HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SECOND SESSION—TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT

3-4 ELIZABETH II

BEING THE 97TH SESSION FOR THE PERIOD 1867-1955

VOLUME IV, 1955

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE FIFTH DAY OF MAY, 1955,
TO THE NINTH DAY OF JUNE, 1955, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

EDMOND CLOUTIER, C.M.G., O.A., D.S.P.
QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY
OTTAWA, 1955

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 5, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. SPEAKER ON ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTHDAY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted on behalf of all members of this house, and I am sure a great many outside of this house, to extend to Your Honour our congratulations and our very good wishes on the occasion of your birthday anniversary.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, while I know the applause requires no comment from this side to make it perfectly clear that it is unanimous, may I simply as a formality join with the Prime Minister in what is not a formality, and that is in the very warmest of good wishes to you on your birthday anniversary, and affectionate good wishes from all of us to your wife on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: I hope I may be forgiven for condoning what is out of order. I do wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Leader of the Opposition and all hon. members for their kind wishes on this occasion. My day started with a bang, that is an atomic blast in the Nevada desert, which is a reminder of the precariousness of this life and the fact that one must always strive to do his best. My wife and I feel grateful to all of you for your kindness at all times.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): I should like to present the second report of the standing committee on industrial relations. In this instance there will be no motion for concurrence.

QUESTIONS

VEGETABLE OILS—TARIFF COLLECTED

Mr. Yuill:

What is the amount of tariff collected, in 1954, on imported vegetable oils used in the making of margarine?

Mr. Dickey:

Vegetable oils used in the making of margarine are not recorded separately in import trade statistics. Customs duty collected, in 1954, on imports of vegetable oils for all purposes were as follows:

	Duty collected
Cocoanut oil, edible	$ 19,837
Cottonseed oil, edible	92,203
Olive oil, edible	43,711
Peanut oil, edible	11,825
Soya bean oil, edible	99,532
Castor oil	2,765
Cocoanut oil, not edible	2,947
Cottonseed oil, not edible	681,016
Palm oil and palm kernel oil	185,084
Peanut oil, not edible	18,381
Sesame seed oil	1,951
Sunflower seed oil	9,445
Other vegetable oils	495,488

T.C.A. ANNUAL PASSES—MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Zaplitny:

1. Have any cabinet ministers and/or members of parliament received passes, on an annual basis, from Trans-Canada Air Lines in 1955?
2. If so, what are the names of such ministers and/or members?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Hon. Alcide Cote, Postmaster General, Hon. George Marler, Minister of Transport.

GRAIN SHIPPING ORDERS

Mr. Castleden:

1. What is the basis for the allocation of grain shipping orders to the various elevator companies, as now used by the Canadian wheat board?
2. When was the present system of order allocation put into operation?
3. How were the percentages for shipping orders as between elevator companies arrived at?

Mr. Dickey:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to disclose details of its current operations nor the competitive position of various elevator companies in their capacity as agents of the board.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. See answer to No. 1.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—COMET AIRCRAFT

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Does the Royal Canadian Air Force own two Comet jet liners?
2. What was the cost of these aircraft?

Questions

3. Are they now in service with the Royal Canadian Air Force?
4. If not, for what reason?
5. What future use is intended for these aircraft?

Mr. Campney:

1. Yes, two Comet 1A jet liners.

2. $1,544,000 each, excluding operating and engine spares.

3. No.

4. The R.C.A.F. removed its two Comets from service following the action of the British Overseas Airway Corporation in grounding its Comet fleet pending a full investigation into accidents.

5. The modification and return to service of the two Comet jet liners is now under consideration. If returned to service, the Comets will again be used, as simulated high-speed jet bombers, to give practice to the continental air defence system.

FIR LOGS, EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. Argue:

1. What was the quantity and value of fir logs exported to the United States in (a) 1953; (b) 1954?
2. What was the quantity and value of fir plywood imported from the United States in (a) 1953; (b) 1954?

Mr. Dickey:

1. (a) 7,383 M ft. $498,815; (b) 4,251 M ft. $330,687.

2. (a) and (b) The information is not available, as imports of fir plywood are not recorded separately in trade statistics.

The value of all plywood imported from the United States was as follows:—(quantity figures not available)

Calendar year 1953—$575,817.

Calendar year 1954—$178,485.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. What are the names of the firms paid to act as distributors for the national film board during 1954, and the amount each firm paid to the national board for this concession?
2. What was the total cost of producing these films during 1954?

Mr. Pickersgill:

1. It cannot properly be said that firms are paid to act as distributors for the national film board, or that they pay the national film board for this concession. In accordance with the general practice of the motion picture industry, contracts for distribution with different firms are drawn up indicating the films which are being covered, the territory in which they may be distributed, the length of time for which the distribution rights obtain, and the financial terms of the arrangement.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

These terms follow a general pattern but vary somewhat according to the nature of the films involved, the territory in which the distribution rights obtain, and other local considerations. A common form of contract provides that preliminary costs including cost of prints, which remain the property of the national film board, are first deducted from the distributor's gross receipts, and the balance of the receipts is then divided in some such ratio as follows: 70 per cent to N.F.B., 30 per cent to distributor; 65 per cent to N.F.B., 35 per cent to distributor; 60 per cent to N.F.B., 40 per cent to distributor; and in some instances, 50 per cent to N.F.B. and 50 per cent to distributor.

Another form of contract provides that the distributor pays the board a stipulated percentage of the gross receipts, costs of prints to be paid by the board out of its share.

Still another form of contract provides that the cost of prints be deducted from the gross receipts of the distributor but that the balance be not divided between the distributor and the board; in lieu of such a division, the distributor pays the board a stipulated sum or makes, in other words, a flat payment.

A list of the names of these distributors for 1954 was tabled in the house on May 2, 1955, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Peterborough.

It would be an embarrassment to the board to reveal the amounts earned by each of these firms under contract during 1954. In a competitive situation, such a disclosure would not be in accord with business practice in general, or with the motion picture business practice in particular.

The gross sum paid to the board by its distributors in 1954 was $150,246.12. No figure is available for the gross amount earned by the distributors, but if the average ratio were 60 per cent to N.F.B. and 40 per cent to distributors, the sum would be $100,164.

