably the greatest drive for exploration of oil and development. It may yet even exceed the outstanding success of Alberta.

I suggest that this is already to the credit of this government. I am going to leave that section of policy which has been so ably presented to this house by the minister and the previous speaker. I should like to say a word about one of the instruments of government, the geological survey, to which the hon. member who has just taken his seat referred. I should like to refer also to the accompanying division of the mines and minerals branch. I regret that in past years this section of our government has been regarded as the poor relation. In spite of this it has carried out, in the interests of industry but not to the point of interference with the ordinary course of private enterprise, exhaustive surveys through the geological branch and analyses of the problems industry must face. There has been assistance and co-operation with industry and a vast fund of information made available which makes this country one of the leaders in research in respect to our mineral wealth. We spend slightly under $3 million a year for this department. I heard the hon. member who has just spoken pleading with the government to give consideration to providing some encouragement for youths who are leaving our educational institutions and looking for employment by taking them into this particular section, thus enabling them to find work and experience. This plan was introduced at the request of the Geological Association of Canada, and today the department has accepted their recommendation and is employing a third again as many over last year of young geologists coming from our schools. They are carrying out work under the geological survey of Canada.

I realize that in the time which is allotted to me I must arrive at a conclusion rather than make observations. We have had from our minister of northern affairs a statement with which I heartily concur to the effect that one of the principal assets of this government as compared with the former government is the policy of making some plans and taking some action in connection with the need for the development of our resources in Canada. As he stated, this is one of the great distinguishing features, the nature of the action that has been taken as compared with the lack of action. I suggest that when this government is in a position, through planning first of all with the Borden commission, to assess our energy sources in so far as their export and domestic use is concerned, then we will be in a position to introduce legislation to establish an energy board and give the resources of Canada not only the co-operation which has not been given them in the past but the opportunity to develop and plan for the future, and we will, as a government, have made the greatest contribution to future generations yet to come. I realize that there are others who wish to exploit particular areas to a point beyond that of which is good for all of Canada. These people are not limited to any one province.

The advantages of an energy board would be, first of all, to assess the wealth that we have in Canada and then to introduce such regulations as would be commensurate with the interests of the provinces and provide long range oil, natural gas, coal and water power policies for the good of our country.

Some hon. Members: Time, time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being 8.42 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 4(d) of standing order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment or amendments now before the house.

And the Clerk proceeding to announce the result of the vote:

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before the result of the vote is accepted I wish to point out to Your Honour that it has been the practice in the house that no vote should be cast after the Speaker has called the vote. As the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Bissonnette) came in after at least 50 per cent of the members had voted I would ask for a ruling in this case.

An hon. Member: Don't be so small-time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is quite true that hon. members must be in their seats when the vote is taken. Consequently, since the hon. member for Quebec West was not in his seat I will ask the Clerk to strike his name from the division list for the last vote.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Aren't you proud of yourself?

President Eisenhower's Visit—Security Arrangements

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I declare the amendment lost.

ALLEGED ACTIVITIES OF U.S. SECRET SERVICE AGENTS

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe the rule is that the motion must be put.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate should continue on the main motion. We are continuing with the main motion. The allowance of time for debate on this order is one day and forty-two minutes. Consequently, there are approximately 35 minutes left—

Mr. Green: I made a mistake, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate will now proceed on the main motion moved by Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) and seconded by Mr. Green that I do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I rise to raise a grievance based on very disturbing press reports involving matters about which this group is most concerned and also a good number of other people, namely, the infringement or reported infringement of Canadian rights by certain secret service agents of the government of the United States.

Mr. Grafftey: It is just hearsay.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member's taste is all in his mouth. You can see that.

Mr. Herridge: I want to illustrate my grievance—

Mr. Grafftey: I wish you wouldn't.

Mr. Herridge: —but before doing so I want to say that we in this group together with all Canadians welcome the visit of the President of the United States to this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: —as the president of a friendly nation.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Herridge: We recognize the great contribution that President Eisenhower has made in war and in peace. However, Mr. Speaker, we are genuinely disturbed by reliable press reports concerning certain incidents which indicate a lack of understanding on the part of these secret service agents of the United States, of Canadians, of their rights, of their ways, of their usages, and a complete lack of confidence in the ability and capacity of our Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I refer first of all to newspaper reports of the search of the residence of the representative of Her Majesty in Canada by these secret service agents of the United States accompanied, according to the newspaper reports, by an inspector of the R.C.M.P. Second, I refer to newspaper reports of a search of the residence of our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) by the same United States agents accompanied, I understand, by an inspector of the R.C.M.P.

While I heard some interruptions when I rose to speak, Mr. Speaker, I said that we were definitely disturbed about these reports and that is why I am raising this grievance tonight on behalf of this group. I am quite certain that while some of the hon. gentlemen opposite may jeer at me they will later be amazed at the number of members of their own party in Canada who will take the same point of view as we do tonight on this question. We consider that if these reports are true—

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is more than the usual noise in the house tonight.

An hon. Member: No wonder.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will hon. members kindly permit the hon. member for Kootenay West to continue his speech in silence, please.

Mr. Herridge: If these reports are true we consider these actions as a grave indignity against the representative of Her Majesty in Canada. We consider the same actions a grave indignity to the Prime Minister of this country. While he supports another party we in this group respect the Prime Minister of Canada. We consider that these actions represent a complete misunderstanding and transgression of the rights of the Canadian people. In addition, Mr. Speaker, if these reports are true we consider that these actions indicate that the Prime Minister, in respect of the incidents reported, has failed to take the firm stand we might expect by reason of former pronouncements on his part with respect to the sovereign rights of Canada.

There is also the question of newspaper reports to the effect that these secret agents may enter these buildings tomorrow. I have a newspaper article here from today's Ottawa Citizen headed, "Will Guards Carry Arms Into House", written by Mr. Bruce Philips of the Southam news service. I want to quote briefly from that; we think it is rather disturbing:

There is no doubt the president's 20-man bodyguard will be armed when they escort him on the public streets. Nor is there any doubt they will be spotted in the galleries when the president speaks. But whether they will be packing side arms in the house is something no one in authority seems prepared to disclose at the moment.

The Prime Minister's press secretary, Jim Nelson, asked whether the secret servicemen would be permitted to bring arms into the building, gave this surprising answer:

"I don't know. You'd better ask Jim Hagerty". Hagerty is the president's press secretary. Dutifully called, Mr. Hagerty didn't know either, although he promised to provide an answer later, which was more than any Canadian official promised.

We sincerely hope that these reports are incorrect, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Why don't you find out whether or not they are?

Mr. Herridge: It just so happens the reports are written by very responsible correspondents, and I am sure in good faith. If these reports are correct—

Mr. Grafftey: Why don't you find out?

Mr. Herridge: We suggest that if these reports are correct action be taken to make certain the rights of this parliament will be respected, and the usages and traditions of the Canadian people.

Now, in comparison with this, and before concluding, I want to bring to the attention of the members that when Her Majesty visited Canada, when the prime ministers of Great Britain visit Canada and when the heads of other states visit Canada, with the exception of one Scotland Yard inspector or some other security official, according to the best information I can obtain from reliable sources, they are quite willing to leave their security outside and inside these buildings to the capacity and efficiency of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In conclusion, I want to say this. I have raised this question on behalf of this group in this house at this time, and I am quite confident on behalf of a great number of Canadians who will welcome President Eisenhower to Canada but who are concerned about actions of this type undertaken by secret service agents of the government of the United States. Because of our concern for our Canadian traditions, our usages and rights which spring from Magna Carta and flow to this parliament, we trust this matter will be investigated, and if the reports are true the necessary action will be taken to protect those rights, traditions and usages.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Outrageous mischief.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

170. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates and the expenses of the international labour conferences (also includes the former Labour Gazette, women's bureau and manpower utilization votes), $1,067,166.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

304. Departmental administration, $1,886,095.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

112. Departmental administration, $2,369,041.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time and that, notwithstanding standing order 67 in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee to consist of Messrs. Bourbonnais, Brassard (Lapointe), Broome, Carter, Chevrier, Chown, Creaghan, Drysdale, Fisher, Fraser, Grills, Gundlock, Hardie, Kennedy, Loiselle, Martini, Mitchell, Monteith (Verdun), Pascoe, Robichaud, Robinson, Rowe, Rynard, Smith (Calgary South), Smith (Simcoe North) and Tasse.

He said: This motion, Mr. Speaker, is to appoint, as has been the practice for many years, a sessional committee to consider the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines.

The house will have noted that the name of the committee has been changed to include air lines. In addition to examining the accounts of the Canadian National the committee has also gone into the affairs of Trans-Canada Air Lines since the incorporation of that company, and it seems only appropriate that the name should take cognizance of air lines, and thus be more descriptive of the duties of the committee.

If it is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, it is my intention later today to ask leave to move that the Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines' reports and the auditor's reports which have already been tabled be referred to the committee, together with the items of estimates that are usually dealt with by the committee.

I might also advise the house that it is planned to have the sittings of the committee start on Monday, July 14, with the consideration of the Canadian National report as the first business.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): This is the motion, Mr. Speaker, which I understand is annually submitted to the house by the responsible minister, in this case the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), to establish a committee in order to discuss the operations of three government-owned and controlled enterprises, namely the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Steamships and the Trans-Canada Air Lines. It is the motion which affords an opportunity to members of the house to discuss the affairs of these three government-owned enterprises.

I say to the minister that I am somewhat disappointed in the fact he did not take the opportunity this evening to discuss some of the matters concerning these enterprises that are of importance to the house; some of the things that we have been interested in during this session and the last one. If my memory serves me rightly, we did not have the opportunity of discussing this matter during the last session.

When the minister was a member of the opposition he almost unfailingly took part in this debate on the motion to establish a special committee on railways, shipping and air lines and there were few occasions when he did not take advantage of the situation to take the then government to task and to criticize it rather severely for certain of its acts of omission or commission. Inside and outside the house he was critical of lay-offs in the Canadian National Railways. But I cannot help thinking that on this extremely important question of lay-offs in the Canadian National Railways, his outlook has changed since he has moved to the other side of the house.

When he was a member of the opposition lay-offs were deplorable; there was no excuse whatever for men being laid off by the Canadian National Railways in the various shops of that government enterprise from one end of the country to the other. The government was responsible. But now, since he has become the minister responsible for the Department of Transport and is the spokesman in this house for the Canadian National Railways he takes an entirely different view of the whole subject. On more than one occasion, in answer to questions in this house, he has given little information; he has said that it is a fact that lay-offs are deplorable, that they are regretted by the government but that they must take place from time to time. I want to draw to the attention of the house the fact that that is an entirely different tune from the one which was played by the minister when he sat on this side of the house.

Even the present Prime Minister was extremely critical of the lay-offs made by the Canadian National Railways. I recall what he said in 1956. His words can be found at page 1864 of Hansard of that year. He said this:

> The morale of Canadian National Railways employees today in most cases is lower than it has been at any time in my experience because the employees feel they are not receiving the consideration they deserve.

You will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that the present Prime Minister in those days, just like the present Minister of Transport, regarded lay-offs in an entirely different light from that in which he regards them at the present time. Now it is the Canadian National Railways management that is responsible for lay-offs; members of the government have nothing whatsoever to do with this extremely important question.

This brings me to another subject that is dear to the heart of the present Prime Minister and I want again to quote his words which can be found in the debates of the session of 1956, volume II, at page 1864:

> One of the things which would assist would be the removal of the present low level of the basic pension. It should be increased at least to $40 a month. That would not be very costly. I am speaking from memory but I believe that pensions today cost approximately 2.7 per cent of the total amount taken in by the Canadian National Railways. The increase in question would be infinitesimal having regard to the total amount of business done and would raise beyond words of description the morale of the employees of the railway company.

Of course it was not the first time that the hon. member for Prince Albert had spoken on this subject. As I said earlier, it is one that is dear to his heart. That fact no doubt explains why in the general election of 1957 we had a formal pledge as to C.N.R. pensions by the hon. member for Prince Albert, now the Prime Minister of Canada. He spoke on May 4 at Moncton and Campbellton in New Brunswick—and I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that when he spoke in those two cities his words certainly did not fall on deaf ears because there were a large number of employees of the Canadian National Railways who were particularly interested in what the Prime Minister would have to say concerning their problem. I therefore think it is safe to say that what he said fell on very sympathetic ears. I quote his words as reported by the Globe and Mail of May 6, 1957. Here they are:

> How can the government ask other employers to give their men and women benefits when crown corporations, for which the government is responsible, reward its faithful employees with pensions like this?

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister at that time was referring to the basic pensions which amounted to $25 per month and less which he said were being received by more than 3,000 retired C.N.R. employees. He pledged a Conservative government to revise pension regulations for retired railway employees, to remove what he called existing inequities and anomalies, and to provide a fair and reasonable basic pension. Mr. Speaker, the present government has been in office now for over a year. Certainly we have a right to ask them what they have done and what they intend to do with reference to this pledge given by the Conservative party to the Canadian National Railways retired employees. We have a right to ask them that, particularly in view of his words which I quoted from Hansard and the statement which he made as quoted from the Globe and Mail.

I should now like to turn to another matter, one which I am sure will interest the house, namely the question of transportation facilities in the Atlantic regions. While I am not free to refer to a debate which took place yesterday, I could not help but read the speech which was made by the Minister of Transport when dealing with a certain transportation and recall that he did not seem to be aware of the fact that an investigation had been started by the former Liberal administration into transportation facilities generally in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think the minister is listening at this point; he is preoccupied.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to bring to his attention, in case he was not aware of this fact,—he did not seem to be aware of it yesterday—a statement made by the former minister of finance, Hon. Mr. Harris, in a budget speech made on March 14, 1957, and which can be found in Hansard for that year, in the second volume thereof, at page 2219. I quote:

> In the view of the government we should now undertake a fresh and comprehensive examination of the entire transportation situation of the Atlantic provinces in order to determine what changes could contribute towards the economic welfare of the region.
> Among other questions, we should consider how best to supplement or improve some of the present means of transport in order to improve the transportation system generally. In this way it might be possible for the Atlantic region to get more value from the present level of federal expenditures in this field and from any increased funds that might become available.
> It is therefore the government's intention to launch an immediate review of the maritime transportation problem in general, and thereafter to put forward proposals as soon as feasible.

It is quite clear from that statement that the former administration did in fact launch an investigation into the transportation facilities of the maritime provinces, and did ask the Canadian National Railways, in particular, to give attention to that very important problem. Everyone knows of the part played by Canadian National Railways with respect to transportation facilities in those provinces; we know of the existence of their rail system in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; we know of their facilities in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, and we also recall that they provide and operate various services by sea along the Newfoundland coast, the ferry between the mainland and Prince Edward Island and the service between Bar Harbor and Yarmouth and so on. They were to tell the Department of Transport what changes in their opinion ought to be made in existing services so as to provide more adequate transportation facilities in the Atlantic provinces.

This motion which is being made to establish a committee on railways and shipping provides, it seems to me, an opportunity to ask the government, or more particularly to ask the minister, what has happened to this matter, and I would think that the minister should give to the house some information, firstly, as to what has happened with reference to the survey mentioned by the former minister the Hon. Mr. Harris and, secondly, what has been the result of the survey undertaken in the Atlantic provinces by the Canadian National Railways.

I would now like to deal with another matter which is of equal importance to the Atlantic provinces, namely the subsidies granted to those provinces under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Last year the Liberal government decided to increase from 20 to 30 per cent the subsidy on traffic movement out of what is known as the select territory into other parts of Canada. That increase was made because it was believed that by increasing the subsidy from 20 per cent to 30 per cent, in other words, making an increase of 50 per cent in the subvention on outbound traffic, that much would be accomplished towards meeting the changed conditions with respect to transportation which had come about since the subsidy was originally fixed, a good many years ago.

I know it is a fact that persons interested in transportation, particularly in the maritime provinces, expressed a good deal of satisfaction with the action taken by the previous administration. However, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) did not seem to think that that was enough, in fact, I believe I can quote words of his to indicate that even that increase from 20 to 30 per cent was not in his opinion sufficient. He promised an improvement in the present conditions under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. In fact, when he spoke at Minto, New Brunswick, on June 1 he said that enlargement of the federal subsidies on freight rates under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, that is, of course, the increase of 50 per cent made by the previous government on outbound movements from select territory, had been totally inadequate for the seaboard provinces.

Those who heard the Prime Minister confidently expected that the Conservative government, if elected to office, would further increase the subvention payable under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. Here again is another field of complete inactivity on the part of the government and I think on the establishment of this committee the house is entitled to know from the minister what, if anything, is being done about an increase in the maritime freight rates subsidy and why, if no consideration is being given to such an increase, what is the position in view of the statements made by the Prime Minister.

It seems to me that the Minister of Transport has shown an unusual change of outlook since he moved from this side of the house to the other side of the house. He has been quite silent today on a number of things concerning these three government-owned enterprises. I am disappointed that he has been silent in regard to so many subjects which are of interest to the house, to the Canadian National Railways, to the Canadian National Steamships, to the Trans-Canada Air Lines, as well as upon those transportation services which affect the Atlantic provinces.

There is one other subject upon which I would like to say a few words, and that is with respect to Canadian National Steamships, but perhaps I might call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the government leader what the business will be tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this motion. We had hoped then to take second reading of item No. 5, which is an act to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners. If the member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) is here we shall go ahead; otherwise we will be willing to defer discussion on this subject.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

Mr. Green: And then item No. 16, a resolution concerning returned soldiers' insurance, and item No. 17, a resolution concerning veterans insurance. The intention is to refer both of those bills to the standing committee on veterans affairs. Then item No. 12, a resolution concerning the Yukon; item No. 6, concerning Cape Breton Highlands national park; then item No. 4, second reading of the act to amend the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it the intention of the government to go on with government business on Thursday?

Mr. Green: Yes, but it will depend on how we get along tomorrow with these different items. We may take the budget resolutions.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

PUBLIC WORKS, GASPE COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 27—Mr. Bourget:

1. What work was done by the Department of Public Works in the county of Gaspe, during the fiscal year 1957-1958?

2. In each case (a) on what date was the work begun; (b) what was the cost of the work; (c) what are the names of the foremen, and what amount was paid to each of them?

R.C.M.P. DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Question No. 138—Mr. Howard:

1. Does the R.C.M.P. maintain any files or dossiers on members of parliament?

2. If so, upon which members of the present parliament are such files or dossiers maintained?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

All Royal Canadian Mounted Police files on individuals are confidential and many are secret. One of the primary duties of all those responsible for such files is to respect and preserve the confidential or secret nature of their contents.

It will be appreciated also that a large number of such files are started by reports, statements or knowledge of activities coming to the attention of responsible members of the police which they are bound to investigate in the course of their duties. The follow-up on such reports in many cases reveals no necessity for further action, yet there is still a file. This means that many files will be in existence under the names of individuals against whom there is nothing of a substantial, let alone a criminal, nature.

It will therefore be generally agreed that it would be grossly unfair to any such individual to have it revealed or even suspected that there exists a police file under his name, yet there may be many ways in which such a suspicion could be raised. One of the surest ways of laying the foundation for the raising of suspicion would be to isolate a group of individuals, such as members of parliament, start answering questions as to whether there are any files on any of them and then refuse —as would have to be done—to go any further when questioned as to the existence or non-existence of a file on a specific member or members of such group. But this is exactly the door which would be opened by an answer to this question.

Not only would this lead to the possibility of prejudice to an innocent individual, but if there were in fact with respect to any one or more members of such group a file or files which contained information serious enough to warrant further investigation, the success of the investigation and possibly the security of the state, might be seriously prejudiced by giving any information whatsoever.

It therefore follows that, both in order to protect innocent individuals on whom there may be files and to preserve the interests of the state, the answer must be that it is considered to be contrary to the public interest to give a specific answer to this question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 9, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

THE ARGENTINE

INDEPENDENCE DAY—EXPRESSION OF CONGRATULATIONS

Mr. Speaker: On July 1 I tabled a cablegram from the Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies of Argentina expressing through me to the House of Commons their cordial congratulations and good wishes on the occasion of the Canadian national holiday. Later I cabled my thanks on your behalf.

Today, July 9, is Argentina's Independence day. In appreciation of this event and of the courteous gesture which I have just mentioned, I am sure hon. members would wish me to express to the deputies and people of Argentina the most sincere congratulations of this house on the occasion of their Independence day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHEVRIER—REFERENCE TO OTTAWA "CITIZEN" REPORT OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On July 8 the Ottawa Citizen carried an article the headnote of which reads as follows: "No Liberals at Session of Committee." The report reads:

Not one Liberal showed up Monday when the veterans affairs committee of the commons began its examination of the operations of the Canadian pensions commission.

I am not a member of the committee but the hon. member for Humber-St. George's (Mr. Batten) is. He informs me that he arrived at the committee at 10.45 a.m. on July 7 and remained until adjournment, which I understand was at 12.30 p.m. I think this correction should be made. I am sure the reporter for the Citizen overlooked the presence of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER

INCLUSION OF ADDRESS TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT IN PROCEEDINGS OF TODAY

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier—

Mr. Chevrier: With great pleasure in my case.

Mr. Green: —the following motion:

That the address of the President of the United States of America, Mr. Dwight D. Eisenhower, delivered before the members of the Senate and of the House of Commons on this day, together with the introductory and related speeches, be included in the House of Commons Debates as an appendix and thus form part of the records of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I take it from the applause that it is the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion.

Motion agreed to.

[For text of addresses above referred to, see appendix, pages 2081-87.]

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That items numbered 170 to 180 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates 1958-59; and items numbered 571 to 573 inclusive, as listed in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, relating to the Department of Labour, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

On the order:

Notices of motions for the production of papers.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): In view of the understandable absence of the ministers involved in the motions for papers Nos. 15, 22 and 23, due to our special visitors, and since I have not spoken to them, may they stand?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): The Minister of Finance has advised me that he would be willing to have these orders go through today.

RESOURCE ROADS PROGRAM, ONTARIO

Motion No. 15—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence since September 1, 1957, between the federal government and the province of Ontario respecting cost sharing of a roads to resources program.

He said: I am sure the Minister of Public Works is referring to the next item.

Motion stands.

EXCISE TAX ON NON-CANADIAN PERIODICALS

Motion No. 22—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all briefs received by the Department of Finance since June 21, 1957, respecting the excise tax on special editions of non-Canadian periodicals and the general position of Canadian magazines.

Motion agreed to.

ESTATES TAX

Motion No. 23—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all national briefs received by the Department of Finance since January 29, 1958, providing criticisms of the Bill No. 248, session 1957-58, setting forth the pattern for an estates tax.

Motion agreed to.

STORM DESTRUCTION, MEGANTIC COUNTY—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Motion No. 24—Mr. Roberge:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, correspondence and other documents exchanged since August 3, 1957, between the federal government, the government of the province of Quebec and the city of Thetford Mines, concerning the assistance to be given in the Thetford Mines district, and elsewhere in the county of Megantic, following the torrential rain and inundation of August 3, 1957.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED CRITICISM OF ACT BY MONTREAL JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to the report in this morning's Montreal Gazette setting forth the strong criticism of a judge in arraignment court of the provision of the Unemployment Insurance Act which deprives a person of benefits if he obtains casual employment? Is it possible for the minister to inform the house whether consideration is being given to making the necessary changes to correct the situation? Can he also inform the house whether it is the intention of his department to introduce at this session any further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question I wish to inform him that I have not seen the article to which he refers. I will take the balance of his question as notice and give him an answer tomorrow.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE FAIR

BRUSSELS—RESIGNATION OF CHAPERONE OF STUDENT GUIDES—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he expects to table the letters concerning the Madame Bienvenue case that I asked for on June 26?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the hon. member had lost interest in the subject. I will table the letters now.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have asked for information from the officials of the house every day since I asked this question. I supposed that the minister himself had lost interest in that particular case.

Mr. Churchill: No, Mr. Speaker. When the question was first asked of me I said I would take it under consideration. The hon. member has not raised the question again since. I am quite prepared to table them.

Mr. Bourget: Am I to understand that the minister will table these letters today or tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Right now.

Mr. Bourget: Thank you.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to ask whether or not the report being prepared by Professor Clark regarding old age and survivors insurance and security in the United States is likely to be tabled before the end of July. In this connection the minister will likely want to bear in mind his reply of a few days ago. Also, when replying, will the minister indicate whether or not Professor Clark has been instructed that his terms of reference are fact-finding and not recommendatory?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member will recall, the terms under which Dr. Clark was instructed to make this study were according to the Prime Minister's announcement. I mentioned a few days ago that this study was progressing favourably, and that is the case. I have no doubt that the report will be presented just as soon as it is completed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister has entirely overlooked another feature of my question, namely whether or not Professor Clark will be precluded from making any recommendations.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The terms under which Dr. Clark was asked to make this survey did not, I believe, include any request for recommendations but purely a factual study. That is my recollection.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTE TO MR. SPEAKER'S RESPONSE TO ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is not a question, but I hope you will not rule me out of order. I would be remiss if I did not say at least a word on behalf of the opposition as to how much we appreciated your very fine response to the splendid address by the President of the United States this morning. I can only add, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure the President will carry back to Washington the conviction that we have an exceptionally fine Speaker in our House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member and the house. In the circumstances I can scarcely rule him out of order.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

TERRA NOVA NATIONAL PARK, NFLD.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources how soon he hopes to be able to table the return for which I asked, and to which the house agreed some days ago, with respect to employment in the Terra Nova national park.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I shall make inquiries and inform the hon. member.

Railways and Shipping Committee

(Translation):

COAL

DRUMHELLER—INQUIRY AS TO POSITION OF MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Has he been informed of the difficult position in which the Drumheller miners find themselves, and could he tell us if the government is considering assistance to that important mining industry in Alberta?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation. In fact the officials of my department have discussed the matter and taken it up with the Department of Labour and the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are now considering the matter in order to find some means of providing assistance to this mine and to local miners.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE GOVERNMENT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, July 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hees:

That a sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time and that, notwithstanding Standing Order 67 in relation to the limitation of the number of members, the said committee to consist of Messrs. Bourbonnais, Brassard (Lapointe), Broome, Carter, Chevrier, Chown, Creaghan, Drysdale, Fisher, Fraser, Grills, Gundlock, Hardie, Kennedy, Loiselle, Martini, Mitchell, Monteith (Verdun), Pascoe, Robichaud, Robinson, Rowe, Rynard, Smith (Calgary South), Smith (Simcoe North) and Tasse.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we resume discussion today on the motion of the Minister of Transport to establish the annual special sessional committee on railways and shipping, that is to say upon enterprises owned, controlled and operated by the government. When the house adjourned at ten o'clock last evening I was dealing with the Canadian National Steamships along with the Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines, government-owned enterprises to which the former administration had given particular attention down through the years.

This subject is one which I believe is of interest to all members of the house, though perhaps it might be considered as being of particular interest to those members who come from the Atlantic provinces. All that is necessary, however, is to read Hansard for a few years in order to appreciate what was said by members of the government when they were on this side of the house and to realize how the members of the Conservative party, when they were in opposition, were clamouring for increased services and facilities for the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships. They were loud in their advocacy of the extension of the service. They advocated, for example, adding additional refrigerated space in these ships so as to make the service between this country and the West Indies more efficient. They pointed to the fact that this service was important to the trade between Canada and the British West Indies, and how important the trade was to the Atlantic provinces; they stressed the usefulness of this link between Canada and what is now the federation.

When the government of the day followed the somewhat cautious course—perhaps it was too cautious—of announcing that the service would be continued on a year to year basis, the Conservative opposition criticized us very severely, perhaps with cause, because we had not placed the service on a more permanent basis. They did approve, however, of the action taken by the previous government to give a longer life to the service, and I think they were actually commendatory of the action taken by the previous government when it announced that it was intended to operate the service for a further period of five years notwithstanding the fact that there had been deficits in the past which, perhaps, were not too agreeable to pay.

In other words, while in opposition the Conservative party was strong in support of the service I think, too, that Canadians generally realized that it had great usefulness. It fostered trade with the West Indies. It provided a ready and continuing means of transportation between this country and the islands; it was a service which was economic as well as sentimental; it was a service which had existed down through the years and which, I believe, this country liked to see in operation.

And now that the opposition has become the government, what has happened? They had hardly been in office for more than a few months before the sabotaging of the Canadian National Steamships service to the West Indies began to take place; and I do not apologize for using this word because I believe that is exactly what took place, the sabotaging of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships. In fairness to the minister I am not holding him exclusively to blame for the outcome because I think that would not be exactly in accordance with tradition; but I find it extraordinary, in view of all that was said in the past by those who now sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, that members of parliament such as the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), who were so vocal in the past in their criticism of the government for not doing more, should have been party to the sabotaging of this steamship line and the discontinuance of its regular service between Canada and the West Indies.

Mr. Speaker, it is disappointing to those of us who sit on this side of the house to realize the manner in which the government consented to the transfer of the flag of the Canadian National Steamships to another country, and it would seem to me that the first thing—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not wish to restrict discussion improperly, but I ask the hon. gentleman to consider whether he is in order in dealing with the subject matter with which this committee would have to deal if it were established. As he well knows, the motion before the house is to establish a committee, to refer certain matters to it and to give it certain powers. Now, if I were to allow the hon. member to proceed to discuss the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships and any other subject matter which this committee might have referred to it by this resolution, there would be no limit to the discussion here. As I said, I do not want to limit discussion unnecessarily but I ask him to consider whether that would not create an impossible situation.

Mr. Chevrier: If I may be allowed to speak to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I may say that it has been the practice in this house over the years to allow the widest possible latitude in discussion upon the motion to establish this committee. I have not Hansard before me at the moment, but certainly in my experience in the years I was occupying the position which the minister occupies now, members of the House of Commons were allowed to rise in this debate and speak on matters concerning the Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships; particularly, sir, in view of the fact that many members are not on this committee and therefore would have no other opportunity of discussing these matters, save on this motion. It is true they could discuss them on other occasions, on the budget debate and on the speech from the throne, for instance. Therefore I say to you with respect that in the past this discussion has been allowed.

What I am proceeding to do now is not to enter into this subject in too much detail, but I would like to make a number of general references not only to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships but more particularly to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Of course if you rule me out of order I will accept the ruling, and that will be the end. I submit that in the past discussion has been allowed with pretty wide latitude. It would seem to me that I am in order in discussing the operations of those three government-owned enterprises.

Mr. Hees: If I might speak to the point of order also, I think the hon. member for Laurier is right when he says that in the past there was a pretty wide-ranging debate allowed on this motion. As far as I am concerned, as minister of the department, I would be perfectly willing to have any of these matters discussed as fully as hon. members would like to discuss them.

Mr. Benidickson: I am glad to hear those remarks by the Minister of Transport, because it just so happens that yesterday and last evening I was looking up some of the past debates when similar motions were before the house. I found that when the Prime Minister himself was a private member of the house he frequently made remarks of this kind on this motion, particularly with respect to pensions of C.N.R. employees. He pointed out that he was not likely to be a member of the committee and urged that the committee, when it undertook its deliberations, should look into increases in the pensions of C.N.R. employees. In similar speeches the Prime Minister, when he was a private member, indicated that he felt the question of competition with Trans-Canada Air Lines and other things should be looked into.

An hon. Member: Do two wrongs make a right?

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for reminding me of what has been done before. I must say I am not too happy about the idea of having duplicate debates. When this committee reports, the subject matter of its investigation will be before the house and open to debate and in the interval it will be debated before the committee. It is obviously the sense of the house today that some latitude should be allowed; therefore I am quite content, by leave of the house, to proceed along the lines suggested by the hon. members and minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not want you to think, Mr. Speaker, that I would wish to delay the establishment of this committee, because we on this side of the house support the motion. I shall try to be as brief as possible. Unless there are other members on this side who want to speak on this motion, I think, I shall be the only speaker; but I cannot assume that that will be the case. I thank the minister and my colleague the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) for their assistance on the point of order, and the very understanding attitude of Mr. Speaker.

May I go on and say that to those of us who sit on this side of the house it is disappointing that nothing, or very little, has been said during the course of this session about the activities of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, particularly by those who were so strong in their criticism of our action. What is extremely disappointing is that after all this criticism, which I mentioned earlier, was made by members who now sit on the government side, there should be this abrupt termination of the services of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships—again the minister may feel that I use a harsh expression—and the complete capitulation of the government in the face of difficulties which could have been and could still be overcome. Those who have followed the fortunes of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships can feel only a tremendous sense of disappointment that the government should have done so little to maintain this very important service to the West Indies.

I would now like to turn to another matter, sir, before I resume my seat, and it has to do with the activities of Trans-Canada Air Lines. At this time I want particularly to draw attention to the complete silence of the minister on this very important matter of Trans-Canada Air Lines services in Canada. I would like to put on record the attitude the minister adopted when he sat on this side of the house. He was very critical of the operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines at that time. I would like to quote from the debates of 1956, volume 2, page 1868, and I will overlook the interjections in the quotation I shall give:

> Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the thing I have never been able to understand is why the government insists on maintaining this T.C.A. monopoly after about 15 years of operation because any businessman knows that in any kind of business where competition is allowed to have full sway, both the public and the competing firms benefit. Everybody wins. The public benefit because they get cheaper prices and better service. The competing firms benefit because they are forced to remain efficient and to keep on improving their product and their service. Where monopoly is allowed to hold sway, as it has been for 15 years in the case of the T.C.A. then the organization becomes inefficient. Any businessman knows that, and I challenge any member of the house to refute that statement.

Here I would like to interject that there is no doubt, too, that the minister who was being extremely critical of T.C.A. when he was on this side of the house, if he could speak what is really in his mind, would say that there is no greater service than that performed by T.C.A. in aviation in this country, and that T.C.A. compares favourably with any other air line in the world. I continue:

If monopoly is allowed to be maintained, costs rise and service deteriorates.

Therefore it is quite clear, sir, from this quotation as to what was the attitude of the Minister of Transport in those days. Then I should like to put on Hansard another quotation in the same debate which, as Mr. Speaker can see, was quite lengthy and fairly wide in its scope. It is found on page 1869 of Hansard for March 6, 1956, and I again quote the present Minister of Transport:

What I say, Mr. Speaker, is, let us have competition in our air services in Canada. Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stop protecting his sacred cow, T.C.A., and let us have all-out competition—

"Let us have all-out competition."

—between T.C.A. and these lines that have applied to compete for passenger and freight traffic across Canada. As I have said, T.C.A. has nothing to worry about provided it can produce better and cheaper passenger and freight services. If it can, it will maintain its position. If it cannot, it will lose some of the business and, as in all competitive enterprise, the buying public will benefit. T.C.A. will benefit because it will then have to improve its services and efficiency to keep pace with those who are taking business from it. That is the essence of the competitive system. That is what makes business on the North American continent in particular such an outstanding example of what free enterprise can accomplish.

Again, in the last paragraph of his speech he said:

Let us have competition in our air services in Canada and put T.C.A. to the test to prove it is as good as it is claimed to be. If it is, then the public of Canada will be very well pleased.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chevrier: Well Mr. Speaker, in the face of this very positive statement made by the minister in 1956 and in the light of the very weak applause for the statement from the other side of the house, it is surprising to those of us who sit on this side of the house that the minister should have been so silent about the activities of Trans-Canada Air Lines. It would have seemed to me that one of the first things he would have done in rising to move the establishment of this committee would be to say something about this very vital matter. The minister, however, has not availed himself of the opportunity to make a statement to the house as to the policies to be followed by the government in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines and competition with it.

However, the minister did make a statement outside of the house. On February 7, just a few days after parliament was dissolved, he went up to Timmins and there he told a public meeting what the policy of the government was to be. As is pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), this was during the election campaign. I read from a report of the minister's speech as found in the Montreal Gazette and emanating from Timmins on February 7:

Elimination of Trans-Canada Air Lines' long-standing monopoly on domestic transcontinental air service was announced tonight by transport minister Hees . . . Private companies such as the big Canadian Pacific Airlines will be enabled to try for franchises on routes now covered by the publicly owned T.C.A. At the same time, T.C.A. will be able to apply for rights on routes flown by private lines.

In the first place, this was a very important statement of public policy. It should have been made in the house and not outside it. Again, being an important statement of public policy, it was a change from the policy followed by the previous administration and, a fortiori, announcement of it should have been made in the house. But we find on close examination of the Aeronautics Act that the minister went much further than he should have gone on that occasion. Perhaps first, Mr. Speaker, I should quote a portion of the speech the minister made so that I will not be accused of misrepresenting him. I succeeded in getting a copy of his speech made to the Porcupine chamber of commerce on February 7, 1958.

Mr. Benidickson: An election was coming along, wasn't it?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, unquestionably. I take this sentence from the speech:

—I am requesting the air transport board to proceed with a public hearing on the general need for additional transcontinental air services, since these two applications may not be the only ones to come forward, and the best method of proceeding would be a general hearing at which all interested parties, whether air lines or private groups or individuals, could submit briefs and be heard.

It is that statement of the minister with which I take issue. I take issue because I say that the statement is contrary to the provisions of the Aeronautics Act. Section 15, subsection 2, of the act provides:

No such licence shall be issued in respect of a commercial air service, owned, leased, controlled or operated by any person who is engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward by means other than aircraft unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such licence be issued.

My point is that under this section, while the air transport board can advise the governor in council, the air transport board does not have the right to issue the licence. That prerogative, in the case of a commercial service already operating by means other than aircraft, can only be granted by the governor in council. The minister is saying in effect in his speech that in principle the government is in favour of competition. Under the Aeronautics Act each air line must apply to the air transport board and establish public convenience and necessity as the reason for the granting of a licence. Unfortunately, however, what was overlooked entirely was the provision contained in section 15, subsection 2, that the granting of a licence in the case of an air line such as Trans-Canada Air Lines or Canadian Pacific Airlines must be done by the governor in council.

Therefore what I am saying is that both the air transport board and the minister of transport are prohibited under section 15, subsection 2, from granting a licence to an air carrier controlled by a surface carrier unless the governor in council is of the opinion that such a licence is in the public interest.

The third point I should like to make is that recently the minister tabled in the house sessional paper No. 197, from which I should like to quote. It is a report by Stephen F. Wheatcroft on air line competition in Canada. I wish to refer to this briefly, sir, because I know the position of the minister has altered considerably, first from the time he sat on this side of the house when he was in favour of all-out competition, then from the time he went up to Timmins where he said that the T.C.A. monopoly must cease; to now when he seems to be in favour of gradual competition. I should like to quote the second paragraph of his letter to Mr. Stephen F. Wheatcroft.

Mr. Hees: May I interject for a moment? As far as I am aware, at no time while I was at Timmins did I say that the T.C.A. monopoly must cease. That was the interpretation taken from my speech by those reporting it.

Mr. Chevrier: Since I was not there all I can say is that a moment ago I read accurately the report in the Gazette but I, of course, must accept the minister's statement. But be that as it may, the second paragraph of the letter which the minister addressed to Mr. Stephen F. Wheatcroft reads as follows. The letter is dated February 4, 1958, which is a few days before the Timmins speech, and I should like the house to pay particular attention to this paragraph:

I am of the view that the time has come for the introduction of some measure of competition on our transcontinental routes. The rapid growth in air line traffic would seem to indicate that competition can be introduced gradually, without major detrimental effects to existing operations, providing the changes are made with caution and on a gradual basis.

The minister has altered his opinion, not gradually but very radically, from the time he sat on this side to the time he wrote that letter. In the days when he sat on this side of the house he was in favour of all-out competition. The former minister of trade and commerce should cease protecting his sacred cow, he said. Today the position has altered, now that he has government responsibility.

Before I resume my seat may I just be allowed to cite one or two of the sections found in this report, which I must say is an excellent report and which vindicates the position taken by the former minister of trade and commerce with reference to T.C.A. On page 75 of the report it is said:

In the years up to 1961 there does not appear to be any possible change in the conclusion already reached about the routes of competitive traffic potential because aircraft size is likely to increase almost as rapidly as traffic growth.

Then farther down on the next page there is the following:

An examination of the possible effects of competition on T.C.A.'s financial position in the immediate future indicates that, unless it was strictly limited in extent, it would almost certainly lead the company to an over-all deficit. A competitive operation of five services daily in 1959 can be shown to be much too large a capacity increment for the transcontinental routes without causing serious financial difficulties: probably for both airlines.

Then the report goes on to say how embarrassing it may be to T.C.A. if competition were introduced at this time. So the conclusion to which I want to come with reference to the argument I am making concerning T.C.A. is this. There were three positions adopted, as I see them, by the minister. First there was the one of all-out competition when he sat on this side of the house. Next there was the one which I mentioned earlier and which he denied, namely elimination of Trans-Canada Air Lines' long-standing monopoly on domestic transcontinental routes as enunciated in Timmins. Finally there seems to be a third attitude, one of gradual competition as outlined in this report.

I think the house is entitled to know what is going to happen to this report. Is the government going to adopt the recommendations and conclusions of Mr. Wheatcroft as government policy? Is it going to instruct the air transport board to proceed to hold hearings, notwithstanding the provisions of section 15 (2) which indicate that in this kind of transcontinental operation it is not the air transport board but the governor in council who, in the final analysis, must hear the application and determine upon it.

Mr. Hees: May I answer that question now, Mr. Speaker? The purpose of the Wheatcroft report is to be a guide to the air transport board in the examination of applications made to it. As the hon. member for Laurier has said, and quite rightly, these decisions are decisions of the government made on the recommendations of the air transport board. This is true with respect to a licence of any kind, but as the hon. member knows very well, the decision is the decision of the government and the recommendation comes to it from the air transport board.

Mr. Chevrier: The point I was making was that we had no information to that effect. I think the minister owes it to the house to tell us what is the position. It was for that reason I was putting on the record those three positions that seem to me to be incongruous and to be contradictory. The minister has made a short interjection which gives the house some idea of what his intention is, but I think he should go much further when he has the opportunity later to enter this debate.

I have touched on a good many subjects relating to transportation in Canada and particularly these three government enterprises, the Canadian National Railways, Canadian National Steamships and Trans-Canada Air Lines. I should like now to conclude my remarks by asking the minister when he replies to tell us something about the Pine Point railway. It seems to me the government has maintained a very discreet silence with reference to that railway. The speech from the throne contained a statement to the effect that the railway would be built. Since there are many aspects of the question upon which information ought to be given to the house, I feel that during the discussion of this motion additional information should be provided in connection with the railway to Great Slave lake. In a word, we would like to be brought up to date on what the government and the Canadian National Railways are doing in regard to this important project.

I should have liked to take advantage of this occasion to say something further about the expansion of transportation facilities in Canada, the expansion of the facilities of Canadian National Railways while the government of which I was a member was in office, because I believe that what was done by the former administration with reference to transportation facilities, railway facilities, air facilities, is something that should be put on the record. Unfortunately I have not the time today, nor would I take advantage of the good humour of the house, to do that on this occasion. But I do hope to be able to indicate at some future time the glorious record of the Liberal administration in the field of transportation.

We believe, sir, that upon this motion we should put on record some of the feelings we have with regard to these government-owned enterprises. We believe, too, that this committee should be established in order to give an opportunity to the officers of Canadian National Railways, and of other government-owned enterprises, to submit their accounts and their respective annual reports. That is the purpose of the committee, during the sittings of which examination of the officers of these government enterprises will take place.

So, Mr. Speaker, because we believe not only in the utility of the discussion of this motion but also in the usefulness of the committee, we shall without the slightest hesitation warmly support the adoption of this motion.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): In rising to indicate the thoughts of the C.C.F. in relation to this motion I should like to say at the outset, after listening to the hon. member for Laurier, that I am sure many hon. members could dispense with ghost writers in the preparation of their remarks and merely review past issues of Hansard, as he has done in making his remarks concerning this particular motion. We remember the glorious record of the Liberal party, also, when it comes to the operation of Canadian National Railways and Canadian National Steamships.

Especially do the people in Prince Rupert remember the brutal and blunt way in which they allowed that company's shipyard to be removed in bits and pieces from Prince Rupert, thus removing one of the last possible hopes of expansion of the shipbuilding industry in the northern part of British Columbia or in the north coastal region. If that is part of the glorious record of the Liberal party, I would imagine it is one of the parts that he and other members of his party would like to forget.

But in any event there is one matter, Mr. Speaker, or one policy that is being shown here that I think is a most unwise one for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) to follow. I might say he is not alone in using this approach. Along with him are other members of the cabinet, notably the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) who a few days ago had somewhat the same approach. But if the Minister of Transport and his colleagues are going to continue with this policy and are going to persist in taking attitudes now which are at variance with those they took when they were on this side of the house; if they are going to adopt a policy of reversion on everything they had to say and admit how insincere they were—I cannot use the word "dishonest"—or to admit that they did not mean precisely what they were saying when they sat in opposition, then they are doing relatively little except lowering the stature of government in the eyes of the people of Canada and placing in a little bit lower position the opinions that people have of members of the House of Commons or of cabinet ministers.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I interject here, inasmuch as the hon. member has inferred—

Mr. Speaker: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Hees: It is a question of privilege. The hon. member has inferred that while the Conservative party was in opposition we were—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is no question of privilege.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker; it is a question of privilege. The hon. member has inferred that we were not sincere in what we said. We meant the things we said when we were in opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: Order.

Mr. Hees: We meant what we said when we were in opposition. If two or three years later, because of changing events, we have changed our opinion to some extent, that does not mean that we were not sincere at the time.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the minister was complaining of the use of the word "insincere" as a matter of privilege.

Mr. Hees: Yes; and the word "dishonest".

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member did not say "dishonest".

Mr. Speaker: The minister will recall that while the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) hinted that he would like to use that word, he deliberately refrained from doing so.

Mr. Pickersgill: He said he would not use it.

An hon. Member: He did use it.

Mr. Howard: This attitude is becoming all too prevalent. Certainly, as the Minister of Transport just said, it is perfectly all right to take a second look; it is perfectly legitimate to change your opinion on some subject matters. It might be all right for the Minister of Transport personally, in this particular case, to say that there was some justification for changing his mind. The point I am getting at is that that is the general attitude of the government itself. This is just another phase of it.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to remind the hon. member that we are not debating the general attitude of the government. We are debating a motion to establish a committee dealing with transportation.

Mr. Howard: Yes, I quite appreciate that fact, Mr. Speaker. I only expanded on that approach because of the question of privilege raised by the minister and said that he is part and parcel of this change of attitude. I think that is something that has to do with the establishment of this committee in view of the discussion entered upon by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) which was rather broad and rather general, and which dealt with a number of these subject matters. I mentioned the matter in that light. I did not wish to expand on it, except in so far as it was occasioned by the interjection of the Minister of Transport. However, I will cease dealing with that phase of the matter and merely say that there are one or two most important questions which must be considered by this committee and one or two most important attitudes of the Canadian National Railways which must be reviewed closely. I hope the Minister of Transport has not changed his mind on this particular phase of it or changed his opinion from that which he had when he sat over here in the opposition. I am referring to the apparently ruthless or callous disregard of the employees of the Canadian National Railways when it comes to lay-offs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lennard: The same old chestnut.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, some hon. members are making interjections. I do not mind interjections but I wish they would make them loudly enough so that I can hear them or make them in a formal way.

Mr. Lennard: The same old chestnut.

Mr. Howard: This attitude of the Canadian National Railways must be looked at closely and people must not just be turned out on the streets merely because that procedure appears to be the policy or the thing to do at that particular moment. In addition to that—and this is something closer to home—the Canadian National have a steamboat on the Pacific coast.

An hon. Member: Not a steamboat.

Mr. Howard: It does not operate under steam, no. They have a ship. It operates up and down that coast no more than three or four months out of the year. For the balance of the time, Mr. Speaker, it stands in mothballs accumulating deficits or losing money or whichever way the Canadian National want to classify it. This approach of the Canadian National—whether it is influenced by this policy of the government or whether it was influenced by the policy of the last government is something that I do not know—or this attitude of the Canadian National in not making available the full facilities that it should make available from the shipping point of view to the coast of British Columbia has resulted, first, in this particular boat piling up losses or piling up deficits; and, second, completely insufficient shipping facilities on the coast of British Columbia. I hope that the committee, in dealing with these things, will have some influence upon the Canadian National so that they will expand their shipping facilities on the coast of British Columbia so as to be able to embrace the entire passenger-freight shipping facilities on the coast and will bring some sense and some equitability to the situation which exists.

I have one other comment to make about Trans-Canada Air Lines. I mentioned this matter on another occasion in another place and I asked a question about it in this house on one occasion also. This comment also coincides with an attitude that the Minister of Transport used to have when he sat over here on the opposition side and which I think he still has. He is smiling, but I am sure he still has the same opinions. However, they may have been tempered somewhat by the responsibility of the office that he holds. Sitting in this house, Mr. Speaker, are many members who, with respect to availability to their homes, are not quite on the same level as are many other members. Those of us from the west coast, the mid-west and from the Atlantic coast are in somewhat an equal position when it comes to being able to keep in touch with the constituency, to return and visit regularly our families and friends, and to keep an eye on things generally. The proposal made by the minister when he was on this side of the house—and which I say he has certainly not abandoned—was that some provision should be made to balance the scale between the members from Ontario and Quebec particularly and the members from the extremities of the nation. This should especially be done inasmuch as we are progressing more and more into an air age when flying is becoming the predominant way of getting from one place to another. Some arrangement should be made in order that members from extreme points in the nation should be able, on a paid fare basis or some other basis, to get home at some time during the session.

I have no set ideas as to the application of this general proposal. Many suggestions have been made, one of which was that such an arrangement should apply outside of a certain radius from Ottawa and 500 miles and 1,000 miles have been mentioned as possible limits. I do not think that this is of too much concern to most hon. members. Another suggestion was made that it should apply in the same way as trip passes apply to employees of Trans-Canada Air Lines and that hon. members might be able to use that pass to fly on aircraft only when space is available and when no paying passengers are available to utilize space. I think that would be a generally acceptable and agreeable idea to hon. members who would like to participate in such a scheme.

It was also suggested that a direct payment by the treasury for transportation be made to Trans-Canada Air Lines once or twice during the year or during the session. As I say, I am sure most hon. members are not married to one thought, but we are certainly partial to the idea of being placed more on a par with our T to T members. I do not suggest that we should leave here via T.C.A. on Thursday night and come back on Tuesday morning every week, but I do feel that an arrangement should be made so that at some time during each session—every other month or something of that nature—we might be able to get home, see our families and friends and so on. Once one gets home, of course, it means that there will be problems to face with respect to one's constituents but these are most welcome and it would be an opportunity to keep in personal contact with constituents and in touch with matters concerning them.

I am not a member of this committee, but I hope that the committee members will deal with this matter at considerable length and will discuss proposals with officials of Trans-Canada Air Lines and with the minister in order to get the attitude of T.C.A. to the whole problem, to assess the question of costs and to assess the question of how many aircraft fly without a full pay load. As the minister knows, I have discussed this matter with him as a member of another committee. I trust the whole matter may be thoroughly canvassed so that we may be able to proceed with a view to allowing passes for trips to members from the eastern and western extremities of our country.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to make a few succinct remarks on the point raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) in relation to passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines and I address my remarks to this house as someone coming from the central part of our country and who, therefore, would not be affected by this matter. I would like to register my support for the members from distant parts of Canada.

I had great hopes of a solution to this problem, bearing in mind the comments of the minister. I had expected that when he came back to this house with a real majority he would be able to do something about the matter right away. Perhaps there is a hesitation on the part of the new government as a result of a too great majority in that it may be felt that since mainly Conservative members would be benefiting from such an arrangement this would arouse too much criticism. I know that this matter has been discussed in the Conservative caucus and for the first time since I came to Ottawa I tried to snoop a little bit on what went on in caucus with regard to this particular matter. I might say I was not very successful in discovering anything in this regard, and all I have noticed is the looks of chagrin on the faces of some western members, especially those from Vancouver. This has indicated to me that they are not making much progress on this point in the Conservative caucus.

As an Ontario member and as one who has been present in this house on Fridays and on Mondays I would like to say that I feel our western members and our members from the east are carrying the load, in a sense, in this House of Commons. Members from Ontario and Quebec are located within handy reach of their homes and are sometimes even able to carry on and develop two occupations, namely being members of parliament while they are also interested in some other line of endeavour. I know the press will probably take off to a certain extent and will say, if we go after this hon. members of parliament are grabbing another prerogative, but I think this is one prerogative we ought to go after, in the name of equity if for no other reason. In this way our western and eastern members will be on an equitable basis with other members in this house.

If it is going to be too expensive to set up an arrangement whereby members will receive passes as they do on railways, and this certainly seems to be logical, then some other intermediate measure as a compromise might be implemented. I certainly feel it is time for this matter to be brought before a committee and thoroughly explored.

Before sitting down I would like to say I am pleased that the minister was brave enough to stand up and admit that he is not completely consistent right down the line. I believe that in our political life of past years we have treasured consistency a little too much and I would like to compliment the minister for having the courage to say that he has altered his approach in this respect.

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I would like to concur in the remarks of the last two speakers. I think we should accept the proposal which I understand was made some time ago that space should be made available to members of parliament when no paying passengers require space.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank hon. members who have spoken in this debate for the views they have put forward and to assure them that I have taken careful note of their suggestions, which will be taken seriously.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked for some information regarding the progress which this government is making with the railways in reference to the railway to Pine Point. I am afraid I have no information for him because this matter is under very active study by the railways and by the government at the present time.

As soon as I have further information on the matter I will be very glad to give it to the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not going to deal with the very important questions referred to by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) with respect to lay-offs by T.C.A., etc? Surely, after the speech made by the hon. member one would expect the minister to give some elucidation to the house.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I tried to deal with the questions relating to T.C.A. two or three times while the hon. member for Laurier was speaking, and I do not think they require to be dealt with further at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not deal very effectively with them.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps I did not deal with them effectively.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Or at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Silence is golden.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS, BUDGETS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved:

That the annual reports from 1957 of the Canadian National Railways; Canadian National (West Indies)

Steamships Limited; Canadian National Railways securities trust; auditors' report to parliament in respect of the Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships for the year 1957, tabled on May 22, 1958; the budget for 1958 of the Canadian National Railways tabled on June 2, 1958; the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for 1957; the auditors' report to parliament on Trans-Canada Air Lines for the year 1957, tabled on May 23, 1958, and the budget for 1958 of Trans-Canada Air Lines, tabled on January 31, 1958, be referred to the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned or controlled by the government, and that items Nos. 431—Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals; 432—Newfoundland ferry and terminals; 442—Maritime Freight Rates Act; 443—Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, as listed in the main estimates 1958-59, and item 635—Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, as listed in the supplementary estimates 1958-59, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the said committee, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

RETURNED SOLDIERS' INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AMOUNT PAID TO BENEFICIARY AS ANNUITY, REMOVE RESTRICTIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act so as to increase the amount of insurance that may be paid to the beneficiary as an annuity in certain cases and to remove restrictions in payment of insurance in the case of pensioners.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister care to give us an explanation of this motion?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is preliminary to amendments to be made to the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. It is important, but I do not think it is very controversial. I do not think there are any objections from any source as far as the proposed resolution is concerned and I do not think it is controversial.

As a matter of fact, on a number of occasions in the committee on veterans affairs it has been recommended that certain amendments should be made to the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act, and these recommendations have come from hon. members in all sections of the house. I should like to make a short explanation regarding the resolution. It is not usual at this stage to give details of proposed legislation, but I am sure that hon. members will wish me to review the provisions in general terms, if only briefly.

Perhaps I should explain first that this act made life insurance available to veterans of world war I and their widows who, because of disability, might not have been able to obtain insurance commercially or, at best, might have had to pay an increased premium. The medical standards required by this act were very low. As a consequence, many seriously disabled returned soldiers obtained this insurance. It is of interest to note that in addition many others whose health was good applied for and were issued contracts.

The act was passed in 1920. The time limit for applications expired in 1923, but the act was reopened in 1928 and finally closed for the issue of new policies in 1933. The most important provision contained in the bill amending the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act is one which would repeal section 10 of the act which requires a deduction in the amount of insurance payable, and the return of premiums and interest thereon in lieu of the deduction, in the event that a pension under the Pension Act is awarded on the insured's death. This amendment would have the result of eliminating any future deductions and thus no policies would, on this account, be paid for less than the face amount.

The bill also proposes that the minister may, in his discretion, increase the lump sum payment of insurance money up to $1,000 above the present lump sum maximum of $2,000. His discretion is at present limited to amounts under $500. This will avoid the necessity of the payment of a comparatively small balance in the form of an annuity. Thus, a policy for $2,500 payable to a widow would at present require the payment of $500 in the form of an annuity. The usefulness of this payment and the administrative effort involved suggest that it is wise to modify this provision.

The remainder of the amendments are of an administrative nature involving the change of the expression "alternative beneficiary" to "contingent beneficiary". The latter expression is used in the Veterans Insurance Act and refers to similar classes of secondary beneficiaries. Administration would thus be simplified and the amendment would remove some uncertainty in the minds of policy holders as to whether the word "alternative" has the ordinary or a special meaning.

I do not think any further explanation is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: I think we ought to be in committee on this matter. The question was that I should leave the chair in order that this question should be dealt with. The discussion can proceed in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the very comprehensive statement made by the hon. minister and I agree that this is not a contentious matter and that it is one which, I am sure, can be dealt with more expeditiously and more adequately by the committee. I presume it is the minister's intention, after the discussion has been completed here, to refer this matter to the committee on veterans affairs on which we have some members, and with this brief statement I am prepared to content myself.

Mr. Herridge: I just arrived in time to have the delightful experience of finding the minister out of order for the first time in this house.

Mr. Brooks: Not seriously, I hope.

Mr. Herridge: Not seriously, but I enjoy these experiences.

I listened with interest to his explanation of the two, as I understand it, major amendments that will be to the advantage of the veterans. I understand that in the past some representations along these lines have been made. I am glad to see the minister introducing these two amendments.

As I understand it, the remainder of the amendments are purely to improve the administration of the act. Like the former speaker, I think this matter could be readily referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs, with little debate at this stage, where we shall have an opportunity to go into the details to much better advantage than in these circumstances.

Mr. Brooks: I thank the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Kootenay West for their consideration. It was our intention to ask that the bill be sent to the veterans affairs committee of which committee the hon. member for Kootenay West is a splendid member, where I am sure it will receive very careful attention.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Brooks thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-33, to amend the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Brooks: May I ask the unanimous consent of the house to have it read the second time now? I would like very much to see the bill go before the committee as soon as possible. The committee is set up.

Mr. Chevrier: By leave.

Mr. Speaker: The house has agreed to permit this bill to be read the second time now by unanimous consent.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I move, by leave, the second reading of Bill No. C-33, to amend the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

VETERANS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE AMOUNT PAID TO BENEFICIARY AS ANNUITY, REMOVE RESTRICTIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Veterans Insurance Act so as to increase the amount of insurance that may be paid to a beneficiary as an annuity in certain cases; to remove restrictions in payment of insurance in the case of pensioners and to extend the time limit for applications for insurance.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, the amendments that we are asking for to the Veterans Insurance Act are quite similar to those that we are asking for in the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act. As a matter of fact, the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act was an insurance act which granted insurance to veterans of the first world war. The Veterans Insurance Act is the insurance act which provided insurance for veterans of the second world war, for Korean veterans and others. As I stated in connection with the returned soldiers insurance bill, I am sure that hon. members will wish an explanation in general terms of the provisions of this bill.

The Veterans Insurance Act for veterans of world war II and their widows was passed in 1944. The first policies were issued on April 1, 1945. Initially, the period of eligibility to contract for this insurance was three years. It was subsequently extended to six years and eventually to December 31, 1954, or 10 years after discharge, whichever is the later. As with returned soldiers insurance, medical requirements are slight, thus enabling life insurance to be obtained which might not be available commercially except perhaps at a greatly increased rate of premium. Many persons with disabilities took advantage of this opportunity and, as before, many in good health also applied for and received contracts. This insurance subsequently became available to those who had served in the Korean theatre of operations and to their widows.

This bill proposes to extend the time limit to September 30, 1962, for Korea veterans whose eligibility now expires on October 31 of this year, and also proposes the same date, September 30, 1962, as the end of the period during which world war II veterans who have continued to serve in the regular forces may apply.

An amendment similar to that under the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act proposes to repeal section 10 of the act which requires a deduction to be made from the face value of a policy in the event that a pension under the Pension Act is awarded on the insured's death, thus eliminating any future deductions.

Another proposed amendment seeks, for this act also, to avoid the necessity for comparatively small annuity payments by allowing the minister, in his discretion, to permit payment in a lump sum up to $1,000 in addition to the maximum of $2,000 which the insured may designate under the present provisions of the act.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I made on the earlier resolution apply to this one with equal force. Since it is a resolution which is not contentious in its nature we feel again that it should be referred to the committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, like the previous speaker, may I say that my previous remarks apply in general to this bill because the bills are very similar in nature but I have one or two supplementary remarks. First of all, I am glad to see the minister introducing these two bills at this time. We are glad to know that the amendments or the benefits are being equally applied to both pieces of legislation, the Returned Soldiers' Insurance Act and the Veterans Insurance Act, and will apply equally, generally speaking, to veterans of the first world war, the second world war and the Korean war. I think that by establishing that principle in veterans insurance legislation we are going to improve the general understanding on the part of veterans and their dependants of the legislation because both cases are becoming very similar. At the same time it will remove the grounds for dissatisfaction which I think could easily arise if these benefits were given in one case and not also given in the other.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. Brooks thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-34, to amend the Veterans Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time; by leave of the house, now?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I move that the bill be now read the second time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the second reading?

Mr. Chevrier: By leave.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, by leave, and referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

YUKON ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING BORROWING AND LOANING OF MONEY, APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIALS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Yukon Act to broaden the purposes for which the commissioner of the Yukon territory may borrow or lend money; to authorize the appointment of deputy police magistrates and provide for them remuneration and allowances; to make it clear that the governor in council may appoint judicial as well as administrative officers; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement on this resolution?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, these amendments to the Yukon Act are somewhat similar to the amendments to the Northwest Territories Act passed by the house in the last parliament. At that time I promised the house that I would bring forward these amendments to the Yukon Act which have been in abeyance for two or three years in the department. I think the house will recognize that our responsibilities with regard to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories take us into the field of provincial and municipal government. These amendments are in the main routine and technical but I think any person who understands the transitional growth that is going on in the territories will recognize in these amendments forward steps in the administration and growth of our new parts of Canada towards provincial status.

There are five amendments in the bill to be introduced. The first four deal with administration. The first of the four extends the power of borrowing and lending money to the territorial government under the control of the governor in council. The second amendment provides for the appointment of deputy police magistrates in a similar fashion to the amendment to the Northwest Territories Act last year. The third amendment provides for the appointment of judicial officers who in this particular instance happen to be small debt officers. The fourth amendment is with regard to the importation of liquor into the territories. At the present time it can be imported only under licence from the commissioner. This amendment broadens the power in order to give the commissioner power to delegate someone else to give permission to import liquor into the territory where they have no provincial or territorial liquor board and therefore must import it from the neighbouring provinces.

The fifth amendment is not an administrative amendment. It is simply a boundary definition. At the time of setting up the Yukon boundary the territory was described in general terms which were neither precise nor satisfactory in the light of the survey definition that we require today. Therefore the fifth amendment is simply a precise survey description from detailed markers to indicate precisely the boundaries of the Yukon territory. With this explanation of the resolution I think I have given sufficient reasons to indicate the national interest in making these amendments at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have just a few brief remarks on the resolution brought forward by the minister and in support of it. I feel that it will do a lot towards achieving provincial status and autonomy eventually for the Yukon in much the same fashion as our good neighbour to the north, Alaska, has very recently achieved statehood.

The amendment concerning the borrowing and lending of money will enable all municipalities in the Yukon to enter more widely into the field of municipal improvements such as low rental housing, paving, new road construction, hospital services and the like. Those services have perhaps been progressing a little slowly in the more outlying communities in the Yukon because of lack of funds. This amendment will allow the municipalities concerned through the territorial government, to borrow the funds necessary to accomplish such projects.

The amendment respecting the appointment of deputy police magistrates is a welcome step forward. The Yukon territory has one police magistrate whose jurisdiction covers over 203,000 square miles. Inasmuch as it is the government's intention, I am sure, to provide a first-class system for the administration of justice, I am sure all members will agree that we cannot allow that system to be thwarted or frustrated by distance or by terrain. The magistrate at Whitehorse is a very busy man and I am sure that the amendment will alleviate a good deal of the load he now has to carry. I do not mean to convey by these remarks that the Yukon is lawless but I wish to assure hon. members that the court is very busy. At the moment the magistrate has civil jurisdiction as well and, of course, he cannot be everywhere at once.

The amendment with regard to small debt officials is, of course, a very welcome step forward as is the boundary amendment which finally and in technical form delineates the boundary of the Yukon territory.

Finally, the amendment regarding the transportation of liquor into the Yukon comes as a very welcome step forward inasmuch as heretofore it was impossible, if the commissioner was away, to keep stocks on hand, as it were. I see in the amendments, especially the one concerning extension of the powers of the commissioner to borrow and lend money, a very firm and long step forward to Yukon finally achieving provincial status.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could put one question to the minister. I must apologize to him. I admit at once that the question is not strictly relevant and if he is not in a position to answer it I do not intend to press it. He mentioned the power to import liquor. I wondered what the Yukon territory had done about the provisions in the most recent amendment to the Indian Act with respect to giving equal rights to the Indians to purchase liquor.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is aware, of course, that it is not strictly relevant but it has relevancy in that it does bear on our responsibilities in the territories. An order in council was passed by the federal government approving the territorial ordinance with regard to the right of Indians to drink in licensed premises in the Northwest Territories. That has gone through and I believe it already exists in the Yukon, if my memory serves me correctly. I think the hon. member for the Yukon would know more about the details of that.

Mr. Nielsen: If I may comment on that, Mr. Chairman, the Indian citizen in the Yukon has the right to purchase and consume beer on the premises. However, an Indian, that is one with Indian status, has not the right to purchase liquor at all or to be in possession of liquor. If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was thinking of liquor, then that comes within the jurisdiction of the territorial council which is, of course, fully responsible in so far as legislation concerning the consumption of liquor is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps the hon. gentleman has answered my question, but I believe on the point of law he is not quite right. The most recent amendment to the Indian Act, with which I have a certain familiarity, does leave certain responsibilities with the federal government as well. However, he has answered my question and I have no desire to pursue the matter further.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-35, to amend the Yukon Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL PARKS

CAPE BRETON—PROVISION FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CERTAIN LANDS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the withdrawal of certain lands from Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the amendment to the National Parks Act affecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands national park is one that has a considerable story to it, which I shall run through in my statement on the resolution and then leave the debate on the details until second reading.

The purpose of changing the boundaries of Cape Breton national park is to provide for the Wreck Cove power development project in Nova Scotia. The National Parks Act does not allow for the exploitation of resources within a park boundary. Specifically, it does not allow for the use of water in a park for hydro purposes. However, if it can be shown that it is in the national interest to exploit a resource in a park, then the affected area must be taken out of the park. This is the purpose of the amending bill.

A request came from the Nova Scotia power commission to the federal government in November of 1956, and a joint federal-provincial body was set up to look into the question of power in this area, to make a survey and come to some mutual understanding. This report has been submitted to both governments and the recommendation is that ten square miles approximately be removed from the park to provide the necessary additional horsepower for the development of this plant. This area is in the south-central portion of the park.

It is a matter of interest that the last occasion when the parks department had to withdraw land from a national park was some three years ago, and it concerned the same park. At that time they took out thirteen square miles. It is a matter of regret, therefore, I am sure to all Canadians that it is found necessary in the national interest to remove these lands from our national park for hydro development. It is true that the lands in this particular area of the park are not as valuable, from a scenic point of view, as lands in other parts of the park. However, it is necessary, if we are to effectively provide for hydro development in Nova Scotia, to provide all the hydro we can for peaking purposes, and to increase the capacity of the Wreck Cove plant in proportion to the moneys spent.

On these grounds, therefore, that it is in the national interest, although with much regret, we introduce this amendment to take out these ten square miles. The federal government did, with the full co-operation of the provincial government of Nova Scotia, make an attempt to get an equal or greater area in some other portion of the Cape Breton highlands. We did look at an area to the northwest of the park but the scenery there was of a similar type and the situation was complicated by the fact there were a number of fishing villages there which would produce innumerable complexities in the administration of the national park. So, reluctantly, we had to turn down that particular proposal. What we did, however, was to make an agreement with the Nova Scotia government that they would give us land near the Champlain habitation, which has long been wanted by the national historic sites division of my department. In recompense for these ten square miles we have received from Nova Scotia a very valuable bit of property.

I should add that the provincial government showed complete sympathy with our dilemma in this particular case. I can assure the house that if anything worth while does come up in the future by means of which we could recoup our loss of territory in Cape Breton, I am sure we would have the full co-operation of the Nova Scotia government. It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to discuss these matters in detail because the bill is not before hon. members, nor can I indicate to them on a map what we have done. I would suggest, therefore, that this is all I need say at this stage.

Mr. Robichaud: It is not my intention at this stage to make a long statement which might delay the passage of this resolution. We of the official opposition have no idea whatever of opposing its passage. As the minister has explained, it is in the national interest to exploit this area and to remove these ten square miles from the Cape Breton national park in order to further hydro development in Nova Scotia.

The minister has mentioned that consideration was given to the replacement of this area by ground adjacent to the park, but there were complications because of fishing villages that were established in the area. I would suggest that it might have been a new venture for the department to have fishing villages in a national park as a special attraction to the tourists and the public in general. As fishing is one of our basic industries, it may have been worth while to give further consideration to the possibility of taking this new area as part of Cape Breton Highlands national park. However, again I wish to emphasize that we of the official opposition have no objection whatsoever to the present resolution.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say just one word of congratulation to the minister for having acquired the Champlain Habitation. I am sure that some people all over the country will appreciate it as another addition to our national heritage.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention at this time to say very much on this resolution. However, the few remarks I should like to put before the house are to the effect that while we understand that this is a development policy being put forward by the provincial government, I hope—while it is not my purpose to refer to what goes on in another legislature in the country—that the provincial government will move with great caution, because of the serious situation of the coal industry today, with regard to the developing of hydro power in this area.

I should like to make mention of the fact that I feel badly that we are losing part of the park, even although it is only ten miles and is an area which is quite a bit inland and which very few tourists or residents see or rarely have an opportunity to get into.

But I did not quite get all of the minister's remarks with regard to the proposed extension. In view of the fact that we already have fishing villages adjacent or somewhat close to the park I cannot see why the department and the minister would not take a careful, cautious and interested look at the idea of expanding the boundaries of the Cape Breton Highlands national park to the extent that it would continue further to the northern tip of Cape Breton Island, where it now cuts off at the entrance to the South Harbour road in the vicinity of Effie's Brook. The boundaries could continue on up along the coast, up through Cape North, Sugarloaf, Bay St. Lawrence and Capstick in Victoria county and continue on into Inverness county which is all very picturesque country. I daresay it is much more beautiful than many other parts of the park. I should like to request that the minister and his department give every consideration to this suggestion. In fact, I would ask for a complete survey at the earliest possible convenience, with the idea in mind of extending the boundaries of the park rather than reducing them. That will be the extent of my remarks at the moment, Mr. Chairman.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-36, to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands national park.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LAKE OF THE WOODS CONTROL BOARD

AMENDMENT ALTERING CONSTITUTION OF MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-25, to amend the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing the resolution on the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act I mentioned to the house that most of the amendments deal with the composition of the board; how in the past there had been two members from Ontario and two from the federal government and how the new bill would provide for two from Ontario, one from the federal government and one from Manitoba; and how this dealt with power in the Lake of the Woods area in Ontario. My statement on second reading will be in greater detail and will deal with some of the historical aspects of this development. I shall have to be extremely precise in my statements because this deals with the affairs of two other governments besides the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the government to introduce at this time amendments to the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921. These amendments are to provide authority for the control of waters diverted from lake St. Joseph in the Albany river system to lac Seul in the English river system by the Lake of the Woods control board which was established by the act of 1921, and also to provide for representation from the province of Manitoba on that board.

In view of the fact that the Lake of the Woods control board has been functioning in an administrative capacity for over 30 years, I will outline only briefly the circumstances which led to the original formation of the board and point out the additional responsibilities which have been vested in the board in the intervening years. This background material, I believe, may assist the members in grasping the salient features of one of the latest developments in regard to the supply of energy in this area and also give a broader understanding of the factors which necessitate amendments to the existing legislation.

The Lake of the Woods Control Board Act, 1921 established the Lake of the Woods control board to regulate the storage in and outflow from the Lake of the Woods. At that time the natural resources of Manitoba were administered by the government of Canada which also had an interest in the navigation and international aspects of the Lake of the Woods storage. The board, as established, consisted of two members for Canada and two members for Ontario. In 1930 administration of the natural resources of Manitoba was transferred to the government of that province, but the significance to Canada of the international and navigational features of this storage has continued and will do so in the foreseeable future.

The international feature continues to be of primary importance to the government of Canada, which has obligations under the Lake of the Woods treaty of 1925 for regulation of Lake of the Woods levels within carefully defined limits. The navigational feature has become secondary in importance as navigation on the lake is limited to tugs and other relatively small commercial and pleasure craft. The storage in the Lake of the Woods has continued to increase in importance to the province of Manitoba which has developed for power production almost the entire reach of the Winnipeg river in Manitoba downstream from the Lake of the Woods.

In 1928 the responsibility for regulation of storage in and outflow from lac Seul on the English river was assigned to this board by provincial and federal concurrent legislation, namely the Lac Seul Conservation Act, 1928.

In 1957 the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario constructed works to divert water from lake St. Joseph in the upper Albany river basin to lac Seul through the Root river. In order that the board might continue to regulate effectively the storage in and the outflow from lac Seul it is necessary that the act be amended to give the board authority to regulate the operation of the lake St. Joseph diversion works when the level of lac Seul rises above certain fixed elevations during particular months of the year.

Storage from the Lake of the Woods and lac Seul provides the water essential to the development of hydroelectric power on the Winnipeg and English rivers in northwestern Ontario and on the Winnipeg river in southeastern Manitoba. This river system supplies a very substantial portion of the hydroelectric power required by this area for the extensive mineral and timber industries in Ontario and the bulk of the industries and population of Manitoba, particularly the city of Winnipeg and vicinity. The additional water made available by diversion from lake St. Joseph is of substantial value both to Ontario and to Manitoba by the provision of greater amounts of hydroelectric power.

Ontario and Manitoba have agreed upon the division of power generated from the diverted waters and have interconnected their transmission networks for most effective operation. This changing pattern of storage makes it most desirable that Manitoba have official representation on the Lake of the Woods control board which necessitates the amendment of section 2 of the act to alter the board membership by the replacement of one of the two representatives for Canada and by one representative for Manitoba, with Ontario continuing to have two representatives.

The location of all of the reservoirs in Ontario makes this proportioned membership most appropriate. The amendment required to Section 3 (b) of this act now new subsection (c) will give the board authority over the lake St. Joseph diversion works so that if lac Seul is above certain fixed elevations during particular months of the year it will permit the board to regulate the storage in and outflow from lac Seul in the best interests of both provinces.

Other amendments required in the act cover minor changes caused by the amendment to Section 2.

I have been very precise in my statement of the historical background of this amendment to the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act. I would like, if I may, to make the house aware of the significance of what has happened between the two provinces, Manitoba and Ontario. Here we have the very pleasant circumstances of two provinces, with rivers originating in one province and flowing into the other province, getting together, pooling their resources and working out a mutual deal which gives a great advantage to both provinces. I think this sets a precedent for other provinces and, if necessary, to states of the union, whereby provinces and countries enjoying the waters of the same river basin, by pooling their efforts, can achieve a fair division and a much greater return by their co-operation than they could by working separately.

To those who are not familiar with this area—and I except the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson)—

Mr. Pickersgill: And also for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —the situation is somewhat as follows: The Lake of the Woods is, I believe, the tenth largest fresh water lake in the world. Rainy river and other short rivers flow into this Lake of the Woods and the water moves northward along the western boundary of Ontario and goes into the Winnipeg river which, in turn, is joined downstream by the English river. The English river derives its waters to some extent from Eagle lake, but mostly from the lac Seul system and, in 1928, when they added the lac Seul system to the Lake of the Woods, they pooled the two basins under the one control authority, which meant that this control board had jurisdiction over the levels of water for the areas not only of the Lake of the Woods but also of the lac Seul basin, which waters flow into the same river as the waters of Lake of the Woods, and its tributary, namely the Winnipeg river.

If the maximum power is to be achieved by spreading the flow of this storage over the year there must be very careful control and synchronization of the flow of waters out of these river basins. This has worked for over 30 years in so far as the Lake of the Woods is concerned and for 20 years in so far as lac Seul and the Lake of the Woods are concerned. An historic occasion has now occurred in that they have gone into a new river basin, one which flows into the Hudson bay and, by putting in a diversion or a dam, they have been able to direct the water of the Albany river system back into the lac Seul system and from there into the English river and into the Winnipeg river, thereby creating tremendously increased storage. This has given to the provinces of Ontario and Manitoba increased power at much lower cost than would have been provided by working alone.

I may say in pointing out the significance of this diversion that if the water levels at lac Seul are high and they did not need the water in the lake St. Joseph region, they could let the water flow back down through the Albany river. The result of all this planning on the parts of the governments of Ontario and Manitoba has made it possible, as I said before, not only for larger amounts of power to be available but for the provision of cheaper power and much firmer power over the whole year.

It has, of course, brought the federal government into the picture because, if you bring in water from other drainage basins in an area such as lake Winnipeg which is already draining the Lake of the Woods and lac Seul, then you add to the water supply of lake Winnipeg and regions below. Naturally the interests of the people of the lake Winnipeg area and those areas below it must be protected. There is the question of flood damage control as well as the question of power, which must be considered, and the technique of protecting these people downstream is covered by holding back the river and the lakes and the storage basins higher up. This is where the interest of the federal government comes in.

The boundary between the United States of America and Canada runs along the Rainy river and cuts off the southwestern corner of the Lake of the Woods, the lowlying lands on the south shores of the Lake of the Woods and, likewise in the United States, the banks of the Rainy river. Therefore, if the level of the water in the Lake of the Woods were to go high enough, under our convention with the United States of America dated 1925 and under the over-all jurisdiction of the international joint commission and the administration by the international board of control this control of the area is taken from the Lake of the Woods control board, which is made up of Canadians, and shifted over to an international board. That is the means whereby our international responsibilities are carried out under this act and I mention this to the house to make absolutely certain that everyone understands that we are fulfilling our international obligations by means of this control.

The bill has been in the hands of hon. members for some time and by reading through these amendments they will be able to judge the importance of them in dealing with the aspect of the changing composition of the board. Most of these changes relate to the lieutenant governor of Manitoba and the only significant change is the one in the third amendment where a new subsection is added.

Mr. Benidickson: That is 3 (c).

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, 3 (c).

Lake of the Woods Control Board

I intend to read it in order to put it into the records of the house. It is as follows:

To regulate and control the flow of waters into lac Seul through the lake St. Joseph diversion works when the level of lac Seul rises above the following elevations in any year, namely, 1168 feet in the period commencing the 1st day of February and ending the 31st day of May, 1170 feet in the period commencing the 1st day of July and ending the 31st day of December and 1169 feet in the months of January and June.

These levels are the levels on lac Seul and are, therefore, under the direction and control of the Canadian section of the Lake of the Woods control board. But as I said earlier, when the water level of the Lake of the Woods rises above a certain point control goes to the international board. I think these are the significant things in the amendment.

I might say a word or two about the proportion of the members on the board. Traditionally there have always been two federal members and two from Ontario. However, as the house may recall, in 1930 Manitoba won back control of its natural resources, but we continued to administer the levels of storage in the Lake of the Woods area even though this did affect the resources of Manitoba. It is only common justice we are doing now in giving Manitoba a voice on that board. We certainly have to maintain our voice in order to protect our international interest and, naturally, Ontario, with most of the water in its area, has the right to two members. Both in Manitoba and Ontario, the provincial legislatures have in their latest sessions, passed legislation similar to this in order to make the composition of this new board possible.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, without wishing to hold up the house, I think it would be appropriate for me, as representing the area which chiefly supplies this watershed to which the minister has referred, to say a few words.

I am sure it gives the minister a great deal of satisfaction to introduce this bill and to speak to it in the very informed manner in which he has, because while he showed modesty in not telling the house that he was born within this domain I am sure it is a matter of pride to him that this was the case. It was also pleasant that while we were discussing this subject the hon. member who is my deskmate should have remarked to me that we were discussing here the most wonderful inland waterway in the world. I am quoting the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) who reminds me that he first became acquainted with this area two years after the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act had been introduced in this house.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Brooks: And he comes from Manitoba, of course.

Mr. Benidickson: And he comes from Manitoba as did I. One cannot, of course, in any way feel that the new composition of the board is not a desirable one, irrespective of the birthplace of either the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or myself. Our neighbours to the west, in Manitoba, have a great interest in the water levels in the area.

During the committee stage I should like to ask the minister a question or two, because although he is new in the department I am sure he has already informed himself on all these matters. I would point out that there did occur in the Lake of the Woods area in 1950 a certain amount of dissatisfaction which was never cleared up with respect to flooding which occurred in that year. I should like to find out, during the committee stage, to what extent people who have land rights on the lakes which have been referred to will be protected irrespective of the change in the composition of the board. I am of the opinion, and perhaps the minister when he speaks later on would indicate whether or not he agrees with me, that such people are perhaps better protected than they were before as a result of the diversion that was made possible last year providing to the power users in Manitoba via the Winnipeg river an alternative source of water flow by means of the diversion from lac St. Joseph and lac Seul. In other words, there would no longer be sole dependence on water-flow from the Lake of the Woods, and in consequence we might not have the same feeling, in the area where people reside, in Fort Frances and on the Rainy lake and in Kenora, and on the Lake of the Woods, and Minaki as we had in 1950, that because our waters were necessary to provide power further downstream in Manitoba the board might at times disregard residents' land and shore rights so far as water levels above are concerned.

I think that is all I am anxious to say at this stage; I have a few questions to ask on the sections of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clause 1—Establishment of the board.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two questions I should like to address to the minister. Is he able to inform the committee as to the investment that was made in the canal and dam which provides the diversion from lac Seul? Secondly, as he informed the house, this bill had its first reading some weeks ago. I wonder whether during the interval he has received any objections from the public and if so whether he would indicate from what source. Then I am concerned about the fact that this is a board composed of four people. Has the chairman, who it is stated will be a federal representative, any over-riding authority if there should be a tie in the voting? Finally, would the minister indicate to the committee the responsibility of the authority with respect to sharing claims for damages that might result from flooding in the area.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, there is one question I should like to deal with first, namely, how are the land rights protected under the new legislation? The answer is that there is no additional protection of land rights under the new legislation, which is simply an amendment to give Manitoba membership on the board as well as allowing for the taking in of this new area under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act. I would point out to the hon. member something which he knows, that this year with low water probable in the Lake of the Woods the position is strengthened by the fact that the diversion from the Albany will give additional water which is required so much in the Lake of the Woods.

As I understand the working out of the Lake of the Woods control board, they meet and they do receive information on the amounts of snow and all the other information, and from that they try to guide their decision in letting out the water.

As the hon. member has recognized, this is purely a matter of power between the two provinces of Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. Benidickson: Which power is now integrated.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, their flows are integrated.

Mr. Benidickson: There are connected transmission lines.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, there is an interconnection between them. The federal responsibility is navigation and with the levels affecting international obligations.

As I understand it, as far as land rights are concerned, the hon. member is thinking of the people upstream who are trying to get enough water in front of their property to operate.

Mr. Benidickson: I probably should have said this. As the minister knows, we have here a most important resort area, one of the most important in Canada. I suppose one can conceive of people having damage as a result of having their shoreline damaged owing to inadequate amounts of water as a result of some artificial interference with the rights that were there when they took the properties over. Are there rights for individuals who might suffer as a result of water being too low owing to a decision reached by the board?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was right in my first statement. Under the Lake of the Woods Control Board Act they do have certain levels, maximums and minimums. When there is a maximum the international board takes over and when there is a minimum they have to stop draining the lake.

As far as we know in the department the only recourse that any person has who has land rights is to go to law and sue. I suppose the government of Ontario, or the government of Manitoba, as the case may be,—in this case it is the government of Ontario —is the interested party. I am very sorry, I cannot answer these legal questions. My deputy knows no more about it than I do.

Mr. Benidickson: My recollection is not necessarily good on this but I do recall that we had damage claims again about 1937. My recollection is that they were due to flooding but that there was a federal contribution at that time. The claims were probably assessed by a provincial organization but a contribution was paid by the federal government. That is why I asked the question as to the percentage of the responsibility for damage claims in practice or by law under this board.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member has information which is not available to us at the moment. As I understand it, he has said that there were claims for damages in 1937 in which the federal government participated. We know nothing about that in the department.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister did not yet reply to the question as to whether or not there had been any objections received by him to the bill since it was given first reading and became public knowledge.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There are two questions that I would like to answer at the one time. We have had no complaints from anybody on this bill. Of course, the two governments concerned have passed enabling legislation.

The hon. member asked another question earlier on which I was trying to get some information. He asked, if there was a division of opinion between Ontario and Manitoba, how would the board members vote. As a matter of fact, as I understand it, if there is a clash between Ontario and Manitoba they do not vote. Manitoba and Ontario have separate agreements of their own which lay down conditions of downstream benefits, proportions of contributions, damages, and so on.

I was looking through my file and I have not in my file a copy of that regulation. However, here is a copy of the agreement. This is included in the new bill from Ontario and is dated 1958. Section 18 of the agreement between Ontario and Manitoba reads:

> Manitoba and the board shall indemnify and save harmless Ontario and the commission of, from and against any and all loss, costs and damages to which Ontario or the commission shall be put or shall suffer arising or resulting in any manner whatsoever within the province of Manitoba from the introduction into the Winnipeg river of the diverted water to the extent permitted by this agreement, and Ontario and the commission shall indemnify and save harmless Manitoba and the board of, from and against any and all loss, costs and damages to which Manitoba or the board shall be put or shall suffer arising or resulting in any manner whatsoever within the province of Ontario from the introduction into lac Seul, the English river and the Winnipeg river of the diverted water as permitted by this agreement or the diversion of such water from lake St. Joseph and its normal water courses.

This is the agreement which was included in the bill in Ontario. As I understand it, each one saves harmless the other when the damage is owing to their respective actions.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister make a comment as to whether or not there is likely less mutuality now or more since the diversion from lake St. Joseph? Formerly there were many people in Ontario who might have suffered damage as a result of the board's decision because of the pressures that would be made by the power interest in Manitoba. Would he say now that because of the diversion and the integration of power made available in the two areas perhaps the English river power development in Ontario and the Winnipeg river power development in Manitoba are now more mutually interested in the whole? Perhaps henceforth in the two provinces there is not the same rivalry or differences?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member has put it very well. This agreement between the two provinces ends long years of difficulties between them and particularly this concept of the downstream party recognizing that by moneys spent for storage and facilities in the other party's area, the upstream area, they achieve downstream benefits and they contribute part of the advantage back in the form of extra power—whatever the agreement calls for—to the other party. In other words, they share the downstream advantages. I think by working together, as they have done in this case, as I have gathered from discussing this with the men who helped draft the agreement, even though the federal government is not interested in the details of the agreement but only in the international responsibilities, this ranks as one of the best examples in Canada of two parties working together to share downstream benefits not only to produce more power cheaply for both of them but also to give firmer power over the whole area.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? Now?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

LAKEHEAD HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION FOR MANAGEMENT AND DEVELOPMENT OF HARBOUR

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-26, to incorporate the lakehead harbour commissioners.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works have for some time had representations brought to their attention urging the construction of a modern freight terminus at Port Arthur and Fort William with seaway depths from which freight might be unloaded from ship to both railway cars and motor trucks for local, northern and western distribution. Accordingly, last October an investigation was made by engineers and economists of the two departments of the harbour development at these two cities.

It was found that the freight terminals operated by the Canadian Pacific railway in Fort William and the Canadian National Railways in Port Arthur are obsolete, that there is no facility for unloading to motor transport and that seaway depth of 27 feet could not be provided at the berths because the foundations of the wharves would not permit additional dredging.

A recommendation was made that a new, modern terminus be constructed to handle all types of traffic and that the management of this terminus should be placed in the hands of harbour commissioners. This proposal was supported by the governments of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, Canadian National Railways and the Canadian trucking associations incorporated.

The city of Port Arthur has some 180 acres adjoining its boundary with Fort William and located on the waterfront, together with an equal area of water lot property. The city of Fort William has a small parcel adjoining this site, a relatively large water lot area and approximately 200 acres on the lakeward side of island No. 2. Both cities have agreed to make the property available to the commissioners for harbour development. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) announced in the house on June 6 that a consulting firm has been retained to carry out surveys and prepare plans for a lakehead harbour terminal estimated to cost $3 million to $4 million. The logical site for the terminus, if soil investigation proves its suitability, is astride the boundary between the two cities. The commissioners would also have harbour dues and water lot lease revenues, which last year amounted to $12,000 and $1,800 respectively.

The bill to incorporate a body to manage the harbours of Port Arthur and Fort William as one harbour, to be known as the lakehead harbour commissioners, is the logical forward step in the increased development that is expected upon completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. It is important not only to the immediate area but also as a distribution point that will serve the prairie provinces.

The bill is similar to the one passed in April, 1957, to incorporate the harbour commissioners for Windsor, Ontario, with the exception that as both Port Arthur and Fort William should have representation both city councils will each appoint one commissioner and three commissioners will be appointed by the governor in council. The commissioners will have jurisdiction over all the harbour fronting both the cities and, as is the case with the Windsor harbour, revenues remaining over the operating expenses, etc., will be paid to the receiver general.

I might say that when the bill is given second reading it is my intention to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I am sure the bill will commend itself to the house as a forward step in the development and expansion of traffic through the lakehead.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed with a great deal of pleasure that I welcome the introduction of Bill No. C-26 which will enable the establishment of a harbour commission for the lakehead and, what is more important of course, the construction of harbour installations which will provide facilities for ocean-going vessels. I welcome the statement of the minister because as far as Fort William and Port Arthur are concerned it is good news.

Fort William, being the largest city in northwestern Ontario, will be one of the principal beneficiaries. By saying so I do not wish to minimize the importance of the city of Port Arthur. As a matter of fact, by common consent with my friend, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), we look upon each city as being equal.

The coming of the St. Lawrence seaway will bring the oceans of the world to the door of this mid-continental heartland 1,250 miles from the city of Montreal. In its two cities, seven towns, 25 organized townships and 11 improvement districts live approximately 200,000 persons. They comprise but one-twenty-fifth of the population of the province of Ontario but inhabit more than half the province representing about one person per square mile.

In the speedy pace of the economic development of Canada during the past decade or since the war northwestern Ontario has achieved much. In gross production, in development of resources and industrial development it has made great strides. Its contribution to the national production has been estimated at more than $250 million annually. Yet this great area of immense potentiality and great promise is known little by the rest of Canada.

The lakehead ports of Fort William and Port Arthur handle upward of 11 million tons of freight each year, which is a greater tonnage than the combined freight cargo of Toronto and Hamilton. No accurate assessment can be made at the present time of the increase in tonnage after the seaway is in operation. An expansion is expected, but it will depend upon various factors such as the coastal trading regulations; seaway tolls; great lakes pilots and wage rates paid to seamen, which will definitely influence costs to foreign ships.

The grain trade is an international business, competitive on a world-wide basis. Consequently grain freight rates are protected at a low level by statute, and doubtless any burden placed upon this trade by harbour dues or tolls would be considered unwise.

I am not over-enthusiastic about the imposition of tolls. Before a definite policy is established in this regard it will be necessary to make a detailed study of the situation, especially when we are dealing with grain shipments and other price-sensitive commodities.

The movement of grain varies from year to year according to crop conditions, but especially in the light of world demand and supply and other market conditions. From time to time our 25 terminal elevators, and I am including all the elevators at the lakehead within the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William with their combined capacity of 93 million bushels, are not cleared promptly enough to prevent congestion.

The ore shipments from the Steep Rock iron mines are expected to reach 10 million tons by 1960 and be worth considerably more than $100 million or nearly four times the value of the 1956 production. The Steep Rock area is, in fact, a range rather than a mine and further exploration is expected to reveal an additional hundreds of millions of tons of rich ore to supply this continent for generations to come.

Then, there is the package goods trade of which fully 90 per cent is consigned to Winnipeg and the west, hence the interest of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta in the establishment of harbour facilities at the lakehead. The present freight sheds owned by the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canada Steamship Lines, as pointed out by the minister, are old and were not built to handle boat and highway truck traffic for which there was no need when these facilities were built.

Our geographical location, our grain and grain products, iron ore, pulp and paper, wood products, coal, oil and general cargo traffic, as well as our fast growing industries, are all reasons for the need of speedy development of our harbour. This bill is designed to set up a harbour commission for the purpose of operating facilities which will be constructed by the Department of Public Works, and which will serve the lakehead and western Canada for many years to come. There is a point or two that I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. Section 6 of the bill reads:

> Each commissioner appointed by the governor in council shall hold office during pleasure for such term not exceeding three years as is fixed by the governor in council, and at the expiration of his term of office may be reappointed.

There is no provision for the appointment of a new member in the case of death or resignation or for the reappointment of a commissioner at the expiration of the term of office. I feel that reappointment should be subject to the approval of the city council of the city concerned.

Then, section 10 reads:

> Subject to this act, the corporation has jurisdiction within the limits of the harbour, but nothing in this act—

[Mr. Badanai.]

Mr. Speaker: Order; I would remind the hon. member that we are debating second reading and it is the principle of the bill that is the subject of discussion. It would be appropriate to discuss the clauses of the bill in committee.