2. Films distributed during 1954 under these contracts were produced at any time between 1945 and 1954. Films produced in 1954 account for only a small part of the gross revenue indicated in the answer to question 1, and many of such films may well be in distribution under contract for periods up to nine or ten years. Furthermore, many films produced in 1954, particularly in the last quarter of the year, have not yet been placed in distribution. Also, it is not possible to know yet which of all the films produced in 1954 will ultimately be given theatrical distribution. The board therefore cannot yet give figures for the cost of producing films in 1954 destined for commercial distribution.

ATOMIC RADIATION—CUMULATIVE EFFECTS

Mr. Castleden:

What are the conclusions of the officials of the Department of External Affairs regarding whether or not there are cumulative effects on human beings from recurring exposures to atomic radiation?

Mr. Pearson: The Department of External Affairs has nothing to add to the statement made on this subject by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on April 4 (Hansard, pages 2652-54.)

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ARMED FORCES—MOVING OF EFFECTS

Mr. Hamilton (York West):

What amounts were paid out by the Department of National Defence to moving contractors in 1954, in the province of Ontario, for moving the personal effects of officers and enlisted men of the three services: (a) from Ontario to points outside of Ontario; (b) from points outside of Ontario into Ontario?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) and have pointed out to him that in view of the way in which statistics are kept in our department, I cannot answer his question as it is presently worded. If he will be satisfied with the names and the amounts paid to moving contractors in Ontario to whom we have made payments in the fiscal year 1954-55, this question could be so amended and made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

CANSO CAUSEWAY—CONDITIONS IN STRAIT

Mr. Kirk (Antigonish-Guysborough):

1. During the past winter did the government conduct studies of the effect of the Canso causeway on ice conditions, tides and climate in the strait of Canso?
2. If so, what did such studies reveal?

DIESEL FUELS, RAILWAYS—DRAWBACK

Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

Do the railways get any assistance whatever from the federal government by way of subsidy, drawback, etc., on diesel fuels when used by the railways?

CIVIL DEFENCE COLLEGE

Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many persons to date have taken courses at the civil defence college at Arnprior?
2. What courses are offered there, and how many persons have been trained in each course?
3. How are these trainees distributed by provinces and cities?
4. What has been the total cost of these courses?
5. How is this cost distributed between federal government, provincial governments, and municipalities?

STORMS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the colossal damage sustained by the residents of the cities of Prince Albert and Saskatoon, as well as adjacent towns and rural areas, in the catastrophe which struck there within the last 48 hours, will the government give consideration to granting compensation and assistance to those people who have suffered serious damage and loss, as was done in the case of "Hurricane Hazel" and one or two other cases?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received notice from the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) of a similar question. I am glad of this opportunity to say what I am sure is the fact, that all hon. members of this house sympathize with those who have suffered storm and flood damage in recent days in the western provinces. Of course the hon. gentleman knows that the primary responsibility is local and provincial, but when there is damage of such extent that it can fairly be considered as a national disaster and representations are made by the provincial government to the federal government, those representations receive the most sympathetic consideration. There is at all times an endeavour to mete out the same treatment to Canadians in all parts of Canada, as has been done whenever in the past there have been things that amounted to national disasters.

We have not yet any accurate information as to the extent of the damage that has been caused by this unusual storm in that locality. I am sure the accurate information will be available shortly; and if the government of Saskatchewan feel that its extent does bring it into the category of what should be considered a national disaster, I am sure it will be brought to our notice and will receive the same sympathetic consideration that has been extended whenever there has been anything that amounted to a national disaster.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I might ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister, is it a fact that in the other cases where national disasters have been declared to exist, a request was made in each case by the provincial government? Second, if the loss is as estimated, namely in excess of $50 million, is that not far above the extent of the damage in previous occurrences which have been declared of national disaster proportions?

Mr. St. Laurent: I sincerely hope the property damage that has been suffered in those localities does not amount to $50 million.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the estimate in the press.

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes, but our experience has been that there is always a first estimate of the extent of the damage that is far in excess of what it proves to be when an investigation is made and the figures of the actual damage suffered in each locality are added up. There has been participation in assistance by the federal government in cases where the actual damage was much less than $50 million.

Now, as to the first part of the hon. gentleman's question, to my knowledge we have always dealt with the provincial governments in working out federal participation in the measures to alleviate damages resulting from a national disaster within a province.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): May I ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert. In the event that damage from floods and other circumstances arising in the province of Manitoba is beyond the capacity of the local people to meet, would the same type of consideration be given as has been suggested by the hon. member for Prince Albert?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Of course the same type of consideration will be given to Canadians in any part of Canada, but I do not think there has been any case where the interference with the growing of future crops has entered into the calculation of the physical damage that was taken into account in arranging for assistance to those suffering the damage.

NATIONAL REVENUE

APPOINTMENT OF CUSTOMS OFFICER AT PORT CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has a decision yet been made as to whether the Department of National Revenue will be able to make arrangements for a customs port at Churchill for the 1955 season?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Revenue will be prepared to provide complete customs clearance facilities at Churchill, Manitoba, during the 1955 navigation season, if assurances can be given by a substantial number of importers, boards of trade, or other interested associations that they will take advantage of the service and will see that customs brokers and forwarding agents are established at the port to facilitate passage of documents through customs and the movement of the goods after clearance to destination.

TRADE

FLOUR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRICE DIFFERENTIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister discussed with the minister of trade and industry for Jamaica his statement that Canadian flour can be purchased in Liverpool and Trinidad at from 20 to 27 cents less per hundred pound bag than in Jamaica? If this situation prevails, can steps be taken to bring these prices into line?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): The minister of trade and industry for Jamaica did discuss this question with me and others while he was here during the present week. I understand there is some differential in the price of flour as related to certain specific brands. The government of Jamaica and the millers are in communication with each other, and officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce have also been in touch with the millers. We hope some satisfactory arrangement can be worked out.

POSTAL SERVICE

WHALLEY, B.C.—CHANGE IN NAME OF SUB-POST OFFICE—LETTER CARRIER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General. In view of the representations made by the Surrey council, the North Surrey board of trade and the junior chambers of commerce in that region, when does the department expect to change the name of the sub-post office in that area to North Surrey, and when does it intend to put the letter carrier service into operation?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I presume my hon. friend has in mind the question of the name of the postal station now known as Whalley. The department is prepared to go ahead with the change of name to North Surrey, presuming that this is the desire of the patrons.

As regards letter carrier delivery, all the details have been prepared and the department is ready to go ahead as soon as the question of the name is decided upon. This matter has been recently brought to the attention of the Acting Postmaster General, and he has given instructions to proceed with the letter carrier delivery and the change of the name to North Surrey. This, of course, is assuming that all conditions governing letter carrier delivery are complied with.

FERRY SERVICE

YARMOUTH-BAR HARBOR—LAUNCHING DATE OF FERRY "BLUENOSE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? With reference to the ferry Bluenose which is to operate this summer between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and Bar Harbor, Maine, is the minister now in a position to tell us the launching date?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question I may say that May 25 has been fixed tentatively for the date of launching of the Bluenose.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDO-CHINA—MEASURES TAKEN TO PROTECT CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) asked a question regarding the protection of personnel in Indo-China. The cease-fire agreements for Viet Nam, Cambodia and Laos all contain clauses requiring that the commanders of the forces of the parties to the agreements "shall provide full protection... to the international commission and its inspection teams in the performance of their functions". I know of no case where a Canadian member of our delegations to the three international commissions or a Canadian member of any of the inspection teams working under the commissions has suffered either personal indignities or violence because the protection called for in the agreements had been inadequate.

CANSO CAUSEWAY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF OPENING FOR HIGHWAY TRAFFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the destruction by fire of the ferry boat John Cabot, is the minister in a position to advise that the Canso causeway will be opened for highway traffic in the near future?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): The provincial government is responsible for the surfacing and maintenance of the part of the causeway to be used by highway traffic. It has proposed to us that this part of the causeway be opened on May 20, and we have concurred in this proposal.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday while I listened to this debate and watched my chance of taking part in it tick away with the clock, instead of being disappointed I think that I was relieved that I would not have the opportunity, by mediocre performance, to detract from the position my party had achieved through the outstanding efforts of my leader.

An hon. Member: Sour apples.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): A lot of apples are passed here, but they are usually on the other side.

An hon. Member: More applesauce than apples.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If I may borrow an expression of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne), instead of being dangerously ill I know that hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, have learned to their sorrow that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) is dangerously well.

I should like to read a few of his remarks as recorded in Hansard of yesterday at page 3445:

> We have heard already during the course of this debate that the government has confidence in the country, leaving the implication that others have not. Mr. Speaker, we have confidence in this country, and we have confidence that we have to encourage the development of the limitless resources we possess, and for the production and fabrication of which we have such enormous resources of industrial energy in the form of hydroelectric power, coal, oil, gas, uranium—all these things. We say that, with the development of these, there is full employment for all here and full employment for millions more in the years immediately ahead . . .

All this calls for action. The Minister of Finance gave a rather schoolmasterly bit of advice to the manufacturers. He told them that they had better pull up their socks and meet the situation.

If I may, at that point in his remarks I should like to interject that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) was probably echoing the words of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) when he said that the manufacturers needed a kick in the pants. Yet that is most difficult to understand, when the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) goes to the trouble of sending us a circular to indicate that the Chrysler Corporation are spending $50 million to double their facilities in this country. I think it is about time we had some unanimity of opinion between the Liberals to your left, Mr. Speaker, and the Liberals to your right. The Leader of the Opposition then went on to say this:

This demands more than action by the manufacturers. It demands action by everyone. It demands action by this government . . .

I am ending my quotation at the third line of the first column on page 3446 of Hansard.

Although we have wide latitude in this debate, I should like to limit my remarks to that particular problem. In the first speech I made in this house I indicated that on occasion, in order to express my views, I might even find it necessary to use such unmentionable terms as free enterprise, tariffs and protection. From my short experience I think I can say that these terms are still politically unmentionable. There is such great reluctance on the part of the government to face up to these terms that I think we can safely say they are fiddling while Rome is burning.

If I may draw an analogy from a Bible story, if the treasury benches are the Ananias in this problem, if they are guilty of a practised avoidance of their responsibility to industry, then all those who sit idly by in their shadow are the Sapphira because they are guilty of the consenting mind. They are not lifting one finger to prevent the crime. For those who represent our great industrial ridings there must come a day of reckoning.

I have said as well that we do not recommend high tariffs, but we ask for an end to the naïve program of binding us under trade agreements to nations which are not playing under the same rules. First, our two biggest customers allow our goods entry or refuse entry as they see fit, regardless of the GATT agreements. There should not be any surprise on our part when we hear about voluntary reductions in imports of Canadian oil and gas by the United States. This contempt of agreements has been going on for some time and is just as effective a barrier to our trade as a complete embargo on our goods by legislation. If there are surpluses in the United States, we are told to go and peddle our wares elsewhere. If there is a shortage of foreign exchange in Britain, we are told to do the same thing.

I think industry has good reason to expect this government to stand up to situations of this kind. We possess raw materials here of vital importance to all nations. It is time this government sat around the trading table in a realistic manner and stood up to our responsibilities to Canadian industries. There is no reason why a big stick should impress us in trade negotiations. Without our raw materials such as aluminum, nickel, asbestos, uranium, wood pulp, etc., the high standards of living reached in many countries could not have been achieved. Let us bargain from strength, not from weakness, and our deteriorating export situation can be rectified.

In the second place, we are, of course, not playing under the same rules in connection with our imports as well. In the last month I have had drawn to my attention by industries in my own constituency at least two or three problems of vital importance. I think I should warn the government that it is no longer a case of a few industrialists who are complaining about unfair competition, those people who heretofore could be told, "Go away and don't bother us". There is a major awakening on the part of organized labour as well. In each instance with which I have had dealings in connection with these problems, the representatives of labour have come along with representatives of management to see what can be done to work out the problem.