Mr. Badanai: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just going to go over some of the paragraphs, but I shall have the privilege of speaking when the bill comes before the committee.

In any event, I should like to say this. It seems to me that the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, who will contribute the land sites free of charge to the commission, should be placed in a position to share in any revenues that may be available at the end of each fiscal year. The bill does not make any such provision, and I think I am in order in saying that.

May I conclude by saying that if the government, as I believe it will, will give the lakehead harbour facilities befitting the potentialities of the district of Thunder bay, I want to assure them that the Liberals of the lakehead will thank the government; the Conservatives will thank the government and the C.C.F.'ers will thank the government and too, will thank the minister.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I believe, Mr. Speaker, in giving credit where credit is due and there is much credit due the government in this regard. If I might review history for a few minutes, I think you will see the point. We had an election on June 10, and as one involved in the campaign I often had the question thrown up to me: You know, if you are elected you are going to be in the opposition, so what could you possibly do for Port Arthur? What would the government possibly do for Port Arthur with you as a member, especially when we have such a distinguished cabinet minister as Mr. Howe? Well, Mr. Howe went, and I think it is worthwhile pointing out that Mr. Howe was not an advocate of this particular piece of legislation introduced by the government. His attitude, linked with that of Senator Paterson who is head of the Paterson Steamship Lines, was that the seaway development was going to be a long, slow process, and that at that time the lakehead did have facilities in charge of the railways which seemed adequate. There was no rush.

I recall during the election campaign that the Free Press, just before it switched to Howe after being against him for a while, had a cartoon in which Mr. Howe was depicted as sitting under a great big umbrella, and the umbrella was labelled "safe seat". Off in the distance somebody was fooling around with some harbour developments, but

Mr. Howe was ignoring the whole thing. After the last election this government began to show an interest in the protests which were launched by Mr. Jobin—I think he should be given credit—and the importunities of the Saskatchewan government. They felt it was quite possible the lakehead area was going to fall behind the United States lakehead area, that is Duluth and Superior, in being ready for this particular situation. The local people, therefore, rallied, and the member who previously spoke, as the mayor of the city of Fort William, and the council of the city of Port Arthur, began to get interested and this whole pattern began to develop.

But I must say again that we would not get really definitive action until there was a move by the government and the Minister of Transport was able to talk to the representatives of the cities, to the chambers of commerce, to the government officials of Manitoba, to listen to representations from other places in the west and to decide to go ahead with the bill.

In the last election campaign before March 31 again I was out on the hustings and people were saying: Now that Howe is gone, the main thing to do is to have another link in the Diefenbaker chain; why elect an opposition member to parliament which is all you will be. We will get such things as the lakehead harbour commission only in that way. As the minister and maybe some of the members of this house can gather, in the next electoral campaign, if I should be around fighting it, I shall have the opportunity of pointing to this magnificent terminal dock and of saying: Having an opposition member is not against you; these are the things you get for being an opposition member. So figuring on this election campaign four years from now, if I have the opportunity I shall be able gratefully to refer to this contribution to the lakehead economy and the economy of the whole country that the minister has introduced.

I have a few minor points that I want to make in detail but I will do that in committee, Mr. Speaker. Again I want to give credit where credit is due; and a great deal of it is due to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) for the part which was played by him and to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) in this matter. I hope it is a real indication that merit triumphs over everything in judging these particular cases.

As I sit down I should like to say that maybe there is an indication in this fact that we are going to have a board that operates and brings the two cities together. This may be an indication of what the mayor of Fort William, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai), has sought in the past. This may be an indication that eventually we are going to move to amalgamation and that within a very short time the Canadian lakehead can become one of the largest cities in Canada rather than remain, as is the situation at the present time, two cities that really in essence are one social and economic unit.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration Service—

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $674,164.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have had the opportunity of presenting the estimates of the Department of Agriculture to the committee. I do not intend to contribute to delaying their rapid passage through the committee by making a long speech. However, I think perhaps I should say something about the general situation of agriculture, particularly during the past year. It has been a year which has been marked by some difference in trends from the previous year and some of these I should like to draw attention to in particular.

Despite marketing problems associated with some agricultural products in 1957, the year was a reasonably successful one for Canadian agriculture. Farm cash income declined slightly from the 1956 level but it was $47 million higher than the average for the ten-year period 1948-1957 and higher than the amount realized in five years out of this ten-year period.

Smaller prairie grain crops were mainly responsible for the slight decline in farm cash income last year. In comparison with many recent years, growing conditions on the prairies were far from ideal. Although spring came early and the crop was planted in good time, cool weather in late spring and early summer retarded growth and plant development.

Over much of the region periods of extremely hot July weather, coupled with drying winds, inadequate moisture, and widely ranging hail storms resulted in reduced yields. These lower returns were only partly offset by higher returns from the sale of livestock and dairy products.

In contrast to the prairies, the rest of Canada in 1957 experienced generally excellent growing conditions for small grains, and most yields were well above recent averages. In Nova Scotia, unusually dry weather resulted in a hay shortage.

Perhaps the outstanding development in export trade last year occurred in the livestock industry. Despite the fact that domestic consumption of beef was at a record high level, about 21 per cent of commercial marketings in 1957 were exported as live cattle or beef. This represents a substantial increase in export trade, compared with only 4 per cent of total marketings in 1956. In the first quarter of this year—that is 1958—exports of cattle and beef were the equivalent of about 29 per cent of commercial marketings.

Another interesting feature of the agricultural export trade picture is that Canada has been the only one of the four major wheat exporting countries—that is the United States, Australia, Argentina and Canada—to have exports of wheat and flour in the current crop year at a higher level than in the same period a year earlier.

Exports of agricultural products in general this year are running about 12 per cent above those in the corresponding period last year, something which I think is a very encouraging sign indeed as far as the general agricultural picture is concerned in Canada in 1958.

On a regional basis, farm cash income was about the same in 1957 as in 1956 in Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and British Columbia, but lower in all other provinces.

The index of the physical volume of agricultural production—with 1935-39 being taken as 100—dropped to 130.5 from 169.2 the previous year, a very large decline in production. The sharpest declines were in the grain growing provinces. The fact that the decline in cash income was so small indicates better prices for many products. However, when grains and other field crops are taken into consideration, the general index of farm prices was slightly lower, dropping to 209.2 from 213.2.

The farm price situation has improved steadily in late 1957 and 1958, to a considerable extent I think since this government came into office and instituted new policies in connection with agriculture. Preliminary dominion bureau of statistics estimates place the index of farm prices of agricultural products at 240.7 in April compared with 237.1 in March. April is the fifth consecutive month witnessing a rise in the index. In other words, in the past six months the general level of agricultural prices has been upward.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Argue: Does he happen to have with him cost of production statistics for the same period, or the cost of production index?

Mr. Harkness: No; I have not that at the moment.

Mr. Argue: Does the minister know whether that index is higher than the index of agricultural prices based on the 1930 average?

Mr. Harkness: During the period which I have just outlined, namely the last six months, there has been very little change. I have in my hand a list of selected commodities, which includes most of the main items produced in Canada and which gives the prices for the first week of June, 1957 as compared with the first week of June, 1958. It indicates the situation in general this year as compared with the situation in the first week of June last year so far as farm prices are concerned, as follows: Cattle, good steers at Toronto, in 1957 were selling at $19.88 per cwt. and in 1958 at $24 per cwt.; hogs, grade A in Toronto, were $32.25 in 1957 and $34.50 in 1958; lambs in Toronto were $22 in 1957 and $24 in 1958; creamery butter, Canada first grade, Montreal, was 57 cents as compared with 63 cents; cheddar cheese in Ontario, f.o.b. warehouse, was 34 cents per pound as compared with 35 cents per pound and cheddar cheese in Quebec was 33½ cents per pound as compared with 32½ cents per pound; eggs, grade A large, at grading stations to wholesalers in Montreal, were 40 cents in 1957 as compared with 46 cents in 1958; in Halifax they were 38 cents as compared with 40 cents; in Toronto 36 cents as compared with 44 cents and in Winnipeg 37 cents as compared with 39 cents; turkeys, live No. 1, 10 to 20 pounds, Montreal, were 30 cents to 31 cents per pound in 1957 as compared with 34 to 35 cents per pound in 1958; fowl, live No. 1, 5 pounds and over at Toronto, were 19 to 20 cents per pound as compared with 23 to 24 cents per pound this year; potatoes, Canada No. 1, wholesale New Brunswick at Montreal, 75-pound bag, $1.65 to $1.75 in 1957 compared with $1.40 to $1.50 in 1958.

I would like the house to note the difference as an indication of the situation in the potato markets. Potatoes No. 1 in Manitoba, at Winnipeg, a 75-pound bag, in 1957 were 70 cents to $1 while in 1958 they were $3 to $3.50. This is one of the products in which we have a great variation from one part of the country to the other and from one market to another.

Wheat, Ontario No. 1, mixed winter wheat at shipping points, $1.34 per bushel last year compared with $1.51 per bushel this year; wheat No. 1 Northern, in store Fort William,

$1.63 per bushel in 1957 and $1.60½ in 1958. This is one of the few cases in which there has been a drop in price.

Oats, Ontario No. 2, 60 cents last year and 64 cents this year; oats, No. 2 C.W.—these are western oats—domestic and export in store at Fort William and Port Arthur, 75 cents a bushel last year and 75½ cents a bushel this year; barley, Ontario, 75 cents last year compared with 80 cents this year; barley, No. 3 C.W., in store Fort William and Port Arthur, $1.16 compared with $1.11 this year—another case in which there has been a drop.

Flax seed, No. 1 C.W., Winnipeg grain exchange, in store at Fort William and Port Arthur, $2.40 last year and $3.02 this year. These prices will give the committee some idea of the changes which have taken place; in nearly all cases the change has been upwards. It is as good an illustration as I know of what has happened during the past year as far as the prices of agricultural products are concerned.

As I have said, I think a great deal of the improvement has been as the result of policies followed by this government, including the introduction of the Agricultural Stabilization Act. This act, as most hon. members of the committee know, was the successor of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, and it went into effect on March 3 this year, having been approved by the last parliament at the end of January. There were a number of important changes from the old act; a formula was included for establishing a base price for any agricultural commodities. The board was commissioned to set up a price support on nine stated commodities at a level equivalent to at least 80 per cent of the base price, including cattle, hogs, sheep, eggs, butter, cheese, oats, wheat and barley, outside of designated Canadian wheat board areas.

For these nine commodities a support price was to be announced for a 12-month period and for any others that might be named the act indicated a one year period but allowed time limits if it should be felt necessary to meet a particular situation. This has been found necessary in the case of fruit and vegetables and the provision was included in the act to make it possible to handle these commodities when emergency situations arose.

An advisory board of farmers or representatives from farm organizations was appointed and the general intention of the act was to stabilize prices in order to help agriculture receive fair returns. Fifty million dollars was added to the revolving fund available for price stabilization, raising the total to $250 million. A considerable number of commodities have been stabilized under this act and the government has so far authorized 16 products in addition to turkeys and potatoes which were authorized under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which meant a total of 18 commodities under support of the stabilization act. The percentage of the base price at which these 16 commodities are supported is as follows:

Commodity	Percentage
Butter	107
Cheddar cheese	110
Dry skimmed milk	107
Hogs	84
Steers	80
Lambs	80
Wool	110
Eggs	85
Wheat	80
Oats	80
Barley	80
Sugar beets	93
Soybeans	90
B.C. tomatoes	112
Asparagus	86
Raspberries
(In frozen pack)	102
(In So_2 pack)	91

I have given these percentages to the committee because statements have been made in this house that prices were being stabilized at the minimum provided under the act. The majority of commodities for which a stabilized price has been announced has been supported at a price considerably above the minimum provided for and in a large number of cases considerably above the base price which is the average price for the last ten years. As I have stated, this means that there is a total of 18 commodities presently under some form of support program as compared with a maximum of six at any one time prior to June, 1957. In other words, we have under support at the present time three times as many commodities as had the previous government at any time under the old act.

Ever since taking office, of course, this government has received a large number of demands which have been in existence for many years past with respect to protection for Canadian agriculture. There are a number of reasons why Canadian agriculture needs protection, five of which are as follows:

1. The short growing season.

2. The long period during which livestock must be housed and fed.

3. A production season that follows peak production in the United States.

4. Long east-west hauls to market centres.

5. Greater exposure to competition from imports than is experienced by manufactured goods.

These reasons, then, account for the unfavourable position of agriculture compared with other segments of the economy, and explain why this government recognizes the need for greater protection.

There are several ways to give this protection without resorting to subsidies or forms of direct government expenditure. Authority is provided under the Customs Act to fix a fair market value for imports of any product from countries, other than those in the commonwealth, if their importation causes injury to Canadian producers. Valuations made under this authority apply for the purpose of assessing special dumping duties, which are added to the ordinary duties. Other means of protection would include tariff quotas, import controls, and establishment of state monopolies such as the Canadian wheat board.

I may say in this connection that there has been a very wide demand in the past year for the imposition of fair value for duty particularly on a wide range of fruit and vegetables. Under the GATT agreement we have to make out a case before fair value for duty can be declared and in a large number of these instances it has not been possible to make out a case which would justify making use of fair value for duty.

I should say something more with regard to exports, and go into a little more detail. Exports of agricultural products in 1957 amounted to $909 million. This was a little lower than the $1,013 million of the year before but higher than in 1954 and 1955. Agricultural exports continued to make up about 20 per cent of total commodity exports. Figures for the first five months of this year show that agricultural exports are continuing at a high level, running about 12 per cent above those in the corresponding period last year.

As stated earlier, Canada has been the only one of the four major wheat exporting countries to have exports of wheat and flour in the current crop year at a higher level than in the same period a year earlier. From last August 1 up to the end of March this year Canada exported 194 million bushels of wheat compared with 176 million in the corresponding period last year, an increase of about 10 per cent. Total wheat exports from all four countries were about 23 per cent lower in the August-March period this crop year than last. Canada has also increased her share of the total wheat trade, supplying 36 per cent of total wheat exports from the four countries compared with 25 per cent in the year earlier.

I think this increase in our wheat exports is one of the most favourable features as far as agriculture is concerned.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister tell us how much of that increase is due to gifts and long-term credit under the Colombo plan?

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: I have not the breakdown in figures available at the moment but the actual exports for cash were considerably higher during this period than in the same period a year earlier; our total share of the world cash trade was very much larger than it was a year ago.

Legislation proclaimed last November 25 provided for making cash advances on a quota of farm-stored grain in western Canada—50 cents a bushel for wheat, 20 cents for oats and 35 cents for barley. This materially aided the cash position of western farmers and the whole Canadian economy last winter and spring.

Now I should like to say something about a few other major commodities. First, cattle. Cattle represent, probably, the brightest spot in the last six or seven months in the entire agricultural picture.

Mr. Gour: That is right.

Mr. Harkness: Cattle and calves at June 1, 1957, numbered 11.3 million, 2.6 per cent more than in 1956, and an all time record. Net marketings—total less feeders returned to farms for further feeding—reached a record of 2.3 million head, an increase of 17 per cent over 1956. The record rate of output continued in the first quarter of 1958 when 602,000 head were marketed, a rise of 30 per cent over the first quarter of 1957. In other words, marketing has continued to increase so that it is 30 per cent higher in the first quarter of this year than in the first quarter of last year. Canadians consumed an average of 75 pounds of beef per person, slightly more than in 1956. This compared with a per person consumption of 55 pounds in 1935-39, and 60 pounds in 1946-50. The improvement in our cattle position has been due to a great extent to the fact that Canadians are eating more beef. That demand has meant better prices, of course, and also the possibility of greater production.

Although Canadians consumed a large proportion of the beef that was produced, about 21 per cent of commercial marketings were exported either as live cattle or beef, in 1957, compared with only 4 per cent of the total in 1956. In the first quarter of 1958 exports of cattle and beef were the equivalent of 175,000 head about 29 per cent of commercial marketings.

Some 376,000 head of cattle were exported in 1957, seven times as many as in 1956. The movement increased spectacularly in the last half of the year owing mainly to heavy sales of feeders to United States buyers. This heavy buying continued in the first quarter of 1958 with 141,000 head being exported, compared with only 8,000 head in the first quarter of 1957.

Exports of beef in 1957 amounted to 48.5 million pounds and were 13.8 million pounds in 1956. Exports of beef in the first quarter of 1958 continued to be large and totalled 15.7 million pounds compared with 2.9 million pounds in 1957.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will begin with budget resolutions, taking first the one having to do with succession duties and then, if these resolutions should go through, we will take the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: Do I take it that once the resolution on succession duties is through, if it gets through tomorrow, we will not consider other budgetary resolutions?

Mr. Green: Oh no, we will go on with the other budget resolutions. Probably the second one will be the resolutions concerning income tax.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the leader of the house tell us what the business is likely to be on Friday?

Mr. Green: We expect it will be either budget resolutions or agriculture estimates. I am not sure at the moment which will be called first.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

DORVAL TERMINAL BUILDING

Question No. 63—Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Have full and detailed plans regarding space to be allocated to air line companies in the new Dorval terminal building, under construction, been submitted to the said companies?
2. Have details as to the rental costs of such space been submitted to the said air line companies for consideration?
3. Has the Department of Transport any plans for alleviating the shortage of restaurant facilities, both in the present domestic and international terminals?
4. Will the Minister of Transport consider giving the public full details of the new terminal building at Dorval by exhibiting plans and drawings in a public place?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. Minimum costs have been indicated to the air line companies. Actual rental costs are under study and will be communicated to the air lines as soon as studies are completed.

3. The department expects to let a contract shortly for a temporary addition to the trans-Atlantic building (international terminal). This will alleviate restaurant facilities at this building.

4. Perspective drawings of the building and floor plan layouts have already had newspaper publication. Enlarged plans of the building, for exhibition in a public place, are in the process of preparation but completion has to be deferred until completion of other urgent construction drawings.

MARINE RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION, CARAQUET AND SHIPPEGAN, N.B.

Question No. 112—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the Minister of Public Works received any official representations or requests from the government of the province of New Brunswick, since June 10, 1957, requesting financial assistance for the construction of a marine railway or haul-up at Caraquet or Shippegan, Gloucester county, New Brunswick?
2. If so, has any decision been reached in this regard?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Representations were made prior to June 10, 1957. Since that date the Department of Public Works continued its consideration of the request until September, 1957, when arrangements were concluded to have the marine haul-out constructed by private interests.

2. Answered by No. 1.

LEVEL CROSSING PROTECTION, DOLLARD COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 121—Mr. Rouleau:

Since June 10, 1957, has the Minister of Transport or the board of transport commissioners received representations from Mr. Maurice Cousineau, mayor of St. Laurent, on the island of Montreal, requesting adequate protection at railway level crossings in the county of Dollard?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

No.

POST OFFICE BUILDING, PLESSISVILLE, QUE.

Question No. 126—Mr. Roberge:

1. On what date was the last call for tenders made in connection with a post office building at Plessisville, Quebec?
2. On what date were the tenders opened?
3. What are the names and addresses of those who requested plans and specifications?
4. What are the names and addresses of those who submitted tenders and what was the amount in each case?
5. Was the contract awarded?
6. If so, on what date and to whom?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. April 29, 1958.

2. June 11, 1958.

Questions

SHIPPING STATISTICS

Question No. 127—Mr. Chevrier:

1. At May 31, 1958, how many Canadian-owned ocean-going vessels of 1,000 gross registered tons or over were there, with their total gross registered and deadweight tonnage (a) on Canadian registry, classified as to dry cargo and tankers; (b) on any other registry subject to recall to Canadian registry by the Canadian government, classified as to dry cargo and tankers?

2. At May 31, 1958, had the sale of any of the vessels included in 1 been approved? If so, how many and what is their total gross registered and deadweight tonnage, classified as to dry cargo and tankers?

3. At May 31, 1958, under the replacement plan administered by the Canadian maritime commission, how many proposals for replacement vessels, with their total gross registered and deadweight tonnage, classified as dry cargo or tankers, has the Minister of Transport or the commission as the case may be, approved, and which are not included in 1?

4. How many of the vessels included in 1, with their gross registered and deadweight tonnage, were built during world war II for government account and subsequently sold to private owners?

5. On May 31, 1958, how many vessels with their gross registered and deadweight tonnage included in 1, were there laid up for reasons other than waiting or undergoing repairs, surveys or periodical drydocking or overhaul?

6. How many of these vessels with their gross registered and deadweight tonnage were built for government account during or following world war II?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. (a) 17 dry cargo vessels totalling 82,751 gross tons, 110,897 deadweight tons and 8 tankers totalling 96,252 gross tons, 148,915 deadweight tons; (b) 61 dry cargo vessels totalling 453,426 gross tons, 662,058 deadweight tons and no tankers were on United Kingdom registry under the special transfer arrangements.

2. The sale of two dry cargo vessels totalling 14,251 gross tons, 20,628 deadweight tons and no tankers had been approved.

3. 9 proposals for ocean-going replacement vessels were approved and not yet completed; they consisted of 5 dry cargo vessels totalling an estimated 63,900 deadweight tons and four tankers totalling an estimated 92,150 deadweight tons and did not include any vessels mentioned in 1; the gross tonnage is not available before measurement for registry.

4. 65 vessels totalling 429,898 gross tons, 622,363 deadweight tons.

5. According to the information available to the Canadian maritime commission from various sources there were so laid up 19 vessels totalling 113,581 gross tons, 159,492 deadweight tons.

6. All 19 of these vessels were so built.

T.V. SATELLITE TRANSMITTERS, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 132—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has the Department of Transport or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation received an application or applications from private telecasters or radio broadcasters for the construction of T.V. satellite transmitters or translators in any part of the maritime provinces?

2. If so, by whom was the application made and for what area?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. Newfoundland Broadcasting Co. Ltd., Argentia, Nfld.; Cape Breton Broadcasters Ltd., Inverness, N.S.

NEWFOUNDLAND—SMALL LOANS FUND GRANTS TO FISHERMEN

Question No. 142—Mr. Carter:

1. How many loans have been granted to fishermen in Newfoundland from the fishermen's small loans fund for each year up to the present date?

2. What is the amount of each loan?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

It is assumed that the hon. member is referring to loans made under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

1. Three.

2. It is not in the public interest to disclose this information which is a matter of customer and bank relationship.

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER
President of the United States

to

MEMBERS OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA, ON WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1958, AT 10 A.M.

Mr. Eisenhower was welcomed by the Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Hon. Mark Robert Drouin, Speaker of the Senate, and the Hon. Roland Michener, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister of Canada): Mr. President, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, members of the parliament of Canada, President Eisenhower comes to us as the renowned leader of a mighty state, but what is more meaningful today is the fact that he comes to us as a good neighbour and friend. We are happy that he is accompained by his gracious wife and helpmate, for Canadians are very fond of her, too.

(Translation):

I now wish to add a word of welcome in the French language, and to assure you, Mr. President, that the warmth of Canadian feeling toward you and our great neighbour is one that comes from the heart.

To you and to your gracious wife, I extend the most cordial welcome.

(Text):

In visiting us unaccompanied by pomp and circumstance the president is following an old and precious precedent in the relations of our two nations. Although you come to us, sir, as the head of a powerful state, the intelligence service informs me after diligent inquiry that you come bearing no arms and carry no armour other than a brassie and a putter. May I, sir, as an aside express the wish that under clear skies and on fairways not too narrow you will be able, while here, to use this armour and add to your list of victories.

The communist world is waging an intensive economic global offensive of "aid and trade", an offensive which is not designed to secure profits in a bookkeeping sense in order to secure the ordinary values of trade for its peoples, but an offensive whose success will be measured by the degree to which the souls and hearts and the freedoms and aspirations of the recipients will be subverted under communist tyranny.

I think this is a very great occasion. We say what we have said on occasions in the past, that our countries are united in defence. I believe, sir, that the Soviet challenge demands that we can be no less in economic objectives. I believe that each of our nations, and each of the nations of the free world, in forming economic policies, while at all times looking primarily to the welfare of the individual nations, must as never before take into account, in the common interest and for survival itself, the effects of such policies on the economic welfare and interests of all other free nations. And I go even further and suggest that, to meet the ever-enlarging expansion of communist economic cold war, joint action is imperative to the end that world trade will be expanded and the financial base of liquid resources necessary for such expansion will be materially increased. I feel sure I speak for all Canadians when I say that Canada stands prepared to assume her full share and to make her full contribution to such a bold policy.

Mr. President, our two lands have a glory of their own, the glory of two peoples moving forward together, not complacently but with a humble pride, and joined in fraternal association that has extended through a century of tragedy and storm in different parts of the world.

We can on this occasion, in the simplicity of our faith, thank God that our nations know nothing of ancestral hatreds or animosities. Above all, we may hope that this spirit of peaceful and co-operative relations will in due course become the fortune of all mankind.

Sir, as you came into our city you drove by and crossed over a small canal. Few know today when or why it was built. It was built more than 100 years ago to help protect this country from yours. Today it is a museum piece; it represents a past that is past.

I would recall to you, sir, on this the occasion of your visit to our country one of the earliest visits by Canadian parliamentarians to Washington. When Abraham Lincoln went to Gettysburg to deliver his immortal and timeless address, one of those who accompanied him as his guest on the Gettysburg platform was the Hon. William McDougall, one of the fathers of the Canadian confederation. Mr. McDougall had been in Washington with Mr. Galt on a small matter regarding trade, and Mr. Lincoln, with that informality which has continued since to characterize our relations, invited Mr. McDougall to accompany him. It is of interest, too, sir, that when the next day Mr. McDougall wrote to his family in Canada his opinion, so different from many opinions uttered that day, was that the president's words would live in history.

In the years since there have been many comings and goings; there have been meetings, and not all brought satisfaction to both sides. But there has remained that glory to which I referred a moment ago, that we can discuss, that we have discussed, that we shall in the days ahead continue to discuss our problems and our differences with the candour of free men in friendship, understanding and manly frankness.

I have often been asked by other nationals what is the secret of the dedication of these two nations to neighbourliness and mutual respect. The answer, we know, is this. We trust each other in a union of hearts based on common ideals and the abiding principles of freedom and the rights of men. Our peoples are North Americans. We are the children of our geography, products of the same hopes, faith and dreams, products as well of those forms of expression which have been nurtured and enriched in the traditions and common heritage of Magna Carta, the Bill of Rights and habeas corpus.

When, 13 years ago, you were given the freedom of the city of London another great warrior-statesman, Sir Winston Churchill, said of you that you had shown "the capacity for making great nations march together more truly united than they have been before." I take leave to quote your noble reply in which in part you said:

> Humility must always be the portion of any man who receives the acclaim earned in the blood of his followers and the sacrifices of his friends.

Mr. President, it is in your clear knowledge that it is only by constructive deeds of living men that the sacrifices of the dead can have their proper values that parliament, yes, the Canadian people as a whole, give you their warmest welcome and acclaim. I salute you, sir, as the wartime commander under whose leadership the legions of freedom marched when liberty was under siege and no man knew where salvation lay. I greet you, sir, as one whose wisdom, humanitarianism and prestige are once more humanity's major hope for freedom and for peace.

Members of the parliament of Canada, I have the high privilege of presenting to you a great and good tribune of freedom in war and in peace, the President of the United States.

Mr. Dwight D. Eisenhower (President of the United States of America): Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Mr. Prime Minister, members of the Canadian houses of parliament, distinguished guests and friends: As I begin, may I be permitted to speak a few words in my halting French to my French friends in Canada. The Prime Minister did this with great courage. I assure you I do it in abject fear.

(Translation):

Here, in Canada, you have demonstrated that differences in speech and forms of speech need not impair communications between free peoples. So it must be among all nations of the free world. Though we may speak in different tongues and accents, that fact does not weaken our determination to work for a just and lasting peace. All of Canada has a great and rich tradition in the service of this high purpose. Her dedication to it has been staunch and persevering. Her example encourages free men everywhere.

(Text):

Mr. Prime Minister, I want you to know of my deep personal appreciation of the warmth of the welcome you have extended to me and of the generosity of the remarks you have just delivered concerning me. Along that same line, I should like to express my very great appreciation of the warmth of the welcome that Mrs. Eisenhower and myself have experienced throughout the city, along its streets and in every meeting in which we have had a part. We are truly grateful.

This is my fourth visit to your beautiful capital. I recall so well that when your gracious Queen came to Washington from Ottawa we spoke together of the beauty of this city and of the greatness of Canada.

It is good to return, to see old friends and to make new ones.

I came here first in 1946 to congratulate the Canadian people on the brilliant role played by the Canadian forces you placed under my command in the world war which had then recently ended in victory. My next visit was made as commander of NATO forces in Europe. In 1953 I returned as president, and talked in this house of some aspects of the relationship between our two countries.

I then spoke of the St. Lawrence seaway in prospective terms. Today it is near completion and next year it will be opened. This is truly a great joint accomplishment. It will open up important regions of both Canada and the United States to ocean traffic. It will ever stand as a monument to what can be achieved by the common effort of two sovereign nations.

On that same occasion I spoke of the need to devise ways to protect our North America from any surprise attack. Since then we have made great strides. The distant early warning or D.E.W. line has been built and placed in operation. In the process of its construction I am sure much has been learned which will contribute to the more rapid development of the northern reaches of Canada and our new state, Alaska.

Last month an agreement was concluded between our two governments to establish a combined air defence headquarters for this continent. We have also, both of us, striven, as we will continue to strive, for the Soviet union's agreement to a system of inspection to protect against surprise attack through the Arctic. Recent Soviet communications have strengthened the hope that they will come to see that by such a system any basis for their professed fears of an attack across the pole will be removed. For Canada and the United States such a system in operation would add measurably to our security against a sudden attack. Possibly it might also pave the way for still further measures of arms control and permit some reduction of the burden and danger of modern armaments.

Both of these developments, the seaway, a broadened, deepened road for peaceful commerce, and the strengthening of our common defence of this continent, strikingly illustrate two things. The first is that change is the law of life and of relations between nations. When two great peoples such as ours, energetic and optimistic, live side by side in all the diversity that freedom offers, change is rapid and brings in its wake problems, sometimes frictions.

The second lesson I see in these common achievements in diverse fields is that by mutual respect, understanding and with good will we can find acceptable solutions to any problems which exist or may arise between us. It is important to remember this. Such differences as are from time to time expressed never affect the similarity of purpose which binds our two countries together.

Of course, each of us possesses a distinctive national character and history. You won your independence by evolution, and the United States by revolution. Our forms of government, though both cast in the democratic pattern, are greatly different. Indeed, sometimes it appears that many of our misunderstandings spring from an imperfect knowledge on the part of both of us of the dissimilarities in our forms of government. And yet, despite these dissimilarities in form, our two governments are developing and are increasingly using effective ways to consult and act together. This we do to meet the problems that confront us in our relations with each other, and in the relations of both with other nations of the world.

We share the basic belief that only under free institutions, with government the servant and not the master, can the individual secure his life, his liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We are both determined to frame and follow policies which safeguard the lives and homes of our people, their peace of mind, their material well-being and, above all other things, their ideals. True to these ideals both of our countries, for example, are determined that the great decisions of peace and war will remain always under civilian control.

Moreover, we both recognize a design of aggressive communist imperialism which threatens every free nation. Both of us face a military threat and political attacks. Our system of free enterprise is challenged throughout the world by a state-directed, state-controlled economic system. Indeed, this could well be the area in which the competition will be most bitter and most decisive between the free world and communist imperialism. We must never allow ourselves to become so preoccupied with the differences between our two nations that we lose sight of the transcendent importance of free world co-operation in the winning of the global struggle.

Acting in accordance with our common dedication the two of us, with others, have drawn together in collective security arrangements. The most notable of these is the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in which both Canada and the United States are equal partners. We are both determined to maintain what George Washington described as "a respectable military posture." We are equally determined to maintain our institutions in good repair and to ensure that our own economies function well.

Thus we seek not only to meet the expanding needs of our people but also to set an example of free men's accomplishments which will encourage and attract those less fortunate. Finally, we are agreed that we shall never cease striving for a just and lasting peace to be achieved by negotiation with those who challenge us. We overlook no opportunity to settle the issues which divide the world and under safeguarded conditions to reduce the burden of armaments.

Now, against this background of similarity in basic factors and policy, let me now point to some of the matters which it seems to me are troublesome between us. Among these are the surplus wheat disposal policies of the United States, the imbalance of our mutual trade, certain aspects of United States private investment in Canada, and Canadian fears of a trend in the United States away from forward-looking policies in the field of trade.

I am sure you agree that we should talk frankly to each other. Frankness, in good spirit, is a measure of friendship. It should be the practice, I believe, on both sides so to speak, when either feels that important interests are adversely affected by actions contemplated or taken by the other. Happily, these instances are rare. In mentioning today specific problems on which we do not see eye to eye I am doing so, of course, as an American, expressing an American viewpoint. I can assure you that your Prime Minister, in discussing these problems with my associates and me, most loyally and eloquently expresses the viewpoint of Canada.

It is my conviction, in which I believe he fully concurs, that for all of our present problems and all of our future ones we will find acceptable solutions. It will take understanding, common sense and a willingness to give and take on both our parts. These qualities we have always found in our dealings with Canada. I hope you have not found them lacking in us.

First then, in some detail, I should like to comment briefly on our surplus wheat disposal policies. I think no one can quarrel with our purpose, though some of our methods may seem unorthodox by traditional standards. Simply stated, our wheat disposal program has three aspects. In times of local famine or disaster we give wheat away. We have also bartered it for strategic materials. Finally, we sell wheat for local currency to countries which cannot afford to purchase it commercially. In these cases our policy is to lend back to the government in question most of the proceeds for local economic development. Our intent is not to damage normal commercial markets, and in this I think we have been generally successful.

I know that in the past there was criticism of certain aspects of these programs, and particularly of our barter arrangements. I believe that the basis for these objections has been largely removed. Increasingly close consultation between officials of our two governments has ironed out many misunderstandings respecting our surplus disposals. Your government knows in detail what we are planning. I assure you that it is our desire and intention to keep the doors of consultation fully open. There must never be a final word between friends.

In several respects, despite inconvenience and even occasional damage in the past, Canada stands to benefit from our moving some surplus agricultural commodities into consumption overseas. First and most evident of all, many hungry people around the world have had food which they otherwise would not have had. Second, had these products remained in dead storage they would have had a depressing influence on the world market and world prices. Finally, the funds which we have been enabled to make available to recipient countries should in the long run help to raise standards of living and create enlarged markets for all of us.

I come next to the question of the imbalance of trade between our two countries. You buy more from the United States than you sell to us and this fact is of concern to many thoughtful Canadians. There are a few basic points which should be noted in this connection.

First of all, the United States and Canada are not state traders. All the products of industry manufactured in the United States and sold to customers abroad are sold through the enterprise of the private seller. These articles come to you in Canada only because of the desire of the individual Canadian consumer to buy a particular piece of merchandise. The United States government does not place goods in Canada as part of a state-directed program. This aspect of our trade with each other is the natural consequence of two private enterprise economies working side by side and trading with each other.

Then we should also remember that the free world represents a multilateral trading community. To try to balance our books once a month or once a year with every nation with which we trade would stifle rather than expand trade. I assume that Canada is as interested as we are in the expansion of world trade rather than in its artificial redirection. Both our peoples want to buy and sell in a climate of economic vigour and expansion. An imbalance in trade with one country, in such a climate, is usually balanced or largely offset by the state of the accounts with other trading nations.

This is the case with Canadian trade. Your export deficit to the United States is offset by export surpluses to other countries and by the flow of investments to Canada. The promotion of healthy multilateral trade, as opposed to artificial bilateral balancing, is an important objective of the international monetary fund and the general agreement on tariffs and trade, to which both Canada and the United States belong.

For a moment I want to address myself as well to the other side of the trade equation, namely your exports to the United States. Here you can rightly say that through quotas and tariffs our governmental policies can either expand or restrict your opportunities to sell to us. The same of course is true of actions taken by your government which can affect the volume of our exports to Canada.

Neither of our countries is a "free trader" in the classifical economic sense. Each of us feels a responsibility to provide some protection to particular sectors of our economies which may be in distress or are for other reasons deserving of governmental assistance. We have taken some actions of this sort. So has Canada.

Oil imports into our country contribute a case in point. We believe that to ensure adequate supplies of oil in an emergency, it is necessary that exploration to develop oil reserves be carried forward with vigour. This means a healthy oil industry throughout the continent. A healthy domestic oil-producing industry is vital to our national security. We recognize that our security and yours are inseparable. We have been keenly sensitive to that fact in considering the nature of the voluntary restrictions on oil imports that have been put into effect by oil companies in the United States, and have minimized their impact on your economy.

Our restrictive action with respect to oil is not in any sense reflective of a change in the fundamental trade policy of the United States. Such actions must be viewed in perspective. For example, since the so-called escape clause was incorporated in our trade agreements legislation in 1951, there have come from industry in the United States a number of requests for the imposition of quotas or higher tariffs. In about a dozen cases presidential approval for some relief has been granted. In only one of these cases was Canada directly affected as an exporter. We have always conscientiously sought to take account of your interests as well as our own in seeking the best remedy to these intricate problems. I believe that a study of the record will bear out the truth of this statement.

Next, the flow of investment funds from the United States into Canada has led to expressions of concern on your part. These funds have been attracted to your country by the business opportunities Canada has offered. Though they may raise questions in specific cases respecting control of an industry by United States citizens, these industries are, of course, subject to Canadian law. Moreover, these investments have helped you to develop your resources and to expand your industrial plant at a far faster rate than would have been possible had you relied wholly on your own savings. They have thereby helped to provide employment, tax revenues and other direct benefits. These funds have also helped Canada to finance with ease its recent surplus of imports from the United States, a fact that is testified to by the premium of the Canadian dollar over the United States dollar.

I am confident that if there are some defects in this investment process, ways will be found to correct them because that is in the interests of both our countries.

One final word on the foreign trade policy of the United States. In 1934 the United States took an historic decision to embark on a positive policy of fostering trade with the launching of the reciprocal trade agreements program. This policy we continue to support and practice. The government of the United States, after a public searching of soul at times of renewal of the trade agreements act, has consistently reaffirmed this policy. Have no fear that the United States will abandon a policy so well established. The problems I have been discussing concern our economic lives. Our points of economic contact are varied and numerous, as they of necessity must be under our chosen system of private enterprise.

Our governments have a responsibility to help compose difficulties, but we must not forget that thousands of individual citizens of Canada and the United States must themselves find in their diversified activities the answers to many of these problems.

Finally, there is no cause to be surprised or disturbed to discover that occasionally differences arise between us. The distinguishing character of the peoples of the free world lies in the fact that differences between them can develop, can be expressed and then amicably resolved. We in the United States have no more desire than you have to seek in our relations with other nations the silent, sullen unity that elsewhere has been purchased or imposed. The hallmark of freedom is the right to differ as well as the right to agree.

I have spoken to you today in the knowledge that through you I address a nation strong in the tradition of freedom and vigilant in its defence. You and we are alike convinced, by our history, our religious faith and our common heritage of freedom that economic well-being and political liberty both depend upon the efforts of individuals and on their willingness to accept the responsibilities of freedom. Today I assure you once more of the pride and gratification that we of the United States feel in our long and friendly association with you, our sturdy northern neighbour.

We stand together at a pivotal point in history. All that we Canadians and Americans, and those who went before us, have built, all that we believe in, is challenged as it has never been challenged before. The new horizons of competition range from the polar areas, and extend to the infinity of outer space. It is for us, all of us, to bring to the challenge a response worthy of ourselves and of our two nations.

As we do, we shall know the satisfaction of having built, in friendship, a safer and ampler home here on the earth for this generation and those that shall come after us.

I thank you very much for your kind attention.

(Translation):

Hon. Mark Robert Drouin (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, it is indeed a privilege to welcome you, on behalf of the Canadian Senate, to a body so dedicated as we are to justice, to freedom and to a belief in Canada's future.

Your presence among us recalls those fine hours when our two peoples made the sacrifices which had to be made if they were to maintain those great ideals which are still, today, as precious to them as they were then. Your visit also focuses attention on the deep feeling of friendship which binds our two countries in these difficult times when it is not easy to draw the dividing line between peace and war.

Our two countries are, so to speak, family relations. We freely refer to you as our cousins to the south, and through the centuries a true family bond has developed between our two peoples. True, we have our occasional squabbles, we have our differences, we disagree; but it amounts to nothing more than the mere family spats such as are likely to occur in the best regulated families. But once we find ourselves faced with a common danger, we are quick to forget these growing pains and, closing ranks, we join forces, and heartened by our bonds of friendship, we confront the enemy; and, with God's help, we have been known to emerge the victors.

Mr. President, you come as the head of a powerful democracy in which the peoples of the free world have, to a large extent, placed their rightful hopes. This privilege is not without its heavy responsibilities. While you must no doubt, on the one hand, be the guardian of your national interests, your guardianship, on the other hand, of the whole of the free world impels you to have a constant regard for the hopes and the needs of the nations joined in alliance. Never must these hopes and needs be confused, still less brought into conflict; most vital of all, they must be brought ever more closely together and reconciled. This heavy task can only be accomplished through the utmost clarity, impartiality and strength. In you, Mr. President, we find embodied all these qualities, and we beg of you to rest assured of our confidence and understanding.

Yet, despite all the crushing burdens which are your lot, you have accepted to spend a few days in our midst. Undoubtedly you have been struck by the many contrasts of language, tradition and procedure between our two countries. Our political institutions are not built up in the same way; our ties with the nations are not all identical; our individual interests do not necessarily call for a like approach. But you must have found, in Canada, a spirit indistinguishable from that which inspires your own country—that of a free people, vigorous and aware of the paramount importance of moral values.

What we have, through the grace of God, we mean to hold; but no longer can nations do this alone. We feel comforted at the thought that we have the United States as our neighbour, and we are pleased to feel the warmth that comes with the knowledge that we stand together in face of the common danger.

Mr. President, please allow me to express to you, as well as to your charming wife, our hearty congratulations on the occasion of the 42nd anniversary of your marriage, and to wish both of you many more happy years together. Your union is symbolic of the bonds of sympathy and of brotherliness which bless the relationship between our two countries.

We are deeply grateful, Mr. President, for the kind words you had for us, and we ask you, on behalf of both the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people, to accept our heartfelt thanks for your visit, and to assure your compatriots of our sincere and loyal friendship.

(Text):

Hon. Roland Michener (Speaker of the House of Commons): Mr. President, the French language as spoken by my colleague of the Senate is so distingué and in this case has been so expressive of our gratitude for your visit and for your address to us today that it would be an anticlimax to repeat his words in English. Even to add to them may be what the Presbyterians would call a work of supererogation. But I must take that risk in the interests of preserving the bilingual rights of my Engish-speaking colleagues and you, Mr. President, must therefore submit to be thanked twice. Furthermore, my thanks and good wishes are expressed more particularly on behalf of the House of Commons in whose chamber this auspicious meeting is taking place.

You will be pleased to know at once that your message to our two houses has evoked a response of complete and unanimous concurrence. You may find it useful, Mr. President, to cite this example to our legislative counterparts in Washington and to remind them that it would be unseemly for them to be outdone in this respect by their Canadian cousins.

We are deeply conscious, sir, of the great consideration which you have shown to our country in your visit to our capital, accompanied by your gracious wife and by your distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, and of the honour you have done to our parliament and people by the sincere and friendly message which you have just given us. Your words have reassured our minds, but more than that they have rekindled in our hearts those ancient and enduring sentiments of friendship which have characterized our relations for the last century and a half.

It is clear that our objectives are the same, that we think alike and want to act together. Nevertheless, as our affairs become more closely interwoven in this shrinking world, more effort is required by each of us to keep them from becoming entangled.

The effort to this end which you are now making we deeply appreciate, more especially because of the constant demands upon your time. Your great office combines in its responsibilities some of the duties of our Governor General in his capacity as representative of the head of the state and commander in chief of the armed forces, and some of the duties of our Prime Minister as chief of the executive branch of government. One cannot carry this dual comparison too far; our Prime Minister has some duties in this chamber which you may be glad, or on occasion sorry, not to share. In any event this duality of your functions, by our standards, makes it more difficult for you to leave Washington and makes us doubly grateful for your presence with us in Ottawa.

I trust that your reception here this morning and the enthusiastic response to your message will leave no doubt of the success of this part of your mission. We offer you our best wishes for the continued success and enjoyment of your entire visit and express our hopes that, by coming to us for a second time, you have established a firm precedent for the future.

Upon your return home we trust that you will convey to your countrymen the respects of the parliament of Canada and will advise them that we shall long remember this significant session. We also ask you to express to them our neighbourly thanks and best wishes.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF JOINT PRESS STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the press statement issued in the name of himself and the President of the United States yesterday evening, which is as follows:

> The Canadian and United States governments have given consideration to situations where the export policies and laws of the two countries may not be in complete harmony. It has been agreed that in these cases there will be full consultation between the two governments with a view to finding through appropriate procedures satisfactory solutions to concrete problems as they arise.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can clarify the meaning of those sentences, dealing with such an important matter, in the light of the statement issued by the Minister of Finance at the same time on the same subject which reads—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of privilege, before my friend goes on I may say that I did not issue any press statement, so my friend should not be reading anything attributed to me under such a heading.

Mr. Pearson: The statement was attributed to my hon. friend by the press officer appointed by the government to hold a press conference. The press officer said that the following statement had been issued by the Minister of Finance:

> The intention is that Canadian law and Canadian law alone is to prevail over persons or corporations carrying on business in Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would not be appropriate today to go into any detail. At the conclusion of the consultations with the President of the United States a statement will be made, and I hope that can be done tomorrow. I do not intend to be drawn into any piecemeal discussion respecting any item that may have appeared in the press or with any press report whatever. The whole question will be dealt with at one time.

Suffice it to say this: that in the discussions that have up to the moment taken place, there has been a spirit of consideration shown for each other's problems that bodes well for the future, and in particular there has been nothing in the nature, if that is what is in the mind of my hon. friend, of suggesting to the President of the United States that in regard to a matter as important as trade we should make the proposition, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition on more than one occasion, that unless trade relations were beneficial in so far as Canada is concerned, we should threaten to withdraw or diminish in any way our defence relationships with the United States.

Mr. Pearson: On a question of privilege, the Prime Minister has attributed remarks to me which I have never made, and which he will never be able to quote as being made by me. He should either withdraw those remarks or substantiate them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not the record here. I made a statement in the house the other day when I had the speech in question, and there was no suggestion of a denial on the part of my hon. friend at that time.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition has stated in his place that he did not make such a statement. I am sure the Prime Minister will accept that statement, just as the Leader of the Opposition will accept the statement of the Minister of Finance that he did not issue a press release.

[Later:]

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question in this field. Will the government consider introducing in this house legislation that would require Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies to act in the export field in such a way as to bring advantage to Canada and not in accordance with the laws in some other country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not think any legislation to that effect would be helpful in any way. I am not going into the complexities of the situation that would be created as the result of legislation to that effect, but when the report is made tomorrow I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree that Canada's subsidiaries will not in any way be interfered with in so far as entering into contracts with other countries is concerned in respect of those things which Canada does not consider strategic.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the importance of this matter, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether these words used by the press officer on behalf of the government of Canada represent the situation in so far as it is within the minister's knowledge? Mr. Nelson said:

> I have an explanatory note here that might help, given to me by the Minister of Finance: The intention is that Canadian law and Canadian law alone is to prevail over persons or corporations carrying on business in Canada.
> Q. That's the same thing as consultation?
> Mr. Nelson: That's what they hope to achieve by it.

In view of the importance of this matter to my constituency and many others, will the Minister of Finance not clarify this matter at once?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that the only law that is binding upon Canadians when in Canada or corporations that are doing business in Canada, to the extent to which they are doing business in Canada lawfully, is the law of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The question that arises here concerns the relations of Canadian subsidiaries to their parent corporations in the United States. My hon. friend knows well that that is a complex matter. I think he has heard the very proper suggestion by the Prime Minister that the matter should not be dealt with piecemeal, that a complicated question of that kind cannot be dealt with in justice in any piecemeal manner. I think my hon. friend would be the first to say that this matter should be dealt with in the manner proposed by the Prime Minister following the conclusion of his meetings with the President of the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the Minister of Finance not agree with me that the Prime Minister's observations a few moments ago really represent what should be the situation from now on? But does the Minister of Finance not think that the statement which he authorized the press officer to make has complicated the situation, and is certainly not consistent with the statement he has just made in answer to my question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I am always happy to find myself in disagreement with my hon. friend.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition, I would refer him to the comments he made on May 13, 1958 as recorded at page 25 of Hansard, which read as follows:

> We must naturally protect our interests when they are prejudiced by United States policy. We must, for instance, make it quite clear that the United States cannot expect full and complete co-operation in continental defence, which is desirable, if she treats us unfairly in her tariff and trade policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has done what he said last night to the press, in connection with the speech of the President of the United States, he would never do. He said he would never take a sentence out of context and draw a conclusion from it. But apart from that, even taking the meaning which he gave to this sentence—and he should have gone on to quote my further remarks on this same page of Hansard—it does not conform to what he said a few moments ago.

Furthermore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he disagrees with the particular sentence he has quoted.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED NEW ORGANIZATION OF DOCKERS AND TRUCKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on a news report in the Montreal Gazette of July 10 to the effect that a huge labour combine, led by the teamsters' and longshoremen's unions—both expelled from the A.F.L.-C.I.O.—started a new organization of dockers and truckers in Canada yesterday. Has the minister been in touch with these developments, and has he any information to give to the house on this important matter?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have read news reports in the same way as has the hon. member. I must say that I have no comment at all to make on the situation.

PICTOU, N.S.—PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFFS BY FERGUSON INDUSTRIES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, based on a statement by the president of Ferguson Industries Limited of Pictou, reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of July 8, that 400 employees will be out of work within a week because of lack of shipbuilding orders. What I wanted to ask the minister was whether he would make representations to the Minister of Transport, who is not here today, and to the Minister of National Defence with a view to seeing whether the government could not arrange for some orders for this well established firm.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of Transport and the other minister referred to will see the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in Hansard and will take it under consideration; nevertheless I will convey it to them also.

HOUSING

SUGGESTED EASIER FINANCING OF PURCHASE OF OLDER HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): May I ask the Minister of Public Works if the government is giving consideration to the extension of the National Housing Act to cover loans on secondhand houses?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the government is of course giving consideration to all possible improvements which would be made to the National Housing Act, but policy decisions would have to be duly announced.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO SITE FOR PROPOSED BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he has yet decided upon a site for the proposed new C.B.C. building in Montreal.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker; the Minister of National Revenue does not decide upon the site of proposed buildings for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in Montreal or elsewhere. Such decisions are made by the officials of the C.B.C. and, in so far as I know, no firm decision has yet been reached.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the minister state whether he has met with or has arranged to meet with any delegation making representations as to the site in Montreal or in the Montreal area?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I have met with so many delegations making representations on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that I am not in a position to answer definitely whether I have or have not met with any representative group from Montreal. I remember that about eight or ten months ago I met with several delegations from that city which had representations to make to me, but certainly I have not met with any representative group from the city of Montreal or the environs thereof within, say, the last six months.

Mr. Macnaughton: May I ask a further supplementary question. Has the minister seen the press clipping from last night's Montreal Star wherein it was stated that he would be receiving a delegation from the city of Montreal today to discuss this very problem?

Mr. Nowlan: I might say the paper to which my hon. friend refers is a very authoritative one; but whatever report may have been contained therein, I have not yet seen nor have I heard of any such delegation.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO RESULT OF MEETING BETWEEN S.I.U. AND C.P.R.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether he could tell the house if the meeting which was expected to be held today between the seafarers international union and the C.P.R. was held or is to be held; and could he indicate the results, if any, of that meeting?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The meeting, as scheduled, was held this morning and it is expected to be resumed at three o'clock. I am therefore unable to give to the hon. member the results of the meeting.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question to direct to the Minister of Labour with regard to his answer concerning the S.I.U. dispute with the C.P.R. Will the minister undertake to exert the greatest possible effort on his part to ensure that the parties concerned will continue to meet—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howard: I am asking a question—keeping in mind that it is not possible to resolve a dispute by settlement when the parties are not meeting?

Mr. Starr: Ever since this strike began it has been the concern of the government—and we have demonstrated that by our efforts—to bring these parties together, and I assure all hon. members of this house that we will continue our efforts to keep the parties together until they are able to agree on a mutually acceptable solution to the problem.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATEMENT ON REPORTED CRITICISM OF ACT BY MONTREAL JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East yesterday referred to a situation with respect to unemployment insurance in the city of Montreal in respect to which, as he put it, there had occurred strong criticism on the part of a judge regarding the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act which deprive a person of benefits if he obtains any casual employment.

I should inform the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, that there are no such provisions. A certain supplementary income is permitted and benefits are graded accordingly. For example, in the case of a person drawing $30 weekly he is permitted to earn up to $13, granting him a total of $43. A person drawing $21 is permitted to earn up to $8, giving him a total of $29. Benefits are not withdrawn; they are graded down according to the amount a person earns. The recipient must, of course, report these casual earnings.

I should inform the hon. member that the gentleman in question was taken to court not under the Unemployment Insurance Act but under a provision in the Criminal Code against misrepresentation. The charge was based on the fact that he had earned money which he had failed to declare while at the same time collecting unemployment insurance. Covering a period of three different weeks he had declared $12, while actual earnings were computed at $93. In addition he had collected $90 in unemployment insurance. In all he had collected $56 more than his entitlement.

As regards the third question, amendments to the act are now being considered and I hope they can be brought down this session.

THETFORD MINES—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SEASONAL BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to a question asked by the hon. member for Megantic on July 3. It was a question arising out of an earlier question directed to the Minister of Labour, as to whether or not any communication from the municipality of Thetford Mines relating to unemployment insurance or any other subject had been received, and in particular whether the acting prime minister or the Prime Minister had received such a telegram. My answer is that there was a telegram received from the mayor of Thetford Mines with regard to extending the period of time of supplementary benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the royal commission on the revision of the terms of union with Newfoundland has yet submitted its report to the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the hon. gentleman asked that question the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In any event, a copy in English has been submitted this day to the Governor General, and the report will be tabled as soon as we are ready to table it in both languages.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the Prime Minister anticipate that this will involve any material delay; because, as I think he knows, the government of Newfoundland is very anxious to get this report for certain reasons of which I think the right hon. gentleman is aware.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is expected that it will be ready for tabling within 10 days. The printing bureau has a great deal of work to do, but we want to table it in both languages. I will take into consideration the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question. In view of the particular nature of this report which, as the Prime Minister knows, was provided for in the constitution by an amendment to the British North America Act, is it the intention of the government, as a courtesy, to submit a copy in advance to the premier of Newfoundland?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As soon as the translation has been completed and before it is tabled in the house a copy will be forwarded to the premier of Newfoundland.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PREVAILING RATE EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR HOLIDAY WITH PAY ON AUGUST 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. I wonder if he can yet give an answer to the question I asked on Tuesday?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I think the question should probably have been directed to the Minister of Finance as chairman of the treasury board, because this is a treasury board matter.

Under the terms and conditions of employment of prevailing rate employees, they are allowed, in addition to annual vacation, nine other holidays. Six of these are fixed: New Year's day, Good Friday, July 1, Labour day, Thanksgiving day and Christmas day. One of the others is designated by the deputy minister in each department and the remaining two are designated by the minister of each department. In general, one of the designated days is whatever day is selected as civic holiday in the area concerned.

COAL

DRUMHELLER—REQUEST FOR AID IN UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lucien Cardin (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister inform the house as to the seriousness of the coal mining situation in Drumheller and what steps the government intends to take to relieve the unemployment problem in that important industry in Alberta?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Well, Mr. Speaker, this matter does not come under the jurisdiction of my department. It is a matter of government policy. It has been brought to the attention of the government, and I am sure all hon. members of the government are aware of it. As hon. gentlemen know, the government at all times gives consideration to situations such as these as they arise in order to arrive at decisions which will assist in solving such problems.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF ALL-CANADIAN ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to answer the question I asked on Monday concerning whether or not the government is giving consideration to the suggestion made by Premier Frost concerning the all-Canadian seaway?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I stated the other day.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When I asked the question on Monday the Prime Minister said he would take it as notice because it was too comprehensive to answer off the cuff. I took it as a matter of course that he would give an answer; but if what he has said today means that there is no answer, I shall have to be satisfied with that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer I gave the other day still applies as I said.

GRAIN

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF WESTERN REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could he say what consideration has been given to the whole question of deficiency payments? Can he say when a decision is likely to be made and whether it is likely to be favourable, in view of the serious crop prospects in western Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in this case, too, I have nothing to add to what has already been stated. The situation in the western provinces is known to the government. Immediate action is being taken in order to meet that problem in co-operation, I trust, with the governments of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. When a decision is finally arrived at the Minister of Agriculture will place before this house the nature of those agreements to meet the immediate situation.

With respect to the general question of deficiency payments, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been asked this question on several occasions and has stated, as I recall, that the whole problem of deficiency payments is receiving full consideration.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question because of the great interest in this question in western Canada. Can the Prime Minister say whether a decision will be made during the current session of parliament, in order that the correct appropriation may be passed by this house and the payments made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that too is a matter that will receive full consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST FOR STEPS TO ASSURE ADEQUATE FEED SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we have all noted that the minister of agriculture for Manitoba has had recent conversations with the federal Minister of Agriculture due to the emergency drought conditions in that area. I was wondering if the minister had any statement to make, and whether or not the conversations involved the possibility of importing fodder from the United States.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the minister of agriculture for Manitoba, Hon. Errick Willis, was here yesterday and the day before. I had two or three conversations with him in connection with the drought situation in Manitoba, which I am glad to tell the house is now much less serious than it was about a week ago because of the rains that started there last Thursday which have now considerably lessened the possibility of a serious feed shortage in southern Manitoba. I might say that the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan is here today. We had a long conference this morning and we will have another this afternoon. At these meetings with the provincial ministers of agriculture we have been canvassing the situation fairly thoroughly as to what the needs are likely to be and how those needs can best be met. As the Prime Minister indicated, I will have a statement to make to the house in that connection in due course.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCINTOSH—REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS BY C.C.F. LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. May I at this time ask the leader of the C.C.F. group a question relating to a report that appeared in a prairie newspaper?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIntosh: I believe it concerns the whole house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can only ask a question of another member relating to a matter before the house under that member's responsibility. If it is a question of privilege and the hon. member will state it, the house will deal with it.

Mr. McIntosh: I am referring to a report which appeared in the Regina Leader-Post of June 30, and I would ask the leader of the C.C.F. group whether he was misquoted or whether he actually made this statement.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could state his question of privilege first and then we will be able to see how far he will need to go to elaborate it. Is it a question of privilege affecting the hon. member himself?

Mr. McIntosh: It is a question of privilege. During a recent visit of the hon. member for Assiniboia to Saskatchewan he is reported to have said:

> —he was glad to be away from the house to come back here and look "at some intelligent people."

The article continues:

> Progressive Conservative candidates, no matter whether they were qualified or not, were elected. He admitted the P.C.'s had some able members in the house but there are "a lot I'm sure will take four years to learn where to hang their hats and coats."

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, when members from Saskatchewan may reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia, or if the hon. member for Assiniboia will inform the house whether he actually made that statement. If he did I believe he owes an apology to the members of the house.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member is not looking for trouble. There was nothing in what he read which seemed to reflect in any way upon him. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia must have been referring to other members of the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER CENTRE ON CANADIAN DELEGATIONS TO RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would care to comment on the statement appearing in this morning's Gazette and attributed to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who is reported as having said in Paris yesterday that Canadian delegations visiting Russia are hand-picked, and while approved by the government are politically immature and naturally very biased.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer is, first, that I have not seen the report, and the answer to the general question is no.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

GLACE BAY, N.S.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED REDUCTION IN STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi asked for my comment on reports that the mail carrier staff in the town of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, is to be reduced. There are 12 letter carriers in the town and the possibility of eliminating one of them is being considered. This is due to the fact that we find, after several checks, a number of them are working substantially less than the required 40 hours per week. A decision has not yet been made, but if it is decided to reduce the number of letter carriers every effort will be made to absorb the one released in the post office itself in Glace Bay or elsewhere.

I think in fairness I should also say that I was asked the same question by letter by the hon. member for Cape Breton South some time before it was posed in the house. I understand that the hon. member for Cape Breton South felt that he preferred to do it in that way and save the time of the other 264 members of the house.

FISHERIES

MIRAMICHI, N.B.—FURTHER STATEMENT ON REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING CHANGE IN SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi asked me if any representations had been received seeking a change in the New Brunswick fishing regulations to eliminate the two-week lift period for Atlantic salmon net fishing. Subsequent to his original inquiry on June 30, I received a telegram signed by the Miramichi commercial salmon association and W. S. Loggie Company Limited requesting that the two-week lift period for Atlantic salmon net fishing be postponed for one week. In view of the short time available and the large area which would be affected by the change the request could not be met at the present time, though the whole proposal will be given every consideration before next year.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HALT VIOLENCE IN INTERIOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice of which I gave him notice. However, as he is not here, as the matter is rather important and because I get frequent inquiries I would address it to the appropriate minister from British Columbia. Has the minister anything to report to the house with respect to co-operative arrangements between the federal government and the government of British Columbia to deal effectively with the violence and the accompanying social problem which are of particular concern to the residents of the interior of British Columbia?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to draw this question to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries; and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I really think, Mr. Chairman, there is no statement required on this particular resolution. I did refer to it in the course of the budget speech on June 17, at page 1245. The house will recall that a previous bill with a similar purpose was introduced at the last session. It was referred to in a statement I made on December 6, at page 2008 of Hansard, and again at the time of the debate on the resolution preceding the introduction of the bill on January 28 and 29 I made mention of the purposes and effect of the bill, at page 3944 of Hansard.

The legislation introduced at the last session was carried to the point of first reading following approval of the resolution. The house was not asked to give second reading to the bill at that session or to carry it farther. The declared purpose of the government was to provide the fullest opportunity for study of the bill, not only by members of the house but by the public generally, and in particular by professional organizations such as accountants, the legal profession and tax advisers who are particularly interested in legislation of this kind and whose views upon it were bound to be of great assistance.

In speaking on the measure in January I asked that such organizations, and indeed individuals as well, be good enough to make a thorough study of the bill and then submit to the government their criticisms and suggestions. In the course of the budget speech I made reference to the fact that the response to this appeal had been most gratifying. We did receive from a number of national organizations briefs and submissions, and we likewise received from individuals many letters containing comments upon the bill. These have been greatly appreciated, and they have been carefully studied and reviewed.

The bill which the present resolution asks leave to introduce is founded upon the bill of last session, but it contains a substantial number of changes. I think no good purpose would be served at this stage, indeed I doubt if it would be proper, to compare this bill with the bill that was introduced last session. It is not unlikely that hon. members will be curious to know about some of the features of this bill that have been changed from the bill introduced earlier.

This leads me to make this comment, Mr. Chairman. I think the consideration of the house will best be served if such questions are reserved until the bill has been introduced and distributed, because unquestionably many of the answers will be found in the terms of the bill itself. I do make the suggestion to the house, therefore, that if the resolution could now be passed the bill would be introduced at once. Indeed, if it meets with the approval of the committee, immediately upon approval of the present resolution I would move that the committee rise and report it, asking leave of course to sit later this day in order to continue the consideration of the other budget resolutions. After reporting the resolution the bill founded upon it could then be introduced, given first reading and distributed. In this way we could expedite the review of the bill by hon. members because they would see it that much sooner.

As I indicated in my budget speech, the intention of the government is to propose that following second reading this bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce for further study and report. In the committee on banking and commerce the officials of the departments of finance and national revenue would be available and the committee would have the fullest opportunity of studying the bill in all its aspects.

There is nothing complicated about the terms of the resolution itself. It simply states:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries; and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the proposed bill is to replace the dominion succession duty with an estate duty. As I said in speaking on the earlier bill last January, the estate tax proposed will bring the Canadian practice in line with the kind of tax that has prevailed in the United Kingdom. It departs from the succession principle of the impost that is levied on estates of deceased persons and substitutes for it an estate tax, a tax that is levied with reference to the estate in aggregate without reference to particular successions, sometimes very numerous, that are either provided for by the will of the deceased or that occur under the provisions of the provincial statutes pertaining to devolution. In that respect, sir, the principle of the bill is similar to the principle of the bill introduced at the last session.

I think, therefore, if it meets with the approval of the committee, this resolution could be reported quickly. Then there will be the fullest opportunity for debate and discussion when hon. members have the bill before them. There will be an opportunity for debate on second reading, and then after reference to the committee on banking and commerce there will be ample opportunity for the study of the bill in all its aspects.

Mr. Benidickson: We are aware, Mr. Chairman, that this bill when presented will be before the banking and commerce committee. I can asure the minister that, from what I know of this group, the discussion therefor at this stage is not likely to be prolonged. On the other hand, a question of this kind, the terms of a resolution which reads—

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries; and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law.

I think is deserving of a little attention and discussion of principles at this stage. The first principle, of course, could be stated as the minister has indicated, namely that it probably involves tax reduction to the extent of $7 million.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Per annum.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, per annum. But I would point out that this in itself is not of too much consequence in so far as the principle is concerned, in that this could be done just as effectively by revision of the present statute either by alteration in the rates or by increases in the exemptions.

We must all realize that as the minister has stated, we are making a move with respect to death duties from one principle to an entirely different one. We have had in the provinces since about 1892 a death duty taxation system that has been based on succession duty or in other words inheritance tax, and we are moving to the estate tax practice which, as the minister says, is the form of taxation in death duties in the United Kingdom and in the United States.

However, I think we should have a full realization of the principles behind succession duty taxation on the beneficiaries. I would say that they are fixed under this principle probably on three bases. Firstly they vary according to the total duty value of the estate. Secondly they vary according to the value of the property passing to each beneficiary. Thirdly, there is variation depending upon the closeness of the relationship of the beneficiary to the decedent. Bill No. 248, which was given first reading on January 28, indicates that henceforth it is proposed that we shall take no account of the manner in which a person disposes of his wealth on death. Somebody might raise the question, why do we have death duties? It is true that in comparison with our total revenues, these receipts from our present succession duty act do not loom large. In the present budget I think the minister estimates revenues of about $65 million out of total revenues of $4,660 million. But I think the basic philosophy was very well stated in a recent bulletin of the tax foundation, when they said:

> In countries like the United Kingdom and Canada where capital gains are not taxed, a system of death taxation ensures as well that the capital gains of a lifetime eventually make some contribution to the society that has helped to create them.

The foundation memo said also there is another merit in it in that a final reckoning of a person's lifetime earnings and savings brings to account tax dodgers who may have accumulated a certain amount of capital by evading their proper income tax liabilities during their lifetime. I think the minister would agree that this particular statute is helpful in that regard. But we must look at some of the other problems that are involved when we make a radical change such as that which is proposed. It may be that some of these can be described as merely transitional. There are certain practical difficulties. There may be a necessity on the part of many people to look carefully upon their present wills and many may feel obliged to revise them. It may mean that the experts in the legal and accounting studies in this field will find that their experiences are fairly well knocked into a cocked hat by reason of a new principle.

Then I think we must look carefully upon the peculiar situation that exists in the province of Quebec. In that province and in the province of Ontario the governments impose and collect their own succession duties. I am no expert in this field, of course, and I expect that some of my colleagues from Quebec will speak on this point when the bill is presented and is before the house for debate on second reading; but I understand that in Quebec there is no court which will appoint an administrator, as would be the case in Ontario or other provinces, if the deceased has not done so. There is no court of probate there to which to apply as there is in Ontario and the other provinces.

Then I think we must concern ourselves with the question of whether or not there is merit in changing our form of death duty taxation without assurance that it has approval in principle by the two large provinces of Canada, which are the only ones that impose their own death duties.

Then when one relates estates tax to succession duty there is always the question raised as to whether or not we should, in favour of simplicity, allow certain elements of equity to be outweighed, based of course on the closeness of relationship to the deceased of the beneficiaries and also the question of ability to pay. Simplicity is emphasized always with respect to an estate tax. The minister placed that emphasis when he indicated that the tax principle was to be changed. I read that one of his principal advisers, whom both of us have complimented for his long service in the Department of Finance, had something to say on this matter. I refer to Dr. Eaton, who is about to leave the department. I noted that Dr. Eaton had an interesting comment to make with respect to this matter when he addressed a meeting of professionals in the field, namely lawyers and accountants. Dr. Eaton said this:

> There are an infinite variety of settlements in the form of life interests with highly imaginative contingencies involving the government in calculating the mathematical probability of a wife remarrying and the odds that she will have children.

This, of course, involves the administration in a fair amount of difficulty. I note that under the bill as advanced last January we would have from now on one rate schedule instead of five. This indicates that there is certainly a direction toward simplicity. But I think the minister himself will agree that, particularly in the province of Quebec, we are still not going to remove ourselves, in administration or otherwise, from special circumstances that will still need the assessment or guessing just what the value would be of certain contingent interests.

When the minister spoke with respect to the forthcoming bill on December 6, 1957, as reported at page 2008 of Hansard, he said this:

> —I point out that in every tax bracket the tax payable under the new law will be less than under the present Succession Duty Act.

I have compared that language with what the minister said in his budget speech on June 17. He has qualified it a bit. As reported at page 1245 of Hansard of that date he said this:

> In every tax bracket, however, . . . the revenue yield will ordinarily be less under the new bill—

I am sure that in the interval he has found, as I have by advice from some of the experts in the field such as trust companies and so on, that his first statement was not completely and universally true. There are instances, I believe, with respect to the bill presented in January where the tax even on relatively modest estates will be greater under the new proposal than under the old legislation.

I can think of a couple of illustrations. Take, for example, an estate of $100,000 under circumstances where a deceased wife whose husband is alive leaves one-quarter of the estate to each of her four dependent children. I believe that under the existing succession duty act the tax would be about $7,800 and under the new provisions, in accordance with the tables in Bill No. 248, there would be a substantial increase to $12,400. Then there is another illustration, again a modest estate of $100,000, where an unmarried woman leaves one-quarter of her estate to each of four sisters. In such a case the estate would find that it would have to pay several hundred dollars more in estate duty tax than would be the case under the present legislation.

I do not know, of course, until we see the bill whether there have been revisions in the schedules of taxing rates which will make the minister's proviso of December 6 true in all respects. There is, however, in the very nature of the estates tax a disadvantage which I think is receiving consideration, notably by women's groups in this country, and that is that the exemptions allowed by deduction of specific amounts from the total value of the estate are allowed whether or not the persons whose very existence gave rise to them are benefited. Thus an estate of a decedent survived by a widow will benefit by the exemption of $60,000; whether the estate is bequeathed to the widow or to a total stranger. This is indeed very different from the situation at the present time, where the rate of duty is determined not only by the amount passing but also by the closeness of the relationship, if any, of the beneficiary to the decedent.

Therefore from a purely philosophical and political standpoint I think this is perhaps the nub of the situation. It is true that the minister has spoken about increases in exemptions but I believe the $50,000 exemption was provided in 1948 and we would all agree that purchasing power has decreased considerably in the meantime. In this respect the Canada Trust bulletin of December, 1956 had this to say:

> It has long been contended that the contribution made by a man's wife to his estate is equal to his own and accordingly she should be allowed to claim half his estate free of duty.

It is obvious that today a person must leave a considerably larger estate to provide for his wife and children than was necessary for a similar purpose when the $50,000 exclusion was provided in 1948. I believe where a property is settled in the United Kingdom—that is to say for example where a life interest is left to a widow—there would be no tax at all with respect to that interest, and I am told that in the United States there is a uniform specific exemption of $60,000.

We have all, I believe, received very interesting briefs in this respect from some of the very important national women's groups. I particularly have in mind a brief from the Canadian committee on the status of women which was received last month addressed to the Prime Minister. The president of this committee is a distinguished Ottawa lady, Mrs. G. D. Finlayson, and I would just like to quote from this brief as follows:

> We point out to you, sir, that those married under community of property in the province of Quebec are taxed on only one-half of the family estate in the case of the death of one partner, which means that such estates, up to $100,000, are not taxable. Should this justice not be extended to all marriage partnerships in Canada? Under the United States revenue act, a husband may bequeath to his wife one-half of his estate which is totally exempt from United States inheritance tax; it recognizes this principle of equality, as do many states of the union by their community property laws.

We have also recently received in this connection a brief from the Canadian federation of university women, the vice president of which organization would, I believe, be available to the committee. She is Mrs. Frank Flaherty, whose husband is one of the distinguished members of our press gallery. Then also there are the women's institutes who are important in Canada and have a very great interest in this problem. The minister did comply the other day with a motion I made asking that all of us who might serve on the committee which will study this bill be given an opportunity of seeing briefs of this kind, some of which we may not have had an opportunity to study, so that we might better inform ourselves in preparation for the sittings of the committee.

There is one other point I would like to make to the minister, which is that I hope the adoption of the new act will not be made the occasion for the government to bring within the scope of the act legitimate transactions which are not now taxed. The bill, of which we received the format at the time of the first reading in January, did move in that direction. Again, with respect to the arbitrary rules of valuation contained in Bill No. 248, some of these were completely new, and I do think they could very severely complicate the process of valuation and might also be unfair to the taxpayer.

Hon. members will have noted that Bill No. 248 made certain departures from an administrative point of view, in that there were new provisions contained therein respecting collection and investigation. Indeed, there were incorporated some of the privileges of the administration which, when the party of the Minister of Finance was in opposition, invoked a great deal of very severe criticism from the members of that party with respect to income tax. I have in mind such things as the authority to enter and take away the books and papers of a deceased person. I can particularly recall that some members from rural Ontario, including the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand and the hon. member for Middlesex West, were very vehement about this provision in the Income Tax Act. This right has now been transferred under the new administration, as a departure from previous procedure, into the proposed estates tax act.

These things, I am sure, will be given very earnest and careful consideration by the committee on banking and commerce and, as I say, we do not know at this stage to what extent the minister has acceded to some of the objections he has doubtless received since last January. I think we will all therefore look forward with interest to the introduction of the bill.

Mr. Argue: This group sees a good deal of advantage in the proposals made and has no intention of delaying the proceedings at this time. We are quite happy to look at the bill as members of the banking and commerce committee, at which time it will be considered in greater detail. We think it is important that in any such law as that which we are now considering, small businesses should not necessarily have to be broken up when it is undesirable from a national point of view. We are hoping that these provisions will make it easier for such businesses to continue to operate in a number of instances when they would otherwise have to be broken up and disposed of upon the death of the owner.

There is one particular question I should like to ask the minister regarding the application of this proposal and it is this. Will this provision affect the revenues going to the provinces as a result of the agreements which have been signed for sharing taxes in this field? The minister said the result of this proposal would be to reduce revenue by $7 million. I take it he meant revenue to the national treasury. I am wondering if it might mean a reduction of $7 million in the total revenue over the whole field. It would seem to me that the government should not be proposing by this measure something which would reduce the revenue to the provinces which have signed agreements with the federal government. I am not sure what the answer to this particular question is, and I should like the minister to comment upon it at an appropriate time.

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, it is quite true that only now have we received, or will we receive, a copy of this bill and it is somewhat difficult, of course, to advance intelligent criticism until we have had the opportunity to study it thoroughly.

Nevertheless, as the Minister of Finance has said, we have had the advantage of having Bill No. 248 before us since December and there are a few things I should like to say about this subject, basing my remarks on Bill No. 248.

Of course the basic difference between the estates tax and succession duty as we have it now is that the estate tax will be levied against the estate, and the tax will be based on the size of the estate, whereas under the succession duty provisions the duty is levied against the recipients of the benefits and the tax is based on the size of the estate, on the amount of the benefit received by the beneficiaries and the relationship of the beneficiary to the deceased.

I admit that if the present bill goes through it will make it easy to estimate the amount of tax payable, and I am told the new rates will be progressive in character on the same principle that is embodied in the Income Tax Act. I am even told that the over-all rates may be lower. But while they may be lower today it is conceivable that within a few years they will rise in amount.

The break-down of the bill shows that part 1 deals with persons domiciled in Canada at the time of death. Under part 1 there are several subheadings such as (a) liability for tax (b) net value, aggregate of estate, (c) taxable estate (d) computation of tax-deductions, and (e) tax returns, assessment, payment and appeals. Part 2 deals with persons domiciled outside Canada at time of death, and part 3 deals with administration and method of valuing.

There are one or two things I should like to say on this section. The estate tax to be paid is on the taxable value of all property passing on the death of a person domiciled in Canada. Under the succession duty act no attempt has been made to tax real estate situate outside of Canada and owned by the deceased, and I think this new principle broadens the scope of property made subject to tax. I think it is worthy of investigation whether we want to go that far.

Under subheading (b) of part 1 we find the rules for computing the net value of the estate passing on death. According to section 4 we find that the value includes that of all property owned by the deceased, and also the value of certain other property; and the words "certain other property" are well worthy of investigation, to my mind. What could this other property be? First of all it could be a gift by trust or otherwise made within three years, if benefit had been reserved. Second, it could be property held jointly by the deceased and another person except such portion of such property as it can be established was contributed by the survivor from property other than that derived from the deceased.

As an example, a husband and wife have purchased a home; the wife contributes part of the money which she has received from the husband. She could have done something else with it; nevertheless she put the money into the purchase of this home. In that case she gets no benefit on her husband's death. On the other hand, if she paid in money she had earned herself she might be able to get some benefit.

Third, it could include the excess value of any property at the date of death over the consideration agreed to and actually paid during the deceased's lifetime for such property. As an example, there are two partners and one agrees to buy the other out on the death of the first. The increased value of the partnership is also included, and no provision is made for incentive.

Then under paragraph 4 it could include any property disposed of by any person, including an employer, on or after the death of the deceased, in recognition of services rendered by the deceased as an employee whether or not the person to whom the disposition was made held any legally enforceable right to such disposition. Thus, for example, if an employer desired to give one year's salary to the widow of an employee on the latter's death, she would have to pay double tax. The year's salary would be subject to income tax, and second it would be subject to estate tax, and I think this question should be considered very carefully.

Then under paragraph 5 it could include the proceeds of any life insurance policy payable to a company controlled by the deceased. Thus, for example, if someone owns 51 per cent of the stock of a company—and we can assume he controls the company—and enters into a loan for business purposes of let us say $100,000 and, in order to guarantee eventual repayment of that loan, insurance is taken out; after the 51 per cent shareholder dies that $100,000 of insurance taken to secure the loan by the bank is deemed to be part of the estate. So again we have double taxation; first on the increase in the value of the company due to the addition of $100,000, and second when the $100,000 is added to the value of the estate, even though the estate did not receive that $100,000. These are new provisions, and I think they are grossly unfair.

Then under paragraph 6 the proceeds of any insurance payable to the spouse or child of the deceased, unless it can be shown that the premiums for such insurance had been paid from property other than property derived from the deceased, can also be included. The effect of this is that all third party insurance applied for and owned by a spouse or child is taxable as forming part of the estate unless it can be shown that the amount used to pay premiums came from a source other than the deceased. Now, if I desire to make a gift of money to my wife she can do anything with that money except buy insurance; but if she does buy insurance then the proceeds are taxed. It would appear that insurance is being discriminated against, yet life insurance is the one protection which so many people desire in order to have the ready cash to help pay these death duties.

Under subsection (c) on taxable value exemptions, I will not go over the figures which have been given—the basic exemption of $30,000, the $60,000 to a widow, infirm husband, child under 21, wholly dependent child over 21, plus $10,000 for each such child. There is a $15,000 exemption in cases where there is no spouse but there are dependent children, plus the basic exemption of $30,000. These exemptions are allowed even though the person because of whom the exemption is allowed receives no benefit from the deceased's estate. This concerns us very materially in the province of Quebec. I will not take the time of the house at this moment to discuss that point further, but it is a matter well worth looking into.

Section 9, of course, is subsection "d" concerning computation and deductions, sets out the table of rates. Under the succession duty act we calculate the value on the benefit to the beneficiaries, but under the proposed estates tax act it is the size of the net taxable estate which pays the duties.

Under subsection "e" concerning returns, assessment, payments and appeals there is a matter I would like to refer to in section 14. Under the present act the executor must file tax returns within six months, and he must estimate the amount. We have no quarrel with that. However, under the proposed estates tax act the estate is liable for the tax and it must be paid within six months. Under the succession duty act the primary liability is not the executor's but rests on the beneficiary. We think the proposed arrangement is perhaps going a little too far.

Part 2 concerns persons domiciled outside of Canada and property owned in Canada by persons domiciled outside. There is a flat tax rate of 15 per cent which is charged. No allowances are made for debts or encumbrances, and there are no exemptions. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance about the case of a non-resident who owns real estate in Canada which is subject to a substantial mortgage. At the present time it is the equity interest of the real estate and not the value of the real estate which is subject to tax. Under the proposal submitted to the house today the real estate would be calculated at its total market value.

We come now to part 3 under the heading "Administration". The powers given under this part, to my way of thinking, are too great and go too far. It seems to me there has been an attempt to take the powers which have been incorporated in the Income Tax Act and apply them to the proposed estate tax act. My learned friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has already discussed this to some extent this afternoon and we will have more to say about it later.

Section 52 provides that in determining the value of any property no allowance or deduction shall be made for or on account of income tax. It is, of course, the Department of National Revenue which takes care of income tax and which, I presume, will administer the estates tax act. This section provides that if the Department of National Revenue levies income tax against certain property, such income tax cannot be deducted in arriving at the value of such property upon which the department levies estate tax. To my way of thinking this is most unreasonable and unfair, and shows no consideration by the tax collector for the rights and equities of the taxpayer.

Section 54 deals with shares in controlled companies. We can examine that question further at some future time. I suppose in general the estate tax principle is sound, and certainly the administration will be greatly simplified. Recognition of family ties is included in the higher exemptions allowed. Many uncertainties which exist under the succession duty act have been avoided and corrected. However, it seems to me that in attempting to plug every loophole the draftsmen have gone too far and have adversely affected the carrying on of normal business to which my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred.

The principle of valuation at date of death may result in tax being levied in many cases on value in excess of the realizable value, which seems unreasonable and unfair. Certainly adverse treatment is given to life insurance and discrimination is shown in regard to it as compared with other property. These are questions that will have to be carefully examined.

I have just a few words to say with regard to the system in the province of Quebec. This is an intricate subject, and I do not want to take the time of the house unduly in discussing it. Under the succession duty act in the province of Quebec certain customs and procedures have grown up and the people of that province have grown accustomed to the operation of the act, even though they may dislike it. In Quebec we have, as has Ontario, I presume, a system whereby relationship has a great deal to do with the payment of the tax, the relationship of first the wife, then the children, the collaterals and strangers.

We have always based ourselves on that close relationship which is part of the family concept. Many wills, trusts and other arrangements have been entered into on that basis with much thought and care, and now this is apparently to go by the board. Under the proposed estates tax act we have to determine how much there is in the estate, and then we pay the tax. The relationship does not count, and the wife is on the same basis as any stranger in relation to the estate. In fact the sole fact of there being a wife gives a $60,000 exemption.

As I mentioned earlier we are opposed to certain broad provisions which extend the collection principles of the Income Tax Act to the estates tax bill. It would perhaps be more difficult to collect money such as income which may be floating. When we are dealing with the capital of an estate there is not the same danger. In the case of capital it is usually either on deposit with the bank or, in the case of securities, registered or unregistered, they are usually in a safety deposit box. In the case of mortgages you cannot run away with them because they have to be transferred in a careful and legal manner. There is not the same urgency as under the Income Tax Act for these provisions with regard to collection.

Naturally if there is any danger of fraud the provisions should be reasonably strong and helpful; but we say the dangers of fraud in this connection are not nearly as great as they might be under the Income Tax Act. I think it is unfair to tax certain arrangements which are justified in order to reach others which are not justified. I do not know the number in the province of Quebec, but I presume there must be many contracts between fathers and sons for the sale of farms. A contract to sell a farm may be made for a 15-year period. In no sense is there any attempt to defraud the government. I say we should not deal with cases such as these as though we were dealing with criminals.

In summary, we are not against the estates tax principle. We point out that there are and there will be certain difficulties in dealing with the question in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I object to certain collection provisions. It is impossible to tell how efficient the bill is until we have seen its terms. We look forward to a careful examination of the terms proposed by the Minister of Finance in the committee to which this bill will be referred.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I just have one observation to make arising from the fear that perhaps the minister or his advisers possibly may have overlooked to some degree a situation peculiar to the province of Quebec. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will allow me to make some reference to one of the provisions of the income tax resolution which is necessarily associated with succession duties.

I should like to point out that under paragraph 6 of the income tax resolution provision is made whereby a husband can transfer to his wife once in his lifetime a $10,000 interest in their common home or residence. If this provision is not carefully handled in the province of Quebec which, as you know, Mr. Chairman, is the only one of the ten provinces—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but surely he is talking about paragraph 6 of the income tax resolution.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister is perfectly right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What has that to do with the resolution now before the committee which is a resolution in relation to estate tax?

Mr. Crestohl: I did address myself to the chair and said that I must refer to one of the sections in the income tax resolution in order to associate my argument with the succession duty act. I think the minister missed that part of my statement.

[Mr. Macnaughton.]

Mr. Chevrier: He was preoccupied.

Mr. Crestohl: It is quite all right but I think if he hears my statement he may find it helpful rather than critical. A husband in the province of Quebec who desires to transfer a $10,000 interest to his wife under that section of the income tax resolution can certainly do so but under the laws of the province of Quebec where husband and wife are common as to property he cannot do it. In other words, we in the province of Quebec feel that because we are a community as to property province—I can see the minister is a little uneasy but he does not have to be.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to proceed with the resolution before us. I do not wish to have disputes over points of order. With all respect to my hon. friend, up to this point he has not shown any relevancy to the matter of estate duty.

Mr. Crestohl: I certainly will.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I fully expect that my friend will be raising this question when we come to the sixth paragraph in the resolution respecting changes in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Crestohl: But it might be too late then because the $10,000 under the system in the province of Quebec, where there is community as to property, will revert to the succession and that is why I want to tie it in. In the province of Quebec the husband and wife who are common as to property will lose the benefit of having such a transfer made. In that province no gift can be made by a husband to his wife who is common as to property. I have examined the matter rather carefully.

Let us assume that the husband does make a transfer of title to his wife. The wife may later be prejudiced in this way. When the husband dies the wife will not be the owner of a half interest in a $20,000 home because she will not have title to the $10,000 which her husband gave her under the Income Tax Act. Therefore the amount will revert right into the succession. As a result genuine prejudice is suffered there.

Let me put it in figures. Let us assume there is a $100,000 estate. If the wife had received what she thought was a gift of $10,000 from her husband under the Income Tax Act provision she would be left with a $90,000 estate because the estate would be depleted by the $10,000 which the husband had given to his wife. Assuming there are no children, the wife is entitled to a $60,000 exemption. There would then be an estate of $30,000. But if it is later found that the transfer of the gift to the wife, who is common as to property, is void there will be a $40,000 estate that will be taxable. I am simply pointing out to the minister that I think that matter will require very serious study.

If the peculiar situation in the province of Quebec with respect to husbands and wives who are common as to property has been given consideration, then the problem will be solved, but I simply rise to draw the minister's attention to the fact that there is that danger in the province of Quebec. Estates generally may be $10,000 greater. They cannot be any more because the gift cannot exceed $10,000 but the value of the estate may be $10,000 more when the deceased really thought he had given his wife a gift of $10,000 thus reducing his estate by that amount. That is the only observation I want to make to the minister.

Mr. McIlraith: Does the minister want to deal with the point?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not until everybody has finished speaking.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret that the minister did not see fit to make a fuller statement in introducing the resolution. I say that because in his budget speech when he tabled the resolution he set out the procedure he proposed to follow and pointed out that the resolution would afford the house an opportunity for debate on the general principles underlying the proposal.

My difficulty is this. Legislation on this subject was first proposed by the former government. After the election of June 10, 1957 a resolution and bill were introduced, the bill being presented for study by members of the House of Commons and the general public, a procedure that I think was quite appropriate in the circumstances. But we are now in the position that we are in the committee stage on the resolution preceding the new bill which we have not yet seen. The advantage of being in committee is that it is possible to ask the minister questions and to approve or reject the principle—I am quite sure it will be approved—of having a new bill brought forward for examination and action by the house.

However, we are left in the position that when the house adopts the resolution it will have approved a principle about which it has not been given information by the minister presenting the measure. If we treat the matter on the basis of the bill introduced last year, we then find ourselves discussing a bill that may or may not be the one coming before the house, but if we do not attempt to discuss that bill we lose our right to ask the minister questions until after we have approved the principle of the new estate tax bill and it has been presented for second reading and referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Therefore the fact that the minister has made such a brief statement leaves the house in a bit of difficulty. I should like to ask the minister if he would tell us at this stage whether or not there are any material changes in the principle affecting allowances for the amount of duty payable to the provinces because that would be an important departure in principle with respect to the financial arrangements.

There is also one point that bothers me considerably. The whole principle of the act now in force is based on a concept that I think members of the house and certainly former governments were very careful to preserve, namely the recognition of the family unit as the basic unit in our social structure.

Whatever weaknesses the years of experience with the former dominion succession duty act showed, and weaknesses were revealed over the years by administrative experience, I think all hon. members would agree that that principle of making special and advantageous provision for those persons to whom the decedent was obligated by reason of family relationships was a good principle. This principle was observed in the bill introduced last year to the extent that the amount of exemption allowed in any estate was increased where there was immediate family relationships, but that was departed from when they dealt with the rates of duty.

I think the minister at this stage would wish to clear up the point as to how far the bill he proposes to introduce when this resolution is passed preserves that principle, because that is a principle that should be dealt with at the resolution stage. I trust he will not mind me asking him to clarify that point at this stage. I believe that principle is really quite important, because the more one works and concerns oneself in the House of Commons with the issues that arise here from day to day, whether on this type of measure or a defence measure or whatever it may be, the more he is impressed with the fact that the type of struggle arising in the world today is concerned with this basic concept. All members will I am sure agree that we should concern ourselves with attempting to deal with our legislation in a way that will preserve and strengthen the family unit as the basis of our social structure.

I trust the minister will not mind my stressing the point a bit at this stage. I wonder if the minister would care to indicate any other changes in principle in the legislation he proposes to introduce. Perhaps I could give him an opportunity of dealing with these points before going farther, because it may not be necessary to go farther at this stage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A few points have been made, Mr. Chairman, in the course of remarks by hon. members. Let me say, in the first place, that discussion of the terms of Bill No. 248 as introduced at the last session is not particularly profitable at this point until the house has the new bill before it. Of course, it will have ample opportunity of discussing the terms of the new bill on second reading, and again in committee. I said in my earlier remarks that a substantial number of changes have been introduced into this bill as compared with Bill No. 248 of the previous session.

The hon. member for Ottawa West has talked about the principle. Here we are dealing not with the bill on second reading where the principle is the matter upon which the house is called upon to decide; at this point, in committee of ways and means, with a resolution before the committee, the committee is not asked to pass on the terms of the bill in any respect. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, discussion of the terms that may or may not be in the bill is, I think, anticipatory at best and profitless under any circumstances because there will be a proper stage for discussion of those matters after hon. members have the terms of the bill before them.

The hon. member for Ottawa West said that the principle of the estate tax had been introduced by the former Liberal government—

Mr. McIlraith: No, I did not mean to convey that impression.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then we are not at cross-purposes. The bill had been worked on in the department before the change of government, but had not been introduced by my predecessor. However, the kind of bill that had been prepared, but had never been introduced, was a bill embodying the estate tax principle.

Mr. McIlraith: Just on that point, and before we leave it, the previous government had not approved that principle. The departmental people had been preparing a bill, and I do not believe the minister would want to leave the impression the previous government had dealt with the principle and approved of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not raise this point. My hon. friend raised it. I am simply putting the record straight with regard to the part played by the former government in the matter. My statement stands in that regard.

The hon. member for Assiniboia raised a question in regard to the effect of the present measure on the fiscal revenues accruing to the provinces from the succession duty. This bill and the present Dominion Succession Duty Act have no terms in them bearing directly on this question at all. It is the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act which governs that question, and that statute does make provision for the proper allocation of the yields from the succession duty—I am paraphrasing the legislation—or in effect any substituted tax. When this new bill is enacted, and the new type of tax comes into effect, the yield from it will be dealt with in the light of the provisions of the tax-sharing agreements act in the same way as the yield from the present succession duty.

There will obviously be some slight diminution in the yield to the eight provinces which have rented the succession duty field to the federal government as a result of the reductions in the yield under this present estate tax as compared with the succession duty. Those reductions, in the case of any particular province, will not be particularly large when one has regard for the figures I have already given to the committee concerning the total diminution in the expected yield from this tax as compared with the yield under the present succession duty act.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the procedure in the committee, to which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred, of course the briefs that were submitted by the national organizations will be available to the committee and the departmental officials will be there to discuss them. The bill will make clear to what extent the various submissions have been adopted in the bill and to what extent they have not been adopted, and of course the minister will be there to explain, if he can, why that course was followed and to defend the course that the government has taken in framing the legislation in the terms in which it will appear when the bill is introduced.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I might not have succeeded in making myself clear to the Minister of Finance, and I regret that I did not. I was not intending to claim that the Liberal government had introduced a new bill replacing the Dominion Succession Duty Act. As I understood the situation, considerable work had been done on drafting a new bill to be introduced. It was stated by the Liberal government that they intended to introduce a new bill on this subject replacing the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

I am quite sure that he would want the record to be clear on that matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct; and that bill which we found in the departmental files and which had been prepared by the former government is one that embodied the estate tax principle.