Perhaps I might be permitted to illustrate my point that we are not playing under the same rules in so far as competition is concerned by imports from foreign countries. Our tariff structure may be quite adequate, but new formulas must be devised for its interpretation or that tariff structure will not perform the function for which it was designed. As an illustration, I am informed that there is no particular tariff provision covering the import of thermos bottles, and that they are assessed on the basis of whether steel or glass is their major component. If it is steel, under item 446a we have the three classifications: British preferential, 10 per cent; most favoured nation, 22½ per cent; all others, 35 per cent. If it is glass, under section 326(i) we have the same three classifications: British preferential, 15 per cent; most favoured nation, 20 per cent; all others, 32½ per cent. By far the greater number of the nations with whom we now trade are classified under the most favoured nation part of the tariff structure, and include nearly all countries other than those behind the iron curtain.

Mr. McCann: What was the commodity?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Thermos bottles. My understanding of the usual method of assessing values for duty purposes, and I think this is the crux of the whole problem, is on the basis of the sale of an equivalent quantity; that it cannot be calculated on the price of the last 50,000 on a 500,000 run but an equivalent quantity at an equivalent level of business in the country of origin. The section dealing with the problem is found in chapter 58 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, being section 35.

But—and it is a very large "but"—there is absolutely no provision for a difference in (1) plant and equipment costs, (2) labour charges and (3) government taxes between the country of origin and our own country. As a matter of fact, if in a country under a controlled economy the government wishes to have goods sold at less than cost on its domestic market, then since 1948 that must be the price used for duty valuation. Dumping legislation does not apply unless the goods are being sold in their home market at prices in excess of their export price. Canadian industry and, in the result, Canadian labour, receive absolutely no protection in so far as our Customs Act is concerned in connection with the production of goods in countries where standards of living are far below our own. I might add that Canadian industry and labour apparently receive no protection from competition from countries where the standards of business ethics are also much lower than ours.

So that I may not be accused of speaking without proof, I should like to illustrate my point. I wish all hon. member could be close enough to me to see the two thermos bottles I have here. I think it can be readily seen and should be recorded in Hansard that they are packaged in almost identical fashion. The format, the colouring, the illustrations as to their use, the instructions which go with them even to the headings such as "electronically tested", "for best results", "to clean", "caution", are the same except that in the case of this product "caution" is spelled "c-u-t-i-o-n" and "little" is spelled "l-i-t-t-e-r". As to the bottles themselves, the design and colouring are the same, even to the design mark on the bottom along with the name.

This thermos bottle is produced by Aladdin Industries in my constituency. This other thermos bottle is manufactured in Japan. The price to the wholesale trade of the Canadian bottle is $1.28. The price to the wholesale trade of the Japanese bottle is 70 cents. The price to the purchaser of the Canadian bottle is $2.35. The price to the purchaser of the Japanese bottle is $1.49. This is what I mean when I say that there appears to be no equality in business ethics as far as the competition that our manufacturers must meet in our domestic market is concerned.

This topic came up for discussion a year ago, at the time of the ratification of the trade treaty with Japan. I should like to read some of the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), as found at page 3515 of Hansard of March 31, 1954. He said:

> In a supplementary exchange of notes which is appended to the agreement Canada reserves the right to establish special values for duty on any imports entering Canada in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or directly competitive products. In the event of such special values being applied, and in determining the level at which such values should be applied, Canada will take into account the prices of like or directly competitive products imported from other countries.

At page 3516 he had this to say:

> The agreement also provided for non-discrimination in state trading practices. Both countries undertake to conform to internationally accepted fair trade practices, particularly in matters pertaining to trade marks, marks of origin and rights under patents. They also undertake to co-operate in the prevention of any practices which might prejudicially affect their mutual trade and to accord sympathetic consideration to any representations that the other country may make.

In the debate on the motion to ratify the agreement the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say, as found at page 4647 of Hansard of May 12, 1954:

> It has appeared for some time to be in our national interest to work out a mutually advantageous trade agreement with Japan.

At page 4648 he went on to say:

> In negotiating this new agreement, we set out to obtain and consolidate advantages in the Japanese market, and at the same time to safeguard in a reasonable way the position of our own Canadian manufacturers in our home market.

At page 4649 he said:

> In case injurious competition should materialize for particular Canadian industries out of such imports, careful safeguards have been provided in the agreement.

I ask hon. members, is this any evidence of careful safeguards? Here is a product manufactured in a Canadian plant by a company which introduced the manufacture of this product in Canada, a company which employs 80 to 90 Canadians, a product which is 90 per cent Canadian. Here is a substitute product manufactured under conditions under which Canadian workmen would in no circumstances work. Here is a product which on the shelf of your hardware merchant is almost indistinguishable from the Canadian product. When my leader said there was a responsibility on the government to do something for the manufacturing industry in Canada and to create jobs, I am sure he was referring to just such an example as this. When we talk about pulling up the socks, when we talk about a kick in the pants, I believe the government should consider if it is not about time they gave themselves the same treatment.

Mr. Balcom: I did not know the hon. member had completed his remarks, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could ask him a question?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Yes.

Mr. Balcom: Are those thermos bottles?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Yes.

Mr. Balcom: Is the name "thermos" on them?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): They are vacuum bottles.

Mr. Balcom: I think that point should be cleared up. These are vacuum bottles, not thermos bottles.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): We will be glad to let you see them. We will be glad to set up shop in the opposition lobby, if you would like to examine them.

Mr. Balcom: I think a correction should be made, and it should be noted that these are not thermos bottles as the speaker said they were. These are vacuum bottles.

An hon. Member: What difference does it make?

Mr. Balcom: I have not seen any vacuum bottle that compares with the thermos bottle. These are both substitutes for thermos bottles. You will find, I think, that the Japanese product is just as efficient as the other make.

Mr. Hees: So what is the question?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why don't you listen?

Mr. Balcom: I wanted to ask if they were thermos bottles, and I find they are not.

Mr. Hees: He said they were vacuum bottles.

Mr. A. W. A. White (Waterloo South): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer my congratulations to the Minister of Finance on this, his first budget. It is a realistic one, and has received widespread approval throughout Canada.