Mr. McIlraith: That is precisely the next point that I am coming to, Mr. Chairman. The minister now makes the statement that he found in the department's files a bill that had been prepared involving the estate tax principle. At that point I think it is only fair to hon. members to have them understand—and I am sure they will agree—that that bill was not before the cabinet for approval in principle at all. That was the work of departmental employees in preparing a bill for submission to their minister and for submission presumably by the minister to the cabinet and for introduction to parliament. By his remarks I would hope he does not mean to present the implication that the former government approved the estate tax principle because, as I understand the matter, it had not been fully dealt with. It may well be that they would have approved it. I am not suggesting that. However, I want to have the record straight as to what the position was.

In my remarks a few moments ago I was extremely careful to make it clear that I did not want to discuss the bill introduced by the minister last session, namely Bill No. 248. I thought the minister followed a commendable procedure in introducing that bill and in presenting it as he did for public examination and criticism or suggested amendment. I commend him for that procedure. But our difficulty today is that we can not discuss that bill and in my remarks I was careful not to discuss it. The resolution before the house—and may I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are back in the position of not having insisted on your reading it at the start of these proceedings; it is unfortunate that it was not read—is as follows:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries; and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law.

My point is this. The proceedings now before the house consist of the minister asking the house to approve or to decide that it is expedient to introduce this new measure doing away with an act that follows a certain principle of taxing property passing on death—whatever the virtues of the act—it was based on the principle of a high recognition of the family concept of social structure in this country. To replace it by a new estate tax which provides that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass on death be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries is now proposed by this resolution.

We are not asking for the details of the bill he proposes to introduce. But before we can intelligently decide whether or not it is expedient that he be enabled to introduce his bill I respectfully suggest that we are entitled to know the extent to which the new bill will depart from that principle and only the extent to which it does depart from it. I do not expect him to give the provisions of the bill at all. However, I say that before he can get approval of this resolution he ought properly to give us that bit of information.

It can be very simply given. We know what it is in Bill No. 248. I mentioned what it was in Bill No. 248. That bill retained it in part and departed from it in part. I should like to know what will happen in the legislation he proposes; because if this principle of taxation is changed, then that is the matter this house is passing on in debating this resolution.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to ask the minister, from the reading of this resolution, whether the intention is to tax all property which passes on death, whether the property is located in Canada or out of Canada and whether the property out of Canada was earned out of Canada. I should like to know whether it was the intention of the minister to include all that property which is not now as fully covered under the succession duty act as it would be under a new act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend's question relates to the terms of the bill rather than the terms of the resolution. I well appreciate the fact that individual members have individual questions which are of considerable interest to them with respect to what may be found in the bill. The hon. member for Ottawa West has indicated a matter in which he is particularly interested to know what the bill provides.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend the hon. member for Cartier is asking a question not about the terms of the resolution but about the terms contained in the bill to be introduced following adoption of the resolution. With respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the way for hon. members to satisfy their legitimate interest in the terms of the bill is to pass the resolution and let us introduce the bill. They are not tying their hands in any way as to questions of principle. There will be opportunity afforded on second reading for discussion of the principle of the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: No questions can be asked then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The resolution is in limited terms. All that the house is being asked to do by the resolution is to approve the introduction of a measure in the terms of the resolution. Beyond that, the questions obviously relate to the terms of the bill. With respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that that is not the function of the procedures provided by the rules of the house for consideration in committee of ways and means on the resolution at this stage. Those questions will all find their answers very readily in the terms of the bill when it is introduced.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I must pursue the point a bit further, Mr. Chairman. I am not interested at this stage in the terms of the bill. We will get those in due course. I am interested in the resolution which says:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to replace the present Dominion Succession Duty Act, to provide that the tax on property passing or deemed to pass, on death, be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased rather than the property contained in the bequests from the estate to the beneficiaries;—

And so on. So that there will be no doubt in the minister's mind about it, may I ask him this question about the language in the resolution, and I quote it:

> —be computed by reference to the property comprising the estate of the deceased—

Does that language include a reference to the relationship of the beneficiaries or does it include only a reference to the amount of property passing? Surely there can be no doubt of the relevance of that question. I have read the language right from the resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That question can only be answered by reference to the bill and not simply a general reference to it. It would mean a detailed reference to the terms of the bill. I ask my hon. friend to let us bring in the bill. He will have the complete answer to his question in the detailed terms of the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: The point is rather interesting, Mr. Chairman. The house is being asked to decide whether or not it is expedient that the minister be enabled to bring this bill before it, a taxing bill. In three or four sentences the resolution sets out exactly what they propose to do. We are entitled to have information about all the taxing aspects of it. We are entitled to have information as to the words used and what he intends them to mean. It is quite true that we could get the bill and read it and determine the principle involved but at this stage I would point out that we cannot ask the minister any questions prior to debating second reading of the bill, and it is our right to ask the minister questions that is the whole purpose of this proceeding.

Mr. Crestohl: With great respect, I wish to point out to the minister that I was not asking for information as to what might be in the bill. I was asking for an interpretation of some words in the resolution, what do they mean: "Tax on property passing or deemed to pass". I want an interpretation, and this could influence my decision as to whether or not I was in favour of the general principle of a resolution of this kind. Is it intended to include property located or earned outside of Canada?

It is a simple matter of interpretation of language in the resolution. It speaks of property; does that mean all of the property of the deceased or all of the property of the deceased which is located in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is well acquainted with the provisions of the present Dominion Succession Duty Act which purports to tax the estate of a deceased person who had a Canadian domicile, wherever his property might be located, inside or outside of Canada. Obviously the measure the house is now being asked to permit us to introduce is one which will provide rules with reference to the determination of what is the taxable estate of a deceased person who had a Canadian domicile. The bill will have to provide, and does provide, as does the Dominion Succession Duty Act, for the taxation of property in Canada of persons who have died and who had a domicile outside of Canada. Any measure of this kind has to take into account both these cases, just as does the present Dominion Succession Duty Act. The resolution about which my hon. friend asks refers to property, and obviously a bill of this kind would be quite incomplete if it did not make provision for both these cases. This bill will do so.

Mr. Regier: The minister will be surprised that I have some nice remarks to make about him for a change. I am very pleased to be able to congratulate the minister and the government upon the manner in which they are approaching, not only this problem but one or two other problems.

We had for too long a government which had made up its mind to follow a certain course of action and regardless of the reaction of the Canadian people to its proposals insisted on not allowing any amendments along the way. I have in mind particularly the present government's proposal to introduce a bill providing for the humane slaughter of animals and this bill dealing with estate tax. The intention of the government was announced during the last parliament and the government waited for public reaction to make itself felt and I feel that this is a particularly progressive move under our democratic system.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not new. What about the Criminal Code and other big measures?

Mr. Regier: I am not saying the former government never did this, but in the main its attitude was that it had all the answers and the general public had to depend for its salvation on the wisdom of the boys in the back room. I hope in the years ahead we will see the adoption of similar procedures in many other measures.

I noted with appreciation the answer of the minister to the hon. member for Assiniboia. Unless I misunderstood the minister the provincial revenues have to pay a part of the $7 milllion loss of revenue which the federal government anticipates. In other words, the amount of money available to the provinces under the tax rental sharing agreements will be slightly reduced. I wonder if the government is able to inform us as to approximately how much of the anticipated $7 decline in revenue will have to be borne by the provinces in the form of reduced payments to them and, if he has the information available, I would like a breakdown by provinces. The actual breakdown could be left for the meeting of the banking and commerce committee. However, out of the $7 million, is the minister able to indicate how large a burden will be borne by the provinces?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not precisely. The figure of $7 million is an estimate. The Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act provides for the sharing of the yield from the succession duty on the basis of 50 per cent going to the province concerned. My hon. friend will recall there is a different situation respecting the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which provinces still collect their own succession duty and, so far as we know, will continue to do so. I am afraid it is not possible, therefore, to give to my hon. friend anything which could purport to be an accurate estimate and I am certainly not in a position to do so at the present time.

Mr. Regier: It is about half?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That fifty per cent would apply with respect to the eight provinces, but I would have to have more information concerning the present figures on the accruals in Ontario and Quebec and the effect of the deductions permitted under the present succession duty act before attempting to make a comparison or to carry the figures further than I have already done.

Mr. Argue: I think the statement of the minister that part of the $7 million will be an expense to the provinces, because of action taken by the federal government, is a very disturbing one, and that it puts the provinces in a very difficult position to have a certain level of revenue assured to them at a time they sign a tax-sharing agreement and then to have that revenue reduced as a result of subsequent action by the federal government. I feel this is a very bad principle which if carried too far, would lead to a worsening of federal-provincial relations.

In my belief, the principle applying, as I understand it, under the act to income tax agreements, whereby if the federal government reduces income tax the revenue to the provinces is nevertheless guaranteed, is the right one. I have the acts in front of me and I am certainly in favour of the provision but this is a very bad practice and a very bad principle, I would think, where the federal government is taking an action—albeit a very popular action in the minds of the public—as a result of which the provinces bear half the cost. I would hope, therefore, that in the future in agreements with respect to the sharing of taxes the provinces' income will be assured and if the federal government decides, on its own volition, to reduce the general level of taxes that there would be taken subsequent federal action to maintain the revenues of the provinces. I think this is a very reasonable suggestion because of the well-known fact that the federal government collects the bulk of the taxation revenue in this country. I believe it is something like 70 cents out of each taxation dollar.

We shall have something further to say on this point when the minister has more detailed information but I might say to him that, as far as the result of this move is concerned, we feel it is a very serious matter and that steps should be taken to maintain the revenues of the provincial governments, particularly at a time when there is a general economic recession and provincial revenues, in some cases at any rate, are likely to fall very considerably.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has, I think, completely overlooked the fact that the stabilization principle, as written into the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, applies to the yield from succession duty as well as personal income tax and corporation tax. In the second place, the parliament of Canada could not at the time of entering into a tax-sharing arrangements act bind itself to make no change in the future in either the nature of the succession duty or the rates, any more than it could bind itself for the five-year period with respect to the provisions for the rates applied under the Income Tax Act. The legislation embodied in the tax-sharing agreements act takes that quite plainly into account in recognizing that the 50 per cent portion to which the provinces are to be entitled in the event of renting the succession duty field to the federal government is the yield from the succession duty or from any substitute tax in the field of impositions in the case of death.

Mr. Crestohl: After the minister's various explanations I am now satisfied with the resolution, and some of the questions I had in my mind have been answered. But I should like to ask him what is the purpose of the words "and also to consolidate, revise and simplify the tax law". If we are now discussing a resolution by which we are doing away with the old law and introducing a brand new law, what is there left to consolidate, revise and simplify? There is no old law and no old regulations. There may have been a great many which required consolidation or revision, but since we are doing away with them, what is the purpose of the words I have quoted? I like to rely on the rule of ordinary interpretation, that some meaning should be given to language rather than no meaning. What is the meaning of these additional words?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member on reflection will realize that the proposed measure cannot and should not repeal the succession duty act. That act must still continue in effect to govern the taxation of estates of all persons dying up to the date on which the new act is proclaimed to come into force, and the provisions of the old act must be continued until the assessment of all the estates governed by the old act has been completed for all purposes.

Some of the provisions of the Dominion Sucession Duty Act, as indeed some of the provisions of the proposed new bill, relate in particular to the extent and nature of the tax. They are the sections which embody, in the case of the present act, the succession duty principle and, in the case of the new bill, the estate tax principle. In both cases besides these essential provisions of either bill there must be a number of other provisions dealing with questions such as enforcement, collection, administration, and many other things which will readily occur to the hon. member, which must be written into any measure of this kind whether it is based upon the succession duty principle or the estate tax principle. In the clauses of the new bill there will be provisions of that kind and they will have application to estates which are governed by the new bill. But the present act will continue to apply in all respects to the estates of persons dying up to the date on which the new act comes into effect.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance has read the answer given by his assistant deputy minister for taxation to the last question raised by the hon. member for Cartier, in the address to which I referred in my remarks? Dr. Eaton, in that address, put it this way—he quoted, of course, the resolution which was introduced prior to the first reading of the bill last session, and the resolution presented to us today is in the same wording—when he told a gathering of lawyers, as reported in the Canadian Tax Journal:

> This resolution seems to imply that the simplification job is confined to "those provisions of the present act that continue to be appropriate". Actually, of course, the main simplification follows from the major operation itself, the hysterectomy which removed from the law the principle which with such fertility gave birth to so many problem children.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution goes through, I have in front of me an act entitled the Federal-Provincial Tax-sharing Agreements Act, 1956, and subsection 2 of section 3 outlines what has to be done if there is any change in the federal government's rates of succession duty. I know the minister is very much aware of this section, which reads in part:

> Where from time to time by reason of a change in the rates of tax or in personal exemptions or allowances for dependants as defined in the regulations, the effective rate of individual income tax or of succession duty differs from the corresponding effective rate applicable—

And then certain dates are listed—

> —the minister shall alter the standard individual rate or the standard succession duty rate, or both, as the case may be, in relation to the corresponding effective rate, so that the ratio of the new standard rate to the former standard rate varies inversely with the ratio of the new effective rate to the former effective rate.

I take that section to mean that if the rates are changed under the succession duty act so as to lower by this means the amount of money which is paid to the provinces, there is compensation made as a result of this section in order to maintain the payments to the provinces. However, if there is a change in the act itself and a new act, another type of act, is substituted, then this provision does not apply. Certainly, on the minister's own statement, one of the results of what is now being done will be to reduce revenues to provinces which have tax-sharing agreements with the federal government, and again I protest this result. I suggest to the minister that an appropriate amendment should be made in the bill to maintain the revenues of the provinces which have signed tax-sharing agreements.

Resolution agreed to.

ESTATE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-37, respecting the taxation of estates.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

INCOME TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

1. That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed by a medical practitioner and recorded by a licensed pharmacist be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

2. That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for eyeglasses, artificial eyes, laboratory or other diagnostic services or transportation to or from a hospital by ambulance be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

3. That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount deductible by corporations for contributions to charitable organizations be increased from 5% of income to 10% of income.

4. That the rate of interest payable to taxpayers on overpayments of tax for 1958 and subsequent taxation years be increased from 2% to 3%.

5. That the two year period within which a taxpayer may apply for a refund of an overpayment of tax for a taxation year be increased to four years from the end of the taxation year.

6. That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years a gift to the spouse of a donor of real property to be used by the donor and the spouse as their home, or a gift to a child of the donor of farm real property to be used in farming operations carried on by the child, or by the child and the donor, shall be exempt from gift tax to the extent of $10,000, provided that no such exemption shall apply more than once during the lifetime of the donor.

7. That the amount by which any gift tax paid on a gift made within three years prior to death exceeds any succession duty or estate tax subsequently imposed in respect of a death after June 17, 1958, on that gift under any act of the parliament of Canada will be refunded.

8. That with effect after June 17, 1958, the exemption from the tax on income of non-resident persons now granted in respect of dividends paid by a non-resident-owned investment corporation be changed so as to apply only in respect of dividends paid after the time when the corporation has paid out dividends which in the aggregate equal the undistributed earnings accumulated by the corporation in years when it was not a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, has the minister any amendments in contemplation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is a slight amendment in the first paragraph of the present resolution. I feel it might facilitate the orderly discussion of the present resolutions, if it were agreeable to the committee, if we were to take up the resolution paragraph by paragraph. We have before us just the one resolution to amend the Income Tax Act. The eight paragraphs that follow are all part of one resolution. If it meets with the approval of the committee I am sure it would contribute to orderly discussion if we were to proceed paragraph by paragraph. If it meets with your approval, Mr. Chairman, I will now speak to the first paragraph to which there is an amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I had a few remarks to make but I thought if there were any amendments to be made to the resolutions we would at least have the dinner recess during which to think about them. Apart from that, I will go on with the general remarks I had in mind.

The Chairman: Is it agreeable to the committee that the resolution before us be taken paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. McIlraith: Not yet, Mr. Chairman. Does the minister propose to make a general statement before adopting the procedure of taking the resolution paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, sir.

Mr. Benidickson: Well then, Mr. Chairman, as the committee knows we are now in the second stage of our budget procedure, having concluded an eight-day debate. At this point I propose to be consistent with the stand I took in the past that remarks must be related to the statute the resolution refers to, namely the Income Tax Act. When one realizes that we are considering in the committee of ways and means resolutions which only affect either personal income tax or corporation income tax to the extent of $1 million for each category in fields that involve the raising of revenue in excess of $3 billion, one must conclude that some of the attempts to dub the budget in general have now proven true and appropriate and the ones that probably appeal to me most after the event, and I think particularly in relation to this statute, are such appellations as the "hope to God" budget—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It is obvious that my hon. friend is about to embark on a discussion of the budget in general. In accordance with the rules of the house we have had an eight-day debate on the budget.

The budget has been adopted and what is now before the committee is a resolution in these words:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:—

Then are set out eight paragraphs indicating specifically in each case an amendment to the act. The rules of the house set an eight-day limit on the duration of the budget debate for a purpose. Surely the plainest way to undo the effect of the rules of the house is to allow in committee of ways and means another budget debate. My hon. friend has gone far enough already to have indicated quite clearly that he wants to discuss the budget—

Mr. Benidickson: Not at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend started out by calling the budget by various names.

Mr. Argue: Why not call the resolution by the same names?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whatever may be said about my hon. friend's appellations of the budget in the proper place, which is obviously in the house, it is clear that the house has passed that stage of discussion and we now have a resolution before us. The debate should now proceed with due regard and be relevant to the terms of the resolutions before us and this should not be made the occasion of another budget debate.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, apparently the minister does not desire to make any general remarks himself on this resolution which covers the whole question of the income tax aspect of the budget. He prefers as is his right—although I suggest it is not normal practice—to discuss the resolution paragraph by paragraph. My friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, as is his right, wished to make general observations covering the whole income tax aspect of the budget which is now covered by this resolution. I suggest that he is entirely in order in following that course.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, not only do I feel that I am in order but I have taken the care to read very carefully the debates that have taken place at this stage in the last three years since the rules were amended and I recall very definitely that from time to time my hon. friends when they were on this side of the house did attempt to question the balance of ways and means and the likelihood of there being a surplus or deficit and matters of that kind and the Chairman very properly called them to order. But in all of those debates on the resolution stage I find that there has been no restriction whatsoever, if one refers not only to the items that are in the resolutions but also to subjects that one might expect to have found treated in the resolution and were not. That is what I had in mind when I introduced my remarks and said that with respect to the changes in the income tax aspect there seems to have been what might be described as "cross your fingers" type of planning with respect to income tax because only $1 million is contemplated in this resolution as a reduction in personal income tax and $1 million on corporation income tax.

This brings me to express the surprise that many people not only in the house but in the country will have with the recommendations the minister is advancing here. We all recall what a great champion he was for tax reductions. We are faced today with this very minimal performance and I feel I have every reason and every right to present to the committee at this stage what I believe is the very changed appearance in my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and even in his leader because they certainly appear to be very dry-eyed today with respect to the taxpayer.

Before I proceed may I say that I will not be the only one in this house who regrets that the hon. member for Carleton is not able to officially sit beside the Minister of Finance. I felt that when he spoke so eloquently in the budget debate on June 20 he was certainly preaching for a call or a recall but it does not seem that so far the whistle has been provided. However, it was indeed a very effective speech. The only criticism that I would make of it was that following the first two speakers, including myself, it was so obviously a prefabricated speech and so well prepared that it could be understood why it did not fit—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but actually at this time we cannot go back to the budget debate.

Mr. Benidickson: I will conclude my sentence and say that it did not fit the arguments he was attempting to knock down.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Chairman is on his feet.

The Chairman: Order. I wish to carry on with my statement. At present we are discussing a resolution affecting the Income Tax Act. We can talk about it in general terms provided the discussion bears on the items appearing in the resolution, some eight clauses which will eventually be dealt with one by one. I must bring to the attention of the committee standing order 59, paragraph 2 of which reads as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Therefore I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks strictly to the items being discussed at present and not refer to the budget debate.

Mr. Benidickson: I am referring to the Income Tax Act, with some digression, of course, with respect to the hon. member for Carleton. It is my purpose to confine my remarks to the whole Income Tax Act. That, I think, is the standard practice and privilege. It certainly was the practice of my hon. friends.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not at all.

Mr. Benidickson: Indeed it was, sir. I have checked very recently my hon. friend's own remarks, those of the present Prime Minister and those of the hon. member for Greenwood and others in the last three years in their opening speeches on the budget resolution with respect to income tax, and my words will certainly be confirmed if my hon. friend will also check.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is making an observation on the point of order that you have raised, I think this is the situation. In times past ministers of finance have at this stage taken objection to any digression from the terms of the resolution or matters related to the resolution so as to be relevant to the terms of the resolution. I think that is the rule fairly stated. In previous sessions when hon. members have sought to take advantage of the calling of a new resolution to embark upon a general discussion, to reopen the budget debate or to make observations that they wished they had made during the budget debate and things of that kind, the chairman has ruled them out of order. With respect, Mr. Chairman, if my friend is now assuming to discuss any matters affecting the Income Tax Act regardless of the terms of the resolution before the house he is clearly serving notice that he is going to embark on a course that is strictly out of order. I submit to you, sir, that the rule you have read governs the present situation and that my friend should confine his remarks to the resolution, that is to say, matters contained in the resolution or matters related by relevancy to those that are contained in the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I reiterate that never in the last three years has objection been taken by previous ministers of finance if the discussion was related to the act which the resolution now before us indicates is to be amended. There has always been an opportunity to refer at this stage, not only to the particular paragraphs in the resolution before the committee but to certain aspects of the resolution or additions to it that could very well be included.

As the minister himself has said, this is one resolution with several paragraphs. I think that any member has every right to indicate that the resolution is incomplete, that one would have expected certain other items to be included in the paragraphs of the resolution. It is to that point that I propose to address myself in all confidence that I am following the usual procedure even more carefully than my predecessors did as critics in recent years when they were on this side of the house.

As my first point I would say that I think everybody was very surprised, having regard to the forthright position taken by the minister in times past, that there was nothing in the resolution to indicate a change in the present personal income tax exemptions. My hon. friend has been very zealous in the past in this respect. I recall that in 1956 he wasted no time at all in indicating that the government should be giving consideration to this very thing in that year. In fact, in the debate on the speech from the throne on January 24, 1956, at page 474 of Hansard—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I hope we can iron out this difference now for the benefit of discussion in the house. No one wishes to be raising points of order all the time but it seems to me that this matter needs to be clarified from the chair and that my friend should be asked to confine himself to what is relevant and proper to discuss at this point. My friend is proposing to enter a field which was properly discussed in the debate on the budget, but there is nothing in the resolution now before us that relates to the subject of exemptions. My friend is not now alluding to what has been said even this year, even in previous discussions in committee of ways and means on budget resolutions. He is going back now to the debate on the speech from the throne a couple of years ago. I thought he was relating his remarks to the point of order.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that remarks concerning exemptions have been relevant on some of these other occasions because there were resolutions affecting exemptions. For instance, a year ago there was a change in exemptions. A flat exemption of $100 was provided in lieu of charitable donations, union dues, etc. at the option of the income taxpayer. But, Mr. Chairman, if my friend is asserting a right to discuss anything that is in the Income Tax Act regardless of whether there is any reference to it in the present resolution, then he is asserting a right to discuss almost every subject under the sun because there are few acts as broad in their scope as the Income Tax Act. It is obvious that we are going to be here a long time if my friend is going to enjoy that measure of unrestricted freedom of debate.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Once again I must bring to the attention of the members that it is my duty to ask for the co-operation of hon. members in respecting the standing orders of the house. On the matter of relevancy standing order 59 (2) is quite clear. It reads:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We have before us a resolution dealing with certain changes in the Income Tax Act and at present hon. members must speak only on the items contained in the resolution. In my opinion it is out of order to speak about anything else not contained in this resolution. With regard to exemptions under the Income Tax Act, I must also bring to the hon. member's attention the fact that on June 26 an amendment proposed by Mr. Argue and seconded by Mr. Herridge was negatived.

This amendment actually read as follows:

This house further regrets that the government contemplates no action at this session to recognize the loss of purchasing power to the majority of Canadian citizens because of the lowered value of the dollar as related to consumer goods and prices, by amending the Income Tax Act so as to raise the amount of permissible income to single and married persons without taxation.

This amendment was negatived on June 26, and consequently it is out of order to discuss exemptions now.

Mr. Pearson: May I say a word on the point with which you have been dealing. As the minister has pointed out to us, the debate on the budget covered the whole field of fiscal policy. We are dealing with a resolution now which covers one important aspect of policy on the Income Tax Act. This resolution reads:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

Then there are eight paragraphs which follow. It has always been considered in order, on a resolution of this kind, to discuss not only the specific terms of the resolution but the inadequacy of the terms of the measure which is contemplated in the resolution.

I suggest that if that were ruled out of order that would be a limitation on debate in this house in respect of the resolution, which certainly has not been imposed while I have been in the house. I respectfully call this consideration to your attention.

Mr. Crestohl: On the point of order, may I ask why we try to avoid giving interpretation to the words "among other things", to which my leader has called attention. This resolution introduces a measure to amend the Income Tax Act, not only in respect of these eight items but in respect of other things. I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that as long as we are debating a resolution with respect to the Income Tax Act we should be permitted to deal with the other things that might be introduced. Earlier today when I tried to make some reference to the Income Tax Act when we were debating the Dominion Succession Duty Act I was called to order by the minister.

I respectfully submit that we are now discussing the Income Tax Act and I do not believe standing order No. 59 interferes with a discussion of other things relative to income tax. I respectfully submit that the words "among other things" are in the resolution and you must give them some meaning, some latitude, rather than trying to confine the debate within certain limits. We do not want to discuss the question of closure again.

Mr. Argue: The terms of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, are very broad. It has been the custom in this house, whenever a resolution as broad as this one has opened up a certain act for amendment, to give members a good deal of latitude in the remarks that they make. Otherwise discussion is stifled and the will of the house is difficult to obtain. I think the minister has a point in that if a member stood up and claimed the right to spend all of his 30 minutes discussing an increase in income tax exemptions, which is not included in the resolution, it could be considered that he was out of order. But surely when the resolution is, in many respects, aimed at reducing income tax in certain ways, it should be in order for members to say that included in this resolution there should have been other provisions. So far as the decision of the house in the last session is concerned and its effect on the debate at this time, I would point out with great respect that the decision of the house on a motion of substance in one session cannot bind the house in a subsequent session. Therefore any decision of the house in reversing that motion has no effect whatever today.

I do not know what the intentions of the official opposition may be, but I think if the minister would not jump in so quickly with points of order he would save himself and the committee a great deal of time. I feel that the reasonable and sensible thing to do is to give the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River an opportunity to complete his remarks. I imagine that he is going to stay within the general framework of this resolution.

The Chairman: First of all, I wish to correct the hon. member for Assiniboia. The motion to which I referred was not made at the last session but during this session on June 26. Actually, there were eight days of debate on the budget during which hon. members were given a great deal of latitude to express their views generally on the Income Tax Act. We are at the moment discussing one particular resolution, and it is my duty to ask hon. members to try to stay as close as possible to the items which are relevant to this resolution. It is, of course, permissible for an hon. member to point out the inadequacies of this resolution. However, hon. members will surely understand that it would not be permissible for hon. members to cover the complete Income Tax Act.

It is my duty at the moment to ask hon. members to stay as close as possible to the relevant items under discussion. I, therefore, ask for their co-operation with respect to this particular matter. It is not my desire to call the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to order on each matter he discusses. It would be appreciated if he stayed as close as possible to the items now under discussion.

Mr. Benidickson: I think you have given a ruling that is in accordance with our past practice. In the first place, at this stage one has not unlimited time. One is only provided with 30 minutes, and certainly one could not cover the whole of the Income Tax Act. In that respect, as you have ruled, one has the privilege, on a resolution of this kind, of referring to certain inadequacies. I was suggesting that this resolution is all the more inadequate because of certain expectations that had been aroused, not only in the minds of hon. members but of the general public, by the new Minister of Finance who was introducing this resolution.

I was about to indicate that he has pointed out in past days that not only did he believe that income tax exemptions should be raised from $1,000 to $1,500 for single people, but from $2,000 to $3,000 for married people.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend is going right ahead to do the very thing you have ruled should not be done. The house has expressed itself on the very point to which my hon. friend insists on referring, the subject of exemptions. On June 26 the house divided on an amendment to the main motion referring specifically to exemptions, and you will find the amendment in Votes and Proceedings, page 191. The amendment introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia reads as follows:

> This house further regrets that the government contemplates no action at this session to recognize the loss of purchasing power to the majority of Canadian citizens because of the lowered value of the dollar as related to consumer goods and prices, by amending the Income Tax Act so as to raise the amount of permissible income to single and married persons without taxation.

This last clause refers to exemptions and nothing else, Mr. Chairman. The house, in the division that occurred on June 26, which is recorded on pages 191 and 192 of Votes and Proceedings, negatived that motion. With respect I suggest that that negatives that matter and precludes discussion by the committee at this present session of parliament.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, suppose I, without prejudice, yield on that particular point. In the few minutes that are available to me I could discuss some other inadequacies which I shall proceed to. I want to refer to some other expectations that I think all of us would have expected to find in the first budget of a new administration by the Progressive Conservative party.

One of the things that I think is regrettable is that there was no reference in the resolution to the Income Tax Act being amended with respect to accelerated depreciation at this particular time of decline in our economy. There was circulation of a questionnaire among the business men of Canada or the business firms of Canada by the tax foundation not long ago and they replied that, next to a reduction in taxes itself, the form of tax relief they thought would be most helpful to the economy would be to give a capital cost allowance on an accelerated basis under present conditions. I wanted to point out to the house that this relief was in fact provided in the last budget in Great Britain. There was a 25 per cent increase with respect to capital cost allowances in the coming years, and particularly at the present time, to encourage new investment and to be a perk-up to the economy. We see nothing of that kind in the resolution in front of us.

I do not know whether the minister proposes to have a public review of the act we are discussing. However, we all know that when he sat on this side of the house that was one of the things that he consistently and persistently advocated. We thought that there might be in these resolutions something to indicate that the Income Tax Act was going to be amended to take care of much that we have heard about giving Canadians opportunities equal to those of foreign investors in developing the country's natural resources. In the past we have heard much about overdeduction of taxes at source. We see nothing in the resolution with respect to that matter. My hon. friend may say that some of these things can be taken care of simply in regulations. But I would have thought that in the resolution that we have pertaining to the Income Tax Act, if Canadians could have some hopes of his carrying out some of the suggestions and promises that he has made in the past, we would have had by now some notice about it.

I found very recently that in the United Kingdom—and I referred to their budget a moment ago—some steps had been taken with respect to foreign investment. I am told that since 1947 profits paid by foreign-controlled concerns in the United Kingdom to their parent companies have been treated as undistributed profits and taxed at only 3 per cent. A wholly-owned subsidiary of a Canadian concern that had been paying the standard British corporation tax of 42.5 per cent plus the 3 per cent profits tax from the last budget of last spring would henceforth be subject to a tax of 52.5 per cent. I do not know whether or not the minister is giving consideration to that matter; but certainly up to now we have had no reference to it.

The colleagues of the Minister of Finance have urged repeatedly in this house that depreciation should be doubled. We are all the more surprised that something of this nature has not been done. In addition to that, we have had the Gordon report and the commission have made reference to certain changes in the Income Tax Act that they thought would be helpful to Canadian industry vis-à-vis foreign investment. We see nothing about that matter in the resolution now before us or in anything that we have had from the minister in the debate that took place previously.

We would have thought that we could have some confidence in expecting these things all the more when we heard about the platform of the Conservative party. When they had their last national convention in 1956 we read in the Ottawa Journal that the present hon. member for Calgary South, won his case at that convention when he called for an amendment to provide tax concessions for Canadian oil and gas operators equal to those obtained by United States operators from the United States government. We see nothing with respect to this matter in the budget resolution that we have before us. I believe the convention at that time went on record as saying that they proposed to encourage national research by a more favourable tax climate. We read nothing about that matter in the budget resolutions nor is there anything from the other side to date in that respect.

The minister has indicated that this bill amending the Income Tax Act will probably be a substantial one. He was kind enough to tell me privately that it perhaps is the largest amending bill that the committee will have had before it for some time. I have no doubt that he will follow the practice of his predecessors and when presenting a bill of that consequence and intricacy, make it possible, not only for members of the house to be able to study its provisions but also the public. There is great advantage in not proceeding too quickly to second reading with respect to a mammoth bill of that kind because it is desirable that the public at large have an opportunity to learn of its provisions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may assure my hon. friend that it is the intention to allow a sufficient period between first and second readings of the bill to afford hon. members as well as the interested public an opportunity to study the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: We have a great number of new members. I think the house should be informed that there are some items which were referred to in the minister's budget speech—and which were, of course, given publicity in the press—but as to which we see no reference in the resolution before us. That is not contrary to custom by any means, Mr. Chairman. But one of these items is referred to at page 1243 of the minister's address. I refer to deductions for support of a dependent upon order of a court such as the family court. I am told it is not in the resolution because that is something possibly can be done by regulation or by amendment to the bill that we shall have coming before us.

Similarly, we see nothing in the resolutions before us with respect to working wives dividend incomes being allowed as a deduction for their husbands. That too is probably something that we are going to find in the bill when it is presented to us. Another item which received a fair amount of attention, and to which we find no reference in the resolution before us, was the reference to oil and gas producers being allowed a deduction for bonus payments in respect of exploration reservations. In my opinion, that certainly is something that even an amendment to the bill is not required for. It probably is subject to regulation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, yes. An amendment to the act would be required for that purpose and the provision is contained in the bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, there are others who, I have no doubt, have some general observations to make and I am not going to address myself to even the particular item in paragraphs Nos. 1 and 2 dealing with medical expenses but I hope to do so later.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the proposed changes in the Income Tax Act. Some of these changes I think are good. Others are minor. But none of them come up to the expectations we had when we read the minister's former speeches. I will try to stick very closely to the act. I remember when the former minister of finance was making a speech about two years ago he paid some tribute to the former prime minister and the present Minister of Finance said that the whole reason for that speech was to praise the former prime minister. He quoted Lord Lyttleton to the effect that there is no weapon that slays its victims so surely as well aimed praise.

I agree with the present minister's quotation. No one can deny that his praise was well aimed at the end of his baby budget speech. Yet he has survived. I do not think, however, in these budgetary resolutions that he has changed the position he previously held. The previous speaker referred to the resolution and I will try to deal with this matter item by item. Clause 1 has to do with the 3 per cent floor—

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member if he wishes to speak generally or is the house now ready to go down paragraph by paragraph?

Mr. McMillan: Generally. I recall that a previous resolution was introduced to this house recommending the removal of the 3 per cent floor in relation to the deductibility of medical expenses for income tax purposes and on that occasion the present Minister of Finance said the positions of the various parties in the house were well known and that so far as Her Majesty's loyal opposition was concerned its position was unchanged and that the opposition would support the resolution. He went on at considerable length to argue that medical expenses should be deducted, not only in respect to the amount in excess of 3 per cent of the taxable income, and at that time he gave the history of this legislation. He stated that the floor had been 5 per cent and after some years had been reduced to 4 per cent and then to 3 per cent, and I know the hon. member for Hamilton West spoke at the same time in favour of the allowing of full medical expenses. Other hon. members who are now sitting on the treasury benches also supported the hon. lady's view, some of them including such expenses as transportation costs, nurses in the home, the conveying of patients from one point to another and many other expenses.

Paragraph 1 provides that amounts paid after June 17, 1958 for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed in writing by a medical practitioner be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income. I know of five or six drugs which are included in this category at the present time and I note that the bill provides for the inclusion of all drugs on prescription. In recent years new drugs, including particularly the broad spectrum of antibiotics, have been very expensive. In fact they cost from 50 cents to 75 cents a tablet, and a doctor does not need to give a prescription for many such tablets to make the bill run to $10 to $15. Many of our people, particularly those in the low income groups, cannot afford to pay these high prices.

Unfortunately this amendment does not help such people. It helps those in the middle and upper income groups. In my opinion it is just as necessary for low income groups to be provided with these special drugs, and I think the minister would be well advised to consider bringing down the cost of drugs, which he could do in a very simple way by eliminating the sales tax on drugs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): They could be regarded as a necessity of life.

Mr. McMillan: Yes, I think such drugs are just as necessary as food in some cases because when there is a severe infection it is very necessary to have supplies of such antibiotics in order to save life.

The former minister of finance gave a $100 exemption to all those who did not have exemptions equalling that amount under charitable donations and medical expenses, and I am told that well over half our people came within this category. I notice that drugs must be prescribed in writing and I do know that a number of the non-narcotic drugs are prescribed over the telephone and that certain patients get repeat prescriptions several times during a year. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether in each case where drugs are purchased there must be a prescription and whether in the case of narcotic drugs the prescription would need to be made in duplicate, since under our federal legislation the druggist must keep on file a copy of each prescription.

I know this would add very much to the extent of our bookkeeping systems. Those of us concerned with the field of medicine already have many forms to fill out and of course the druggists certainly have a great deal of bookkeeping of this nature. It would also add to the administrative responsibilities of the Department of National Revenue and we do not want to have too many new civil servants. We know that the Department of Finance, for instance, already has about 70 new employees this year—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Mr. McMillan: How many are there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I told you so two weeks ago.

Mr. McMillan: It may be only 69.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true either.

Mr. McMillan: It is right up there somewhere. This is the sort of thing about which the present Minister of Finance spoke when he complained of the wastefulness and extravagance in the various departments of government.

Paragraph 2 includes laboratory and other diagnostic services and I am just wondering how this might work out. At present some of these services are included in hospital and medical bills. If you pay a Blue Cross premium and you have a medical bill, say of $200, that $200 is considered as the amount allowable for deduction for income tax purposes.

Now, under the new Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, the federal government will pay roughly one-half of the cost of treatment in our hospitals. It will pay one-half of the costs of the diagnostic and laboratory services in some provinces, but the other half would be paid by the patient himself in some provinces, or by some special tax levied in the provinces. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance what allowance would be made in future. Would the full hospital bill be allowed for deduction at present, or just the amount which a particular patient contributes by way of a premium? This is going to vary in the different provinces, and unless something is done you will have people in different parts of Canada paying on a different basis as far as income tax goes. Under paragraph 3, I think the government is providing:

That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount deductible by corporations for contributions to charitable organizations be increased from 5 per cent of income to 10 per cent of income.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member would permit, I should like to suggest again, that it would contribute to an orderly discussion in committee if we approached this subject paragraph by paragraph. The hon. member, as I understood it, was making some general remarks but his remarks have all related to the first paragraph, and now he is going on to make remarks which relate to the third paragraph. I am saying the hon. member will have full opportunity to make his comments, but I suggest this should be done in an orderly way, the sections being discussed seriatim in the order in which they appear so that all hon. members who may wish to speak on a particular subject can do so during one period of time. Otherwise, we are bound to have a very discursive and disorderly discussion ranging over eight widely different matters which are mentioned in the eight different paragraphs.

Mr. Benidickson: I recall that in past years, after the general discussion had been concluded, there was universal agreement in the committee to proceed in that way. May I say to the minister, however, that in this particular case it happens that the hon. member for Welland, who is well informed on these matters, is anxious to speak on these subjects because instead of giving medical treatment, as is his usual practice, he will have to submit to medical treatment tomorrow and will not be free to make his remarks unless he can continue now.

Mr. McMillan: I acquiesce to the minister's request.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, so many points of order have been raised that it is a little hard to know what is in order or not. We, of course, intend to support the resolution. The resolution is a most necessary one, and the principle is a good one.

The resolution seems to be in line with what was promised by the Prime Minister as reported in the Ottawa Journal of May 22, 1957, when he said the Conservative party would cut unnecessary taxation to promote production which would help meet the threat of inflation. Nowadays we might amend that to read: "to cut unnecessary taxation which would promote production which would help to relieve unemployment". However, that is another matter.

Then the Prime Minister added that last year the government had over-taxed the Canadian people by $500 million, and with this I come to the main theme of the remarks

I intend to make on this resolution, in that in our opinion the concession, welcome as it may be, is entirely inadequate. Not only is it inadequate, it falls far short of the pledge which was given the taxpayers of Canada.

On May 23, 1957, the Prime Minister claimed, as reported in the Vancouver Sun, that every Canadian man, woman and child had had their pockets picked by $30. This resolution is certainly not going to help that situation very much, and I am sure that the pockets of the taxpayers are going to continue to be picked. On May 24, 1957, the same hon. gentleman is reported to have said over a C.B.C. radio broadcast: "We will put an end to excessive over-taxation." Well, it is our opinion that this resolution, taken in its entirety, falls far short in its provisions of what is needed to relieve the people from over-taxation, and this is especially important at this moment when the time is overdue for the average people of Canada to be relieved of some of the burden of taxation in order that they may be able to buy more goods and hence provide more employment in Canada. I have in mind, for instance, the section of the resolution dealing with medical expenses.

While we welcome the extra concessions that are being made, we have over the years advocated the removal of the 3 per cent floor which presently exists, and if some bold and substantial measure of relief had been intended, that proposal might well have been given greater attention. I feel that with regard to medical expenses the act at the present time is needlessly cluttered up; one may deduct such medical expenses as exceed 3 per cent of net income, but one may not deduct such expenses as are in excess of a certain percentage of income. And then, if a person has no receipts at all he may deduct $100 for medical and charitable expenses, and so on. I, for one, would like to see all medical expenses for which receipts can be produced eligible for deduction. In this respect the resolution falls far short of expectations.

I know the house has voted on exemptions for single and married people, so I may not bring in my recommendations with regard to that; there will be another opportunity of doing so. However, the allowance for dependents falls far short of being realistic when considered in relation to present day cost of living. I believe no one in this committee would claim that a dependent child between the ages of 16 and 18, for instance, can be educated, clothed and looked after on an allowance of $500 a year, and I believe it is high time, especially in the light of higher education fees, that a substantial increase should be granted in this direction.

The minister spoke at some length with regard to the principle involved in raising the percentage of income which may be deducted in respect of contributions for charitable purposes. We agree that the needs of our institutions have risen with the years and the measure he has taken—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member is going to talk on individual paragraphs I would ask him to withhold some of his remarks until the committee decides to deal with this resolution paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. Regier: It was not my intention to go into detail in my discussion of the individual subject. I meant only to survey these questions in order to show the inadequacy of the resolution as a whole. I certainly hope that this particular clause is not a reflection of the government's approach to the needs of education in Canada and especially the needs of higher education because it would be a sad day indeed if our educational institutions should have to rely for their continued successful operation and expansion on the proposed amendment to the Income Tax Act.

We regret very much that the government, among other things, has not seen fit to have listed a change in the social security tax that is presently paid under the Income Tax Act. At the present time a man having a taxable income of $3,000 pays $60 as a maximum in the form of a social security tax and the man having an income of $100,000 also pays a like amount. I feel that the minister might well have compensated the loss of revenue the government is sustaining by abolishing that maximum in order that people would pay into the social security tax fund according to their ability to pay.

In the main, we welcome the resolution. However, we must at this time remind the minister that it falls far, far short of what the people of this country had been led to believe they might expect and this takes on particular significance at this time when people require additional purchasing power to meet rising costs.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee now prepared to discuss this resolution paragraph by paragraph?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we now discuss paragraph one?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to paragraph No. 1 which I shall ask one of my colleagues to introduce. The resolution at present contemplates in this paragraph that after the effective date amounts paid for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed in writing by a medical practitioner may be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income. This matter has been reviewed and I should like to indicate that the proposed amendment is intended to provide that if drugs have been prescribed by a medical practitioner and recorded by a licensed pharmacist they may be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to move that amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: It has been moved by Mr. Monteith (Perth) and seconded by Mr. Macdonnell:

That paragraph 1 of the income tax resolution be amended by deleting the words "in writing" and by adding the words "and recorded by a licensed pharmacist" immediately after the words medical practitioner in line 2 thereof.

The paragraph as amended will read:

That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed by a medical practitioner and recorded by a licensed pharmacist be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I take it that in no case is it necessary for the prescription, as such, to be sent in?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The prescription would be available for examination on the premises of the druggist, Mr. Chairman, and that would suffice.

Mr. McMillan: But what about prescriptions for non-narcotic drugs that are simply phoned in?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those prescriptions must be recorded. I mean by that that they are in practice, so this will come clearly within the terms of the amendment.

Mr. Regier: What evidence will be required of the individual taxpayer that expenditures have in fact been made, a receipt from the pharmacist or what?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the receipt from the pharmacist under which he will have recorded the prescription.

Mr. Macnaughton: That must be in writing, of course? There must be a written prescription recorded in the pharmacist's book?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if every prescription must be recorded? For instance, a great many prescriptions are filled a dozen times or more on the basis of the original prescription. Would each prescription have to be included for each lot of medicine?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that my hon. friend in his question is referring back to some of the designated drugs. With regard to those I may say that insulin, vitamin B12 and injectible liver extract are at present prescribed by a physician initially but it is usual for patients using those drugs to obtain them from their pharmacists without further reference to the initial prescription. Patients using those drugs know their dosage schedules and delays in obtaining requirements could, in some cases, prove fatal. It is intended that the amendment deal with these in such a way that receipts showing purchases of these three drugs need not have a prescription file number.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, when I first heard the amendment read I thought it made it easier to abide by the terms of paragraph one but now as I read it I think it makes it more difficult because what is necessary now in order to meet the terms of the first paragraph is that there must be a prescription by a medical practitioner and a recording by a licensed pharmacist. The two conditions must be there before the claim could be made, is that not right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; but you see, we are easing the requirement of the original resolution because we are deleting the words "in writing" as applied to a prescription given by a medical practitioner. That takes care of the problem raised by the hon. member for Welland of the repeat order and the phone call.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, the person requiring the prescription has no control over the druggist with regard to his recording it. He will enter a drugstore, present a prescription, receive it and leave and what the druggist does with respect to recording the prescription is something over which the customer has no control. It may not be recorded. The druggist may be careless or he may lose the prescription. The proposed amendment exposes the prospective user of that prescription to some difficulty. He may have a receipt but there may be no record of it in the drugstore through no fault of his own but through the fault of the druggist.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is obvious that if the individual in question wishes to claim the expenditure as a deduction by way of medical expenses he will have to be in a position to produce a receipt. Obviously when he makes a purchase he will have to see to it that what the law requires is done, both on his own part in obtaining a receipt and on the part of the druggist in recording it. That is only fair. I am quite sure my hon. friend does not expect the Department of National Revenue to supply proof in these cases. The taxpayer will have to see to it that he preserves his receipts as he now does with respect to his other receipts that he intends to use for medical deductions.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister is perfectly right. I go along with that. The taxpayer will go in and buy and will get a receipt and go home, but from that moment he loses control over what transpires with the prescription behind the counter and in the druggist's office. He cannot go in there and watch to make sure that his prescription is recorded.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: When the committee adjourned at six o'clock we were discussing an amendment to paragraph 1 which reads as follows:

That paragraph 1 of the income tax resolution be amended by deleting the words "in writing" and by adding the words "and recorded by a licensed pharmacist" immediately after the words medical practitioner in line 2 thereof.

As amended will read:

That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed by a medical practitioner and recorded by a licensed pharmacist be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps I should say just a word in reply to the question put by the hon. member for Cartier at six o'clock. The case he put, Mr. Chairman, is covered by the fact that the pharmacist has the record, for he must by law, keep a record of the sale. I think that is the complete answer to my hon. friend's question. He must do so as a matter of law.

I might add that this resolution and the amendment have been discussed with both the Department of National Health and Welfare and representatives of the Canadian pharmacists association. The amendment accords with the views that have been expressed by both of these sources.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to know the mechanism that will be used under this amended section to claim the cost of drugs as a deduction. Must you send in the druggist's receipt plus the prescription?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The taxpayer does not send in the prescription to the Department of National Revenue when he files his income tax return. He sends in his receipt, just as he does in connection with other elements in his claim for medical deduction, his receipt for the doctor's account, for the hospital account and others. He simply sends in his receipts, and the receipts will bear a reference to the prescription which is filed with the druggist.

Mr. McMillan: If the drugs were ordered from the druggist by telephone, and the druggist made a note that they were ordered by telephone would the receipts given under those conditions be considered valid by the department?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, if the drugs in that case were, in fact, prescribed by the medical practitioner and were recorded by a licensed pharmacist, the cost of the drugs in that case would be treated as allowable medical deductions.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Chevrier: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it, Mr. Chairman, you have put the amendment first. We are not adopting the paragraphs individually. As I understand it, there is only one resolution before the committee and there is only one motion for adoption of the resolution which will be put after we have gone through the eight paragraphs. An amendment at any time would have to be put.

Mr. Chevrier: If I understand the discussion aright, the amendment has now carried. It is the intention to dispose of this resolution clause by clause, so the amendment having carried is the clause still open for discussion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Probably my friend did not hear the discussion this afternoon. There is only one resolution before the committee. This one resolution has eight paragraphs to it. It was agreed this afternoon that in the interests of orderly discussion the paragraphs should be called seriatim and the discussion in each case would necessarily be relevant to the particular paragraph. At the conclusion, one motion would be put for adoption of the resolution as amended.

Amendments, of course, could be introduced to any paragraph at any time. I take it that if there is no further discussion sought on paragraph 1, then the chairman would now be calling paragraph 2.

Mr. Benidickson: I was under a misapprehension. I thought probably the amendment was being put to regularize the paragraph. I should like to ask a few more questions on item No. 1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As amended.

Mr. Benidickson: As amended. Could the minister indicate to us just what he estimates will be the cost to the treasury of both paragraph 1 and paragraph 2?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From $4 million to $5 million.

Mr. Benidickson: In a full fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In a full fiscal year.

Mr. Crestohl: If we do, finally dispose of paragraph 1, we automatically go on to paragraph 2 and so on to paragraph 8, and take one vote. Does that leave the door open, while we are at paragraph 5, for someone to revert to paragraph 1 if he so desires?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I take it that would mean chaos in our proceedings. What was agreed upon this afternoon, in the general interests of orderly discussion, was that each paragraph would be called seriatim. If there is no further discussion, then the chairman will proceed to call the next paragraph. The discussion on the previous paragraph would then have been exhausted and closed.

Mr. Crestohl: I agree with you on that. I was just asking for clarification of the procedure.

The Chairman: Is there further discussion on paragraph 1?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. I was interested in hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Welland. I thought they were well taken. I am sure that he knows his suggestion with respect to the elimination of sales tax on drugs was last month endorsed by a very important organization, the national council of women.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With respect, Mr. Chairman, we are not discussing the sales tax now. We are discussing the amendment to the Income Tax Act, and the sales tax on drugs is surely not relevant.

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct, but my next point was going to be that any concession that might be made from the point of view of foregoing revenue might be better done this way because, as the hon. member for Welland indicated, there are a great number of people who are not taxpayers. Those, of course, are the more poorly off people of the country. This measure does not provide them with any benefit so far as their expenditures for drugs are concerned. I may be one year out of date but I have here readily available the 1956 tax statistics, and I think they have reference to the 1954 tax returns. There one will find that the taxable returns were 3,410,160 and the non-taxable returns were 1,393,250. In addition to that, of course, a number of people are not even called upon to put in a return. I just wanted to commend the hon. member for Welland for his remarks. He, of course, referred to the fact that he too was surprised that this resolution had not gone further. I find that at least on a number of occasions in recent years the Minister of Finance associated himself with his party in indicating in his vote in this house that he felt the floor itself should be removed. I refer to the vote on January 30, 1956; the vote on February 14, 1955; and the vote on January 18, 1954.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With the exception of that last date my hon. friend voted against the proposal on each occasion and his party did so also.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend may be talking about consistency but I am simply pointing out to him that we expected some consistency from him when he on three occasions indicated to the public at large this was something about which he felt vehemently and on those occasions voted that the floor be removed. As the hon. member for Welland has indicated, either that procedure or the elimination of the sales tax would be more beneficial than the resolution we have before us tonight.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about part of this resolution. I believe the minister will know what I am speaking about as I have already drawn the matter to his attention. I refer to the wording of this resolution which has to do with the deduction of medication for income tax purposes. I spoke about the matter previously. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and his department that the resolution, as it is worded, says "prescribed in writing" or words to that effect.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether my hon. friend has just come into the chamber. I may tell him that the resolution has been amended. I think the amendment fully covers the point my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. Mitchell: I thank the minister. That is all that I was concerned about.

The Chairman: Is there any further discussion on paragraph 1?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Shall we proceed to paragraph 2?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McMillan: In connection with paragraph 2 I have a question. When the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act is in operation, as it is now in parts of Canada, I should like to know what part of the hospital bill will be deductible in respect of income tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The entire bill, just as at present. The statute to which my hon. friend has referred has not changed the situation, and the Income Tax Act is not being amended in that respect. The position is just the same as if today the taxpayer's hospital account was paid by his insurance company.

Mr. McMillan: Then it means that they would get the part that the federal government pays, which is roughly 50 per cent of the treatment in the general hospital. They will be able to deduct that part in respect of their income tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not what I said, Mr. Chairman. I said that the hospital account would be admissible just as at present if it were paid by an insurance company. There is no change in the position in that respect. I am not saying what the situation might be or what the new situation brought about by the act may call for later on. But as things stand now, no change is made in the law in that respect.

Mr. McMillan: That act is in operation now in certain provinces in Canada. I should like to know what will happen in connection with taxpayers making claims in those provinces, and whether the total hospital bill would be presented or just the part that was not paid by the dominion government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Whatever the account is, as rendered to the taxpayer, and is paid. Under the provisions of the new act, whatever that hospital account is it is treated just as is the hospital account today that is paid on behalf of the taxpayer by his insurance company. I cannot put it any more clearly than that.

Mr. McMillan: Suppose no account is rendered to the patient in hospital and his bill is paid half by the federal government and the other half by the provincial government where the money is raised say by a sales tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In order to have the benefit of a deduction he must be in a position to produce a receipted hospital account.

Mr. Benidickson: And it must be more than 3 per cent of his income.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. But what I mean is that in order to qualify at all, he must be able to produce a receipted hospital account in the case put by my hon. friend. It is not everybody who will be under the scheme in any of the provinces in which the new systems come into effect on July 1. What the method will be in any particular province I would not be prepared to say now, or as to the practice of the hospital; but if he produces a receipted hospital account, a bona fide account duly receipted, then it will qualify as a medical expense.

Mr. McMillan: That would therefore mean that in certain provinces where he pays a premium, he might pay half his hospital account; and in another province where the province is contributing the whole thing he would be presented with no hospital account. Hence people in different provinces would be treated differently.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no province now of which I am aware that is paying the entire cost. Those provinces that had hospital insurance schemes are the ones that are coming in now under the provisions of the new act with effect from July 1.

Mr. Benidickson: In the province of British Columbia, where I believe the hospital scheme is paid for in large part by a retail sales tax of 5% levied by the province, is it possible for a resident to submit his hospital bills if he requires hospitalization in the course of the year and it appears worth while in that these bills with the other medical bills, go beyond 3 per cent of his income.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not the method of the payment of the premium under the provincial scheme that governs whether the hospital account is a deductible medical expense. It is whether the hospital renders an account and the taxpayer is in a position to produce a receipted account. In that particular case the yield from the sales tax, of course, is turned over to those responsible for operating the hospital scheme. But that is not the determining factor in relation to the test of eligibility of the account to rank as a medical expense.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not quite understand my hon. friend. Let us consider the situation that has existed up until now in the province of Ontario where I think probably 75 per cent of the wage earners are now enrolled in Blue Cross.

Blue Cross is an organization supported by premiums which more or less equal the outgo in respect of all accounts presented to Blue Cross by the hospitals. It has been my understanding that an individual has never been able to render to the Department of National Revenue for deduction from income tax the cost as a medical expense his premium, but if he does require hospitalization the hospital does not render him an account and he does not have to pay anything. But he can go to the hospital and ask for a statement of what the charges would have been had he not been insured, and it is that statement which is submitted to the Department of National Revenue. This was why I raised the query with respect to British Columbia where there is no exact fixed premium but there is of course the retail sales tax which is supposed to support the hospitals in that province, or has been supposed to do so up until now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At the risk of repetition, may I say that it is the receipted account which is the prerequisite, indeed the test of eligibility for an account to rank as a medical expense. It is not the premium, however collected or however paid, which is the determining factor. Indeed for this purpose it is not relevant. It is the receipted account of the hospital that governs the decision.

Mr. Crestohl: I would like to refer to the language of this paragraph which refers to transportation to or from a hospital by ambulance which may be included under medical expenses. Perhaps the minister may be able to give some clarification on this point having regard to the following situations which might arise. One can easily conceive, for example, that someone in, say Seven Islands has an accident and must be rushed to hospital by plane. A plane is not necessarily an ambulance but it could perhaps be called an ambulance for this purpose. Secondly, there may be a case where a plane would have to go to a place such as Sudbury on the instructions of the doctor treating a patient there in order to transport the patient to Montreal for treatment. Even though such a patient is not transported by ambulance such a conveyance might be called an ambulance in this case also. Then there is a third possibility, where a person has to be rushed to hospital and there is no ambulance, as such, available.

Would the transportation in each of the three cases to which I have referred be covered?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer in all three cases is no.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister what would be the position in a case where there is a regular air ambulance service as there is in the province from which I come? Such service, as the minister well knows, has saved a great many lives. It is a standard service and has been in operation for more than ten years. There is a registered nurse on the plane at all times and all the facilities are available which would be available in an ambulance, including those for the administration of oxygen when necessary.

It seems to me that in such an instance an air ambulance service is just as much an ambulance service as it would be if it were on four wheels on the ground. I would think the minister would not wish to place the federal government in the position where it would deny the cost of a service which is, and for some time past has been, largely although not wholly subsidized by the provincial government. The person who is being transported is charged a flat fee, which varies in one or two minor ways but is in the neighbourhood of $25 to $35. After the air ambulance lands at the airport a regular ambulance, the automobile variety, picks up the patient and takes him to the hospital.

The cost of the automobile ambulance is a few dollars less than the $25 to $35 charge for the air ambulance service but in view of the fact that this air service is a regular one—it is very definitely an ambulance—assisting in the saving of many, many lives, I feel the minister should favourably consider this request.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not possible for me to give a categorical answer to my hon. friend, but I think in many instances an airplane could not in any sense be regarded as an ambulance. If, however, such an airplane is equipped and used for no other purpose than the transportation of the sick, maimed or injured, then I would think the Department of National Revenue would be disposed to look favourably on such a case, provided it were properly substantiated. I emphasize, however, that the plane must be confined with respect to its equipment and use to that purpose and to no other.

Mr. Argue: Emergency situations might arise which would cause the plane to be used perhaps once or twice a year for some other purpose but this is a regular service and the plane at least 99 times out of 100 is used for the purposes of transportation of patients only. The plane will not take off unless a doctor has ordered the plane to pick up a patient at some outlying point and unless that doctor already has available a bed in the hospital for such patient. I would therefore think such a proposition would be on all fours with one concerning any other ambulance service.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If those are the circumstances I think the Department of National Revenue would rule such a plane to be an ambulance.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister very much for his answer. I see he has been in consultation with the Minister of National Revenue who probably knows that this is a regular service on a province-wide basis. I believe anyone receiving a bill from the Saskatchewan air ambulance service, on the face of it, has a bona fide claim under this paragraph.

Mr. Crestohl: I am wondering if the minister's negative answer to the three questions I put to him is altogether in fulfilment of the spirit prompting this legislation, especially if the legislation is indeed intended to offer relief from stress caused by illness. The language used is "transportation to or from a hospital". It does not speak of transportation within any limits, and if it was intended to restrict the coverage to certain areas the wording should be "within a radius of 50 miles from a hospital" or "20 miles" or some other distance.

Since the proposed legislation does not specify a limit to the distance over which an invalid may be transported then I think the minister should perhaps reconsider his answer. One can easily conceive that even an automobile ambulance might have to transport a patient over a distance of 300 or 500 miles. Would such a case be covered? I do not see that any citizen who finds it impossible to obtain an ambulance, in the sense that we understand the word—fully equipped and on four wheels—should be prejudiced in any way by this lack of transportation, or because no roads are available. I do not think such a citizen should suffer because the only means of transport is by air, and I think the minister might give some consideration to the merit of allowing the deduction to a person who has to be transported to hospital in this way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that the minister has a big and sympathetic heart with regard to these considerations, and I only wish he had spoken as forcefully when he was sitting on this side of the house in support of a proposal to offer some relief to those who incur expenditure through being transported to or from hospitals. This is the first time in the history of Canadian income tax legislation that any legislative proposal has been put before parliament for permitting any form of transportation expense to be included as a deduction for income tax purposes. This is the first time.

We cannot include every form of transportation; the difficulties of administration and enforcement would be almost insuperable if this provision were thrown wide open. If expenditure on, say, taxis were to be allowed I do not know how you would effectively enforce the act, because who is going to check all these cases? We considered all aspects of the matter and came to the conclusion that limitation of the vehicle was the only effective means of fair and adequate enforcement of the regulations by the officers of the Department of National Revenue. It will be the nature of the vehicle used to transport the patient to and from hospital which will determine whether the expenditure qualifies under this provision.

Mr. Herridge: Having listened carefully to the minister's answers to repeated questions I do want to say that he has deeply failed on this occasion to use the English language with his usual exactitude. When we want to find out the meaning of the words which the minister uses in his eloquent and vehement speeches we are in the habit of referring to dictionaries in order to get his meaning, and the same is true when it comes to an act. If you want to understand an act you look in a dictionary. I have looked in a dictionary to find out the meaning of the word "ambulance", and the dictionary describes it as "a conveyance for sick and wounded persons". So unless there is a further definition added, I am convinced that if someone challenged a case before the courts the judge would have to refer to the Oxford dictionary or to some accepted dictionary in order to find out the meaning of the word. I think the word used here is far too broad, and that without further definition it would create misunderstanding.

In addition, I cannot see why the allowance should be confined to ambulances of a certain type, because we have so many instances in this country where it is not possible to get the normal type of ambulance when sickness or accidents occur. I am glad to see that the Minister of National Revenue has his ears cocked my way. The hon. member for Cartier has mentioned one such instance. In the area from which I come we often have to use water taxis or launches in order to convey injured persons over long stretches of water to hospitals. Surely, a person who has to incur considerable expense in this way should be in the same position as one who takes an ambulance for a mile or two in a city. In addition, we have such a thing as horse ambulances because roads are often not good enough to enable us to get out men who have been injured and, on other occasions, I remember that pack and saddle horses have been used to get men to hospital from mountain tops.

I suggest, then, that the term now used is far too broad and that the minister's replies are not related to the dictionary definition of the word "ambulance". I think he is in for a lot of trouble unless he adds some interpretation to the legislation. In addition, I want to emphasize that I cannot see the fairness of confining this to cases where a particular type of ambulance is used, mostly over paved roads and for short distances, while the people who live in the backwoods, the people who work in the mines and mills and woods and who produce a great deal of the natural wealth which keeps the wheels of industry in this country turning are unfairly dealt with.

Mr. Habel: I am fully in agreement with the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. In the district in which I live we have a very good hospital and we have very good doctors. However, on many occasions a doctor will be unable to perform an operation and patients have to be sent to Toronto. In such cases patients are sent on doctor's orders and they have to travel either by train or by air. It is a very costly trip, representing a journey of 575 miles, and if this act is intended to give relief to the taxpayers it seems to me it should apply to transportation of this kind as well, unless the minister wants to make a big impression with a little concession.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, in Newfoundland and in many parts of northern Newfoundland and Labrador the air ambulance is the only kind of ambulance there is, and the government of Newfoundland has purchased suitable aircraft for use in taking patients to hospital in an emergency. Despite the existence of these official air ambulances it is necessary at times to use planes and helicopters which are normally engaged on other work. I should like to think that people transported in such aircraft being used as ambulances will come within the provisions of the act.

Mr. Crestohl: I am quite sure the minister knows that there are hundreds of villages in Canada where there are no ambulances at all. An invalid might have to be transported from one village to a neighbouring village, a little larger, where there is some hospital service. A citizen who hires a taxi or who rents an automobile, or a conveyance of some kind, and who has to spend a certain sum of money should surely be entitled to deduct that expenditure even though, strictly speaking, he did not use a vehicle with a red cross on it marked with the word "ambulance". I think that is the intention of this amendment. The intention is to confer a benefit on people so that they may have certain advantages with respect to medical expenses being deducted, and it should not be so restricted as to apply in practice only to people who live in cities where ambulances are available; it should confer an equal benefit on all Canadian citizens.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already explained to my hon. friend why, after very careful consideration, it was found not possible to extend this benefit more widely. The difficulties of enforcement were found to be insuperable. If the committee wants that point met and if the objection is going to be pressed it may be that my hon. friends will just talk the taxpayer out of getting this opportunity to have a deduction with respect to expenditures made on ambulances because I can assure the hon. gentleman that this and the other questions he has raised were very carefully considered and the difficulties in the way of enforcement were found to be insuperable.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I can tell the minister that as far as my riding is concerned there is no ambulance. In order for a person in a remote area to get to a hospital he must hire a taxi and travel anywhere from 80 to 100 miles or he must hire a boat and travel 50 or 60 miles at considerable expense. No one in my riding can benefit from this proposal. I do not think we should put on our statute books legislation that discriminates between one taxpayer and another. We should treat all taxpayers alike.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point something out to the minister with which I think he will agree. In paragraph No. 1 the minister was ingenious enough to find a method of designating what medical expenses can be deducted. He placed, as it were, an identity card upon those drugs which can be deducted when he established that they must be procured by prescription from a physician. I believe a means of identification could be found in the present instance, too. If the law were to read that the vehicle was deemed necessary by a duly qualified practitioner and that it was required for an emergency and should therefore be a deductible expense, that would be a means of identifying it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All I can suggest to my hon. friend, Mr. Chairman, is that he give us a chance to work this proposal out on the present basis. In time we will see what we can do. We started out to try to help the taxpayer by this means. We have gone as far as we can see the possibility of effective enforcement in the measure before us. All I can suggest in the face of that is that we are trying to help the taxpayer who incurs expense in being transported to a hospital. I urge hon. gentlemen opposite to give it a trial and provide an opportunity for the department to work with it and we will see what can be done. That is all I can suggest to my hon. friends under the present circumstances.

Mr. Crestohl: That is fair enough.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, we all commend the minister for taking this forward step with respect to transportation for the sick but may I point out that it is not unusual at this stage in the discussion of budget resolutions for the Minister of Finance to be impressed with a suggestion receiving support from hon. members all across the house and the administration reconsiders the bill. This suggestion certainly has an appeal to me on the basis of its reasonableness. It is not at all unusual to amend a proposed bill on the floor. I think the minister could go one step further than just saying, "Let us examine it in another year." Between now and second reading of the bill I believe that he and his officials could examine this proposal and bring in a measure that is considerably more likely to equate the situation for all people across Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if the suggestion were new I should have no hesitation at all in acceding to my hon. friend's proposal but I repeat that it is not new. We considered this matter in all its ramifications very carefully and, I might add, at very great length. Here we have gone as far as we can see the effective limits of enforcement. I do not think I can do more than suggest what I suggested to hon. members earlier in reply to the last remarks of my friend the hon. member for Cartier.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, could I offer another suggestion to the minister. When he calculated the amount that this measure would cost the treasury he must have had in mind some average figure representing the cost of an ambulance, perhaps $15 or $20. Why not put a similar limit on with respect to deductibility and let everyone who incurs expenses benefit to that extent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that does not overcome the problem of enforcement in regard to somebody who takes a taxi ride. You cannot enforce a provision that is related to a taxi ride; that is just the difficulty.

Mr. Carter: But surely the hospital authorities could certify the expenditure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hospital does not pay the taxi driver.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, could I put this question to the minister. Would it be on a par with past practice if the doctor added the cost of transportation to his bill and rendered it to the patient in the same way as in the past we know that doctors have provided drugs and added the cost to their bill? Such expenditures were recognized for tax deduction by the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid it is not analagous to the cost of a prescription for which I argued for many a long year and with respect to which my hon. friend and those associated with him would not accede.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend knows that the former administration took a very careful look at the question of drugs and because of the argument that drugs were an important item of medical expenditure it deliberately lowered the floor from 5 per cent to 4 per cent stating at the time that it was doing so for the purpose of recognizing that about 1 per cent of medical expenditures of this nature on average were for drugs. Also the then administration made it clear that in doing so the administration was saving the taxpayer a lot of money by not having officials examine small accounts and conduct correspondence about them.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, I like the way this particular paragraph reads just as it is and I think it should remain in this form because when you take a ride in an ambulance you have more than transportation, you also receive medical attention. I should like to see the word "licensed" inserted before the word "ambulance" in this paragraph. As hon. gentlemen probably know, we have a very good hospital plan in the province of Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nasserden: I expected this would draw applause and particularly from hon. members of the C.C.F. group and those from Saskatchewan. We are all proud of the plan we have there. We also have a splendid air ambulance service which will go into any part of the province. May I suggest to those hon. members who have been wondering what they can do in their part of the country and how they could benefit under the terms of this measure that they should perhaps try to establish an air ambulance service in their areas as well.

Mr. Peters: Maybe a good C.C.F. government would be a solution.

Mr. Nasserden: The people of the province of Saskatchewan wanted it and we do not think the C.C.F. should claim all the credit for it.

Mr. Peters: It is the only province that has it.

Mr. Nasserden: I should like to see it left as it is and I know that the people of Saskatchewan will welcome it as just one more forward step taken by this government for the benefit of Canadians.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if in considering this the minister and his officials really did consider the back areas of the country where there are vast distances to cover. It is all right for the minister to say that there are difficulties involved in keeping track of taxi fares but that is not a satisfactory answer. The country in northern and northwestern Ontario and other parts of Canada has been famous for its mercy flights. Hundreds of families have been assisted in bringing out people from distant parts who require urgent medical attention. In all common sense I cannot see why this sort of flight which is made at a tremendous expense to the patient or his parents could not be checked and certified by a doctor or hospital authority. The provision before us may be all very fine for the people in Crestwood Heights but it does not do anything for people in places along the northshore area or in the bush country.

Mr. Crestohl: Where is Crestwood Heights?

Mr. Fisher: It is a figment of some sociologist's imagination. It is in North Toronto not very far from where the minister comes. As a matter of fact, a very interesting book has been written about it and you might get more of an idea, Mr. Chairman, about the background of the hon. member for Eglinton if you had a look at it. That is getting away from the point. This matter should be gone into more thoroughly and a more attractive answer or reason given than the one the minister presented.

Mr. McMillan: If I may go back to hospital charges I should like to ask one question. Suppose a person now goes to a hospital in Ontario and is covered by Blue Cross. If he has a bill of $300 Blue Cross will pay the bill and the patient will get the receipt. Suppose the same thing happens after January 1 next when the Ontario hospital insurance scheme comes into effect. Will the department accept a receipt in full for $300 or will they only accept a receipt for about $150 because the federal government will be paying about half the hospital bill? Suppose we take Saskatchewan where there are no direct contributions in the form of premiums. What would the department accept there in the case of a patient with the same number of hospital days, the same services and the same charge? Would they get their $300 just the same?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I must point out that this matter was fully discussed and I answered that question as fully and as adequately as I can when my hon. friend asked it four or five times half an hour ago. I point out also that the question does not arise under the present paragraph at all. If my hon. friend is not content with the answer I gave him earlier then I think it is a case where probably he can communicate with the Department of National Revenue. It is something which does not arise out of these amendments at all.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not begrudge at all to the minister credit for the improvements made under clause 2 of the resolution. I note with pleasure that eyeglasses are one of the expenditures that from now on may be included if a person's total expenditures exceed three per cent of his income. But looking at it in a practical way I think that people are going to have to break a lot of eyeglasses for this to mean very much. The hon. member for Welland indicated that he thought that perhaps 50 per cent of the taxpayers would get no benefit from this section because they would be benefiting under the standard $100 exemption made available last year in Mr. Harris' budget.

I would go further and ask whether the minister would quarrel with an estimate I have in my mind that the percentage of taxpayers with less than $100 claimed for such deductions in the past and who would thus utilize the standard exemption would not be 50 per cent but nearer to 70 per cent. I notice that the Minister of National Revenue, the minister's colleague in these budget matters, is sitting next to the minister. From reading the newspapers a lot of people think that the exemption with respect to eyeglasses means that the total cost of the eyeglasses will come off their income tax bill. That, of course, is not the case. Their income tax rate would be what would determine what portion they would save on the total cost of the glasses.

In the first income taxable range the tax rate is 15 per cent so in that case they would only save 15 per cent of the cost of the glasses. It has come to the attention of all of us, that during the time the Minister of National Revenue has assumed duties of tax collection, that in Vancouver, as we were sorry to learn, something in the nature of a kickback system has been in operation involving the purchase of glasses. As I recall the circumstances the kickback to the doctors was unknown to the purchasers of glasses and amounted to anywhere from 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent of the cost of the glasses.

Therefore I say that while there might be a 15 per cent saving for somebody whose total expenditures were over three per cent of his income, nevertheless it would only apply to 30 per cent of our total taxpayers. If the Minister of National Revenue can assure us he is looking into this situation on a nationwide basis I think that is probably the best thing we can do for most people who are obliged to buy glasses.

Mr. Nowlan: I think the hon. member can accept my assurance in that respect, that the matter is being fully investigated across Canada.

Mr. Crestohl: Could the minister tell us whether the cost of earphones for people who are hard of hearing is deductible?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are already allowed under the act and have been for some time.

The Chairman: Clause 3.

Mr. Macnaughton: I am particularly happy that under this clause the minister has increased the exemption for contributions to charitable organizations from five per cent to ten per cent. He himself referred to the great need of universities and colleges for additional money. We all know that with the increasing need for additional classroom space, equipment, more money for salaries for professors and so on, this can be a very helpful provision. I should like to ask the minister one or two questions. In his budget address he said, as found on page 1244 of Hansard of June 17:

> —far too many corporations do not come close to taking advantage of the present five per cent limit; but I am glad to say that many corporations do take their responsibilities in these matters seriously.

He was making the point that under this provision private Canadian corporations can make greater contributions to universities and colleges. That is particularly important in the province of Quebec where in effect government gifts without strings attached are, I think we can assume, not altogether popular at the moment. Therefore private enterprise will have to make up the difference to meet the tremendous needs of colleges and universities in the immediate future.

My first question is: Has the minister any figures or is he able to give us any percentage of Canadian corporations which do contribute under this provision? Second, would the minister tell us what "charitable organizations" means? Can he define it? I am well aware that section 62 (1) (e) of the act defines it to a certain degree but would the term "charitable organizations" apply to charitable trusts, non-profit corporations, low cost housing corporations, provincial governments and Canadian municipalities. I also understand that the 1957 amendment permitted the excess of donations over five per cent, now ten per cent, to be deducted the following year. Does this still remain in force?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the first point, Mr. Chairman, according to the statistics for the last year available, 1956, corporations contributed in round figures $32 million to charitable organizations within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, and that was one per cent of their income. On the average they have not been contributing up to the five per cent. Some have, and encouragement is being given, we hope, by the proposed amendment to all corporations to contribute more generously to the support of charitable organizations.

On the second point, there is no change brought about by the proposed amendment in the definition of "charitable organizations" under section 62 (1) (e) of the act.

On the third point, the matter of carrying forward, the answer is yes, the carry-forward still obtains.

Mr. Caron: During his budget speech the minister said that the increase from 5 per cent to 10 per cent was given especially to help education. If I recall well, he said that evening that educational institutions were counting too much on the government and private corporations had to do their share. I see by the wording of the amendment that the exemption for contributions to charitable organizations by corporations is to be increased from 5 per cent to 10 per cent. If it was the intention of the minister that this money should go for education, why did he not make special provision for a 10 per cent deduction for contributions to education and a 5 per cent deduction for other charitable purposes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I made a special plea to corporations to give support to education through universities for a particular reason, but I did not suggest that the purpose for which the act now recognizes a deduction should be confined to gifts to universities. I did indicate in my budget speech that the deduction would apply in the case of gifts to charitable organizations. The one change this resolution would make in the act would be to change the one figure, the figure 5 to the figure 10.

Hon. members are aware that strong efforts have been made, in the last several years particularly, to put before corporations a plea that they recognize their responsibility in a special degree in connection with university education, and particularly corporations engaged in technical pursuits. A strong plea has been made to them by many enterprises of a philanthropic nature to assist in education. I think that while this amendment does not attempt to narrow in any way the definition of charitable organizations under the act, nevertheless there is reason to hope that corporations will look with particular favour on the plea that they support, through charitable donations in their normal budgets, university education.

There are obvious reasons. Corporations are not subject in the same way as individuals to pleas for support for ordinary church or religious works, and many corporations do not feel disposed to contribute, as individuals do, to the support of church and religious organizations but those corporations will, nevertheless, respond to an appeal to contribute to the assistance of university education.

Mr. Crestohl: If I understood the minister correctly, I believe he said that the corporations of our country have contributed but one per cent towards these charitable institutions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not a good enough record.

Mr. Crestohl: I was going to say that that certainly is not very commendable. In other words, they had a latitude of an additional four per cent of which they did not take advantage.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Many of them did not.

Mr. Crestohl: I am speaking of the average. I am wondering whether the addition of five per cent would merely widen the margin of deficiency, of neglect or carelessness or avoidance of responsibility. I am wondering whether or not that would give them much encouragement because, in my judgment, they are extremely delinquent in complying with the possibilities.

What I say may be a bit drastic, Mr. Chairman, but I am wondering whether or not the law could not be changed to compel corporations to take full advantage of that exemption. If, for example, a tax were imposed on corporation profits to the extent of five per cent—I will not go as high as the ten per cent which the minister suggests—the revenue from that tax could be used to create a fund to be distributed amongst educational and charitable institutions. In other words, we could compel corporations of this country to take advantage of the possible exemption.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend will agree with me that the penalty imposed on corporations by the law today for not contributing up to the permissible percentage to charitable organizations is pretty heavy. It is 47 per cent, and that is a very stiff kind of penalty to impose. I think my hon. friend will agree with me on that.

Mr. Crestohl: That is the perfect answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the second place, I think the increase from five per cent to 10 per cent in the permissible percentage will have the effect for which he and I are arguing. In the first place, there are some corporations that do today contribute up to the full permissible five per cent, and would contribute more if the law permitted them to do so without penalty. In those cases, certainly there will be more generous contributions in view of the proposed increase from five per cent to ten per cent. But in addition, I think in the case of those corporations which have not been contributing hitherto up to the full permissible five per cent there will now be greater consciousness of the opportunity that is given to them and the social responsibility that goes with it. It may well be that some corporations have fought shy of some charitable appeals on the theory that they might, somehow or other, at the end of the year be crowding their five per cent. They will not be quite so apprehensive in the late months of the year of crowding ten per cent. I have some hope that more corporations, and I tried to put it rather strongly in the budget speech, will now recognize their social responsibilities in this respect.

Mr. Macnaughton: It might be just as well to point out that before we force corporations to contribute up to five per cent or ten per cent we should make sure that they have profits of five per cent or ten per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Since 1941 there has been a standard spread between the allowable charitable deduction with respect to individuals of 10 per cent and corporations at five per cent. I was wondering why, when he was raising the maximum deduction in case of corporations, he did not see fit to do likewise also in the case of individuals. The minister in his remarks indicated that he felt individuals had appeals for religious and local charitable donations that were not so regularly accepted by corporations. I suggest to him that perhaps the individual has both, he has the appeal for capital requirements for educational institutions as well as the steady annual religious and local type of appeals that are made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think that under the present circumstances one could depart from the historical, biblical conception of the tithe. I understand that was always the basis of the 10 per cent figure applied to charitable donations under the act for individuals. In the case of corporations, we are simply bringing them up on a level with the position of the individual. The tithing principle is recognized now by the act with respect to all taxpayers, whether individual or corporations.

On the second point, I may tell my hon. friend that while it may be that there are more types of charitable appeals to individuals than to corporations, the record again of the average figure for the individual is not as impressive as perhaps most of us in this house would wish.

In the year 1956 the total of charitable donations of individuals reported in income tax returns was $248 million which happens to be 2 per cent of the income of the individuals.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the corporation record?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The corporation record in that year was one per cent of income.

Mr. Denis: In his budget speech the minister said that the majority of corporations did not use the 5 per cent already admissible for exemption. How can he expect that they are going to use the 10 per cent that is to be exempted?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I endeavoured to answer that question when it was asked by hon. members opposite. I do not think I can usefully add to what I have already said. If they do not use it, they will pay in tax 47 per cent of what they have not chosen to contribute to charity up to 10 per cent of income.

Mr. Benidickson: Perhaps I could simply suggest to my hon. friend that I think he has indicated agreement with the development of the last administration in allowing a little bit of averaging. But the averaging is for a relatively short period, from one year to the next. As time goes on I think he may find that too many taxpayers are not giving adequately, either on the personal side or the corporation side, for fear that their income for the coming year is not ascertained. It might be to the benefit of all society if the averaging period were extended to perhaps two years or three years or something like that and they were then less cautious and gave more generously.

Mr. Carter: I wonder whether the minister could tell the house just how many firms or corporations have contributed the full 5 per cent or what per cent of the corporations have contributed fully?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are no available statistics on that point, I am informed.

Mr. Regier: We realize very well the urgent need of our institutions, especially in the field of education, for additional resources at this time. I do not want to do anything that is going to make contributions to them any less, either the contributions of individuals or the contributions of corporations, however, as I indicated before the dinner recess, I sincerely hope that this is not an approach that is going to be used, or a major approach even, to the very urgent problem being faced by our higher institutions of learning. I am all in favour of individuals exercising charity. However, I am a little bit leery when a huge corporation professes to do so because there is not very much heart in that type of a gift. It is a fairly cold-blooded proposition when a huge corporation makes a donation to a charitable organization; and very often that definitely is the case when it makes a donation to a higher institute of learning. We had the evil practice beginning in the province of British Columbia whereby the local grants are based on the amount of money the university is able to raise by way of donations. I should hate to see the day come when the federal government begins to institute any taxation system whereby they will make any payment to education dependent upon the payment being made by huge corporations.

When these corporations make these grants, especially in the scientific field, to our higher institutions of learning they are not acting entirely from unselfish motives. Therefore the expression "charitable organizations" mentioned in the resolution begins to lose a little bit of its real validity. These organizations will make their grants to universities and will attach riders to the grants and make them conditional upon the money donated being used for specific purposes at the university. That leaves the whole field of research open to some very serious questioning.

For many long years now we have taken rather great pride in the liberty attached to our educational institutions. While I am willing to admit that an individual making a donation to a university—I think this can be fairly said—is not able, even if he wished to do so, to exercise any undue influence upon that university, however, when a university is brought into the position where it is obliged to rely for any large share of its revenue upon the contributions of huge corporations, —and they are becoming larger every year—then some of the liberty that we value so highly in the field of education begins to fly out the window.

There is another questionable angle to this resolution and it is this. It places those responsible for education in a position where they are obliged to go from door to door among the corporations and in effect ask for hand-outs. I greatly regret the situation of which I learned when not so long ago I met one of the most intelligent heads of one of our most progressive universities returning from New York. What had he been doing in New York? He had been spending a week in New York approaching these United States corporations having large subsidiaries in Canada, and he was appealing to them for funds for his university. He was a man chosen to head the affairs of the university. Yet because of the conditions existing he had been placed in a position where he was a beggar on behalf of the university rather than the able administrator supplying the intelligent leadership which he was able to supply and for which purpose he had been appointed in the first place.

While I am not in opposition to the resolution at this time I think the wiser approach for the good of education is not to take the approach the minister took when he introduced this matter in his budget speech. I think the wiser approach is this. If these corporations are making more than the shareholders must have, if they are making more money than they require, then the money should be collected from them by way of taxation by various levels of government and the government can hand that money over to those institutions of learning thereby assuring the continuing liberty of our schools of learning.

We just have to look south of the 49th parallel to see what can happen. All Canadians interested in the field of education are expressing growing concern at how one institution after another south of the border is beginning to become subject to the huge corporations upon whose generosity they must rely for their continued existence. We do not wish that to happen in our Dominion of Canada. I hope the minister will hold some consultations with responsible educators in Canada—I do not mean only scientists but men really in the field of education—upon the long-range possibilities of some of the implications of the government encouraging corporations to make their donations to schools of higher learning rather than the government taking this money from the corporations and the government remaining in charge of our schools of learning.

Mr. Macdonnell: I wish to make a comment or two on this matter, Mr. Chairman. I have had something to do with universities, their needs for money and their collection of money from corporations. It seems to me that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has insisted on bringing into this discussion a measure of suspicion of all kinds of dark doings which are going to be let loose if this exemption is increased in the case of corporations.

Mr. Regier: That is your interpretation.

Mr. Macdonnell: I have had some experience in these matters and while there may be cases where corporations try to exercise an influence and perhaps, in rare cases, undue influence, I would also point out that there are a great many corporations who give money and give it gladly and leave it to, we hope, the wise decisions of the university boards as to its use. It seems to me that to cavil at these concessions made to corporations who do not subscribe is utterly unnecessary and that we should give our blessing to this provision.

Mr. Crestohl: I wonder whether I might, with great respect, make a suggestion to the minister. I believe we are all agreed that it would be well for the educational and charitable institutions of the country and for the people generally if all corporations could in some manner be induced to take full advantage of the law and to pay to these worthy institutions the full 5 per cent, now 10 per cent, of their earnings. Would the minister consider at the end of each year tabling in this house a list of those Canadian corporations who have taken full advantage of the law and another list of those who have not done so? I think the country is entitled to know—

An hon. Member: How about individuals?

Mr. Crestohl: Well, we could include individuals too, if you like, but we are discussing a special law at this moment with respect to corporations. I do not object to individuals being treated in a like manner and I would in fact support such a resolution. However, I believe most individuals do take advantage of this provision, right up to the hilt, and I believe the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Finance will agree that it is unlikely that any individual does not do so. Therefore the hon. member might reflect upon his observation and he may realize that these things could be improved upon.

I hope the minister will consider the tabling of two such lists concerning corporations operating under federal charters in Canada. We want to know which of those organizations are discharging their responsibilities to the charitable and educational institutions of our country and which are not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I could not recommend such a course, which would mean not only a departure from but a complete violation of the principle of secrecy as applied to income tax returns.

In principle, I do not think that is the way to bring about the desired result; I think we must depend upon the good judgment of the people, and the element of compulsion is not, in my opinion, a desirable one to be introduced by this house. We might deplore the fact that many corporations do not measure up to what my hon. friend and I regard as their proper social responsibilities, but in time, as the result of education, we trust there will be a better response, to which we hope this present change will contribute.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on the paragraph or shall we proceed to the fourth paragraph?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I noticed with considerable interest the other day, after this resolution was presented to the house, that a tax commentator in the Financial Post had this to say:

> The amendment apparently ignores the effect of the exchequer court decision in the case of Subsidiaries Holding Co. Ltd. v. the Queen in which it was held that a taxpayer may not enforce payment of a refund refused by the department—even if the refusal is not legally justifiable on the merits of the case.
> The extension of time will be of no use to taxpayers faced with a departmental refusal to pay.

I see that this refers to the next paragraph, and I will reserve that question for the moment, but on the fourth paragraph I have another question to raise.

Am I right in thinking that the self-employed person is obligated to pay a quarterly amount in respect of tax and, if not, there is a penalty of interest imposed upon him? I read a newspaper statement the other day to the effect that the employed person whose wages are deducted at source is under a considerable disadvantage, and it was pointed out that if a self-employed person had put aside for his own use the amount of tax that would otherwise be deducted monthly he would save, at the end of the year, in the case of a man earning $4,000 per annum, at 3 per cent, interest $5.64 if he was a married man, and $9.85 if he was single man. This would constitute an advantage to that extent over the man whose tax was deducted at source each month and a question, of course, arises with respect to the fact that no interest is allowed on advance payments of income tax. I would like to ask, therefore, if it is true that a self-employed person does not have to present his tax return or pay his tax liability until the April 30 after the year in which the income was earned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He is obliged to make quarterly instalment payments, and I think my hon. friend will find the answer to his question in section 54 of the act.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister inform the house of the amount paid by the department last year as interest on over-payments of tax, that is to say, for the last fiscal year?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those figures are not available, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Robichaud: Would the minister explain why they are not available? If the rate was 2 per cent and the government wants to increase it to 3 per cent, there must be a reason for so doing and something must have been paid.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, of course, and the reason is obvious. The government wishes to be a little more generous to the taxpayer to whom the refund is payable, but the fiscal year closed on March 31, which was three and a half months ago, and the figures have not been compiled, so they are simply not available.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister give the figure for the year ending March 31, 1957, which was two years ago?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The department does not segregate those figures.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, there must be a reason for this. The minister has just stated that the government wants to be more generous to the taxpayer and I think this committee has a right to know how much money was paid during the last fiscal year for which the figures are available. We should be told what difference it would make to the treasury and how much more money would be involved. Are we being asked to vote blindly on a flat statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My friend may not approve of the fact but, nevertheless, the figures are not available. No statistical records have been taken of the precise amount paid by way of interest on refunds under the existing law.

Mr. Caron: Is this not a poor way to deal with these matters, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Might I remind my hon. friend that if the former government had seen fit to amend the law so as to provide for such records we would have those figures today. We have, however, only been in office for a year and we cannot be responsible for failures under the law before that time.

Mr. Caron: Every time the minister seems to be in a jam he goes back over the last 22 years.

Mr. Nowlan: We are only going back to last year.

Mr. Caron: If there was anything wrong during the administration of the past 22 years why do you not try to correct it today. I think we have the right to know.

Mr. Ricard: We are correcting things; they cannot all be done in one year. Give us time.

Mr. Caron: We have a right to know. I hear the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot squeaking away as always. We hear all the time about giving the baby Castoria if he cries; we hear it on the radio, we read it in the newspapers and so on. If he waits a little while I will give him some Castoria.

What I want to know at the present time is whether or not it is the intention of the minister to try to change this situation so that we may get these figures with respect to what the government is paying back in interest to those who have paid their taxes in advance or overpaid their taxes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only those who are entitled to a refund will receive any interest in these cases, and then subject to determined conditions. This is not the case of the man who has paid in advance but of the man who is entitled to a refund, and it is the view of the government that when a man has paid more than he was legitimately obliged to pay, the 2 per cent interest on the refund to which he was entitled and which has prevailed for many years is inadequate, and that that rate of interest should be increased in favour of the taxpayer from 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

I do not lay down the rules for statistical compilation of the government or of the former government; it was not the practice under the former government to take off a statistical record, segregating what the 2 per cent rate involved in cost to the treasury. So while the hon. member may regret that the figure is not available I can only inform him that the figure is not available and that the present government is not responsible for the fact that it is not available.

The purpose of this clause is to increase in favour of the taxpayer from 2 per cent to 3 per cent the interest to which he is entitled on a refund under conditions prescribed for the purpose. And the interest is calculated from the latest of three dates; first, the date when the overpayment arises; second, the date on or before which the return was required to be filed; and third, the date when the return was actually filed; and the interest runs to the day on which the overpayment of the tax is refunded.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister or his department must have made some estimate of what it would mean to the treasury to increase this interest rate from 2 per cent to 3 per cent. It must mean that a certain sum of money would not be available to the treasury. There must be an estimate somewhere.

Mr. Denis: Has the minister not got any idea? Is it $50 or $500?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are many occasions on which a precise estimate of cost to the treasury with respect to a particular change in the tax law cannot be arrived at, and this is a case in which there has been no precise estimate, and in which no attempt has been made to arrive at a precise estimate. It is a measure which is put forward because it is considered to offer more justice to the taxpayer.

Mr. Carter: May I ask if this rise in the interest rate is an indication of an expected rise in the interest rate generally?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. It will not have escaped the attention of the hon. member that it remains for a government which has had the satisfaction of seeing interest rates brought down substantially since it came to office to propose this increase in the interest rate on refunds due to the taxpayer.

Mr. Denis: Is it the intention of the minister to fix a date after which it will assume responsibility for his own administration? The Minister of Finance refers to what the former government did. Is he going to set an ultimate date after which he will assume his own responsibility?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think that is a subject for a private chat between the hon. gentleman and myself.

Mr. Caron: The minister tells us that he has no estimate of what this increase will cost the treasury. Did he not ask his officers what this additional one per cent would mean? If the minister never got around to this, why did he not make the figure 4 per cent, or why did he not increase the rate to 5 per cent? It would not mean anything, because there is nothing to show the cost.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think if we were to increase it to that extent even the hon.

member would be overpaying his tax in order to obtain a high rate of interest on his return.

Mr. Caron: What is the rate charged to those who are late in paying.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the hon. member was well aware of that. It is well known. It is 6 per cent.

Mr. Caron: Why not make it 6 per cent for refund?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because the 6 per cent is in the nature of a penalty.

Mr. Caron: The government should be penalized because sometimes, when they overpay, it is because the amount has been poorly calculated in the department.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am deeply impressed by the hon. member's keen desire to see the present government penalized, but he was here for quite a few years and he never suggested that the previous government should be penalized in this way.

Mr. Caron: There is something the minister will have to learn. From now on we are dealing with the future and not with the past.

Mr. Denis: Would the minister not hold Sir John A. Macdonald responsible?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a close relationship between overpayment as described in this paragraph and a subject in which the minister himself has always taken an interest, and that is overdeduction. I am not criticizing the administration, but I wonder if it would not be appropriate at this time for some statistics to be given, if they are available, to indicate the extent to which it is proving necessary to make refunds to people who have their taxes deducted at source. We might have some figures as to the amount of money so refunded in recent years and the number of taxpayers entitled to refunds each year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I suggest that is a proper question to ask the Minister of National Revenue when his estimates are before the committee of supply?

Mr. Nasserden: Before we pass on from the question which has been brought up by hon. members to my right I think it would be a good thing if the minister would indicate if this government intends to change the policy which has been in effect for a number of years so that in future we may have an accounting of how much is involved, because it seems to me there should be an accounting figure somewhere to show what it represents. It seems to me it is time there was a change in the way this is done.

Mr. Regier: I am concerned about who it is who receives this interest rate. I have never heard of individuals receiving interest out of the government. Must the money lie on deposit for years before a taxpayer is eligible to be paid any interest? I believe there are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are eligible for some manner of refund at the end of the tax year. Is this 2 per cent regularly added to the refund or must there be a certain minimum amount? Under what conditions is any interest paid?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact that the hon. member has not heard of many cases is I think a tribute to the efforts of the Department of National Revenue to make these refunds before April 30, and I think it is not amiss to pay tribute to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue for the efforts which are being made in this respect.

Mr. Regier: In other words, if I understand the minister aright, there is no interest payable on money before April 30. It is only payable on money left after that date.

Mr. Caron: I hope the Minister of National Revenue will not say it should have been asked on the resolution on income tax.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister care to explain the intention of paragraph 5.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought paragraph 5 was obvious.

Mr. Benidickson: I think it should be on the record, that is all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is very obvious at the present time that any application on the part of a taxpayer for a refund in respect of overpayment must be made within two years from the end of the taxation year in question. Cases have arisen where the taxpayer, following the expiration of the two-year period, has found some mistake. It may be that he made a mistake in his own return or, for some reason or other, he considers he has overpaid and wishes to apply for a refund. Under the present law the only way to deal with such a case is for the governor in council to permit an ex-gratia payment to be made, and that is not the way in which these cases should be handled. Therefore it is proposed that the period be now extended from two to four years within which a taxpayer may apply for a refund.

Mr. Caron: Does the minister have any figure to show what it would cost the treasury to extend it for an additional two years?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is quite obvious, Mr. Chairman, that Solomon himself could not give a figure on that because these are cases that are unknown at the present time. There may be cases that will arise where, after the two-year period, the taxpayer will discover he has a claim to a refund and will make it, but those cases are not known at the present time.

Mr. Crestohl: Does the minister not know that Solomon was a pretty good accountant himself? He was able to count up to 1,000, at least.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I always understood that Solomon lost count after 600.

Mr. Hees: He just lost interest after 600.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we proceed to a discussion of paragraph No. 6?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I see in this paragraph that a gift to a spouse of real property can qualify for exemption from payment of gift tax. In the province of Quebec we have a marriage contract which has to be signed before the marriage. Would that be included in that? In other provinces you can sign a marriage contract or give a gift after the marriage but in the province of Quebec marriage contracts have to be signed before the marriage takes place. I would like to have some clarification of that point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The nub of the problem would be the effective date, not of the contract but of the gift. This provides for a gift between spouses.

Mr. Caron: But it is a gift by contract. If a man were to give a gift of $10,000 in real property to his wife before the marriage will that be included?

Mr. Pickersgill: His wife? Before the marriage?

Mr. Caron: His wife-to-be. Assume they are to be married in two days.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think my hon. friend is assuming there will be no slip twixt the cup and the lip; but I do not know that the law in all those cases can assume that the intended marriage is going to be carried out. The resolution contemplates a gift from one spouse to another.

Mr. Macnaughton: Paragraph 6 is a good example of how the tax drafters have considered only English common law and not Quebec civil law. In the province of Quebec the question of gifts between husbands and wives is regulated, as hon. members know, by the civil code. In order to give a gift to your wife you must specify it in the marriage contract which, as was pointed out by my friend the hon. member for Hull, has to be signed before the marriage. If the minister is prepared to give an exemption of $10,000 to people living in English-speaking provinces, why would he not consider giving an exemption of $10,000 on gifts made between husbands and wives and allow the province of Quebec to participate in this general provision because transfers of property between husband and wife—I was going to say are not well known, but in fact they are not even permitted in Quebec as I understand they are in English-speaking provinces?

While I am on my feet, I have a few questions to ask with regard to paragraph six. I note that the paragraph refers to gifts of real property. Does this apply to a gift of cash to buy real property, cash per se and cash to forgive indebtedness arising from the previous purchase of real property?

I also ask this question. If you claim an exemption of $10,000 once on account of a gift of a house between husband and wife, can you also claim a second exemption for the gift of a farm to your son?

Another question arises. Let us assume that I claim only $5,000 of my $10,000 exemption. Can I come later and claim the balance of $5,000? Can I in effect make two gifts up to the extent of $10,000?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Taking my hon. friend's points seriatim, in the first place if it is permissible under the laws of Quebec, the competent draftsman my hon. friend is would seek to provide that the gift which is ante-nuptial in effect, would take effect on the marriage. In that case if the gift were one of real property it would obviously come within the scope of the present resolution.

I believe the next question my friend asked was whether cash could be substituted for a gift of real estate and the answer is no. The law at the present time permits a gift of $4,000 per annum, but the purpose of this provision is to create more security in the Canadian home for the spouse and, of course, particularly for the wife. That is the whole purpose of the clause.

My hon. friend asked about the possibility of two gifts, a gift to the spouse and then, if the property should happen to be a farm property, a gift to the son. The answer is that there is one gift permitted and only one of $10,000 in value. My hon. friend realizes that this is in addition, of course, to the present permissible gift of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. Crestohl: During the course of the afternoon I referred to a subject and perhaps I gave the minister a bit of a running start because it is dealt with in this paragraph. In the very best of faith there is an oversight in this paragraph in so far as the citizens of the province of Quebec are concerned. Perhaps I discussed this subject this afternoon under a heading which may have made me slightly out of order and I would like to repeat my remarks now and ask the minister to examine the question.

Husbands and wives in Quebec who have no ante-nuptial contracts are considered to be common as to property. That is the law of the province. In fact, Quebec is the only province in the whole of Canada with that peculiarity in its law. Consequently a husband in that province who is common as to property with his wife—I am not concerned about the separation as to property at the moment—is prevented under this paragraph from taking advantage of giving a gift to his wife as contemplated by this clause.

I can visualize the following situation. A husband who is common as to property in Quebec might wish to give or pass to his wife $10,000 ownership in the home which they occupy, and I use that figure because that is the restriction under this paragraph. Property cannot be conveyed in Quebec, as it can in other provinces, unless it is done by notarial deed. The husband and wife must go to a notary to have such a deed drawn up. A notary who is ethical and who knows his law will promptly say to him, "Under article 1265 of the civil code of the province of Quebec you cannot make a gift to your wife."

Assuming a notary were to draw up such a deed and the husband died later, the succession duty assessors who are very able and knowledgeable gentlemen, in assessing the estate must find that the gift which the husband gave to his wife is completely void and the $10,000 would revert to the estate.

I am to give an example. A husband who is worth $100,000 ostensibly gives his wife under this section a gift of a $10,000 interest in the home. When he dies the value of his estate should then be $90,000 because he has parted with $10,000 by a legal gift to his wife under this section. Assuming there are no children, she is entitled to an exemption of $60,000 leaving a taxable estate of $30,000. But in assessing the estate the inspectors will find the flaw in this gift. It is a gift that is void. It is not even voidable. It is void ab initio. Consequently there is an estate of $40,000 on which succession duties must be paid.

As I said this afternoon, I think that some provision should be made to allow husbands or wives in the province of Quebec who are common as to property to benefit from this form of gift. I have discussed the matter with lawyers who are perhaps more familiar with the civil law than I am and they have confirmed the suspicion that this clause will not afford the same benefit and have the same force and effect in the province of Quebec as elsewhere. Therefore I suggest to the minister that perhaps between now and the bringing down of the bill he might give this matter very careful consideration. Perhaps some means can be devised to allow the province of Quebec to enjoy the fullest advantages of this section in the same way as the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Even according to my hon. friend's contention, it is not this section which denies the benefit to the Quebec spouse. According to his argument it is the law of Quebec—

Mr. Crestohl: Correct.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —so he should not say it is this provision which denies benefit to the Quebec spouse. I want to point out to him that the spouse in Quebec, as between whom and his spouse there is community of property, does not need this clause. There is community of property between them and they therefore share ownership of the family home. There is a situation which does not exist in the other provinces, and surely my hon. friend is not going to deny the opportunity, so far as tax legislation can do it, to extend the benefit of community of property to spouses in the other provinces in respect of the family home.

Mr. Crestohl: The fact does remain though that it is intended under this section to allow a husband to make a gift to his wife free of gift tax. That can happen without any difficulty in any of the other provinces of Canada. The husband can make a gift to his wife free of gift tax. Under the laws of the province of Quebec this is not possible under this section.

Mr. Macnaughton: What we are saying in effect is that the gift tax provisions should allow the husband to pay $10,000 to his wife under his marriage contract free of gift tax. That is what we want.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not catch that.

Mr. Macnaughton: We are asking that the law should be amended to allow a husband who has a marriage contract in the province of Quebec to pay $10,000 to his wife free of gift tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision is not intended to be a duplication of the present provision with regard to the $4,000 per annum which a husband may give to his wife. That stands. This is intended to create security for the wife in the ownership of the family home. It is related directly to the family home and that is the purpose of it. It does not relate to cash gifts at all. It permits a gift of an interest in the home.

Mr. Caron: In the province of Quebec husbands are not allowed to give gifts to wives or wives to husbands. How will we do it? They can do it up to 48 hours before they sign the marriage contract. Would they be exempted from gift tax? If not, I think it is a case of discrimination against the laws of the province of Quebec which are not the same as in the rest of Canada. We still have the Napoleon code.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This provision, which has much to commend it, is available to anybody in Canada once parliament enacts it. If it is my hon. friend's opinion that the law of Quebec prevents some spouses there from deriving benefit from this provision, I think in all fairness that should not be pleaded as a reason for denying this benefit to spouses in other provinces, particularly when it is a fact that those spouses in Quebec as between whom community of property exists already have similar benefits.

Mr. Caron: Would it not be possible to amend clause 6 to provide that gifts given under the marriage contract which is signed a few hours or a day before the marriage will be considered as gifts given to a spouse and be exempt from gift tax? That is what we want. We do not want to stop others from benefiting but we want those in the province of Quebec to be able to have this benefit.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member is speaking about the province of Quebec where under certain circumstances they have community of property. From what I have seen in my limited practice, and I am sure others in English-speaking provinces have seen it too, a husband will deed a property to his wife as joint tenant. Perhaps they build a home when the husband retires and they create a joint tenancy. Then the husband dies and in the course of events it is suddenly found that there is a gift tax because the property is owned by the husband and the wife had not put any money into it. Time and time again complications have arisen because of the gift tax and gift tax assessments. It is to avoid cases such as that that this section is designed. It refers to the home of the husband and wife.

I think you will all agree that when they start out early in life the husband buys a home. That is all right. But later on they retire and he may build or buy another home. The probabilities of life expectancy being what they are, the chances are that he will pass on before his wife and the husband may create a joint tenancy. But then complications may arise because of the gift tax. This section is designed largely, so far as husbands and wives are concerned, to overcome that difficulty and that difficulty only. There is also, of course, the feature of encouraging a father to turn over his farm property to his son and thus avoid payment of gift tax as has happened so often in the past. It is remedial legislation.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not doubt at all the lofty and desirable intentions of this section of the law but I am a little apprehensive whether or not it delivers that which it seems to deliver so far as husbands and wives in the province of Quebec are concerned. If it does and if the minister is satisfied that it does then we want him to convince us. I appreciate the lofty intentions which motivated the section. I agree with it and accept it but, as I said, I am very doubtful whether or not, in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, it will be as effective, useful and helpful as the minister has just said it will be in other provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Give us a chance to put it to work and let us see then whether my friend's misgivings or our hopes are justified.

Mr. Crestohl: Perhaps the minister could get a legal opinion in the course of the next few days in order to assure the house that the section will deliver that which he thinks it will deliver. Perhaps he could get a legal opinion from the Department of Justice or the Minister of Justice. We would like to have a legal opinion.

The Deputy Chairman: Are we finished with paragraph 6?

Mr. Crestohl: No. I call it ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business will be for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with these income tax resolutions, and then take the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the leader say what the business will be on Monday?

Mr. Green: On Monday we intend to move to go into supply.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND

Question No. 144—Mr. Carter:

Question

1. How much money has been paid into the unemployment insurance fund per month since June, 1957?

2. How much has been paid out of the fund each month since June, 1957?

3. What is the balance remaining in the fund at the present time?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 11, 1958

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEARSON—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT OF REMARKS MADE IN DEBATE IN SENATE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the members of this house. It arises out of a report in the press of a statement made in the other place about the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Jung) with reference to his racial origin.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I rather anticipated that point might be raised. Some hon. members have already spoken to me about it. In my view a question of privilege cannot properly be raised against a member of the other house for something said in the other house. The other house has its privileges just as we have, and its powers over its own members to deal with their conduct in the other house. It does not seem to me to be appropriate to raise, as a matter of privilege, something said by a member of the other house when this house has no power to deal with the matter. I do not say that it is not a proper matter for comment at a proper time or that one cannot refer to or cite the proceedings of the other house. However, I do not think it is appropriate to raise what the hon. member has in mind as a matter of privilege.

Mr. Pearson: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling; but as this statement in the other house referred to a member of this house, and as this statement has appeared in the press under headlines which I think are derogatory to the members of this house, I had thought and hoped I could bring it forward in this way under these circumstances.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would think that the person who might raise the matter, if it can be raised at all, would be the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Whether he will entertain the same resentment as do members as a whole will remain for him to say when he comes here. In any event the matter could be discussed next week in a general way when the subject of external affairs is up for consideration. I feel that Mr. Jung—and I refer to him as Mr. Jung—should be here when this matter is referred to because whatever answer he gives will be in keeping with the tradition that we are all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: As this is a rather novel matter, perhaps I might take it under further consideration. May I say that I appreciate what hon. members have said.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we greatly appreciate the attitude Your Honour has taken on this matter. However, there is one point which has not been mentioned by you but which we feel means a great deal, and it is this. If a reflection is made on a member of the House of Commons, is that then not a matter of privilege in the House of Commons?

Mr. Speaker: I have already expressed my immediate view on the subject and, as I say, I will give it further consideration.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SESSIONAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. Earl Rowe (Dufferin-Simcoe) presented the first report of the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER—STATEMENT ON SUBJECTS DISCUSSED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked whether I could make a statement regarding the discussions which took place as between the President and Secretary of State of the United States, various members of the government and myself. While I have not had an opportunity during the intervening hours to make very much preparation in this regard, I will outline in general the discussions which took place, leaving, however, detailed discussion until the debate on external affairs which is set for next week.

The members of this house and our fellow citizens in this city have shown very clearly how happy they were to welcome the President of the United States to Ottawa. A visit of this kind is an opportunity for us to demonstrate the ties of history and kinship which bind us together, and I know we were all very pleased to have the President address this house. He stated his views frankly and in a straightforward manner, as we have done for this government. We appreciated the opportunity to hear him explain the views of his country on those important issues which are of consequence to both our nations. Nothing better illustrates the strength of our relationship than that we can talk honestly to each other without endangering the association which holds us together.

The same spirit which was evidenced in this house was also apparent during the discussions between the President and the Secretary of State of the United States, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, other ministers and myself. We were aided by the presence of Mr. Dulles, who shared with us his broad experience and wide grasp of the problems of international relations. He had just returned from Paris and was able to give us a general idea as to the attitude of France respecting the great problems which particularly affect her and those which affect Canada jointly with France as members of NATO.

I think what has taken place illustrates the need of some continuing body to permit of a general discussion from time to time of our respective points of view. Respecting the earlier reference to the need for arrangements to permit of discussion from time to time between members of the congress of the United States and the parliament of Canada, while constitutionally as far as the President is concerned no decision in that regard could, of course, be achieved, the success of the meeting in general, as a meeting between the President and myself and the others to whom I have referred, indicates how very important it is that something in the nature of an exchange of opinions should take place from time to time as between the parliament of our country and the congress of the United States. My hope is that the recommendations which were made by the committee composed of Congressmen Hays and Coffin will be accepted; that a committee on Canadian-United States relations will be set up in the United States congress, and that we in our House of Commons will set up a similar committee, and that from time to time mutual exchanges will take place between members of these committees or between members of parliament and members of congress outside those committees, to the end that in general discussion the views of each nation may be ascertained and thereby, through discussions, causes of disagreement removed.

As far as the general discussions which took place are concerned, the President and I touched upon most of the pressing issues of the day as well as upon matters of more particular bilateral interest. There was very broad agreement on these fundamental issues, and whatever differences we may have on details there was never any question either before these meetings or during them—nor will there be, I know, in the days ahead—that either of our nations will lose sight of the fact that we must remain united in our objectives and in our determination if freedom is to be maintained.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs and I discussed with President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles such matters as progress toward disarmament and the changing nature of Soviet policy with reference to the economic challenge of the critical situation in the Middle East. The Minister of National Defence had an opportunity to talk over our mutual defence problems with Mr. Dulles. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture discussed trade and economic questions, and the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources had a talk on the problem of boundary waters. In addition to these more formal talks there were, of course, opportunities for a less formal exchange of views in the atmosphere of the social occasions during which we met.

With respect to the international situation, members of the house are aware that discussions have taken place during the last year or so with regard to the providing of safeguards against the danger of surprise attack, and Canadians and Americans have a particular and special interest in these arrangements for the polar regions. These matters were discussed with reference to the recent letter which Mr. Khrushchev sent to the President signifying Soviet readiness in principle to enter into direct discussions on the technical aspects of the problem of preventing surprise attack.

Hon. members will not expect me to indicate even in general terms the contents of the President's contemplated reply, but that its broad purpose is to bring about such technical talks will be evident from our agreement that experts should work together on this problem. Studies have been under way for some time, and I understand that similar work has also been done in the United States. The meaning of our agreement is not only that there should be consultation between our officials; such exchanges of views on disarmament matters have long been a feature of our normal relations. It signifies rather that in the immediate future our collaboration should concentrate in a practical way on this particular and very important matter.

As to the general question of defence, it has been the aim and purpose of this government—and I think that view has been accepted by the Canadian people as a whole—that at all times in our joint defence efforts we must assure and maintain over and above every other consideration the political and civilian control with respect to military matters. During the course of the President's visit we reviewed the complex issues which arise from the joint efforts of our two governments in the field of continental defence. There was mutual recognition of the increased necessity for regular consultation between our two governments, both on the specific requirements with which the two governments may expect to be faced in providing for the security of North America and on international events which could lead to the necessity of activating the continental air defences. There was full realization that our joint efforts in the defence of North America must continue to serve the objectives of the NATO alliance in which we have banded together with other like-minded countries in the search for collective security in an uneasy world.

In these discussions we took note of the intimate co-operation of our two countries over the past two decades in matters relating to continental defence and of the machinery which had been established to provide for the consideration of defence problems of common concern. We recognized that these interdependent defence relationships must continue and, indeed, that they would become even more important and more complex in the face of the advanced weapon technology which is now available to potential aggressors. We agreed that while existing machinery in the defence field had served us well in the past and would undoubtedly continue to do so in the future, the need existed to supplement existing channels for consultation by providing for a periodic review at the ministerial level of problems which might be expected to arise. We recognized that decisions in this field would involve not only consideration of the military aspects of our common defence but also political and economic factors. We thought it particularly important as well that every step should be taken to maintain the principle and the fact of civilian control and guidance of these common military activities.

We agreed therefore that we should establish a joint ministerial committee to be known as the Canada-United States committee on joint defence, with scope to consider all matters bearing on the common defence of the North American continent. This committee will consist for Canada of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Finance; and for the United States of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defence and the Secretary of the Treasury. We agreed that such other appropriate cabinet members as either government might designate from time to time might participate on an ad hoc basis in the committee's deliberations. The committee will normally meet alternately in Washington and Ottawa under the chairmanship of the Secretary of State when the meeting is held in the United States and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when the meeting is held in Canada.

In regard to the question of defence production, we examined together the situation which arises in these days of mounting defence costs and the need for rationalizing whenever possible and consistently with national requirements the industrial base for our own defence needs. In anticipation of a meeting of the newly-announced committee at cabinet level on defence matters, some consideration has been given to the sort of items which might be placed upon the agenda. Further consideration, of course, will have to be given in consultation with our colleagues in each country to prepare ourselves to discuss in adequate detail many of these matters.

That in general represented the tenor of the discussions with respect to the subject of defence. So far as particulars are concerned, they will be available in committees; in the committee on defence, as an example, when the minister might be asked further questions with respect thereto.

I now come to the problem of economic questions. Consideration was given to the principal economic issues that are now facing the free world. It was agreed that some of those have become intensified by the Soviet economic offensive. It is more important now than ever before that measures be considered which might be expected to strengthen the economies of countries in the free world through the expansion of international trade and the promotion of programs of economic development. If progress can be made in these directions, as I believe it can, it may become easier to make fully convertible the main currencies in which world trade is conducted; but it would be quite wrong to suggest, as one newspaper did this morning, that any plans had been agreed upon, or been determined in part, with respect to convertibility of sterling since, of course, such action is entirely for decision by Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

We received from the President and his Secretary of State reports concerning the prospects for the trade agreements legislation. We described the preparations being made for the commonwealth trade and economic conference. Within those limits various matters were discussed, all of which, of course, cannot be referred to at this time. However, there is one matter of particular interest and that is the necessity, as we see it in Canada, of revising the list of strategic materials which come under either prohibition or control for export to the Soviet bloc and to communist China. This matter is going to be considered at length at a conference that is about to take place in Paris of representatives of nations of the free world.

I raised with the President the question that some Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies may have been prevented from accepting orders from communist China, or from peoples in that country, by the application of United States foreign assets control regulations, even though acceptance of such orders would be permitted by the policy of the Canadian government. The President expressed the view that the United States regulations should not be applied in any way to the disadvantage of the Canadian economy. If cases arose in the future where the refusal of orders by companies operating in Canada might have any effect on Canadian economic activity, the United States government would consider favourably exempting the parent company in the United States from the application of the foreign assets control regulations with respect to such orders.

It was made perfectly clear, and I want to underline this fact, that there was no question at any time that, with respect to the operations of Canadian companies, Canadian law shall govern and Canadian wishes shall be respected. Further consideration of this question will naturally require some days. I go no further at this time except to re-underline what I have said to re-emphasize the stand taken by this government, that Canada as a sovereign nation has the right to the maintenance in its full amplitude of its legislative enactments, both dominion and provincial.

I think that in general is a summary of—not in particular—the discussions that took place. I must say that during the course of the three days I was more than ever impressed with the very reasonable and co-operative attitude that was taken to assure that at all times anything that takes place in the economic field which might conceivably cause difficulty to either of our countries will to the limit of our respective capacities be resolved to the end that our unity shall be maintained; that in whatever we do there will be a full realization on the part of each of us that in taking our individual courses as individual nations every regard and respect will be paid to the fullest consideration that nothing that is done shall detrimentally affect the other country; and that indeed we now approach an era internationally where it becomes more important than ever before that the nations of the free world must, in the interests of survival itself, bring about economic changes in unity that might 15 or 20 years ago have been regarded as impossible of achievement.

I conclude by saying in very simple words that this conference did represent a forward step. There was a spirit of mutual respect and forbearance and a common desire to arrive at decisions which will assure that the unity that we all desire to attain will be preserved, and that the sovereignty of each of our countries will not be impinged upon in any way.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the house—certainly we on this side—are grateful to the Prime Minister for his statement, and all the more so because he has not had very much time in which to prepare it after coming, I suppose, straight to the house from seeing off the President and Secretary of State. We will, as the Prime Minister has said, have an opportunity next week in the discussion of external affairs to go into these matters in greater detail, because their importance certainly justifies that discussion.

We on this side of the house share the satisfaction of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the good results which have been achieved during this visit. We share with him the pleasure of having had in our capital at this time the President and Secretary of State. I am sure the conversations between the Prime Minister and President have been fruitful and useful, just as those between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary of State have been.

The Prime Minister has indicated that some new prices of international machinery have developed out of this meeting. He made reference to the joint committee on defence which is being set up. This should, I think, be a useful development, though speaking as one who has had some experience with international machinery in recent years, just as is the case with other such pieces of machinery this will be as valuable and as useful as the participants desire to make it. I am glad the Prime Minister mentioned the desirability of a joint committee of parliament and congress being set up. This is a matter which was recommended from the United States side by Congressmen Hays and Coffin in their report, and by Senator Aiken. It was referred to also by the Prime Minister in the United States a few weeks ago.

I cannot think, myself, of anything at this time which might be more useful than such a joint committee. I quite realize that this is a matter concerning which the President would have to be very careful in his talks with the Prime Minister because of the division of powers in Washington. Nevertheless, perhaps the initiative which has been taken could be followed up on the legislative level, and something permanently useful could result.

I noticed with much interest the Prime Minister's reference to the economic aspects of his talks. I agree with him that too much stress cannot be placed on the necessity for expanding trade, not only in the interests of the prosperity of the countries concerned but because the necessity to expand trade in the free world will perhaps become more and more important as a defence against the kind of aggression from the other world which reflects itself not so much now in aggression across borders as in aggression in markets. The Prime Minister, I think, was quite right when he mentioned that one aspect of this expansion is convertibility, though neither the President nor the Prime Minister, or their governments, can themselves bring about this convertibility. It is one of the objectives they both have in mind. It is an objective which might be encouraged and sought at the forthcoming commonwealth economic conference.

The Prime Minister mentioned that from time to time difficulties arise between our two countries because of our differing regulations in regard to trade with the communist countries. It seems to me, and I know the Minister of Trade and Commerce must be very much aware of this, that the sooner we can agree among the NATO countries—I know talks are going on to this end—on a uniform list of commodities which are on the strategic list and therefore not exportable to countries which we fear, the sooner those difficulties will disappear.

This question of the China differential has been before us now for years, and the sooner it can be cleared up the better. This morning the Prime Minister said, and it was a very interesting part of his statement, that he felt sure as a result of these talks—I do not want to misquote him or say anything which does not reflect his meaning. However, I gathered the impression that he felt sure that the difficulties which have developed in one or two cases over the export of goods to communist China can be cleared away by the application of United States law in such a way that it will not prevent Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies from exporting goods to other countries if that is within our laws and our regulations. I am sure that must be a welcome development to all members of this house. It was therefore with some mild disappointment that I read in the press conference report last night that the spokesman of the United States delegation was not able to go any further in his statement than to say that in these matters consultation would take place when difficulties arose.

The Prime Minister referred to the initiative that has perhaps been taken—one is never quite sure in these matters whether or not a genuine initiative has been taken—by the Soviet government with regard to technical discussions for the prevention of surprise attack. I am sure that members of the house will have heard with great satisfaction that both the Canadian government and the United States government are determined to follow up this move in case it turns out to be a valuable and useful initiative. It is, of course, something that has been in the minds of the Canadian government for a long time, especially in its relationship to Arctic defence. It is encouraging to know that the reaction in Washington and in Ottawa—and I am sure in London and Paris—has been quick and positive to what may turn out to be a useful move.

I am sure that the talks that have now been concluded have been carried on with that frankness which is characteristic of a tried and tested friendship such as that which exists and must be maintained between our two countries. It has been said that neighbourhood is a geographical fact but that neighbourliness is a relationship between people. I feel certain, Mr. Speaker, that the talks which have just been concluded have deepened and strengthened that neighbourliness which is now more essential than ever in both countries in the tense and dangerous world in which we live.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group listened with anticipation, interest and attention to the Prime Minister's preliminary and, naturally under the circumstances, brief review of the discussions with President Eisenhower and his colleagues. Naturally there is great interest in what the Prime Minister had to say this morning because of the great concern in Canada with the many problems that face us at the present time—I refer to our difficulties with respect to defence; disarmament; markets for lead, zinc, copper and other metals; markets for oil; markets for wheat and many other Canadian commodities—and also, Mr. Speaker, because of the growing interest and concern with respect to the settlement of the issues between us and the United States concerning the development of boundary waters.

The substance of the arrangements reported by the Prime Minister, in the opinion of this group, will be revealed only after discussion on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, after further explanations and details are given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and as a result of action taken in the days ahead by the governments to meet the problems that concern us all.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his extremely informative statement to the house a few moments ago. Can the Prime Minister say definitely whether or not in the future a Canadian company like the Ford Motor Company would have the right to export automobiles to China? Would the Prime Minister also say what consultation took place on the question of Canadian oil exports to the United States and whether, as a result of this conference, anything is being done or is likely to be done to increase the market for Canadian oil, a very important point for many geographical areas in this country?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the last question is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I may say that there was discussion respecting oil and also the other matters to which the Leader of the Opposition made reference a few moments ago. While discussions took place and while representations were made, I do not think there is any useful information I can give on these questions at this time. There will be a meeting shortly, I hope, of the members of the economic committee, when in particular these questions will be discussed. During our talks naturally they were dealt with at some length in general between the President and myself but, of course, in detail as between the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

However, as to oil, I can say that the problem is a difficult and complex one. We placed before the United States representatives most strongly the position of the oil industry within our country and the need of the amelioration of any unnecessary embargo or reduction in import by the United States. These discussions are still continuing. As I say, these matters cannot be determined in a matter of a few hours or a few days. However, the fullest discussion took place with regard thereto with, of course, the realization by this government of the need of markets being extended and expanded not only for oil but also in respect of other products of Canadian mines. Without going into detail, I would mention in general iron, lead, zinc, copper and also aluminum and nickel.

Mr. Argue: And wheat?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was dealing with the others. As one who was raised in the west, I may say that wheat never gets too far away from my thinking.

As to the first question, I would say that while the discussions were, naturally, particularly directed to the export of Ford cars, I was rather surprised to read this morning in a statement purported to have been made by the president of the Ford company that at no time was there anything in the nature of finality, and there was apparently no more, as I understood his statement, than some negotiations and discussions. I do express the hope that if the Ford company can secure an order from communist China it will be able to ship the cars.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Might I ask the Prime Minister if it was clear from the discussions between the President of the United States and himself that the directions of the United States in this matter are simply pursuant to treasury regulations, or do they involve any act on the part of congress itself?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would say at this moment that the situation comes within the expression used by the hon. gentleman. If the regulations are dependent upon immediate congressional action in the United States—by a congress seemingly more desirous of an early conclusion of the session than is sometimes apparent in this house—I would think that any such legislation which might be introduced during the current session of congress would not have much hope of being passed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if, with regard to the joint ministerial committee on defence, it will be within the terms of reference of that committee to include consideration not only of defence matters as such but the related matter of civil defence? Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs also give some information to the house as to why the Minister of Defence Production should not be included as one of the Canadian ministers on the proposed joint international ministerial body?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first part of the hon. member's question having to do with civil defence, there was no discussion of that matter in the discussion concerning the setting up of this committee. I have the text of the announcement given to the press, and the committee will consult on matters bearing upon the common defence of the North American continent which lies within the North Atlantic treaty area. I believe it could well be demonstrated that civil defence bears on military defence. It could well be that civil defence could be discussed in the committee. I do not contemplate that in the meetings of that committee we will abide by strict rules of procedure; it will be a forum for a discussion of common problems in the field designated by the announcement.

With respect to the second part of the question raised by the hon. member for Essex East, as has been indicated to the house, this is going to be a six man committee, but I would draw his attention particularly to this paragraph: "Other ministers may participate on an ad hoc basis on a request by the committee." I can well anticipate that the Minister of Defence Production will be called into the discussion from time to time.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is anticipated that the present joint defence board, Canada-United States, will report to this proposed joint defence cabinet committee?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): That has not been considered. I draw the attention of hon. members to this statement: "The committee will not supplant but will supplement existing joint boards and committees." I can well anticipate that at the military level —there are two other committees which provide for consultation across the border at military level, so there are three altogether, including the joint defence board—on occasion we will have to get the views of those two committees.

ROYAL VISIT

PRINCESS MARGARET—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF OFFICIAL RECEPTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I put a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche)? I am sorry I have not had time to give him proper notice, but I think he will be able to answer it just the same.

Inquiries of the Ministry

According to an item in yesterday's Toronto Star, Premier Bennett of British Columbia had to cancel an official reception for Her Royal Highness Princess Margaret because of undue interference in this matter on the part of the Prime Minister of Canada. Will the Secretary of State tell us whether that report is true, and would he be so kind as to produce all correspondence exchanged on the subject?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I have not seen this news report in the Toronto Star. I will check the accuracy of the report, will look into the matter, and will then be in a position to reply to the hon. member for Hull.

TELEVISION

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR COVERAGE OF HOLT-DURELLE FIGHT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Minister of National Revenue what are the possibilities of having the Holt-Durelle fight televised in the maritimes next week?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised in this house and outside of this house on several occasions by the hon. member for Westmorland, the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and others. The television rights are controlled by the international boxing commission, I am advised, and that commission at first refused point-blank to allow any telecast of the fight. However, this is a fight for the British empire championship, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has discussed the matter at length with the commission. I am glad to say that arrangements were finalized this morning whereby this fight will be telecast on the night of July 16 at ten o'clock p.m. eastern standard time. We have also made arrangements with the South African broadcasting commission so that the fight will be broadcast in South Africa, and possibly in other parts of the British commonwealth.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MAIL DELIVERY OF COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to address a question to the Postmaster General, arising out of a newspaper report that a newspaper, faked by the communists to look exactly like Ceske Slovo, a free Czech paper published in Munich, has been received by mail by more than 1,000

Czech Canadians. Does the Postmaster General know if there is anything that can be done to stop this communist propaganda by misrepresentation which is coming through the mail in increasing numbers and causing especially a great deal of irritation and concern to ethnic groups?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will look into this matter and give the Leader of the Opposition an answer next week.

TRANSPORT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT RAILWAY EXTENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I address a question to the Prime Minister, arising out of the fact that I believe all the members of the House of Commons who come from British Columbia received a wire this morning from Hon. Mr. Bonner in his capacity as minister of industrial development, trade and commerce of that province, informing us that he understood that within a few days a decision will be reached by the federal government on the route of the northern development railway extensions and asking the British Columbia members of this house to inquire of the Prime Minister whether, if such is the case, serious consideration is being given to a tie-in of routes for railways so there will be a planned basis of development in British Columbia?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer this question. The matter of the Pine Point railway has been before the government for some time. We have received representations from the government of British Columbia and from many bodies in Alberta, and when a decision is made on the route it will be announced at the proper time.

INCOME TAX

PREMIUM IRON ORES—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Prime Minister whether he found an opportunity, as reported in the press, to discuss again with his United States visitors the views of his government, which I believe are not dissimilar from those of the former government, with respect to the United States tax claim against a Canadian corporation, namely Premium Iron Ores Limited?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, discussions were held with regard to this matter and there was an exchange of ideas on the question, which has been a vexed one for a considerable period of time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL—PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFF BY CANADIAN CAR AND FOUNDRY AT TURCOTTE PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, which might also perhaps be properly addressed to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been made aware that Canadian Car and Foundry Company is being forced to close its Turcotte works in Montreal, resulting in the lay-off of about 1,000 people for at least four months? Is the minister also aware that this is due to the fact that the railway companies are no longer placing advance orders for capital goods because of the freight rate question? Since the Montreal area is deeply concerned, has the minister any comment to make on this question?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this pending lay-off, but from time to time during the past year I have been in touch with both railways regarding the possibility of orders being placed with those companies which manufacture rolling stock in Canada, and I have been continually assured that the railways place all orders as early as possible for their anticipated requirements and that they keep such companies advised well in advance of pending orders. I am afraid there is nothing more I can say at this time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HALT VIOLENCE IN INTERIOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked if I could report to the house with respect to co-operative arrangements between the federal government and the government of British Columbia in connection with the problem in the Kootenays created by the sons of freedom members of the Doukhobor sect. I must advise the hon. gentleman that we have not yet received a reply from the government of British Columbia to the letter we wrote them some two weeks ago.

INDUSTRY

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—REPORTED REMOVAL OF SUGAR REFINERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the statement made in Saint John, New Brunswick, on June 26 last by Mr. Alex B. Hill, president of the Atlantic Sugar Refineries Limited, to the effect that his company was "being pushed out of Saint John", could the minister advise the house what action, if any, is being taken by his department or by the government to prevent the contemplated closing of the Saint John sugar plant and its transfer to another point in central Canada?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of the statement, and since the hon. member did not take the trouble to send me a copy of it I am afraid I cannot comment.

Mr. Speaker: I think the question was asked before in the house, though my memory may not be correct.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister said he was not aware of the statement, but the matter was discussed in the house, even though a question was not asked about it. May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister been made aware that the construction of another pier at Saint John harbour together with the application of more favourable and competitive freight rates would assure the continuation and even the expansion of this company's operation at Saint John, to the benefit of New Brunswick and of the Atlantic region generally?

An hon. Member: There is no answer.

Mr. Hees: There was no question.

Mr. Speaker: The question seems to be the advancement of an argument.

GRAIN

DELIVERY QUOTA POSITION IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce which I am sure he will welcome. Will the minister say what progress is being made toward the equalization of delivery quotas on the prairies, whether the producers will have an opportunity to deliver an equal quota by the end of the crop year, and whether there is anything to the belief that delivery quotas will be raised to eight bushels or more, or perhaps removed altogether?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question, and for deferring it for 24 hours when I informed him that I was assembling this information. I welcome the question, because the reply is very favourable indeed. Other hon. members from western Canada have asked me about this quota position.

The first part of the question is, what progress is being made toward the equalization of delivery quotas. The answer is, excellent progress. There are in the western provinces 2,070 delivery points to which the farmers bring their grain. Ninety per cent of those are now on a 6-bushel quota or have completed the 6-bushel quota. The figures are as follows: on the 5-bushel quota, 71 points; on the 6-bushel quota, 1,967 points; completed or closed, 32 points, for a total of 2,070.

The breakdown by provinces is as follows: All the 375 delivery points in Manitoba are now on a 6-bushel quota. In Saskatchewan 67 are on a 5-bushel quota, 1,026 on a 6-bushel quota, and 28 are closed. In Alberta four are on the 5-bushel quota, 562 are on the 6-bushel quota and four are closed. In British Columbia, where there are four delivery points, all are on the 6-bushel quota.

The second part of the question asked whether all producers would have an opportunity to deliver an equal quota by the end of the crop year. I think the figures I have given indicate that this will likely be the case.

The final part of the question asks whether in the light of the present marketing and crop conditions the quota may be raised to eight bushels or more. It is obvious that present marketing conditions are very good. Our exports of wheat will exceed the 300 million bushel target which was set last summer, and because of the large volume of exports these marketings from the farms have been made possible. Whether or not the quota can be raised to eight bushels or more I do not know. I do not know, either, why the hon. member should have set it at eight bushels rather than moving just one step at a time and suggesting seven bushels.

Mr. Argue: Let us call it seven, then.

Mr. Churchill: But the C.C.F. always go just a little beyond what other people consider reasonable. I will ask the wheat board to give me a comment as to whether or not the quota may be raised beyond what is now in effect.

SPORTS

U.S.-CANADA—REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL GOLF SCORES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have an important question to ask the Prime Minister. Having regard to the fact that the President of the United States, in that spirit of frankness which characterized his visit, saw fit to declare his golf score yesterday, would the Prime Minister ask his two colleagues if they would be equally frank with the house and tell us how they scored?

Mr. Hees: Terrible.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): If the President had gone fishing there would never have been any argument about the score.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Thursday, July 10, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Rea in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide, among other things:

1. That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for drugs and medicines which have been prescribed by a medical practioner and recorded by a licensed pharmacist be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

2. That amounts paid after June 17, 1958, for eyeglasses, artificial eyes, laboratory or other diagnostic services or transportation to or from a hospital by ambulance be included in the medical expenses that are deductible in computing taxable income.

3. That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years the maximum amount deductible by corporations for contributions to charitable organizations be increased from 5 per cent of income to 10 per cent of income.

4. That the rate of interest payable to taxpayers on overpayments of tax for 1958 and subsequent taxation years be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent.

5. That the two year period within which a taxpayer may apply for a refund of an overpayment of tax for a taxation year be increased to four years from the end of the taxation year.

6. That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years a gift to the spouse of a donor of real property to be used by the donor and the spouse as their home, or a gift to a child of the donor of farm real property to be used in farming operations carried on by the child, or by the child and the donor, shall be exempt from gift tax to the extent of $10,000, provided that no such exemption shall apply more than once during the lifetime of the donor.

7. That the amount by which any gift tax paid on a gift made within three years prior to death exceeds any succession duty or estate tax subsequently imposed in respect of a death after June 17, 1958, on that gift under any Act of the Parliament of Canada will be refunded.

8. That with effect after June 17, 1958, the exemption from the tax on income of non-resident persons now granted in respect of dividends paid by a non-resident-owned investment corporation be changed so as to apply only in respect of dividends paid after the time when the corporation has paid out dividends which in the aggregate equal the undistributed earnings accumulated by the corporation in years when it was not a non-resident-owned investment corporation.

The Deputy Chairman: Last night when the committee rose we were discussing paragraph 6 of the resolution. Is the discussion on this paragraph now concluded?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, as I am very interested in the gifts given under a marriage contract, would the minister promise that he will study this matter and consult with his legal advisers with a view to adding something to these provisions so that such gifts may be protected when the bill comes before the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, all these tax questions are under consideration all the time. Certainly there is no intention to exclude consideration of the matter that my hon. friend mentions, or indeed any of the others that may be raised from time to time in the course of these discussions. That is one of the purposes that discussion in committee is intended to serve, as I understand it.

Mr. Caron: I know that if an amendment originates on this side of the house it has very little chance of being accepted.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I can assure my hon. friend that any suggestion from any part of the house that has merit will certainly be given consideration.

Mr. Caron: I am not speaking of the principle, I am speaking of the practice. If the minister would bring in an amendment himself we on this side of the house would be very happy.

(Translation):

Mr. Dorion: Mr. Chairman, may I allowed a few remarks with regard to paragraph 6 which has been commented upon by our learned friends in the opposition. According to them, it would seem that in its present form this paragraph would put the province of Quebec in a rather unfavourable position, the provisions of the civil code being what they are.

Two things are, of course, authorized by this paragraph: a tax exemption in respect of a gift made by a husband to his wife, during his own lifetime, of real property to the extent of $10,000, and a further tax exemption in respect of a gift made by a father to his son of real property to the value of $10,000.

I feel that everybody will agree that this provision is excellent in principle. As for the second part, in particular there is no doubt that it is such as to be of great benefit to our farmers, in so far as it allows the maintenance of the family farm, thus encouraging the father to make a gift to his son in his own lifetime, of the land he farms.

Where the problem becomes somewhat more involved, if my understanding of the first part of the paragraph is correct, is where a gift is made by a husband to his wife.

Every body knows—and our learned friends reminded the house of the fact yesterday—that community property is the general rule in Quebec. This common property is made up of all movable property belonging to the husband and wife before marriage, all movables acquired by them during their marriage, either by gifts or succession, fruits, revenues, interests falling due or received during marriage, and all immovables acquired during marriage.

On the other hand all immovables owned by the consorts on or before the day when the marriage was solemnized, as well as immovables acquired by them, during its continuance, by succession or equivalent process, do not go into the community. Our civil code also provides for a third type of property: property reserved to the wife.

Under the principle of community property, the husband alone has sole control and management of his property and he alone may dispose of it.

As far as any personal property of each spouse, the husband alone administers it but he cannot, without the wife's consent, dispose of any property belonging to her. Finally, there is a third category of property called property reserved to the wife; it is property acquired by the wife as a result of her own savings or use thereof, or resulting from the sale of real estate which she owned. Control and administration of that third category of property rest exclusively with the wife. One point which must not be overlooked is that this institution, community property, gives the wife a half interest in the property. Each spouse has an equal share. Consequently, on the death of the husband, or when in certain cases during marriage, separation of property is declared by the courts, the result is that the wife is entitled to half the community property and her half is not subject to income tax, nor to succession duty tax.

That is one advantage resulting from the principle of separate property. Besides, the matter was referred to yesterday,—and my excellent friend from Hull Mr. Caron recalled it very precisely,—except when ordered by the courts, separate maintenance is instituted by marriage contract which, necessarily, is entered into before marriage. I know that here, in Ontario, this type of contract is entered into after marriage, or at any time during marriage.

The marriage contract can provide for all sorts of conventions, even those which might be void in any other intervivos arrangement. In this way not only can such donations be made in respect of present property but also in respect of future belongings. Those future belongings, if they are set out in the contract, may take effect during the lifetime of the consorts. In this regard I believe that the jurisprudence established by our courts is quite clear. Moreover, Mignault, in his writings on the Quebec Civil Code, volume 6, page 139, clearly expresses that opinion which, in any event, has been abundantly supported by our jurisprudence.

Therefore, nothing stands in the way of taking advantage of this paragraph, since, by way of a marriage contract, a tax exempt gift of $10,000, of real property, for instance, can be made, even though at time of marriage that property may not be at the interested party's disposal, or though he may not have a cent to his name. This real property can be claimed at anytime during the marriage, as long as such a gift has been provided for prior to the marriage and determined by the contract itself.

Obviously, as was rightfully pointed out yesterday, no gift intervivos can be made between husband and wife. They can make no changes in the contractual matrimonial conventions. However, it must be admitted that, when our notaries draw up a contract of separate property, they generally are careful to specify in the contract: a gift in cash or real estate. Through a legal provision under the resolution now being considered, such gift could very well be some real estate worth up to $10,000, which might therefore be exempt from income tax. Of course, the proposed clause under discussion would not affect existing marriage contracts, except where they already provide for such a gift. Therein lies the difficulty. I am sorry that my learned friends in the opposition did not find—and probably for a very good reason—any realistic suggestion by which this paragraph might be adjusted to present conditions in the province of Quebec.

It will be admitted that the principle announced in this paragraph is excellent. It will also be recognized that the second part of the paragraph will be of very great help to the farmers not only of Quebec, but of other provinces as well. Otherwise, I readily admit that the first part of the paragraph will raise some difficulties for the province of Quebec with regard to the provisions of our civil law as they are now.

However, I wonder how it would be possible to amend that paragraph so that it might automatically apply to already existing marriage contracts, unless we encroach upon a field coming exclusively under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and especially of the province of Quebec. We all know to what extent the province of Quebec is jealous, and rightly so, of her institutions and notably of her civil code since, as everyone knows, the settlement of all individual conflicts that might arise, every day as it were, between citizens of the same community, come under the civil code. It is precisely by reason of this vital function that the civil code constitutes the most solid bulwark acquired and preserved by our ethnic group, a bulwark which no doubt has largely contributed to its maintenance and survival.

Under the circumstances, how could the federal parliament compel the province of Quebec to enforce this paragraph without automatically encroaching upon provincial jurisdiction? Unless we simply do away with such an eminently social and familial provision—no one in this house would be in favour of such a solution—there seems to remain but one possible solution, one which lies outside our jurisdiction and comes exclusively under the provincial legislature: i.e., to amend, if it so chooses, section 1265 of the civil code to allow any citizen of that province to take advantage of the clause now under discussion.

This obstacle should not, in my opinion, hamper the work of the federal government. After it has legislated within the limits of its own jurisdiction, it is up to the Quebec provincial government to complete its work and insure its full effect by taking action within its own field and enacting legislation which under the constitution, comes under its exclusive jurisdiction.

Before closing, I must add that for the last few years, a commission in the province of Quebec has been busy redrafting our civil code. I seem to remember, although I could not positively vouch for this, that the Right Hon. Thibodeau Rinfret, chairman of that commission, has indeed observed in the course of interviews given to the press, to the radio and to a group of people concerned, that the problem which we have tackled in connection with section 6 is already being considered: i.e. should we maintain, as a general rule in the province of Quebec, the community property system or should we not substitute for it the separate property system, which is now the exception. In any case, I am convinced that the commission will take note of the amendments made to the Income Tax Act and will definitely endeavour, in the suggestions which it will submit to the government of the province of Quebec, to ensure that all Canadians of the province of Quebec, as well as all Canadians of any other province, may take advantage of that section which, in my opinion, I repeat, seems highly familial and social in its nature.

In view of the fact that, in my opinion, all the steps that the federal government could take to impose upon the province of Quebec the obligation of taking advantage of this section, would constitute an encroachment upon the responsibilities which are exclusively provincial, and it seems to me that we should, under the present conditions, accept this section, leaving the province of Quebec the choice of taking advantage of it by amending the civil code accordingly.

Mr. Caron: I am very grateful to the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) for so clearly and accurately outlining the matter. To a person like myself, who has not too much legal knowledge, this was all very interesting but I do not feel quite clear in my mind about one particular matter. As it is, the member for Bellechasse seems to believe that if the federal government were to recognize as gifts between husbands and wives those which are made under a marriage contract, this would be an infringement on provincial jurisdiction. I would appreciate an elaboration on that point.

Mr. Dorion: I am sorry, but what I meant was this. What would be an encroachment, would be to authorize gifts during marriage, in some way or another, if such gifts had not formerly been provided for in the marriage contract. But gifts made under the terms of the marriage contract are altogether different. To my mind advantage may be taken of these gifts mentioned in the marriage contract, even though such gifts be for the future.

Mr. Caron: In that case, I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to consult with the member for Bellechasse, who could surely be able to inform him in that regard.

(Text):

Mr. Crestohl: I was certainly very pleased, Mr. Chairman, to hear the hon. member for Bellechasse present to the committee his studied expose of this situation. It is so typical of him that anything he tackles he does thoroughly and he does well. Certainly there is no difference of opinion on the basic principle which he so clearly enunciated to the committee. There is certainly no difference of opinion on the second half of the resolution, in which we all concur. However, by his presentation the hon. member has just confirmed that in so far as Quebec is concerned, the problem exists. I do not think there is any issue between the opposition and the government on the principle which they are attempting to establish. We are only concerned as to whether or not this principle covers the province of Quebec as clearly and as adequately as it covers the rest of the country.

The presentation by the hon. member for Bellechasse is quite clear. But even so he suggests, and I say this with great respect, that if the legislature of Quebec would amend article 1265 of the civil code the problem would be solved. Since we do not know what the Quebec legislature will do now, when we are debating this legislation, we might not be giving the benefits which are intended by this legislation to the province of Quebec. I was wondering whether we could not suggest an amendment in some form which would cover the situation.

I might say now to the minister that we are seeking to obtain for the husband in Quebec the very same rights which husbands enjoy in the rest of the country; that is our objective. I suggest to the minister that he might consider this form of amendment, because in my humble opinion this is how we might be able to attain our objective under present conditions. I am not moving this as an amendment, but I am merely putting it forward for the minister's consideration. When the time comes this amendment might be made to paragraph 6:

> Where the making of a gift as herein contemplated is prohibited by provincial law, but a desire to make such a gift is recorded, there shall be no tax assessable if in the last will and testament of a husband he specifically bequeathes to his wife a legacy, which in effect is similar to the gift as herein contemplated. The deceased's estate shall in that case, for estate taxes, be considered reduced by the amount of the said gift.

I tried to word this as clearly as I could. The intention is that if there is a prohibition in the civil code of Quebec against the making of such gifts, there is no prohibition against the husband making such a gift by will. The husband would have, during his lifetime, declared in writing that he desired to make such a gift but could not do so because of our code. Then if it is later found in his will that he bequeathes to his wife a legacy of $10,000 or less, providing it comes within the framework of being in connection with their home, that $10,000 should not be considered a part of his estate under the new act which we discussed the other day. It may be excluded. If it were declared now that such gift, by legacy, was intended to be a gift under this section, then the intent is clearly expressed and I believe the legal difficulties are surmounted if the federal government will go along and say they will exempt that amount for estate tax.

Later if the legislature of Quebec, as the hon. member for Bellechasse has declared, comes to the aid of husbands in Quebec, I would say tant mieux; then we would have confirmation of it.

Mr. Roberge: At page 2136 of Hansard for yesterday the minister was speaking on this clause 6 of the resolution, and he had this to say:

> This provision, which has much to commend it, is available to anybody in Canada once parliament enacts it. If it is my hon. friend's opinion that the law of Quebec prevents some spouses there from deriving benefit from this provision—

The minister was referring to a question put to him by the hon. member for Hull.

> —I think in all fairness that should not be pleaded as a reason for denying this benefit to spouses in other provinces—

We on this side of the house quite agree with that, Mr. Chairman. However, I should like to ask the minister whether, in framing the amendment to the act, any consideration was given to the laws of the provinces, and in this instance especially to the laws of Quebec in so far as gifts to spouses are concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, certainly. As a matter of fact this resolution is, in part, designed to give to the spouses in the common law provinces of Canada the benefit that the wife enjoys in Quebec by virtue of the community of property.

Mr. Roberge: I beg to disagree with the minister. I do not believe that spouses in Quebec are going to benefit at all from that provision as the law of Quebec stands now, even under community of property or with a separation as to property.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the case of marriages in Quebec where community of property exists, if I understand it, the benefit that this particular proposal would create in favour of the wife already exists in the province of Quebec. I think that point has been clearly made. My friend may not agree with it, but I think the point has been clearly established.

Mr. Roberge: I shall try to elucidate this situation in so far as community property is concerned. When a man and woman are married in Quebec—I am referring to those who are now married, not those who may be married in the future—community of property exists if there is no marriage contract signed before the marriage. Then the community property belongs to both at the same time; it is not divided. It is divided only when the death of the husband or wife occurs. Before that, it is administered by the husband alone, without his wife taking any part in the administration of the property.

The exception to this was mentioned by the hon. member for Bellechasse, where property may be reserved to the wife, but that does not enter into our considerations. In so far as community property is concerned, it is not divided before one of the spouses dies; therefore I do not see how they could benefit from this amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have tried to make this point as clear as I could. When my friend says that no benefit will directly accrue to spouses in Quebec under this resolution, what I am submitting to the committee is that in such cases joint ownership already exists under community of property in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Benidickson: But does it help in any way? There is the group where the husband and wife have an ante-nuptial contract.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the case of an ante-nuptial contract you have a different situation, because there the parties can exclude community of property by the terms of the marriage contract.

Mr. Benidickson: And do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; and in those cases, as I understand it, it will be competent for them to make gifts. After the very clear exposition of this matter by the hon. member for Bellechasse I would have thought the point had been clarified. There has been a useful discussion. It seems to me the point has been established reasonably clearly now.

I can assure hon. members, Mr. Chairman, that this matter was very carefully canvassed from all aspects. All hon. members are aware that in the province of Quebec, in cases where community of property does exist, the wife has already, by the fact of the marriage, acquired a joint ownership in the property of the husband. Consequently she already enjoys the benefit that this legislation is intended to make it possible for the parties to a marriage in other provinces to create in favour of the wife in respect of their home, and as well for the benefit of those parties to marriages in the province of Quebec who have, by ante-nuptial contracts, excluded the principle of community of property.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to clear up one point for the minister, if I can. The minister is under the impression that where there is community of property, the wife already has what is rightfully hers, half-interest in the property. But that is not quite the case. Even where there is community of property the husband and wife can have property of their own. There are certain things which husbands and wives have which do not fall into the community. One of these is property which they inherit.

For example, if a husband inherits the home in which he resides, that is the husband's property. The maintenance of the home is the community obligation, but that property is the husband's and he can do away with it by will if he wishes. The wife has no interest in that. I hope the minister sees the difference under those circumstances. If a husband has property which is exclusively his own and which does not fall into the community, or within that property which we are talking about, why should not the husband who has his own property which does not form part of the community not be able to give away part of that property and make a gift to his wife of $10,000? Under our present law he cannot give his own personal property, not the community property; he cannot give that to the wife.

There is a material and serious difference there, I submit to the minister, and that is the butt of our entire discussion of this whole thing. It is with reference to that $10,000 of the husband's own estate which he is prevented from giving to his wife under our law. The law as contemplated here intends that to be the case but it cannot be the case in the province of Quebec. A husband cannot even give his own personal property to his wife if he wants to do so, if they live under the regime of community as to property. It is that difficulty which we are trying to remedy in order to give that husband the privilege not of giving community property but of giving his own property which does not form part of the community.

That is the basic difference. If the minister will look at the matter I am sure he will understand it perhaps in another light. I understand certainly that the hon. member for Bellechasse gave an excellent expose and a complete review of the situation in the province of Quebec. But even so he left a doubt, and he would call upon the legislature of Quebec to make it possible to give effect to the law which we are now attempting to pass in this house. I am all in favour of that law, but I am apprehensive that it might not be possible for the matter to be dealt with in the province of Quebec as effectively as we should like to see it done.

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to add a word or two, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member for Cartier must realize this, and I should like to say this for some other people in the house who perhaps have had more experience in the common law than in the civil law. If we are dealing with article 1265 in the province of Quebec I think he must admit that it is perhaps one article that has had more jurisprudence on it, even within our own province, than most other articles. I think he is doing a little bit of crystal-ball gazing and is prejudging the situation a little bit.

After the clarification by the hon. member for Bellechasse I feel that we should get on with this thing. Even in the province of Quebec I say we have a great deal of jurisprudence on this very point. I can quite easily visualize, especially on the federal level, this debate going on for weeks and weeks. I repeat I think he is prejudging the situation. After the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse I can quite easily see this matter being straightened out in the near future. In view of that possibility I hope hon. members might consider these remarks.

Mr. Carter: I am in the position of a juryman in this case, because I know nothing about the Quebec law except what I have listened to here this morning.

Mr. Benidickson: Jurymen do not decide on the law.

Mr. Carter: In listening to the arguments that have been put forward on both sides of the house, and especially those by the minister himself, it seems to me that everybody is overlooking the real principle in this clause. The real principle is not security of the family—something which the minister stressed—which he is giving to provinces other than Quebec but which is already enjoyed in Quebec; and it is not the fact that some people in Quebec cannot make gifts unless they separate their property before marriage. The real principle is surely tax relief. This measure is designed to give a certain amount of relief to taxpayers. That is all it is for. We are giving an exemption for tax purposes in a case of this kind. Surely we must keep to the main principle and treat all taxpayers alike. If we are not treating certain taxpayers in Quebec in the same way as we are treating taxpayers in other parts of Canada, then we should take some other measure to try to bring about that result.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I have followed with much interest the statement made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion). I agree with him that the easiest way to reach the desired objective would be to amend the civil code. I also recognize that it is not within the powers of this government to amend the civil code or to ask the government of the province of Quebec to do so. However, I wonder if there is no other way open to us. I would not like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) or the government to take my remarks, or those of my colleagues, as criticisms. We are just endeavouring together to find a compromise so that spouses living in the province of Quebec can also benefit from that $10,000 exemption.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, if I recall rightly what I learned in my courses at the university, there is such a thing as the ancillary power of the federal government with regard to matters that come within the jurisdiction of the provinces. I refer especially to the Bankruptcy Act. I think it was decided by the privy council that the Bankruptcy Act was intra vires of the federal government inasmuch as it was ancillary to its power.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, no.

Mr. Roberge: I might be wrong.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Bankruptcy is one of the heads of jurisdiction especially enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act.

Mr. Roberge: That is true. But at the same time I submit that the Bankruptcy Act was infringing a little bit on provincial rights because it was dealing with property and civil rights. It was decided by the privy council, if I remember rightly—

The Chairman: Order.

(Translation):

I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the debate is drifting away, to a certain extent, from the main subject. This morning, hon. members went into the matter of federal provincial relations; the debate has dealt in part with community property in the province of Quebec and various points were raised which perhaps in their time and place are important. However, it remains that at this time we are dealing with section 6 of the resolution which has to do with a tax exemption granted on gifts of real property between spouses, and between father and son especially as regards farm property. Hon. members should now try to confine their remarks as much as possible to section 6 of the resolution without starting a debate on irrelevant questions. I therefore ask hon. members to stick to the subject under consideration.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may I should like to say a word on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. Surely my friend the hon. member for Megantic was merely trying to give an analogy between something that happened in another field of law and something that we are seeking to do here in this particular clause. Surely it would be restricting debate to an inordinate degree to deny to an hon. member the right to give an analogy between one set of circumstances and another. Even if the minister did not agree with the analogy I think we should be allowed to hear it.

The Chairman: I wish to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the fact that I did not call the hon. member for Megantic to order. I simply asked the hon. member for Megantic as well as other hon. members to please stay as closely as possible to the item being discussed without straying into federal-provincial fields.

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept cheerfully the chairman's suggestion.

Mr. Harkness: You need a translator.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I quite appreciate the fact that I was rather far from the point in question, but as my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, I was just giving an example. I did so in order to come to the suggestion I wish to make. In speaking of these ancillary powers, which I well recognize, I wonder if the minister would consider adding something to the bill which would differ slightly from the present resolution to provide, notwithstanding the provisions of any other act in so far as a gift is concerned, a clarification of the situation. Surely this suggestion is worthy of consideration by the minister. I do not know whether it is completely applicable or not, but I do believe the ancillary powers of the present government could be of use in the case in question.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) surely does not need my help, since he gave us a clear picture of the situation. We believe, however, that the province of Quebec is being discriminated against because of our laws. And in order to prove to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that there seems to be discrimination, one has to explain our law regarding community of property and separation of property, in the province of Quebec. Unless section 6 is amended, we shall have to rely solely on the amendments brought in by the government of the province of Quebec to its own legislation, as the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion) said. However, I have reason to fear that no such amendments will be made. On previous similar occasions, this house has enacted laws that were beneficial to all the provinces of the country, save Quebec. It was so, for instance, in the case of the trans-Canada highway, and likewise so as regards grants to universities.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Denis: I only want to show to the hon. members that, on several occasions, when a federal bill was introduced in order to assist the other provinces, we were willing to support it because we felt it was reasonable, while regretting that it did no good to the province of Quebec, although the citizens of that province are taxpayers, just as much as others elsewhere. That is why, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the hon. Minister of Finance should reconsider this resolution so that, when the bill is introduced, he might find some way to give the province of Quebec a chance to profit from the provisions of this amendment on the same basis as other provinces in the country.

There is, in my view, a further discrimination. As a matter of fact, in the second part of paragraph 6, the children of farmers are entitled to this gift, whereas, according to the first part, the children of the workers of Montreal, Quebec, Toronto or any other city area, are not entitled to the same benefit. So, in urban areas, children cannot receive the paternal house as a gift on the same basis as the farm children, because the first part of paragraph 6 applies only to the wife or husband, whereas according to the second part, the children are included. There are in urban centres small properties which have been by tradition familial properties, homes in which the whole family has lived and to which cherished memories are attached. Family spirit can exist in cities as well as anywhere else, and children of carpenters, bricklayers or any other tradesmen might wish to keep the paternal house and take advantage of this legislation. I ask the minister, when he introduces this bill, to look for some way to correct something which, I feel, is a discrimination against city children. I ask the hon. minister to be kind enough to take that suggestion into favourable consideration so that city children might benefit from that legislation to the same extent as do rural children.

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to make two brief observations on the remarks just delivered by the hon. member for St. Denis.

In the first place, this resolution and the bill to follow will do all the federal jurisdiction can do to extend this benefit to everybody in Canada, regardless of the province in which he or she lives. The federal government can do no more than legislate for the benefit of all, and that is what this legislation will do. I do not think, notwithstanding all the repetitive arguments to which we have been listening, that it can be contended, as my hon. friend assumes, that there is going to be any portion of this benefit denied to those who live in the province of Quebec, and I simply refer him to the exposition on this subject delivered this morning by a brilliant advocate of the province of Quebec in the person of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

On the second point, my hon. friend complains that in the case of gifts from parent to son the benefit of exemption should not be confined to those cases where the gift is that of a farm. This resolution has been deliberately drawn in this form because of the desire to keep the sons of farmers on the farms, and because so many of these questions arise with respect to property located in rural areas. This is a situation which occurs over and over again in all parts of the country and has given rise to this particular amendment.

I do ask the committee to recall that we had a very extended discussion on this subject, and I think it is clearly understood that we are trying to bring forward two new types of alleviation of the tax burden. Most of the hon. members who have been speaking in this house this morning and who spoke last night have been here for a long time, but at no time have they brought forward such suggestions as those for which they are so strongly arguing this morning. The need has existed all this time, if there is any such need at all, but I do ask hon. members to weigh well the fact that in this paragraph are attempts to bring relief, and I think very useful relief, to all parts of Canada.

First, this alleviation is with respect to a gift by one spouse to the other of an interest in the home; we are here proposing that up to the amount of $10,000 that gift should be free of tax. This means, with the present exemption on gifts between spouses of $4,000 per year, we have now created a means by which the wife can be secure in the ownership of the home of the couple in all parts of Canada. Second, in the case of a young man on a farm, the father can now convey to the son, up to the amount for which provision has been made, an interest in that farm which will have the effect of keeping such a young man on the farm and will, we think, contribute not only to the easing of the tax burden but will serve the socially desirable need to maintain agricultural production and retain the ownership of these farms in those families where it is clearly to the national advantage to do so.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. The committee of ways and means was discussing the resolution respecting the Income Tax Act, clause 6.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was not proposing to enter into a discussion of the situation in the province of Quebec as I would not be competent to do so, but I am concerned about the expectations raised by this section with respect to the correction of the type of thing so aptly described last night by the Minister of National Revenue. I think he very well described the situation in the common law provinces when he described how a husband dies and, in the case where there has been a joint tenancy, it is suddenly found that there is a gift tax because the property is owned by the husband and the wife had not paid any money into it. Time and again complications have arisen because of the gift tax, and it seems to me that it was to avoid cases such as this that the section which refers to the home of the husband and wife was designed.

I think the practice of having joint tenancies with respect to the resident's property has been growing in volume in recent years, and I want to know whether or not it is intended, as referred to in this section, that the bill should provide that only joint tenancies created since 1958 will avoid gift tax.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh no, it is not confined to the creation of a joint tenancy—

Mr. Benidickson: Well, a gift—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in the home of the couple. But one can see that with a gift of $10,000 permitted under this clause, if the property were of the value that most city homes cost nowadays it would not be adequate to pay the value of the home in full.

Mr. Benidickson: I was really referring to retroactivity with respect to, say, $10,000 of a gift with respect to real estate. I was agreeing with the Minister of National Revenue when I was saying that so many of these difficult cases arise from a joint tenancy that has been in existence for many years, and only discovered by the tax administrators as a result of the death of one of the tenants, and the minister was indicating that this resolution was designed to avoid that kind of trouble. The point I want to make is that if it is not going to have reference to tenancies of this kind created prior to 1958 we are not accomplishing very much.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It will still be possible, undoubtedly, for a husband and wife in such a situation to take advantage of this legislation so long as the gift of the interest in the property which is the home of the couple, after the date on which this legislation comes into effect, does not exceed $10,000 in value. It will be possible for the husband, if he so wishes, to give an increasing value to the widow's interest in the property by a gift of $4,000 a year. That is what he can do at the present time. I am sure the hon. gentleman is not going to suggest that where you introduce alleviating provisions of this kind you should make them retroactive; you must start at one point. We might regret that this kind of legislation was not put into effect sooner, but here we are bringing it on. Now let us put it into effect.

Mr. Benidickson: If some retroactivity of the type suggested last night by the Minister of National Revenue does not apply, it seems to me that the administration is simply obliging people to go through a lot of legal rigmarole, if a joint tenancy has been created, as a result of some of the publicity that will attach to these discussions and the presentation of the bill, if people do seek legal advice, in that they will be warned by their solicitors that if no contribution was made by one of the spouses to the joint tenancy that was created in the past they had better re-transfer the property into the name of the person who contributed solely to the investment in the real estate and then subsequently provide for another transfer back into the joint tenancy. Would that be satisfactory to the department? Would that come within the provision as intended here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One must be very careful about this matter of going back. I think that what the legislation will provide for is quite clear, and I trust it will be worth while for those who propose to take advantage of this measure to take the steps that are required to bring their gift clearly within the scope of the alleviating provisions.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to say a word about the minister's statement before we adjourned. I have a feeling that the minister thought that perhaps we were labouring this question unduly. I want to assure him that from our standpoint we were not. We agree with the legislation. I have said that before. We are not opposing it in any way, but we are concerned as to the certainty of this legislation in obtaining the objective which it seeks, and I wonder whether the minister would not again consider my suggestion that he should obtain an opinion from the Minister of Justice or from the Department of Justice if he has not already done so. I have a feeling that he thinks the legislation is infallible.

I suggest again that I would be quite content to accept the minister's statement that this has been carefully reviewed by the Department of Justice and whatever legal advisors he has had. I have a great respect for the legal ability of the hon. member for Bellechasse and I would be prepared to accept his opinion except for the fact that I feel his opinion was not unqualified. I should like to hear an unqualified statement because I do not think that the legal interpretation which I and my colleagues are placing upon this is correct or infallible. Because the legislation is so important I feel that the committee should have, under these circumstances, the benefit of an unqualified legal opinion from the best authority that is available in the country.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance for the purpose of clarifying paragraph No. 6 and in order to remove any doubt as to the interpretation placed upon it by the government. I refer to the first part of paragraph No. 6 which reads as follows:

> That for 1958 and subsequent taxation years a gift to the spouse of a donor of real property to be used by the donor and the spouse as their home—

I should like to know if that would apply in cities, villages and rural areas? I am asking that question because the second part of the paragraph relates only to farm property.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the first part of the clause relates to real property wheresoever located. The second part, in the case of a gift from father to son, relates to farm property.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, may I say to fellow hon. members of this house from the province of Quebec, through you, sir, that those of us who are new members and perhaps particularly those who are new members from the west have been extremely interested in the discussion that occurred this morning and last evening. Since coming to this house on May 12 we have heard frequent reference to one word in particular on the part of hon. gentlemen from Quebec. It is one of the very few French words that I have had time to learn. I refer to the word "unity". Certainly if we are to attain unity in this country we need to know more and more about the problems of the various sections of the nation. Speaking for myself I have gained a new conception of at least one problem in the province of Quebec and it is for that reason that I ask the indulgence of the house for a few moments while I endeavour to explain, as best I may, the relationship of this particular paragraph to the people of the prairies.

Let me say at once that we believe this represents an admirable amendment to the Income Tax Act, one that has long been needed. I say that for this reason. Our part of Canada, unlike the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, has been more recently settled. The people who live there are to a large degree the original pioneer settlers. Many are reaching the age where death is taking its toll and disability is rendering many of them unable to work any longer.

I am not a member of the bar but I have had a rather extensive experience with farm people both as a technical agriculturist and as a businessman. We have, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has indicated, adopted the practice of joint tenancies in that part of the country and we have found that the principle of joint tenancy is becoming more and more popular. I would not say that at this moment it was widespread throughout the part of the country from which I come, but certainly it is being viewed with a great deal more favour than it was a few years ago.

With respect to a joint tenancy in Alberta, should the husband die within a few years of the establishment of the joint tenancy the widow is required by the income tax branch to establish the validity of her claim under the joint tenancy. In many cases, of course, this is impossible. Frequently she is unable to produce any evidence that she has an actual financial right in the property and as a result taxation is applied and the widow is at some disadvantage.

It seems to us as laymen, that women in our part of the country—this question is frequently discussed there—I feel I can say this since the election of March 31 is now over and I cannot be accused of a motive—and particularly the pioneer women have never been fully recognized at law. This is a strange situation because the wife and daughter have played an equal part to that played by the husband and son in the development of that part of the country. Certainly these women have done their full part in developing western Canada. We appreciate this amendment for the very valid reason that to some degree at least it gives to the women of our part of the country, regardless of what may be the situation elsewhere, recognition at law and a right to which they have been long entitled.

Let me add that what is true of the wife and the widow is also true of the working son and the fatherless son. Did I wish to take the time I could cite a number of instances where a young man has worked with his father from boyhood into early manhood and yet at the time of his father's death he has had no equity in the farm which he has helped to build up. From the point of view of those of us who have to some degree studied this problem on the prairies and from that point of view of those of us who have had contact with actual cases, we believe the amendment is to be commended and we wholeheartedly endorse it.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, may I say first of all that I greatly appreciate the introductory remarks of the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I believe they were in themselves a valuable contribution to our national unity. We were pleased to hear the hon. member explain the interest he has in the problem we are trying to raise with respect to the province of Quebec and that he is anxious to acquaint himself with our problems. Hon. members from the province of Quebec feel that the question we are seeking to raise at this time is one of considerable importance to us. I think it would be regrettable if an important aspect of this piece of legislation were to go through, leaving behind it some misunderstandings as to its exact meaning. I agree, and hon. members on this side of the house have agreed from the beginning, that this is highly useful legislation applicable throughout the country in most of its aspects but with respect to one particular aspect there is some doubt as to its application in the province of Quebec.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Bellechasse in his very learned, fair and complete expose of the civil code relative to this matter. The minister has asked us to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse and I think he will recall that the hon. member for Bellechasse said there was only one part of this section which was not necessarily applicable to the province of Quebec. He made the point that we, as the federal government, could not legislate in order to force the provincial government to modify its civil code with which I fully agree, but I believe it would be possible for the federal government to slightly amend the wording of this clause in order to eliminate what I believe is a discrimination affecting some of the people in that province under this important legislation.

I am not going into the problem of the community of property; I think the hon. member for Bellechasse has explained that quite well. I believe that the part that deals with those people who are married, and there is separation of property, is the nub of this whole problem. I would like to clear up the matter in my own mind by asking the minister whether or not it would be applicable to those people. For instance, take the case of a couple who enter into a contract prior to marriage in which the spouse makes a gift of, let us say, $10,000 in real property to his wife to be payable during the course of marriage. Would this gift be exempted or not; would he be able to benefit from this section of the act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I answered that question last night, Mr. Chairman. I was asked if a donation in cash would qualify and I answered no; it must be a donation of an interest in real property which is to constitute the joint home of the spouse and the donor.

Mr. Cardin: Am I to understand that a contract that was entered into by two people before marriage in which there was a gift of real property would be exempt from taxes even though—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; my hon. friend is asking me about the position of a gift of money, or successive gifts of money. These are recognized at the present time as gifts. The act exempts gifts up to $4,000 per annum. This new exemption is in addition to that. This applies to a gift of real property, or an interest in real property, which constitutes the home of the spouse and donor, and it applies in the case of a gift to the spouse by the donor; if the gift takes effect on the marriage, then it will qualify. If it is something that preceded the marriage and the parties were not at that time in the relationship of spouses, then it could not be expected to qualify.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. Cardin: That is exactly the point. We have this problem in the province of Quebec. In order to be able to make a gift it has to be done before marriage.

Mr. Benidickson: A contract has to be entered into before marriage.

Mr. Cardin: The contract has to be entered into before marriage. It seems to me relatively simple for the government to include those particular circumstances by way of amendment in order that these people who are in separation as to property might be able to qualify, would it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the gift takes effect at the time the parties become spouses, then obviously it will qualify under this clause. As I understand it, the contract is entered into on what is a provisional or a conditional basis, the condition being that it shall not come into effect unless and until the parties wed. If the gift of real property or an interest in real property takes effect on the marriage, then—

Mr. Benidickson: Or after.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —I think it clearly qualifies.

Mr. Cardin: Then, the answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, if the gift takes effect on the marriage then at that moment the parties are in the relationship of spouses and I think the gift comes within the terms of the clause.

Mr. Roberge: On the same subject, I understand that people from Quebec who are married or thereafter get married and include in their marriage contract, where there is separation as to property, a gift of real property to a spouse, will benefit from this clause. What about those people who are now married and who did include, let us say, 10 years ago, a donation of $10,000 of real property, the donation to take effect tomorrow, would they benefit tomorrow?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, for all persons in all provinces in all parts of Canada this provision will extend the exemption in the case of such gifts occurring on or after January 1, 1958.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to direct the minister's attention to another problem. The minister in referring to the second part of this section speaks about a gift from father to son. The section makes no reference at all to a father or even a mother; it speaks of a spouse and a donor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It speaks of a child of the donor.

Mr. Crestohl: That is right; the donor can be the mother or the father. That is the point I am trying to make. The hon. member for Medicine Hat spoke quite properly about the rights to which women in his part of the country are perhaps entitled. Among other things is the right to make such a gift by a donor within the meaning of section 6. I draw to the minister's attention the fact that women in Quebec, common as to property, cannot be donors of immovable property. Therefore, here again the women of Quebec are unintentionally being discriminated against while women in other parts of the country can donate to their children. Women in the province of Quebec cannot, if they are common as to property, be donors because the husband has the administration not only of the community property but also of his wife's property. Perhaps the thing should be looked at again and if possible give the women of Quebec the same right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If there is any discrimination it is not created by this provision; indeed, it is not created by any federal legislation. We cannot remove any discrimination, if discrimination has been imposed, under the law of the province of Quebec. This is taxing legislation. We have made it universal in its application in all parts of Canada. It is fair, it is equitable legislation. There is no discrimination created by this legislation and there is nothing that we can do about that situation which my hon. friend mentioned.

Mr. Crestohl: There is no doubt that what the minister says is perfectly correct; the legislation is not discriminatory and has not that intention. That is perfectly true. But its end result in so far as a section of this country is concerned is that it is indirectly a discrimination. It is on that that we should like to get a legal opinion. In other words, we are prepared to give something to the citizens of the country, and yet in a certain part of the country they are not able to take advantage of it and that in itself, although the legislation is not discriminatory, is a form of discrimination.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does my hon. friend suggest that the hands of parliament must be tied and that this kind of alleviation should be denied to persons elsewhere? We are creating no discrimination. So far as parliament can do it, this is given to all.

Mr. Woolliams: Does the argument not boil down to this? Even if the minister could go along with the suggestion, would it not be ultra vires. Is that not the whole point? We have spent about three hours on it now.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say this. I believe one other hon. member spoke on it. In western Canada we certainly go along with it because in Alberta we have a Torrens land titles system in which there is joint title. Where the land is in joint names, a homestead, a farm, a home or probably an estate, the legal fees can be cut down because all you have to do is to file an affidavit in the land titles office in Alberta rather than probate the estate. As a lawyer I look at this in one way and as a Canadian I say it is a very good thing. We have spent a long time on legal argument. I am a lawyer, but I say let us get down and settle this. It appears to me as though this is something that could be remedied by one province and could not be remedied by this house anyway.

The Chairman: Shall we continue with discussion of clause 8?

Mr. Benidickson: I believe that this is one of those loophole corrections which probably does not affect a great many taxpayers. Am I right in thinking that under the present law if a company is, and always has been, what is known as an n.r.o. company, the dividends paid by it are exempt from withholding tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is correct, Mr. Chairman. This is to meet that situation, where a company that has not been a non-resident investment corporation but is turned into one; if an effort were made in that direction, it could take advantage of two exemptions that exist at the present time where there should be only one.

Mr. Benidickson: The proposed amendment does not affect the situation that I described?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the proposed amendment will permit one exemption, and properly so, but not the two. The house may be interested in the meaning of this. These non-resident investment corporations are corporations of which the shareholders reside outside of Canada. The n.r.o. company is subject to a tax of 15 per cent each year on its income from all sources, but is exempt from the 15 per cent tax normally paid on dividends by Canadian corporations to non-resident shareholders.

Now, if non-residents invested directly in shares of a Canadian company or in Canadian bonds they would pay to Canada only the 15 per cent non-resident tax on their dividends or interest. But if these non-residents formed an n.r.o. holding company to hold their investments in Canada, they still pay only the 15 per cent tax in Canada on their income from their investment. But for certainty of collection, it is paid each year by the n.r.o. instead of when actually withdrawn from the country in the form of dividends. Now, that is the present situation.

This is the loophole that could occur under existing law. Where a company in Canada was acquired by non-residents, and which was carrying on an active business and was not up to that time an n.r.o., and then became an n.r.o. it might have undistributed income accumulated while it was an ordinary company which it could now pay out as dividends to its shareholders since dividends from n.r.o.'s are free from non-resident tax. This resolution proposes that this loophole be plugged by providing that dividends from n.r.o.'s shall not be exempt from non-resident tax until all the income accumulated while the corporation was previously not an n.r.o. has been paid out.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again? Next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration, including advisory committee on agricultural services, $674,164.

Mr. Harkness: When the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were briefly before the house on Wednesday afternoon I had been giving a brief summary of some of the changes that had taken place during the past year so far as agriculture is concerned, as well as a brief outline of the agricultural situation as it appears now. I had been dealing with these matters in a general way and had dealt with some of the more important agricultural products such as wheat and cattle. I had made reference to the amount of beef exported during the past year.

I should like now to continue with those remarks and say something about the prices received for a few of our other major agricultural products. In 1957, the price of good steers at Toronto averaged $19.05 per hundred pounds live weight, 25 cents higher than in 1956. The average price of all cattle marketed was $16.10, almost the same as the $16.05 average in 1956. The strong domestic demand for cattle—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was that $16.25?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Harkness: No, the average price of all cattle was $16.10 and in 1956 it was $16.05, almost the same.

The strong domestic demand for cattle, in conjunction with the heavy United States demand that developed in the last part of 1957, resulted in a substantial increase in cattle prices between October 1957 and April 1958. Good steers at Toronto averaged $22.26 per hundred pounds in March, 1958 compared with $18.78 the year previously, an increase of upward of four cents a pound. The high level of marketings and the strong demand was reflected in the total value of commercial marketings, being $116 million in the first quarter of 1958 compared with $69 million in the corresponding period of 1957. The gain in cattle prices has been responsible to quite a considerable extent for the fact that the total cash income of farmers during the first quarter of 1958 is considerably greater than in the first quarter of 1956 or 1957.

The figures are given in the dominion bureau of statistics farm cash income publication, and they show that in the first quarter, that is January to March of 1958, farm cash income was $618 million, which is up $42 million from the $576 million of a year earlier. I think that we have been very fortunate, so far as our cattle prices are concerned during these past nine months in particular, in the fact that we had increased numbers of cattle available to market at these higher prices.

After cattle the most important meat production which we have is hogs and I should like to say just a few words about that matter. At June 1, 1957 hogs on farms numbered 4.9 million, only slightly more than the 4.7 million at June 1, 1956. In 1957, 5.4 million hogs were slaughtered and graded in federally inspected and approved plants, 9 per cent less than in 1956. The retention of hogs for breeding indicated by the drop in output in 1957, in spite of the large number on farms, is reflected in the current and anticipated increase in marketings during the present year. In other words, although there were more hogs on farms in 1957, there were fewer slaughtered than in the previous year, which indicated a considerable number was retained for breeding purposes which means that we shall have a much larger flow this year and in the early part of 1959.

Gradings in the first three months of 1958 were 1,542,000, 7 per cent higher than in 1957 In other words, this increased movement of hogs to market is already showing up in the first quarter of 1958. That increase has been mainly on the prairies. The amount of increase in hog production in the eastern part of the country has not been very great but in the prairies it has been very marked.

Per capita consumption of pork was 46.2 pounds in 1957, 6.7 per cent more than in 1956. In the first quarter of 1958 a further increase in consumption is indicated. Domestic disappearance from commercial marketings totalled 177 million pounds in that quarter, a rise of 9 per cent over 1957. In other words, although we have more hogs now coming to market, the market has been able to absorb those. The consumption has increased.

The equivalent of 322,000 hogs were exported as pork products in 1957. Exports amounted to 6 per cent of total commercial marketings in 1957 as compared with 9 per cent of the total in 1956. In other words, we were able to consume sufficiently more at home so that we had a lesser amount available for export.

In the first quarter of 1958 exports were 14.5 million pounds compared with 11.3 million pounds a year earlier. In other words, exports are going ahead. They have gone ahead again in this first quarter of 1958.

Grade A hogs at Toronto averaged $31.05 per hundred pounds dressed weight during the first quarter. That is exclusive of the federal government premium of $2 per head. In 1956 the average price was $27.50 and the ten-year average—that is from 1948 to 1957—was $29.68, which means that the price of hogs has been relatively quite high during this last year of 1957. The estimated value of hogs marketed and inspected in approved packing plants was $65.9 million in the first quarter of 1958 and $66.3 million in the same period of 1957 or approximately the same.

The production of sheep and lambs is one branch of agriculture in which we are deficient.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but he has now spoken for more than 30 minutes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Go on.

The Chairman: However, if he has the leave of the house, I will permit him to carry on.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harkness: I was just saying, Mr. Chairman, that as far as the production of sheep is concerned, Canada is quite deficient. We import the great bulk of the wool which we use and we import quite a large number of the lambs and sheep which we eat. The national flock numbered 1.7 million at June 1, 1957, only slightly more than at the same period of 1956. The 1957 total was only about half the pre-war numbers and the pre-war numbers were less than they had been in the earlier period. In other words, we have had a marked decline during the past 20 to 25 years in sheep production in Canada. The stabilized price which was put into effect for wool at 60 cents a pound was intended to act as an incentive to sheep producers, to encourage them to stay in the sheep business and to encourage them to increase their flocks because this is one branch of agriculture which we need to encourage. We are certainly not threatened with any surplus as far as it is concerned. Sheep, of course, are a type of livestock which can be used profitably on very poor land which will not profitably support cattle and other types of livestock. The import of mutton and lamb —and it was mainly lamb—amounted to 12.3 million pounds in 1957, which was 19 per cent more than in 1956 and about half the output of the Canadian product from inspected plants. It is the intention, of course, that we could and should increase our sheep production in order to meet our local needs. Practically the entire amount imported originated in New Zealand and Australia.

In the first quarter of the present year prices for lambs averaged higher than in 1957, largely owing to the influence of prices of competing meats. In March of 1958 good lambs at Toronto averaged $24.44 per 100 pounds compared with $22.37 a year ago.

Next I should like to say something about the dairying industry. Dairying is a branch of agriculture in which more farmers have some interest and from which they derive part of their revenue than is the case in any other branch of the agriculture industry. The great majority of farmers in Canada keep at least a few cows. It is therefore an industry of extreme importance to the entire agriculture picture.

Milk production in 1957 was 17.3 billion pounds, only slightly above that of 1956. Since mid-1957 production in each month has exceeded output in the corresponding period of the preceding year. This, of course, is undoubtedly due to better prices as far as most milk products are concerned.

Production during the first quarter of 1958 exceeded that of the preceding year by about 300 million pounds, an increase of 10 per cent. That is quite a marked increase in the amount of milk produced in the first quarter of 1958 as compared with the first quarter of 1957. This year the bulk of the additional milk has gone into the production of creamery butter. Production of this commodity in 1957 of 303 million pounds was about the same as in 1956. Domestic disappearance, which showed an increase in the early months, began to decline around October, 1957. This decrease has continued into the present year. However, in spite of the drop in domestic disappearance stocks were reduced and at the end of 1957 totalled 69.9 million pounds compared with 88.2 million pounds at the beginning of the year.

Prices of butter remained stable at approximately the support level during the first seven months of 1957, and then strengthened because there were some indications of the possibility of a tight supply position early in 1958. As a matter of fact, shortly after taking over as Minister of Agriculture, I found that the butter trade and the officials in the department were quite fearful that we would have a definite shortage of butter and be forced into the position of having to import butter into the country.

Mr. Gour: This was said by the previous minister.

Mr. Harkness: It therefore seemed obvious that some measure was necessary in order to encourage the putting of whole milk into butter rather than into cheese and other products and of course action was taken in order to increase butter prices and this had the object of diverting considerable amounts of milk from cheese and other types of production into butter so that we now have ample supplies of butter.

Production in the last few months of the year rose well above year-earlier levels and prices continued fairly stable at the higher level. Current receipts at Montreal—this is not in new boxes as we buy it in the agricultural stabilization board but in used fibre boxes—were quoted at 57-57¼ cents per pound at mid-July, 1957 and were 62 cents per pound in December.

Output of butter in the first three months of 1958 continued at the high level of late 1957, and production was 8.6 million pounds more than a year previously. At the same time consumption continued below the preceding year's level and was 2.8 million pounds less in the first three months of 1958 than in the same period of 1957.

Stocks of butter at May 1, 1958—that is, a little more than a month ago—at the beginning of the 1958-59 dairy year, amounted to 35.2 million pounds compared with 36.9 million pounds at that date in 1957.

From this I think it is clear that the stocks are about the same as they were a year ago, and bearing in mind the fact that consumption is down a little while production is up, we are sure of ample stocks for the balance of this dairy year, that is to say, up until next May. The prices of butter have remained steady in the last few months and have averaged 62¾ cents per pound in the last week of March, 1958 as compared with 58 cents per pound a year ago.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Cheddar cheese production in 1957 was 95.6 million pounds and so was substantially higher than in the preceding several years and exceeded production of 1956 by 12.8 per cent. The year 1957 was a big year so far as cheese production was concerned; that is, as far as recent years go, because during the first world war and prior thereto we produced a great deal more cheese than we do today. In the first quarter of 1958 output dropped to the normal level over recent years of 7.4 million pounds but manufacture in that period was considerably more than in the year previous. Exports dropped sharply in 1957, the 8.1 million pounds exported being 3.4 million pounds less than in 1956 and 5.3 million pounds less than in 1955.

This decrease in exports of cheese, of course, is due to the high price at which our cheese sells on the United Kingdom market compared with the prices paid for Australian and New Zealand cheese, which sell there at around 16 to 18 cents per pound or less than half at which our cheese sells, namely approximately 40 cents per pound. We have therefore a very limited market for our cheese. The domestic market accounted for 75.2 million pounds of cheese in 1957 compared with 72 million pounds in 1956. With the sharp upturn in production and the reduction in exports, stocks in storage were built up during the year and at the end of December, 1957 they amounted to 52 million pounds as against 39.6 million pounds in the previous year. Domestic consumption in the first three months of 1958 was approximately normal, the relatively large stocks at the end of March of 41.2 million pounds reflecting last year's heavy production and accumulation in storage.

Cheese prices were strong early in 1957 but eased as a result of the high level of production accumulated in storage. During March, 1957 prices at factory in Ontario were about 34 cents per pound and at year end were approximately 32 cents per pound. The prices in the first quarter of 1958 have fluctuated within a narrow range and were 34 to 34½ cents per pound during March. The increase in price has been due, of course, to the price having been stabilized at 34 cents in Ontario and 33½ cents at Montreal.

Dry skimmed milk, which is the final dairy product on which I wish to say a word, has been one of the most difficult products for us to handle and dispose of. Domestic disappearance rose during the year, but at a lower rate than production. Since exports accounted for only 719,000 pounds during the year there was a considerable accumulation of powder in storage and as the situation developed import controls were applied in order to prevent the great influx of dry skimmed milk from all countries of the world, which had been going on during the early part of 1957.

Output of dry skimmed milk continued at a high level in the first quarter of 1958 and at the end of March this year totalled 19.6 million pounds, roughly double the 9.5 million pounds produced in the same period of 1957. The extreme difficulty in disposing of this dry skimmed milk either in Canada or overseas made it necessary to reduce the support price which, it was quite evident, had acted as an incentive price and had resulted in a considerable increase in the number of dry skimmed milk plants and in the first three months of this year, as I have said, had doubled production compared with the previous year.

At May 1, 1958 there were about 40 million pounds of this product in storage, compared with about 5 million pounds at May 1, 1957. The recently announced stabilization price of 15 cents per pound for spray process powder and 64 cents a pound for creamery butter mean that last year's price relationships in terms of milk will be roughly maintained. In other words, the return to farmers for their marketing will be roughly the same this year as it was during the last three or four months during 1957.

I have a lot of notes in regard to other products such as apples, potatoes, fowl, eggs and so on, but I do not think I had better take the time of the house to go into these matters at this time. Undoubtedly questions will be asked on these matters and we will deal with them as they come up during the course of the estimates.

I would, however, like to say something about the research activities of the department. I think we have concentrated a great deal too much on the question of prices during recent years with respect to agricultural matters. Most of the discussions in this house for a great many years have been concerned with the prices of agricultural products and very little attention has been paid to the scientific activities carried on in order to improve the yields of many such products and to eliminate the diseases which cut down those yields. Actually, the activities of the research scientists have contributed a very great deal to farmers' incomes during the past several years and I think it is quite apparent that the introduction of Marquis wheat and latterly Selkirk wheat has improved farm incomes to a considerable extent. Many other improvements have been brought about and it will be possible to bring about many further improvements. In many cases the results of the research in the agricultural field have actually increased yield, two, three, four, five or more than five times. Such increases in yield have, of course, meant a greater return to the farmer, and are more important than a great many of the things about which we have heard so much, such as trying to improve market facilities, to secure very high prices for particular products and to keep price supports under them and many other things along that line. I think we have neglected our research scientists and the wonderful work they are doing in our discussions on the agricultural estimates.

I would like therefore to briefly indicate some of the activity carried on in this respect over the last few years and to tell the house of some of the advances made to illustrate the great contribution these men are making to agriculture. Firstly, may I mention the Lacombe bacon hog. This particular breed, developed at Lacombe, was released to the public in October, 1957 by the Canada-wide distribution of 50 Lacombe boars. Crosses between the Lacombe and Yorkshire exhibit hybrid vigour for growth and they are at least equal to the parental breeds in respect to quality. We have high hopes that this new breed will improve grading and will also enable hogs to go to market earlier. This will of course mean that the farmers will be able to make considerably more profit from them.

A team of biochemists and physiologists has joined the animal husbandman in an intensive search for the factors causing urinary calculi in range cattle. A breakthrough should provide information of great practical value in controlling the problem.

There have been some interesting experiments on pasture. At Nappan, Nova Scotia, an average gain of 548 pounds per acre of beef was secured on fertilized dikeland pasture as compared with 445 pounds on fertilized upland pasture. Corresponding gains on unfertilized pasture were 363 pounds and 233 pounds per acre, respectively. This work is of considerable importance, particularly in the maritime provinces, because we are reclaiming quite large areas down there through the activities of the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act and I think this reclaimed marshland provided the basis upon which a very thriving beef industry can be built up in the maritime provinces, placing the agriculture of those provinces upon a much sounder basis than for many years past.

Cattle warbles have proved a troublesome problem and do great damage to our leather production. Work is progressing favourably on new chemical control methods that destroy cattle grubs before they reach the animals' backs and damage their hides. This promises a distinct advance on previous measures which kill the grubs after they have completed their migration through the body. However, much work remains to be done in evaluating the total effects of this type of treatment and new materials are under constant test.

The department has an all-out program designed to protect and improve the wheat of the future from both genetic and quality standpoints. Varieties are being developed to meet all foreseen eventualities. Increased emphasis is being placed on superior quality in the new lines. Selkirk, rust resistant, and Chinook, wheat stem sawfly-resistant, are examples of contributions.

The department has released a new malting barley, Parkland, by name, which is at least equal to existing varieties in quality, and superior in agronomic characteristics. It is outyielding Montcalm by seven to ten bushels per acre and has much better lodging resistance.