The post-war years from 1945 to 1953 brought to Canada, under a Liberal administration, a period of unprecedented prosperity during which our gross national product grew to $24·5 billion. During the same period the government followed the wise and prudent policy of creating surpluses with which our national debt was reduced by $2·25 billion, with a corresponding reduction in debt carrying charges. This policy undoubtedly has met with the approval of the Canadian people. In my opinion it was good housekeeping, in spite of the fact that many hon. members opposite criticized this policy of deliberately creating surpluses during this period of unprecedented prosperity.

The present budget will, I believe, give our economy a shot in the arm by releasing more purchasing power into the stream of our economy through a reduction in personal and corporation income taxes. Undoubtedly the 5 per cent reduction in the sales tax on cars and the removal of the sales tax on tires and tubes will give a new impetus to those industries, which will have a beneficial effect on our economy.

The budget papers show that the number of persons without jobs and seeking work rose from an average of 137,000 in 1953 to 232,000 in 1954. This trend continued in 1955, and in February of this year the number of persons without jobs and seeking employment was 379,000 or 64,000 more than in February, 1954. Since a large percentage of these unemployed persons are industrial workers, any policy which will put more purchasing power in the hands of the Canadian people is a step in the right direction, even though it is brought about by deficit financing.

However, in my opinion this is not the entire solution to the slow-down that has taken place in many of our secondary industries during the past year. The fact that the purchasing power of the Canadian people has been increased does not necessarily mean that this increased purchasing power will be used to buy Canadian-made goods when imported goods can be bought at lower prices. The effect of competition with manufactured goods imported from the United Kingdom, Japan, Hong Kong, and the countries of continental Europe, where wages are very much lower than those paid in Canada, has been felt for some time by many of our own industries. Since many of our secondary industries are almost entirely restricted to our domestic market, the loss of this market could have a serious effect on our economy.

The fact that many of our secondary industries are losing their home market is, in my opinion, borne out by the fact that while consumer expenditures for goods and services increased from $15,100 million in 1953 to $15,600 million in 1954, or slightly more than 3 per cent, there is still a slow-down in industrial employment in many branches of our secondary industries. Last year I attempted to draw the attention of this house to the dangerous position of the textile industry in Canada, particularly the wool cloth branch. The former minister of finance directed the tariff board to conduct an inquiry into tariff item 554b, which reads as follows:

> Woven fabrics composed wholly or in part of yarns of wool or hair shall be subject to a specific duty of 20 per cent and an ad valorem duty of 12 cents per pound, but the sum of these two duties imposed by this item on imports under the British preferential tariff shall not be in excess of 50 cents per pound.

The tariff board conducted the inquiry as directed by the minister, and the report was tabled in this house earlier this year. The establishment of a maximum British preferential duty first appeared in 1935, at which time the duty under this item was fixed at 27·5 per cent specific duty and 17 cents per pound ad valorem, with a 65 cents per pound maximum. The recommendation that the sum of the two duties imposed under the British preferential tariff should not exceed a fixed maximum was the result of the tariff board finding at that time that cloths both woollen and worsted, selling in England at a price of $2 or more per pound, were not within the range of economical Canadian manufacture. In other words the tariff board recommended that a ceiling be placed on the duty for high priced specialty fabrics such as those purchased by custom tailors, and in this way restrict Canadian production to a range in which it was most efficient.

This tariff item was changed in 1937 and again in 1948, when the present rates of duty were established. In 1935 the prices of raw materials and wages were very low, and imports under this item averaged only $1.02 per pound. Therefore the duties imposed under this tariff were able to function as they were intended to do; but in 1953, due to the increase in the prices of raw materials and conversion costs, the average price of wool cloth imports was $3.14 per pound; consequently the maximum duty could no longer function as it was intended. Instead of applying to only a special range of cloth which it was considered uneconomical to manufacture in Canada it has now actually replaced the specific and ad valorem duties, with the result that virtually all woollen and worsted cloths imported under this item are subject to a duty of only 50 cents per pound.

That this is true is borne out by the tariff board at page 43 of their report, where they state that the 50 cent maximum had become the governing rate on a large proportion of imports of British wool cloth, in effect a specific duty. That this was the main purpose of the inquiry is established by the letter of the former minister of finance to the tariff board when he directed the hearing to be held. In it he said:

> I have received numerous representations from the woollen industry in Canada to the effect that as a result of price changes the 50 cent maximum duty prescribed under the British preferential rate of tariff item 554b has become anomalous and unrealistic and that, as a consequence, the industry has suffered and is suffering serious injury. Indeed it has been claimed that the continued existence of the industry is in jeopardy.

I do not believe anyone could question that the tariff board found as a fact that the 50 cent maximum under this item has become the governing rate of duty on practically all imports of British wool cloth, and that the industry no longer had the protection of the 20 per cent specific duty and 12 cents per pound ad valorem as was intended when these rates of duty were first established.

There is no doubt in my mind, either, that the Canadian wool industry has suffered and is suffering serious injury from the loss of their domestic market to imported British cloth, and that the 50 cent maximum is one of the contributing factors. The closing of 17 mills, most of which were established before the war and in some cases before world war I, the reduction in the number of employees by 43 per cent between 1949 and June, 1954, with many of the remaining employees working only part time—facts that were established by the tariff board in their report—are a clear indication that the Canadian industry has suffered and is suffering serious injury. That the tariff board recognized that the continued existence of the industry is in jeopardy is established by their statement in the report at page 30, where they say:

> Taking all these factors into consideration, there seems little doubt that the chief reason for the losses incurred in 1953 was the fact that to secure orders the mills had to sell a substantial part of their output at unsatisfactory prices. In many cases these sales were reported as having been made at prices to meet those quoted by their British competitors. That a substantial portion of the industry appears to be in serious difficulty is evidenced by the constancy of the over-all rate of absorption of capital resources.

The Budget—Mr. A. W. A. White

In today's issue of the Globe and Mail it is stated on the financial page that Dominion Woollens and Worsteds had a loss of $361,166 in the last year.