Cumino sweet clover is another development. The use of this new variety, developed in our laboratories at Saskatoon, will remove the danger of sweet clover poisoning of livestock, and will eliminate melilot taint resulting from volunteer sweet clover in wheat fields. It is the first coumarin-free variety of white blossom sweet clover which has been made available to agriculture.

For the first time in the history of Canadian agriculture a hardy variety of perennial rye grass, capable of surviving winter throughout large areas in eastern Canada, as well as in British Columbia, has been made available in 1957. This variety, known as the Norlea, was developed at Ottawa as a result of 17 years of breeding work. That gives you some idea of the amount of time required in order to develop new varieties and, in other cases, to eliminate certain types of disease and things of that kind.

Rambler alfalfa was developed at Swift Current and licensed in 1955. It is a creeping-rooted, drought resistant variety suitable for dryland pasture.

Annual surveys provide advance information on impending outbreaks of insect pests and enable provincial governments and growers to take proper precautionary measures. This service has contributed greatly to reduced losses from such occurrences as the white grub outbreak of 1957 in Ontario and Quebec, the constantly shifting hazard of the spruce budworm throughout eastern Canada, and the present grasshopper menace that threatens the prairies. A selective spray program has been developed in Nova Scotia against the codling moth and other fruit tree pests. In this program chemicals are selected that also allow control by the natural enemies of the pests involved. This has resulted in a reduction in costs of spray materials from $50 per acre, in comparable areas of eastern United States where this method is not used, to $4.80 per acre, as revealed by independent economic studies. This saving is very important to the established method of production and the type of market available to growers in Nova Scotia, and is a good example of what I said at the beginning regarding the way in which the efforts of our research scientists in agriculture can and do improve the return that farmers get from their crops.

There are several other examples which, perhaps, I will not take time to deal with; various types of experiments, all of which are interesting. I think, perhaps, that I should refer to one or two more. One concerns strawberries. Four new varieties, Cavalier, Grenadier, Guardsman and Redcoat have been introduced from Ottawa. I do not know why those names were considered particularly appropriate for strawberries coming from Ottawa, but perhaps they are. These varieties should have wide adaptation in the east as well as possibilities on the west coast. Cavalier is an early variety, while Guardsman may have a special place as a late ripening variety.

Reliable methods for testing the cold resistance of fruit tree seedlings are being developed. If this program is successful it should practically eliminate the present severe losses from winter killing.

Summerland experimental farm is cooperating with industry in evaluating the 25-bushel containers for handling apples and introducing them to growers; what is known as bulk handling. These are expected to reduce capital outlay for containers and labour handling costs, something which is essential in the fruit industry if growers are to receive an adequate return.

Even Newfoundland has not been neglected in these researches. The peat bogs of Newfoundland have received considerable attention. Agricultural engineers and agronomists are studying methods of drainage and fertility requirements. There have been marked yield increases from applications of both nitrogen and phosphorus on newly drained and limed bogs.

A good deal of work has been done with regard to irrigation as well as drainage, and agrometeorologists and agronomists working together are evolving formulae regulating irrigation to a schedule which permits optimum growth of crops, protects the soil, and economizes in the use of water.

Mr. Chairman, these are only a few of the numerous scientific studies which are going on, and each of them which comes to successful fruition is, of course, extremely helpful to agriculture and, taken together, these studies do a great deal to improve the general economic position of farmers.

Just before I close I should like to pay tribute to the employees of the Department of Agriculture. I have found them extremely competent and co-operative; I have found that they are deeply interested in agriculture and in the people engaged in agriculture, and they are undoubtedly making a great contribution to this, our most important basic industry.

Mr. Gour: Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks I want to say to my good friend the Minister of Agriculture that I am in 100 per cent agreement with him with regard to what he said in the last part of his speech about the employees of the Department of Agriculture. I have dealt with them on many occasions over 30 years and found them very loyal. They have done great work for the Canadian farmers, as a whole, in this country.

Secondly, I am 100 per cent in agreement with the minister in what he is doing about raising the standards of animals and produce of every kind produced on the farms. Over 30 or 35 years I have noticed that there has been an improvement in every way of working the land so as to produce better crops and raise finer animals. This improvement is due to the fine work that has been done by federal and provincial representatives of agriculture.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks I wish to make known to hon. members the situation in my riding. There are very many new members and unfortunately for the good of the Canadian people too many of them are Tory. However, those new members I have met since the beginning of the session have been very nice people but, as I said, far too many of them sit on the wrong side of the house and do not advocate a good policy.

The riding of Russell has a population of about 96,000 of whom approximately 32,000 live in the rural districts. Many of those live in small villages and towns; perhaps 8,000 in all. Therefore only about 24,000 of my constituents are real farmers. I want to tell you that I have the best farmers that one can find in this country. Most of them are engaged in mixed farming. They raise every kind of cattle. Some raise chickens and there are many garden farmers who grow the vegetables and fruits to supply the city of Ottawa and surrounding territory. It is not uncommon in Russell to see a farmer milking more than 40 cows a day. Many raise from between 100 and 300 pigs each year. Many raise over 40,000 chickens annually. The farmers there work very hard but, as the minister pointed out, they could improve a great deal in their methods of operation. In many cases they could derive twice the revenue from their farms and their operations in cattle and chicken raising than they are now getting.

I want to draw to the attention of new members the agricultural picture in my riding. I need not do this for the older members many of whom I have known for 12 years and so we are good friends. I am interested in the farmer but not for political reasons because less than one-quarter of the electorate in my riding engages in farming. I am interested in the farmer because I have some knowledge of farming. I was one of a family of 13 born on a farm. I have had business dealings with farmers for 40 years as well as with labourers and people in every conceivable occupation in cities and towns. I have been dealing not only with farmers but with labourers and business people in Casselman for 35 years. I had over 1,000 acres of good farm land under cultivation and was responsible—although not personally—for the milking of between 75 to 80 cows.

While I am referring to Casselman I wish to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that we had a nice plant there dealing with flax and linen. It had up to 4,000 acres under flax. This brought good money to the labourers and farmers in the district and gave them an opportunity to buy additional grain from the west. At that time I was more interested in grain from the west. Many years we had over 100 carloads of grain from the west including wheat, oats, barley and mixed feeds. That fine plant is going down because Britain offered us starvation prices. I do not know if the minister could help us. Britain got flax from Latvia which offered it at dumping prices. We will not be able to carry on and we will have to close the plant. If that happens, a manufacturer from Canada or from any other democratic country in the world will be welcome to step in and start any kind of manufacturing plant there. We will rent or sell it at a sacrifice, perhaps 25 per cent of what it would normally cost. The plant would cost about $300,000 if one were to build it today.

Because I deal with at least 600 farmers a year and approximately 600 customers engaged in other occupations including labourers and business people within a radius of 60 miles of my home, I feel that I am qualified to speak about the needs of the farmer and what we should do for him. Not only should we assist in educating them but we should also improve the prices they receive for their goods. Many of the needed improvements cost much money and the farmer requires sufficient money to carry on his operations.

I will complete my remarks in English in order to provide an opportunity for English-speaking hon. members to listen to me and try to understand. It will be easier for them than if I were to speak in French. I am interested in seeing the simultaneous translation system installed in the house because then it will be easier for me to speak in French. I want the English-speaking hon. members to know that I had to work 13 hours a day at the rate of 50 cents a day in order to go to school to learn the English language. I therefore feel I have done my duty and I must express the wish that more English-speaking people would make an effort to learn our language. We should not really have a translation system in the house. It is not natural. It is far more natural and interesting to listen to a person speak in his own language.

The Minister of Agriculture referred a moment ago to the fact that we import mutton and that the raising of sheep should be encouraged. Something should be done to raise the price of meat and wool. In my part of the country dogs are a serious menace to sheep. The destruction of flocks in my riding has been due mostly to dogs but in other districts sheep are menaced by bears and other animals. In some districts the farmers are compensated for sheep destroyed in this way but the price is very low.

I have explained my position. I am not a farmer but I still have 200 acres of farm land. I am a businessman. In my business I carry every important piece of goods from puzzles to bulldozers. Therefore, if any of my good friends need something for themselves or for their good wives they will be welcome at my home and they will be just as well served if they are Conservatives as if they were Grits.

If the minister wants to do something to help the farmers of this country I will give him a five-point program. First, the farm loan board should be permitted to lend money on a farm at 90 per cent of the appraised valuation, up to $10,000, and any amount over this at something around 70 per cent of the appraiser's evaluation. As it is now, the appraisers value the farms at only about 80 per cent of their value and allow very little on the buildings. Usually in the east and in the maritimes where we find mostly mixed farming, the buildings on the farms are much more expensive than the land. The interest should be reduced to 4 per cent on a 30-year payment and should be paid by the farmers in any amount at any time without notice. That is the practice

I carry out in my own business. They are always welcome to come after 12 o'clock noon and if it is not after seven o'clock in the morning we call it the day before. Therefore, I make the suggestion that the farmer be given the chance to pay without notice at any time before the due day. This encourages them to pay and it would be an advantage for them to do so.

My second suggestion would be to ask the Minister of Agriculture to use his influence on the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce so that they may be more careful in the words they use when they talk about diversion of trade from our friends and neighbours, the United States of America. Diversification does not bring anything to anybody. If they get dissatisfied on this question of diversion they may stop buying our cattle, our pork, our sheep, and so forth. At the present time the United States are buying our cattle and other animals, and that is the reason for our high prices. If tomorrow the United States were to stop buying our cattle the price of cattle would drop by 50 per cent. I defy anybody to say anything else because I have had the experience of dealing with farmers for 35 years. There has been too much talk about diverting trade from our good neighbours. I would prefer that we did not talk so much about it because our friends may get dissatisfied. Good business people do not talk along that line.

My third suggestion, Mr. Chairman, is that there should be an increase in freight subsidies of $3 a ton on all feed and grain from the west which are shipped to the maritime provinces and to Ontario and Quebec so that the farmers may be encouraged to feed more of the grain. Unfortunately, the people of my riding are selling their cattle unfinished. Some of those cattle are only a year or two years old. The farmers do not make a profit when they sell their cattle that young. We should buy western grain and feed it to our cattle and sell those cattle to our friends to the south and to our people at home. In that way our people would use more western grain and would thereby help the farmers of the west and at the same time make more money for themselves. This would encourage our farmers to give better grazing to their cattle and raise more of them. This applies also to the raising of chickens and pigs. Too many farmers are selling their cattle too young and in an unfinished state to the United States and by doing this they lose their profits.

My fourth suggestion is that we should have a farm credit bank system which should be extended to the fishermen and potato growers as well as to the small business operators. With the farm loan legislation and the farm development legislation we are in need of a farm credit banking system under which the government will guarantee short term loans of the bank at around 90 per cent and permit the farmers to obtain loans when they are in urgent need, at a low rate of interest. Such legislation should permit the government to send government experts to supervise the farms and advise the farmers. This is one of the great needs of the farmer. They should be in a position to receive help from people who can advise them. That advice could be given in conjunction with advice from the agricultural representatives of the Ontario government.

My fifth suggestion is that the so-called stabilization farm price should be raised on cheese, beef, pork, eggs, poultry, butter and skim milk at least 10 per cent higher than it is now, because the stabilization price is no good to the farmers at the moment because it is less than the price at which they have been selling their farm products for the past two years. In the meantime the cost of operating the farms has gone up from 15 per cent to 25 per cent and this applies also to the things which the farmer has to buy. A cheese factory in my riding is not selling cheese at all at the moment. They have not sold any cheese for two months; they are stuck with it. The price of machinery and the price of everything else has gone up. I keep everything in my store and I am in a position to know what I am talking about. I have a report from my manager which indicates that the cost of shoes, pants, and everything else has gone up. I will not name all of the commodities. The cost of labour has also gone up. Nobody wants to work on a farm any more. They work in the city. It is easy work in most cases and they work only 40 hours a week. The farmers, unfortunately, have to work on Sunday and holidays, on confederation day, Canada day, not Dominion day. The farmer has to work on those days as well, and there is no holiday for him. The prices of everything the farmer has to buy have risen.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I submit this idea to the minister in the hope that he and the government will give it every consideration. They will do so if they wish to do something to help the farmers remain on the farms and keep their sons with them. We have to be careful to encourage them to produce on a high scale. It is estimated that the population of Canada will greatly increase in the next few years. We hope to be in a position to supply food for our own people as well as the people in other parts of the world, and in that way keep communism away from us. In this way we shall be able to prove to other nations, as we have in the past, that we in Canada are doing our duty in every way. We will show that we want to be friendly with every country which wants to give liberty and freedom to its subjects.

I know that my friend, the Minister of Agriculture, will take these remarks as a friend's opinion. I am not playing politics in connection with this question. I am only hoping that the farmer will receive more. I know when I say that that my city electors will say, "Gour is for the farmer." I do say that the more prosperous the farmers of this country are, the more prosperous the country will be. Then, too, if the farmer is prosperous he will not go into the city and take jobs which the people in the city need. Therefore everything within reason should be done for the farmer because that will be of advantage to every citizen in this country; that is my opinion, and I think I am right. It is because I think I am right that I am saying these things to the minister. I ask the minister to try to convince the rest of the cabinet of these facts, as I am sure he is convinced of them. The time for politics is over. It may be too bad, but you are elected for the next four years, so there is time to do something.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): Since I come from a province whose economy is, to a very large extent, dependent on agriculture, I should like to refer in this opening discussion to several phases of that economy which are vital to us at this time. One of our biggest problems is that of obtaining adequate farm credit facilities, and in that respect I include funds necessary for rehabilitation. In speaking on agriculture at the last session I outlined the alarming decrease in the number of farms being operated in our province. As we all know, this results in a serious decline in the general economy of any province, a great loss in production, and eventually a great expense in returning those farms to a state of production which we feel will be necessary at a later period. One of the chief reasons for such an exodus from the farms is the lack of proper credit facilities.

The provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act have long been outdated and fail to serve the needs of many of our farm population. I would suggest that it is extremely urgent that steps be taken to either bring this board up to date or replace it with a body which will meet the needs for farm credit under present day conditions. If we are to return these abandoned farms to production, it is necessary in most cases that we inaugurate a scheme which will allow young farmers, or immigrants, to take over these farms under certain conditions and return them to a productive paying basis. For some years now, many of us have followed closely the successful operation of the Veterans Land Act, as administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs. We feel strongly that if arrangements were made to set up good prospective farmers, under conditions such as those provided under the Veterans Land Act, well supervised and controlled, then we would have a rehabilitation scheme which would be eminently successful. I hope steps will be taken soon along these lines which will achieve, in a large measure, the desire that many of us have for the repopulation of these abandoned farms.

Closely allied to such a program should be the experience and information derived from investigations into land use. I know there has been a committee of the other place studying this problem, and I hope that there will soon be tangible results from their investigations. Here again, I would urge the government to pursue their policy of investigation into this matter, as it would be extremely helpful to any rehabilitation scheme.

One of the major crops in our province is potatoes. Having been very familiar with this phase of our agricultural industry as a dealer and a small grower since world war II, I feel I should make some comment concerning present conditions in that industry within our province. First of all, I must say from practical experience that the humble potato is probably one of the most difficult products in the world to market. The potato market is a most sensitive one for a large variety of reasons which would take a long time to explain. Most of our farmers agree that potatoes are a highly speculative product in which to deal, and appreciate that if a permanent support price is placed under the product that policy could be fraught with many dangers. Of course, our farmers would expect to be subjected to many controls. In general, they do not wish to be placed in this position. However, they do expect that when an emergency arises it will be treated with due consideration.

During the past year we have had an abnormally large crop, not so much as a result of any increase in acreage as the result of ideal growing conditions throughout the whole season. The average price has been fairly good, and in midwinter was reasonably high. Unfortunately, because of our insular position and the fact that we are serviced by only one railway, as well as the fact that reefer cars have only one-way freight, we are seldom, if ever, in a surplus position with regard to this type of rolling stock. During the past winter, when prices were high, our farmers shipped to the capacity of reefer cars available. When the price started to drop they still kept shipping at a high rate. Unfortunately, as a result of the mildness of the winter, there was an abnormally early closing of the side roads and paved highways to heavy traffic. Many of our farmers were unable to ship until a much later date because of the load restrictions on highways, the early calling in of snowplows, and the unusually muddy conditions of the roads for a long period. This left many of our farmers, who normally do not ship until midwinter or later, in the awkward position of not being able to dispose of their potatoes.

I have mentioned earlier the extreme sensitivity of the potato market which is due to many factors pertaining to the marketing of potatoes throughout the whole of the North American continent. In some years we have new and entirely different factors entering the picture. This year one which seemed to have a great deal of influence was the manipulation of the New York mercantile exchange. At any rate, prices had a continual downward trend from mid-winter, with a dull and sluggish market which would not absorb the potatoes being offered.

As a result a number of our farmers were caught with fairly large holdings on their farms. The potato marketing board in our province then asked for some assistance to market the balance of the crop. After several submissions a figure of 45 cents per 75 pounds bulk on the farm was offered. Keeping in mind that this was a distress measure, as a number of farmers had been fortunate enough to market all or most of their crop at reasonably good prices, the price offered by the stabilization board was fairly adequate. Yet, in view of the fact that some farmers were in the unfortunate position of being located where they could not have shipped, it was felt by many, including my colleagues from Prince Edward Island and myself, that the price should have been somewhat higher.

In fairness it might be noted, however, that it does compare more favourably than that offered at the beginning of the marketing season of 1955, when the prices offered were first 15 cents, 20 cents and 25 cents per bushel and later 20 cents, 25 cents and 30 cents per bushel over a marketing period of three phases. It must be remembered that this price was for the whole of the crop in that year, whereas we were asking for a distress price to look after the tail end of our potato crop. In view of the small amount of money spent in assisting the potato grower as compared to the amount used in supporting other phases of the industry, we did not feel averse to requesting support—and fairly generous support—in an instance such as this. The price support to be granted has been settled for this season, and I do hope that, if the occasion again arises when support is needed, we shall be dealt with in a generous manner by the government and its official advisers.

Our agricultural picture is very closely interwoven with our transport problems. Although we have a great advantage with regard to isolation from diseases among our farm crops and cattle, we are at a distinct disadvantage where importation of feeds is concerned and, of course, in the carrying of our goods to market.

As I have on the order paper a resolution on the Northumberland causeway which I hope will come up for discussion, I will not deal with that phase of our transportation problem at the present time. However, for reasons I have just mentioned, I should like to deal briefly with present services; particularly that provided by the existing railroads and ferries.

As in many other parts of Canada, our rail service has been curtailed, with the approval of the board of transport commissioners, and I feel that it has been cut down too much, to a point where it is to the disadvantage financially of both the railways and our people, particularly our farm people. This is especially so in the constituency of Kings which I have the honour to represent. During the winter I made a trip on each of the three main lines in our county, familiarizing myself with the service from the viewpoint of the train crews, station agents and the travelling public. It is strongly urged that the present daily winter service be set up one month earlier in the fall and run one month later in the spring. In that way it would be providing many places with a service which would allow shippers of produce and other bulk products to compete on the same footing with those in other sections of the province, and it would not cost the railways any more than does the present irregular shortened service of the summer months.

Our passenger and vehicle service at both ferries has continued to grow regularly each season, and the present service at both Borden and Wood island is inadequate. A new boat has been provided for Wood island which will assist in that service greatly and by this fall, on the completion of the causeway survey, we should perhaps be in a better position to decide whether or not a new one will be necessary also at Borden. When the causeway is built there will still be great pressure for greater outlets in the eastern part of the province. I would suggest that strong consideration be given then to the transfer of some of the facilities now at Borden to the port of Georgetown. This port is the finest one in the province with almost year round ice free conditions. A connecting link from here to Pictou in Nova Scotia would be a practical proposition and would provide an all year round and very much needed service to the eastern sections of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. It would provide this section of our province with better and more accessible markets for farm products, as well as a better service for our tourists and the travelling public generally.

It would be greatly appreciated, Mr. Chairman, if the government would give every consideration to these major farm problems which I have dealt with briefly. They are chiefly the rehabilitation of our abandoned farms, with due consideration of the Veterans Land Act as a model a wider expansion of farm credit facilities; progress in land use study; due consideration to adequate prices for support when warranted; and any assistance which could be provided in drawing attention to the importance to our transportation problems.

Mr. Peters: I have been very much surprised this afternoon to note the usage the minister makes of certain words. He refers always to a moderate decrease and yet when he speaks of the same sum of money, if it is an increase, it is a substantial increase. I think that probably explains fairly well what the policy of the government in the past year has been with regard to agriculture. Where there is an increase, it is substantial but where there is a decrease of the same amount, it is very moderate. I think the farmers will eventually be wondering just where the substantial increase arises.

Some of the members have asked why I should be speaking on agriculture. There are a great number of new Conservative members from agricultural fields who probably do not know that in northern Ontario we have what is called the little clay belt which is probably one of most outstanding and most fertile agricultural areas in all of Canada. Western members may be interested to learn that this area which is in northern Ontario and—that there is a great quantity of available agricultural land—suitable for mixed farming. We have many farmers who farmed in the west. It may be of interest to hon. members to learn that when our house leader came to northern Ontario last week he met two or three farmers near whom he had farmed in his own area but who are now farming in northern Ontario. It is a mixed farming area. Unless this particular government does something about the problems of wheat I am quite sure they will be able to explain to some of the new members who wish to go into farming that they will be able to go into northern Ontario, if the price of wheat continues to fall.

This government since its inception has continually tried to maintain, in my opinion, the poor conditions under which the farmers have existed for the last five or six years and they have striven very hard to do that. I am surprised to hear that some consideration has been given to agriculture when we note the amount provided in the estimates that are now being discussed. In the 1957-58 estimates under a Liberal government $87 million was the amount involved in the agriculture estimates, and in the current ones, those for 1958-59, only $90 million is involved. So that if this government has done such a great deal for agriculture and for the people in that field, they have done it or hope to do it with the sum of $3 million over and above the former estimates.

The minister made a good deal of the Agricultural Stabilization Act and he mentioned some of the things which had been happening. On page 2075 of Hansard for July 9 last he had this to say:

> As I have said, I think a great deal of the improvement has been as the result of policies followed by this government, including the introduction of the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

He goes on to say something about a formula and the general opinion has been expressed during and since the last election that this Agricultural Stabilization Act did have a formula. I think it is very interesting to note the words of the minister when he referred to this formula and when he was comparing the changes in the new act with the provisions of the old act. He said:

> A formula was included for establishing a base price for any agricultural commodities.

He does not say the base price for these agricultural commodities was established on a formula but he says that the formula was included for the establishment of this base price. I suggest there is a great deal of difference between a formula used in establishing a base price and a formula for the establishment of that base price. I presume that when you have a stabilized price you do have a formula but I do not think there is any formula which has any relationship to anything else in this base price.

The minister goes on to mention an advisory board comprised of representatives from farm organizations and outlines the general intentions of the act and so on, but I would like to know from the minister before his estimates are completed how often this stabilization board is meeting, what they are doing and just what they have accomplished which was not accomplished by the previous act.

I know that the officials of the government, in particular of the department concerned, who have been appointed to administer the act were the people who administered the old act and I have personally found them very courteous and helpful at all times. Let us look at some of the prices which have been stabilized, however. It is generally understood that prices were to be stabilized at 80 per cent of the average price for the last ten years and it has been pointed out that butter, for instance, has been stabilized at 107 per cent, steers and lambs at 80 per cent and the highest percentage quoted was 112 per cent. We also know that in the case of many of these commodities the floor price established is considerably higher than formerly under this formula—as the minister calls it—of 80 per cent. Some commodities, however, were receiving greater prices prior to the introduction of this act and it is probable that prices received do not have too much relationship to this legislation.

We believe that the Conservative government has done very little to stabilize agriculture in our country. In my own particular area, and I think this applies across Canada, the number of people leaving the farms has not decreased since this government came to power. In fact, their problems are just as great today as they were under the old administration; the standard of living in rural areas has not improved and neither have conditions generally.

As in all other parts of our economy the prices of consumer goods have continued to rise, which has forced up the cost of living and these prices are continuing to rise. Yet we are given an assurance that conditions are improving. I believe and my party believes that the solution to some of these problems is the implementation of a parity price. In the last few years there has been an increased interest in deficiency payments but it would appear to me that deficiency payments are merely a substitute for a parity price, the only difference being that a deficiency payment is paid on a product already sold—

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he mind giving the house his definition of parity of prices, that is to say the C.C.F.'s definition? I have been wondering about that and I would like to hear it from the hon. member this afternoon because some of us may be answering him in this debate today.

Mr. Peters: I would be more than pleased to do so, but I would first like to say that there have been many explanations of parity prices because all political parties, unfortunately, have used this term in the course of every election with which I have been concerned.

I believe and my party believes that a parity price is a price which will take care of cost of production on a regional basis. It would mean, for example, with respect to a dairy product such as whole milk, where it is not called a parity price but that is what it means, that you would have to take into consideration the wholesale index, the weekly wage index, the commodities and services used by farmers index, the price of butter fat index, the prices of condensed products index and the prices of cheese index. You would have to add up all these figures and put the total over 100 in order to arrive at a base. We feel that account must be taken of all facets of cost of production, including farm labour, cost of living, cost of machinery, a certain return on investment and allowance for interest on loans and all those things which are necessary in order to produce your product. Your selling price must be equal to this amount and we do not consider that profits should enter into this question. A parity price would only be cost of production which would include all the divisions I have outlined.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a supplementary question of the hon. gentleman? I am sure he knows that the cost of producing a bushel of wheat in some sections is less than others, and would he take into account the regional costs?

Mr. Peters: Yes, it would be on a regional basis.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. gentleman say the cost of producing a bushel of wheat even in the same community might vary from farm to farm?

Mr. Peters: I would say it would.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I am wondering if this edifying debate is in order on the minister's estimates.

Mr. Peters: The Canadian Federation of Agriculture carry out surveys and they at one time had the services of an exceptionally fine economist who, unfortunately, has passed on. However, they have the benefit of considerable research and I am sure they could tell the hon. gentleman what he wishes to know. These facts are all available and they could tell him exactly the average price of producing a bushel of wheat in any given area of the prairie provinces, or Ontario or the maritimes, for that matter. These are things which can be worked out and have in fact been worked out and if the hon. member represents a wheat growing community I am sure he would be most interested to know what is the formula price for wheat in his particular area.

We believe that no farmer, and for that matter no person, should be asked to produce a product for nothing or in respect of which over a given period of time he is in effect losing money. Those in labour a few years ago implemented a very similar program to this when they attached to their wages the matter of the cost of living. They computed the cost of living on the dominion bureau of statistics figures, and every time the cost of living went up a point they had their wages increased. We feel that if the farmer is going to maintain his position on the farm —if that is the wish of the Conservative government—they are going to have to do something not only to see that the farmer gets along as well as he did last year, because that was not very good in my area, but that he gets a much better deal than he has had in the last two or three years and that he returns to the plane he was existing on in the years between 1945 and 1951 when he came closer to maintaining a parity price than ever before. I do not think many farmers throughout Canada would say that that parity price between 1945 and 1951 was a bad thing.

There are many other considerations which the minister must take into consideration. Certainly, for the benefit of those members from the west who have not been here before, I think they will be very concerned with this matter of crop insurance. I understand that in the west there is a serious drought condition. In my area it is not a drought condition. We have had lots of rain, but we have not had much good weather and we are faced with a poor hay crop, and unless conditions improve we are not going to have good grain either. Some consideration must be given to the stabilization of the products that agriculture is producing. The agricultural producers of this country want to market as good a product as possible. To enable them to do that and maintain a standard for Canadian products that will sell across the world the government is going to have to insist on much better grading and much better marketing than we have now. We have had over the last year a great deal of difficulty concerning bacon. That one commodity, bacon, has been done up in packages and it looks very nice. The packages have had red cellophane on them, and you buy a package of bacon and think you are getting good bacon but you end up getting mostly lard. If we are going to work for international markets or to increase local markets we are going to have to provide the means whereby we can provide a much more stabilized product than now.

I am very pleased to hear from the agriculture committee that they are going to be discussing the matter of credit for agricultural loans. This is one of the great problems that we face in northern Ontario and I am sure we are facing it across the country, and while I do not want to discuss this matter at any length I do hope that the minister will give consideration to providing for the farmers loans on a similar basis to those which are provided for under the Veterans Land Act which have in most cases worked out very satisfactorily. It has been apparent to the Veterans Land Act authority that they must to some extent supervise the credit they are extending, and there comes a time when credit must be extended beyond what is considered now satisfactory under our chattel mortgages and loan mortgages, and I think the Veterans Land Act has found some solution to this question.

The matter of crop insurance is, I suggest, going to be very important to western farmers. It has been said that they have four or five years of wheat built up in their yards or in their granaries, but I am quite sure that they are depending this year on a crop that they may not produce. While this matter is provincial in scope and has been handled by some of the provinces, I think the federal government has an obligation to provide leadership for those provinces who have not seen fit to look after this matter on their own behalf. If we are sincere in our talk about extending benefits to farmers under other acts, I think we could provide unemployment insurance in a manner in which it could be provided to a farmer, namely by the implementation of crop insurance.

Again, we are concerned with the matter of the wheat surplus. Some people maintain that with a better price for agricultural products there might be a surplus. At the present time, and for a number of years, the only major surplus in agriculture in Canada has been in wheat, and according to reports that surplus may not be as much this year as it has been in other years. But this is, again, a matter which needs a great deal of consideration and sympathetic study. This is a commodity maintained by the federal government and the federal government must take care of that portion of the product that must be sold on the international markets. We are pleased with the work that has been done in this field, but certainly would support any constructive decision that is made to have a two-price system on wheat, where one price could be available on a competitive basis on the international market and the other one handled perhaps under the Agricultural Prices Support Act where we think it should have been put in the first place.

Another problem which faces agriculture is this matter of farm efficiency. There have been a number of very comprehensive articles written about this. The Conservative candidate in my area was very concerned about where the farmer was going, whether he was efficient enough to operate and just how he could be helped, and one of the ways in which big business is helping the farmer is through this matter of vertical integration. While this has taken place and some of our farmers have accepted it because of cash restrictions and because they have to borrow money from the bank in order to develop, they have signed contracts with feed companies and other companies such as packing companies that are less than what would be called desirable. Unless some consideration is given to this matter the small farmer who has been the backbone of agriculture in Canada for years will gradually disappear and we will find the farmer in the position of a hired man for the local packing company or for the local feed dealer.

Some consideration must be given to examining this vertical integration program. Legislation should be developed that would be much more effective in dealing with combines which would take place and could take place very easily in the feed industry and in the packing industry where they are supplying the money. If the farmer is going to be forced into this vertical integration, then I think the federal government has an obligation to protect the farmer and enact legislation that will prohibit the abuses present in the contracts farmers are now signing, and make it imperative that if a farmer is going to sign this type of contract he will be at least protected so that at the end of the year he will have a decent standard of living.

On this same business there is a conclusion that has been reached that I think will be of interest. It is from an organization that I do not usually quote. It is the Searle Grain Company Limited. I am quoting from a booklet entitled "This matter of farm efficiency —a commentary":

> It has been said that farming can no longer be considered a way of life, that it is strictly a business which must be run on strictly business-like lines. We venture to say, however, that desirable and necessary as it will always be to aim for the greatest efficiency possible, farming will still remain very much a way of life to many.

Life is made up, after all, of apparent inconsistencies and that is why the human desire to cling to farming in the face of difficulties is something which cannot be explained in terms of the dollars and cents return any more than it can be fully understood by those who concern themselves with efficiency. The present trend toward larger farming operations will undoubtedly proceed but with two-thirds of our prairie farms still under three-quarters of a section in size there is little doubt that for many years to come the moderate sized or relatively small holdings will continue to occupy an important place in the whole farming industry in western Canada. To our way of thinking this is very desirable.

I suggest this is desirable to the agricultural industry of all Canada. We endorse it and urge the minister to take some steps to see that it comes about.

A problem has developed in my area which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. We have been farming in northern Ontario for approximately 50 years. The farmland has been heavily worked. The prices that have existed in years gone by with a very few exceptions have been such that the farmer has not been able to take steps to replace the minerals in the depleted soil. Such action is now necessary. Mixed farming takes more from the soil than does the type of farming that is done in the west. Now the farmer is faced with increased costs for providing commercial fertilizer and agricultural limestone.

There is a federal statute in existence called the Agricultural Limestone Subvention Act, revised April 1, 1951. This is a joint program involving the railway companies, the provincial governments and the federal government. Its purpose is to provide at the lowest possible cost agricultural limestone for use by farmers subsidized with respect to freight rates. The railways have made a reduction for the farmer who imports agricultural limestone. The reduction is 25 per cent. The Ontario government in southern Ontario pays 75 per cent of the reduced freight rate up to a maximum of $2.50 per ton. In northern Ontario the provincial government will pay 75 per cent of the reduced freight rate with no limit and the purchaser will pay the balance. The federal government will pay 60 per cent of the provincial contribution to the freight rate for the hauling of agricultural limestone when billed by the provincial government. If the limestone is hauled by truck from the source to the farmer the federal will pay five cents per ton up to a maximum of $2 which would be 40 ton miles. This has been advantageous to the people of northern Ontario. They have had to use increasing quantities of limestone which they have purchased by the carload through farm co-operatives, the federation of agriculture and the farmers' union. They have appreciated this arrangement. Because commercial fertilizer falls in the same category as agricultural limestone and because they have to buy fertilizer in such large quantities the farmers in that area would like the act extended to apply to fertilizer as well. This would mean that the farmers could put more fertilizer on the land.

From my experience with farmers I know they are the original conservationists. The farmer owns his land. He likes farm life and puts all the money he can into his farm. If the coverage of the agricultural limestone subvention policy were to be extended the farmers themselves would make an increased contribution to the betterment of the country and would increase the production of agricultural products on their farms.

May I conclude by expressing the hope that in the near future the Minister of Agriculture will introduce legislation that is not a copy of the kind of legislation the Liberal government implemented many years ago. Farm prices have been steadily decreasing. Farmers are leaving their farms in great numbers. The agricultural economy of Canada in my opinion is one of our greatest heritages. It is a renewable resource of which we should be proud. We should take good care of it and give the industry all the assistance we can.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, a week or so ago when I addressed myself to the coal problems of the maritime provinces it was pointed out by the minister concerned that I was an ex-inspector of fisheries attempting to speak on the coal problems of the maritimes. If this afternoon I participate briefly in this debate on the first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture I hope I will not be accorded similar treatment by the Minister of Agriculture.

When introducing the first item of his estimates on Wednesday the minister made a general statement on the situation of agriculture particularly during the past year. In his statement, the minister stated that farm cash income had declined slightly from 1956 level but it was $47 million higher than the average for the ten-year period 1948-1957, and higher than the amount realized in five years out of this ten-year period. In order to make his statement clear and logical, the minister should also have mentioned the increase in population which took place during that same period and which normally would mean a much larger consumption of our agricultural products.

With an actual farming population of approximately 17 per cent of the total population of this country, it is true that the productivity per man hour has advanced far more rapidly in agriculture than in any other industry in Canada. It is a well-known fact that our country today is almost self-sufficient in the production of food for its growing population, with food imports averaging only approximately 4 per cent of our total farm production. It is therefore logical that an industry which affects such a large percentage of our population, with total gross revenue of approximately $2¾ billion per year, should receive considerable attention from the parliament of Canada. The total estimates for the present fiscal year for the Department of Agriculture amount to approximately $97 million, or less than 2 per cent of the total budget for the present fiscal year.

In the course of his statement, the minister stated that a considerable number of commodities had been stabilized under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and had so far authorized 16 products in addition to turkeys and potatoes which were authorized under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. This report shows that out of the 16 commodities quoted, 11 have been supported at a percentage below the 100 per cent average base price for the last ten years, and in fact, five of these commodities have been supported at the minimum price of 80 per cent based on prices paid for the last ten years.

Before this first item is passed by this committee could the minister inform us what was the total amount paid under the agricultural prices stabilization program from January of this year to June 30? We will also be interested to know how much was paid in subsidy, or deficiency payments for asparagus and soybeans.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while the number of cattle exported in 1957, as stated by the minister, was seven times as high as the exports for the previous year, we must also take into consideration the fact that on account of this large increase in exports the Canadian consumer is paying from 25 per cent to 30 per cent more for beef than he was paying a year ago. This is adding, accordingly, to the cost of living and we must also take into consideration the fact that this increase in export of cattle is only a temporary one and could easily be reversed when the United States have increased their production, as they are doing now.

Notwithstanding the accusations made by members of the present government about the legislation brought in by the previous administration, we must all admit that the present policy of the government is based almost entirely on the sound foundation of Liberal legislation. The only major changes made since June, 1957, are the cash advances on farm-stored grain and amendments to the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Measures such as the freight assistance policy, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act were all enacted by the previous administration. The Liberal administration also assisted and supported the Canadian wheat board through vigorous sales policies, with wheat sales in previous years reaching record proportions.

As I have just stated, it is evident that the present government so far has done nothing more than build on the sound legislation introduced by the previous administration. We of the official opposition realize that the ever-increasing farm production in Canada requires a new approach to the problem of agriculture, with proposals that will be of long range benefit to our farmers and which will assure them the place which they deserve in our economy and in our national life.

The importance of a national policy on farm problems, farm credit and others, must be one of the main concerns of the present government. It is the duty of the government of this country to maintain a healthy and efficient agriculture and this cannot be done unless prices paid for farm commodities can assure our farmers a fair profit for their farming operations. With our increase in population our agriculture should become more and more stabilized but for the time being our farmers want constructive action from the present government.

While certain farm commodities have been included for price support or deficiency payments under the agricultural stabilization bill, other important commodities have been left out from the permanent list and may be included only after acceptance by the governor in council. It may be all right to support such commodities as asparagus or soybeans, but we from the maritime provinces want to know why potatoes are not included on the permanent list of commodities coming under this act or at least why our potato growers are not given the protection received by growers of other products in other sections of the country.

Mr. Harkness: They have had a great deal of protection; a lot of money has been paid out to them.

Mr. Robichaud: The minister seems to be satisfied with the protection which has been given so far. Unfortunately, our farmers are not of the same opinion. The Prime Minister has said on numerous occasions that "there is a distress price in Canada below which all agricultural prices cannot fall." The potato is an important commodity for farmers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and our farmers have a right to expect the same protection which is being given to farm producers in other sections of the country. The recent offer made to Prince Edward Island farmers, averaging 33 cents a bushel for their potatoes, is not sufficient. It is not a sufficient offer to our producers and the government without delay should come out with a farm policy for our potato growers.

Another commodity which has been given the run around by the Minister of Agriculture is the pulpwood sold on the small farms in eastern Canada. We all realize that a large number of our small farm owners depend on the sale of pulpwood cut from their woodlots as a source of ready cash or revenue to meet the payment of their municipal taxes and other urgent obligations. Those small farmers are receiving today for their pulpwood a price which is far from satisfactory and which barely meets their expenses of cutting this pulpwood and taking it to the roadside.

On January 21 last, as reported at page 3809 of Hansard, for the 1957-58 session, during the course of the debate on the agricultural products prices stabilization bill I asked the minister the following question:

> I would appreciate it if the minister would be more specific and explain why he is opposed to the inclusion of pulpwood as one of the commodities to be covered by the bill, or can he assure us that pulpwood could be included under subparagraph (ii) of clause 2, "any other natural or processed product of agriculture designated by the governor in council."

On that occasion I received the following reply from the minister:

> Yes, Mr. Chairman, Clause 2 provides for support prices being established for any agricultural commodity which is accepted by the governor in council on the advice of the committee and of the board as one which should be supported.

This, Mr. Chairman, could be considered as a rather vague reply, but during the political campaign, while speaking in Rimouski on February 27, the Prime Minister said, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of February 27, 1958, something which was rather more specific, and I quote:

> I hope that the advisory committee and the stabilization board would give consideration to including farm-produced wood so that they will know the lowest price they will receive in a year in advance.

It is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five oclock, it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Private Bills

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to consideration of private and public bills, the former pursuant to standing order 15 (3) having precedence.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Since there are a number of divorce bills standing for second reading, is it the wish of the house that these bills be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill No. SD-79, for the relief of Benita Gertrude Kozlov Cohen.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill No. SD-80, for the relief of Marie Marguerite Amelia Genier Wright.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill No. SD-81, for the relief of Winifred Jean Garrett Somers.—Mr. McCleave.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANS MOUNTAIN OIL PIPE LINE COMPANY

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-6, respecting the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as set out in the bill, is to subdivide each of the shares without nominal or par value into five shares without nominal or par value. Such a subdivision would result in a reduction in the unit price per share and a corresponding increase in the number of shares held by each shareholder and in the number of shares available for future issue. It is believed that the lower unit price and larger number of shares should encourage a wider distribution of the company's shares among investors in Canada and would facilitate future financing by the company. After this bill has passed second reading, I undertake that the officials of the company will be available to the members of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to explain the bill in detail.

Before I go on to the financing of the company, I should like to go into a certain amount of detail concerning the operation of Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company and pipe line companies generally, so that the members of this house will have a knowledge of the oil pipe line industry. As hon. members will recall, Trans Mountain was incorporated by an act of parliament in 1951 for the purpose of transporting oil from Alberta to the Pacific coast. It was originally conceived and built as an all-Canadian line at a time when it was considered politically desirable that the oil reserves of Canada should be reserved for Canadian use. For this reason the terminus of the line was to be in the Vancouver area, with a provision for shipping any surplus oil to export markets by tanker or by barge. However, the fantastic growth in Canadian oil reserves soon made it apparent that development of these Canadian oil fields would be held back unless export markets were secured, and to this end Trans Mountain incorporated a wholly owned United States subsidiary, Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Corporation, which owns and operates the company's pipe line system in the state of Washington. This Washington system is connected to the refinery of the General Petroleum Corporation at Ferndale, and to the refinery at Anacortes of the Shell Oil Company, as well as to the new Texaco refinery which is presently being built in the same area. The total for these two refineries, excluding Texaco, will be 90,000 barrels a day.

When Trans Mountain was built approximately 2,500 men were engaged on the original construction of the project, of whom 90 per cent were Canadians who gained experience in the complexities of pipe line construction. Since the completion of the original line a number of substantial contracts have been awarded to Canadian construction companies, giving additional employment. In this regard, it might be well for members of the house to understand the purchasing policy of Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company, which is set out in the purchasing manual as follows:

> General policy is to purchase materials and equipment made in the following areas with preference given in the order they are shown:
> 1. Canada—western area
> 2. Canada—eastern area
> 3. United Kingdom
> 4. United States
> 5. Other countries
>
> The preference referred to is given only on the basis that materials and equipment are of equal quality and price.
> Policy as regards distributors and wholesale houses will be to place orders for use in Alberta with firms located in the Edmonton area, wherever possible, and for British Columbia requirements with Vancouver firms. Consideration is also to be given Kamloops firms where they are able to compete.

In a most recent expansion of the system, two leading Canadian manufacturers of electrical equipment were given the opportunity of producing in Canada, for the first time, large capacity explosion-proof electric motors and complicated control systems for pipe line pump stations. When it is not possible to obtain our requirements from Canadian manufacturers the manual states preference is given to the United Kingdom and commonwealth suppliers. Every effort has been made and will be made to allow them to participate in our business. In some cases we have been able to delay our delivery dates in order that they might participate in this business.

As to the staff of the company, as called for in the Companies Act the majority of the directors are Canadians. In regard to the employment of other personnel for Trans Mountain, the employment policy from its very start has been to obtain qualified Canadian and British commonwealth personnel, with preference given to those with oil industry experience and especially pipe line experience. To this end, more than 2,000 applicants were reviewed during the hiring of the first 150 employees. Of these 150 Canadians and British commonwealth citizens very few had previous important pipe line experience. The company paid for and sent these men around to various pipe line companies, both in Canada and the United States, in order to gain this experience. At the present time Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company is wholly staffed with Canadian personnel. This should be a bit of an object lesson to a lot of other pipe line companies who have not shown that same initiative.

Because of the publicity which has been given to pipe lines and pipe line matters, Mr. Speaker, both in the press and in parliament over the past few years, it would seem desirable at this time to say a few words about an oil pipe line as compared to a gas pipe line. On land, the main arteries of transportation of both petroleum and natural gas are the pipe lines. At this moment, I am reading from the submission of Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company to the Borden commission. These pipe lines are similar in size, extent and general trunkline constitution. It would appear that, generally speaking, the public does not differentiate between the two. However, there are characteristic differences which are of major importance when considering government regulation and control as well as such matters as finance and operation.

Oil pipe lines generally transport a commodity that is owned by others, a raw material that is eventually delivered to a refinery for further processing into many products before reaching the consumer. Gas pipe lines, on the other hand, frequently function as public utilities, owning the material they transport and delivering it as a finished product. An oil pipe line frequently has no guaranteed business and is essentially a high-risk venture; a gas pipe line, before construction gets under way, generally has long-term contracts for both supply and delivery that will guarantee the high load factor essential to economic operation, thus making it a relatively safe undertaking. In fact, in the case of Trans Mountain it was necessary, because of the risk element, to obtain from the major backers of the project deficiency agreements which will be further explained when I deal with the financing of this company.

In the United States, controversy over the pros and cons of ownership and control of pipe lines by the major integrated companies has existed since the early days of the oil industry. Out of this controversy have come such regulatory measures as the Elkins act, prohibiting rebates, the consent decree regarding permissible dividend payments and various Sherman act anti-trust cases. Divorcement of pipe lines and disintegration of major companies have been seriously considered by the authorities concerned. In this regard, I should like to refer to the Merrill foundation for the advancement of financial knowledge which financed the work of Mr. Leslie Cookenboo, who produced a study on this very important subject. This study is contained in this book entitled "Crude Oil Pipe Lines and Competition in the Oil Industry". I should like to quote from page 143 where Mr. Cookenboo, in discussing public policy and public control of pipe lines, has this to say:

A similar development, which is even closer to the best that any public policy could hope to achieve, is illustrated by the two Canadian lines mentioned above—

Namely Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company and Interprovincial.

—which were built under special permits from the Canadian government.

He goes on further to state that in these lines the financing was shared by independents and majors alike as well as public participation. He closes his paragraph on page 143 by stating this:

If future crude lines built in the United States were to imitate those built in Canada (most of the ownership is by United States companies or their subsidiaries), then there would be little ground for complaint about major exclusion of the market-oriented independent refiners from crude supplies.

Again on page 168 he states:

—the latest such joint venture,—

That is of independents and majors combined.

—Trans Mountain is an almost ideal example of how a pipe line should be built—

I should now like to turn to the financial structure of the company. When Trans Mountain was first financed it was based on an estimated completion cost of approximately $80 million, and it was decided that $65 million should be produced by the sale of bonds and $15 million by the sale of shares. Shares to the number of 450,000 were sold to the public at $10 per share to yield to the company $9.50 per share after deduction of underwriters' fees. The remainder of the shares issued originally were sold directly at $10 per share. With respect to the 450,000 shares sold to the public, the underwriters were asked to effect a wide distribution to Canadian purchasers. That this objective was accomplished is evidenced by the fact that the first shareholders' list included over 5,000 names; and I believe that number has increased to date, to something in the neighbourhood of 7,000 names. The shares were not offered for sale in the United States and no registration of the shares of this company has been effected with the United States securities and exchange commission. I may say that this again is from the submission to the Borden commission.

The prospectus of the company contained a clear warning of the risk and speculative nature of the undertaking. Because of this an important added feature is the fact that all the bonds issued are guaranteed by deficiency agreements entered into between the company and the six major oil company shareholders. Those shareholders are Imperial Oil Limited; Shell Oil Company of Canada, Limited; Canadian Gulf Oil Company; Standard Oil Company of British Columbia, Limited; Union Oil Company of California and Richfield Oil Corporation. These companies are referred to as deficiency agreement guarantors. In other words, these companies have to guarantee the bondholders. That is, if the pipe line did not make a profit, and if it did not carry its charges, then these companies would have to make good to the bond holders. In addition, a group of independents signed deficiency agreements but these agreements were subject to lapse on December 31, 1956.

The effect of that is rather interesting, Mr. Speaker, in that the shareholding as of March 27, 1958 as compared to December 31, 1951, varies as follows. On December 31, 1951 some 670,000 shares were held by the major oil companies which were guarantors under the deficiency agreement. That number has dropped by only 100,000 shares to 570,000 shares as of March 27, 1958. However, the group of independents and smaller oil companies—and I am referring to oil company shareholders—which at December 31, 1951 owned 250,000 shares now own only 53,025 shares. This means that those shares have now a wider distribution than they had at the time when the company was first formed.

The intent of the bill is to divide the shares five for one in order to give a broader base in the way of participation by Canadians in the holding of shares of this company. This participation is considered to be good policy on the part of the company. I have tried to stress the Canadian nature of the company, the Canadian nature of their operations and the way that they are operating for the good of this country, in the way that I think a Canadian company should operate.

This bill was before parliament in 1957. At that time it was suggested that the treasury had 3,500,000 shares approximately and that this wider distribution could be effected simply by issuing those shares to present shareholders. Mr. Speaker, that procedure would not effect wider distribution in the way that this amendment will effect it. As I have pointed out, the oil companies which are guarantors of the line hold 670,000 shares, or rather 570,000 shares as of today's date. That would simply mean that the treasury stock would be turned over in relation to the present shareholders and in fact it would be watering the stock. The company prefers to do it in this way which in effect is simply taking a $50 bill and changing it into five ten-dollar bills so that it is easier to trade. There is no watering of the stock. There is simply the chance of wider distribution of the stock. The equity that was behind each share of stock will be behind it in the proportion of one to five for each new share of stock. In addition, the company will have in their treasury unissued shares which can be used as required in the way of gaining funds for future financing.

Mr. Speaker, there is in this bill nothing of a contentious nature. In the Vancouver area alone this company, through the facilities it provides, has developed a refining industry which at the present time has increased employment in British Columbia by about 750 persons engaged in the refinery and oil transportation business. The municipality of Burnaby has benefited to a marked degree by the building of this pipe line as has the economy of Canada, because this pipe line has provided an outlet for many millions of dollars' worth of oil to the northwestern states.

As I said before, the company is ready to go before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for the purpose of answering all questions and divulging all information which the committee may require. I would ask that hon. members pass this bill on second reading so that it may get into the committee stages.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, back on March 11 of last year, in rising to speak on a bill, as reported at page 2093 of Hansard of 1957, in my opening sentence I had this to say:

> —I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the debate on this bill, because it has to do with a company that is connected with the oil business and because the exact effect of the bill now before us is to ask the authority of parliament to split shares.

I can commence my remarks this afternoon with exactly the same words because we are dealing with the same bill. It is obvious that the officials of Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company are very keen on having this parliament give them authority to split their shares five to one. Their interest is shown not only by the fact that this bill was introduced in 1957, at which time it failed to pass this house, but that the company has seen fit to place it before parliament again at the present time. In addition to these facts we also recognize the interest of the officials between the non-passage of the bill in 1957 and its re-introduction at this present session because those officials have endeavoured to make their position understood, if I may put it that way, to those who successfully blocked the bill in 1957. I can say that because Mr. Morrison, the president, came to see me in my office in Vancouver between sessions—in between elections, as a matter of fact—and also because the officials of the company asked to meet with our group in this House of Commons just a few days ago.

I am not making this statement in a critical way; I think it was most commendable of the officials to try to see that we have a full understanding of what they have in mind. I assure all members of this house that we not only listened with a great deal of interest to the information we were given but we asked a great many questions of the officials of the company. But we are still in some doubt as to just what is behind the proposal to split the shares five to one. This is a further reason why we have listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member who sponsored this bill.

I am certain that all hon. members noted the emphasis placed upon what I presume is the main intent behind the measure which is, in the words of the sponsor, a wider distribution of shares and, later on, he said that the splitting of five to one would give a broader base of share holdings. I am sure that is a commendable motive but, quite honestly, we in this group cannot tie in that motive with the declared policies of the officials of the company. A large portion of the outstanding shares are held by oil companies—I think the figure is 33 or 35 per cent—and I believe those companies are nine in number. We have been told by Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company officials within the last few days that there is no intention on the part of the oil companies to dispose of their shares and therefore there can be no greater distribution or broader base, because if they intend to hang on to their shares—

Mr. Broome: May I explain that point?

Mr. Winch: If the hon. member wishes to say that I am giving wrong information, most certainly, but I do not think he does.

Mr. Broome: No.

Mr. Winch: So there is no broader base of distribution except that the oil companies will hold five times the number of shares they now have in their possession.

Mr. Broome: On the same equity.

Mr. Winch: I said they had no intention of selling but that their holdings would amount to just five times the number of shares with the same equity, that is right. There is therefore no broader base for distribution and that is my first point. Secondly, the officials told us right in this building just a few days ago that there was no intention in the foreseeable future of the issuance of further stock. That was not contemplated

If the companies are going to hold their shares and Trans Canada Oil Pipe Line Company is not going to issue any more shares, then on what basis is the passage of this bill going to give a greater distribution of shares or establish a broader base of shareholding? The position explained to us by the officials—and this was confirmed by the sponsor—is that the intent of splitting the shares is merely for the purpose I have just outlined so far as the foreseeable future is concerned.

We have been given to understand, and this was mentioned in brief by the sponsor of the bill, that in the event of the necessity of the expanding of the operations of this company it would be in a better position in connection with the issuance of shares in order to obtain additional capital if it could present to the buying public shares of smaller denomination than those presently existing. In other words, to use the same terminology as the sponsor of the bill, by changing a $50 bill to five $10 bills then on a stock-selling basis they might be able to attract more people to buy on the basis of $10 than on the basis of $50.

That sounds as though it might be a commendable idea but one question which arises in all our minds is whether there is any move contemplated or any need for the expansion of the operations of the company. I think the best way to judge that would be to make a study of the company's operations. The company started operating in 1953 and I have before me both the annual report of the company for 1957, which gives a breakdown of operations from 1953 to 1957, and also the quarterly report for the first three months of this year. What do we find in the company's own report? If we study their actual daily deliveries we find that in 1953 the figure was 21,096 barrels, in 1954 it was 39,787 barrels, in 1955 it was 83,982 barrels, in 1956 it was 129,103 barrels and in 1957 it was 154,891 barrels. The annual highest average, therefore, works out to 154,891 barrels but as the officials pointed out to us, partly because of the recession, but particularly because of the United States policy with respect to oil, there has been a decline in their operations with the result that for the first three months of this year the average daily delivery of this pipe line is 102,180 barrels. And it looks as if on this delivery they are not losing money but still making it.

The reason I read this report, Mr. Speaker, was to show their low figure in 1954, their high in 1957, their present delivery rate, which is 102,000 barrels daily, and to ask you to relate that to the dumping capacity of the company, which according to the report is 250,000 barrels a day. Now, they have never come anywhere close to this capacity and on the basis of their present operation they could carry on with their present equipment doing almost two and a quarter times the business they are doing today, and even on the basis of their high year of 1957 they would still have an additional capacity of approximately 100,000 barrels on a daily basis.

That being the situation according to the company's own figures, it seems highly improbable that in the foreseeable future they will have to go on the stock market in order to raise funds for the expansion of their delivery facilities, and the company has admitted that there is no such intention. So, on the basis outlined a few minutes ago of not issuing shares, on the basis of their facilities for increased business, we cannot see why there should be this pressure to have the House of Commons this session give the company the right to split their shares five to one.

I think that we, as public representatives, have the right to look very carefully into this situation and to ask the plain question whether or not this company, with its earnings and earning capacity, should be given this right to split its shares. Admittedly, in 1953 there was a loss in the first year of operations of $470,000, and in 1954 there was a loss of $1,256,000. But then they got into real operation and between 1955 and 1957, after all expenses, after all income tax, nearly $16 million was secured in net returns which added up in 1957 for example to net earnings per share of $5.52. Now $5.52 net earnings on what was basically a $10 share is quite a considerable return, and even on the basis of dividends paid out, which amounted to $2 a share, it was pretty good on $10. Of course, many of the shares were not purchased at $10 because of profit taking on the stock market, but even if they have not been sold on the stock market they are of that value to those who paid $10, which brings to my mind what happened with regard to Imperial Oil and other oil companies in this country.

The greatest and probably the only existing study ever made of share-splitting was made by the late Chief Justice M. A. Macdonald of British Columbia, who was appointed in 1934 as a royal commissioner to investigate the coal and petroleum industry. He filed his report in 1936, a most exhaustive report. I have a copy here and I regret that we have not time to read it into the record, because it is most interesting. One of the highlights of Mr. Justice Macdonald's findings concerned this matter of the oil companies and, in their operations, the splitting of shares in order to hide profits and in order to build up capital gains without the investment of new moneys. I will quote just one brief example of the Imperial Oil situation, and I take this directly from the report. It shows on page HH 251 a table of the increases in authorized capital of Imperial Oil, which company, by the way, is a heavy shareholder in the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company; I believe it is one of the largest of the shareholders.

Mr. Broome: Equal with the other five major ones.

Mr. Winch: From 1880 to 1929 the capital of that company increased from $500,000, 5,000 shares of $100 each, to 32 million shares of no par value which, on the stock market, at a valuation in July of 1935, represented a value of $139,119,200. This was done, starting in 1913, by splitting shares; 150,000 into 500,000; 500,000 into 2 million; 2 million into 8 million; and 8 million into 32 million, with the result that the original share of $100 became worth $1,216 in July, 1935.

Mr. Justice Macdonald warned against the practice of splitting shares, and so, in view of what I have tried to point out from the company's own records, and in view of the history of the oil companies and of the profit derived by the method of splitting shares, we feel that the full story has not been told and that the reasons we have been given for the purport of this act cannot stand investigation.

Mr. Broome: I object to those words, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: We have come to the conclusion that our position is unchanged from the position we took in 1937 and we must again in this quarter of the house and in these circumstances oppose the House of Commons giving authority to this company to split the shares in the ratio of five to one.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I sat in on the meeting the other day when the officials of the Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company consented to meet with a number of us to hear if there was any change in the attitude of the company compared with what it previously has been. I, personally, was very much interested in the fact that after they had talked for some time they informed us that this split from one share to five was not going to accomplish anything in the way of more money in the treasury. And I was particularly surprised to note that they maintained that they did not need any more money in the treasury, and that this was the only reason for this split. They have in the Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company 5,000,000 shares of no par value. Of these shares, about 1,000,000 have been issued, about 450,000 to private individuals.

If this company is interested in expansion and in raising more money for capital expenditures, then because of the value of the stock it would be a simple matter for it to raise the money by issuing some of the treasury stocks it now holds to the general public. If the company wishes to raise more money it would appear logical for it to do so in the normal business practice. It could issue the stock it now has to the general public which would make available to the company enough money with which to expand and possibly make whatever investment it feels is necessary.

In the committee we asked why the company did not sell more stock. Frankly, I was not impressed with its reasoning. Some hon. members may recall the history of this company. It came to parliament and asked to split its stock on one previous occasion. In the last application the main reason stated was that it wanted to split its stock again, not to eliminate the oil companies that are affected in the capitalization program, but because the company was distressed by the fact that the shares were rising on the market very rapidly and the profit of the company was becoming embarrassing in view of the small number of shares it had out. If this should be true it would appear that parliament is required to pass legislation to control the method of stock evaluation under which the profits can prove to be a source of embarrassment to the people who own the stock. In all fairness I must point out that when we asked the officials of the company about this matter they agreed they would also like to see legislation which would eliminate the necessity of their having to have these matters handled in this way.

I am in complete agreement that something must be done to control these companies. While their representatives pointed out that they are not similar to companies engaged in distributing gas, the situation over the years has developed to the point where federal legislation is required with respect to pipe line companies. The lack of legislation to control pipe lines is becoming more obvious to this parliament and the people of Canada every day. This applies not only to the federal field but to the provincial as well. The investigation into pipe line companies in Ontario has revealed that disastrous decimations have been made in the cabinet ranks of the legislature of that province.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member not think he is going a bit far afield? After all, we are dealing with the splitting of the stock of the Trans Mountain Pipe Line Company which does not operate in Ontario. May I suggest that the hon. member relate his remarks more closely to the subject of stock splitting.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was attempting to suggest that the problem with respect to this company is being reflected in other companies. The presumption would be that it will not be too long until some of the other pipe line companies for the same reason would have to come to this parliament to seek permission to split stock. If that is the solution to the problem which appears to have developed, then I can see other companies having to do the same thing.

I feel I am safe in saying that the company did not convince us that it had a legitimate reason for splitting its stock. Without regard to the fact that money was necessary the officials of the company pointed out they would like to have $40 million in their treasury for capital investment. They also pointed out that the capital investment was not going to take place immediately, that the splitting of the stock in itself was not a method of raising money for capital expenditures. The company did not have a program which, in my opinion, would indicate that it was going to increase its subsidiary industries that resulted from the establishment of the line in the Vancouver area. I do not think, therefore, there is much justification at the present time for this novel method of disposing of the high profits the company has been enjoying.

I feel it is basic common sense to say that if a company is making so much money that it is ashamed to face the Canadian people then the parliament of Canada should not play a part in concealing the matter in this way. If the company had come to parliament with a proposal for expanding industrial development in the immediate area of Vancouver or in the lower mainland of British Columbia then there might have been some justification for its application. The company stated independently that this would not allow them any additional money for that type of development so it could not be accomplished in this manner. I feel that this company should take another look at its method of disposing of stock. I feel the Canadian people are not much interested in seeing companies do this sort of thing. If the company issued the stock it has in its treasury for use in capital expenditures it would assist the Canadian economy but it is seeking only to split its stock in this fashion.

I wish to express my appreciation of the opportunity afforded me of meeting the officials of this company. With only a small investment this has become a large, economical company. These gentlemen came to Ottawa and by using a great deal of tact and finesse they pointed out, to me at least, the new trend that must be taking place in big business in terms of stock promotion and business operations. It is indeed a contrast with what occurs in the mining industry; in fact, it could be described as being completely the reverse of what occurs there. In the mining industry instead of ending up with five shares for every one you find that you end up with one share for every five that you held and you are lucky if this does not happen several times a year. This appears to be stock splitting that is completely the reverse of the kind of stock splitting to which I am normally accustomed.

The mining industry, which has been splitting stocks for many years, in reverse, should take a look at the situation and in particular at the tactics these gentlemen use. It has been normal in the mining industry to tell my friends and me, yes, and other parliamentarians, this is the way it is going to be done, you can take it or you can leave it, and sometimes they have even offered some stock in the deal, but this appears—

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Peters: I do not know it from first-hand knowledge because I have never had enough money to buy stock. Normally, stock-splitting involves something like this. Every time you buy one share of stock you end up with five or six for one. If this did not happen every time they came to parliament with a matter of this kind probably we would be more interested in buying stock.

An hon. Member: Have you ever bought any stock?

Mr. Peters: I never have enough money to buy any stock.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated in rising because I thought the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) was going to participate in this debate. I did, as did I am sure the hon. member who introduced this bill, look up past issues of Hansard in an attempt to familiarize myself with the background of a similar bill which was introduced in 1957. I noticed that at that time the then member for Victoria, Mr. Fairey, introduced the bill. In his introductory remarks, or in his remarks on second reading, he was very short. In fact, he said at that time that it was a simple bill and did not require too much expansion and he hoped that the bill would pass. Perhaps that was one of the reasons why he got into difficulty with the passage of it.

I would like to extend my congratulatory remarks to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), and not the least for expanding his remarks much farther than did his predecessor in introducing the bill. Even though he was more expansive and made more references to the structure of the company and its relationship with its employees, nevertheless I do not think he covered adequately all of the ground or came anywhere near answering the objections which were raised when this bill was before parliament in 1957. In my opinion the questions which were raised at that time are still valid questions and still require answers.

I wonder, too, why this particular company, if this is the approach that they use—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): May I ask a question? Is this part of the speech of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) of last year or of Mr. Cameron's.

Mr. Howard: I did not catch the question.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Is this part of Mr. Cameron's or of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam's speech of last June?

An hon. Member: Mr. Cameron's.

Mr. Howard: I must admit we do have excellent taste. If this is the approach that Trans Mountain uses, I wonder why the company did not approach one of the members representing the Burnaby constituencies. I can well appreciate why they did not approach the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and ask him to introduce and support the bill, but I wonder why they had to go so far afield as Vancouver South to find someone to support and introduce this particular bill.

Mr. Broome: This is obviously part of the speech of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, which he made last year.

Mr. Howard: It may be as my hon. friend says.

Mr. Winch: Why does the hon. member not ask me if I make my own speeches?

Mr. Howard: In any event, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the comments made by hon. members opposite, when I opened my remarks I said the hon. member for Vancouver South did not come anywhere near answering the questions which were raised during the debate on this bill a year ago, and did not come anywhere near dealing with the objections which were raised at that time. Inasmuch as the subject matter of the bill is the same, and inasmuch as it was given a most exhaustive debate and study a year ago, where else would one go than to the past records of Hansard to see what the problem is all about. Actually, in reading those references in Hansard, just as we do in other research work in attempting to deal with other problems, we must deal with points that were dealt with in the speeches and debates of the past.

Mr. Argue: The Tories should do their homework, too.

Mr. Howard: If the remarks that I am making now and the remarks that I intend to make about this bill in the future are similar to remarks made by hon. members of this house in previous debates, or by present hon. members, well, it is only natural that they should be so.

In the operation of pipe lines, whether they be gas or oil, the hon. member for Vancouver South attempted to differentiate between the two and to say that the promoters, owners and operators of oil pipe lines were lily white pure compared with the buccaneers and pirates interested in the operation of gas pipe lines. Be that as it may, we have seen over the years that both oil pipe lines and gas pipe lines, in the operation of the oil and gas industry, have done nothing but enrich the pockets of a number of promoters. It has been a most lucrative industry—the gas pipe lines and the oil pipe lines—both here in Canada and in the United States.

Mr. Broome: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he not aware that not one cent was made in promotion fees in the promotion of the Trans Mountain Oil Pipe Line Company? In reading the prospectus I tried to point out that every cent raised went into the treasury of the company and was used for the development of the company.

Mr. Howard: What was the question?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Winch: May we ask about the business for next week?

Mr. Badanai: What is the business for Monday?

Mr. Green: On Monday, Mr. Speaker, we intend to take a supply motion. If we get into supply we shall go on with trade and commerce.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he does not feel that, according to the rule book of this house, it would be more appropriate to take a private member's motion, which would be just a second day for private members' bills, rather than one supply motion following another?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker; I think it is more important under existing conditions to have a supply motion.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

HIGHWAY BRIDGES—FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY

Question No. 128—Mr. McWilliam:

Does the federal government assume responsibility in whole, or in part, for the construction of highway bridges solely within provincial boundaries, other than trans-Canada highway bridges?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

Yes, in special circumstances where there is a federal responsibility.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 14, 1958

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

FRIDAY EVENING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS ON AND AFTER JULY 18

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Friday, July 18, 1958, and on every Friday and Saturday thereafter until the end of this session, the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

Fridays
11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and
2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m., and
8:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m.;

Saturdays
11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and
2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m.;

That the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be as for Thursday (government day); and that the provisions of standing orders 2(1) and 6(3) be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister is going to make a statement in introducing his motion?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the statement I intend to make will be quite short. I know from long personal experience that the lengthening of the sittings to a six-day week makes it a trying experience for all members of the house, and I did realize that situation when I introduced this motion. Each year, however, it becomes necessary, as we begin to arrive at a point when we can look forward with some hope to the end of the session, to introduce a motion similar to this.

I think I should say a word or two with regard to the industry and the application of members generally in the discharge of their responsibilities as members of this house. Like the weather, the shortcomings of politicians provide a never-ending subject for discussion, and we receive selective treatment from time to time in that many feel there is not that degree of application which there should be with respect to the responsibilities of our official positions. With that viewpoint I entirely disagree. I know there are exceptions to every rule, but I know of no other group of public servants or people generally who more diligently and honestly devote themselves to the discharge of the work that is theirs in the interests of the public welfare. In saying this I believe, however difficult and trying it is for those who devote themselves with earnest application to the problems which come before the house and in committees, that the time has now come to make this motion.

The legislative program as forecast in the speech from the throne has not been entirely carried out. In addition to those matters which are already on the order paper there are a number of matters which are in process of being made ready for placement on the order paper. There are therefore quite a number of matters which still require to be considered. I would be the last to in any way endeavour to unduly activate members into getting on with the business, but I feel that the committees to which assignments of estimates have been made should make a special effort to report on their examination of such estimates at the earliest possible date, so those estimates may receive the further consideration of the committee of the whole house.

It has been suggested by a number that it might be a good idea to adjourn until the fall. I feel that generally speaking hon. members would like to see the business concluded before adjournment. That is the objective and the purpose of the government and, I trust, of members in general. The matters that are still to come up are of singular importance, but I feel that with the extension of the hours of sitting of the house to the degree set out in the motion, a first step will have been taken to ensure the completion of the agenda with the greatest dispatch without—and I emphasize this—in any way doing anything that will savour of pressure being applied to bring about an early end to the session.

I do believe that if this motion is passed—and I commend it to all members in all parts of the house—it will be the first step along the road to the termination of the session after the completion of the business in hand.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we of the official opposition do not intend to oppose this motion, which in its terms does not go quite as far as some of us had been led to believe it might.

We are as anxious—perhaps not as anxious as the members of the government with the additional responsibilities they have to bear—but we are as anxious as other hon. members of the house to conclude the business of the session with the least possible delay. It is true, of course, that with the number of committees now sitting, together with the work that has to be done in the house itself, a very considerable burden is imposed on all members of the house and particularly on members of the opposition groups, but I should like to reassure the leader of the house that we are not complaining about that.

One way in which the business of the house could be facilitated and, I think, expedited, would be to have it more effectively organized in advance so that we might know in advance what we are going to deal with. I recall, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite recall, the words of the former leader of the Conservative party when he sat on this side of the house as leader of the opposition, when he was accustomed to reproach the government in season and out of season, two or three times a week, because, he said, we had not organized our work properly. I commend his words to hon. gentlemen opposite at this time. If they would give us a little more advance notice of what is coming up perhaps we would be able to play an even more effective part than we do now toward expediting and facilitating the work of the House of Commons.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): We in this group intend to oppose the motion, because we feel that we have not yet begun to arrive at a point when, as the Prime Minister said, we can look toward the end of the session.

I think the job of members of parliament is to come here and to arrange the business of the house and perform their duties in such a way as to give each item the consideration that it warrants. I feel that this being the first full session of parliament since 1956, the time has not arrived when we should endeavour to speed up the session as is contemplated by this motion.

I have examined the motions that have been presented in sessions gone by which provided for an extension of the hours of sitting of this house, and I believe I am correct when I say that since the end of the war—and that is as far back as I have gone—such a motion has never been brought in during any full session of the house at as early a date as that at which the present motion is being put forward.

In 1946 almost five months of the session had gone by before a motion was brought in to extend the hours of sitting. In 1947 over five months had elapsed before such action was taken. In 1948 over seven months had gone by before such a motion was brought in. The present session is barely two months old, yet a motion to extend the hours of sitting has already been presented. In 1951 the session was almost five months old before a similar motion was presented. In 1952 four months had elapsed, in 1954 seven months had elapsed, in 1955 six months had elapsed, and in 1956 approximately six and a half months had elapsed before the motion extending the hours of sitting was brought down.

As a matter of fact I think we are a long way from the point where we can really say we see the end of the session as far as business being dealt with by the house is concerned. Almost all the estimates have still to be brought before the house. Only the estimates of the Department of Public Works have been dealt with at any length, and I do not believe that consideration of even that department's estimates is yet completed. As far as the work outlined in the speech from the throne is concerned we have barely scratched the surface. Among other things the throne speech referred to a bill of rights. I do not know if the government intends to go forward with its bill of rights, but that certainly has not been brought before us.

The throne speech forecast further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to be introduced at a later stage of the session. Such items as the construction of a railway to Great Slave lake, the provision of roads for development in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, the South Saskatchewan river project and the proposal respecting the establishment of a new agency to regulate broadcasting in Canada and to ensure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and privately owned broadcasting stations work effectively together have not been introduced. The new National Capital Act, the act to provide for cash advances, amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the Ticket of Leave Act and a number of other pieces of legislation forecast in the speech from the throne and to which I have not referred in detail have not been brought before us.

There are a great many committees of the house now sitting. Today a meeting has been called of the committee on railways, air lines and shipping to sit at 9.30 a.m., 3.30 p.m. and 8.00 p.m. A meeting of the committee on mines, forests and waters has been called for 10.30 a.m. The estimates committee is meeting at 11.00 a.m. At the very time when hon. members of this house are exceedingly busy with a great many committees that are meeting we have brought before us a motion of this kind, and still the estimates must be dealt with during this session.

I am quite prepared to work as many hours as I am able to during a given week, and I believe that is true as far as all hon. members are concerned; but I also feel that we should be given a chance to work as efficiently and effectively as possible. It would seem to me as far as the deliberations of the house and meetings of committees are concerned that five full days, starting in the morning and going through to evening sessions on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, makes a very full week.

As far as week ends are concerned, as far as Friday evening and Saturday are concerned, most hon. members spend that part of their time in preparing and briefing themselves for the work of the week ahead.

I do not think hon. members can give the estimates proper scrutiny, I do not think they can deal with legislation as carefully as it should be dealt with, if they are to be put under the kind of pressure that comes from sitting six days and four evenings a week, along with morning sittings of a great many committees of this house.

I do not understand the government putting this kind of pressure on members of the House of Commons so early in the session. Because not since 1956 have we had a full session of parliament, I think this kind of motion should have been delayed until the session had been going on for four or five months, as was the case when other similar motions have been presented during similar sessions in the past.

For many years members of parliament were paid a sessional indemnity. At that time it was assumed that a session would be short. For a short period of time members would leave their normal occupations, come to Ottawa and deal with public business. But after sessions had become much longer the whole basis of pay of members of parliament was changed. We all agreed that it was an improvement. Today members of parliament are paid each and every month of the year. I believe that step was taken to pay members on a yearly basis because it was recognized that being a member of the House of Commons is really no longer a part time job; it is a full time job, and it is the kind of job that takes between five and six and close to seven months of the year in Ottawa during a session properly to discharge the work that is put before the House of Commons.

We are opposed to this motion, Mr. Speaker, as I said, not because we expect it will mean any more work for our group—I do not see how it could—but because we feel that members of parliament generally are now working to maximum capacity, and it is the kind of pressure that makes it impossible for members to do the work of the house as they should. If after another week or two the government should bring in another motion to extend further the sittings of this house it would make a mockery of parliament itself, because how is it possible for members to do the work on committees and carry on the sittings of the house on an extended basis and still be able to say in good conscience that the work has been dispatched carefully and with consideration?

The government, along with the Leader of the Opposition, should be doing a better job of planning the work of the session itself. When this motion is dealt with and after the orders of the day are called we shall be considering a fifth supply motion. The rules in the rule book provide for six supply motions during the session. When a few years ago the number of supply motions was limited to six, it was then understood that those supply motions would be brought in periodically so that periodically throughout the session members would have the right to raise grievances before supply was granted. There will only be one further supply motion left after the one set for today has been dealt with. The whole purpose of supply motions has been abrogated and sidestepped. The rights of members to raise grievances before going into supply will be removed. That is one way in which planning has not been adequate or even within the spirit of the rules.

The rules also provide for six private members' Mondays. If we are in sight of the end of the session, as the Prime Minister says, I wonder whether it is the intention or hope that the session will end some time before all private members' Mondays have been called and that by cramming the session into a short period of time private members' days will not be proceeded with. I for one believe that these rules were placed in the rule book only after careful consideration, and I believe they should be complied with in spirit as well as in letter.

It would seem to me that the government is showing undue haste by presenting this motion for extended sittings now, by speeding up the calling of supply motions and by leaving the whole question of private members' days very much up in the air. Because we believe in a more careful and diligent study of public business, Mr. Speaker, we in this group intend to oppose the motion.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, in looking up the discussions that have taken place from time to time when motions such as this have been brought forward by the government of the day I find it has been the usual practice for the prime minister to give a detailed statement of the legislation expected from then until the end of the session. I note particularly that the Prime Minister, in his former capacity as leader of the opposition, did ask similar questions from time to time of the then prime minister.

Before the motion is put on this occasion, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would not give the house some indication of what legislation is likely to be introduced from now until the end of the session. There is no way of stating at this time how long the session is likely to last, but in view of this motion this is the beginning of the end, I think the house is entitled and will want to know what is in the mind of the government with reference to future legislation.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is arranging to get the details to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Laurier. I intend to take but a few moments on the motion to deal with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The weakness of his argument is apparent when he says that this is the type of session which should last for six or seven months. That would mean until November or December. I suggest that any such plan would be not only unwise but also unreasonable.

Let us turn our minds back to what has happened within the last 18 months. A session was held in the spring of 1957 when the former government was still in office, and a portion of the business for 1957 was completed at that time. I believe the whole 10 days were allowed for the debate on the speech from the throne. Other time was allowed for supply motions and a certain amount of time for private members' days. I do not remember the exact number of days, but all the preliminary work involved in a regular six-month session was done at that time.

Then there was the election in June and the new parliament met in October. At that time again there was a 10-day debate on the speech from the throne. We had a certain number of supply motions. We had a number of private members' days. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, this provision for six two-day supply motions and for six Mondays plus two Thursdays for private members was designed for an ordinary session of the duration of six or seven months. But we have not been in that position at all, and we are not in that position today.

The house met again on May 12, and for the third time within 15 or 16 months there was a 10-day debate on the throne speech. There have been four debates on supply motions during this present session and on only one of those was it possible to reach any agreement that the time would be shortened from two days to one.

This impossibility of arriving at an agreement on any short-cuts is the responsibility of members of the C.C.F. Today we would have been debating external affairs had the government and the official opposition been able to carry out what they wished to do, but the eight members of the C.C.F. in the corner would not agree. They would not agree to waive one of the private members' Mondays in order that we could discuss external affairs.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the minister inform the house how often the Conservative opposition used to pass up the privileges of the opposition when they sat on the other side of the house?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on many occasions we made arrangements with the government on what seemed to be a reasonable basis, just as the official opposition have been willing to do with us in this session. Here we have the situation that eight members are insisting on having far more time than that to which their numbers would entitle them, and are being absolutely unfair to the other 257 members in the house. It really amounts to obstructionist tactics.

Mr. Argue: Not according to Beauchesne.

Mr. Green: Here we have the proposal made today that this session should go on for six or seven months. I believe the vast majority of members of this House of Commons believe that their duties as members are not confined to being in Ottawa for 12 months of the year. They have an equal responsibility to be out in their constituencies meeting the people they represent and finding out what are the problems which face their people.

This procedure would be absolutely impossible if the plan put forward today by the leader of the C.C.F. were followed. This house would continue in session. There would be no adjournment for the summertime. He did not provide for any adjournment; oh, no, he said six or seven months. That takes us right into December. Then the government has the duty of calling a 1959 session probably in January, and certainly not later than early February, in order that next year's business may be done. Incidentally I may say that we hope to be able then to get the business of parliament back on the regular basis whereby work would be finished within a period of six or seven months, all the provisions for full supply motions and private members' days could be carried out and the business of the house completed in the ordinary manner.

Mr. Speaker, I have never yet known it to be possible to conclude the business of this house without sitting extra hours. That certainly was the case when we were in opposition. We did not like having to sit extra hours any more than the hon. member for Assiniboia likes it, but how many hours has the house been sitting thus far? It has been sitting 25½ hours a week. Nobody is being overworked by sitting for those hours. This proposal which the government brings forward today is to add 7½ hours, so that even if the motion is carried we will be sitting only 33 hours a week, certainly nothing about which there should be a great deal of moaning and groaning.

Mr. Winch: How about the rest of the work?

Mr. Green: I am coming to that matter.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister permit a question there?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the minister did not intend to leave the impression that members work only the number of hours indicated by him as the sitting hours of the house.

Mr. Green: If hon. members will read this motion carefully they will find that we have not interfered in any way with the work of committees. We have not touched any time when committees have been sitting. The only time we are taking is Friday evening and Saturday, so there is not the slightest interference.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I did not make my question clear.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes.

Mr. McIlraith: I gathered the impression that the minister was inadvertently doing something he did not intend to do, namely that he was creating the impression that the members work only the number of hours during which the house is in session. I am quite sure that was not his intention.

Mr. Green: I have been here a long time and I know, just as well as everybody else, that some members work hard and some members do not. That is the way things will be no matter whether we sit 24 hours a day seven days a week or whether we sit one day in seven. It is largely a matter of the conscience of the members. Some will work and some will not. This statement applies to all parties. No party has a corner or a monopoly on the workers or on the people who do not believe in working quite so hard.

Mr. Winch: So you give favours to those who do not work.

Mr. Green: If the motion should be carried and the house should sit Friday evenings and Saturdays, that time, in so far as it is possible, will be devoted to considering estimates. Until 1955 we always sat Friday evening, we always considered estimates and we always made good progress.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: I mean the former government made good progress.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister's memory is failing him.

Mr. Green: This rule was changed because the majority of the members of the House of Commons lived within a short distance of Ottawa and they wanted to go home for the week ends. Let us have no misunderstanding about that matter. I do not blame them. I would probably be the same if I lived near Ottawa. The rule was changed so that we sat from 11 o'clock to one o'clock on Friday morning, thereby taking away one day for committee sittings, and we did not sit on Friday evening. As a result members from the far west and those from the far east had to sit around here all week end, unable to do any business, because the majority of the members wished to go home.

The result, of course, was that the sessions lasted that much longer and the arrangement was unfair to those who lived a long way from Ottawa.

The government today is only asking members to sit to consider estimates on Friday nights and Saturdays; nobody is going to be hurt. If a lot of members want to go away for the week end, let them go; but I do not believe very many will do so. I believe that the sense of responsibility among the members of this house is so great that a comparatively small number would not be here to do the business of the house on Friday nights and on Saturdays in the same way they would be here on any other week day. We are not infringing on the rights of parliament. We have great respect for the rights of parliament. We have experienced in the flesh what it means to have those rights interfered with.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the conciliatory approach needed to get the business through quickly.

Mr. Green: This proposal brought forward by the government today is, I submit, a reasonable one, which I hope will be supported by the majority of the members of the house.

Business of the House

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): The Prime Minister in his introductory remarks was kind enough to say some good words about members of parliament as a group. When I heard this buttering-up, Mr. Speaker, I knew the blow was going to fall later on but I would like to do a little buttering-up myself in relation to the performance of Conservative members.

This is a new House of Commons and we have a tremendous number of new members who are receiving their initiation. There are a great many committees now meeting. One of the epithets which the Prime Minister hurled at the Liberals a few years ago was they were a collection of trained seals; in fact, I believe this term acquired the dignity of no longer being considered unparliamentary. I think with respect to the untrained seals we have at the present time, we have pretty good evidence that the performance of Conservative backbenchers both in the house and with respect to their fairly active part in committees is an improvement upon the performance of the Liberal backbenchers when the Liberals were in office.

This indicates that there has been a real interest on the part of Conservative backbenchers during this session, and I would suggest that those members are going to suffer just as much as are the members of the smaller opposition groups by the introduction of these extended hours.

I would like to raise another point, which I think is important, and that is that in my opinion the members from the far west and far east of Canada have been carrying the burden and will be doing so even more under these new hours of sitting. The Minister of Public Works can say that the members from these areas do not like to lie around here on the week ends doing nothing, but from my own observations of these members they have been the ones who to a great extent have carried the load in this House of Commons, especially on Fridays and Mondays. They look forward to a break at the week end as much as anyone else in order to do their office work, and it is always remarkable to me to find so many western and eastern members around the house on Saturdays and Sundays catching up on their work and their studying. I would say that the present motion would make their difficulties even greater.

I am particularly interested in the official opposition's attitude toward this motion. This seems to stem from the fact that in recent months there has been a good deal of castigation with respect to the Liberals by the press. They have been criticized for their poor attendance during the last session and previous sessions. This is the only explanation of which I can think for the stand announced by the Leader of the Opposition.

I would like to point out that the factors which make us object to this measure—which make us obstructionists, if you will—should be just as important to the official opposition, because it is much easier for the members on the government benches to carry on the work in committees than it is for opposition members. It has been particularly difficult for members of this group to cover all the committee work. I think the Liberals' conduct with respect to this particular motion, in consenting to go along with it rather than vote against it, can only be explained by the fact that their consciences must be bothering them and they are afraid of a renewal of comments in the press on their performance in parliament during the recent past and the amount of work carried out by them.

We have just had two election campaigns and recently a high pressure session. These provide further reasons for taking a fairly slow pace at the present time, in my opinion, because I can think of nothing more exhausting for members of parliament than election campaigns. Why increase the pressure now by means of extra hours at the end of the week?

In closing my remarks I would like to refer to some remarks of Hon. George Drew when he was a member of the opposition in this house with respect to this particular point. The Minister of Finance discovered last year, when he mentioned to the house the tremendous number of hours he was working, that he got scant sympathy from the house and from the country. We get very little sympathy by telling people how hard we work. I do not want to express either personally or on behalf of this group or on behalf of members of the house any similar complaint, but these are the words of Mr. Drew which I would like to leave with hon. members for their consideration. On January 2, 1955, as quoted at page 4344 of Hansard, Mr. Drew said on a motion to extend the hours of the house the following:

> I do not think it is in the interests of parliament to convey to the public the idea that we are prepared to accept hours which will deny appropriate attention to public business merely in an effort to get out of here by the end of June.

If I might interject, it seems that this is what the Minister of Public Works implies; that we could not possibly stay here until the end of November or December but that we must get out of here as quickly as possible.

> If the public business demands that we stay longer, let us stay longer.

And this is the point I wanted to emphasize:

> Let us make sure, however, that we follow a course that is within both the physical and mental capacity of hon. members, having regard to the immense amount of work still before us. Let us also be sure that we do not disregard the impression that would be conveyed by a very sparse attendance while billions of dollars of public funds are being voted.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has built quite a reputation over the past couple of years as the champion of the rights of parliament. In fact I believe he has built up for himself the reputation of being the very symbol of the rights of parliament in this country. We therefore find it very difficult to reconcile that picture with the motion now before us. He has for long maintained that the most important thing in parliament is that the opposition should have the opportunity and privilege of functioning properly, in fact that parliament must always be ensured of such an opportunity.

While on this side of the house the Prime Minister on many occasions pointed out that the proper functioning of parliament depended just as much upon Her Majesty's loyal opposition as it did on the government itself, if not more. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, though he did hedge round the question as to just how many times the Conservative opposition passed up their rights, would find, if he took the trouble to look through Hansard, that it is not very often that members of the Conservative party when they sat on this side of the house left any stone unturned to ensure that their opposition was a vigorous one and was going to do a job. Actually the duty of the opposition is not only a privilege; it is a duty. The opposition is duty bound, by the form of government we have, to study, examine and criticize proposed legislation and to suggest any alternatives to government legislation which is introduced in the house.

We have at the present time the smallest opposition we have ever had and certainly this is a time, if ever there was a time, when the privileges of the opposition should be protected with great care. I have noticed several occasions during this very session when this house has been divided on a question and when there were more than enough government members missing on a vote to have outvoted the combined opposition if we were all present. And this is only in the short period during which we have been sitting so far. What will happen from now on if we are going to have to sit Friday nights and Saturdays is anyone's guess, but the fact remains that half or three-quarters of those on the government's side can take their week ends off, but not so the members of the opposition. If we are going to do the job which it is within our power to do and which we are in duty bound to do, we are going to have to attend in the future, as we have attended in the past.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia, this is the earliest time in any session on record, I believe, that such a motion has been introduced into the house. I wonder if it is only pure coincidence that the earliest record of such a motion coincides with the greatest government majority that has ever been seen in the parliament of Canada. We feel there is no need of this motion at the present time. There may be need of it in the future, and if a time comes when it is needed, that will be another matter. But we feel that at the present time it constitutes an imposition on the opposition which they are physically incapable of meeting. I note that at the present time we have to try to go 30 hours a day in order to try to get 24 hours in, and with this in mind, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), I should like to move the following motion:

That the resolution be amended by eliminating the words "and Saturday", and by eliminating all the words after "10.00 p.m." up to and including the words "Thursday (government day); and", and also by eliminating the words "2(1) and".

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to alter the motion by eliminating the provision for Saturday sittings. I listened to the Minister of Public Works with great interest, and I was somewhat dismayed at the attitude he seemed to take. I can remember the Minister of Public Works of old when he fought very tenaciously to protect every right enjoyed by hon. members under the rules. This attitude seems to have changed and, speaking in the house today, and referring to the 10 days taken in discussing the speech from the throne in 1946, 1956 and 1957 and in the session earlier this year, he said that 10 days were allowed, as though the government were in charge of the time provided for discussion of the speech from the throne. The minister went on to say that he had found in talking with the C.C.F. that there was no possibility of arriving at a short-cut. I do not think it is our job to arrive at short-cuts. I do not think that is the duty we have in this house. And the minister said, after we had failed to agree with the requests which would remove on a temporary basis our rights as provided under the rules, that members of the C.C.F. group wanted more time than our numbers entitled us to have.

Some hon. Members: Isn't that true?

Mr. Argue: The rule book of this house applies to every hon. member with equal effect, and all we have been asking the government to do—

Mr. Cardiff: Do you feel that all members of this house are not getting an equal opportunity?

Business of the House

Mr. Argue: All members of this house have an equal opportunity until the government starts using its majority and cracking the whip in order to take away those rights. As a matter of fact, in asking that private members' Mondays be maintained members of this group are asking that the rights of the Conservative backbenchers, who have most of the motions, should be protected.

An hon. Member: We will look after ourselves.

Mr. Argue: We have rights under the rules, as have all members of this house, and I do not feel that the Minister of Public Works should talk about hon. members being allowed 10 days for the debate on the address.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? Surely he realizes that in making a statement of that kind he is being very unfair. All I pointed out was that there have been three debates on the address within the last 18 months, each involving 10 days—allowed by the rules.

Mr. Argue: All right, we have got it amended now, it is allowed by the rules. But in each case where there was a debate on the address there was a different government in power. Since when does a debate on the address during one session have any bearing at all on the number of days used in a debate on the speech from the throne in another session? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) contends that because in the last couple of years there have been three debates of this kind, that constitutes something of a background statement which would entitle the government to consider that this session is something of an extraordinary session. I repeat the statement I made earlier that this is a regular session of parliament, that we have before us the whole of the estimates, and that, as the first session in a new parliament, it should be the attitude of the government to co-operate in every way possible to allow full discussion and to allow the full time provided under the rules for both private members' Mondays and for motions on going into supply, and with regard to all the other rights of the House of Commons. I can tell the Minister of Public Works that we intend to resist at every stage—certainly during what we consider to be the early part of the session—any move that would make it more difficult for hon. members to accomplish all their duties.

We do not agree that this is an extraordinary type of session, that it should be a short session or one which should be wrapped up quickly, nor do we agree that only two months after the session has started this kind of move for the extension of sittings should be brought in. We say that the rule book is clear on the subject. It provides for a certain number of supply motions, a certain number of private members' Mondays and certain hours of sitting of this house. On the basis of the practice in the past we believe that the provisions in the rule book are such that they should be upheld and changes should not be forced on the house at this very early stage.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to say that we do not feel we can support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin). The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) expressed certain surprise that the official opposition did not take the same line he was taking in his speech. I suggest that perhaps the reason the official opposition did not take the same line as the hon. member for Port Arthur is that the official opposition has had the experience and the responsibility of carrying on the government of this country and expects to have it again, and that one's attitude to the deliberations of this house and to the work of parliament is unquestionably affected by considerations of that kind.

If the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) had carried out the intention that we understood the government originally had to take away the time in the mornings on ordinary sitting days and thereby interfere with the deliberations of committees—and I think with my leader that there are too many committees trying to sit at once at the present time for the efficient operation of parliament—we would have joined with our friends to my right and to your left, Mr. Speaker, in resisting this motion but I do not think they have made out a case for refusing to sit on Saturdays.

I agree with the leader of the house—and this is about the only respect in which I do agree with what he said—that we should spend some time in our constituencies if we hope to represent our constituents properly in this parliament. I feel that if by sitting on Saturdays we can dispose of some of the estimates of some of the departments we are justified in doing this. But I do not feel it is any reflection on parliament if every one of the 265 members is not present when the estimates of each of the departments—for instance, the Department of Fisheries—are being considered. I simply give that as an illustration and I consider that as important a department of government as there is.

If we are going to do our duty in this parliament that does not mean all of us have to be in our places in committee of supply when the estimates of every department are under consideration. There has to be some division of labour, and I use the term in the classical sense. It seems to me perfectly proper for the house to sit on Saturdays, at this stage of the session, in order to consider estimates. I would hope that the government would not attempt to do anything else but take up estimates on Saturdays, because to attempt to proceed with legislation on Saturdays would be an abuse of what the government is asking us to do. For the purpose of taking up the estimates it does not seem to me that a case has been made against the proposal of the government.

I must say there was one other thing with which I agree in what the leader of the house said and that was his indirect and implicit commendation of the way in which Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Harris conducted the business of this house when they had charge of the leadership of the house. If the hon. member will look at the comments he made regarding the first session of 1957 he will see that he paid them a high compliment, but I am afraid I cannot reciprocate. It seems to me that the leader of the house is still, in spirit, on this side of the house. He is far too provocative. He does everything possible to obstruct the business of the government. As a very young member to a very old member I would suggest to him that he try to get through his head that he has won two elections and that he now sits on the government side of the house and is the leader of the house and therefore he should attempt to be conciliatory if he wants to get the arrangements of the house made in a fashion to expedite business—

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have the floor, sir.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? Does he mean I should give him some of the public works projects he listed recently?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, sir, my mind does not move in the same way in which the hon. gentleman's mind moves. I was merely talking about the arrangements of the business of the house. I would not feel that there need to be any mixing up of the consideration of the matters before the house and the business of the house. It does seem to me we would be a lot better off in this house if we had a little more conciliation, a trifle more planning and order and somewhat more forethought about the arrangements of business for the house than has been the case. I say again—somewhat reluctantly because while I admit I am new in opposition I would like to oppose the government—it does seem to me that, on this particular occasion, there is sound justification for asking the house to sit on Saturdays.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I too, would like to be able to return to my constituency. I too, would like the opportunity of seeing my wife, my three children and my five grandchildren. I stood as a candidate for election as a member of the House of Commons of Canada to deal with policies, revenue, expenditure and law. I rather anticipate, if I know my constituents at all—and I think I do—that those who sent me down here expect me, when I rise to my feet in this house or when I speak in committees, to have some knowledge of what is before the committee or before the house for discussion.

Mr. Pallett: You had better get to work, then.

Mr. Winch: It has already been pointed out by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) the number of hours the House of Commons sits. Although it has not been elaborated upon it has also been indicated that many hon. members of the house spend a considerable length of time each week attending committee meetings, too. It is possible, of course, to speak on issues that are before the house or committees without research, study or consideration but that is not the practice of hon. members in this group nor will it ever be. In addition, and especially if you happen to be like many of us, hon. members representing constituencies 3,000 miles from Ottawa, there is a great deal of correspondence all of which must be dealt with. Also, there is a great deal of research that must be undertaken when the government brings in a bill or a motion. As far as we in this group are concerned, we want to study the proposals, analyse them, do research on them and come prepared either to the House of Commons or to one of the committees knowing what we are talking about. I think we have a pretty darn good record in that regard, too. However, all of this requires time.

I know that this past week end the work, memoranda, correspondence and reports were so piled up in my office that I got up at five o'clock on Saturday morning in order to clear my desk.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: I know that many of you were at home but in order to catch up with my work I had to get up very early and work very late.

I think it is only reasonable and logical, as was pointed out by a member of the official opposition a few moments ago, to say that there is a great deal of work to be done outside of the House of Commons, if we are to accept our responsibility, but we have not the time to do it. There is a limit to what members can do; but even beyond that there is something that should never be forgotten by an elected member and that is this. We are making laws, changing laws or rescinding laws. Because we deal with questions that mean so much in the way of taxation and the expenditure of money—and do not forget it is going to be around $6 billion this year—we should be in a position where we can do that work not only expeditiously but efficiently and with cool, calm deliberation and with a full knowledge of exactly what it is we are doing.

It is for that primary purpose that I oppose the motion which we are now discussing and which was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). In addition, Mr. Speaker, I cannot take my seat without adding a comment on the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green). The amazing change which has come over my hon. friend—and he has been my friend for 25 years—passes my comprehension.

Mr. Green: For the better, I hope.

Mr. Winch: No; I am afraid, sir, you have come down the ladder of my estimation. We all know—we do not have to repeat it—the stand he and his colleagues took in opposition and how different it is now. I just want to comment on one phase of his argument, namely his presentation regarding the rights that private members have enjoyed, and the fact that he does not think the government is asking too much now to have a change made in the standing orders. Through you, Mr. Speaker, because you were also here, I want to remind him of the hours, the days and the weeks, and I think I can say the months, that a select standing committee of this house spent on the revision of the standing orders. The committee was finally able to come to conclusions and bring in recommendations at a session of a previous parliament. The changes made in the standing orders were of such a nature as to expedite government business and to guarantee the time and rights of private members. I was here, Mr. Speaker, when that report was brought in and I heard all the debate. I recall how often it was pointed out that although some of the previous rights of private members were to be given over to government business for the expedition of government business, that in the standing orders there was the protection of the rights of private members.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, was one of the strongest advocates of, and always insisted on, the rights of private members and the fact that they were spelled out in the standing orders. Yet, now that he and others have crossed the floor they have forgotten a great deal about the protection of the rights of private members through the medium of the standing orders and exactly why the standing orders read the way they do. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) that no matter how small a group may be the rights and privileges of private members are the rights and privileges of all members except those of the cabinet. If we look over the order paper, as was pointed out, I repeat, by the hon. member for Assiniboia, we see that the majority of the items that appear under private members' names appear under the names of private members from the government side of the house.

I think they are honest, as I hope they know I am honest. They did not place their motions or their bills on the order paper just for fun. They really were interested in what they had in mind; they really wanted something done so they put their motions on the order paper intending that they should be discussed.

We in this group go over every resolution and every bill to study it and to reach a decision and we believe that we—it may seem strange—are rising in our places this afternoon and fighting on behalf of the rights of private members on the government side so that they may have an opportunity to discuss the things that they thought important enough from their point of view and their constituencies' points of view to place on the order paper of the House of Commons.

Mr. Flynn: You don't give us a chance; you take up all the time.

Mr. Winch: I am speaking now on the comment of the Minister of Public Works. That is why we say in the first instance he should not expect any group or any member in this house to agree to a further curtailment of the time allotted to private members in a regular session of the House of Commons. And also—and I am quite certain of it because I know of the hours the Minister of Public Works puts in in the preparation of any statement that he makes—all members should have the time and the opportunity completely to study anything which is on the order paper of the House of Commons.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, looking at it from every conceivable angle, if we as members of the House of Commons are to fulfil the responsibilities which are ours as members of the House of Commons in a logical and a reasonable manner, then at this time the sittings of the House of Commons itself should not be further extended. I am certain that after what I have said the Minister of Public Works will revert to his former sanity and withdraw the motion.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Repetition.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Don't be impatient.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, in view of the concern the Prime Minister showed a few weeks ago when he mentioned the fact that the opposition was small—and frankly I did not know until today how small it was. We evidently have lost what we considered to be the official opposition. They have deserted us; they have deserted the position that traditionally they are supposed to fill. I would not be surprised today to see again an amendment similar to the one which was moved in the last session asking the government to trade seats with them and they will run the government because the government is running the country the same way that they would. The Prime Minister did mention the fact that there was a small group in the opposition and wherever possible he was going to facilitate the operations of that small minority, he was going to give the opposition rights and he was going to protect those rights because obviously steamroller tactics could be used any time the government wished the steamroller to go into operation. We do not need closure motions. These are the same type of motions.

I am perfectly well aware of the physical capabilities of members of parliament. If the other members are doing the same amount of work that the C.C.F. group are doing—and I am quite sure they are—then they are going to be hard-pressed to do anything outside of the House of Commons in the way of handling the work that the Minister of Public Works thinks is necessary in their own ridings because they are going to be here doing all their homework on Sundays and burning the midnight oil at night as well.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Peters: I have no intention of sitting down until I finish what I wish to say and I think a little courtesy would do a lot of people a great deal of good. Parliament has only been in session for two months. It is true that the opposition as a whole may be inefficient but that is because some members of the opposition do not want to function as they should. None the less, this group intends to do so and I am certain that government members in their committee work are doing a good job of criticizing, examining and giving consideration to things about which they do not know much because this is their first session. There are many of us who do not know too much about these things but I have been very pleased with the interest taken in government by the government backbenchers and those of other parties.

The government is going to be in power for a number of years. This session should not be short like the last session when there was some justification for getting out on the hustings and having another election. We have not got that excuse this year and if we are going to draw a yearly salary we should at least do the work we are supposed to do and give it the consideration it deserves.

Something has been said about the matter of going home and that some members are now doing that. It is quite true that some will still be able to do so. The man who is representing me in Russell where I am living at the present time will be able to go home every night if he wishes to do so. But a great number of members who were able to go home on week ends will not be able to now if they only have Sunday off. I might point out that there has not been a vote in this session when there were not more Conservatives absent than the total opposition combined, and that will probably be the case today.

Mr. Pallett: That statement is completely inaccurate.

Mr. Peters: Therefore it appears to me that we who have the job of criticizing and examining are now doing as much work as we are capable of doing and by adding another day the government is just adding the straw that will break the back of the camel. In my opinion the additional day will only create an additional burden for the opposition because if opposition members continue to do the work they must do they will be incapable of bearing the load.

I think the government should take a look at what one of their former leaders said about this matter. I understand he was much more interested in the sessions of the house than some other people. As found at page 1712 of Hansard for December 10, 1951, the Hon. George Drew had this to say with respect to a similar motion:

> I believe that it is immensely important that the time of our sitting remain as it is so that hon. members who attend committees may also have an opportunity to sit in the house.

There is no motion yet to sit in the mornings but the Prime Minister did not say it was not going to happen next week. Mr. Drew went on to say:

> A number of the committees are still sitting and these are all important committees. There is the committee on defence expenditures; there is the committee on radio; there are committees on other matters, and I think hon. members should still attach some importance to public accounts, which committee is still sitting.

We are in the same position today with the exception that the public accounts committee has not even started to sit. This is a little bit like a convention where if you have a whole lot of important business left over at the end you pass the necessary motions on the last day and start off on the next year. Mr. Drew went on to say:

> There cannot be that attention to the work of these committees and also attention to the business of the house that the nature of the work of the house justifies if this motion is adopted. I urge strongly that it should not be adopted and that we continue to meet at the hours that have been set. There is another reason. I think members of this house should be given an opportunity to digest the reports in order to be able to present their views thereon. It is perfectly clear at the moment that they will not have the slightest chance to examine these reports and express their opinion if this course is followed. Therefore I oppose the motion and I hope that it will not pass.

Frankly I would not object if he were here to make the same speech again today. I think he would probably agree with the position that we have taken.

I suggest that possibly one of the reasons the motion is being introduced is because of the rumblings on the part of many government backbenchers who object to the fact that the members of the C.C.F. group have the opportunity to speak when they wish. I suggest that the backbenchers of all parties have a contribution to make as great as or at least equal to that of some of the government frontbenchers and that there is an obligation upon them to do so. If this motion, as it appears to be, is just a method of giving some members a holiday in the middle of the summer, then rather than this motion being moved there should have been a motion for a recess of six weeks in the hot part of the summer. We could then come back here and do the work we were elected to do no matter how long it took.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as one of the private members on the government side I want to thank the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) for purporting to speak for us, but may I assure you, sir, that no one has less conception of what is in our minds at the present time, as evidenced by the thoughts he so eloquently expressed. The private members on the government side of the house have one thought which has been uppermost in their minds.

[Mr. Peters.]

An hon. Member: To get back to your law practice.

Mr. Walker: That thought is, how long, oh Lord, how long, can one tolerate this repetitious guff we hear from the members of the C.C.F. group?

Mr. Argue: You sound like C. D. Howe.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member purports to speak for us, but what have the members of that group said and what have they done?

An hon. Member: Ask the voters.

Mr. Walker: We will tell the voters. I suggest to you, sir, that they should realize that work does not mean talk. They mistake talk for work. Unfortunately that is about all they have been capable of doing so far. Their contributions to the debates of the house, if you examine them, Mr. Speaker, are practically negative, devoid of any ideas, devoid of any assistance, devoid of any original thoughts, devoid of any constructive criticism.

Mr. Winch: How jealous can you get?

Mr. Walker: I speak now of all the members of the C.C.F. group. I wish to assure the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) that he is the last person in the world of whom I would be jealous. May I say further that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who has that high sounding title, leader of the C.C.F. group, although it is really no longer a group but a very small rump, should realize—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: I suggest that you go back to the boiler room instead of interrupting me. May I suggest that this group of eight represents the vanished pomp of yesterday and that all the indulgence they are getting from the government is because of the insistence of the government that it will never be said of them that everybody did not have a fair chance. Even in this debate today four members of the C.C.F. group, or 50 per cent, have already spoken without interruption. Should the private members on the government side have the same chance, 104 of us would have the opportunity to speak and we would not be through at the end of August. We would be here a year from now.

Mr. Winch: Why don't they get up?

Mr. Walker: Because you do not give us an opportunity, because you talk all the time.

Mr. Winch: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the insult to Your Honour be withdrawn because it is you who recognizes speakers in the house.

Mr. Walker: My friend is quite right. I am speaking of the members of the C.C.F. group, and not yourself, Mr. Speaker, because no one knows better than I the contribution you have made to the house. When are we going to have an end of such conduct on the part of this group? We want them to have full scope. I have not said anything in the hope that they would soon desist. All we hear from them is whining, complaining, tearing apart, talk and more talk. We would not mind, Mr. Speaker, if this group represented something but they are neither socialists nor capitalists nor free traders nor protectionists. They do not represent anything. They represent, as I said, the vanished pomp of yesterday. The reason their numbers diminished in the last election from 25 to 8 is that they represent nothing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is getting a little away from the amendment.

Mr. Walker: Speaking to the amendment, Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully suggest that the eight of them should take a little "think" to themselves and ask themselves whether 257 others can be wrong and only this group of eight can be in step. Mr. Speaker, it is a travesty of the rules of this house that this group, many of them speaking without knowledge and without background, should continue to block the efforts of this house to clean up the business of Canada in the conscientious manner which it so greatly deserves.

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention to participate in this debate and would not have done so but for the reference made on my behalf by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who is one of my constituents during the session. I am sure that he is a good and intelligent member, and I am sure that if he lives in Russell for the next four years he will become a Liberal. I am not so satisfied with some of my colleagues from the west and from the east who say that members from around Ottawa are sitting less than are other members who are far away. I defy anyone from the C.C.F. party or anyone from the other party to say that he has done more work and has spent more time for his people, in this house and out of the house, than I have during the 13 years that I have been here.

I have 96,000 people in my riding. We have every kind of organization meeting, on an average of one a day, and I contribute to most of them. I contribute as a member should, to fulfil my duty. I am very pleased to do it, but it takes half of my indemnity for that purpose. Hon. members who are far away have only to answer a few letters, and tell their constituents that they cannot be in their ridings. This is about all that it costs you, and many of you ask for free airplane transportation. Many of you are lucky that you cannot go home to your riding. Do not try to fool us. I do not go home every night, my good friend. I have lived in Ottawa since I became a member. I go home once in a while, sometimes every two weeks. I have never lost more than two or three days during a session, and I have received and seen over 1,500 of my electors yearly.

I do not care how long we sit. When I first came here, we were sitting up until 11 o'clock or until 12 o'clock. I do not care how long we sit as long as the business is well done. I understand that we are a small group in the opposition—something which is too bad. The people misunderstood us the last time. I hope that they will understand us better the next time. I will sit here from any hour of the morning until any hour at night, and I am glad to do so in order to do our job properly. But let us not have committees sitting when the house is sitting in the morning because we cannot be here and attend the committees at the same time, as we are a small group in the opposition. I say to the C.C.F. that we do not need them to make an intelligent opposition. We have done it up to now and we are able to do it any time. We will do it in a constructive way in order to protect the Canadian people against too much bad administration by the government. Let us keep on working.

Mr. Peters: I rise on a question of privilege. I only made reference to the hon. gentleman as his riding is right on the edge of Ottawa and I am living there. If he does not live in that area, I owe him an apology.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister if he is able to tell the house now what the legislative program is from now until the end of the session?

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks he will close the debate.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I did not originally intend to take part in this discussion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Relax. Take it easy. All that moaning and groaning reminds me of the braying of a herd of asses.

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a comment or two very briefly and to express my gratitude to the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) for being kind and gracious enough to tolerate us in this place and to express my appreciation at the indulgence of the government in even allowing us to be here. We appreciate the fact that the hon. member does let us come into this chamber occasionally and participate in these debates. I do not know whether he is familiar with the fact that the rules of parliament as they apply to every private member are the same; parliamentary rights are set out in the rules developed over many years of parliamentary government in Great Britain and in this country, and if the hon. member is not familiar with them I suggest he should consult with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who will bring him up to date regarding the rules and procedure. I should also like to remind the hon. member that the road to dictatorship is paved with intolerance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena will recall that I interrupted the hon. member for Rosedale when I thought he was going in the wrong direction. I hope I will not have to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: I, too, hope you will not have to interrupt me, Mr. Speaker, but I was merely trying to get the same distance along that road as had the hon. member for Rosedale. The hon. member for Rosedale may know—and this is on a little path not actually irrelevant to the motion—that in British Columbia in 1941 we saw a direct coalition entered into between the Liberal and Conservative parties which lasted for some years. Here, of course, we have a different situation existing, a situation in which we have an indirect coalition, and as a member of the unofficial and effective opposition I should like to express also my thanks to the Prime Minister for mentioning in his introductory remarks the number of items indicated in the speech from the throne which have not yet been presented in the house. This has been discussed in detail by other hon. members, but I would point out that the items mentioned in the speech from the throne with regard to which no details have been given are the ones which will probably be the most important to come before this parliament during this particular session, and there appears to be no need for rushing, hurrying and scurrying into consideration of these items. Haste makes waste, as you know, Mr. Speaker, and in my opinion this is nothing more than an attempt to legislate by exhaustion by holding back the main pieces of legislation until the end of the session when adequate and proper consideration cannot be given to them. By taking such action the government will not get good legislation.

The obvious conclusion we reach, regardless of the smoke screen which was spread over this issue by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green)—and he is quite adept at doing this on any and every occasion—is that we have to rush into this legislative program not because we have a special situation arising out of two elections in a year, or arising out of an incomplete session prior to the election last year, or in minority government and so on, but because of the obvious frustration and restlessness that exists among the government's backbenchers. I know many of these private members personally, and have spoken with them, and they have indicated that they are frustrated—that they are restless—that they do not like being here because there is relatively little for them to do. So they want to get it over and go back to their law practices, or whatever it is, or rush back, as is right, to their constituencies to spend all the time possible at home, which we would all like to do. Obviously the Prime Minister is giving in now to this pressure from his backbenchers. I wish he had not done it so early in the session.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I intend to oppose the motion proposed by the Prime Minister and I should like to state several reasons why. The leader of the house has accused us of being unfair to other members of this house. I feel that when the leader of the house placed on record the fact that this house was sitting presently for only 25½ hours a week that he, unintentionally, was most unfair to all members of this house, because the minister, on reflection, will concede that the newspapers would love to headline the fact that some members of parliament object to working for more than what he calls a 25½ hour-week. I feel that if there was any unfairness this afternoon it was this calling to public attention the records of Hansard and the fact that this house sits for 25½ hours a week, when the minister himself is quite aware, from his many years of experience, that there is no such thing as a 40-hour week, a 50-hour week or even a 60-hour week for conscientious members of parliament who must work even longer hours than that.

Mr. Speaker, we in this group attempt to be fair to ourselves, to our responsibilities and to the problems that confront this parliament and the government of Canada. I have in mind at this time especially the very serious problem to which practically no attention has yet been given during this session and that is the problem of heavy unemployment in the middle of the summer. I realize that not all hon. members find it necessary to spend an equal number of hours in their work as members of this house and it may well be that the hon. gentlemen in that party which has an overwhelming majority in the house may find it difficult indeed to work 60 hours a week. They may find that they like to—in the minister's words—go home for the week end.

I feel that the minister was further slightly unkind when he indicated that hon. members did not—to use his words again—like to sit around here. I presume he meant on week ends. I can assure him that there is not very much sitting around here on week ends; instead, there is a great deal of working around here on week ends and if the minister's memory is that short it might do him some good for him to be in the house on a week end and observe the many hon. members who are working.

This afternoon we have had a perfect example of the old policy between the government and the official opposition of "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours". The desire to get out of the house and have done with the session seems to be shared by members of both the larger parties.

At this time I wish to enter a plea on behalf of a group other than ourselves. We all know what the regulations are and when the house sits on Saturdays the employees of the house must also work on that day. If this resolution receives the endorsation of the house—and I hope it will not—I trust some arrangement will be made whereby the employees will be assured of the continuation of the five-day week which they have enjoyed for the past several months. I feel that it is most unfair to expect these employees to work a six-day week merely to please our convenience so that we can have done with the session at as early a date as possible.

Business of the House

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) outlined a little of the history of the last several sessions of parliament. However, I should like to remind him that almost for the past two years this house has been largely engaged in political squabbles laying the groundwork for the election battles and not too much attention has been paid to the business of parliament. To illustrate what I mean one has only to think back and realize that this parliament did not complete the estimates for the year 1957-58. Indications are that we may have a difficult time indeed, if the wishes of many hon. members should prevail, finishing a consideration of the estimates of 1958-59. One of the most ancient rights and privileges of a people's parliament is for political purposes and now apparently for the sake of expediency to be shortened.

The public accounts committee has been constituted and as a member of it I have yet to receive notice of its first meeting. If the Liberals and Conservatives cannot agree as to who ought to be chairman I suggest that the government approach my leader with a view to inquiring if our group would consider appointing a chairman for the committee in order that we could get on with the business of the country. Some reality might be given to the much publicized role the public accounts committee would play under a Conservative regime. The select committee on broadcasting about which we heard so much in the speech from the throne has not yet been appointed to my knowledge.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) listed many pieces of legislation which were forecast in the speech from the throne but he omitted many of them which I intend to enumerate at this time. It was indicated in the throne speech that the government would attend the commonwealth trade and economic conference. Surely the parliament of Canada should be given an opportunity to express its views in this regard before that conference is held. The throne speech forecast an acceleration of useful public works projects designed to sustain employment but we have yet to hear of this accelerated public works program. It also forecast a public investment program but outside of the South Saskatchewan river dam nothing more has been heard. We in British Columbia were particularly awaiting some announcement of legislation by which means our province could participate in this program and I refer particularly to the Columbia river project but nothing more has been heard.

Forecasts were made of the extension of airports and air bases but we have heard nothing more of this. Mention was made in the budget as well as in the speech from the throne of amendments to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act but we have yet to see that legislation introduced. We were assured that amendments to the Financial Administration Act would be brought in but nothing has been done in this respect. We were assured by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that the House of Commons would be given an ample opportunity to discuss the government's use of warrants but no time has been allowed for such a discussion.

In conclusion I wish to offer the proposition that there is nothing so horrible in the thought of the House of Commons sitting, as the Minister of Public Works said, until November or even December. I believe that the people of Canada have the right to expect that we sit for as long as it is necessary to attend to the affairs of the greatest and hugest enterprise in Canada, the government and the business of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) made a statement to the effect that backbenchers in the Conservative party were frustrated. This is absolutely untrue and there is no frustration in our midst. We are quite prepared to sit here for five or even six days a week or as long as is necessary in order to carry on the business of this house. But what we are not content to do is to sit here and listen to the yak, yak, yak of the C.C.F. members in the far corner of this house. Hon. members of the C.C.F. would do well to remember that 17 of their members talked themselves out of this house in the last election and if they keep on the way they are going at the present time they will be completely annihilated in the next election, so let us hear no more from them in this respect.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to add to the festival that has taken place here this afternoon. Certain hon. gentlemen have reviewed the needs of parliament, the democratic system, the preservation of parliamentary rights and the necessity of having the legislative program passed by parliament. It is because we want to accomplish this that we have asked for the extension of the time within which this house will sit to the end that we may deal efficiently and effectively with the very large portion of the legislative program that still remains. There are, however, some hon. gentlemen who believe that instead of having the division of labour which was referred to by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), their contribution to the solution of the problems that confront parliament is best determined by each of them saying the same thing over and over again. They choose to do this instead of having one or another of their members efficiently organized to the end that a full and proper discussion will take place.

Repetitious utterances, sir, do not solve problems or assist in their solution. I suggest to certain gentlemen who have spoken that possibly if they were better organized and those extra hours that they work had been devoted to allocating among members of their group responsibility to speak in respect of those subjects which they have studied more carefully than others, the business of parliament would be expedited and a considerable step taken toward making this house a place in which the determination of problems is on the basis of contributions rather than on measurement of the length of time taken by any of them on discussion and repetition.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked me to outline in general what will be brought before the house. I can do no better than refer to the speech from the throne. In it is contained the legislative program that we intend to bring before the house. It is because of the fact that so far the debates have been mainly on the speech from the throne and the budget, and not wishing to transgress the rights of private members to express themselves, the time has come, unless the House of Commons is to become the place in which the definition of eternity will be found, when we must act to the end that longer days, longer periods of sitting, will have to take place if we are to discharge our responsibility. That is why this preliminary motion is moved. It is not the complete picture, but at the moment committees are meeting. Because committees are meeting, and in an endeavour not to prevent those committees from completing their responsibilities, the extension is within the limited scope of this motion.

In so far as the legislative program is concerned, in addition to those things that appear in the speech from the throne, I might say that having regard to agricultural conditions on the prairies some further action is being considered by the government which, if determined in the affirmative, will require further legislation. So far as the Saskatchewan dam is concerned, the last word I have this afternoon is that the difficulties arising out of discussions by both sides have all but been resolved and my hope is that an agreement will be signed by this government and the government of Saskatchewan which will, of course, necessitate legislation at this session of parliament to implement it.

Farther than that I do not intend to go. I do believe in the rights of parliament. Those rights shall be undiminished. That is the attitude of this government and that is the stand I outlined in the first speech I made in this house. But, sir, the legislative program must come before the house. If the normal hours at this period, in the passage of time since the speech from the throne, are insufficient, then there is only one way to proceed and that is the way we are following, the preliminary step, the minimum extension but not morning sittings, to the end that we shall be able to bring about a solution of our problems through the necessary legislative action.

Some speak about the rights of parliament. All I say is that these rights will be maintained. But at the rate the discussions are taking place here, where a few members believe that in order to show that they are making a contribution each says the same thing over and over again, the only way in which that can be met is to extend the time so that hon. members will have an opportunity to consider the matters that are of particular importance, as set out in the speech from the throne. Our objective is not to prevent members from talking; it is to extend the opportunity for that purpose. Instead of in any way interfering with members having the right to express themselves, I feel that the extension of time will enlarge those rights and I hope that ultimately in the process of time we will be able to have the legislative enactments on the order paper, not only placed before parliament but also passed by the house in its wisdom.

The program that we have is an important one. It has not been considered as yet with that degree of application on the part of all of us that I want to see, and I hope that when this motion is passed, if the house passes it, as I hope it will, we shall be able to make much progress because the work has been organized by the government. We are ready. Our legislative program is set out. The legislation is ready. We are now asking the House of Commons to proceed to consider that legislation and, I hope, to pass it.

My hon. friends talk about the house sitting until November or December. It is all very interesting. They speak disparagingly of others who have some responsibility. I hope the time never comes when we elect to the House of Commons only those who desire to spend 12 months a year here. I hope that we shall continue in the tradition of good parliamentary government and not prevent those who can serve this country from serving because through unnecessary repetition we make it impossible to command and mobilize the candidature of those who can be induced to sit in the House of Commons, as many now sit, who, if they found that it was a 12-months job, would be unable to make their contribution to the building of a better Canada and the attainment of a better legislative program.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the main motion. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion agreed to on division.

FINANCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONVERSION LOAN

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have an important announcement to make relating to our public debt operations. Today we are embarking upon the largest and I believe the most constructive financial operation in the history of Canada, of the successful outcome of which I am fully confident.

Hon. members are aware of the general background. In my budget speech four weeks ago I informed the house and the country in some detail of our financial requirements during the coming year. I stated then that in order to carry out our approved program in the fields of both economic capital development and social welfare we would require some $1,400 million of new money during this fiscal year, in addition to providing for the refunding of nearly $2,000 million of maturing bonds. This, as I said at that time, is a formidable task.

We must also look beyond the immediate needs of this fiscal year. During the next few years there will mature in quick succession the whole of the remaining wartime victory loans. The total amount of the five victory loans falling due between now and 1966 is over $6,400 million. This is a very large sum and it constitutes more than 60 per cent of our outstanding funded debt, excluding the special categories of Canada savings bonds and treasury bills.

This large volume of early maturities overhanging the market has made it very difficult to plan an orderly program of debt management and has contributed greatly to the general feeling of uncertainty which has prevailed in our bond markets for the past few years. This uncertainty in the market for prime Canadian bonds has had inevitable effects on the market for provincial, municipal and good corporate bonds.

We have therefore decided to clear away this heavy congestion of early maturities and to lay the foundations of an orderly and sensible program of public debt management. Today we are launching the Canada conversion loan of 1958. The details of this offer are being made public concurrently with this announcement. Holders of all unmatured victory bonds are being offered new and longer term bonds in exchange for their present holdings. The holders of the eighth and ninth victory loans maturing in 1963 and 1966 are offered a choice of new 4¼ per cent 25-year bonds maturing in 1983 or new 4¼ per cent 14-year bonds maturing in 1972. Holders of the seventh victory loan which matures in 1962 may convert at their option into either of the two new bonds already mentioned or into a 3¾ per cent 7-year bond maturing in 1965. Finally, the holders of the fifth and sixth victory bonds due in 1959 and 1960 may convert into new 3 per cent 3¼-year bonds maturing on December 1, 1961 or into any of the other new bonds mentioned.

In brief, the holders of all these victory loan bonds may convert into a choice of four issues, 25 years at 4½ per cent, 14 years at 4¼ per cent, 7 years at 3¾ per cent or 3¼ years at 3 per cent, provided, however, that they must elect a bond which lengthens out to that extent their present term.

In addition, in order to adjust equitably the current market prices and yields of the old bonds to the new offerings we will make appropriate cash adjustments on conversion. Since we are making this offer to the two million individual private citizens who own these victory bonds, we are combining accrued interest and the cash adjustment into a single figure. The actual cash adjustment, exclusive of accrued interest, in favour of the person converting will depend upon the issue he is turning in and the new bond he is taking in return, but ranges from nil on the 1966 maturity being converted into the 14-year or 25-year bond to $1.99 per $100 par value on the 1959's which are converted into new bonds of 7-year maturity or longer.

This is not, of course, the first conversion loan in Canada's history. There have been a number of previous conversion loans relating to the victory loans of the first world war and of the second world war. But none of the earlier conversion loans has been on as large or as comprehensive a scale as the one we are offering today. Detailed prospectuses will be in the hands of all branches of chartered banks and of all investment dealers either this afternoon or tomorrow morning.

This is a tremendous operation requiring the enthusiastic co-operation of everybody concerned. We spent long hours with officials and other experienced advisers under the leadership of the governor of the Bank of Canada perfecting our campaign plans and organizing committees. I am happy to report that I have received from all quarters pledges of enthusiastic and vigorous support in carrying this enterprise to a successful conclusion.

In the campaign I am now announcing the period between today and August 5 will be largely taken up with organization, but it will be open to any holder to deposit his old bonds and take his cash adjustment starting today. Our offer to convert will remain open up to and including September 15, 1958. All the new bonds will be dated September 1 and will bear interest from that date.

Apart from corporations and financial institutions it is estimated that there are two million private individual holders of the victory loan issues to which I have been referring. To make sure that each and every holder, in so far as it is humanly possible, is made aware of this opportunity we are arranging for a widespread publicity campaign using all appropriate media.

This conversion offer will perform the major and essential task of clearing the way for an orderly program of debt management over the years ahead. It will not, however, provide us with any new cash. To cover our cash requirements over the next few months we have arranged to sell an issue of $400 million of five-month bonds bearing interest at the rate of 2½ per cent per annum to the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks. These very short-term bonds will fall due on December 15 next, a date which will coincide with our known cash receipts from this year's Canada savings bond campaign.

In conclusion may I say two things. The first is that we are convinced, and so are those with whom we have consulted, that this great conversion loan will lay the foundations for a new, healthy and confident tone to our whole bond market, and that the beneficial results of this will extend well beyond the market for Canada bonds and into the market for provincial, municipal and corporate bonds.

The second point I wish to emphasize is that this government attaches great importance and a high priority to the preservation of a sound currency and stability in the purchasing power of our dollar. On behalf of the government I wish to reiterate that we intend to follow policies designed to maintain the soundness of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker, this is a great national undertaking. It is the concluding phase of the victory loan campaigns of the war years which, as we all remember well, enlisted the enthusiastic support of all Canadians. I confidently bespeak the support of all Canadians today in carrying through to a completely successful conclusion the Canada conversion loan of 1958.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has indeed made a very important statement, a statement of an operation which was forecast in this morning's press and which, indeed, in its detail is in the afternoon press. As the minister has said, the Canada conversion loan, 1958, will be the largest operation of its kind in our history, even in our wartime history. He has emphasized quite rightly that for it to be successful it will require the enthusiastic co-operation of everybody concerned, and as I said in my contribution to the budget debate, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will hope that he will get that co-operation and all Canadians must hope that this operation will be a success.

We in this country are entering upon some very difficult and complicated financing and refinancing moves which the minister has outlined to the house previously, and this is the first and a very important stage in what he himself has called a major financial operation. I repeat that we as Canadians must all hope that this operation will be a success and that, above all, the stability of our currency will be maintained throughout the operation. Of course, while all of us hope that, we cannot help but feel anxious about the effect on monetary policy and on inflationary pressures of the operation which is now beginning. We hope that effect will not be harmful, and we hope these inflationary pressures will be held in check. We will all be following with great interest the progress of this very important refinancing campaign.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement just made by the Minister of Finance is certainly one of the most important that has been made by a minister of finance since the end of the war. We hope with him that the objective of a sound money policy may be achieved and that the soundness of the Canadian dollar may be maintained. We hope also that the issues will be in smaller denominations so that ordinary Canadians will have a chance to participate and that the terms of payment will be such that ordinary income earners will be able to acquire the bonds that are being issued. We hope that the result of this issue will be to ease the financing problems of provinces and municipalities.

I am certain that one of the reasons the total amount of financing is in such a large figure is the deficit in the current budget. We hope that future budgetary deficits will not have to be so large, and that we shall get back to a balanced budget and a more balanced economy so the country will not have to add to its long-term debt.

The exact terms of the proposals—the interest rates, the length of time and so on—will be studied very carefully by this group. We shall have further comments to make at a later time, but we hope the issue which the minister is now making will receive general public support.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance and ask him how he squares his announcement of the 4½ per cent interest rate with the statement made by his leader in Halifax on March 24 that the tight money policy of the Liberals had been reversed and the interest rate had been decreased from 4.3 per cent to 2.8 per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are four offerings open to holders of these five outstanding victory loans. We are anxious to make the offering of the latest maturity as attractive as possible in order that as much as possible of the maturing debt of Canada may be well advanced into the future. My hon. friend has not commented upon the fact that the interest rate on the earliest of the four maturities offered is just 3 per cent, the same as the rate on all the five outstanding victory loan bonds. The other rates are arrived at and graduated in accordance with the maturity of the new bonds. The 3¾ per cent is on the 7-year issue, the 4¼ per cent on the 14-year issue and the 4½ per cent applies only to the 25-year issue. This ties in with what has been said earlier here on this side of the house and by the Leader of the Opposition with regard to the maintenance of soundness and confidence in the Canadian currency.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a supplementary question, may I ask the minister if he really thinks that answers my question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I have given my hon. friend in my answer a lot of credit, perhaps, in relation to the question he asked.

[Mr. Argue.]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO HALT VIOLENCE IN INTERIOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): On Friday last, Mr. Speaker, I informed the house, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Kootenay West that I was not in a position to make any statement in connection with the Doukhobor situation as I had not received from the government of British Columbia any reply to my letter.

I regret to say that I was in error. I now find that a letter from Premier Bennett had been received in my office several days previously which, due to an oversight, was not brought to my attention. I apologize for the error. I also wish to remove any impression that a letter from the British Columbia government was overdue.

While it appears from the letter I have now received that the two governments are not in agreement as to where the constitutional responsibility for handling the general situation lies, nevertheless there seems a possibility that a mutually acceptable basis for co-operation in respect of one possible solution may be worked out. Premier Bennett's letter indicates that we shall be hearing from him further in this regard in due course.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED ARREST OF MAN ON TICKET OF LEAVE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that William Munavish of Vancouver has been returned to the British Columbia penitentiary following the issuance of a new warrant cancelling his ticket of leave, without any indication as to how he was alleged to have broken parole conditions, will the minister in the name of justice and decency have this man or his lawyers informed as to the charges and will the minister arrange for a hearing so the man may be given an opportunity to defend himself?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, I am afraid, entirely misconceives the nature of procedure under the Ticket of Leave Act. There is no charge laid against a person whose ticket of leave is cancelled or suspended.

The whole subject, as I explained in answer to an earlier question, will be dealt with when the new national parole bill is up for debate. At that time I hope to have an opportunity, at greater length than is possible on orders of the day, of explaining the basic concept of the ticket of leave or parole, as it will then be known, and the reasons why in the case of a cancellation or suspension in the interests of society as well as in the man's own interests it is necessary to have a man recommitted immediately and, subsequent to his recommittal, to have a full investigation of the reasons therefor.

There is, however, no charge and there is no imposition of a new sentence because the former sentence was never cancelled. The situation is simply that the man has been out on licence and his sentence continues. When there is evidence that a man has broken the conditions of his licence, and it is decided, in the interests of society, or for whatever the reason be, that he should be returned, it is necessary that the return be made immediately.

Mr. Winch: I understand all that the minister has said, and he has told us this before, but may I ask him, in view of the fact that the man has been returned to penitentiary without any knowledge as to the reasons therefor, can he or his lawyers, in the name of common decency, not be told these reasons?

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to look into this question. It is my impression that the man in question knows full well the reasons for his return. In view of the circumstances, this is one of those cases where I do not think, at the present time at any rate, it would be proper to inform the house of the reasons because a man's character and reputation are at stake.

Mr. Winch: I am not asking that the house be informed; I am asking that the man or his lawyer be informed. I received this morning an affidavit from him to the effect that he has not the faintest idea as to how he broke his parole.

Mr. Fulton: I will have this matter looked into. I shall be very surprised if he does not know, but if he does not I will ensure that he be advised.

Mr. Winch: That is exactly what I asked.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MANITOBA—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING TAX RENTAL AGREEMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): On June 23 and June 26 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked whether I would table the correspondence between the government and the premier of Manitoba. He referred to an item in the press with regard to the tax rental agreements. I now table that correspondance.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the absence of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, may I ask the Prime Minister if this correspondence could be printed in the usual way as an appendix to Hansard, or if he would ask that this be done?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is very lengthy, Mr. Speaker. I was wondering whether or not the same result would not be achieved by printing it in Votes and Proceedings rather than in Hansard. It is a very lengthy correspondence.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would hope that the usual practice could be followed. There are a great many people who never see Votes and Proceedings but who are greatly interested in these federal-provincial matters. I would hope that the Prime Minister would reconsider the matter and request that the correspondence be printed in Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker. It is simply the fact that Hansard will be a large document today.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that the documents tabled now by the Prime Minister be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of correspondence referred to above, see appendix, pages 2231-35.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REVISED BUDGET

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): By leave of the house I move:

That the revised budget for 1958 of the Canadian National Railways and the operating budget of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways, air lines and shipping owned and controlled by the government.

The revised Canadian National Railways budget replaces the budget tabled on June 2.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO SUSPENSION OF FAST TRAIN CONNECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): May I ask the Minister of Transport if he has received representations from the chambers of commerce of Senneterre, Amos, Rouyn-Noranda and other towns located throughout the northwestern part of Quebec about the proposed suspension by C.N.R. authorities of the only fast train connection between these districts and the rest of the province of Quebec, particularly with respect to direct trips to Montreal, the Canadian metropolis, and Quebec city, our provincial capital?

If so, would the minister inform the house—although we quite agree with him that these matters are questions of administration and internal decision by the Canadian National Railways authorities—what are the over-all revenues of the different railroad systems in northwestern Quebec covering the two federal ridings of Villeneuve and Chapleau, which serve a population of 150,000 people, and also what are the main reasons motivating this decision?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from the centres mentioned by the hon. member and I will be glad to draw these representations to the attention of the management of Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): May I ask the minister as a supplementary question, in view of the urgency of this matter, if he would immediately discuss this question with the officers of the Canadian National Railways while they are here in Ottawa?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, when the Department of Transport says it will take up a question with management that means immediately.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY ASSISTANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the desirability of members on the other side of the house being available to speak for ministers in their unavoidable absence from the house, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is considering appointing parliamentary assistants soon; perhaps I can repeat the words my friend the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) uttered earlier this afternoon in another connection, namely "How long, O Lord, how long".

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the anxiety of my hon. friend in this connection will be satisfied very shortly.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION OF MEASURES FOR REFORM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question of much greater importance. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has had over a year to meditate upon the chilly nature of the swirling waters of Senate reform that face any government considering this problem, and in view of the continuing and recently much stimulated interest in this matter, to put it as politely as possible, would the Prime Minister inform the house when he intends to take the plunge?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with characteristic imagery my hon. friend refers to "the plunge". I really could not call it that. I can understand the interest of a brother British Columbian in this problem at this time. All I can say is that when the matter receives attention it will be communicated to the house, not in the nature of a plunge but of a course of action.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PICTOU, N.S.—STATEMENT ON PROSPECTIVE LAY-OFFS BY FERGUSON INDUSTRIES LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate directed a question to the Minister of Labour regarding the reported lay-off of employees at Ferguson Industries Limited at Pictou because of a lack of shipbuilding orders. I may say that on several occasions the hon. member for Pictou has made representations with regard to work for this shipyard, and as far as my department is concerned we are continually keeping in mind and reviewing the situation in regard to employment for our shipyards, but I cannot be specific in regard to this particular yard at this time.

AIR TRANSPORT

MODIFICATION OF REGULATION OF NON-SCHEDULED SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): In view of the earlier comments of the Minister of Transport regarding competition between scheduled air line services, I wonder if he has also given any thought to possible modification of government regulation of non-scheduled services, particularly in the light aircraft field?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for advising me of his intention to ask this question. The answer to the hon. member's question is yes. The government, after study of this matter, has come to the conclusion that there should be an easing in the treatment of applications for licences for non-scheduled commercial air services which involve only the use of small light aircraft and helicopters.

The concept of regulated competition in the field of public utilities is already well accepted as applying to public services which are of great importance to the population as a whole, or to major segments thereof. However, I can find no evidence to indicate that services provided by small, single-engine light aircraft and helicopters fall as a general rule within this category.

Services of this type can only offer transportation at a relatively high unit cost compared with larger aircraft. In total they provide only a small percentage of the air transportation picture in Canada. Nor is there any indication that the public interest would, as a whole, suffer if this type of air service was permitted to operate more freely. In fact all the indications are that the reverse would be the case, and the government has accordingly decided that it would be in the public interest that licences for air services using only this small type of aircraft be granted freely on request. This I consider to be properly in accord with the spirit of free enterprise.

I recognize that there may be a few instances, for example in remote northern areas, where the importance of services provided by this type of aircraft to a community is so great that, unlike in the settled areas of Canada, small aircraft service has to be classed as essential, and that in these cases the air transport board may vary the general policy I have indicated by bringing such cases to me for special consideration. I have informed the board, however, that I would expect instances of this sort to be very much the exception rather than the rule.

I have also informed the board that generally speaking this policy should apply to what is known as group C aircraft, that is small single-engine aircraft having a gross disposable load of less than 1,100 pounds and to small single-engine helicopters such as the Bell-47 and Sikorsky-51 types, but not to larger units.

[Later:]

QUEBECAIR—RECENT DAMAGE TO FACILITIES BY FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if an investigation will be made into the fire which destroyed a large portion of the air facilities of Quebecair recently, and whether his department will give consideration to assisting that efficient air line in re-establishing its facilities?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for having advised me of his intention to ask this question. We will investigate this fire and the situation resulting from it, and we will give consideration to the possibility of giving financial assistance in this case.

POSTAL SERVICE

WESTMOUNT, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO DAILY DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, notice of which I sent him a few moments ago. Has the minister taken cognizance of an item in Fitz's column in today's Montreal Gazette, stating that the citizens of Westmount were up in arms with respect to the fact that the once a day mail delivery reaches them only during the afternoon, and could the minister tell the house if it is the intention of his department to remedy this situation?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I received notice of the question a moment ago, and I did not read the item referred to. I regret that I missed that interesting column, but to the best of my knowledge there has been no general change in the mail service to this section of Montreal. It is necessary, with a man covering two routes a day, that one delivery be made in the morning and the other in the afternoon. That applies generally with respect to all our post offices.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—REQUEST FOR RETENTION OF GOVERNMENT CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received a copy of the resolution passed unanimously at a recent meeting of Timmins town council, and if so, is it giving any consideration to the request contained therein that the gas pipe line between the Manitoba boundary and Kapuskasing, Ontario, be retained under government ownership and control?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes, and the answer to the second question is no.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

RADIO AND TELEVISION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the fifth of the six supply motions we shall have this session, and I must confess that it is unfortunate that five of them will have been exhausted after today or tomorrow, because it looks as if we will now be here for some weeks, and I think it was the intention when standing orders were changed dealing with this matter that these supply motions would be spread as evenly as possible over the session.

I am not blaming anybody at the moment for this situation, but it does mean that after this supply motion has been exhausted we will have one only during the rest of the session. There may be very important developments during that time which would normally be raised by the opposition by moving amendments on going into supply, when such questions could be raised or grievances could be aired.

The subject I wish to raise today and on which in due course I will move an amendment is the question of national radio and television, which I think all members of the house will agree is an important aspect of national development, an aspect which leads us into the realm of the communication of ideas so important in welding together our sections and our people, in strengthening their unity and stimulating their pride in their country.

It is my view and the view of the official opposition that government policy should by now have been laid down with regard to this matter; that doubts and hesitations which have been created in recent weeks should be resolved, and that the house and indeed the country should know where we stand in this matter especially in view of the Fowler report on broadcasting and of the assurances given by the Prime Minister in the election campaign of 1957 and repeated in 1958 that the recommendations contained in that report would receive attention, as he put it, "at a very early date". Nothing has been done to remove this uncertainty, though I must add at once that we had a very interesting and very helpful statement by the minister concerned a few weeks ago.

Nothing, however, has been done to remove the uncertainty with regard to policy, an uncertainty which is bound to be felt in view of the strong position taken by the Prime Minister and by members of the government with regard to radio and television matters when they were in opposition. If we on this side of the house complain now of delay and uncertainty with regard to policy we should, I think, in all fairness, put forward our own views on this question and that is what I am proposing to do before I move the amendment.

In doing this I do not think I need stress at any great length the importance of radio and television in our national life, in the development of Canadian culture, and in the development of a Canadian identity. They are two of our most powerful media for better or for worse in the pursuit of these essential goals. These days we hear a great deal about the special need at this stage of our history for a strong and healthy Canadianism. This is a matter of understandable concern to all Canadians. Therefore we are bound to be concerned with the performance of any agency for the communication of ideas such as radio or television, and with the contribution that such agencies are making toward the development of this strong and healthy Canadianism.

This is especially the case with broadcasting, because if we do not exploit this medium for right Canadian purposes and direct it in the public interest it will be used by others for purposes which may be good or which may be not so good, but which cannot be expected to be wholly Canadian. The national interest and a national purpose should be and have been, then, a responsibility for radio and television in this country, and this has been recognized by governments for many years. That interest is superior, and must remain superior, to any private advantage.

I suggest there must be no weakening of this principle in any policy that may be adopted in this house with regard to this matter. Control of our own air must help us to determine, in so far as any nation can so determine in this interdependent age, our national destiny, and help us develop our distinct national personality and our own Canadian culture.

Too much emphasis cannot, I think, be placed on the part that radio and television can play in building up on the northern half of this continent a distinct, cohesive, self-reliant national personality proud of its achievements and confident about its future without being smug or arrogant about it. Maintaining Canadian unity and building the Canadian nation has never been and perhaps never will be an easy task in the face of the geographic, economic and other factors that tend to separate us or pull us south rather than east and west. Canadian governments in the past of both parties have accepted the responsibility of countering these factors in the interests of national unity. They have accepted this duty in radio and television as they have in other forms of transportation and communications.

That has cost and will continue to cost us a great deal of money and I will have something to say about that a little later. We should not permit that cost to be one dollar higher than is absolutely necessary but I believe that what is determined to be necessary by parliament should be given. That, in my view, would be a small price to pay for the results achieved in national or individual reward or satisfaction in the application of a good national television and radio policy.

Recently fears have been widely expressed and, I think, often deeply and genuinely felt that our own control over our economic life is being disturbingly and unduly weakened by our increasingly close integration with the economy of the United States, a process that has been going on in this country since the beginning of this century. There certainly is a basis for this fear although the fear itself can be exaggerated. It requires us to do what we can to remove that fear through wise and carefully considered policies based on long range considerations of true national interest rather than short range considerations of prejudice or perhaps even immediate advantage, or what may seem to be immediate advantage. I suggest that the dangers to which our cultural and non-material life are being exposed today are as great if not greater than those facing control of our economic development. Indeed, the two fears and the two results are closely connected.

This situation has been very well and reasonably described in the report of the royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences which the Liberal government appointed in 1949. I should like to quote from page 18, paragraph 26, of that report on this particular point. It reads:

> American influences on Canadian life to say the least are impressive. There should be no thought of interfering with the liberty of all Canadians to enjoy them. Cultural exchanges are excellent in themselves. They widen the choice of the consumer and provide stimulating competition for the producer. It cannot be denied, however, that a vast and disproportionate amount of material coming from a single alien source may stifle rather than stimulate our own creative effort; and, passively accepted without any standard of comparison, this may weaken critical faculties. We are now spending millions to maintain a national independence which would be nothing but an empty shell without a vigorous and distinctive cultural life. We have seen that we have its elements in our traditions and in our history; we have made important progress, often aided by American generosity. We must not be blind, however, to the very present danger of permanent dependence.

That consideration should, I think, be a major preoccupation on the part of the government and all of us in respect of any change that may be recommended in Canadian radio and television policy. We have been led to believe from reports outside this house that some such change is shortly to be recommended. Indeed, it is perhaps true that it is in the field of broadcasting that the possibilities mentioned in the report which I have just read of United States influence becoming too powerful and too dominant are greatest. The existence—indeed, the very fortunate existence—of two main language groups; our great area combined with our small and scattered population makes the effective discharge by government of its national responsibilities in this field both difficult and expensive as my hon. friend, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) pointed out two or three weeks ago in what I referred to as a very interesting and, I thought, sensible statement.

The easy way out of this responsibility —just as the easy way out of our transportation responsibilities in this country 80 or so years ago—would have been to have relied on the United States or on policies that would have brought us under United States control in this important field. I wish to read what the Massey report said on this point at page 23, paragraph 3:

> The easy and obvious answer soon appeared.

That refers to the answer to our problem of radio and television. Radio was the main concern in early days and the television problem was just emerging at the time of this commission. I continue:

> In the United States the new industry of radio was growing phenomenally. Men of enterprise quickly mastered the early techniques and enlisted and adapted an astonishing amount and variety of talent for the new medium. Commercial returns justified their investment. Here, it seemed, was the solution to Canada's problem. With easy access to the south, American programs could be channelled in to Canada inexpensively through stations along the border. Canadians could again feast heartily and cheaply on American bounty, this time without even an obligation to return thanks. It was then that some Canadians began to think that history was about to repeat itself in a new and alarming form.

I suggest that we in this house and indeed in Canada can be grateful to those leaders in both parties who refused to take this easy way out at that time and who, as Canadians had done before them in other spheres of national development, chose the harder but the better course in this great work of nation building by following perhaps a more difficult, but a Canadian way.

I should like to briefly trace for a few minutes the development of Canadian broadcasting policy in the search for this the Canadian way, the Canadian answer to the problems that are inherent in this matter. National policy in this field of broadcasting began, as hon. members know, with the appointment of the Aird commission in 1928 and the principle which that commission adopted as its guide, on which subsequent policy was based and which, I suggest, must still be followed, was expressed by the commission in these words which may be found in the report of that body:

In a country of the vast geographical dimensions of Canada, broadcasting will undoubtedly become a great force in fostering a national spirit and interpreting national citizenship.

In due time the report of the Aird commission appeared and it was implemented in part in 1932, but in the main in 1936, through the Canadian Broadcasting Act, which is the legislative basis for a national broadcasting policy in this country. However, one important recommendation of the Aird commission was not implemented. Private broadcasting stations were not absorbed by the government corporation, as the Aird commission had recommended, but rather were integrated into the national system, experience having shown that the private stations could perform important services as part of that national system but not if separate from or aloof from it.

Then the next stage in the development of Canadian policy in this field, at least the next stage which I venture to mention, is the report of the Massey commission, 1951, from which I have already quoted. That commission, as hon. members probably know, reviewed what was being done in this field in the United Kingdom, France, United States and in our own country. It examined complaints received from private broadcasters and it analysed very carefully—and I think myself very fairly—the public interest aspect of broadcasting policy. It restated and it reconfirmed the basic principles and practices of radio policy that had already been laid down in Canada. As we contemplate at this time possible changes in broadcasting policy I think, Mr. Speaker, it is worth recalling what the Massey report had to say in this regard because these are principles on which I think we should base our policy at this time. They are principles which are certainly accepted as the basis for policy by the official opposition. On page 283 of the report we find this, and I read these passages in hearty and complete agreement:

Broadcasting in Canada, in our view, is a public service directed and controlled in the public interest by a body responsible to parliament. Private citizens are permitted to engage their capital and their energies in this service, subject to the regulations of this body. That these citizens should be assured of just and equal treatment, that they should enjoy adequate security or compensation for the actual monetary investments they are permitted to make, is apparent. But that they enjoy any vested right to engage in broadcasting as an industry, or that they have any status except as part of the national broadcasting system, is to us inadmissible.

Then, on page 284 of the report we find this:

The only status of private broadcasters is as part of the national broadcasting system.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Then, paragraph 32 reads:

We wish to recognize fully the private stations as important elements within the framework of our national system. But we are resolutely opposed to any compromise of the principle on which the system rests and should rest. Radio has been the greatest single factor in creating and in fostering a sense of national unity. It has enormous powers to debase and to elevate public understanding and public taste. Believing as we do that it is an essential instrument for the promotion of unity and of general education in the nation, we cannot accept any suggestions which would impair the principles on which our present national system is based.

Mr. Speaker, the Massey commission in short recognized and confirmed that the responsibility of government in this field should be along the lines followed in the United Kingdom and in France but rejected in the United States. We think those principles, as laid down in that report, were sound and wise.

Then we come to the report of the Fowler commission on broadcasting set up, I think, in 1955. That was the next and the last investigation of radio and television in this country, perhaps not the last but the latest, and it was concerned primarily with the television aspects of broadcasting which had made very great strides in Canada since the Massey report. The Fowler report was presented to this house in March, 1957, shortly before parliament dissolved for a general election. That report, the latest report we have on the subject, expressed in strong and clear terms the same fear of undue and damaging United States influences in the television field, as the Massey commission, in its report had previously expressed. It pointed out that the Canadian situation vis-a-vis the United States in this field makes our position and our problem a unique one in the world, as indeed the Minister of National Revenue has already indicated to the house. It underlined that there was a very real danger in the development of television in this country of Canadian stations becoming what I might call branch plants of United States networks. Perhaps the house will permit me to read from the Fowler report one or two excerpts that deal with this point. On page 7 the Fowler report has this to say:

One of the special factors affecting Canadian broadcasting—

And I have already mentioned this. I continue:

—is the sheer size of the country in relation to its population. We have today in Canada more than 2 million television receivers, each of which is within range of one of the 38 Canadian television stations. In New York—

That is New York city, I take it.

—there are seven television stations whose signals can reach nearly 4½ million receiving sets.

Page 8 of the report has this to say:

No other country is similarly helped and embarrassed by the close proximity of the United States. Much that is good and valuable can come from this closeness; there is an increasingly rich fare of programs on both radio and television available at relatively low cost from the United States. Much of this we cannot hope to duplicate and we would be poorer if we did not have it available as part of our total program supply.

But as a nation we cannot accept, in these powerful and persuasive media, the natural and complete flow of another nation's culture without danger to our national identity.

Then, on pages 10 and 11 there are these extracts:

We cannot choose between a Canadian broadcasting system controlled by the state and a Canadian competitive system in private hands. The choice is between a Canadian state-controlled program with some flow of programs east and west across Canada, with some Canadian content and the development of a Canadian sense of identity, at a substantial public cost, and a privately-owned system which the forces of economics will necessarily make predominantly dependent on imported American radio and television programs.

On page 11 we find the following:

If we are unwilling or unable to provide quite substantial amounts from public funds—

And we know they are substantial.

—for such a broadcasting system there is little point in having any public agency engaged in the broadcasting and distribution of radio and television programs, and individual private stations will necessarily become outlets for American networks and programs. This would result not because the private broadcasters are unpatriotic citizens or because they lack a sense of Canadian consciousness or responsibility; it would result from economic pressures on the private operator which make it easy and inexpensive to import American programs and difficult and costly to produce any substantial volume of Canadian programs.

Mr. Speaker, there is the dilemma, and the principles which should underly government policy in resolving that dilemma have been laid down now by more than one commission, as I have stated, and have been followed by governments.

We on this side at this time, wholeheartedly subscribe to these principles and we suggest that there must be no weakening in regard to them. Moreover, the Fowler commission does make certain recommendations which in the opinion of the commission do not violate or weaken the essential principles that have been stated but which will in its opinion improve broadcasting, remove certain grievances and strengthen certain weaknesses in the present system.

For a few moments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention some of these recommendations of the Fowler commission, some of the views they expressed in their report concerning them and give you my own reaction to those recommendations and views. The first, of course, is that public control and regulation of broadcasting is an essential and proper function of parliament exercised not directly but through a state agency or regulatory body. We agree with that. We feel, as commissions that have investigated this matter in the past have felt, that broadcasting is not and in the nature of things cannot be safely considered to be an ordinary business undertaking similar to the publication of a newspaper, a magazine, a popular song or a play. Therefore it does indeed come within the public domain and must be considered in any governmental approach to it, in any parliamentary approach to it, as such.

The Fowler report points out, and rightly I think, that no one has ever argued, at least before any of the commission and I do not think before any of the parliamentary committees, against technical control, against regulations for the allocation of channels and frequencies, against measures to prevent the unauthorized use of airwaves and all that kind of thing. The argument, and it certainly has been an argument and perhaps continues to be, is over the extent to which there should be regulation and control and how that regulation and control should be exercised.

Freedom, of course, in this as in other fields of human activity is very important but the Fowler commission on page 36 of its report states that the most important freedom in this particular medium is "the freedom of the public to enjoy a broadcasting system which provides the largest possible outlet for the widest possible range of information, entertainment and ideas." We agree with that.

Mr. Nowlan: What page is that?

Mr. Pearson: That is page 36 of the report where it deals with the question of freedom in its application to broadcasting and television.

The report also states that there must be a single radio and television broadcasting system of which all stations in the country are a part and which will be controlled, regulated and supervised, not directly by government but through a delegated authority responsible to parliament and that in this national system three elements must be considered. The first is the private stations. The second is the publicly operated and controlled Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the third element is a board, however constituted, responsible to parliament and directing and supervising the whole national system.

I should like for a moment to look at these three elements in turn with special reference again to the recommendations and views of the Fowler commission in respect of them. The first element is the private stations. The Fowler report emphasizes, and I agree with the emphasis, the importance of the private stations in the national system. Indeed, as members who have read the report will know, and I am sure most members have, the commission was especially preoccupied with the position of the private stations with regard to television.

The report points out in this connection, and quite rightly, that a television licence today in a large Canadian city is, to use the expression of the report itself, a rich plum, and a grant of such a licence imposes a difficult responsibility on government. Furthermore, as I suppose I have already indicated in some of the excerpts I have read from the reports of previous commissions, once that licence is granted there will be a heavy economic pressure on such a private television station to become an outlet for a United States network, especially as such a station would not, I suppose, be likely to join a C.B.C. station in the same city as an outlet of the Canadian national system.

Nevertheless, the Fowler commission does recommend and makes a strong case for abandoning the single channel, as it has been called, or monopoly policy which has been followed in the past by granting in appropriate circumstances, and I emphasize those words, a licence for a private television station in cities where the C.B.C. now operates a television station. The Fowler report agrees that it was deisrable to have one station for as many areas as possible before there should be two stations in any one area but now, the commission thinks, enough progress to this end has been made to justify a change of policy.

But the commission does not stop there. It emphasizes that this change should be brought about gradually and with very great care indeed so as to avoid, for instance, the mistakes that were made in the early days of radio of duplication between private and C.B.C. stations. The necessity for care is underlined not only by the factor I have just mentioned but also by the fact that in Canada today, as hon. members know, there are only 12 very high frequency channels that are assigned to our country. Only 12 are available and that makes them, as I have already indicated, assets of very great value and very great national importance. Therefore the Fowler commission because of these considerations not only advocates care in implementing this change of policy but emphasizes that private competing stations when licensed should be subject to previously determined regulations which would require a minimum standard of Canadian program performance and which would bring them under some control in respect of such things as advertising. The commission has some very interesting sentences on this particular matter and perhaps before I quote them, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Pearson: At six o'clock I had been discussing the Fowler report and the recommendations and views in that report concerning the three elements which should constitute the national broadcasting system and the power to regulate and control broadcasting, I had indicated that the Fowler report, while agreeing that there should be modification of the single station policy with regard to television, also emphasized that this change should be brought about very carefully. Its views in that regard are, I think, both interesting and important so far as the private broadcasting element in the system is concerned. I venture to put one or two of these views on the record. For instance, at page 230 of this report, the commission had this to say:

> It has been said that available television channels not now in use are rare and precious natural resources that should be preserved for some use in the future. Because the number of unused channels allocated to Canada and practically usable at the present stage of television development is limited, we agree that great care should be exercised in granting licences for these scarce resources. But we think they should not be left idle if they can be used effectively for the benefit of the Canadian people. As with other scarce natural resources, they should not be wasted but neither should they be hoarded.

Then again, in counselling care in granting competing television licences where C.B.C. stations are now operating, at page 235 of its report the commission had this to say:

> If the level of performance practically possible under today's conditions is substantially lower than the level determined by the board of broadcast governors to be desirable, Canada would do better to wait for alternative television service.

In short, Mr. Speaker, while the commission recommended—and I have no quarrel with the recommendation—that the policy with regard to the single station for television in any one Canadian city should be modified, it also emphasized that the implementation of this modification should be made with great care.

I now want to say a few words about the second, the public element in the national broadcasting system, which is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and which has, as we all know, special responsibilities for operating its own stations in the national interest and at present for controlling the whole broadcasting system in this country. This latter function is, of course, a more controversial one. In its report the Fowler commission confirms the good record of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation without suggesting that it is perfect or has been perfect or has not made mistakes or indeed that it cannot be improved. At page 127 of its report the commission has this to say:

Despite a good deal of propaganda directed against the C.B.C. and the Canadian broadcasting system, the results of all past inquiries have been remarkably consistent in giving general approval to Canada's performance and achievements in this field, and it will be seen that the present commission is no exception to this trend.

We on this side of the house also feel that the record of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over the years has been good, that it has made a distinguished contribution to national development and has operated in the national interest. If that is the case—and I think it is the case—then I think we owe a great debt of gratitude to the chairman of the board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. Davidson Dunton, who has recently resigned, for the work he has done over the years and for the tact, wisdom, patience and intelligence he has shown in a job which, it seems to me, in complexity and difficulty is second to none in our country. I should like to pay my tribute to the work he has done in this capacity since he was chosen for this position a good many years ago. I am sure he will be missed by the corporation.

It seems to me that the corporation, by its record, stands up well in comparison with broadcasting companies or corporations, public or private, in any other country. It certainly has had to face some terrific problems. Some of these are inherent in the nature of broadcasting. Some of them are peculiar to broadcasting in this country where there are, as I tried to point out this afternoon, some special difficulties. Some of them arise out of the almost furious pace of growth and development in Canada to meet the desires or indeed—and I do not think it is an exaggeration to say this—the demands of the Canadian people.

I suppose it is true to say that growth in the field of television has been faster in Canada than in any other country in the world until today we have reached a position where, so the Fowler report tells us, 97 per cent of the Canadian population are covered by radio and in the space of a very few years 80 per cent of the people are covered by television. Indeed, in four years, I think it is, the number of television sets in this country has increased from a few hundred to 2.3 million. No wonder there were, and still are, headaches and growing pains in broadcasting in Canada. I suppose these are increased or are to be increased by the desirability of raising the figure of radio coverage to approximately 100 per cent and television to the objective laid down in the Fowler commission report of at least 90 per cent.

Attaining that latter figure of 90 per cent of our people to be covered by television will be a difficult and expensive proposition under present conditions; and, as the report points out, it will require the establishment of a number of Canadian low-power repeater stations in areas which are not now reached by television but which should be reached by television. The Fowler commission also makes the point, and it is one surely which we can all support.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation . . . should have its task clearly defined,—

I quote from the report at page 160:

—should know the limits beyond which it is not expected to go, and should have the means and the power to discharge that task within those limits.

That brings us to the very core of the problem, as I see it, namely the responsibilities and the resources of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At present it certainly has definite and very large responsibilities for the provision of national programs and for ensuring that the whole system, public and private, shall be truly national and be guided in its operation in all sectors by national considerations.

For that purpose the corporation has been given certain general powers of regulation and control of the whole system, with which I will try to deal when I come to the third element of the system. For that purpose, even if changes are made in the present system with respect to responsibility for control the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation requires and will continue to require not only large funds with which to meet its obligations but surely it should also have some assurance of the receipt of what it will require over several years, certainly over a longer period than one year. The reconciliation of this requirement and this assurance with considerations of strict economy and parliamentary control is a very difficult problem indeed and one which, I assume, is before the government at the present moment.

I am always very happy indeed to help in the search for any solution of any problem and perhaps what I have to say about this may be of some assistance to the minister in this regard.

Radio and Television

There is no doubt in anyone's mind about the mounting cost to the treasury of the discharge of the responsibilities I have mentioned; there is no doubt about our desire as members of parliament to keep these costs down to the minimum required for the effective discharge of the policies we have laid down. In last year's estimates we voted approximately $27 million for broadcasting and another $16 million for statutory expenditures —approximately $42 million in all—and in this year's estimates the government is providing for $49⅓ million and $12 million statutory expenditures which are provided by the excise tax of 15 per cent on television sets and parts. That is a very large sum of money; something over $61 million in our estimates for broadcasting in Canada.

Some time ago the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation estimated—and this perhaps puts the figures in proper perspective in terms of the services performed—that the cost of television was about $15 per television home per year and that it had been running pretty close to that, though I suspect it will soon be above that figure. However, I venture to say that perhaps no expenditure of $15 per home could bring so much in the way of information, enlightenment and entertainment. I personally felt last night, when watching television for one hour, from ten o'clock to eleven o'clock, that I got back a good proportion of that $15 in that one hour. Therefore we should not begrudge the corporation the necessary amount of money to enable it to do its job, provided that that job is well effectively and economically done. That of course is the question.

It seems pretty clear that if broadcasting services—radio or television—increase, the cost is of course going to increase also. Indeed I have suggested one respect in which these services may perhaps have to increase in extending the television coverage to a greater part of this country. It is also clear that if these extensions are made the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation cannot do its job without some assured and firm basis for its operational and its capital financing.

The Fowler report gives its own estimate of the amount of money which will be required over the period of years up to 1962 and those figures are very, very large. I believe they include the extension of television hours, which may not be as essential as some other changes; the introduction of colour television, which may not be too essential at this time, and the extension of television coverage to 90 per cent, which perhaps is more important than the other two changes.

I come now to the third and last element of this national broadcasting system, that of control and regulation which is now vested in the chairman and board of governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Strong exception has in fact been taken in this house to one operating agency, namely the C.B.C., having too much power over other operating and competing agencies, namely the private stations. In other words, that the corporation in these matters of regulation and control is taking the position—and it has been put this way in this house—of both judge and jury.

In my view, from the study I have been able to give to this question, the present system has not worked too badly in practice. I do not think the C.B.C. has abused its powers but I am inclined to agree that the principle, as a principle, is open to some objection. The Fowler commission presumably came to the same conclusion because they recommend a change in this regard without however—and I think this is important—compromising the essential principle that one national system should be ensured. To reconcile that principle with the change which it thinks desirable the commission recommended in its report a separate board, of what it called broadcasting governors, to consist of fifteen members appointed for five-year terms, at least one of whom would be from each of the five major regions of Canada. It is not, in this recommendation, to be a board like the board of transport commissioners, which is a full-time official board. It is to be a part-time board and even the chairman is to be a part-time appointee. Naturally he and the other members of the executive committee would have to spend more time in Ottawa than would the remainder of the board.

The report emphasizes that the membership is to be highly qualified and is to be independent of the government in the same way as, say, the board of directors of the Bank of Canada are independent of the government. I certainly agree with the commission in this respect. Independence is stressed as being essential in the recommendation made both with regard to public and private elements of the system would be responsible to this board of broadcasting governors which would in its constitution, its functions and in its authority be quite apart from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; it would, as I understand it, itself have no operating responsibility but it would have control over the national system and over broadcasting policy. It would be responsible for making and enforcing regulations. In exercising this control, in its supervisory functions and, in enforcing minimum standards of performance, the board—the report says—should not be rigid or unduly interfering or attempt to interpret the public interest in too limiting and narrow a manner. I think that is a very wise safeguard, as are those safeguards recommended against an unfair exercise of regulatory functions. In my own view, and I think in the view of a good many people who have studied this matter, it would be a mistake if we changed our broadcasting policy so that we had two boards, one the kind of board I have been mentioning and another board for the C.B.C. itself; in other words, one as at present, which would be concerned with programs and performance of the C.B.C. alone and a second board which would be a small full-time board concerned mainly with licensing new radio and television stations, increases of power for stations and such things, but without the authority to control standards of current performance or excessive commercialism in the whole system.

I am suggesting we should be making a mistake if we left the C.B.C. under its own board and then attempted to set up a full time board concerning mainly with licensing problems and only in a secondary way with the control and regulation of the whole system. It seems to me two such boards of that kind would be wasteful and overlapping. On the other hand, one small full-time board—I will compare it with the board of transport commissioners though the analogy is by no means perfect—with all the power to regulate and control might, in my opinion, prejudice the national system, based as it is on the special responsibilities of the C.B.C. and the prior position of the C.B.C., because of those responsibilities, in that system, which in my view should be maintained.

On the other hand, the role of a part-time independent board of broadcast governors would not be primarily administrative or technical but, within existing legislation, would keep broadcast policy in line generally with public opinion and protect the public interest in this vital matter. That is the kind of board we on this side of the house would prefer.

In conclusion, may I say that we approve in general the recommendations of the Fowler commission and we feel they might well form the basis of any new legislation on the subject, and I say that without accepting them in all their detail. The attitude of the official opposition on this most important problem can be summed up by the following broad principles of policy. In the first place, we feel that private radio and television stations have an important role to play in the field of broadcasting in Canada, not as an independent network but as a part of a single and integrated national system operating under the control and supervision of a public regulatory body to make sure—and I am quoting now from the Fowler report—that programs are responsive to Canadian needs and adapted to Canadian conditions and that the public rather than any private interest should prevail.

In the second place, the C.B.C. must continue to play a dominant role in our national system of broadcasting. In order to be in a position to perform that function effectively it must be completely free of government interference and be ultimately responsible only to parliament; it must also receive adequate funds, not merely on a year-to-year basis but, subject always to parliament control, in such a way as to be able to plan in advance the development of its services.

The proper operation and development of such a national system of broadcasting will be costly and will involve increased public expenditures in the future. It is imperative that we should be prepared to meet this responsibility if we want to grow and develop as a distinct nation. I should like in this respect to quote the very sound and serious warning given to us all in this house by Michael Barkway in a C.B.C. capital report on June 29, 1958:

> Nationwide television will probably involve costs proportionate to the unique contribution it can make towards developing and informing a Canadian point of view. If ever we decide it is not worth the price—that we could get along just as well with free American programs—then it will be high time to put your money elsewhere and prepare to abandon ship. There are quicker ways to destroy Canada, but none more decisive: because this would mean declaring that we don't really care any more.

It is important that the position of the government on these matters and particular in regard to the recommendations of the Fowler commission should be stated clearly, and stated soon. Delay and doubt about this matter is creating difficulties and uncertainties in this field. The Fowler report has been in the hands of government for well over a year. Where does the government stand on it? Is, for instance, the board of governors of the C.B.C. being abolished by default? The announcement in the speech from the throne has only added to this uncertainty, especially in the light of past statement, because it says merely this:

> There will be placed before you a proposal to establish a new agency to regulate broadcasting in Canada and to ensure that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the privately owned broadcasting stations work effectively together to constitute a national system to provide satisfactory television and radio services to all Canadians within reach. Related amendments to the Radio Act will also be proposed.

We think that this parliament, many weeks after that speech from the throne was delivered, is now entitled to a clear statement of government policy with regard to the implications of that paragraph. By moving this amendment we hope to get that statement from the government, and therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) the following:

That all the words after the word "That" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor: "this house regrets the government has not yet presented its proposals for the regulation and financing of radio and television broadcasting and thereby removing the uncertainty as to the future of public and private broadcasting in Canada.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we in this group listened with a great deal of interest to the excellent hour and twenty minutes speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on this most important question.

I must say that one frequently has the experience, listening to a person making a good speech, of realizing that he is in effect stealing your thunder and some of your lightning, if it can be termed as such. Therefore during the dinner recess, I have had to reorganize my remarks to some extent, and one can readily understand that in this humid atmosphere one is not inclined to labour very vigorously in the vineyard of material and notes and things of that sort for material to replace material one intended to use earlier in the day.

We were very pleased at the explanation made by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the history, the purpose, the achievements and the record of the C.B.C. I thought personally that he made a very good job of his outline of those subjects and also of his exposition of the value of the C.B.C. in promoting Canadian culture, in promoting Canadian identity, Canadian unity and, in the right sense a Canadian national consciousness.

I am sure that in that part of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition we in the C.C.F. can heartily concur. We agree also with his references to the value of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to, as it were, weld together the various races in Canada and to bring together Canadians from east to west.

I also noticed, on keeping a very close eye on the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), that the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition did not seem to cause him any undue pain. I would assume that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had been here the best he could have done would have been to have given us one of his pallid smiles from time to time.

As we in this group do not believe in repetition—

[Mr. Pearson.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: — I shall not reiterate the points in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition with which we in the C.C.F. agree—

Mr. Pickersgill: That statement was worthy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Herridge: —and I am sure that the members of the C.C.F. realize that I always speak with a certain penury of language.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On a number of occasions hon. members in the C.C.F. have made reference to notes and readings. I wonder if the hon. gentleman could dispense with reading?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member come right over here and see whether or not the hon. gentleman is reading.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman by his question clearly indicates that he is a novitiate in this house. The notes and readings to which I refer are in my office and were prepared after a very hurriedly eaten dinner in order to try and have something worth while to say following the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that the point of order which was raised by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden) has been satisfied by the assurance of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) that he is not reading.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman could see my notes he would think a chicken with wet, muddy feet had tracked across the page. Before proceeding further I think I should join with the Leader of the Opposition in expressing our admiration for the valuable services rendered to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over a period of 12 or 13 years if I remember correctly and also to the Canadian people by Mr. Dunton. It was not an easy task to be at the head of that organization and I am convinced that it was not made any less easy at times by the vigorous criticisms of some of the hon. gentlemen who now sit on the government side of the house. We wish Mr. Dunton every success in his new undertaking as president of Carleton University.

Throughout the years the question of the C.B.C. is one that has drawn a great deal of attention in this house and provoked much interest and comment in the country. That has been indicated by the fact, if I remember correctly, that there have been 13 parliamentary committees over the years studying the administration of the C.B.C and some three royal commissions. The Aird commission was the first in 1928. The Massey commission also made a study of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the latest, the Fowler commission, reported on the subject in 1957. I am not going to repeat what the Leader of the Opposition had to say with respect to the Aird commission. We in this group agree with most of his comments in connection with that commission. However, I do wish to refer briefly to some of what we consider were the inadequacies of the Massey commission with respect to its report in so far as it referred to radio broadcasting and we must all realize that the situation has changed a great deal since the time of that report.

While it was an excellent report and covered the field quite comprehensively under the circumstances that prevailed at the time there were three major omissions in the Massey commission report from the point of view of this group. The first was that it failed to suggest that higher standards should be required by private stations. We in this group think that is a question that should be given very serious consideration by this parliament and those that are charged with the responsibility of administering radio in Canada. We also do not believe that newspapers should be given radio or television licences and the Massey report failed to mention that.

The third suggestion omitted from the report which in our view would have been worth while and necessary was that the board of governors be more qualified. I am not making any undue criticisms of the board of governors and their services in the past. The experience of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in radio and television throughout the years has been evolutionary. We feel that the board of governors should be more qualified to analyse and understand programs, administrative procedures and to understand to a greater degree than was possible in the past the very complex technical difficulties that are related to making decisions in respect to radio broadcasting and television.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. gentleman tell the house what he contemplates when he postulates this high degree of technical knowledge and so on?

Mr. Herridge: We would not suggest that all the board of governors should be qualified technicians but we do think that those who have charge of the administration of radio and television in this country and who make the policy decisions should have included among their numbers some people who because of their technical knowledge and ability, divorced from the direct administration of the organization, have some degree of technical competence to pass on some of these very complicated and difficult problems particularly when it comes to the question of applications for two stations in one city or the necessary things that are required to give radio coverage in certain areas and questions of that nature.

With respect to the report of the Fowler commission I—or rather, we in this group—think it is most comprehensive. I am not very much given to saying "I" but one slips into the habit and when speaking on a subject like this I want it understood that I am speaking for the members of this group. We are not given to putting ourselves forward as individuals. We submerge our personalities to the common good, you know.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is becoming more like the Prime Minister all the time.

Mr. Winch: He will be there some day.

Mr. Herridge: This report indicates that the commission made a very thorough and exhaustive study of the subject. The report also indicates the very widespread support for the C.B.C. that exists in this country. In that connection I wish to refer to a bulletin that was sent to my office by the Canadian broadcasting league which has lately been revived, as I understand it. The bulletin contains a paragraph which refers to national support for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and which reads as follows:

> The report of the royal commission on broadcasting 1957, signed by R. M. Fowler, president, Canadian Pulp and Paper Association; Edmond Turcotte, ambassador; and James Stewart, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, states (page 11):
> "The overwhelming weight of evidence submitted to us—compelled us to report that Canadians wish to have a Canadian broadcasting system . . . want to keep some part of their broadcasting fare Canadian, and are willing within reason, to pay for it."

My comment in this connection would be that there is clear evidence of the value of the work that has been done throughout the years by those who have been charged with the administration of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The second point in this bulletin reads:

> Some 245 organizations representing over six million Canadians submitted briefs of many points of view; but:
> "there was virtual unanimity in favour of a Canadian broadcasting system, supported by moneys from the federal treasury."

Then, this report goes on to list a number of organizations that made representations to the commission and I find eight national religious organizations, and then some 10

French-Canadian organizations, universities and various well known French-Canadian societies, and some 10 labour organizations, headed by the Canadian labour congress; some 9 women's organizations, such as the national council of women of Canada, the Canadian federation of university women, the I.O.D.E., women's institutes, and so on. I am very pleased to see that because I think it is a good omen that the women of Canada should commence to take a great interest in a subject such as this.

Then, I come to agricultural organizations; I see 12 are noted, several of them of national scope, the Canadian federation of agriculture, the co-operative union of Canada and so on. Then, we come to organizations representative of music, drama and the arts, and here we find nine organizations, including the Canadian arts council, the national ballet guild, the Canadian council of authors and artists, the dominion drama festival, the Canadian league of composers, and so on.

Then, interestingly enough, we have eight private radio broadcasting stations, apparently making representations in support of the C.B.C. as the publicly owned body representing the people of Canada to carry on radio, and then some 16 educational organizations such as the Canadian home and school and parent-teachers federation, Canadian association for adult education, national advisory council on school broadcasting and so on, and several of the universities across Canada including this list.

I think, this indicates very clearly that while as the Leader of the Opposition said, there is no organization or group that does not make mistakes under very difficult conditions where we have had this development of television, a very expensive medium of communication in recent years, changed technical conditions, procedures and things of that sort, the C.B.C. has done a wonderful job in this country, which is recognized by the Canadian people as a whole.

I am going to speak very briefly, Mr. Speaker, because as I said before I do not want to repeat what was said by the Leader of the Opposition. This report does make some very concrete recommendations, the first of which on page 13 is as follows:

> That the mixed Canadian system of public and private ownership is here to stay.

One would almost think that that was taken out of the C.C.F. program, Mr. Speaker. Here is a demonstration of the workability, the efficiency and the public accord given to a mixed economy, the first step in that direction on a national scale. Recommendation No. 2 reads:

> That the state agency may grow, as Canada grows, but its functions are not to be extended to do the whole job of providing radio and television services to Canadians.

Quite rightly so. We have found this mixture of public and private enterprise in Canada on the basis of the C.C.F. proposals in this direction throughout the years very suitable indeed. We suggest the necessary direction and control of major policy, but still leaving flexibility for local initiative, local control, and things of that sort.

The third recommendation reads:

> That private stations should individually be required to justify the continued grant of a valuable public franchise and that some may lose their licences because of a shabby performance, but private operators should stop worrying about the bogey of nationalization that has filled them with suspicion and fear in the past.

We in this group do not see much to object to in this paragraph. The fourth recommendation reads:

> That, for the foreseeable future, we will continue to have a single broadcasting system in which all Canadian radio and television stations, public and private, present and future, will be integral parts, regulated and controlled by an agency representing the public interest and responsible to parliament.

One would almost think that this paragraph was written at the C.C.F. national convention. You know, Mr. Speaker, it is strange when somebody else says these things and writes these words. Then, such words as "control" and "regulate" are perfectly respectable, but if we should include such words in a portion of our program or of our manifesto, or things of that sort, the challenge of dictatorship, tyranny and all the rest of it is immediately hurled at us. Therefore, you can see that once again, Mr. Speaker, the members of the other parties in this house and even distinguished people employed by the government in this country on behalf of Canadians are infected by the language, the philosophy and the outlook of the C.C.F.

Mr. Macdonnell: Infected?

Mr. Herridge: "Inoculated" would be a better word, yes, but against the diseases of decadent capitalism.

I have dealt with these four recommendations but I am having some difficulty deciphering the scratches on my paper. I now want to deal briefly with government policy as it has been foreshadowed to a limited extent by the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue. The speech from the throne dealt with a proposal to establish a new agency to regulate broadcasting in Canada and to ensure that the C.B.C. and privately owned stations worked effectively together to constitute a national system to provide satisfactory television and radio services to all Canadians within reach and to set up a select committee on broadcasting.

I have a memo here on points from the address of the Minister of National Revenue, who is responsible for the C.B.C., delivered on June 3, 1958, at page 812 of Hansard. This is one that really butters it up. Honestly, Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of National Revenue has the somewhat exterior appearance of a Conservative, I am of the opinion that if you penetrated, shall I say, his political hide to a slight extent you would find the warmness of heart and the forward-looking view of many C.C.F. members.

Mr. Pickersgill: It takes only one bad apple.

Mr. Herridge: He said:

I think the service which will be given by the C.B.C. to the people of Canada will be one of which all Canadians can be well and truly proud. I want to assure the house . . . that the government and the C.B.C. are conscious of the responsibility which rests upon them, the government to supply the money and the C.B.C. to supply the service. It is my belief and conviction that the C.B.C. will continue to develop this service and provide even a better one than it has previously. I think it is generally recognized . . . of our radio programs that the standard and quality of the C.B.C. will compare favourably with any radio network or any radio system in the world.

We say, "hear, hear" to those sentiments. We are all very glad to hear the minister speak in such proud vein of this publicly owned, controlled and regulated organization and authority. I continue:

In the United States of America there are three television networks, and . . . none of them, as networks, are making much money, if they are breaking even. The United States of America has a population of . . . 170 million. We have a population of . . . 16½ million. We have a national network for television and . . . a French network for television. In other words, we are maintaining two television networks with a population of 16½ million whereas the United States of America is finding great difficulty in maintaining three networks with a population of . . . 170 million. I say therefore that on the whole we are not doing too badly.

I am very glad the minister brought that fact very clearly to the attention of the house. Here is another quotation from the minister's speech:

There has been a great deal said about competition, and I think this should be put on record for the benefit of the C.B.C. In the United States of America, . . . 55 per cent of the area of the United States, has available to it only one television station. In other words, these areas have no competing stations . . . over 55 per cent of the area of the United States of America has available to it only one television station, if any.

That is in the land of the ultimate of free enterprise.

6. —the former government provided enough money to operate the C.B.C. until last October. . . . As a result, the first thing that had to be done last fall was the provision of a vote to enable the C.B.C. to carry on for the balance of the year. This we did.

7. We have provided several million dollars more this year than has ever been provided before for the C.B.C. The service is being expanded as rapidly as possible. . . . there has been criticism of the government for having made too much money available to the C.B.C. I do not subscribe to that for one moment.

There is the progressive approach of the minister coming out in that sentence. I wonder what the Minister of Finance thinks of that sentence uttered by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or of the rest of the speech.

Mr. Herridge: I continue:

8. There has been some suggestion that the C.B.C. has failed to do something; that is simply arrant nonsence. The C.B.C. has not failed or refused to do anything. The C.B.C. has been spending the money which this parliament has made available to it and spending it to the very best effect possible.

We in this group say that that is the best speech made by a Conservative member of the House of Commons on radio broadcasting and television for a good many years.

Mr. Nowlan: Why qualify it?

Mr. Herridge: Before I conclude with my more or less general remarks—

Mr. Walker: Let us have your speech. We have heard the minister's.

Mr. Herridge: I wanted the minister's because I thought it was worth repeating. I think all good things are worth hearing twice. May I say that I think the hon. gentleman is a bit too touchy. I might tell him right now that during the dinner recess a number of his colleagues spoke to me and said that he was rather rude to us in this group earlier in the day.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, may I reply that it is about time the hon. member's group knew the truth about themselves. They are getting it now and they are going to get it from now on.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely that is not a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point or order?

Mr. Walker: I have made my point, Mr. Speaker, yes. I am very fond of the hon. gentleman opposite—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might show his fondness by letting the hon. member for Kootenay West finish his speech.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, you often come to our rescue in the house with words of wisdom. I want to refer briefly now, and I must lay a foundation of fact, to a memorandum submitted to the Minister of National Revenue by the council of broadcasting unions, C.L.C., which I understand represents about 30,000 employees directly related or employed in broadcasting and television. I am not going to read the whole memorandum but I do want to read one paragraph because I think it puts very clearly and well certain attitudes which we in this group support. On page 2 of the memorandum we find the following:

> For we find that the report upholds the validity of the basic policies of our national broadcasting system as developed and defended over the years by responsible Canadians of all parties and of all walks of life. And we believe that a new government, enjoying as it does a very general mandate for the advancement of things Canadian, will not fail to see the wisdom of maintaining and strengthening that single system, for the sake of the greater development of national unity, understanding and culture in the broadest sense of that word.
> We are aware that broadcasting is a complex field, and that its complexities have been deliberately exploited to mislead the well-meaning. Even without the shrill voice of a small and well publicized pressure group, it would be no surprise if many members of the new house were misled by a surface knowledge of apparent facts. Not every Canadian can be privileged to sit on a royal commission on broadcasting. But three royal commissions and thirteen parliamentary committees have reviewed the facts with care over the years. Their findings as to the fundamental facts of Canadian broadcasting have been essentially the same.

I was very interested to note that they made that point because anyone who reads the reports of the committees and the royal commissions will see that that point is very clearly demonstrated.

> The latest royal commission reports that 245 organizations representing some six million Canadians addressed briefs to the latest royal commission. Their views were virtually unanimous and are accurately reflected in the report.

This memorandum is very well drafted and we have been very interested in getting the views of those persons who are directly employed in the industry. I suppose I must get along. I see the hon. member for Rosedale fidgeting again. We in the C.C.F. look on the C.B.C. as a cultural dike, as it were, against United States monopoly of the air in Canada. We look upon it as a great force for the understanding and development of Canadianism in its true sense.

I want to make a comment or two about the private stations before I conclude, even to the discomfort of the hon. member for Rosedale. Many private stations have performed excellent community service but a very interesting thing about them is that there is a very great variation in the service performed by private stations in Canada. In one community you find a private station giving a lot of free time for community purposes, carrying the major C.B.C. news reports and taking a good number of C.B.C. programs.

In other places, particularly the smaller towns and cities, the private stations in our opinion are evading their responsibility to quite an extent.

As the Leader of the Opposition said, the radio and television field is a very lucrative one. It is a plum because franchises can only be given to a limited number of corporations or individuals. I and the other members of this group have repeatedly noticed that while the private stations are great exponents of free enterprise in its purest and should I say, therefore, its mythical form, they are very much opposed to competition coming into play when it is a question of another private station getting a licence in a particular city or town. I hope that the C.B.C. and the authorities who regulate the C.B.C. in the future will pay more attention to that aspect.

I also think that the private stations should be required to carry a minimum quantity of C.B.C. programs, that is, a minimum quantity of C.B.C. news and also provide a definite minimum quantity of community service. I know what happens with some small private stations in this country, as I am sure many other members do. I am speaking particularly of British Columbia because I rarely hear the news here since I am so occupied in the house, in my office and in other ways in Ottawa. I mean other Ottawa offices. I very seldom hear the news here but in British Columbia we will often get the C.B.C. eight o'clock news and then we will get Mulligan's Paint Shop news at noon and Tom Jones Sport Goods news at seven o'clock and so on. I think the private stations should be required to carry at least two or three of the daily national news summaries. I understand it is more profitable to carry a local news report but sometimes they are very poorly drafted. Generally speaking, no newscasters in Canada can excel the C.B.C. announcers for objectivity, enunciation and conciseness in reporting on world and national news. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this mixed economy of radio and television has worked very well indeed and can be improved.

While I have spoken briefly about national policy and the national aspects of the situation, I want to deal for a moment or two with local needs. The minister knows what I am getting at. I never speak on this question without thinking of the miners, lumbermen, prospectors, trappers, the people who live in the backwoods in numbers of constituencies in Canada and who to date because of certain circumstances have been denied the opportunity to listen to Canadian radio programs on any satisfactory basis. In that connection the Fowler report mentions the necessity for some 74 low power relay stations across Canada, if I remember the number correctly. I do urge the government to give early consideration to the needs of these people and their requests by the establishment of low power relay stations.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker,—and I see a smile coming over the face of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker)—while we in the C.C.F. admit that we cannot see into the future in all directions, although we have been proved to be correct many times in this house, there are changing conditions and circumstances that will require change in administration and changes in procedures and things of that sort. We recognize the good work that has been done by the C.B.C. in the past and therefore fundamentally, while there may be changes in administration to meet changing conditions, the excellent work of the administration and the procedures used today. We want the C.B.C. in the future to be given every opportunity to meet the needs of all Canadians in Canada for satisfactory radio and satisfactory television. We want an effective and fair administration which will demonstrate, as I said before, the value of the mixed economy in radio and television and, shall I say, the basic soundness of C.C.F. principles in this direction.

I now come to the conclusion of my address. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the amendment be further amended by adding thereto the following words:

And this house further regrets that the government has not declared itself in support of the maintenance and expansion of publicly owned facilities in the field of radio and television.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to support the amendment which was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) earlier this afternoon and which in effect was critical of the government for the delay in bringing down its policy with reference to the operation, regulation and control of radio broadcasting and television in Canada, at the same time regretting the fact that there was no attempt by the government to remove the uncertainty in this field as to the future of radio and television broadcasting in Canada.

To those of us who sit on this side of the house it is surprising that the government has thus far not seen fit to announce its policy in that regard. As a matter of fact, in this important field of telecommunications, the government has been strangely silent. Still, Mr. Speaker, when they were on this side of the house, they were highly critical, not only of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation but more particularly of the government and its policies with reference to the manner in which this field of communications was handled. They were bitter and sometimes violent in their criticism. Now that they have the responsibility of office they are, as I said earlier, silent. They have been in office now for over a year and it seems to me that in that time it would have been possible for the government to bring down a policy which was tantamount to what had been recommended by the Fowler commission.

It is true, on the other hand, that this is a field which is highly technical in its nature. It is a field with which the average individual or—and I am sure I am not casting any reflection on members of the house when I say this—the average member of parliament is not too conversant unless he has had an opportunity of reading carefully the various reports. However that may be, the government has before it at the present time a very comprehensive and thorough report which was read in part by the Leader of the Opposition. I refer to the report of the Fowler commission on broadcasting. Some very timely recommendations were made by it. Therefore in my opinion there is no reason why up until this time there should not have been some positive statement from the other side of the house.

This afternoon we had the opportunity of debate on a motion to extend the sittings of the house and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) at that time indicated that he intended to bring down legislation that was mentioned in the speech from the throne. It strikes me also that this extremely important legislation having to do with this field of telecommunications is legislation which should have been brought down earlier, that it is legislation which, because of its importance, should have been considered not in the dying days of the session but during the earlier part of the session.

The procedure in the application for radio and television licences in Canada is as follows. An application is made to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) by either an individual or a corporation seeking the establishment of one or other of these media. If the application is found to be in order from a technical standpoint; if the application, after it has been considered by the officers of the Department of Transport, is found to be in order; and if it is also approved from other telecommunications aspects, it is then sent to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for study and consideration. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at a public hearing considers the briefs that are from time to time made to it in public, then makes a recommendation to the Minister of Transport who, under the statute, has authority to issue and grant the licence.

The main requirement for a station is, of course, a frequency or channel. These frequencies or channels, as they are called, belong not to any individual and not to any group. They are part of the public domain. They are the property of the Canadian people and as such they should be developed for the use of all Canadians, not just for the use of a small number of individuals and not just for the use of those who are anxious to make a profit or those who are anxious to make a killing at the expense of the public domain or at the expense of this natural resource.

I should like to say a few words also about the principles which I think are at the basis of a sound television policy. First, however, let me say that the development and growth of this nation has been the result of a partnership between private enterprise on the one hand and public ownership on the other. The outstanding examples of this, of course, are the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway. There was a time when the railway lines of what is today the Canadian National Railways were in an extremely unsound position financially or were in bankruptcy and parliament, because of the fact that it desired to save these lines established the crown company and granted to the Canadian National Railways the power to develop and operate the non-paying lines. It was because of the attitude of parliament at that time that it was possible to assist those lines by means of public ownership under the aegis and jurisdiction of the Canadian National Railways and at the same time to assist the privately-owned Canadian Pacific railway.