Other hon. members who have spoken on this subject in this debate have constantly referred to the industry asking for an increase in the tariff. The Minister of Finance in his budget address also said that he did not think it would be wise to increase the tariff. I would like to point out that the industry in its submission to the tariff board did not ask that the tariff be increased, but only that the 50 cents per pound maximum be abolished because it no longer served the purpose for which it was established, and had become unrealistic and anomalous.

The tariff board found as a fact that since 1948 the 50 cents per pound maximum had become the governing rate of duty—in effect a specific duty—and there is no doubt in my mind, and I do not believe there was any doubt in minds of the members of the tariff board, that this very fact was one of the contributory factors leading to the present plight of the Canadian wool cloth industry, even though by itself, or per se, as it is said in the report, it cannot be considered the whole cause.

Another factor that the board said must be taken into consideration is the decline in the Canadian market. In this regard it is interesting to note that while the total decline in the market from 1948 to 1953 was 10 million yards, the share of the Canadian industry of the domestic market dropped by 10·7 per cent while during the same period British imports increased by 11 per cent. It is therefore quite obvious that while the total demand for wool fabrics has declined, the share of the Canadian mills of the available market has been reduced to a greater extent than the decline in the market itself.

Another hon. member, speaking in the debate on this subject, indicated that the industry was overexpanded and inefficient. I would like to point out to him that with full employment between 1945 and 1949, the Canadian wool cloth industry was able to supply only 68 per cent of the domestic market, and any statement that the industry is overexpanded is unfounded. In the post-war years the industry spent $35 million on plant and equipment and have in operation 655 manual looms and 1,788 automatic looms, whereas in 1949 there were 1,404 manual looms and only 1,014 automatic looms. I think it will be readily admitted that the Canadian industry has modernized itself and is efficient.

The widening gap between wages paid in England and in Canada, which was accentuated by the devaluation of the pound, has been a major factor contributing to the loss of the Canadian market to British imports. In 1935 wages in Canada were 29·7 cents per hour compared with 19·1 cents per hour in England, a difference of 10·6 cents per hour. In other words wages in Canada were 55 per cent higher than wages in England at that time. After devaluation of the pound this difference widened to 45·5 cents per hour in 1950, or 123 per cent. Today the difference is 61·8 cents per hour, or 151 per cent. The tariff board had this to say about wages at page 17 of its report:

> It was suggested during the inquiry that in the years of profitable operations—1946-49—wool cloth manufacturers were too optimistic and raised the wages of their workers too much and that as a result, Canadian wool cloth cannot compete with wool cloth made in low wage countries. This is a difficulty that manufacturers in a high wage economy must meet if they are to continue in production. For industries where the cost of labour is a large proportion of total cost, such as the wool cloth industry, this is a serious problem for manufacturers. To compete in this market, production in this industry must be efficient. This means that manufacturers must not only give efficient management but must attract and keep skilled and industrious workers. To do this, the industry must pay wages which are about the same level as those offered in other industries.

The board also stated at page 46 of its report:

> Manufacturers must now make finer cloths than in the pre-war years; indeed, finer than in the immediate post-war years. As finer cloths mean more labour, labour costs may well have become a higher proportion of total conversion costs, adding to the disadvantage of Canadian producers.

Since the cost of wool is fixed by world prices the difference in conversion costs, of which wages is a big factor, simply means that the British manufacturer can produce wool cloth, pay transportation, pay the 50 cents a pound maximum duty, and land his wool cloth in Canada at 50 to 60 cents a yard less than the cost of production in this country.

Many will undoubtedly say that it is an uneconomic industry and should change to something else or get out of business. I wonder how many of our industries could survive if they were faced with that kind of competition. I would like to ask the representatives from the western provinces if the wheat farmer could stand competition like that; and if he could not would they say it was an uneconomic industry? I do not think anyone would suggest that the average workingman is getting more wages than he needs to live and raise his family in this great country of ours, where we are enjoying the second highest standard of living in the world. Neither do I think anyone would say that we should lower our standard of living to meet competition from these other countries. That would be a retrograde step and where would you stop? At the living standard of the Japanese, where they get less than ten cents an hour?

The leader of the C.C.F. group, speaking on a national broadcast on June 1, 1954, had this to say:

> Within the last two weeks, the government has asked the tariff board to study the impact of preferential tariffs on woollen textiles imported from the United Kingdom. This announcement can have only one meaning—that the government is considering increasing the preferential tariff rate of this commodity imported from Great Britain. Let me immediately say that if this were done the C.C.F. would be strongly opposed to it.

That may well be the position taken by members in the C.C.F. group representing the prairie provinces, but I am convinced that the textile workers and organized labour in the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec could never subscribe to such a policy.

Many other industries are losing their Canadian market to imports from these low wage countries; to mention only a few, the machine tool industry, the electrical industry, the rubber footwear industry. Still others are suffering from competition with imports from the United States, where their large home market with a wall around it allows them to produce in such large quantities that our secondary industries in many cases cannot compete with them even in our own market. We have listened too long to members of the United States government give lip service to the principles of freer trade; then, as soon as any of their industries suffer from competition they immediately slap on quotas and use the escape clauses under GATT.

In conclusion I would ask the government to reconsider its decision, and before the new GATT agreement is signed to eliminate the 50 cents per pound maximum under tariff item 554b. I would also urge the government to see that we have the same escape clauses as any other signatory to the GATT agreement and if the United States or any other country wantonly uses the escape clauses against us, we should protect our own industries by the same method.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, for many years now the world has been in the grip of a so-called cold war. A cold war is a war for men's minds, a war in which the aggressor seeks to talk his intended victim out of the possessions which he contemplates obtaining. The enemies of freedom, which comprise the communist conspiracy, subtly and with satanic skill and cunning, have been talking the world into confusion and into delusion in order to lead the democratic peoples into captivity, bondage, slavery and then destruction.

My purpose today is to discuss one of the techniques of that cold war that has been waged against the anti-communist world incessantly now since at least as far back as 1940. During that cold war the anti-communist peoples have sustained appalling losses, mainly through failing to recognize and realize what was happening to them. They are still in danger of losing, because they will not realize what is happening to them. For example, during the ten-year period ending with this year, in China alone 450 million potential friends of North America have been turned into 450 million potential and almost certain enemies of North America, by being delivered into the hands of Stalin and the political successors of Stalin in red Russia.