The same thing can be said in the field of aviation. There the parliament of this country decided that it would be well to have a national air line and to assist that national air line, in the form of Trans-Canada Air Lines, to operate essential services, not only across our country but to other parts of the world. While that was being done on the one hand aid was continuously being given to private enterprise to operate air lines in our country.

The same applies to the Canadian Overseas Telecommunications Corporation, a crown corporation established by this house some years ago. It has been operating successfully in the field of telecommunications, submarine cables and of Marconi wireless, side by side with private enterprise. Rates for carrying goods and persons have been set by a public body to ensure the best possible service to the public and at the same time to ensure that the facilities themselves could remain in existence in order to bind our nation together.

The history of our nation indicates that public ownership and private enterprise have succeeded side by side. There have of course been struggles but in the long run national interest has won out. The partnership of private and public enterprise has been successfully carried on though at times, not without some acrimony. However, if we are to continue to grow this partnership must be maintained in the field of telecommunications, and particularly in the field of radio and television. That is our view on this side of the house; we believe it is the only way in which we can have a Canadian nation.

In the early days of radio there were many patriotic Canadians who were fearful lest control of broadcasting should fall entirely into the hands of United States chains. This was not because of anti-United States sentiment or because we did not like United States broadcasting—there is much to commend United States stations—it was because we wanted the greater part of the Canadian broadcasting system to be of Canadian origin and content.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has contributed a great deal to the keeping of this country definitely and distinctively Canadian, and we owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to the corporation in that respect. Had it not been for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation monopolies in the field of radio from the United States would have moved in and, I am sure, would have taken control. Here we have a nation of 17 million people living alongside a nation of 170 million people, which speaks the language of our majority and is rich, inventive and has a highly developed broadcasting system of its own. No other country is similarly helped and embarrassed by the close proximity of the United States to use the words of the report of the Fowler commission on radio broadcasting. The natural flow of trade, as that report says, as well as of travel and of ideas, runs north and south. We have tried to make it run, in some part though of course not all of it, east and west. This we have tried to do at considerable cost, but we have been willing to do it because it has meant the maintenance of Canadian programs, the maintenance of our way of life and the maintenance of a Canadian nation. The result has been the retention of a Canadian identity, art and culture and, in essence, the maintenance of Canadian nationhood.

That is why I said earlier, and now repeat, that we are deeply indebted to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for its contribution in this field. It has succeeded in avoiding a condition in the fields of radio and television which was feared by many citizens when this medium of telecommunication began; it has succeeded in avoiding a condition which was referred to in an editorial appearing on April 13, 1932 in the Winnipeg Free Press which I should now like to quote to the house:

> The radio issue now being decided at Ottawa is quite simple and very easily grasped. There is a choice between a national system and the handing over of the radio-supporting public of Canada to the radio monopolies of the United States. All the pleas put forth on behalf of private control of radio in Canada, no matter how plausibly presented, nor how strongly backed by eminent figures in the world of finance, are in support of a system which, in its practical working out will make Canada a subordinate annex of the United States radio-land and give the final (if concealed) voice in the decisions of how radio is to be operated in Canada to purely commercial interests, American in character.
> The day of the small detached and supposedly independent radio station is about over in Canada. If the field is left to private enterprise, there will be rapid consolidation of these stations into a combination. We shall have a privately-owned monopoly of the air, and this monopoly will operate in harmony with the great radio monopoly of the United States—the harmony that always exists between the boss that gives orders and the dependant subordinate who obeys them.

If this is true with reference to radio, and the editorial to which I have referred dealt only with radio of course at that time how much more is it true with reference to television? What we are interested in is the Canadian content of our programs. We believe the Canadian people want programs of Canadian origination and not canned programs coming in from the United States. This policy is based upon the recommendations which were brought before parliament in the early years and among those who stated the principles on which radio should be operated —with which principles I and those on this side of the house are in full agreement—was none other than the late Lord Bennett. I should now like to quote his words, because I think they are replete with soundness and apply not only to radio of the day but also to television today. His words may be found at page 3035 of Hansard for May 18, 1932 as follows:

> First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such control radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened. Other and alternative systems may meet requirements of other countries, and in any case it is not my purpose to comment unfavourably upon those systems. But it seems to me clear that in Canada the system we can most profitably employ is one which, in operation and control, responds most directly to the popular will and the national need. In this stage of our national development we have problems peculiar to ourselves and we must reach a solution of them through the employment of all available means. The radio has a place in the solution of all those problems. It becomes, then, the duty of parliament to safeguard it in such a way that its fullest benefits may be assured to the people as a whole.

And still a little further on, the late Lord Bennett continues:

> No other scheme than that of public ownership can ensure to the people of this country, without regard to class or place, equal enjoyment of the benefits and pleasures of radio broadcasting.

And again:

> The use of the air, or the air itself, whatever you may please to call it, that lies over the soil or the land of Canada is a natural resource over which we have complete jurisdiction under a recent decision of the Privy Council. In view of these circumstances and of the further fact that broadcasting is a science that is only yet in its infancy and about which we know little yet, I cannot think that any government would be warranted in leaving the air to private exploitation and not reserving it for development for the use of the people.

These are words which I think will commend themselves to all parts of this house. They are, it seems to me, a sound basis for not only a radio broadcasting policy but for a television policy as well. We believe that those same principles should continue to be applied in Canada. In fact, the late Lord Bennett's statement is more applicable today than it was then; we believe that his views are still appropriate today.

Now I would ask hon. members to contrast that statement with the words of a former leader of the opposition which can be found at page 410 of Hansard of December 8, 1952. They are the words of the Hon. Mr. Drew, and I quote:

> If the concept of the C.B.C., in relation to this new medium of communicating thoughts, news and pictures of events as well, is to be carried forward consistently with the original idea, then surely it should be the purpose of the C.B.C. to provide television broadcasts in those areas where private broadcasting will not find it economically convenient to do so.

What is the meaning of those words? It is, to my way of thinking, that private interests are to operate where there is money to be made and that the C.B.C. is not to have a chance to gain revenue with which to improve and expand its system for the benefit of all Canadians. What is being defended in this statement is that this great Canadian resource which belongs to the people of Canada should be handed over in those parts which are "a sure thing", a profitable venture, to private individuals or corporations, and then let Canada put up money out of general taxation to provide television in those areas where it cannot pay. And here I go on to complete the idea expressed by the former leader of the opposition:

> That was the intention of the C.B.C. in relation to radio broadcasting. If the same principle is carried forward, then surely the whole purpose of the C.B.C. in relation to television should be to let the private stations, without public expense, broadcast the television broadcasts in the great areas of concentrated population where that is financially possible, and for the C.B.C. to provide the television broadcasts in those areas where the ordinary financial returns will not justify private investment.

Is this to be the policy of the government? I think the house has a right to know, and to ask the government what its policy is, and that is what the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition seeks to do. Is the policy of the government to be based on the principles laid down by the late Lord Bennett? Is the policy of the government to be based upon the principles held by the former leader of the opposition which I have just quoted. Or are the recommendations of the Fowler commission to be carried out.

Now may I turn to another subject, and that is the matter of new stations in areas now being served. Thus far the so-called single channel policy has been applied to the development of television in Canada. Following the report of the Massey commission in 1952 the policy of granting one television licence in each of the main geographical areas of Canada was adopted. After television stations were established in Toronto and Montreal, the C.B.C. began the construction and operation of stations in Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Halifax. No two stations were to be licensed to serve the same area. And then, at page 226 of the royal commission report, the former minister of national revenue, who was responsible for the policy of television and for the C.B.C., is reported as saying:

> The principle of one station to an area is to apply only until an adequate national television system is developed. At the rate that applications for stations are now being received it may not be long before there is a sufficient degree of national coverage to justify the government and the C.B.C. giving consideration to permitting two or perhaps in some cases more than two stations in certain areas. It is anticipated that, in due course, private stations will be permitted in areas covered by C.B.C. stations, and the C.B.C. may establish stations in some areas originally covered by private stations.

There is today, as the house knows, a strong public demand for the granting of licences for second stations, and I ask: what is the policy of the government with respect to that? The Fowler commission at page 233 asks three questions which, I am sure, the Minister of National Revenue has carefully studied and they are as follows:

> (1) When should the "single channel" policy be abandoned?
> [Mr. Chevrier.]
> (2) To whom should second licences be granted?
> (3) On what terms should second licences be granted?

The answers are discussed at some length and I think we on this side of the house are entitled to know what the policy will be in reference to those single channel stations.

Next I should like to say something about the French language stations in Canada. The report of the royal commission deals with that matter in a full chapter. I believe the report deals with it in an understanding and sympathetic manner, and I commend the reading of this chapter of the report which will be found at page 237 et sequentia. It is stated in that chapter that there are several principles governing the operation and control of French language stations in Canada. There have been demands by a number of inhabitants of Canada who are not in receipt of any broadcasting facilities whatsoever, or from those in areas where the programs, though available, are untimely or of inadequate quality. One of these groups is in the maritime provinces. In the centre of New Brunswick, in western Nova Scotia and on Cape Breton island there are important groups of French-speaking Canadians out of range of any service at all, whether of radio or television, in their own language. I submit that the C.B.C. should examine this question and see if it is not possible to bring its French language radio service to these groups in the maritime provinces. Consideration should be given to the establishment of a television station at Moncton, which is an important cultural and educational centre of that province. I am sure my colleagues from the maritime provinces on this side of the house, if they take part in this debate, will want to deal with that subject and probably will deal with it more effectively than I can.

There are four French language television stations in the prairie provinces, at St. Boniface, Edmonton, Saskatoon and Gravelbourg. They are not commercial stations in any sense of the word. They are rendering a public service and have received assistance from the three prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as by substantial contributions from the province of Quebec. These four stations are operating under extremely difficult and trying circumstances. The question is how long will they be able to continue? They need assistance. I say respectfully that the government should not allow these stations to disappear. It should study in what manner it can best assist them.

And now I turn with great satisfaction to a statement which I find in the chapter referred to earlier, that section of the report concerning French broadcasting stations in the province of Ontario. At page 240 we find these words:

In the province of Ontario, a new and rather gratifying phenomenon of Canadian life was discovered by the commission. It is the growing acceptance, at least by the more alert and reflective elements of the community, of the French language as a leaven of cultural growth for the whole of Canadian life. From several English speaking sources came the request that a way be found to bring the French radio network service to Toronto.

At this point let me quote a portion of the brief presented by the Ontario modern language teachers' association which reads in part as follows:

The French language occupies an important position on the curriculum of all secondary schools in the province of Ontario. Its prominent place on the high school program was likely due at one time to the proximity of this province to the province of Quebec. As time went on, however, the study of French proved itself as an effective academic discipline to the extent that it has all but taken over the position once held by Latin. An estimated 80 per cent of the students proceeding to university elect French as the language to be studied in their final year in the secondary school ....We do realize that so much of the teachers' time is required for the formal academic study of the French language that insufficient attention is often given to making certain that each of the 35 or 40 pupils in each class attains a satisfactory fluency in speaking French. Nevertheless, those students who, after completing the French courses in our high schools, find themselves in a French environment, develop very quickly a fluency equal to the needs of ordinary communication. An opportunity to hear French-language broadcasts of a popular nature which stimulate greatly the students' interest in the spoken language and would be only slightly less effective than an extended visit among French people....The enthusiasm with which students speak of French programs which they have heard by radio or in the cinema seems to indicate that such broadcasts would enjoy a large and receptive audience particularly in the urban centres.

Having quoted this brief, I have no hesitation in saying that it does a great deal to weld and unite the various parts which go to make up our country. I should like to pause here for a moment and contrast that statement with another statement which was made by the grand master of the Orange Lodge in Montreal recently as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 27, 1958:

Leslie H. Saunders of Toronto, grand master of the Grand Orange Lodge of British America, says he is opposed to compulsory courses in French language for Ontario schools.

He said: "Canada is not a bilingual country. It is English-speaking with a bilingual province."

Addressing the annual conference of the lodge yesterday he said French and English language courses might be of value in Quebec, where most of the population was French Canadian. But even this province had 500,000 English-speaking persons.

Mr. Maloney: Why do you not read the editorial they wrote about it, too?

Mr. Chevrier: Unfortunately I have not got it. I read the statement as I found it in this press clipping.

Mr. Deschatelets: Why does the hon. member for Parkdale not make his own speeches?

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to say that fortunately for this country the grand master represents a very small and not too important group in Canada.

Mr. Bigg: Why quote him, then?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure that the vast majority of the membership of this house does not approve of that kind of statement because have we not had a repeated example in this house on the part of various ministers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself of a desire to speak the French language? I was in Quebec not long ago and listened to the Prime Minister speak for some time in the French language and I believe he must really have imposed upon himself a strict course of study of the language in order for him to speak for the length of time he did on the important subject he discussed. The same may be said of my leader who not only is able to speak French correctly but who understands the language as does the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I put those two attitudes in juxtaposition because I believe they dramatically illustrate two points of view, one of them fast disappearing in this country. I would even invite my hon. friend, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) to some day rise in the house and regale the house in the French language. I am sure, if he wanted to, he could do so. In so doing he would be following along the lines of many prominent members of his own party.

Let me now ask this question, Mr. Speaker. What is the future of radio broadcasting in Canada? My leader dealt with that at some length and most efficiently. All I need say in that respect is that the Fowler report on broadcasting shows that conditions in Canada have changed very materially since 1936. At that time there were 75 radio stations in Canada, television had not yet appeared on the scene and the total cost for the public broadcasting system was approximately $2 million. Today there are 189 radio stations, 38 television stations and the annual public cost amounts to approximately $40 million. The task of regulating and supervising the Canadian broadcasting system, is, therefore, a different one from that envisaged in those years.

Now that a substantial Canadian system for both radio and television has been created, a different task lies ahead. Accordingly, it is suggested that the present Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be abolished and replaced by a new board of broadcast governors which would have responsibility for all public and private broadcasting in Canada. There would also be established a corporation to be known as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which would have powers and responsibilities similar to those of the present C.B.C.

Is this the best method of regulating and supervising broadcasting in this country? The Fowler royal commission thought so after 14 months of study and investigation. What does the government think?

We have a good broadcasting system in this country. The joining together in one system of public and private ownership suits Canada and serves Canadians well. The concept is a good one. We would be wise to keep it very much as it is but improve and strengthen it. So thought the commission, Mr. Speaker. What is the government going to do about it?

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, in regard to the C.B.C., I should like to refer to one particular point, that of programs. However, may I point out in passing that it is quite logical that Canada should not be entirely deprived of its national radio and television network. The government must continue to subsidize the C.B.C. as long as we expect the corporation to discharge those responsibilities that private enterprise is incapable of assuming, i.e. serving the people of Canada in areas of the country where sources of revenue are clearly inadequate. On the other hand it would also be logical to put an end to this undesirable type of monopoly and, in so doing, give the private stations a chance to share in the creation of a Canadian radio and television service.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to give strict orders to the proper authorities that close supervision be exercised on television programs of all types, and to censor them if required in the interest of morality. Certain programs are most distressing in their effects on the hearts and minds of people.

The influence of television on the subconscious cannot be exaggerated. It especially affects young people at the most impressionable stage of their development. It reaches into homes, thus affecting the family in a most intimate way. All this goes to show how necessary it is to provide strict control over television broadcasts so that they may not have permanent effects on hearts and minds.

There could be nothing more pernicious or destructive of the spiritual strength of the nation, than this repeated spectacle, in the very heart of the family circle, and before so many innocent young eyes of impressive scenes of pleasure, of passion and of sin that can permanently upset and destroy all that had been done to make youngsters upstanding, good and well educated from an individual or social point of view. Television should be a medium of wholesome entertainment for people, while at the same time and in all circumstances contributing to their education and moral uplift.

Not only should television refrain from evil but it should be a positive means of education. Against the advocacy of sovereign art and of freedom of thought and expression must be invoked the superior and inalienable rights of conscience, of the soul exalted to supernatural life. I urge the Minister of National Revenue to bring pressure to bear on the authorities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in order that they apply severe censorship on their programs:

1. To oppose objectionable programs by demanding the application of the law against licentiousness in literary and artistic productions.

2. To foster the production of programs of high moral and aesthetic value.

I hope that programs dealing with murder, gangsters, firearms, and crime will disappear from our television screens. Those programs are damaging to our young people.

Let the C.B.C. do away with smutty stories, and with daring costumes worn by some performers. They too often forget that art by no means calls for scanty attire.

It is not Christian to picture a depraved, corrupt humanity, without hope or nobility of soul.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could the hon. member read a bit more slowly?

Mr. Pigeon: I shall be pleased to comply with the hon. member's request.

Let people stand indicted who dare maintain that a certain form of broadcasting can be exploited, developed and exalted, even though grievously offensive to morals, as long as it can claim artistic or technical value.

I point out, sir, that I have some notes before me; I prefer consulting them to talking nonsense as some hon. members of the opposition are doing.

Mr. Speaker, television should be at the service of truth, honestly inform the public, without overlooking the moral aspect of any news broadcast to the public, provide culture as well as entertainment to viewers, and carefully train them not so much that they may authorize themselves to see immoral shows but so that they may judge what is presented to them and learn to profit from what they see and hear.

C.B.C. authorities should, more than ever, consider the moral aspect of radio and television broadcasts. The familial character of television should exclude any objectionable production . . .

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must remind him that he is getting away from the text of the amendment which concerns the regulation and financing of the C.B.C. The question of the quality of programs does not come within the purview of the proposed amendment. I would ask the hon. member to stick closer to the text of the amendment.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point of order, I am of the opinion that the quality of the programs comes within the purview of the amendment, since the production of programs is related to the financing of the C.B.C. In fact, some fees which are being paid to certain writers and performers form an important part of the financing of radio and television, and believe that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) should be allowed to carry on his remarks in this connection.

Mr. Pigeon: I thank the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) for siding with me.

The family character of television should exclude from the T.V. screen anything that would be objectionable in a respectable living room, such as the vulgarity of cabarets and nights clubs, scanty attire, lascivious or suggestive dancing, scenes of violence, robberies, plays that make a mockery of marital faithfulness and parental authority.

The C.B.C. should keep a closer supervision over the choice of television theater programs and feature films in which family and marriage are not always respected.

The C.B.C. should set strict standards in the matter of modesty in dress on the part of dancers and perfomers, as well as with respect to the choice of ballet themes.

The C.B.C. should also enlist the co-operation of qualified advisers, and authorities especially those familiar with the various fields of human endeavour.

Why not get them together in several advisory committees that would meet periodically, for instance once a month, to criticize the programs concerning their own specialty and to make suggestions to authorities and directors. Those committees would also be useful in stimulating opinion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! I am sorry to interrupt again the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm but, after considering more closely the amendment now before us and the comments made by the hon. member for Hull, I feel I should again remind the house that this amendment now under study deals precisely, as it is well said, with "regulation" and "financing", that is to say the regulation and financing of radio and television programs, but not with their moral quality.

If the hon. member wants to discuss the financing of these programs, I think he would be perfectly in order. But the moral quality of broadcasts can hardly be dealt with in relation to the amendment before me. I would ask hon. members to try to adhere as much as possible to the terms of the amendment during the discussion of this bill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I make a remark to the point of order?

As a matter of fact we have been discussing the Massey report all evening, also the report of the Fowler Royal Commission and the Aird report. Now, the Fowler report, of which I have a copy before me now, deals in several chapters with the very matter the hon. member is now discussing. I therefore think that the amendment as well as the sub-amendment without specifically referring to the remarks just made by the hon. member, are germane to the present discussion. I submit this with all due deference and respect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to point out to the hon. members that I did not say that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm was out of order; I just asked him to adhere as closely as possible to the terms of the amendment. Indeed, if you read the amendment and the sub-amendment thereto you will see that they more particularly concern the regulations and financing of the C.B.C. by the government.

It is now my duty under clause 2 of standing order 59 to ask hon. members to deviate as little as possible from matters concerning the amendment now under discussion by the house. I therefore once more ask the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, and honourable representatives, to speak closely to the matter before the house.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your remarks. I intend to depart somewhat from the matter of C.B.C. financing and to say a word more especially about the programs which are given on television. In fact, I was saying that the C.B.C. should enlist competent advisers and various personalities specially versed in the various fields of human activity. Why not group those personalities into several advisory committees that would meet, for instance, once a month to criticize the programs in their particular field of interest and make suggestions to the authorities and to the producers? Those committees would serve also to stimulate public opinion, of which they would be the natural representatives.

They could also advise C.B.C. authorities in the assessment and selection of suggestions sent in by viewers. Members of those committees would receive a fee for their services, which should certainly not overburden too much the budget of the C.B.C.

Self-criticism and research bodies.

Within the framework of the C.B.C., I would be glad to see, if possible, the creation of self-criticism and research bodies. The first would make preliminary censorship of programs, in so far as interest, artistic and moral value are concerned. It would determine the rating of each program, taking into consideration their intrinsic value as well as their acceptable popularity.

To that self-criticism body, I would add a creative body.

No doubt the ideal would be to trust duly qualified producers, who would be reasonably paid and free from financial worries. But will we ever be able to reach such an ideal?

The body that I propose would concern itself with creative work in lieu and place of the producers. The latter would then be chiefly responsible for the production proper. Some of the policies of the C.B.C. in the past have been and still are, undemocratic. Some authorized programs are biased and prejudiced. Reforms are in order.

A cleanup job is necessary in the C.B.C. It is high time something was done.

Television and radio must be means for culture and education, and not a vehicle for biased propaganda. That is a very generally held opinion so why not, in so far as it is possible, do a cleanup job, eradicate all those who have neither conscience nor any wish of mending their ways?

This is not moralism, but morals. Nobody wants to persecute anybody else, but we should rid our television screens and our radio waves from a whole coterie of pseudo-artists who have never understood the meaning of human dignity.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

The C.B.C. should not allow leftists and socializers to enjoy the lion's share of the network.

At certain times the C.B.C. has become the preserve of socialists. They know that full well. This explains why they fear anything that might threaten to remove the C.B.C. from their control.

I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to give orders to the proper authorities, if possible, so that programs may become more Christian and more in line with moral standards. Let there be a little cleanup job in the C.B.C.; let us throw out these people with warped ideas, leftist ideas, who grab half the television programs, such as, for example—and I have no hesitation at all in naming them—Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Gerard Pelletier and Jean-Louis Gagnon who should be permanently kept away from the national network. To my mind these people spread warped ideas, ideas which are counter to the ideals of our people.

I ask the Minister of National Revenue to advise the proper authorities in the C.B.C. to put the brakes on these socialist-minded people, on these leftists who will not rest content until the whole nation is socialized. Let these gentlemen be replaced by people imbued with democratic and Christian ideas.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words with regard to the C.B.C. and to television.

The people of Quebec are fed up with seeing and hearing all these whited sepulchres denouncing private enterprise, but who nevertheless fatten on income derived from taxation, i.e. from taxes on private enterprise. They are dangerous parasites. It is high time to put an end to the activity of these people who dilute their socialism—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: We will continue with this debate tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Could we find out what the business will be for Wednesday?

Mr. Green: If the debate finishes tomorrow we will then go on with the second reading of the bill to amend the Yukon Act; then second reading of the bill to amend the National Parks Act respecting the boundaries of Cape Breton Highlands national park; then the resolution concerning the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the intention being to refer the bill when through second reading to the standing committee on agriculture; then second reading of the bill respecting the taxation of estates, this bill to go to the standing committee on banking and commerce; then second reading of two bills concerning conventions for the avoidance of double taxation, one with Belgium and the other with the Belgian Congo and the territory of Ruanda-Urundi.

Mr. Chevrier: Will we go on with government business in this order on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: I am not quite sure of the order. We may take budget resolutions also.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SKIM MILK POWDER FLOOR PRICE

Question No. 49—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from any groups or association to review the decision to decrease the floor price of roller and spray skim milk powder?

2. If so, what reply has the government made to these representations?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. Yes.

2. It was pointed out that during the past year milk powder production in Canada had increased by approximately 60 per cent over the previous year, which indicated that the price of 17 cents per pound was an incentive to production and that some downward adjustment was necessary to balance supply with possible disposal, and that despite the lower price support for dry skimmed milk the dairy farmers' position would be better than in the earlier part of 1957 due to the increase of 6 cents per pound from 58 cents to 64 cents in the price support on butter.

POTATOES—FLOOR PRICE, ESSEX AND KENT COUNTIES

Question No. 75—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

Has the agricultural prices stabilization board received a request from the potato growers of Essex and Kent counties that their produce be put under the Agricultural Stabilization Act for purposes of having a floor price applied to potatoes?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

An inquiry has been received from the Kent and Elgin potato co-operative asking if the early potato crop in southwestern Ontario was eligible for assistance under the stabilization act and also requesting information as to procedure to be followed to obtain price assistance.

POSTAL SERVICE—COST ASCERTAINMENT STUDIES

Question No. 149—Mr. Benidickson:

1. When did the cost ascertainment section of the post office make its last studies to determine the financial position respecting the handling of various classes of mail?

2. What was the section's last estimate of profit or loss for handling each class of mail?

3. Did the last cost ascertainment specially evaluate the probable profit or loss of handling second class mail printed in the United States of America?

4. If so, what were the conclusions?

Answer by: Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General):

1. October 1955 and March 1956.
2. See statement below marked "A".
3. No.
4. See answer to No. 3.

APPENDIX

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MINISTER OF FINANCE AND MANITOBA PROVINCIAL TREASURER

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada

Ottawa, March 14th, 1958.

The Honourable Charles E. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer,
Province of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Dear Mr. Greenlay:

In reply to your letter of March 7, 1958, respecting the basic stabilization amount, I must substantially repeat what I said in the House of Commons on January 29, 1958.

The purpose of Section 5(4)(a) was to ensure that no province would receive less for the fiscal year ending in 1959 than 95 per cent of its total tax rental, equalization, and stabilization payments applicable for the fiscal year ending in 1958. The stabilization payment was to be related not to the payments for the current year but to the actual payments made in the preceding year or, when applicable, the average of the actual payments for the two preceding years. If it had been the intention of parliament to do what you suggest, the government of that day would have worded the subsection in a manner which would have related stabilization to the current rates of standard taxes and not to the actual payments received in preceding years.

There has been no reduction in the protection afforded your province by stabilization. Your province remains entitled to the same stabilization subsequent to the amendment as it did prior to the amendment. What change there was, is to the advantage of your province. The tax rental payment and tax equalization payment for 1958-59 will be larger by the amount of the 3 per cent increase in the standard individual income tax than they would have been had no such change been made.

Yours very truly,
Donald M. Fleming.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA
Department of Provincial Treasurer
Office of The Minister
Winnipeg

March 14, 1958.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Thank you for your letter of March 6, 1958, in which you confirmed certain of our calculations respecting the possible yields to Manitoba in 1958-59 under the tax-sharing arrangements.

Your comments respecting the basic assumptions underlying those calculations have been noted, particularly those relating to the significance for the tax arrangement payments of any lag that might occur between a decline in profit levels and the reflection of that decline in corporate tax collections.

Yours very truly,
Chas. E. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA
Department of Provincial Treasurer
Office of The Minister
Winnipeg

March 7, 1958.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Mr. Fleming:

In your letter of February 20, 1958, respecting the estimated tax arrangement payments to the provinces under the new 13-9-50 standard tax formula, you indicated to us that it was not the intention of the federal government to have the 13-9-50 formula apply in the determination of stabilization payments for the 1958-59 fiscal year, though it was to have effect in the determination of the rental and equalization payments for that year.

In our view, this differentiation between the stabilization payments on the one hand and the rental and equalization payments on the other seems rather inconsistent and, frankly, difficult to justify—particularly since as a result the "95 per cent of last year's revenue" guaranteed minimum has become practically meaningless. If the 13-9-50 formula is not employed in the determination of the stabilization payments, the so-called "95 per cent minimum" for Manitoba for 1958-59, on the basis of the data presently available to us, means a guaranteed revenue of $30,732,500, or only 85 per cent of what the province would have received in 1957-58 if the 13-9-50 formula had been in effect that year—effectively, then, an "85 per cent minimum".

You and your colleagues would not, we are sure, deliberately reduce in any way the relative measure of protection available to the provinces under the tax-sharing arrangements. Yet the "interim" amendments introduced to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act last January have, unfortunately, resulted in such a reduction! It is our view that steps should be taken immediately to correct this situation, and we therefore strongly urge that the federal government at the first opportunity amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to enable the 13-9-50 formula to apply in the determination of the stabilization payments for 1958-59 as well as in the determination of the rental and equalization payments for that year, so that the present inconsistency in the arrangements will be eliminated and the high relative measure of protection formerly enjoyed by the provinces under the arrangements will be restored to them.

Yours very truly,
Chas. E. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer.

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada
Ottawa, March 6, 1958.

The Honourable Charles S. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer,
Province of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Dear Mr. Greenlay:

I have your letter of March 4 and while there is little of substance that I can add to my earlier remarks, I appreciate your dilemma and will do all in my power to assist you. You will appreciate, of course, that anything at this stage that deals with future levels of income is purely conjectural. This, as I said before, is one of the big difficulties with the use of current figures in determining payments under the existing fiscal arrangements.

You have asked me to confirm that if you make certain basic assumptions, the yield to Manitoba in 1958/59 will be $32,250,000. This is substantially correct. The question, however, could be asked whether or not the basic assumptions are supportable.

As far as standard individual income taxes are concerned, there does not seem any likelihood of any substantial change from present levels. Therefore your assumption may be assumed to be essentially correct. Standard succession duty estimates are on a three year average at the present time and I think some small increase might be anticipated, but this is of no great significance.

Your second assumption is that there would be no change in the population of any of the provinces from 1957 to 1958. Inasmuch as the equalization payments depend on per capita levels of standard taxes and as there has been a tendency for Manitoba's population to increase at a somewhat slower rate than Ontario's and British Columbia's, this assumption could lead to errors. As a reasonable estimate of population in 1958 could be made on the basis of the same rate of change as between the previous two years, I think this might be given consideration.

Your estimate on the level of corporate profits is that they would drop by 20 per cent from 1957 to 1958 and that the standard tax yields from this field would drop by the same percentage. A drop of 20 per cent would reflect a more serious curtailment of business activity than is now forecast. While estimates are very tentative at this stage, they do indicate a drop in profits but not of this size. Something in the neighbourhood of 5 per cent would currently seem more probable, although in view of the volatile nature of profits this could easily change either way during the year.

It is very difficult to give a concise answer to the question of the reflection of profit levels on collections. By the regulations, a seven months' lag is provided for in calculating payments under the Federal Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act and it would seem probable that this would adequately care for any lag of the nature to which you refer. In our preliminary payments, of course, this does not apply directly, but we attempt to give consideration to this factor in determining payments. I believe, therefore, that this lag factor could be largely ignored, in view of the tentative nature of the date with which we must work at the present time.

As to individual income tax in relation to personal income, I think collections are largely consistent with changes, both on account of the payroll deduction methods and due to the fact that a lag for collections from the taxation year has been provided here as well as for corporation taxes, in this case, of three months.

Again I regret my inability to give you more accurate information but in a tax-sharing arrangement such as this, I am faced with the same difficulties as you are in forecasting revenue. I am glad, however, to provide what assistance I can.

Yours very truly,
Donald M. Fleming.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA
Department of Provincial Treasurer
Office of The Minister
Winnipeg
March 4, 1958.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

Thank you for your letter of February 20, 1958, confirming that the estimates that have so far been available to Manitoba of its possible 1958-59 tax arrangement revenues have in fact been based on 1957 tax information, not on projected 1958 data, and that the actual payments to be made to the province next year, therefore, may well differ substantially from these estimated figures. We would have preferred to receive a more definite estimate, of the tax-sharing arrangement payments the province could expect next year, but can certainly appreciate your reluctance at this stage to take any particular forecasts or projections respecting these payments.

You indicated in your letter that for the purposes of your own estimates, you were using the figures for the tax-sharing arrangement payments that were tabled in the House of Commons—the figures based on 1957 tax information. At the same time, however, you have recognized, as we do, that "there very well may be substantial differences when these payments are finally determined". The possible magnitude of those differences is of course what we in the provinces must keep in mind in our planning for next year.

Therefore, while we do appreciate that perhaps in view of this uncertainty in the present situation it might not be well for the federal government to issue to the provinces any definite forecasts of their respective tax arrangement payments in the coming fiscal year, we are hopeful that you and your officials will be able to assist us in preparing our own forecast figures. You will recall that in our letter of February 17, 1958, we mentioned that we had estimated that if corporate profits were to drop by 20 per cent in 1958 the 13-9-50 formula in 1958-59 might produce for Manitoba not $35,755,000, but $32,250,000. In arriving at this estimate the following three basic assumptions were made:

(1) that there would be no change in any of the provinces in the standard individual income tax yields and standard succession duty yields from 1957 to 1958, assuming, of course, that the standard tax rates will be adjusted in accordance with the provisions of the tax-sharing arrangements to compensate for the tax changes introduced since 1956.

(2) that there would be no change in the population of any of the provinces from June 1, 1957, to June 1, 1958. We realize that this assumption has no real foundation in fact, but are willing to use the 1957 figures in our computations for the time being, recognizing that the 1958 figures that will be available next summer will require certain changes to be made in our early estimates.

(3) that the level of corporate profits would drop by 20 per cent from 1957 to 1958 and that the standard tax yields from this field would drop by the same percentage.

On the basis of these assumptions and applying the 13-9-50 formula, we estimated a 1958-59 tax arrangement payment to Manitoba of $32,250,000.

While recognizing that our first and second assumptions may not be entirely accurate, we are prepared to go along with them in our calculations. The one very real area of doubt in our minds, however, centres around the third assumption. Here we have assumed, essentially, that a drop in corporate profits would be reflected immediately in a similar drop in standard tax yields, and have made no allowance for any delay or "lag" that for all we know may very well occur between the time profit levels are established and the time they are reflected in corporate tax collections. If such a lag does occur, it should be taken into account in our calculations as it could significantly affect the size of the payments to a province in any given year.

You will readily appreciate that by ourselves we would find it difficult if not impossible to arrive at any sound estimates of this kind. We just do not have access to the information that would be required to enable us to make this kind of projection. The federal government, however, which collects these taxes and deals with these matters day by day is in a much more knowledgeable position in this regard—and we are therefore looking to you and your officials as the only people in Canada who can estimate for us, with any degree of accuracy, the probable effect on tax collections of a specified reduction in the level of corporate profits.

Would you, therefore, please verify for us the accuracy of our computation of the tax arrangement payment that would be made to Manitoba in 1958-59 if the 13-9-50 formula is applied, and the following assumptions are made:

(1) that there would be no change in any of the provinces in the standard individual income tax yields and standard succession duty yields from 1957 to 1958.

(2) that there would be no change in the population of any of the provinces from June 1, 1957, to June 1, 1958.

(3) that the level of corporate profits would drop by 20 per cent from 1957 to 1958 and that the standard tax yields from this field would drop by the same percentage.

In other words, if we are prepared to make these assumptions, are we correct in estimating that the 13-9-50 formula would yield to Manitoba in the coming year $32,250,000?

Secondly, if the tax collection experience of the Department of National Revenue should indicate that there is a lag between the establishment of profit levels and their reflection in federal tax collections, what change should we make in our $32,250,000 estimate to take account of this lag?

I should like to emphasize that we are not now asking that you or your officials make any estimates whatsoever in connection with the forecasting of the 1958-59 tax arrangement payments to Manitoba. We are prepared to make our own estimates, recognizing that in the absence of a certain amount of relevant data they may not perhaps be as accurate as might be desirable. We would, however, appreciate your assistance in verifying the accuracy of the calculations we have made on the basis of the assumptions we have stated in this letter, and in resolving for us the one area of doubt that we have mentioned as being of particular concern to us: the significance of the lag factor in corporate standard tax yield determination.

You will note that we have not specifically asked for information respecting the effect of the lag factor in the individual income tax field, because it is our view that in this field it would have relatively little significance. The payroll-deduction method of tax prepayment would probably tend to keep collections fairly well in line with income levels. Your comments on this point, however, would also be appreciated.

Yours very truly,
Chas. E. Greenlay
Provincial Treasurer.

MINISTER OF FINANCE
Canada

Ottawa, February 20, 1958.

The Honourable Charles E. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer,
Province of Manitoba,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Dear Mr. Greenlay:

As you point out in your letter of February 17, the data placed in Hansard on January 27 to illustrate the effect of the amendments to the tax-sharing formula was based on 1957 tax information. You will appreciate the necessity of this for at this time of year it is not possible to give any estimate of tax revenues for the 1958 tax year that would be valid for your purposes.

You mention that under the tax rental agreements estimates of probable payments were made available about this time of year. This is correct, but there was an essential difference that made this possible. Under the tax rental agreements payments were based on the gross national product and population of the previous year, for which there were reliable estimates. Under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act payments are based on the current year for which even preliminary estimates are not yet available. This necessitates the use of data of the earlier period and the procedure is outlined in the agreements and the regulations. I think I should point out that the difficulty in giving reliable estimates was emphasized on more than one occasion during the course of negotiations but the provinces preferred to accept this in order to have the final payments on as current a basis as possible.

There are, of course, very real problems in making estimates on the basis of the earlier year, for as you point out, changes in the level of corporate profits and personal incomes could have a noticeable effect on payments, especially when taken in conjunction with population changes. It is for this very reason I am most reluctant to make any forecasts at this stage. I may say that for the purposes of my own estimates I have used the figures based on 1957-58, i.e., those used for illustration in the House of Commons, accepting the fact that there very well may be substantial differences when these payments are finally determined.

As to your first two questions, I do not think it would be proper for me to attempt to indicate what your estimates should be for 1958-59, for the reasons I have stated.

On the third question, the stabilization at 95 per cent is on the basis of actual payments for the year 1957-58 and is not affected by any amendments to the standard rate of individual income tax recently made. Section 5(4)(a) of the act was not amended.

I am sorry that I cannot be of greater assistance to you in making up this estimate of revenue but the use of current figures involves this difficulty, a fact of which all participants in the agreements were fully aware at the time this method was decided upon. I am sure you will understand and appreciate my position in this matter.

Yours very truly,
Donald M. Fleming.

PROVINCE OF MANITOBA
Department of Provincial Treasurer
Office of the Minister
Winnipeg

February 17, 1958.

Honourable D. M. Fleming, Q.C., M.P.,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Fleming:

We have been following with great interest the proposed and now actual changes in the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act. We have noted that, as an illustration of the significance of the 13-9-50 formula, you indicated to the House of Commons that Manitoba would have received $35,755,000 by way of tax rental and equalization payments in 1957-58 based on the tax collections of, and other data relating to, 1957. However, as is well known, these tax-sharing arrangements and the returns to the provinces therefrom are based primarily on the tax collections of the current year and therefore, for the year beginning April 1, 1958, which is our immediate problem, our returns would be based on the collections experienced by your Department of National Revenue in 1958, not 1957. We are therefore, most anxious to have from you some forecast of the receipts that Manitoba may expect in the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1958, and ending March 31, 1959.

About this time every year since the tax rental arrangements came into effect, the federal government has made available to the provinces estimates of their probable payments under these programs for the fiscal year about to begin. In some cases, this information has become available with the publication of the federal estimates of expenditure for the coming fiscal year then being presented to the house in Ottawa. In other cases, by direct communication very early in the year, we have secured from Canada reasonably firm estimates of the amounts involved. We recognize that these estimates must have been largely based on forecasts and projections, but nevertheless have found them most essential to us in our planning. Therefore, even if full forecasts should not be available to you at this time, in view of the widespread belief that corporate profits are likely to fall substantially in 1958 and the fact that they have already fallen in the last several months of 1957, we would greatly appreciate your advice as to what kind of downward revisions, if any, we should be making in our forecasts of the returns to our province from this most important revenue field. Our calculations, for example, show that if corporate profits were to drop by as much as 20 per cent, and if as a result the standard tax yields in this field were to drop by a similar percentage, the 13-9-50 formula would yield not $35,755,000 but $32,250,000. In other words, instead of getting more during 1958 than we are getting in the year just closing, we could, under these circumstances, get as little as this year's amount or even less. A drop in personal income could also cause a drop in personal income tax collections and a drop in tax-sharing payments to provinces.

It would be most helpful to us in our planning for next year if you would please advise us as to the following:

(1) In your opinion, in the light of existing circumstances, should we, for the 1958-59 fiscal year just ahead, reasonably budget for the full amount of $35,755,000 indicated by you as being our revenue from the tax-sharing arrangements under the 13-9-50 formula?

(2) If, in your opinion, Manitoba is likely to receive in 1958-59 less than $35,755,000, what is the amount that should be expected? would it be 5 per cent less than the $35,755,000 —10 per cent less—15 per cent less—what would be your estimate?

(3) How does the 13-9-50 formula affect the minimum payments under the tax arrangements? We are not clear as to how this new formula will apply in respect of these minima. As you know, prior to the January revision, one of the guaranteed minima available to the province for 1958-59 was an amount equal to 95 per cent of our 10-9-50 tax arrangement receipts in 1957-58. In view of the change from 10-9-50 to 13-9-50 will this 1958-59 minimum now become 95 per cent of the tax arrangement receipts the province would have received in 1957-58 if the 13-9-50 formula had been in effect? In this case, it would appear that we could expect revenues of not less than $33,967,250 in the coming year. Will you please advise whether it is correct for us to assume that this $33,967,250 is to be our guaranteed minimum for the 1958-59 fiscal year or, if not, what in your opinion the proper figure would be?

Yours very truly,

Chas. E. Greenlay,
Provincial Treasurer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

FINANCE

TEXTILES—TABLING OF FURTHER TARIFF BOARD REPORT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and in French of a further report relative to reference No. 125 on textiles, which I have received from the chairman of the tariff board. I am also tabling a transcript of the evidence presented to the board at its public hearings.

This report deals with three groups of textile materials, namely rags and waste of various fibres, slivers, etc., of wool or hair, and rovings and yarns of wool or hair. In general the recommendations of the board would have the effect of substantially simplifying the tariff schedule and of reducing the number of items by eliminating certain end use items.

With respect to the first group of items, the board recommends that rags and waste of all fibres which are to be further processed be classified under a single item and receive duty free entry. At present these materials enter under 13 different tariff items carrying varying rates of duty, although for the most part they are now duty free.

With respect to the second group of items consisting of slivers and other forms of wool and hair in the stage preceding rovings and yarns, the main purpose of the board's recommendations is to clarify the nomenclature and classification of these materials.

In the third group of items, rovings and yarns of wool or hair, the board recommends a small increase in the specific duties under both the British preferential and most favoured nation tariffs. Here again the number of items is being reduced. In making this recommendation the board points out that the major proportion of the yarns used in Canadian woollen mills is produced in integrated plants.

It can be seen that the items covered in this report are related, in part, to other items in the textile schedule which are still before the board. The board has recently concluded its hearings on cottons and will be proceeding with hearings on synthetic textiles, knitted goods and narrow fabrics. The government does not intend to propose to the house any tariff changes relating to the report just tabled until it has received further relevant reports from the board; and in the light of the board's program of work it is clear that no new tariff proposals in this field should be expected during the current session of parliament.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Could I ask the minister whether any of the items referred to are bound by treaty?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think so, Mr. Speaker. In any event such bindings as do enter into this matter would have to be considered in relation to the rather broad reclassification which the board has recommended.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—STATEMENT ON CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no doubt the house will expect me to inform it with respect to some of the grave events now occurring in the Middle East, events which have led to the landing of a force of approximately 5,000 United States troops in Lebanon this morning.

We were notified yesterday evening of the United States decision to take this urgent step, and I need hardly state that we are in very close touch with the United States authorities about this matter. President Eisenhower made it clear in a statement published this morning that these landings are designed to protect the safety of 2,500 United States citizens in Lebanon and at the urgent request of President Chamoun to assist the Lebanese government to stabilize the situation and preserve Lebanon's independence and integrity.

President Eisenhower has emphasized that the United States government cannot—and I quote from his statement—"stand idly by when Lebanon appeals itself for evidence of our concern and when Lebanon may not be able to preserve internal order and to defend itself against indirect aggression". The United States has stressed that the action being taken is "in conformity with the spirit" of the United Nations charter, that the troops being landed are not a fighting force, and that the landing is not an "act of war".

The security council has been fully informed of the United States action, and the United States has made it plain that the troops will stay only until "the security council has itself taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security". The step which the United States has been obliged to take in Lebanon has been rendered necessary by the sudden and alarming developments that took place yesterday in Iraq. In the light of the implications for Lebanon of these developments, it was considered by the United States that the United Nations observation group was no longer adequate to meet the current menace to Lebanon's security and independence, though I might interpolate here that it was thought at the time of the visit of President Eisenhower and Mr. Dulles last week that the observation group would in fact be sufficient for the task.

Discussions are now proceeding at the security council, and the Canadian representative has been instructed to support all constructive efforts within that body which will have the effect of achieving the objectives outlined by the United States government and minimizing the threat to the peace of the area arising out of current developments.

We have also been kept informed of developments in London leading to the statement by the foreign minister, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd, in the House of Commons at Westminster this morning to the effect that the United Kingdom fully supports the action which the United States government has found it necessary to take but that United Kingdom forces, however, are not being used in the current operation in Lebanon.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know the house will have heard with great interest the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on what he has quite rightly called the grave events in the Middle East. I know the house will not expect at this time any more in the way of detailed information from him and would not, I think, expect any comments from this side which could not be helpful, and which we would not wish to be harmful. One cannot but feel, however, great anxiety at these developments and at the necessity—and it was no doubt a necessity—which required the United States to land troops for the protection of its nationals in Lebanon due—one must assume, and the minister's remarks have confirmed that assumption—to the grave events in a neighbouring state.

The result of this, Mr. Speaker, is that we now have in Lebanon United States troops protecting their own nationals and we have a United Nations observer corps with its functions to perform. In that corps there are Canadian members. We must all hope that there will be no contradiction between the functions of these two bodies, both of which are there for peaceful purposes. We must also hope that President Eisenhower's statement that the United States troops will be able to withdraw as soon as the United Nations forces could take over their function represents a hope that may be realized.

I am certainly not underestimating the gravity of the situation, but at this time I do not think any observations beyond those I have just made can be of help. However, I would like to ask the minister one question. Can he inform the house what steps have been taken to ensure the protection of Canadians in Lebanon and in Iraq?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, as far as Lebanon is concerned, we have over several weeks been in close touch and planning with the United States embassy in Beirut, and the Americans have undertaken that they will look after—I informed the house about three weeks ago that there were about 125 Canadians there; it now appears that there are about 146—the interests of those Canadians as well as they would look after the interests of Americans.

With respect to Iraq, normally we would have depended on the United Kingdom embassy there. As the house knows, the building was blown up yesterday. There has been some suggestion that the ambassador of the United Kingdom may have been killed, but there is no confirmation of that report. Apart from that there has been no suggestion of any loss of life. We have not been able to ascertain what the condition actually is in Baghdad at the present moment. There are approximately 43 Canadians in Iraq, about 40 of whom are in Baghdad, and we are hoping for the best. That is the best answer I can give at the present time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether our own embassy in Beirut is not being given some responsibility, particularly in connection with those Canadians, some 140 in number, who are located in that area?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Oh, Mr. Speaker, I did not suggest that our diplomatic representative in Beirut was not in consultation. Yes, he is the one who is working closely with the United States embassy in Beirut.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, reports from the Middle East without a doubt are the cause of grave concern and apprehension on the part of members of this house and the Canadian people generally. In the opinion of this group recent developments in the Middle East are the result of the shortsightedness of United States foreign policy in recent years, commencing with the refusal of the loan to Egypt which could have been the starting point, in the opinion of this group, for a positive and constructive approach to the difficult problems of the Middle East.

In particular we in this group are opposed to bilateral action. We urge that every effort be made that circumstances justify for the utilization of the international police force under the United Nations to restore order and maintain peace in this very difficult area.

COLOMBO PLAN—ALLEGED DELAY IN APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of press reports about continued delays in the approval of projects under the Colombo plan. Would the Prime Minister inform the house what action Canada is taking to accelerate these very important projects and as to the assistance given to underdeveloped countries?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The government believes in the Colombo plan, Mr. Speaker, and has given every consideration to the various projects that have been suggested as worthy of support under that plan. There has been no delay. There have been some projects for which relatively small expenditure has been asked, and they have been deferred in so far as approval is concerned.

I may say this, that having regard to the increased amount made available for Colombo plan projects since this government came into power, I am sure the house will agree that there is no justification for any criticism of delay with respect to projects which are worthy of immediate consideration.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STATEMENT ON MAIL DELIVERY OF COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Leader of the Opposition made an inquiry of me concerning a newspaper report that a publication, faked by the communists to look exactly like Ceske Slovo, a free Czech paper published in Munich, had been received by Czech Canadians. He asked whether there was anything that could be done by the Post Office Department to stop this "communist propaganda by misrepresentation" from coming through the mail.

The short answer is no, but a brief explanation of the reasons will be helpful, I think. A number of communist countries have a well developed publicity program which is largely based on mailing to selected groups of Canadians various types of news and information sheets giving the communist point of view and attitude on various matters both within and without the iron curtain. With few exceptions this material has not been requested by those who receive it, and in most cases the recipients would much prefer not to be on the mailing list at all.

I have much sympathy with those who find themselves in this position, and most particularly with new citizens of Canada who have come to this country from communist dominated areas in search of freedom and who are sent this material much against their will and sometimes to their great embarrassment; none the less, under the policy which is generally adopted toward our domestic mail and more particularly under those international conventions covering the carriage of mail to which Canada is a subscriber, it is not practical for the Post Office Department to take action in these cases.

The basic principle which is involved is the sanctity of the mails and the fact that in free countries we do not set up either the post office or any other government department as a censor of that material which passes through the mails; nor would it be desirable to do so. By law or for practical reasons of safety certain classes of material are specifically prohibited from passage through the mails. The law includes such items as obscene literature, lottery tickets and the like, while safety and common sense extend to such material as explosives. Beyond this, we accept and deliver everything which is placed in our hands and on which the proper postage has been paid.

In a case such as that referred to by my hon. friend the parties who are concerned, if they are aggrieved, must necessarily look to the proper courts for whatever action is justified and not to the Post Office Department.

It might be helpful to my hon. friend as well if I quoted the remarks he made on August 1, 1956, as found on page 6837 of Hansard, when he said:

> This is a free country and subject to the observance of the law, people, even diplomats from the Soviet countries, can use the mails for the circulation of their literature.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, nothing I included in my question was meant by me to transgress the principle the Postmaster General has stated, freedom in the use of the mails, and I would not have my question interpreted in that way. What I had in mind, and perhaps I did not make it clear in my question, was that there was an element of fraud in this case because the paper in question which was being circulated through the mail was in a form which would confuse it with a non-communist Czech language paper. Therefore I thought there was an element of fraud in this particular case which might have involved a contravention of the law, and that action might have been taken in that regard.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): What I meant by my answer was that the determination of fraud is within the province of the courts and not that of the Post Office Department.

ALLEGED ABANDONMENT OF ELECTRONIC SORTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Egan Chambers (St. Lawrence-St. George): Would the Postmaster General care to comment on a report in this morning's Gazette that the $3 million electronic sorter which the former Liberal government installed in the main post office is a failure and about to be abandoned?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): There is no more accurate foundation for that report than for the one which appeared in the same column yesterday to the effect that the citizens of Westmount were disturbed because of changes in their mail delivery. This is a machine which is basically, at the moment, a research project, and as in all these research projects it is currently again in the process of being reassessed to determine its value and its future potential. Certainly there is no decision as yet regarding its abandonment or anything of that nature.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STANDARD OF TREATMENT OF MENTALLY ILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. By way of explanation I should like to say that in the throne speech debate on May 26, Hansard, page 451, I suggested that the government consider the advisability of encouraging the provision of the same standard of care for the mentally sick that is afforded the physically ill. Can the minister inform the house what measures are being taken to improve the standards of care for the mentally ill?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. As far as the dominion government is concerned, three avenues of approach are being taken toward improving the standards of care for the mentally ill.

In the first place, an annual grant of over $7 million is provided under the health grants program to assist the provinces in developing and extending their facilities in this field. Over the past 10 years this money has been used for the establishment of mental health and child guidance clinics, the extension of mental health services in general hospitals, the provision of staff and equipment for mental hospitals, the establishment and enlargement of provincial divisions of mental health, the support of research into mental health problems and the training of mental health workers.

In addition to this assistance, the health grants program contains a hospital construction grant under which federal funds amounting to $2,000 per bed are available for the construction of mental hospitals as well as of general hospitals, some of the facilities of which are utilized in treating the acute as opposed to the chronic phases of mental illness.

A third way in which the government is helping to raise the standards of care for the mentally ill is through the hospital insurance and diagnostic services program. This scheme takes into account the recent development of psychiatric wards in general hospitals for the active treatment of acute phases of mental illness, and includes the costs of this kind of care within the expenses to be shared by federal and provincial governments.

The whole purpose of these endeavours is to place the standards of care for the mentally ill on the active treatment level instead of on the custodial care level, which in large measure was the case in the past.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question arising out of this excellent review of what the government has been doing in this field. I wonder whether the minister can say whether active consideration is now being given to the inclusion of mentally ill persons in hospitals under the national hospital insurance act, since about half the hospital patients are involved?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There has been no change in the situation since I answered that question at the time the amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was before the house a short time ago.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): By way of supplementary question, may I ask the minister if he is not aware that the very excellent reply he has just given is practically the same as the reply given to the Minister of Finance when he complained about deficiencies in the hospital insurance act introduced by the previous administration?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Can the Prime Minister advise the house if the royal commission on Canada's energy resources plans to hold public meetings in the Atlantic provinces? If so, have dates and places been selected?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have no information on that, Mr. Speaker. I shall communicate with the chairman of the commission with a view to ascertaining his intended sittings. When I have that information I shall communicate it to the house.

BRIDGES

SAULT STE. MARIE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): Can the Minister of Public Works say whether or not the government is considering financial aid towards the construction of the proposed international highway bridge across the St. Mary's river between Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. No consideration has been given to financial aid by the federal government. It is my understanding that the proposal is to have a bridge built by a company known as the St. Mary's Bridge Company.

IMMIGRATION

PAUL ROBESON—INQUIRY AS TO PERMISSION TO ENTER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): May I address a question to the cool, collected and colourful Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that many Canadians believe that great art and talent belong to the ages and to all people and, therefore, wish to enjoy the same opportunities in this respect afforded other nations in the commonwealth; and in view of the fact that many Canadians wish the opportunity to hear Paul Robeson, internationally famed concert, stage and screen artist, would the minister inform the house if her department recognizes the maturity and cultural development of the Canadian people sufficiently to permit the entry of Paul Robeson for their enjoyment?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question is purely hypothetical. So far as I am aware there is no application for admission of the gentleman to Canada.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask, as a supplementary question, if an application were made would it be favourably considered?

Some hon. Members: Order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROVINCIAL LABOUR MINISTERS ATTENDING CURRENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if many of the ministers of labour from the provinces are attending the conference on seasonal unemployment at the present time.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Ten provincial ministers of labour accepted the invitation. Nine are here and one, being ill, is not able to be present.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, July 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

RADIO AND TELEVISION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): The problem of how to utilize radio and television technology with maximum benefit and minimum expense to the people of Canada is certainly one of the most difficult problems with which the government of Canada could be faced, no matter what party is in power. It is something that we must have because we cannot do without it, but when we look at the astronomical cost which is involved in a country of such geographical dimensions as our own, we begin to wonder how we can afford the expense.

That brings up the question of which system is best suited to our particular conditions. First, as far as the system itself is concerned we have three choices. We could have a completely public system or a completely free enterprise system or a combination of both. I believe the particular system we have at the present time, which is not only a combination but a partnership of public and private enterprise, with the public acting the role of senior partner, is the very best system we could possibly have and is one which I believe we should continue to maintain, with perhaps some modification with respect to regulatory powers.

If we have a combination certainly there is a need for regulation; and while I do not think a very good case was made out against the C.B.C. by those who produced briefs before the Fowler commission, I think perhaps it would be worth-while to adopt the regulations which that body recommended. Not only do we have a financial problem but we have the difficulty of providing proper safeguards so that our system will not become the mouthpiece or a propaganda machine for the government of the day. We must be equally careful in providing safeguards to see that our broadcasting system does not become a mouthpiece for subversive elements.

Reference has been made to the function of the C.B.C. as a means of developing our Canadian culture, and no doubt it is making a worth-while contribution in that respect. I think there is an even more important job than that for it to do, however, which could not be as well done by any other agency, and that is to provide a uniting force to keep before us the great values on which our culture is based and on which our way of life has been built and by which it is nursed. In times like these, when we are engaged in a cold war, this function of the C.B.C. is perhaps the most important of all.

As far as Newfoundland is concerned we do not have very many complaints against the C.B.C. or against the private stations; in fact the programs are very useful and very enjoyable, and we are particularly fortunate in that we have private stations which do, I think, more than their part in developing local culture. I have listened to private stations in other parts of Canada and I have not yet heard a station which is carrying out its functions in any sense better than the private stations in Newfoundland.

As far as my own riding of Burin-Burgeo is concerned, I would like to take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the house the fact that only a very small number of my constituents are able to avail themselves of the services which the Canadian broadcasting system offers. We need the services of the C.B.C. in Newfoundland to unite us as a province in the same way we need to be united on a national scale. But we have our diversities of interest, and one of the functions which the C.B.C. could perform would be to bridge the gap of isolation caused by our geography and by these differences of interest. In the western half of my riding it is impossible for people to receive the broadcasts which go out from the C.B.C. station at St. John's, and this despite the fact that a few years ago a great deal of money was spent increasing the power and trying to extend the range of that station.

I think it has been clearly demonstrated that it is impossible to reach the length and breadth of the south coast of Newfoundland by radio without building a small relay station either on the Burin peninsula or at Port aux Basques or both. As I understand it these relay stations are not very expensive, and I would ask the government to look into this matter and see what could be done in this respect. It is a very urgent necessity, because the people in my riding are fishermen; they want to hear the weather forecasts, they want to hear the prices of fish, and they want to hear where bait is available. Their ties with the capital city are so many and so varied that the need can only be met by having a system which could provide full coverage for the whole island.

What I have said with respect to broadcasting applies to an even greater degree as far as television is concerned. Only a few people in the extreme eastern part of my riding can now enjoy the benefits of television programs, and since a microwave relay system is being erected in Newfoundland so that programs from the mainland may be received in our province simultaneously with their reception on the mainland, and having in mind that one of these microwave stations is being built at Red Rocks which is only nine miles away from the centre of Port aux Basques, I would ask the government to have a look at this to see if it would not be possible to utilize that microwave station so the people in the Port aux Basques area may be able to receive television programs. I believe this could be done, and because television waves carry a greater distance over water, I understand that it would be possible for people west of the Burin peninsula to enjoy television programs also.

I hope the minister concerned will investigate this matter and give it all the favourable consideration possible.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Perhaps I can set a certain tone in what I am going to say by acknowledging that the reason I reached the House of Commons was partly through a private television station; it was a private television station which partly opened up the opportunity, so I am quite aware of the advantages which television and broadcasting bring to many parts of the country.

I feel that neither the amendment nor the subamendment is intended to be a backhanded or nasty slap at the government, but rather a gentle but firm prod to the government along the way we are sure it is going to follow. The government's intentions, as far as we know, were spelled out in the speech which has been referred to before, made by the Minister of National Revenue on June 3, and his subsequent announcement that the C.B.C. was to go ahead and plan the building of a certain number of television stations which would provide coverage in some of the more remote parts of the country—parts, that is, which are remote from present television coverage.

This announcement was very welcome, but in our district, though we were pleased that Kenora would receive some benefit, there was a certain disappointment that those further north and east of Kenora were going to be missed out according to present plans. Certainly it is our general view that the fact that the minister should stand up and indicate that the C.B.C. should go ahead with its planning was support for the view that the government was going ahead with the backing of the C.B.C. which would enable it to do this job.

The financing of the C.B.C. is one of the toughest questions in terms of fairness that I think a government will face. It seems there are three different ways in which the C.B.C. has been financed in the past, and I cannot see any other possible ways to finance it in the future. Most of you will remember that the licence system proved a very unpopular means of supporting the old C.B.C. radio system; yet in essence a licence fee is the only absolutely fair way of supporting the operation of a national system if you look at it from the point of view of straight economic justice. It means, of course, that the people who are actually enjoying the programs or who have the ability to receive the programs are the ones who are paying for them; and certainly if a licence set-up should be part of the government's plan it would save a great deal of criticism that comes from areas which have not adequate coverage from the national system at the present time. They will certainly not have the complaint that as general taxpayers they are paying for a service which they are not receiving.

The system presently being used in part to support the C.B.C., that of the special excise tax, has been declared discriminatory and unfair—I think those were his words—by the minister concerned in this house; and whether or not one agrees with that, it is perfectly obvious that an excise tax levied upon the instrument through which a program is received is quite inadequate to provide any sound financial basis for the future. At the beginning, when television sets were being bought in great numbers, it provided a source of revenue; but now there has been a saturation point reached in most areas of Canada of somewhere between 70 and 80 per cent, the income from this tax will not come near to meeting the requirements of the C.B.C. in the present or in the future.

That brings us to the third possible means of supporting the C.B.C. It is the one that is likely to be followed, yet in many ways it is very unfair; that is to take the money directly out of the consolidated revenue fund, or make some sort of arrangement with that fund and have the C.B.C. operate on a year to year budget from a demand placed before the government as to what its needs are going to be in the coming year.

If the money comes out of the consolidated revenue fund it means in effect that every taxpayer in the country is contributing to the cost. It is obvious from the distribution of population in the country and the varying nature of the markets in which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation must compete that a portion of the country is never going to receive the full benefit of this expenditure. From that point of view it is unfair.

As a politician amongst 264 other politicians I think we all have to recognize that the licence system is extremely unpopular. I do not care what party you belong to, you have to recognize that the licence system, which is perhaps the fairest, is so unpopular that it is going to require a very strong and courageous government and minister to bring it in. I would tend to support the third means, that is taking money out of the consolidated revenue fund, but I think we need to be aware that if we follow that course it will result in an annual spree within the House of Commons and the committee on broadcasting over ways and means to jimmy down what the C.B.C. may estimate it needs, and it will not place that organization on the long-term planning basis that one would gather from the chairman is really needed.

The argument that has gone on for a number of years led by the C.A.R.T.B.—the Canadian association of radio and television broadcasters—in essence has centred around something concerning which the Winnipeg

Free Press has published a number of pamphlets. It is the contention that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a regulatory body, as well as being a competitor, was somehow interfering with their basic freedom. The Free Press was fond of drawing a parallel between radio and television stations and newspapers, and insisted that freedom of the press was parallel and analogous with the freedom of the air waves. There is no point in discussing in detail the way in which the Fowler commission and other commissions have treated this particular point, but it has been amply proven by the fact that there are such a limited number of both radio and television frequencies available that there is not and cannot be any such thing as freedom of the air.

The point was quite well made yesterday by the hon. member for Kootenay West with respect to freedom of the air and competition. The private broadcasters themselves have proved the point repeatedly, in that every time there has been an application for a new radio or television station before the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation board of governors—and this applies especially to radio—wherever the market area already had a private station, the station in existence instead of welcoming the new competitor into the field as a wonderful example of the benefits of free enterprise and freedom of the air has bucked the application all down the line, frequently using the very argument that there can be no such thing as freedom of the air parallel to freedom of the press.

One of the minor points arising out of the amendment that hit me after talking to a couple of C.B.C. producers in the Toronto-Ottawa region stems from the fact that if some limited competition evolves it could represent a tremendous blow to the amount of Canadian talent that is used. Mr. Ouimet announced last year that 15,000 artists of various kinds did work for the C.B.C. last year. Regardless of what some of us may feel concerning the quality of the work of those artists, the fact that this number were employed is an excellent thing. In any consideration of opening up a licence in a high market area like Toronto or Montreal, the government and any regulatory board it sets up must keep this factor in mind. To bring in a private station may be all right, but it should not be done at the cost of diminishing the amount of Canadian talent and creative effort that goes into these programs.

I spoke to one successful C.B.C. producer recently. He is successful in the sense that one of his series has been sold in the United States and he is down there now considering a highly attractive offer. He told me that his own feeling was that if a private station opened in the Toronto area without any regulations to control or direct it with respect to using a certain amount of Canadian programming, you would see the advertisers who now support to a degree the C.B.C. dramatic presentations switch over and use the private station and the cheaper United States imported films. As a consequence of this loss of income the C.B.C. would not be able to maintain its standard of dramatic production. I think all of us should take pride in the recognition that has been given the quality of certain Canadian Broadcasting Corporation productions in that sales are being made in the United States market, and in the past couple of years the C.B.C. has had increasing success in selling its dramatic productions in the British market not only to the B.B.C., which is the government organization, but also to the private television network that has been created in England and Scotland.

One of the other problems in connection with the C.B.C. and its operation in the large market areas is, of course, more and more the movement of United States subsidiaries into Canada. The kind of advertisers who support television programs are marketing their products in Canada as well as in the United States. Personally I am delighted with that. I like to watch the fights and the baseball games, and I support Gillette with the occasional purchase of razor blades.

I think we must acknowledge that this will be a continuing trend. It does mean, however, that the United States television stations close to our borders are always going to be invading our markets. There is nothing we can do in the form of regulation to stop it, but it means they will always have an effect and influence upon Canadian television stations whether they be C.B.C. or private.

I want to be fair here in considering the latitude we should allow a private station and this factor must be weighed. We must weigh United States competition within the same market area against the fact that we would like private stations to be regulated in order to ensure that they utilize a certain minimum of Canadian programming.

One matter that concerns everyone in connection with television—and it has affected me as a teacher and as one in political life—is the choice of popular programs. I am thinking of the near despair that comes when you talk to people about their reaction to television programs and even to the operations of the C.B.C. I know it was a source of despair to me that amongst my pupils the most popular program of all was the Saturday night wrestling. It is very discouraging.

However, I should like to point out to hon. members that despite the despair one may feel over the reaction of the adolescent and pre-adult group, there are some significant groups and national associations in Canada that have taken a much broader and more educated view of the whole matter. I was delighted to see that the Canadian radio league has been reactivated, and was impressed by the people who are organizing and supporting it. I note that a famous Liberal is on the committee, Professor A. R. M. Lower. I think that is good. The committee also includes a man who is almost a paragon as far as the Conservative party is concerned at the present time, the great biographer of the life of Sir John A. Macdonald, Professor Creighton.

If you go over the list you find such names as Dr. E. A. Corbett of the Canadian association of adult education, Dr. Robbins, secretary treasurer of the humanities research council, Father Henri St. Denis of Ottawa. We even have the president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the president of the federated women's institutes of Canada, all in this reactivated league which supports the general premises of the Fowler commission and in effect supports both the amendment and the subamendment that have been introduced in this house. That is a sort of balance to the despair that comes over one when he gets what one might say is the impromptu reaction of so many of the younger people in this country.

Television is very much a mixed blessing, and I think we have to keep in mind that our national interest in it is the paramount consideration. Both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Kootenay West, as well as others, have put it very succinctly. There are two main reasons why we have to keep a national system and why that national system can only be one that has government support. One is the United States inundation that is always threatening us, and the other is the fact that we have not in Canada the markets to support a private enterprise system right across the country; and, of course, the two factors are interrelated.

One of the key problems in connection with the future of the C.B.C. is the question of what kind of regulatory board there should be. Quite obviously the board of governors of the C.B.C. has not operated very well in one particular regard, namely controlling the private broadcasters from the point of view of the C.B.C.'s own regulation. As a matter of fact I know of a C.C.F. telecast that goes on regularly. Every time it goes on it breaks the C.B.C. regulations. Yet the C.B.C. has never bothered to police its own regulations, and the board of governors have never sufficiently encouraged the management of the C.B.C. to go out and police the regulations.

When you have regulations that are not policed and supported, then they become ridiculous. That is one of the reasons why the C.A.R.T.B., under Mr. Allard, went off on such a wild attack, because at that very time they were running pretty freely, without any checkrein.

Therefore, following from this point, I think the central thing we need to keep in mind with respect to the regulatory board is that it should really regulate. If it does introduce regulations it should put them out in a precise booklet, and if any changes are made those changes should be put on record and the record kept up to date and not have a whole host of separate papers, so that private broadcasters will know where they stand and know that if they do not follow the regulations then they get the axe, or some form of punitive measure will be taken against them. I know of one particular radio station about which dozens of letters have gone in complaining that they break the regulations concerning the number of spot announcements in the morning and noontime periods. All they have received from the C.B.C. is a gentle tap on the wrist, saying in effect, "No, no, boys; some day you are going to get your licence suspended." I hope when the regulatory board is set up it will enforce the regulations.

One of the factors in connection with a regulatory board, as brought out by the Leader of the Opposition, is whether it should be a fairly large board and representative of a group of interests in the country or a small board. Well, I tend to feel that a smaller board would be more effective, because once you begin to try to represent interested groups across the country you get a body that has, let us say, very little unity or homogeneity in terms of following a definite course of action, and it takes a long time when that group is meeting fairly rarely to develop an integrated course of action.

On the other hand, if this regulatory board is going to be the body that has the power to hand out those plum licences in the rich market areas that board is going to be under a great deal of pressure. I hope the Minister of National Revenue will look at the experience of the F.C.C. with regard to the television licence fiasco in such places as Boston and Miami, where the pressures have been so great. We have all observed the scandal going on in the United States at the present time over the pressure put upon federal regulatory boards for favours for certain people. Well, that is the sort of thing this regulatory board in Canada could be open to.

As a matter of fact I would almost think the government might consider, in connection with the question of additional television licences in the rich markets, that those people should have to come right into the House of Commons in committee to state their case. If that were done we would at least know that all sides of the argument would be heard and there would not be pressures exerted or any favours passed.

This may be a rather gloomy anticipation of Canadian moral integrity in such boards or the kind of pressures that would be applied; but when the awarding of licences itself is worth several million dollars—that is the potential in several cases in Canada—there is no question but that the pressures could be very sharp. It means that the regulatory board set-up is something that should be considered very closely.

The final point I want to touch on was brought up in French last night, and I am going only by the translation of the speech by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. To read his speech, Mr. Speaker, is to feel that we have Rev. Mr. Hansell back in the house again. That may be good or bad. There seems to be in certain parts of this country a completely different attitude toward morality and censorship than in other parts of the country. But the point raised by the hon. member—and the Deputy Speaker did try to remind him that he was moving away from the point of the amendment—is one that I think deserves some discussion. I hope the discussion will rid the whole idea right out of the premises.

I refer to the idea that it is the job of the board that is to be associated with the C.B.C. to be a screener of morals. The protests of the hon. gentlemen were placed more or less in two categories. He is concerned about morality in the sense of sexual licence, nudity and that form, and he is also concerned with morality in the fact that certain deviationists are undermining our whole social structure by moving us toward the left. Again this was the cry of Rev. Mr. Hansell when he was in this house. The C.B.C. was in the hands of leftists. We were continually under a barrage of leftist campaigning in certain forms.

I think the hon. member is entitled to his opinion, but I would just like to explain why some people, especially people who have what I would call reactionary views, feel that the C.B.C. is leftist. I think the C.B.C. has attracted to itself and will continue to attract a great many highly educated people, especially from English Canada. I think these highly educated people from English Canada, in their contacts, go out for people who they know have certain controversial ideas, or can give a certain analysis of various circumstances, be they economists, historians, sociologists or what have you. They bring these people to the C.B.C. If they happen to be leftists, I would just like to remind hon. members it may indicate that amongst the academic community, in the ivory towers of this country, there may be people who feel that that is the way to go.

Now, they want to do something about blocking them. I would suggest that they encourage the people with the right wing view to become articulate. It has always been the mark of a conservative—I am not thinking about the Progressive Conservative—to be inarticulate. You will notice that in all their restatements they always hark back to the one great spokesman they had in the English-speaking world, namely Edmund Burke. If you want the other point of view, get articulate. I would remind the hon. member that even the C.B.C. had Mr. Hansell on the "Viewpoint" program, offering criticism.

I aways felt that the question of the C.B.C. being composed of a pack of socialists has been overstressed. I know that any time, I, thinking of myself as a socialist, have encountered people from the C.B.C. I have found a great deal of contradiction of statements I made. I cannot speak for the French language network, but I certainly want to assure the hon. member who made the protest that among the people connected with the English language network whom I have met there have been a great many who have opposed my views, and therefore I would assume that they are not completely dominated by the socialist ideology. Of course I would hesitate to acknowledge that I am completely dominated.

I think it is very dangerous that a member should rise and emphasize the matter of censorship so far as the C.B.C. is concerned. I hope during the debate there will be speeches by other members of the house that will restate the need for free expression of public opinion. You can quote Milton's Areopagitica in relation to censorship; but I always think of one sentence he wrote; that you cannot understand good unless you know evil. By knowing evil he meant just knowing what it was. I think that pertains pretty well to what we see on C.B.C. programs. If our young people cannot be trusted to look at a girl in a scanty pair of shorts or with a certain amount of cleavage, then I say we might as well throw up our hands and give up on our young people.

Mr. Thomas: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Certainly.

Mr. Thomas: Is he advocating a board of control over our national system which would fail to exercise judgment concerning the moral content of the programs that are broadcast?

Mr. Fisher: In reply I should like to state very briefly that if the hon. member would look at the speech made by the member to whom I referred he will see that he spelled out very clearly certain criticisms that reminded me very much of communist China, where they are always going through an orgy of self-criticism. I feel that to spell out censorship in such terms with relation to a regulatory body is bad. Certainly I would expect that in general the regulatory body would express certain ideas to the management of the C.B.C. and any of the other stations about the content of programs. However, I would hope that it would not be a formal job of theirs, that in essence it would be a minor aspect of their duties and that such action as they might take would be advisory rather than regulatory.

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, last night, at ten o'clock, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) moved the adjournment of the debate. I expected him this afternoon to conclude his speech but, for some reason best known to himself, he has not seen fit to do so. There are a few questions that I would have liked to put to him after he was through. So, I now ask him if he would allow me to ask three questions of him.

Mr. Pigeon: With pleasure.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot permit it even if the hon. member will permit it. He has spoken on this motion and he is not permitted to speak again. The hon. member is free to make his own speech.

Mr. Rouleau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, a little later I shall reply to the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. Among other things, he asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to set up a board of censorship in order to rate television programs and safeguard, as he said, the rights of morality. Well, if the hon. member wants to protect the rights of morality, I would strongly advise him to do so in the various constituencies of the province where, as he knows, there are speak-easies.

At the moment I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that the amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), with regard to radio and television, is altogether relevant and timely.

When Conservative members were in the opposition, they never missed a chance to charge the government with interference in matters relating to radio and television. When Conservative members were in the opposition, they spent their time in recriminations and complaints that their party was not being allowed the air-time to which it was entitled over radio and T.V. Meanwhile other members, on the government side, were harping on the same string, claiming that Conservatives were being allowed too much time on radio and T.V.

Any man with strong convictions will always feel that members of opposite parties are allowed too much time over the state-controlled radio and television. Now that we are in the opposition, we find the situation has not changed. For instance, when the Prime Minister of Great Britain came here to address the House of Commons, the cameras were aimed solely at government benches. It was overlooked that in a democracy, the parliament is made up of both a government and an opposition.

The only consolation we had in watching that program on T.V. was to see on the screen this charming lady who is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough).

(Text):

I was just saying, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, that the other day when the Prime Minister of Great Britain addressed the House of Commons only the government side of the house was shown on television, but we took great pleasure in looking at the charming lady who is Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

(Translation):

When they sat in opposition, Mr. Speaker, our Conservative friends were forever clamouring for a regulatory body for the control of private and public broadcasting. And while the Conservatives were busy running down the government, and making demands, the government of the day set up the Fowler commission and gave it the responsibility of inquiring into the problems that faced private and government broadcasting. The Fowler report, published just before the June 1957 election, contains conclusions which the government should consider seriously and adopt in their entirety.

The Liberal party's policy with regard to radio and television was clearly set out yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. As usual he was clear, accurate and concise in his remarks. He stated incidentally that he fully endorses the view expressed in the Fowler report, that there should be a single broadcasting system in which private stations would be the indispensable and welcome partners of the C.B.C.

The C.B.C., Mr. Speaker, has done a tremendous job throughout Canada, in setting up a truly national network. Useful assistance was given the C.B.C. in this work, by owners of private radio stations. Some time ago I received a letter from the manager of one of these private stations, who, among other things, wrote:

> However before permits are issued for private T.V. stations, there should be issued requirements than has been the case, sometimes, with radio.
> To begin with, the licensing authority should make sure that the applicants have the necessary capital to embark on an undertaking of this kind.
> Secondly, they should make sure that applicants have the necessary know how or have had practical experience, say in the field of radio broadcasting, as evidence that they could manage a television station.
> Thirdly, it should be realized that we do not want a T.V. station for the sole purpose of making money out of it, giving the public any sort of trash, but to supply good programs, suitably varied to please all tastes.

Mr. Speaker, as the television and radio systems throughout our country advertise and help to develop our culture, it is most important that these two media be controlled. In our country, radio and television broadcasts are an important part of our national heritage, and should, as I said, help to widen and to mould our national culture everywhere in this country.

In its conclusions, the Fowler report emphasizes the dual racial character of the Canadian nation; it takes into account the existence of French people in Canada as well as the economic and geographical realities of this country. Throughout its recommendations, there is an apparent concern with adequately meeting the needs of a dual race population, of a dual Canadian culture bent on remaining such. The commissioners gave a whole chapter to the necessity of extending the French network all over our country.

> The reports states that "the sentiment of French Canada as expressed through the briefs heard publicly by the commission, or submitted to it for private study, was virtually unanimous in its commendation, with only minor reservations, of the general texture of the programming of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the French language and of what was believed to be the genuine effort of the management of the C.B.C. to respond to the needs of French speaking Canadians for a distinctive broadcasting fare".

[Mr. Rouleau.]

Further on, the Fowler report cautions those who preside over the destinies of this country against certain dangers.

> And yet we may owe it to Canada to test the core of resistance. National leadership is a failure when it remains blind or inert before wholesome underlying trends that are precisely in need only of enlightened or courageous leadership to come to the surface. Hence, any new departure that holds before us the vision of deeper spiritual harmony among Canadians of the two main cultural groups is one that all earnest Canadians should studiously examine.

Because of the cultural importance of broadcasting, and because we are dealing here with a national asset, as I said a moment ago, radio and television must not escape the supervision of parliament. At the present time that regulatory function is exercised by the C.B.C.'s board of governors. The Fowler report suggests to the government that this be henceforth exercised by a board of governors for radio and television composed of prominent representative Canadians, responsible to the government and not beholden to any political party. That is what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) demanded in his speech yesterday. I am convinced that such action would be satisfactory to all concerned.

The C.B.C. has an excellent record. It has been of tremendous service to the Canadian nation. And when I hear a speech such as that made yesterday by the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I cannot help rising in rebuttal.

Someone called my attention to an article on the subject of the C.B.C., and it occurred to me that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm might well have drawn some inspiration from it. It was printed in a paper called Nouvelles Illustrées, formerly known as Nouvelles et Potins—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, that is an absolute falsehood, and I would ask the hon. member for Dollard to withdraw that statement.

An hon. Member: He has not made a statement yet.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, I have not asserted anything. I did not say the hon. member had lifted his speech from that article; I merely said that there was in there a source of inspiration for the hon. member.

Mr. Pigeon: In no way whatever.

Mr. Denis: Neither directly nor indirectly, as Mr. Duplessis would say.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, Nouvelles Illustrées is the unofficial spokesman for the Union Nationale.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. member to withdraw those remarks; they are out of order.

Mr. Rouleau: Well, if the hon. member did not draw his inspiration from that article, perhaps the writer drew his inspiration from the hon. member's speech, for they are very much alike. Here is what it says:

> That the Conservative government should thus foster a focus of hostility towards itself, that is its own business. But the people of the province of Quebec demand an early and thorough clean-up.

The author of the article also states:

> If the Liberals were in power, states writer Robert Rumilly, they would not tolerate the Conservatives ruling the roost at C.B.C. headquarters a year after a Tory defeat.

Elsewhere in the same article we read the following:

> Enemies of Maurice Duplessis sometimes brand him as a dictator, but in no other country in the world would such attacks, made on the state-controlled television against the head of the government be tolerated.

The article also mentions the name of Miss Simone Gelinas, editor of Notre Temps, official organ of the Union Nationale,—and goes on to say:

> As for me, I am less polite, or more "fed up" . . . I say that a government that is being fooled like that by the state radio is a government of cuckolds.

At the top of the page, the article concludes as follows:

> There should be a clean sweep in the C.B.C. and we are offering the broom!

Mr. Speaker, I presume that the present government is not prepared to accept the broom being offered by Mr. Rumilly.

Those words of inspiration, which fall so unpleasantly on the ears of certain hon. members, were perhaps written by the ghost-writer of Mr. Maurice Duplessis, the "jaundice" of the Union Nationale, false prophet Robert Rumilly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I feel he is drifting away to some extent from the amendment.

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Speaker, I noticed that when you interrupted the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, last night, he went on with his remarks just the same, and I respectfully submit that you should grant me the same privilege.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I made no mention of a broom.

Mr. Boulanger: You referred to scanty attire; what has that to do with the discussion?

Mr. Rouleau: In any case, Mr. Speaker, if all those people were replaced, that the hon. member wants fired, and if there were a general clean sweep at the C.B.C. it might well afford an opportunity for patronage.

I resent the attacks made here by the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm against three honest persons: Messrs. Pierre-Elliott Trudeau, Gerard Pelletier and Jean-Louis Gagnon.

I do not know the political affiliations of Messrs. Trudeau and Pelletier, but I do know, and full well, those of Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon.

In some quarters, well-known to the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm, there were attempts to besmirch the name of Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon. It was hinted that he was a Communist, which is absolutely false. They resent Mr. Gagnon because he is a Liberal. He is an honest man, a man of great culture, who is a credit to us not only in this country but abroad.

Moreover, the hon. member should know that the C.B.C. has on its payroll men like Roger Duhamel and Dostaler O'Leary. When the Liberals were in power, there were men at the C.B.C. who criticized the government, like Andre Laurendeau and Gerard Fillion, yet the former government never moved a finger to have them fired.

They were doing their duty as newsmen and the former government never interfered. I therefore hope that this government will never hamper the freedom of the press.

If some newsmen attack us, in matters of politics, on the radio and in the press they do so to help their fellow citizens. They live under a democratic system, and they are not ousted, as was done recently to a newsman by a certain premier.

In his remarks, the hon. member used the same expressions as the premier of his province. Yesterday in his speech the hon. member used the phrase "whited sepulchres" in reference to men like Messrs. Pelletier, Trudeau, Gagnon and perhaps even of all Liberals. Well, that happens to be a pet expression of the premier of Quebec. It is no problem to discern where the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm got his education. The men he mentioned yesterday are honest people who go out of their way to do their duty. I would like to know what the hon. member means when he says "leftism"; he did not describe the meaning of this word.

Does he mean to say that people in the C.B.C.'s employ, like Father Ambroise Lafortune, Father Emile Legault, Father Desmarais and Mr. Rene Levesque, are communists?

Mr. Pigeon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dollard is distorting my remarks. Actually I said that Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon was the symbol of "leftism".

Mr. Dupuis: Adrien Arcand is a fascist but nobody speaks about it.

Mr. Rouleau: Anyway, Mr. Speaker, the "whited sepulchres" mentioned by the hon. member are not where he chooses to look for them, because the ones he attacked in this house are probably users of natural gas, but there is no need of a royal commission to investigate their doings.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, I believe that, in moving his amendment the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) quite aptly raised a question of national interest which has become a subject of national controversy because of the government's failure to implement the following, taken from the speech from the throne:

> There will be placed before you a proposal to establish a new agency to regulate broadcasting in Canada—

Well, the resignation of Mr. Dunton as president of the C.B.C. has given rise in public opinion to some rumours to the effect that this resignation will be followed by others in the C.B.C. The present confusion was heightened by the numerous speeches made by well-known members of this government, and I refer particularly to the Ministers of Justice and of Finance (Messrs. Fulton and Fleming) who, on several occasions, when they were in the opposition and dealt with this subject, always professed to be in favour of granting greater privileges to private radio and television broadcasting for the purpose of allowing them to set up a network to compete with the C.B.C. on a national scale. It is now well known that the present cabinet is not of one mind as to what should be done about radio and television broadcasting in Canada, i.e. as regards policy, future control, structure and financing.

If this debate were to serve no other purpose than forcing the government to make known at last its policy on this problem, one so important to all Canadians, I am sure that in return Canadians would be grateful to the Leader of the Opposition for having raised the matter.

Mr. Speaker, no medium of communication is more important than radio and television broadcasting, in preserving for this country and the various groups that make up this nation their national and cultural heritage. In this regard, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) in the fine speech he made yesterday, splendidly outlined the great work accomplished by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I feel that we should be proud of the progress achieved in the last few years. Proximity to the United States presented some dangers in this regard. We managed to avoid those dangers and, in spite of American competition, we preserved the typically Canadian character of our culture and of our art.

On several occasions, we have been proud to hear foreigners pay high tribute to the quality of our programs, as well as to the quality of our performers. To a certain extent, this is the work of the previous government, and of this we are very proud. However, we are anxiously wondering today what the policy of this government will be with regard to future development of our radio and television broadcasting system. Our own approach to this matter has always been the same, it is well defined, very clear and was reiterated yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. We feel that the national interest must prevail and take precedence over any private interest whatever. We recognize the important part that the private radio and television stations are called upon to play in this regard in Canada, but they must do so under the authority and the supervision of a regulatory body.

The Fowler report has been in the hands of the government for more than a year. We have been told nothing of the government's attitude in this regard. The time has now come for it to clear up matters in this connection.

Now Mr. Speaker I have a few suggestions to offer with regard to Canadian radio and television so that they may be better fitted to render maximum service to all classes of our people. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians, night workers, shut-ins, the sick or disabled, either at home or in hospitals, are deprived of the enjoyment of television. I wonder if it would not be possible to put on more afternoon films, so that these thousands of our fellow-citizens might have an opportunity to enjoy this entertainment which is unavailable to them in the evening.

At the time I sat on the government side, I called the attention of the Minister of National Revenue to the fact that French films shown on channel 2, Friday and Saturday evenings, were often of very doubtful quality. There already has been an improvement in this regard, even though we must recognize that there is no great choice in this matter since selections have to be made among films produced almost ten years back. But I do feel that if the Minister gave instructions in this regard, there would certainly be a marked improvement.

As regards the financing of radio and television in this country, I feel that we should favour increased spending. To my mind no Canadian would really object, because it would mean a more tangible form of assistance for our young people of talent. If we expect to compete with American radio and television, we must make it easier for our young folk to break into television by means of competitions and prizes that would bring unknown talent out of hiding.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word or two about a speech delivered yesterday by my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). I will merely note a sentence which may be found in the official record of this house, page 2228:

> Let there be a little cleanup job in the C.B.C.; let us throw out these people with warped ideas, leftist ideas, who grab half the television programs—

I have no wish of going into any details in this connection, but the hon. minister will have no difficulty in following me, since this is an extremely important matter. I feel that every newspaperman and every hon. member who sat in the last parliament, the 22nd parliament, will admit that we of the Liberal party have prevented politics from entering into the operation of Canadian radio and television. There is an old saying: "When politics enter the courts, justice is ousted".

Well, the day when we will let politics interfere in the field of radio and television in Canada, we will slowly but surely march towards totalitarianism. The word "cleanup" is often directly connected with political patronage. May I therefore be allowed to give some good advice to the hon. minister (Mr. Nowlan), and ask him to do as we did, i.e. to keep politics out of television and radio. As far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we will see to it that the government does not depart from the policies we have established in this matter.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to reserve my observations until the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) had had a chance to speak, because it may well be that many of the things I might otherwise say it would not be necessary for me to say and it would therefore have facilitated what the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked for yesterday, namely the speeding up of the business of the house, but since the minister is even slower than I in getting to his feet and since you, sir, were about to put the question, I seem to have no choice but to speak before the minister.

I should like to begin by referring to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). Perhaps it is almost unnecessary for me to say that we in the official opposition will be very glad indeed to support the subamendment. We hardly think it is necessary, as a matter of fact, after the words which were said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). If one compares the terms of the subamendment, which can be found on page 2221 of Hansard as follows:

> And this house further regrets that the government has not declared itself in support of the maintenance and expansion of publicly owned facilities in the field of radio and television—

—with what the Leader of the Opposition said at page 2215 of Hansard:

> The proper operation and development of such a national system of broadcasting will be costly and will involve increased public expenditures in the future.

And then these words which I hope all hon. members will mark well:

> It is imperative that we should be prepared to meet this responsibility if we want to grow and develop as a distinct nation.

I think it will be seen that the point has been dealt with. But I see no harm whatsoever in having this point stated explicitly as it is stated in the subamendment which was moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West, and we are very happy indeed to support the subamendment.

If I could think that the words, if I may put it that way, of the Minister of National Revenue when he spoke in the house on June 3 represented the considered and final views of the government, I should think it would not have been necessary for us to have brought this matter before the house. I must say I found many good things in the minister's speech; I found nothing much to disagree with except a very minor question of propriety as to whether he should have talked about the 15 per cent excise tax in the way he did, but I regard that as such a small fly in such an excellent ointment that I commend everything the minister said and I should like to remind members particularly of these words recorded on page 813 of Hansard in the middle of the second column:

> I pay tribute where tribute is due. I think the Liberal government deserves a tribute once in a while for some of the things it did, at any rate. I want to point out this fact also. In the United States of America there are three television networks and according to the financial reports none of them, as networks, are making much money, if they are breaking even.

And then the minister went on to point out the difference between the situation there and here. If we could feel that the statements that the minister expressed on that occasion were going to be reflected in the policy of this government when it is finally brought in in this house, I hope during this session—the Prime Minister rather intimated yesterday that we could look for everything this session that was forecast in the speech from the throne—we should be very pleased indeed. Of course, I cannot question what the Prime Minister said, though perhaps I can have a few private doubts about it. But we do feel it would be quite wrong for this session to go by without some firm indication of the direction in which the government intends to move. I must say that I personally would not be disposed to quarrel with the government too much if they did not finally complete their legislation this session, if they thought it more expedient to bring down the financial proposals which are in many ways, I think, the most urgent, and to indicate the lines along which they intended to proceed. I think that might be a wise course, because it would provide an opportunity not merely for us in this house and for the ladies and gentlemen in the other place to consider the government legislation, but it would also provide for the kind of opportunity that from time to time is given to the public generally to consider measures of great importance bringing about important reforms such as was given, for example, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in connection with the estates tax.

However, I recognize that it is not my responsibility nor my function to determine the course to be taken by the government. The most I can hope to do is to influence it, and I must say that if I can add a little to the influence which I hope and believe, and which there is certain evidence for believing, the Minister of National Revenue is exerting on his colleagues, I would feel we were moving in the right direction. I must say I was very pleased, too, by what the hon. member for Kootenay West said though he did not go quite as far yesterday as the Minister of National Revenue went the other evening.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

But the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) did say, as reported at page 2218 of Hansard of July 14, 1958:

> I think this indicates very clearly that while, as the Leader of the Opposition said, there is no organization or group that does not make mistakes under very difficult conditions where we have had this development of television, a very expensive medium of communication in recent years, changed technical conditions, procedures and things of that sort, the C.B.C. has done a wonderful job in this country, which is recognized by the Canadian people as a whole.

I would be the last person to claim that the government which was in office for all but one year of the life of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation deserves all the credit or even most of the credit for the achievements of that corporation but I do not think it can be denied nor do I think the Minister of National Revenue—although that may not be true of all his colleagues—would want to deny that the government which was in office from the time the C.B.C. was established in 1936 until certain unfortunate events in June of last year did create a climate in which the kind of C.B.C. could be developed of which the vast majority of the Canadian people are very proud as was shown, I think, whenever the issue was joined either in this house, in any parliamentary committee or whenever it was investigated by successive royal commissions.

It seems to me as the Leader of the Opposition very well pointed out yesterday, and as has been pointed out by almost every one who has spoken with the exception of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), who seemed to have rather different ideas about the C.B.C., that the feeling in this house is that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or perhaps I should rather say a national broadcasting system receiving a considerable measure of support from public funds, is essential to the national life of our country. The problem of radio and television broadcasting, as I see it, is the problem of Canada itself. It is the problem we have confronted over and over again ever since we made the resolution nearly 100 years ago to create a transcontinental nation in the northern half of this continent. We have discovered in almost everything we have tackled on a national scale that, because geographically we are inevitably on the margin of a country with ten times the population and more than ten times the developed—I do not say the undeveloped but the developed—resources of our own, that it is not possible to allow our national institutions to develop solely by the free play of economic forces. I have a predilection for the free play of economic forces; indeed, I belong to a party which has this predilection. But this is one field in which it became very quickly clear, even in the twenties of this century when radio was first developing and broadcasting was first being undertaken, that there would be no distinctively Canadian content to radio broadcasting if it were left to undiluted commercial enterprise.

It was that circumstance which led the government of Mr. Mackenzie King in 1928 to appoint the Aird commission. It is very significant that the report of the Aird commission has, in its essence, been accepted by and acceptable to the great majority of Canadians and to all governments ever since. There has been one deviation from the recommendations of the Aird commission, of course, but up until now there has been only one serious deviation.

There is no doubt that at the time the recommendation was made it was contemplated—and I think it was still contemplated even at the time the Canadian Broadcasting Act was first introduced in this parliament in 1936—that there would be a state broadcasting system and nothing else, as there is in the United Kingdom. We should remember, of course, that these recommendations were made and implemented at a time when we had a population of 10 million instead of 17 million in this country and at a time when economic activity was very different from the level it had attained at the time the Fowler commission made its report which, I might remind hon. members, was before the current recession began.

It is possible to contemplate that some of the economic conditions which made it seem imperative to the Aird commission that a complete monopoly of broadcasting should be given to a state organism were found not to be present because of the growth of population, wealth and capacity to support alternatives, but as the Fowler commission pointed out there were certain unfortunate as well as many very fortunate results which flowed from the deviation from that original decision. One of them was, of course, that because the private stations were anterior at least in time to the C.B.C. and they had established certain rights—not vested rights because specifically they were excluded, but rights of use and wont—they perhaps did manage, in one or two cases, to retain certain valuable franchises which were really a part of the public domain for which the public was not given as adequate a return as the public should have got.

That has been one of the thorniest of all the problems that every government has had to face. Once we decided to deviate from the original conception of a purely state agency, once we decided that private stations regulated by a state agency should be a part of the national system, it was quite clear that the most difficult decision—and as the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) pointed out, the kind fraught with the greatest danger—would have to be made from time to time, and that was how and at what price and in what circumstances should part of the public domain be exploited by private users. It should be pointed out over and over again that the airwaves are the public domain, that they are limited and that the public has the right to control them completely. All this talk about the possibility of free enterprise and competition in this sphere is, as the Fowler commission pointed out, talking about something that is not in accord with the facts of the situation.

Whenever a private station—be it a radio station or even more a television station—is given a licence it is being given a chunk of the public domain to exploit and it seems to me it should be given that chunk of the public domain to exploit only if it is going to be exploited in the public interest. That does not mean, of course, that the people who do the exploiting are not entitled to a proper remuneration for what they do whether it be in the form of salary and wages or in the form of profits, but it does mean that the public interest should always be paramount and always be put first.

It seems to me there are three problems of major significance that face the government at the present time. I am going to state them in the order of difficulty and it so happens that I think the order of importance is the exact opposite of the order of difficulty.

I think the least important of the three, but the most difficult of the three, is to decide to whom, where and under what conditions private licences for television are to be granted.

Mr. Nowlan: That is the least important.

Mr. Pickersgill: I say that that is the least important of the three in the whole picture but I think it is the most difficult of the three and I think the most fraught with dangers of many kinds for those who have the responsibility for discharging that obligation. We all know that of all those potential franchises the most valuable one is clearly the second channel in the city of Toronto. Not only is this the largest aggregation of population in the country using one language, or predominantly one language, but it so happens that in Toronto there is only one more channel available while in Montreal there are two. I am subject to correction on this but I think there are two in Vancouver, but in any case even if there is only one in Vancouver it might potentially be much more valuable than the one in Toronto but it is not actually so.

I thought of reading page 233 and the two following pages of the Fowler report but I do not think I will weary the house by doing it. I would like to draw them to the attention of hon. members because they deal specifically with this point.

It does seem to me that there are two ways of approaching this matter, two quite opposed ways, and there might, of course, be many gradations between those two. At the one extreme, if one wanted to apply the principle of almost undiluted private enterprise to this problem—and I must say I have thought there might be quite a good deal to be said for following that course—it seems to me there is one thing that could be done and that is that the second channel in Toronto could be put on the auction block and given to the highest bidder for an annual rental that would provide a very considerable revenue which could be used to improve public network television and television generally. If that were done, of course, and it were treated as a purely private enterprise problem, it would be quite wrong for the government to impose any conditions upon the broadcasting except such conditions of decency as might be felt to be in the public interest. If we were to make that approach, the purely private enterprise approach, the exploiters would have to be allowed to decide for themselves how they could make the most out of the station.

At the other extreme—and I must say that I have a preference for this other one, as the Fowler commission also had—it does seem to me that there should be very careful criteria laid down as to the kind of broadcasting that was to be done, as to the conditions under which the broadcasting was to be carried on, as to Canadian content above everything else, and that every effort should be made to see that the licensees of these private stations were not chosen because of their wealth, because of their political affiliation or because of any other conditions except their demonstrated competence and their capacity to do the job of providing a thoroughly Canadian service.

I do think there is quite a lot to be said for both of these alternatives; but what I think there is nothing whatever to be said for is to give this licence at comparatively low annual fee to some private interests to exploit for profit without many conditions being attached. If the station is to be run purely as a commercial operation for profit, then the unearned increment, the part of the profit that is due to scarcity, the part of the profit that is due to the fact that a section of the public domain is being exploited, should come to the state, to the people to whom it belongs and should not go to the undertakers of the enterprise. On the other hand, if we are to lay down serious conditions of Canadian content, serious conditions such as are suggested in the Fowler report, then we should make absolutely sure that the licensees are the kind of people who will carry out these conditions, and there should be a body to police them in order to see that they are carried out.

As I say, I think there is a lot to be said for those two possible solutions but there is nothing to be said for the third course that I mentioned. There is another alternative, of course. It was suggested to me on one occasion by a friend of mine that the C.B.C. should have the second channel in Toronto and those other profitable channels and run a purely commercial type of operation in order to help balance its books. I do not think much of that idea either, though I can understand some people in the C.B.C. thinking it might be a very good way of meeting some of their financial problems, and undoubtedly it would be. I do think, too, as the hon. member for Port Arthur did point out in what he had to say, that we do need to be pretty careful—and the Fowler commission indicates the same thing—about the duplication of stations to make sure that we are not going to siphon off too large a share of the potential advertising revenue into the private station and throw an unnecessary burden upon the taxpayers as a whole in doing so. That is the same problem exactly as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is facing with his proposed competition against T.C.A., but I do not want to be diverted into that channel, though I think the minister would understand that very well.

I come now to the second of the three problems that it seems to me the government has to face here. There are three major problems, the second of which, as I say, is rather more important even than the first one I have mentioned but I think a little less difficult, a little less complex, and that is the problem of the proper way to finance the C.B.C. I think all of us agree that it would be quite unrealistic to think of going back to the old system of having licences. Any government that undertook that, however popular it might be for other reasons, would become unpopular very quickly if it undertook that course. I think also that it is quite unrealistic to think that we could have the kind of national television service, or even a Canadian national radio broadcasting service that the Canadian people have demonstrated over and over again they want to have without some support other than advertising revenues. Therefore, it means either that we should use some device like the 15 per cent excise tax—of course, I was a member of the government that did it; I think I was or, if I was not, I was an adviser of the government that did it.

Mr. Lambert: It is the same thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is a device that worked very well; I think it was a very fair device in the days when many people did not have television, because it made sure that the building up of the television chain would be paid for by the people who got the benefit and not by the people in Bonavista-Twillingate and other areas who cannot receive television programs from anywhere because there is no station near them. If we are to approach 90 per cent coverage, as we hope to do and I think we should, it does seem to me that the problem of discrimination between one form of raising money and another will become less important.

What is important is the problem of determining how much money the C.B.C. should have and how it should be provided. I quite agree with the Fowler commission that it should be voted by parliament. I quite agree that the ultimate responsibility should be with parliament. But we in this party have always agreed that we do not want any direct or indirect pressure from the government upon the national broadcasting system, and I was very pleased indeed to hear certain statements made during this session by the Prime Minister which suggested that he took exactly the same view. The kind of financial control that should be exercised by parliament is the control that is concerned with getting the most for the least money and nothing else. We do not want to have the government setting itself up as a board of censorship nor do I think we even want parliament to do so.

In my opinion the only way you can run a system that is going to have any vitality is to choose good people to run it, trust them to run it and if they do a bad job then do something about them. I was not reassured by hearing the speech of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm because I do not think we in parliament should attempt to be censors. I do not think that most of us have the necessary attributes or the necessary time and I would have the very gravest fears of any attempt to have parliament do that.

At the same time I know that when we were in office we felt greatly concerned about the rapid growth in the cost of this operation and the prospective cost which was even more frightening. We did think that perhaps there might be some faint disposition on the part of people wanting to do a good job, wanting perhaps to be perfectionists, to feel that there were unlimited funds with which to achieve perfection. I do not say that that attitude was a very prevalent attitude in the C.B.C. but I do not think it was entirely absent either.

While I am not going to endorse every word in the report of the Fowler commission, it does seem to me that its basic view is sound that a certain amount should be allocated to the C.B.C., with safeguards for changes in the value of money, and the C.B.C. should be told that is all it is going to get for the next four or five years and that it must make do with it, choose the things that it thinks are most important and cut out the things that are not quite so important. I know that in the last year or two we were in office we subjected the film board to that regime and I felt it had a very good effect indeed upon their attitude to their expenditures. I believe that something of that kind would indeed be the best way.

The Fowler commission recommends three different methods. As between them I think it would be silly for me to make any observations because the government will probably have a fourth one and we had better debate the actual proposition instead of an academic proposition. But I would hope that the government would never think of bringing in annual estimates which would inevitably turn the C.B.C. into something indistinguishable from a government department. I cannot conceive that it would be possible to do this by the method of annual estimates without bringing directly, and more particularly indirectly, pressures upon this organization which I believe would sooner or later, almost inevitably be political and partisan in their nature.

That brings me, of course, to the third problem the one which I think is by all odds the most important but which I also think is the least difficult. That is the problem of control. While I had some sympathy for the feeling that engendered the propaganda of the Canadian association of broadcasters—its name is somewhat longer now—I think that it was fallacious. It was never intended that we should have two systems like the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. It was never intended at any time by any parliament that there should be more than one system of broadcasting in which the private sector complemented the public sector.

I have never felt that there was anything wrong whatsoever in principle or indeed in practice—the Fowler commission has said so too—about the regulation of the private stations by the board of governors of the corporation. I must say I had a good deal of sympathy with what some of the private broadcasters had to say about employees of the C.B.C. exercising control over them. I think they had a valid point when they said that they did not object so much to being controlled by the board of governors or by people directly responsible to the board as they did to employees lower down the scale exercising control over them. They felt that this created jealousies between the private stations and some of the public stations which may have been unfortunate. I do not claim to possess any personal knowledge but I think an argument could be made and in my opinion the basic solution suggested in the Fowler report that there should be one board to control both but that control should not be exercised by employees actually engaged in the operating agency is a good and sound one.

But what is most important, what I should like to emphasize above all, is that national broadcasting should be as independent of the government as the judiciary. What is important is that we find a formula—whether it has been found by the Fowler commission I am not absolutely sure—which will make it absolutely certain that there is no way in which the government can yield to the temptation, which I suppose is present in all executives, namely to use all legitimate means to further their own ends, to exercise pressure upon the people who have control of this great agency, which we believe must be a national agency and must be supported by the state, in order to favour one political party, one group or one set of ideas rather than another. We do not want to have a totalitarian type of broadcasting system. If we are going to have a national system, we have to have one that is financed by the state to some degree and controlled by an agency of the state.

In that regard it seems to me that the great historic experience of the British peoples in establishing courts that can be completely independent of the executive, and they are independent, is the real model and pattern for us to follow and that in this matter more than in any other field it is of vital importance, not only that there should be no interference by the executive branch of the government but that there should be no colour of interference. If the government brings before us proposals which cover this point completely, which give us real assurance that what has been the case over the past 20 years will continue to be the case, then in my opinion they will have no difficulty with that part of their legislation in getting it through the house.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

As I said at the beginning, and I say it again now in coming to the close of my remarks, if I felt that the Minister of National Revenue was himself going to decide this question I would have great hope and great confidence. But we have had from hon. gentlemen opposite, in their different metamorphoses—and they have been many in the past 25 years—many divergent views about how broadcasting should be carried on in this country. We had Mr. Drew's famous proposal to which the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) referred last night, that all the lucrative broadcasting should be left to private industry and the government should pick up the tab for the outlying parts of the country. In 1952 the hon. member for Laurier demolished that proposition so completely that we never heard it again. Incidentally, he made one of the most magnificent speeches that I ever heard in this house; that was before I was a member.

I do not believe there is much danger of the Tory party reviving that proposition. Then, we had the Prime Minister making a statement at Kenora, with which I am sure the minister is familiar, on March 18, when he said:

> I have read and studied the report.

The reference is to the Fowler report.

> We intend to bring in legislation for a semi-judicial body similar to the board of transport commissioners so that radio and television will have that justice which is the essence of our system.
> The time is long overdue to assure private stations in competition with the publicly-owned national organization, that their cases shall be judged by an independent body instead of as in the past by those in national competition, acting as judge and jury.

I would not have minded so much the first paragraph, but I do not care very much for the second. I imagine that perhaps the Prime Minister was speaking, as he sometimes does, without a text and perhaps without the same amount of reflection that he might have given to his words on a different occasion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rarely ask for the indulgence of the house, but I could finish in one minute.

Mr. Nowlan: Go ahead.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I was saying, with the first half of the Prime Minister's statement I find no difficulty, but the second half worries me. It worries me quite a lot. This conception of competition, and this conception that it is not one unified national system. I hope when the government's proposals are matured that that will disappear. I may say—I never thought the day would come when I would say this, but in closing I want to say it—this is one field in which I hope the Tory party goes back to Bennett because on this subject, and on this subject almost alone, Bennett was right.

(Translation):

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to join hon. members who spoke before me and supported the amendment submitted yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). After listening to severe criticism aimed at the C.B.C. by government members when some of them were sitting in the ranks of the opposition, we are hardly surprised that our leader, the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) should have thought it was time to upbraid the government for delaying a statement explaining its policy with regard to our radio and television systems.

From its timid attitude with regard to the C.B.C. and the delay in revealing their policy to this effect, we may conclude that the government has now realized that our present system, which they so vehemently criticized when they were still in the opposition, managed, though it is not yet quite perfect, to combine public broadcasting and private property by an agreement very suitable to our country, which meets the demands of the great majority of Canadians.

This house certainly regrets that the government has not yet submitted any proposals for the control and financing of radio and television, and it is also important that some decision be announced as soon as possible in order to dispel any uncertainty that may now exist with regard to public and private broadcasting in Canada.

Our radio and television system, as it exists today, is perhaps not perfect and could no doubt be improved in some respects, but we have to realize and to admit that it is to our advantage to keep, as far as possible, our Canadian identity and our Canadian culture.

It is to our advantage to avoid, if possible, in our cultural system, any foreign influences which might affect this Canadian element which is our own, both inside and outside the country.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay any further the debate on this important question upon which depends the future of radio and television in Canada.

I am glad, however, to take this opportunity to associate myself with the remarks made in this house yesterday by the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) with regard to French language stations in Canada.

We recognize that the Canadian economy cannot by itself take care of a radio and television system depending only on commercial revenues. That is why it is essential that a system such as the C.B.C. should be supported by public funds, and this is all the more necessary if we wish to protect the rights of our various racial groups.

We, as members of a minority group in the maritime provinces, recognize that the principles adopted by the C.B.C., and especially those regulating the operation and control of French language stations, try to be fair towards our minority groups.

Representatives of various French language groups who appeared before the Fowler Royal Commission, were practically unanimous in approving the general quality of the French language programs of the C.B.C. They took the opportunity to pay tribute to the governors of the C.B.C. who endeavour to give the French language population of Canada a service which aims to satisfy the requirements and demands of the French-speaking population.

We should also recognize that, in their briefs, those various groups requested improvements which were then introduced by the C.B.C. as far as financial and technical facilities allowed.

I should like to mention particularly those briefs submitted in French from the maritime provinces, that dealt with the establishment of a television station connected with the French network, having its broadcasting centre in Moncton.

As announced in this house a few weeks ago by the Minister of National Revenue, the request was considered reasonable and the C.B.C. wasted no time in taking the necessary steps for the establishment of this station.

Realizing that most of the French-speaking people of New Brunswick live in the northern constituencies of the province, the C.B.C. promptly acted on our request that French network programs be extended to the new television station planned for New Carlisle, the inauguration of which is anxiously awaited in the northern area of New Brunswick and of the Gaspe peninsula.

We have reason to believe that the C.B.C. will not delay in agreeing at the same time to the request of the English-speaking people of this area, particularly in extending to this station or to the northeastern area of New Brunswick, the programs of the English network of the C.B.C.

Mr. Speaker, I am therefore happy to support the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

(Text):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on this subject of radio and television broadcasting in Canada perhaps we have had just as much in the way of speeches and material written in those other media of communication, the newspapers and magazines, as on any other subject that has been before us for a number of years. I am speaking as perhaps the only one who has intervened in this debate and who comes from a region where private radio and television has more scope than in this particular area of the country. Perhaps some of the views of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken have been coloured by that fact. I would like to draw to the attention of hon. members some of the difficulties which face those concerned with the development of radio and television in Canada.

I do not think I need to go back over the history of this subject, because references were made by the proposer of the amendment and those who followed him to the Aird commission report, the Massey commission report and finally the Fowler commission report, which pretty well indicate the history of these media. I think we must however recognize the fact that the existence of private radio and television in Canada is not the result of unfettered development as some members might have seen fit to allow, but rather some sort of controlled development. If we look at the results in this light perhaps they are a little easier to understand.

I know there are many areas in Canada where, if development of television had been less restricted, we would have better television today. We have the rather ludicrous situation in Vancouver, for instance, where the viewers in many areas are able to pick up six channels, only one of which is Canadian, and where hundreds of thousands of dollars in revenue pour across the border to United States stations simply because—or this is one of the reasons—the Canadian station does not have enough hours available in which to accept advertising and commercial sponsorship from the people who want to give it. I suggest the same thing applies in Toronto, Montreal and other areas. These cities could support a greater number of channels or outlets and it is not a matter of an entirely commercial outlet taking away all the advertising from the existing C.B.C. outlet.

I think the matter of attracting viewers is a question of the type of program available. After all, you cannot force a person to listen to a radio program or to view a television program against his will. There are, of course, many people who perhaps need a sort of sound conditioning—they cannot live without some sort of background noise—and they will take what is there. We have all witnessed this condition in some rural areas where smaller stations pour out hour after hour a certain type of music which is rather grating on the nerves, but still a lot of people will accept it. However, people are free to choose and if they will listen to that type of broadcasting then such programs will be sponsored.

I feel it is fallacious to suggest that simply because there exist limited channels in the Toronto area that if we turned over the remaining channels to a purely commercial organization revenue would immediately depart from the C.B.C. station. That, I think, is based on the assumption that what the C.B.C. station has to present to its viewers is not worth looking at and that its viewer rating will immediately drop and the commercial sponsors will desert it as rats desert a sinking ship. I do not accept that theory at all; I think it would be a good thing if the C.B.C. had competition in such areas. The men who are in charge of the management of these various private stations are businessmen and they have responsibilities like everyone else and they are recognized as having those capacities, so they will certainly make efforts to cater to the public and make their product a saleable one. As in so many other things the matter of radio and television content is a matter of selling to the public and I would say the best sales attraction for these media would be quality and then service.

I have one further observation to make in connection with the question of private and public television stations. Based on my somewhat cursory knowledge from visiting and participating in programs at both types of stations, I am astounded at the number of personnel in private radio stations compared with those at C.B.C. stations for the same type of program. It is almost incomprehensible. One cannot understand why so many people have to be around a sound stage at a C.B.C. station. I presume they have a job to do. The same comment applies to the technicians involved. They may have something to do with the quality of the program, but I have particular reference to where the same type of program is involved. Somehow or other the C.B.C. always seems to have rather more people about. Perhaps the technical production is superior; I do not know, but I make that observation in passing.

I feel the position of our radio and television coverage in this country is such that we should encourage competition between the national system and private interests. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) suggested that we did not want to get into a situation in this regard like we have with the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., but I think the fact that there is a privately owned radio system and a publicly owned one—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member does not want to misrepresent what I said, which was that we had not created a system such as the one with respect to the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. Lambert: I stand corrected, Mr. Speaker. I felt from the reference of the hon. member that he was suggesting that the fact that there exist two different types of competitors was something that should not be encouraged. I would like to say that I would have thought the best competition for the C.N.R. is the C.P.R. It acts as a spur to provide a better service to the public, and the same applies with respect to the C.P.R.

I believe the same might be said of this field of radio and television. Competition within the framework of technical control by a board set up to regulate the allocation of wave lengths and the general technical development of radio and television in my opinion would be beneficial. This competition, of course, would have to be confined in other aspects from the point of view of morality, et cetera, but we could then encourage private radio and television and the C.B.C. on the same footing, but not the condition which has existed for rather too long of the one group acting as judge, jury and prosecutor. It may be that the greatest discretion was used, but there was always the suspicion that because the framework permitted it there were occasions when there was some discrimination. From what I have heard from private radio and television interests, those occasions were somewhat frequent.

And now may I make a suggestion with regard to the future of radio and television —certainly television—it would be this: I have spoken on a number of occasions in this house about the value of bilingualism, but I will address myself now particularly to the English speaking members of this house; I do not think I have to convince the French speaking members about the value of my proposal. We have today French speaking television stations and English speaking stations. In a few centres in Canada we have bilingual stations, but if I am fully conversant with the regulations, such stations can exist only where there is not already an English speaking or a French speaking station. In other words, we cannot have an English station and a bilingual station in the same area.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all members that if we are to develop as a nation we must encourage the learning of the other language to the fullest extent possible and take steps to see that our people, particularly our children, become bilingual. We have seen such a development taking place in many areas, in our schools and so forth, and noted that though there had been previously a great antipathy toward learning a second language, that attitude has been changing. Knowledge of a second language is certainly of great advantage in this house, and I feel that where there is a field for a second television station and where there is a demand because of the existence of a minority of the second language group, be it French or English, we should provide a bilingual station on the basis of 70-30 or 60-40 or even 50-50. I suggest that the limitation which exists today be dispensed with.

I know that here in Canada the quality of the development of our domestic actors on the French network of the C.B.C. is of a higher calibre on the whole than that which exists on the English network. Simply because there are no fill-ins they have had to get out and produce. In the same way I think we should give encouragement throughout the rest of the country and that we should give encouragement to the full development and use of both the English and French languages from one end of this country to the other. That is by way of constructive suggestion.

I feel we can say to hon. members in the opposition that this government is fully aware of the problems which they have been eloquent in pointing out. It has been spoken about in the debate on the speech from the throne, and I suggest that if we bide our time we will see something that will be satisfactory.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): We have had an interesting debate starting yesterday afternoon and running into today and I think I will be expected to say something about the matters which have been raised, although frankly there has been very little here of a controversial nature. I appreciate the fact that the debate has been kept on a high level and that the discussion has been constructive rather than destructive.

I hope I am not departing from that standard when I suggest that the fact that the amendment was made in the terms that it was, is a great tribute to this government, because after all this is one of the six motions, we were told yesterday, to go into supply. This is the fifth of the six motions which give to the opposition a chance to move a vote of censure on things which the government has done and which should be rectified, and it is interesting to see that after this parliament has been sitting as long as it has, the only criticism with which we are faced in this amendment is the fact that we have not proceeded quite as fast in dealing with the order paper as members of the opposition would have wished.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Did the minister observe that practically all of the amendments pointed to omissions and failures to act?

Mr. Nowlan: If we are only guilty of omissions of this kind then Canada is undoubtedly blessed in the government it has, and I think the majority of Canadians are of this opinion.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) quoted at length from the Fowler commission report, partly in the language of that commission and partly in his own, very adequately presenting the problems which face broadcasting and telecasting in this country. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) quoted at length from a speech which was made here a few days ago by the Minister of National Revenue and I am not sure which one of the two hon. gentlemen made the greater contribution to the debate. I suppose modesty would prevent my deciding that matter. In any event, I do not propose to make again the speech which the hon. member for Kootenay West repeated at some length last night.

Hon. members will remember that I discussed the C.B.C. on an ad lib basis for 20 minutes or so here the other evening, and certainly I am not going to repeat the observations I made then, though the fact that I do not do so does not in any way suggest that the circumstances have changed or that I have changed my mind with respect to them. Perhaps, though, I should make one comment or explanation, because I have had some letters from people associated with the television industry.

Apparently I said in a free and easy moment, and quite factually, that I thought the radio system in Canada was the best in the world. But I did not make the same observation about television, and they thought there might possibly have been an implied criticism of our television programs. There was no implied criticism intended. We have some excellent television in this country but naturally, with the tremendous sums of money spent on television programs elsewhere, we cannot, perhaps, say that all of ours are superior to all of those that are available to the Canadian people.

The amendment itself simply regrets that the government has not yet presented its proposals for the regulation and financing of radio and television broadcasting and thereby removing the uncertainty as to the future of public and private broadcasting in Canada.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, we have not presented our proposals as yet, but I doubt if that is a matter for serious criticism at this time. I think hon. gentlemen opposite wanted, perhaps, to stake out a claim for themselves in defending the C.B.C. and also, perhaps in elaborating upon the Fowler commission, perhaps taking the copyright on that. And so, to use a slang expression, they rather beat the gun and moved this amendment yesterday. But because presumably in a week or two or certainly in the relatively near future I will be having to make another speech on broadcasting and telecasting in Canada when the government legislation is brought into the house, I am sure hon. members will not feel I am slighting them in any way if I do not deal in detail or in fact if I do not deal except in a very general way with the arguments they have raised.

I have made some rather copious and rough notes here which I shall review. I will have the advantage of reading in Hansard my remarks and those of hon. gentlemen who have spoken and if I anticipate correctly I will have an opportunity of speaking on this matter again in the near future and perhaps at that time I could clear up any points which hon. members have raised with which I did not deal this afternoon.

After all, Mr. Speaker, this house opened in May. We did not conclude the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne until well into the month of June. We have had the budget debate since then. We have also had five motions to go into supply. We have had legislation dealing with housing, legislation dealing with an extension of unemployment insurance benefits and the house has considered many other matters in addition to having had private members' days and the hours devoted to a consideration of private members' bills. At least it cannot be said that the house has been idle. The house has been sitting regular hours for several weeks and now we are moving to an extension.

It is true, I suppose, that one could have brought forward a certain piece of legislation and set it ahead of another and perhaps this could have been brought on a little earlier, but very little earlier. If that had been the case, other legislation which to many people would have been equally important would have been delayed. In other words, I do not seriously accept for one moment—and I do not think hon. members opposite expected me to accept it seriously—the suggestion that there has been any delay in bringing forward the legislation. I doubt that there has been any great uncertainty in the minds of those associated with the corporation because of that.

As one hon. gentleman pointed out, the report of the Fowler commission was brought forward in the early spring of 1957, I believe in February or March. The government of that day did not proceed with legislation at that time. This was natural because an election was pending and the government delayed action on it until after the election. That government was not returned; we were. But I suspect that if the government had been returned—I am fairly certain of this although I cannot be sure of it—last year with a full majority it would have been inclined to look upon the session as sort of a windup of the earlier part of the session and if hon. gentlemen opposite had formed the government last summer I doubt if they would have brought in legislation dealing with the C.B.C. last fall. I am certainly sure they would not have done it if they had been returned in a minority position as we were wherein they would not have known how long they might be in office.

This government was returned last year under circumstances wherein it had a cleanup of legislative matters and details left from the previous session and not being in a majority position I do not think it was expected of us that we would bring in legislation which obviously would be contentious and is of tremendous importance and attempt to deal with it at that time.

I say there can be no possible suggestion of delay in this matter on the part of the government and the same delay would have occurred if hon. gentlemen opposite had been in power until after parliament was called together this spring. I feel I have dealt with that point adequately and I say again that there has been in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of all hon. members of this house regardless of what position they may feel they should assume on the vote, that there has been no great delay in this connection.

This is a very important matter and one could discuss it at considerable length. I could take all the time that is available to me and more in dealing with the points which have been raised but, as I said, I do not think this is the time for me to do it. I cannot believe that hon. gentlemen opposite expect from me a preview of the government legislation which is to be brought down. I could not properly do that even if I wanted to because it would be contrary to all the rules and accepted principles of legislation. But I can say this to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who raised the question—and certainly properly so—that it is proposed to bring down the legislation at this session of parliament and I hope it will be done in the very near future.

This is not an easy matter upon which to legislate. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) quite properly pointed out what he considered were the three problems in connection with it. I wish there were only three. Two of the problems to which he referred will come into being after the legislation is brought down, the matter of licensing and of regulation. There are many problems in trying to bring into being a workable scheme different in conception from that which has applied heretofore. Assume for the sake of argument that the government did decide to establish some sort of independent regulatory board such as is recommended by the Fowler commission and that the board were given the powers heretofore exercised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Assuming that were done, when you come to draft working arrangements whereby that could be accommodated, I think the ingenuity of the draftsmen would be taxed to a considerable extent and whatever system the government may decide to introduce presents many problems.

Perhaps what I am about to say should not be said but I think it is a fair observation. I think quite frankly that whatever the legislation is and whatever the regulations are we are not going to make a system like this work by referring, let us say, to section 475, subsection 2, subparagraph (g) and saying, "That is the answer". The success of this endeavour is going to depend on the men who are administering it, on the personnel, on common sense, on practice, on goodwill and all the other factors which enter into arrangements such as this. Whatever system may be introduced and whatever similarities or changes it may embody, it will be very similar to the British constitution. There will be more which will be unwritten and which will have to develop with practice than will be set down in black and white and capitals as the legislative enactments of the Medes and Persians. I doubt if a system like this can work in any way except in being based on established general principles.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred to the one-station system which is applied in Toronto and other places. If the inference or thought were in his mind I think it should be said that is not a matter for the C.B.C. per se. That is a matter of government policy which was laid down by the preceding government, and I think properly, at that time. It is a policy which has been carried on and maintained by this government. The C.B.C. as such, whatever it may or may not have benefited by it, depending on the circumstances, is not a matter of Canadian Broadcasting Corporation regulation. It is a policy of the government of Canada and, as I said once before, the time is rapidly approaching if not already here when the government will have to give careful consideration to a revision of that policy. My own thought would be that when that policy is revised, if it is, it would not be advisable to do it until such changes as are proposed in the legislation are brought into enactment and such bodies as may be created under that legislation are named and such regulations as they may decide upon are drafted and published because I do not think —and I am now expressing my own personal opinion and I think it is a reasonable one— that people, groups, corporations or syndicates can operate successfully without knowing the regulations under which they have to operate and once they get them it is hard to change the regulations afterwards. My own thinking for what it is worth would be that there will be no change in that policy for some little while yet at any rate and when the change is brought in regulations will have been adopted.

There has been a great deal of talk by some hon. members about licensing. I agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Frankly, I think it is a minor matter. It is very important to the people who are looking for licences. It might be very awkward or damaging to the government or to any political organization which has to make the decision but actually, in so far as the national interests are concerned, it will not make so much difference whether the group of A, B and C get the licence or group D, E and F get it, provided that there are regulations laid down which will be operative, which will be known, which will be reasonable, which will have application and which will be enforced. If those regulations are promulgated by a body in whom the Canadian people have confidence and are the type of regulations that such a body would promulgate, then I do not think there will be much trouble in dealing with the matter of licensing.

Something has been said about the use of the French language by radio and television stations. I quite agree with what has been said by hon. members in that connection. There have been French speaking stations authorized but not licensed with which the C.B.C. is proceeding this year. We have the station at Moncton about which hon. members have spoken from time to time. And the hon. gentleman spoke about it a moment ago. We have one at St. Boniface which has been authorized by the C.B.C. this year. We have the bilingual station to which the hon. member for Edmonton West referred a few moments ago. We have a bilingual station being licensed at New Carlisle, which is serving the northern area of New Brunswick and part of Quebec, and we are making and will continue to make progress in the extension of those French television and radio stations. The matter of finances is—I will not say embarrassing—a problem of great importance and of increasing importance every day. The costs are rising astronomically.

Something was said about the number of employees in the C.B.C. television stations as compared with private stations. I do not think any one of us who has gone into a C.B.C. station to make a telecast—I remember one night, sir, I happened to encounter you somewhere; it was a hot night; you were coming out as I was going in—has not been struck by the fact that as he went into the C.B.C. station he saw that the service was, shall we say, more adequately manned than was that of the private stations. Of course the C.B.C. is faced with unions, negotiations and contracts which may or may not be the explanation. The matter was delicately referred to by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Although it is very pleasant to speak about the C.B.C. as we have, and as I certainly have done in the past and will again, yet we also have to pay tribute to the private stations, many of which in this country have carried their share of this national obligation in a very adequate way. There may be some exceptions; there are some who, armed with a disc jockey and a few records, would like nothing better than to play those records all day long and charge for them; but generally speaking I think it can be said that the private stations have recognized their responsibilities either to the local communities, particularly the smaller stations operating within the communities, or to the province or the nation, as the case may be. They are part, of course, of the integrated national system.

Some hon. members talked yesterday and today about competition and whether they were competitors or partners. I think sometimes it might be rather difficult to persuade the private stations that they were partners entirely in this enterprise, and there is no doubt in the world that they are competitors, and properly so, for the advertising dollar. That may have a good effect on both because they are in competition one with the other in the quality of their programs, and so on, to attract the advertising. In the other field they are associated in an integrated system. As I see it, it is the only system that could possibly work in this vast country.

In this system we have created something unique in the whole world, which we have evolved here, partly private and partly public. It is a compromise which Canada has used so often throughout her history, for example, in the building of railways and in fact in the building of the whole nation. Yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West rather humorously suggested that perhaps we have followed the C.C.F. in combining private enterprise and public interest. The C.C.F. are following. They have adopted the policy and the pattern which were in effect in Canada long before the C.C.F. was ever heard of. We had that in the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National and now we have it in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There has been this compromise. Perhaps we are not the most colorful people in the world; perhaps we are not dramatic, but we have built up a pattern which is rather unique in creating this nation stretching across the northern half of the continent, and nowhere is it better exemplified, than in the working out of this partnership.

Perhaps I would be expected to say one word about the matter to which I referred in the house the other day. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has suffered a very severe loss in the resignation of the chairman of the board of governors, Mr. Dunton. He has served the corporation well throughout the years in many ways. The development of this enterprise is a monument and tribute to him which will endure for many years and the country as a whole is indebted to him for what he did during the years in which he was associated with the system.

I do not think there is anything more I need to say at this time, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I should say a word about the sub-amendment. Simply expressed, it reads:

> This house further regrets that the government has not declared itself in support of the maintenance and expansion of publicly owned facilities in the field of radio and television.

That may be technically correct, Mr. Speaker. I was under the distinct impression —and I admit I have not found it—that there is on record in Hansard a speech of mine in which I declared myself very forcibly in favour of such a system. I certainly did it by inference the other night, if not explicitly, and I am quite sure there have been statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the same effect. If they were not made in the house, then they were made on several occasions outside the house, because I have heard them myself. Let there be no doubt about it, this government is in favour of support for and maintenance of the publicly owned facilities in the field of radio and television.

As has been pointed out by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, a Conservative government under R. B. Bennett, later Lord Bennett, laid the foundation of the whole Canadian broadcasting system. That was when the pattern was developed, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate quite fairly and generously paid tribute to the government of that day for having established the foundation on which the rest has been built.

With every committee of the House of Commons, regardless of the political party, unanimously recommending in favour of maintaining such a system, with three royal commissions recommending the same thing, any political party that would seek to depart from that would certainly not be worthy of the confidence of the people and would not get the confidence of the people and would be politically inept and politically stupid. This government I do not think has shown any of those traits, and I am sure they would not do so in a matter such as this.

As I said, the legislation will come down in the relatively near future. I hope that perhaps the opportunity afforded hon. members to speak yesterday and today will take some of the speeches out of their system and we may possibly have a shorter debate on account of it, although I doubt that very much. I do not think there will be anything in the legislation which has not been envisaged in one way or another in the speeches that have been made. Certainly I cannot go any farther in dealing with that legislation than simply to make the statement I have made, that it will be brought down at the earliest possible moment. I regret the fact that it has not come down earlier. It has certainly been due to no fault of the government in trying to delay it or anything of that kind. There are certain factors in connection with it which have had to be and are being dealt with so that now we are in the position that with the work of the draftsmen nearing completion the bill will be brought in at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister concludes I wonder whether he would permit a question. Can the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to appoint a successor to Mr. Dunton pending the bringing down of their new legislation?

Mr. Nowlan: I would not want to give a definite answer. Frankly, I think it would depend on circumstances. If we can bring the legislation in at the time I hope, see the framework that is provided under the legislation and the legislation is enacted, then, as the Fowler commission has pointed out and as this party pointed out in days gone by when we were in opposition, there obviously would be an independent regulatory body of some kind and one would assume, whatever the details might be, that some board would be set up such as that which might or might not obviate the necessity of filling the vacancy. At the moment there is a vice-chairman, of course. This is not the general manager of the corporation. As the hon. member well knows, this vacancy is that of the chairman of the board of governors. There are vacancies on the board now, and perhaps it would be rather invidious to appoint one person, make him chairman and not fill all the vacancies. That is a matter which the government will have to decide depending upon circumstances and the progress made in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish with unanimous consent to proceed on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Pearson: On division.

Amendment (Mr. Pearson) negatived on division.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the house be prepared to dispose of the main motion now?

Mr. Argue: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no. You tried.

An hon. Member: Grievances.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

GRAIN—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF WESTERN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to ask for a statement from the government as to its policy regarding the question of deficiency payments on western grain. I see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) has just entered the chamber and I hope that at the conclusion of my remarks he will enter the debate and place the government's position in this regard on record.

The case for deficiency payments, western producers feel, is very strong. For many years they have been in favour, as they still are, of the Canadian wheat board system of marketing their grain. They have asked for stability in the assembling of their grain, in the grading of it and in the selling of it on the domestic and export markets. At the same time they have asked for a measure of stability in the price-cost relationship. They have said that the price of their grain should bear a fair relationship to cost of production. Grain producers were quite satisfied with the price-cost relationship in the first few years immediately following the end of the war. They had a number of grievances at that time relating to the final payment and so forth, and after the British wheat agreement was brought to an end they had certain grievances as far as freight costs were concerned, but generally speaking they found their price-cost position between 1945 and 1950 reasonably good.

Since that time, however, there has been a drastic increase in the cost of production. Since 1947 there has been an increase of just over 50 per cent, according to official statistics, in the cost of production. At the same time there has been a general decrease as far as the prairies are concerned of 12 per cent in the price of agricultural commodities. As far as wheat is concerned, the drop has been 21 per cent. Western farmers find, then, that since 1947, the cost of production has increased by more than 50 per cent while the price of their most important agricultural commodity has declined by 21 per cent. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite how any ordinary business firm in this country could maintain its solvency over a 10-year period if it faced increased costs of 50 per cent and a reduction of 21 per cent in the price of its main commodity.

Prairie producers at this time face a very serious economic crisis. It is true that in recent months prices of certain other agricultural commodities have tended to increase. Farmers on the prairies in desperation have been taking a substantial acreage out of wheat and turning it into coarse grain, turning it into coarse grains and fodder crops, and increasing very substantially their production of cattle and hogs. I think that is a sensible long term trend but unless something is done to correct the price-cost position as far as grain products are concerned there will be a far greater acceleration of the movement away from the production of grain to the production of livestock which, I suggest, would have disastrous results as far as agriculture in other parts of Canada is concerned.

No one will dispute me when I say that you can produce grain on the prairies more cheaply than in any other part of Canada, and if the grain producers find it is unprofitable for them to sell their grain they will turn it into livestock, and if they turn any substantial percentage of this enormous production of grain into livestock and livestock products it could mean the total collapse of agricultural prices all over this country. I am hoping that the government will act. Certainly the farm organizations have expected the government to act, and farmers have had a good deal of faith that the government would act.

The events of March 31 demonstrated to every person on the prairies, no matter what political party he might have voted for on election day, that the people of the prairies had displayed great confidence in the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and in the stated policies of the Conservative party. I know that a great number of them were most unhappy on April 1 and had the feeling that they had gone too far and that it was not in the best interests of parliamentary government that in the three prairie provinces which return 48 members, 47 should be members of one political party. But that action was taken and I do not think that in general the public were sorry they had supported the government.

But now they are beginning to question the government as to what its agricultural policies are going to be, and they are asking this question day after day, over and over again: when is the government going to announce its policy on deficiency payments?

The western wheat pool organizations, which in the past have always been considered cautious and careful organizations, organizations which adopt and initiate policies only after a great deal of the most careful consideration, have now for more than two years been asking for deficiency payments. Before the final payment was announced on the 1956-57 wheat crop the prairie wheat pool organizations had been asking for deficiency payments on wheat for 1955-56 of 22 cents a bushel; for 1956-57 of 30 cents a bushel; for oats, 1955-56, four cents a bushel; 1956-57, 15 cents a bushel; for barley, 1955-56, 14 cents a bushel; 1956-57, 22 cents a bushel; and they estimated that the total amount of money that would be involved on the basis of these requests would be in excess of $220 million.

That was before the final payment was announced on the 1956-57 wheat crop. The farmers were disappointed. The wheat pool organizations, through their spokesmen, said they were shocked at the very low final payment averaging approximately six cents a bushel and because the final payment was amended to six cents a bushel they altered their request for a deficiency payment and increased it from 30 cents a bushel to 36 cents a bushel. I understand, from reading the press, that at the last annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool a resolution was passed instructing the incoming board of directors to wait upon the government to present their request for deficiency payments and by the time of the next annual meeting, which is in November, this year, to have received a satisfactory answer from the federal government or in the meantime to have organized to be sent to Ottawa a mass delegation to wait upon the government to impress upon it the producers' views.

The government has made no announcement. The directors of that organization are under these definite instructions from their annual convention. That is why they are so anxious that the government delay no further this very important announcement. This request is supported not only by the wheat pool organizations but by the farm union organizations and at various conferences throughout western Canada it has been endorsed by most organizations with a mass membership. It has been supported by rural municipal associations, urban municipal associations, retail merchants' associations and by some church organizations and teachers' federations in their annual conferences.

This is a request that is not confined to the spokesmen in a given political party nor is it confined to spokesmen in a given organization. This is a request that is supported by the people of the three prairie provinces almost unanimously. I confidently hope and expect that it is supported by the 47 Conservative members in this house from the prairie provinces. I would be highly surprised if it were not. There was such an indication during this session at the time I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) whether or not the government was giving consideration to this question. The minister replied that the 47 Conservative members to whom I have referred were as anxious as I was to have action on the matter and had spoken to him about it. I hope they have continued expressing themselves to the minister in this regard. I also hope that sometime this evening before the main motion is put to the house we will have an expression from hon. members from the various provinces that are mainly affected by this question because I expect that the people back home, for that matter all the people on the prairies, will be anxious to hear from them as representatives of the people in the three prairie provinces.

Although the Liberal party is not represented in the house through members from the three prairie provinces I would also hope there would be some indication of the attitude of the official opposition with respect to this question. We all know from practical experience that when the government presents any program, and particularly a new one, it is anxious to know the stand of the opposition parties in this house. If the proposition put to the house by the government is unanimously supported then there is little political trouble for the government presenting the motion. I would expect that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose department this affects mainly, would stand in his place in the house tonight and announce deficiency payments such as have been requested, the official opposition would unanimously support that announcement. I would certainly hope that would be the case. Certainly the C.C.F. members would support it.

I have heard it said on many occasions in various debates in this house—

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Surely.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been standing in his place preaching like a parrot for the last 15 minutes about the difficulties of the farmer. We are all aware of the facts of the situation. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what he ever did—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has been given the floor to ask a question. I suggest that he put his question.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what the hon. member has ever done to remedy the situation in the last four or five years other than to stand there and talk about it.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will examine my record in the house I think he will find that it compares favourably with the record of any other hon. member on this particular question.

I was about to refer to the many occasions when some of my good friends on the Conservative side of the house and I participated together in various debates and was about to remind them that even with the tough government we had to deal with in those days we were able to make some progress. My hon. friend, as has already been suggested to him, can rise in his place a little later and make whatever submission he wishes.

I have been saying that this proposition is supported by most organizations in the prairie provinces. I have in my hand the submission of the interprovincial farm union council to the federal government dated May 28, 1958. In it they have asked for deficiency payments of approximately but not exactly the same size as those asked for by the wheat pool organizations. In 1955-56 they asked for deficiency payments on wheat of 28 cents per bushel, and in 1956-57 they asked for payments of 26 cents per bushel with appropriate deficiency payments for oats and barley. In this submission they point out by way of their own tables and figures some of the very things that were pointed out by the wheat pool organizations.

This brief is highly complimentary of the government. It congratulates the government quite frequently. It is very moderate in tone and concludes with a request for deficiency payments. Since the date of presentation of this brief the interprovincial farm union council has returned to Ottawa; in fact, representatives of that organization are here now. I have not been informed whether they have yet interviewed the cabinet as such but they have certainly been interviewing private hon. members from the various parties. They have left with us a memorandum on deficiency payments and other farm issues. The submission is dated July, 1958, and bears the notation that it is submitted to the members of the House of Commons by representatives of the provincial farm unions. I do not intend to quote all of the brief but I shall cite some extracts from it. It speaks about a resolution supporting the sending of a large delegation to Ottawa and then goes on to say:

> As you will note, the foregoing resolution is based on the assumption that immediate action was not taken on this matter, following the last federal election. It may be, however, that this is not the case, and we certainly commend those members who have been keeping this farm issue before those responsible. Still, we must stress the fact that until farmers see definite action on these matters, words give cold comfort.

Omitting a paragraph, the brief goes on to say:

> Since our submission in May, the final wheat payment for the crop year 1956-57 was announced and proved to be a disappointment to the growers. This price level lends further evidence in support of our reasoning that farmers are carrying an impossible economic load with continued higher costs and progressively lower prices, and there is no evidence of any effort being made to reflect an honest cost-price relationship in the domestic price of wheat.

Omitting the next paragraph and proceeding to the subsequent one, I continue:

> We feel therefore that our request for consideration of our position on the basis of our May submission is more than reasonable, and farmers are extremely disappointed that action has not been announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The brief makes a strong statement in asking for action on the part of the government and a statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. There are many reasons why such action should be taken some of which I have outlined. I think the main and over-all reason is that the cost-price relationship has worsened to the point that prairie producers are unable to make a living in that occupation unless action is taken.

However, there are other reasons why action should be taken to come to their assistance, and I refer to the very serious crop outlook on the prairies. Recent rains have improved that outlook, and those of us who have been raised on the prairies know that even at this late date a substantial supply of rain within the next few weeks can work wonders. Even so, a large part of the crop is beyond redemption and in certain areas farmers are going to have what will amount to a near total crop failure. Because of that, coupled with other reasons, they need assistance at this time.

Certain additional emergency steps that could be taken and should be taken are the provision by the federal government of emergency assistance in the provision of freight assistance for the shipment of feed and fodder into distress areas. Then there is the need to expand the payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, to increase them in keeping with the tremendous increase in the cost of production since those payments were made effective back in 1939.

In my discussions with producers I have found that related to the cost of farming at this time they feel that such payments at a time of crop failure should be at the rate of $10 an acre. They would have no objection, in fact, they would be quite favourable to a substantial increase in their contribution to the prairie farm assistance fund. They do feel that the present maximum of $4 an acre is inadequate; that the other payments of $2 and $3 per acre for various yields of crop are too low; that all of these payments should be increased. As I say, they are prepared to make a larger payment into the fund.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member be in favour of raising the levy?

Mr. Argue: Definitely, yes, provided of course that the benefits under the act were increased.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): To what rate?

Mr. Argue: I am quite prepared to answer the question. I would not mind the rate being tripled. I would support a tripling of the rate—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the farmers agree?

Mr. Argue: Wait until I finish my sentence. I would support a tripling of the rate if the maximum payment were increased to $10 per acre in time of total crop failure, and the other payments increased proportionately, and I would be prepared to defend that proposition on any public platform in western Canada and I think agricultural producers would support it. There has been little or no complaint; there has been some complaint in Manitoba and some in the northeastern parts of Saskatchewan and perhaps some in the northeastern part of Alberta about the general prairie farm assistance scheme, but generally speaking the scheme has met with the approval of western producers. If they could receive a maximum payment of $10 an acre instead of $4 an acre and if in addition the maximum acreage on which it was paid was to be increased in keeping with the general increase in size of farms since 1939, this whole proposition would be even more acceptable. It would seem to me that if an acreage of 400 was accepted as something that was fair and reasonable in 1939, as a maximum, that an acreage today of 600 would be approximately in the same proportion.

Those are the main suggestions I am making as far as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is concerned, together with the oft repeated request so eloquently made by the Prime Minister when he was member for Prince Albert and when he was member for Lake Centre that prairie farm assistance should be paid to farmers on an individual basis. I think he was right in those past years when he made that statement. I hope that if that is not accepted during the present session of the house, a very definite step will be taken in that direction.

I would also say to the government that if the crop should be so disastrous that large numbers of producers across the prairies should have to seek social aid or relief, as the word was known in the 1930's, there should be a sharing of any of those emergency costs between whatever provincial government is involved and the federal treasury, just as the federal government has come to the assistance of provinces and of workers when there has been widespread unemployment. But I do not base my request for deficiency payments in the main on this emergency situation because even if the crop prospects on the prairies today were excellent the same price-cost squeeze would remain, and this above all is the economic problem that the people on the prairies wish solved at this time.

They have believed that the Prime Minister would give them a sympathetic hearing. As a matter of fact, as late as July 10 the Prime Minister said, in answer to a question on this subject, that the whole problem of deficiency payments was receiving full consideration. As to whether an announcement would be made in this session and as to whether appropriate legislation would be introduced, he replied that that, too, is a matter that would receive full consideration. In the light of that statement, in the light of previous statements by the Prime Minister, and in the light of similar statements by the Minister of Trade and Commerce,

I hope that an announcement will be made forthwith in keeping with the requests of farm organizations, an announcement that will satisfy them, that will improve the economic position of the producers and will be in keeping with what the same producers believe has been the promise made to them by this government.

The Prime Minister made a speech in Moose Jaw during the election campaign. At that time the whole question of deficiency payments was raised and at that time he made the statement that this would be given very sympathetic consideration. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources went even farther at Wolseley. He is reported in the Regina Leader-Post of March 21, 1958, as follows:

> He said it was the first step in a comprehensive farm program started by the Progressive Conservatives on June 10. Future steps included a revolutionary farm credit program, crop insurance, tax reductions, deficiency payments on western grains and many other important reforms.

Here is the statement attributed to the minister, that this government would take future steps so important that he called them revolutionary, which would include deficiency payments on western grain. The time for a statement from the government has arrived. The people on the prairies are looking to the government for action. They are most distressed because of the very low final payment announced a few weeks ago. They have been given hope and encouragement by statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the Prime Minister himself. They feel that their request is reasonable. They are not asking for the same price-cost relationship they had immediately after the war; but they are asking that deficiency payments be of such an order as to restore the price of grains to the 1947-55 average.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that members generally support this proposition. All we need now is a statement from the government that such action will be forthcoming during the current session.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for a moment in this debate merely to answer some of the points brought up by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), much to my dislike, I might say. I agree with certain things he said but I disagree with him with respect to others. He referred to western Canada and how some people in the west were sorry that they had sent too many members to parliament belonging to one party. I can say that the farmers I know in the west are in the best position they have been for years because of that very fact. At last they have got together and have realized that the only way they can get what is just, what is fair, what is coming to the west is to send a united body of members belonging to one party to parliament rather than splitting their votes between three or four or five or six small splinter parties.

I say again that the west is in the strongest position politically it has ever been and probably will be in the future. As was pointed out, there are 48 members from the prairie provinces and only one who does not support the government party. In view of the fact that a mass delegation is thinking about coming to Ottawa may I say that we have a mass delegation here already. There are 47 members from the prairie provinces who support the government. That is a mass delegation, and every one of those 47 members has been working for deficiency payments and for what he thinks is right for western Canada.

Let there be no doubt in the minds of the members of that small group to your left, Mr. Speaker, or any other group in the House of Commons that they have been working for it because they have been doing so on numerous occasions. The government certainly has the matter under study and it has been under study a great deal. It is a question that needs a great deal of study.

I am a farmer from the west and I am proud of it but before we implement deficiency payments as the solution for everything we must give the matter a little thought. Over a long term period I think a better system of farm loans could do more for agriculture than a straight, flat gift every year which from a political point of view would have to be increased every year.

The hon. member mentioned the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and said that he thought the acreage should be raised. He stated that his reason for suggesting that the acreage should be raised was that farms are getting larger. I have not had time to look it up in Hansard but I would refer the hon. member to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) last October in which he indicated that there are 230,000 permit holders in western Canada, half of them with less than 200 acres of cultivated acreage. Why would you increase the acreage to 600 acres? It would be of greater benefit to the larger farmers and would not benefit the small permit holders to the same extent. That is something we have got to watch. With an improved farm loan board administered on a better basis we could do a lot more. We could lend money on the basis of the farmer's ability to earn, not on his security. If we are going to improve agriculture and increase the size of farm holdings so that they will become economic units the farmers have to have capital, and under an improved farm loan system we could lend them money on their ability to earn money. If you lend them money on their security you are just allowing the larger farmers to increase their land holdings.

The hon. member made no mention of the government's export of 300 million bushels of wheat. He did not refer to the fact that perhaps in the long run this would benefit western agriculture. In the very pamphlet he held in his hand it is stated that the average yield per year over the past number of years is 319 million bushels. If we can export over 300 million bushels I say that over a period of years that will tend to do away with the wheat surplus of western Canada, and I think that is one of the main steps in improving agricultural conditions in that part of the country.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that by the statement he made in the house a few days ago he was not helping agriculture, particularly the situation with respect to cattle when he implied that great numbers of cattle would come on the market and prices would fall terrifically. That is a poor attitude for a member of the house to take. I would say it would be better to try to encourage market prices to stay up and not educate the packers to pay less for our cattle, which in a sense is what he was trying to do.

Mr. Argue: Misrepresentation.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am not misrepresenting.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is an expert at that.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to say a bit more about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The hon. member implied that we should increase the levy. I can perhaps go along with him to the extent that if the levy is increased the payments should definitely be increased. But as a farmer in western Canada who has collected P.F.A.A. payments in a good many years I certainly do not want the levy increased unless the payments are increased. I should like to point out that right now the one per cent levy accounts for about half of what is paid out. I certainly would not go along with an increase in the levy unless there is an increase in the payments.

I do not want to take too much of the time of the house. To some extent I agree with the hon. member in respect of deficiency payments but he is wrong when he says that nothing is being done about them. Of course I could say that some of the Conservative backbenchers have not been talking too often because we have a leader and cabinet ministers in whom we have faith. We are not like the C.C.F. group. When their leader spoke on a subject a couple of days ago six more members of that group had to get up and say the same thing because they had no respect for their leader's judgment.

Over the past two and a half months that I have been here I have noticed that the new members have a tendency to get to know one another perhaps quicker than they get to know some of the older members, and I can say that I have been surprised at the ability of all the new members I have met. In my opinion it certainly would not take them four years to learn where to hang their hats and coats in the House of Commons. It might take them four minutes. It may have taken some hon. members four years in the past to find out where to hang their hats and coats but not the members of this party.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in effect the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has challenged the 47 new members of the Conservative party from the prairie provinces to say something about wheat. You have heard one reply, Mr. Speaker, from my neighbour and fellow member, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner). May I say that those of us who come from the prairies and represent agricultural districts are just as keenly cognizant of the wheat problem as is the hon. member for Assiniboia.

It is a strange fact that with representation from the west comprising some 48 members one member should take it upon himself to be the spokesman for the farmers of the three prairie provinces. It is a strange fact that his party should take it upon itself to speak for labour, to speak for the civil service, to speak for the servants of this house and to speak for all other groups in Canada.

An hon. Member: And small business too.

Mr. Brunsden: In so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, as a very humble backbencher in a party of which I am very proud, I resent very much the inference that the hon. member for Assiniboia or the other members of his small group can take it upon himself or themselves to be the sole spokesman for a tremendous group of agricultural producers stretching from Manitoba to British Columbia.

He has referred to the wheat problem. The wheat problem did not arise yesterday; it did not arise on March 31, 1958 or in June of 1957. Yesterday we had an opportunity, as did the hon. member for Assiniboia, of discussing wheat and other problems with the members of the farm uinon of western Canada. I would say, with respect to the brief to which the hon. friend has referred that I was astounded, dismayed and somewhat disgusted with the tone of that particular brief which implied although it did not state, that this government elected on March 31 had had no consideration for, and done nothing about, the wheat problem and other allied agricultural problems in western Canada. We have been here about two months. These 47 members—it should have been 48 incidentally —have been here two months, and had my hon. friends in the far corner of the house exercised that discretion and judgment which we may have expected from them we would have been able to tackle the wheat problem at least one month ago.

If we, as western representatives, if we as the spokesmen of western agriculture if you like, are to sit day after day, week after week, listening, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said yesterday, to repetitious speeches, if we are to listen to debates on matters of order and procedure, if we are to listen to amendments to motions and if we are to be delayed far into each night with the views of a small group of men who do not represent prairie agriculture, then we shall never come to grips with the problems of the western wheat producer. May I say in all humility, sir, it has been one of my studies over many years, and it is based on a world situation. Until the rise of Hitler in Germany and the rise of economic nationalism in Europe there was no wheat problem in western Canada.

It is quite true that we had problems of drought; we had problems in some years of slight over-production; we had problems of congested markets; but generally speaking, as compared to the last few years, we had no problem regarding the mounting surpluses that we have seen in recent years. This problem can never be solved by discussion in the House of Commons. It will never be solved by pitting political strength, however puny it may be, against the voice and thought of the government of this country. It will only be solved by serious and deliberate study of ways and means of alleviating a very difficult situation. The hon. member for Assiniboia referred to a probable mass movement on the city of Ottawa, the seat of this government, by the individual wheat producers of western Canada. We had such a movement as that in the 30's. By chance I happened to be in Ottawa as the servant of a farm organization in those years. The cry at that time was a dollar a bushel for No. 1 Northern.

That crusade was spectacular. I can still see the former prime minister, once removed, on a platform in a hall in this town receiving that delegation along with his minister of agriculture. I can remember farmer after farmer rising to plead the case of the western wheat grower. I can remember a priest making a very colourful appeal to the government to raise the price to one dollar per bushel. This appeal was successful. But I do say that in this year 1958 the situation is completely changed. We talk about the average cost of the production of wheat. I challenge my friends in the far corner of this house to produce such an average figure of the cost of production. Frankly, as a student of agriculture over many years, I know not what that average figure may be.

I do know that production methods today are much more efficient than they were ten years ago. I know, too, of course that taxes are higher; that labour costs are higher; that the cost of farm machinery is higher. However, I believe that the efficient grower of wheat is still assured, under this government's policy, having particularly in mind the payments—I refuse to use the term deficiency payments, because they sound like an orphan industry—that may be forthcoming from this government, coupled with market prices, of a fair margin of profit.

One would have to be a prophet to predict the future of western Canada in the next few years. It is quite apparent that we are moving into a period when wheat production as we have known it in the last 20 or 25 years may be a thing of the past. We have the possibility of the entry of the U.S.S.R. into the wheat market. We have bountiful production in the Argentine. We have a reasonable degree of self-sufficiency in Europe, and the promise of a further degree of self-sufficiency. It may be that our western wheat economy, as we have known it in the past, will have to undergo some drastic change.

I am not at all interested or helped by the veiled threat which I heard yesterday from a certain gentleman of the west, and which I heard again tonight from the hon. member for Assiniboia, that unless we put wheat production in western Canada on a profitable basis, unless we keep our acreages in western Canada in wheat, then we in the west will wreck the entire agricultural economy. I remember an old rancher friend of mine in the west who ran cattle on a large scale back in the 30's. We were talking about the over-production of cattle. We always talk about the over-production of agricultural products, regardless of what those products may be. I remember sitting with him in this city when we were meeting the government of that day. He sat in the office of the minister of agriculture, and the minister said to him, "What do you think of the over-production of cattle?" My friend Mr. Rube Gilchrist—I am very proud to know him—said, "Mr. Minister, old mother nature has a manner of straightening out these problems." I would say to the gentlemen in the far corner, and their spokesman, that with respect to the over-production of any product they have in mind, and I presume they are thinking mainly of pigs, old mother nature has a habit of straightening out the problem.

I am convinced in my own mind that there is no threat to the eastern hog producer from the western grain producer because of the fact that, by virtue of the particularly unhappy position with respect to wheat, he may turn to hogs. The western grain grower is not essentially a hog man. You either love hogs or you don't. If you do not love them, you do not raise them successfully. I would say that the alarm expressed by my hon. friend was probably more political than factual.

May I conclude as a member representing a western constituency and as a westerner myself, that I have no particular fear with respect to the policy to be adopted by the government regarding wheat payments. May I add that with respect to the disaster which has struck western Canada in recent months, the outcome of which we do not yet know, I have no particular fear respecting the provisions of the P.F.A.A. which may be applied. I do feel, however—and this is the only point upon which I am in agreement with the hon. member for Assiniboia—that the 47 Conservative members on this and the other side of the house representing the agrarian constituencies of western Canada, are quite able and we are most anxious, to advise this government with respect to the problems of that particular section of the country.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Churchill: Same topic?

An hon. Member: He is a wheat farmer?

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the hon. member that he introduced the motion we are now debating and that if he speaks now he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: He did not introduce the motion.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, as I understand it there is only one way in which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) could speak at this time, and that is by unanimous consent of the house because he has exhausted his right to speak on the main motion. If he makes that request to the house the house can decide whether it wishes to give consent but, with great respect, I do not think he should now claim the right to speak.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is well taken. The hon. member was not introducing a substantive motion and therefore he cannot even close the debate by speaking. He has exhausted his right on this particular subject.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, is it not the case that the amendment to the main motion has been disposed of and that therefore my right had been restored to speak on the main motion once it came before the house?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Very ingenious but not very sound.

Mr. Pearson: I only regret, Mr. Speaker, that the rule prevents me from making my first agricultural speech in the house at this time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Another farmer.

An hon. Member: A horse trader.

An hon. Member: "I love hogs Martin".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all regret that the rules of the house are such as to preclude the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) from speaking at this time on this grievance.

The Leader of the Opposition will, I am sure, take advantage of the earliest opportunity to deal not only with this very subject but with agricultural problems on a much wider scale than the particular and narrow concept suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

An hon. Member: You will be quoted on that, Paul.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member is supposed to speak for himself, is he not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When I say the narrow concept, the hon. member, of course, would be wrong in concluding that I do not at once regard this particular phase of the matter as of the greatest importance. I could not help but feel, as I listened to the last speaker, for whom I have the highest regard, and the preceding member who sits further to my left—

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Acadia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —suggest that it was wrong for those of us sitting on this side of the house, including the hon. member for Assiniboia, to use this forum for raising matters which we regard as important to a particular and important section of our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite with their vast numbers should have learned by this time that although they do have a preponderant numerical position in this house, every hon. member has the right notwithstanding the convenience or the inconvenience to some hon. members sitting on the treasury benches to raise matters which they regard as urgent and important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman who just spoke did say that he did not think the House of Commons was a place where this problem could be resolved.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In one sense the hon. gentleman is right.

An hon. Member: He didn't say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But only in one sense because the decision rests not with any hon. member of this house but with those hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches. The decision for giving relief to the farmers of western Canada rests at this time—let there be no mistake about it, as the hon. gentlemen said—upon those who today have the responsibility for formulating the agricultural policy of the government of Canada. But it is open to all of us, wherever we sit, to take advantage of the procedures of the house and to bring home to the government what we believe to be situations of an urgent character, what we believe are the demands or the requests or the submissions put forward by various groups. It is all very well to chastise the numerical inferiority of the opposition—

An hon. Member: It is not only numerical.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but let there be no mistake about it that those of us who sit under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition will take advantage of every opportunity to bring home to the government what we regard as the legitimate complaints of various sections of the country.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And when hon. members interrupt me as they now do let it not be forgotten that they have as their leader a man who was the first to criticize interruptions of this kind as being one form of closure which was not in keeping with our parliamentary traditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), as you will recall, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Let's hear about wheat.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —when you had a different status in this house—

An hon. Member: We want hogs.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —referred to this kind of interruption as contempt of parliament. Some hon. member says "Oh", but he was not in this house at that time. However, if my hon. friend will read Hansard and if he will follow the newspaper accounts for the past decades he will find that the kind of observation I am now making was made by his leader with regard to some hon. gentlemen who did not like what he was saying, and one member had to be retrieved from this obstruction by the then minister of agriculture, who had done so much for the farmers of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members opposite do not like the hon. member for Assiniboia or other members on this side of the house asking the government for a statement of policy at this time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): In view of the fact that during the years 1940 to 1950 the Canadian farmers subsidized the rest of Canada in the sale of their wheat, would he say whether he would call the supplement payment or deficiency payment a form of relief?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend will not think that I disregard the importance of his question if I do not deal with it at this particular moment. How often have we heard in this house hon. gentlemen including the present Prime Minister, including the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), including other hon. gentlemen on that side of the house when they sat in opposition, talking about the plight of the farmer in western and other sections of Canada, and asking the government to proclaim policy.

Shortly after the farm unions had come to Ottawa to meet the cabinet, the present Prime Minister, rising the next day, was demanding that the government should state its policy with respect to the requests placed before the government by the farm organizations at that time. The farmers' union came to Ottawa in the month of May. They acknowledged the difficult problems confronting the government, but they reminded the government that during the elections of 1957 and 1958 they had given the farmers of Canada reason to believe that given the opportunity of forming a government they would resolve many agricultural problems.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) was among those who gave such assurances in his own city of Winnipeg and throughout western Canada during the last election. On March 15 last the Prime Minister is reported as having promised that some consideration would be given to making deficiency payments on wheat, oats and barley to growers so that their returns might bear a fair relationship to production costs. That was the statement made by the right hon. gentleman who heads the government which is now being asked to explain this policy in answer to submissions made to the farmers' union in the month of May last. Is it unreasonable now, on this the 15th day of July, for members of parliament on this side to ask the government of the day what its policy is with regard to the various demands made by the farmers' union? Is it unreasonable to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what the attitude of this government is with regard to the question of deficiency payments? Is it unreasonable to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who regards this apparently as a laughing matter—

Mr. Churchill: I am laughing at the notes you are passing back and forth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are going to be laughing in a few moments—

Mr. Churchill: You have not got your own speech, that's all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the attitude of this government, having promised the people of Canada that if elected they would call parliament in September and resolve these problems? And now two months after those requests were made by the farmers' union the Minister of Trade and Commerce sits in his place and is not able to answer any questions from this side of the house as to the request made by the farmers—

Mr. Churchill: I am listening to you, give me a chance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen opposite promised the farmers of this country price support at fixed and declared figures. They introduced an act last session which was supposed to be a charter as a result of which farmers would be extricated from their economic difficulties, and that was based on farm legislation which had been introduced by the previous government. We were told there would be firm prices for this and for that. To take an example, the Minister of Agriculture announced there would be a floor price of $2.10 for soybeans. Let us see whether or not we have a floor price of $2.10 for soybeans. When the Minister of Agriculture announced that policy, every farmer in this country, certainly in those areas particularly concerned, believed there would be a floor price of $2.10 for that particular commodity. But there is no such floor price of $2.10—

Mr. Speaker: As I understood the grievance which is under consideration at this moment, and to speak on which I gave the hon. gentleman the floor when there were others who wished to speak, and as enunciated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) related to deficiency payments—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was just seeking to illustrate how the policy of support prices in the form of deficiency payments in respect to one particular subject has operated under the present administration. The hon. member for Assiniboia has said we are asking for a declaration of policy by the government with regard to deficiency payments, that is, with respect to a policy which has not yet been announced. I am now dealing with the technique, with the administrative machinery of the operations of this government with regard to deficiency payments already announced with regard to other commodities, and I submit with much confidence that surely it is within the relevancy of debate that I should be able to indicate what this government is doing with regard to floor prices—

Mr. Speaker: I am, perhaps, even less familiar with agriculture than the hon. member who has the floor but, with respect, I would suggest that he has gone off on to support prices which seems to me something different from deficiency payments.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All I can say is that though I have a high regard for you I can well understand that your own acknowledged limitations on this subject have not afforded your Honour the opportunity of following the refinements of my argument.

However, if you take the position that I am not able to discuss floor prices generally, I will have to bow to your ruling except to say that there will be an opportunity for dealing, not only with the policy of this government in relation to deficiency payments to western producers but also with regard to such things as soybeans, Ontario wheat, and many other matters which are of great concern to the farmers of this country.

Now the farm union has representatives in this city at the present time. I understand that they have seen the administration, that they have called on various members of parliament, that they have put forward their points of view, and that the nature of their grievance, as stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia, is that in the light of the assurances given by this government in the elections of 1957 and 1958, and in the light of the assurances given by the administration when this group called on them in the month of May, that we and they are now entitled to ask of the government, so many weeks after they first met with the administration, what is the policy of the government with regard to deficiency payments as asked for by the group that called on the administration only a few days ago and in the month of May?

Mr. Pallett: Isn't there a rule against repetition?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Assiniboia asked us what was our attitude with regard to this problem. Our attitude has been declared; it is on the record and is represented by years of fruitful Liberal administration on behalf of Canadian agriculture. And while it may be in the hands of hon. gentlemen to criticize the agricultural policy of the previous administration, the fact is that the record of achievement of the former government toward all sections of agriculture is such as to compare favourably with the policies of this administration and, from all indications, with all future policies of the present treasury benches.

We believe on this side, as a statement of principle, that we should maintain and extend the system of support prices and deficiency payments where appropriate, administered in such a way as to obtain for farmers for their products prices bearing a fair relationship to their costs of production and designed to ensure to farmers a fair share of the national income and encourage the production of marketable farm products.

An hon. Member: Where did you copy that from?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is copied from the national Liberal convention which, earlier than you think, will give us the next prime minister of Canada.

Mr. Pallett: Did the hon. member mention the year 2000?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the convention policies that led to the election of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)? Where is the implementation of that policy and that program?

Mr. Pearson: Where is the program?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where is the program, my leader asks.

Mr. Fraser: We will show you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I ask my hon. friends to compare the inaction of this government now with the kind of demands made by hon. gentlemen opposite when they sat on this side of the house. I do not refer only to deficiency payments. What about the other points put forward by the farmers' union in the month of May and referred to again the other day? They called upon the government to establish an adequate farm credit system under the Department of Agriculture to handle all the types of farm credit that are needed. They asked for the accumulating, as quickly as possible, of adequate data on the cost of production of farm products in order that the price stabilization board may have authentic statistics available as a basis for implementing the provisions of the price support legislation.

How often have we heard the present Prime Minister speak of trying to bring about some government policy that would result in a yield to the farmers in proportion at least to the cost of production, and how often did he urge the government of the day to establish some system through the research bureau in the Department of Agriculture or in the Department of Trade and Commerce, in collaboration with the universities, by which a better appreciation of the factors of the cost of production of agricultural commodities might be better ascertained?

The hon. member who just spoke a few moments ago, if I understood him correctly, said he was at a loss to understand fully how one could arrive at what the cost of production would be with regard to the growing of wheat. If that is the case—and the hon. gentleman I take it is an experienced farmer—I ask him, then, will he not join with us in asking the government to implement this particular request of the farmers' union so that we can have some appreciation of the authentic statistics available as a basis for implementing the provisions of the price support legislation?

If the government finds that one of the reasons why it cannot announce this deficiency payment policy is because it has not at its disposal the necessary facts to ascertain what is the cost of production, then I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce why he and his colleagues did not take that position when they sat on this side of the house asking the government of the day for measures that would relieve the economic pressure which confronted not only western farmers but farmers all over Canada.

And so I say to the hon. member for Assiniboia that only because of the rules of this house was it not possible for the Leader of the Opposition speaking on our behalf to rise at once and to say that we, too, have strong views about these matters. In fact, we have a stronger claim than the hon. gentleman because, while he has spent many active, interesting and imaginative years sitting on this side protesting, we have sat many years on that side of the house achieving.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, Rosthern constituency is a well-known agricultural area. It is probably best known as the home of world championship wheat—

An hon. Member: And Walter Tucker.

Mr. Nasserden: —the kind which first focused world attention on the superior quality of western grown wheat and cereals in the markets of the world that demand the best high protein wheat and flour. Besides that many championships in the pure bred classes for bacon hogs have come to our breeders and in other pure bred classes of livestock. I just want to say at this time in regard to dairying which is an important part of our economy in Rosthern constituency that the people there engaged in that industry are appreciative of what has been done by the present government and our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) in this regard.

In recent years the grain producers in western Canada have known declining prices and rising costs and in their efforts to escape that situation they have turned to almost every avenue of revenue that could imaginably be turned to by people engaged in the agricultural industry. For instance, many of them have turned to the production of turkeys. After the experience of last year when the turkey industry was threatened by the dumping of United States turkeys on the Canadian market, I have yet to meet a turkey producer who was anything but "Diefenbaker, all the way".

As a result of the cost-price squeeze, many of our farmers have turned to the production of rapeseed and this acreage has increased until today many people believe that we may soon face a surplus in regard to that commodity. Many farmers have also turned to the production of flaxseed as a source of a cash crop. Generally speaking the producers of both those crops are well satisfied with the situation in that part of the industry. The notable exception to this is the question of freight rates on rapeseed which are so high that they constitute a very limiting factor in returning to the producer a full share of the selling price for that commodity. I have discussed this matter with several members of the cabinet and I am sure that when a decision is reached it will benefit the producers of that particular commodity.

The situation in regard to durum wheat is anything but rosy. There are many bushels which have been stored on farms for several months now. Some of the storage dates back to the time when the Liberal government was in power and when this grain is ultimately sold it will be sold at only a fraction of the cost that prevailed at the date the grain was grown by the farmers in those areas.

As hon. members know the price of rye is based on the open market and therefore subject to the wide fluctuations that used to prevail in the marketing of wheat, oats and barley before the advent of the Canadian wheat board as the sole marketing agency of western grown grains. There is a well founded feeling in many parts of western Canada and particularly among those who produce rye that as long as the government is not prepared to handle rye on the same basis as wheat, oats and barley, then the restriction in the marketing of this commodity should be relaxed so that a farmer might take advantage of the price when it suited him under that kind of situation. Once again I recommend this particular matter for the consideration of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and other members of the cabinet.

Something has been said here tonight and on other occasions about Bill No. 237 and what it does and does not do for the farm people of Canada. All I want to say about it is very little but I want to say this—

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that it would not be in order to go on discussing Bill No. 237. This is a grievance period, when only one grievance is supposed to be discussed. I take it we are discussing the question of deficiency payments and the government's policy on that matter.

Mr. Nasserden: I would like to thank the Speaker for the guidance he sought to give me. I would also like to point out it has a bearing on the situation of deficiency payments on grain in western Canada, but on the whole I shall try to tie myself very closely to the subject under discussion.

Each year farmers in western Canada have seen a widening of the gap between the income that they have received and the income received by other groups in this country and I predict that within the period of the next three years, unless something is done to indicate to western growers that the Canadian people want them as the producers of cereal grains, we shall see in western Canada a turn to the production of dairy products, poultry and hog and beef products, such as this country has never seen before. As proof of that I would say that we receive a lot of literature in the House of Commons. I hold in my hand a letter on Canadian livestock products from the meat packers council of Canada and I quote from it:

> In Canada the increase in marketings in the first 20 weeks of this year over last was a little over seven per cent,—

This is in regard to hog production.

> —with a 19 per cent gain in western Canada offsetting a 1½ per cent decrease in the east.

I know from personal experience that many of the farmers in western Canada are putting capital expenditures into the erection of buildings suitable for the production of hogs. If that takes place it will mean that they are going to be in the business for a long time. It will mean that they are going to try to take advantage of the guarantees given in Bill No. 237.

As hon. members know, the prices of wheat, oats and barley have been on the decline over the past several years. These grains have been under a rigid quota system which has brought about some semblance of equality of delivery to those engaged in that production, but it has also put a problem upon our elevator companies which receive and store grain before they are called upon for delivery by the Canadian wheat board. Each year we have seen our grain handling companies devote large sums of money to a building program to enable them to receive and hold that grain, and each year we have seen the problem of storage on the farms increase and increase. On an average size farm in western Canada of about 400 acres under cultivation the general practice of good farmers is to seed half to crop and to summerfallow the other half. That means that with 200 acres in crop, if you take an average yield of 18 bushels per acre, which is just about the average for the last 10 years, you have something like 3,600 bushels of grain on a farm of that size. Out of that you have to take dockage, make allowance for shrinkage and loss in storage and then provide seed for the next year's crop. I think that that requires roughly another 400 bushels. That would leave a farmer with 3,200 bushels of grain to sell.

All hon. members have heard of the ravages of rust and what it can do to reduce the grade of the crop. All hon. members know what frost can do when it affects any crop, whether it is grain in western Canada or in eastern Canada, and all hon. members know that under unfavourable harvesting conditions, whether the crop is wheat, soybeans, tobacco or any other crop, there is a deterioration in quality and a loss in price. Usually in a year of poor harvesting conditions, grain in western Canada has gone into storage to deteriorate both before and after delivery to the elevators.

For instance, last fall rain resulted in mildew of much of the oats crop and as a result farmers were taking from 34 cents to 39 cents less per bushel for much of that crop. Under a system such as that I think it is fair to assume that a farmer gets little more than $1 per bushel for wheat year after year in actual take-home pay and under our quota systems with 400 acres and a quota of five or six bushels, the maximum that he can deliver is roughly 2,400 bushels. There is an initial quota of 300 bushels, making a total of 2,700 bushels, or $2,700. In addition to that, on a basis of the final payments this year, he can get perhaps another $200 and that would make a total of $2,900 before expenses and before the cost of living are taken into consideration. It is true that he still has 500 bushels in storage, but he has to provide storage facilities for that grain, just as he has to provide storage facilities for the other 2,700 bushels of grain that he has to carry from August 1 of one crop year until the end of the next crop year. In addition to this he must provide for paying taxes which are at an all-time high in this country. He must pay for insurance costs on buildings and on grain in storage, hail insurance, repairs to machinery, fuel and oil bills, chemicals and, in some cases, fertilizer as well as labour and all the other expenses that go into making a farm produce.

In the industrial areas of our country labour works for wages at so much an hour. From time to time we hear of limitations being set on the production levels of man hour work. Farm people have no choice but to pay those rates on everything that they buy that goes into the production plant on their farms. Farm people are entitled to returns—and I think every member from western Canada believes this—that will enable them to provide themselves and their families with returns over and above their ordinary operating expenses equal to that received by labour.

Since coming to this house and since coming to eastern Canada I have heard some people venture the opinion that 400 acres do not fully occupy a farmer during the year, and therefore he should not be expected to make a living on a 400 acre cultivated farm. I know from personal experience that it will require the full-time labour of a farmer from March to December to produce and to look after production on a 400 acre farm.

The only other thing that I would like to say is that there are some areas of western Canada, part of my constituency, part of the constituency represented by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp), part of the constituency of Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) and part of the constituency represented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) where the cost of labour is even greater because it requires more than one man to take care of 400 acres of a grain farm.

It is a generally accepted fact in western Canada, and I think almost any banker will confirm it, that many of the farmers have been living on their machinery depreciation during the last several years and if they were to go out today they would not be able to buy new equipment because they have spent the money in those years on family living costs. That is one of the reasons why industrial plants in eastern Canada have been shut. That is one of the reasons why men and women are idle in Canada today. For 12 years the best customers of the people in industrial Canada have been starved for income and as a result we are faced today with an unemployment situation such as the country has not seen for many years. During those 12 years the Liberal party, in power with majorities that compelled responsibility, failed time and time again to take appropriate action. Year by year marginal surpluses built up until they became unmanageable and the country found itself in real trouble.

An hon. Member: What are you doing about it?

Mr. Nasserden: You just cannot go out and sell a 12 year surplus at the drop of a hat. We on the government side who represent those who produce grain in western Canada know that the farmers are not asking for a handout. We have not seriously questioned the subsidies given other segments of the economy. We have not risen in our places to challenge the tariff policy which has been built up over a long period of years by other governments and parties until today it has become an integral part of the economy of the country. We are prepared to accept the voices of the representatives of other constituencies as the voices of the people of those constituencies. All we ask in return is that those who have come to the House of Commons from other parts of Canada give equal recognition to the rights and needs of the people who inhabit the three prairie provinces which have become known as the grain bin of an empire.

I have devoted more time to this particular matter than was my wish but since coming here I have been astounded by the fears rampant in Ontario townships and some parts of Quebec and the maritimes as to what may happen if western Canadian farmers turn in earnest to the production of those commodities that the farmers of the east have felt for so many years they had the sole right to produce. My only comment in that regard is the same as the one I made a few minutes ago with respect to hogs, that there is a trend today that far surpasses anything anyone in the house imagines if the remarks I have heard during the time I have been here are indicative of what is taking place in western Canada.

There is a great deal that can be said for deficiency payments, and I think everyone in this house, regardless of party, recognizes that the farmers of western Canada have laboured under a handicap not only for the last year or 18 months but for the last several years. I do not need to remind hon. members of what took place during the war years and what it cost western Canadian producers of cereal grains to be a patriotic part of the Canadian war effort. I believe, as the leader and members of our party believe, that the solution of this problem is the adoption of a national agricultural policy, a policy that will enable farmers in all parts of the country to realize that they do not have to come cap in hand to the government year by year asking for another morsel, whether you call that morsel deficiency payments or something else.

The other day in the house the leader of the C.C.F. intimated that if deficiency payments were not paid the Conservative party would forfeit much of the good will it has in western Canada. I say to him and to others of like mind that the making of deficiency payments alone is not the total answer to the plight of the western grain grower. We want a national policy that will continue from year to year so that the farmers of western Canada will be able to take pride in the fact that they are playing an equal part in the economic development of this great nation.

I can understand the anxiety that is felt in many parts of western Canada when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) goes back west and says that the Conservative government will do nothing for the farmers. All I want to say is that those who do that, and it has been done for many years now, are more responsible than anyone else for the measure of hostility that I seem to sense even on the streets of Ottawa when the word "wheat" is mentioned. In the ordinary course of events it will take years for the Conservative members who have been sent to the House of Commons to overcome that measure of inconsistency that has prevailed in the presentation of the demands that have been made so blatantly so many times by those who have come to the House of Commons with the slogan, "fight for the west".

I believe in a national policy for agriculture. I believe in the ability of the western Canadian members of the house to renew that confidence that should be part and parcel of the understanding between farm people in all parts of the country. Toward that happy end I am ready to work with those members and with the government to the end that the people of western Canada may say, as the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is reported to have said at Winnipeg on June 25 of this year, "Never before have Canadian farm organizations played so influential a part in shaping national farm policy as in the last two years."

Something has been said about the election and about the promises during the campaign with regard to deficiency payments and agriculture generally.

Mr. Pickersgill: We seem to have forgotten about the grievance.

Mr. Nasserden: I rather wish that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) were here so that I might do this in his presence, but I am very happy to take this occasion to thank him for coming to my constituency during the campaign and outlining the Liberal agricultural policy. He was not able to speak tonight. Maybe I can tell the house something of what he advocated at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I have allowed the hon. member a good deal of latitude and I do not think he ought to go back to the last election and general agricultural policy.

Mr. Nasserden: I am very glad to stay away from it then. You would probably see that I did anyway, but all I want to say now is that when an announcement is made I imagine it will be made by those who should make it, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture. When it is made I believe that hon. members to my right will find there will be something which will give the farm people of western Canada, not only another morsel but something upon which they can build their hopes for the future. It will amount to more than what one might call a deficiency payment. After all the problem is four-fold, as I see it. It takes into consideration this thing called credit that has been mentioned here tonight. It takes into consideration this thing called markets, the finding of markets and it takes in prices. Then it takes in above all else the shaping of the industry to the other parts of the economy of Canada.

I just want to say that during the period to which my hon. friends to the right referred western farm costs rose by 50 per cent while the price of wheat has fallen by almost 21 per cent. Something was said about the pledge of our leader with regard to deficiency payments. This is what he said at Moose Jaw:

> The question of deficiency payments on western Canadian wheat, oats and barley would get a sympathetic hearing from a Conservative government and it was one that needed full and careful consideration.

I submit to this house and to the people of western Canada that when he said "full consideration" that meant a program that would carry forward into the future. I believe, therefore, that the cabinet and the members of this house have been justified in giving this matter consideration until a decision is reached.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that remain, I should like to say a few words about the topic raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) namely deficiency payments. This topic was not reached by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), although his speech was full of deficiencies, and his arguments had no bearing whatever on the topic under discussion. The subject is a troublesome one because it deals with one of the main problems facing Canada, the level of income of western agriculture. We do not consider that any more important than the income of agriculture elsewhere in Canada, but it has been indicated over the years, from a study of wheat production and other grains and the prices procured in world markets, that one of the great difficulties facing western agriculture has been the variability in income year after year depending on yield, price and other factors. Hence we have the suggestion now of deficiency payments to make up for the loss of income which western farmers have suffered over the years.

It is related to what the western farmer has called the cost-price squeeze. We have had representations from the interprovincial farm union people and from representatives of the various wheat pools. This subject is not raised for the first time on this occasion, and it has been given very careful consideration. The hon. member for Essex East quoted the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to the effect that the government would give sympathetic consideration to this problem. That is precisely what has been done. It has been sympathetic consideration. We have heard the delegations who have come here from time to time dealing with this problem. We have listened to their arguments. We have studied those arguments. We have prepared quite a bit of material from time to time in attempting to analyse this particular problem to ascertain if there was a satisfactory solution.

I can understand the impatience of people in western Canada anxious to get a reply to this particular question. There is a general impatience when problems like this are raised, and that impatience has been whipped up a bit by people like the hon. member for Assiniboia. But you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that tonight the authentic voice of western Canada was heard in the able speeches delivered by members like the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner), the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Nasserden). These hon. members from western Canada do not get the opportunity from day to day that is afforded to the hon. member for Assiniboia who, by virtue of the fact he represents a group in this house, gains the floor on almost every occasion and can pose questions to the government every day. This is a special privilege which is accorded to him by virtue of his position in this house, and by his chance survival last March 31.

But these other members, the three of them who have spoken tonight, are people with as much experience as the hon. member for Assiniboia, with as much knowledge of the problems of western agriculture, with as much sympathy for those problems as the hon. member indicates in this house. They have given very reasoned statements with regard to the problem and have not attempted to whip up any emotional response.

We have been considering sympathetically this particular problem. Last January when representatives of farmers' organizations were here in Ottawa I recall saying to them on the subject of deficiency payments, why do you come to the government and ask for this without yourselves doing some of the hard work? Why do you not give us some figure with which to work? What are you talking about? I recall saying to them, are you talking about $50 million or $150 million? Have you any plan of your own? Subsequently, they got to work and produced some figures. We, in our turn, have examined those, and generally there has been a useful consideration of this problem.

But I noticed with regard to those who are advocating deficiency payments that they have not given attention to some of the factors that should have been considered. In the first instance, the idea of deficiency payments originated not on this continent but in the United Kingdom and in Europe. In eight or nine countries situated across the Atlantic deficiency payments have been given to the growers of wheat for a number of years. The deficiency payments have been used as an incentive to production because those countries, with the exception of France on occasion—I am speaking now of the United Kingdom, Belgium, the Netherlands, West Germany and so on—did not produce a sufficient amount of wheat for their own use each year. Consequently they have endeavoured to stimulate that production by deficiency payments. It is an entirely different thing when you talk about deficiency payments in a country like Canada, which is one of the great exporters of wheat, the country that supplies those areas in Europe with a great part of the wheat that they need. It seems to me it is quite wrong to lift from a country in Europe which does not produce sufficient for its needs a plan such as deficiency payments and transport it over here to a country where that incentive to production is not required.

That is one point which was not considered by those who made presentations to us last year, and my hon. friend from Assiniboia in his argument tonight said nothing about certain other factors which should be considered. If you are going to discuss deficiency payments on the production of wheat you have to take into account increasing yields which have occurred over the years; you have to take into account more efficient production techniques, the decreasing number of farms and the effect of the size of farms upon the profitability of operation.

When you look at the farm picture in western Canada closely you find, as I believe my hon. friend from Medicine Hat pointed out tonight, that some farms are able to produce wheat at a profit but you also discover that perhaps some 50 per cent of the smaller farms, some of which are on unproductive land, are not able to do so. Hence, you get a demand for deficiency payments to take up the slack. It is a problem which is large in extent but whether or not deficiency payments are going to be made I am not in a position to state tonight.

I would however point out to those who have spoken on this subject that we are giving very active consideration to it. I hope there will be an answer before many more days have gone by and that answer will not be in response to any pressure exerted upon us in recent days or any threat, such as my hon. friend from Assiniboia has made on several occasions of some march on Ottawa by the people of western Canada.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I know the minister wants to be fair and I think he will accept my word when I tell him I have not insinuated any threat. I have merely outlined what I believe to be the facts as far as the wheat pool organizations are concerned. If my facts are incorrect I shall apologize for having given the house wrong information. I believe they are correct and I was referring only to decisions and policies of the wheat pool organizations.

Mr. Churchill: If I have misunderstood my hon. friend I am sorry, and I hope there is nothing like that behind any of his suggestions because I do not think that would be a responsible way to approach this particular problem. As I say, we hope to have an answer one way or the other but whether that answer will be deficiency payments depends upon a careful study of this question and I have pointed out some of the factors which must be considered.

As my hon. friend from Acadia pointed out, the most important thing of all in these days of large production is to dispose of all your stocks, get them moving to market and this, of course, is what has complicated the situation in recent years. Surplus stocks of wheat on the western prairies during the last several years, the inability of the farmers to market the grain stored on their farms, has meant that the income has not gone to the farmer in the year of his production, and then, the general over-all surplus on the North American continent in both Canada and the United States of America has of course had a depressing effect on world markets. These are things over which there is no ready control but, on the other hand, certain steps can be taken and before you reach the stage where you pay a deficiency payment I think some of these other matters should be pressed home until you are very clear that you have done everything possible to ease the situation.

This government's program is aimed in that very direction. The very fact that over the years an initial payment has been made on wheat has stabilized the situation in western Canada to some extent. A few years ago plans were made for the payment of storage charges on that amount in excess of 178 million bushels which over the last three years has resulted in the payment by the treasury of approximately $95 million as assistance or in discharge of the obligation on the part of the people of Canada to bear some of the burden of storing this surplus wheat. Such a burden should not be borne entirely by the farmers.

Then, last fall we introduced the cash advance legislation which was a stopgap measure designed to put ready cash into the farmers' pockets. The sum of $35 million was paid out, of which 90 per cent is already paid back. The Export Credits Insurance Act has been used to foster the sale of wheat on terms to certain countries which could not pay cash for it, and great efforts have been made to move wheat from Canada to overseas markets. The success of the exports of this crop year will mean that we will exceed the 300 million bushel quota which we set last summer and that will constitute a record in recent years for the sale of our wheat.

We have undertaken to provide through the Colombo plan long-term loans for wheat and gifts as a result of which about 40 million bushels of wheat have been moved already which otherwise would not have got into the world markets.

I see that my time has run out but I have outlined some of the policies which have been pursued by the government in a serious attempt to assist western agriculture and we are quite prepared to provide a comprehensive agricultural program, introducing measures other than the one proposed by my hon. friend tonight, which in the long run will have beneficial effects on western agriculture and as a result of which the western farmers and all of Canada will benefit.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

58. Departmental administration, $706,492.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

231. Departmental administration, $1,441,494.

PRIVY COUNCIL

308. To provide hereby, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act or the provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to each member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada who is a minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $15,000.

Proceedings reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the house leader would tell us what the business will be for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 8 on today's order paper, which is second reading of a bill to amend the Yukon Act; then item No. 9, second reading of a bill to amend the National Parks Act; then item No. 3, a resolution to introduce a measure to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is No. 3?

Mr. Green: It is the third on the list. We hope to send this bill to the agriculture committee; then item 10 on the day's order paper, second reading of the Taxation of Estates Act, which is to go to the banking and commerce committee; items 4 and 5 dealing with income tax conventions—

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think the bill is available yet; No. 4 is not available yet.

Mr. Green: Item 6 on the day's order paper, second reading of the act to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act; then item 13, the resolution preceding a measure to establish a national parole board. Then, if these should go through, we will take the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I am not sure about Thursday, but we may take any of those measures or the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not proposed to go on with budget resolutions either tomorrow or Thursday?

Mr. Green: It is possible that we may take budget resolutions on Thursday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the leader of the house try to get the government to make up its mind as early as possible so that we may have a little advance information?

Mr. Green: Unfortunately it is not my mind that has to be made up.

At five minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS, COLOMBO PLAN

Question No. 78—Mr. Denis:

What amount, in money or otherwise, was contributed by Canada to the Colombo plan each year since its inception?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

All moneys voted by parliament for Colombo plan assistance are, with minor exceptions, transferred to recipient countries in the form of goods and services. Canada's annual contributions to the plan since its inception in 1950 are as follows:

(Funds voted by fiscal years.)

1950-51	$ 400,000
1951-52	25,400,000
1952-53	25,400,000
1953-54	25,400,000
1954-55	25,400,000
1955-56	26,400,000
1956-57	34,400,000
1957-58	35,000,000

(main estimates).

It should also be noted that, in addition to the moneys voted for the Colombo plan, Canada has given certain amounts of wheat and flour to Colombo plan countries, as set out below:

Year	Country	Amount
1953-54	Pakistan	$5,000,000
1955-56	Pakistan	1,475,833
*1957-58	India	8,000,000
1958-59	Pakistan	4,000,000
	Ceylon	3,000,000

*Part of the total allocation of $15,000,000 for this program was financed from moneys authorized in 1957-58; the balance is provided for in the estimates for 1958-59.

VETERANS INSURANCE, N.B.

Question No. 153—Mr. McWilliam:

1. How many veterans domiciled in New Brunswick have insurance coverage under the Veterans Insurance Act?

2. What is the total amount of insurance coverage in force?

3. What are the regulations governing eligibility for this type of insurance?

Answer by: Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs):

Return at June 30, 1958:

1. Statistical records are not maintained to show the domicile of persons insured under the Veterans Insurance Act. The number of veterans so insured who were resident in the province of New Brunswick when their policies were issued is 652.

2. $86,243,034; of which $2,170,701 is carried by the 652 veterans aforesaid.

3. Eligibility of veterans for insurance under the Veterans Insurance Act is governed by the provisions of that act, of the veterans insurance regulations and, for veterans of the campaign in Korea, of the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954.