How came this dangerous occurrence about? United States citizens, acting either within the United States or under the direction of people in the United States, threw the Chinese mainland under the domination of the red rulers of Moscow. How and by whom has this been achieved?

May I suggest, as one of the figures eminently worth considering in this connection, Dean Gooderham Acheson, one-time secretary of state of the United States. Much confusion has been sown everywhere among anti-communist peoples through certain false statements of Dean Gooderham Acheson. Strangely enough, throughout this country and practically throughout the world this man is held in high esteem, which makes his falsehoods more dangerous.

May I invite the house for the time being to consider two of many examples of such false statements which I could readily name. Dean Acheson in 1949 said in effect that the United States could not in reason have prevented the outcome of the so-called civil war in China. No matter what she had done or left undone, he said, she could not have prevented the outcome. In his letter of transmittal to the white paper on "United States relations with China, 1949", Dean Acheson said:

> The unfortunate but inescapable fact is that the ominous result of the civil war in China was beyond the control of the government of the United States. Nothing that this country did or could have done within the reasonable limits of its capabilities could have changed that result; nothing that was left undone by this country has contributed to it.

See Utley, page 31.

I think probably a bigger falsehood than that could not be found in modern times. Freda Utley, at page 30 of her highly scholarly and scrupulously documented book, "The China Story", published in 1951, writes:

> No one who takes the trouble to study the records can accept Acheson's statement.

She particularly refers to the letter of transmittal to the white paper, which contains the statement I have just quoted from Acheson. Dean Acheson was wrong; Freda Utley was right. On page 31 of "The China Story" Utley justifies her statement in the following words, and I quote from "The China Story":

> Perhaps Mr. Acheson did not study the white paper all the way through its unindexed 1,054 pages. For in the small-print annexes in the back, as will be shown, are a number of documents that glaringly contradict the words of the state department in the main text.

That is glaring falsehood No. 1. As for No. 2, Dean Acheson in a letter to Senator Connally on March 15, 1949, used these words:

> Despite the present aid program authorized by the last congress, together with the very substantial other aid extended by the United States to China since V-J Day, aggregating over $2 billion . . .

I quote this from "The China Story" by Utley, page 31. It is a glaring falsehood to say that China had received $2 billion worth of aid. In "The China Story", chapter 2, entitled "Too Little, Too Late", Utley, after carefully studying the figures given on pages 1,043 and 1,044 of the 1949 white paper on China, says on pages 33 and 34:

> Elimination of both the "service" charges and of the $100 million or so of United States non-military "war surplus" stocks sold to China in 1946 reduces the total of post-war "military aid" to China to about $360 million. This total is disputed by the Chinese national government. According to its calculations, China received $110 million worth of "effective military aid" prior to the 1948 China aid act, which, together with the $125 million allocated by that act, brought the total to $225 million.

Next to the one I cited a moment ago, that comes close to being the second prize winner for the lie of the quarter century. See how colossal the lie is and what a false impression it has contrived to give concerning the strength of the communists, the weakness of Chiang Kai-shek, the position of Formosa and all these other matters which so vitally affect us in this dangerous hour.

Colonel L. B. Moody, a United States army ordnance corps officer who served with the Donald Nelson mission to China, after having made an intensive and detailed study of aid to China, said in a speech in Washington on April 11, 1950, and I quote from the speech as it is printed in Utley, page 35:

> It is obvious that "military aid" means to the Chinese infantry weapons and ammunition above all else, and it is precisely these items which the United States action has consistently denied, delayed or limited.

No matter how much money might have been spent in China on anything else except bullets and the guns with which to shoot them, the aid would have been of no value; but even at that the aid which Acheson implied had been given was never given.

What I have already said in this talk will help anyone to appreciate, in some small degree at least, the significance of some words which I now quote from Dr. Hu Shih in his article "China in Stalin's Grand Strategy":

> Such, in brief, is the story of the unfolding of Stalin's strategy of conquest in China. The heart of this strategy has been the creation, preservation and nurturing to full strength of the Chinese red army. It has taken nearly a quarter of a century for the red army to achieve sufficient power for the conquest of continental China. This red army was many times defeated, broken up and nearly annihilated by Chiang Kai-shek's armies; and Stalin and world communism might never have succeeded in China if the greatest war in human history had not intervened.

I may add to that, if in the course of that war it had not been possible to delude people so completely by falsehoods that had been spread about and never answered. I quote again from Dr. Hu Shih's article:

> The pattern of conquest is therefore the same in China as in Poland, Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Jugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. It is the pattern of conquest by force and violence projected from the contiguous Russian base. What seems to differentiate China from the seemingly much easier conquests in central and eastern Europe has been the much greater complexity and difficulty of the conquest, which made it necessary for Stalin to resort to the most cunning forms of secret diplomacy in order to overcome the resistance that nationalist China had been able to summon for over two decades.

The cunning and secret diplomacy to which he resorted I am now discussing. My reference is to Dean Acheson and his monstrous performance in connection with this struggle against Chiang.

The Chinese communists, abundantly aided by Russia, played a part in driving Chiang to retire to Formosa. The Russian communists did far more, while the American communists under Dean Acheson really did the job of driving Chiang to withdraw to Formosa. Actually Americans Roosevelt and Truman, Dean Acheson, General George C. Marshall, backed by the United States communist organization—these are the men who drove Chiang to withdraw from China to Formosa.

The authorities which I shall cite today are given at pages 3025 and 3026 of this year's Hansard. They are "China in Stalin's Grand Strategy" by Dr. Hu Shih; "The Iron Curtain Over America", 1952, by Dr. John Beaty, at one time military intelligence officer in the United States all during world war II; "The China Story" published in 1951 by Freda Utley—the authenticity of these authorities I discussed on a former occasion in some detail—and committee hearings such as those of the McCarran committee of the United States Senate. Every one of these is of the very highest degree of validity.

To appraise and appreciate Chiang Kai-shek with even superficial adequacy, one should contemplate him against the background of his whole history. I gave a considerable amount of that history on April 21. Time forbids that I do that on this occasion. Omitting for the present the remarkable story from June, 1926, when General Chiang Kai-shek as commander of the army of national revolution succeeded Dr. Sun Yat-sen as leader of the republic of China, on down to the end of 1944, let us consider the pertinent events of 1945 and on.

Let us look at 1945. The Chinese communist army in 1945 probably amounted to from 300,000 to 350,000. See David J. Dallin, "Soviet Russia in the Far East", Yale University Press, 1948, at page 223, cited in Dr. Hu Shih at page 34. These were scattered over 19 provinces, poorly armed and poorly supplied—see Hu Shih, page 34. These remnants Chiang was rapidly and effectively mopping up. May I quote a passage which establishes that fact quoted in "The Iron Curtain Over America" by Dr. Beaty, page 115:

> President Truman, on the advice of Dean Acheson, announced to the world on December 15, 1945, that unless communists were admitted to the established government of China, aid from America would no longer be forthcoming. At the same time, Mr. Truman dispatched General Marshall to China with orders to stop the mopping up of communist forces which was being carried to a successful conclusion by the established government of China.

We come now to 1946 and an outline of the doings of General George C. Marshall in China during that year. I have told of his selection and dispatch in December, 1945. He was head of the Marshall mission, which was assigned the task of ending the struggle in China between the anti-communists under Chiang Kai-shek and the communists under Stalin's direction. Marshall had specific instructions—and note this carefully; how impossible for Chiang Kai-shek they were—to exert pressure on Chiang's national government to come to terms with the Chinese communists, such pressure to take the form of threats to withhold credits, technical assistance in the economic field and military assistance by the United States; see Utley, page 8. May I quote from "The China Story", page 8:

> Thus, in effect, President Truman barred China from American aid until the Chinese communists should cease fighting the national government. Since the Chinese communist party, like all other communist parties, always and at all times, acted on Stalin's instructions, the United States government was in reality endeavouring to force the Chinese government to submit to Moscow.

That does not sound nearly so good, does it? How does the Dean Acheson lie stand in relation to that? I quote again from Utley, page 10:

> America's compulsions could be and were exerted only against the national government. By withholding both economic and military aid from the national government until it came to terms with those who wrought havoc in China for their own ultimate gains, it was we (the United States) who put the communists in a position in which they could blackmail the national government.

That is a pretty bad start, is it not? It is a rather ugly picture, is it not?

Marshall, during his one year in China, interfered with Chiang enough to ruin Chiang's finest chances of ultimate victory, unless he could be given generous American aid in later years. This was in addition to what Roosevelt had done at Yalta! This damage Marshall did: First, by pressing Chiang into ceasing fire three separate times, namely in January 1946, in June 1946, and in November 1946, in each case just when Chiang had his enemies on the run, in full defeat and in full retreat. Second, or the second means by which he did damage, was by declaring an embargo—almost unbelievable—preventing Chiang from buying military supplies for upwards of a full year; see Utley, page 13.

Now as to the details: Marshall, shortly after he arrived in China, arranged a truce. He found Chiang winning too much and he called for a truce effective January 13, 1946, whereby, first, the communists and nationalist forces were to be frozen in their present position; and second, the nationalist forces were to be free to move into Manchuria to take it over from the Russians; see Utley, page 11. That does not sound too bad, except that it stopped Chiang from destroying his enemies when he had them on the run.

Now, the province of Jehol adjoining Manchuria had been administered by Japan as part of Manchoukuo, which was the Japanese name for Manchuria. The nationalists naturally assumed that they were to occupy Jehol. Chihfeng, a railway junction city in Jehol, was occupied only by Russian troops; see Utley, pages 12 and 13. The nationalists insisted on taking Chihfeng over. Control of Chihfeng would go far toward enabling the nationalists to shut off the Chinese communists in China from the communists in Manchuria, something which of course was greatly to be desired. The Chinese communists, under Chou En-lai, insisted that the Chinese communists held Chihfeng and should hold Chihfeng—one of his lies. Since the Chinese communists, he said, had it—which was a lie—they should hold it.

Marshall, at 10.30 that night, went to visit Chiang Kai-shek at his home and stayed there until midnight. He constrained Chiang to let Chou En-lai have Chihfeng and with it control of Jehol province—Utley, page 12. All that needs to be said now to show the absolute abomination of that act is that the Russians were in control of Chihfeng. Chou En-lai did not have it. He knew he did not have it. He knew the Russians had it, and he used this lying trick to get control of that centre which would have meant victory for Chiang Kai-shek.

The communists in the truce signed on January 10—Utley, page 13—had agreed to allow the nationalists to move into Manchuria to take it over from the Russians—Utley, page 11. But as Russia's armies retreated from the Chinese territory they had ravaged, they handed over the towns and military supplies to the Chinese communists —Utley, pages 12 and 13. Naturally the Chinese nationalists fought. Who would not have fought? Here were the communists breaking their agreement right under Marshall's nose and being disregarded in the process.

When in May Marshall returned from the United States he found in progress a victorious nationalist offensive which was sweeping the communists before it in spite of the Russian arms, military advice, and training that had been given the Chinese communists —Utley, page 13. Marshall, when he returned, saw what was going on and saw that he would have to stop it. Marshall in June again forced Chiang to call a cease-fire—Utley, page 15. This time Marshall made Chiang let the communists keep the parts of Manchuria they then occupied, keep them in violation of Marshall's own truce effective January 13—Utley, page 13. It is almost impossible to believe, Mr. Speaker, that people from the United States would commit such outrages against an innocent people, is it not?

To use Utley's words, "the victorious offensive of the nationalist forces was halted"—Utley, page 13. The nationalists had forced the communists back as far as Harbin—Utley, page 15. That is a long way. You see the terrible loss that was inflicted by Marshall on Chiang then. The communists, having acquired through the second truce the breathing space they required to rally their forces, began to fight against Chiang again. In every case you will notice it was the Chinese communists who took the offensive. They were the aggressors. They continued to fight against Chiang through the summer and fall of 1946—Utley, pages 15 and 16.

Yet the nationalist forces, having still some ammunition left, won battles and regained territory. They captured Kalgan pass, which was vital, and other strategic points in north China and seemed well on their way to win the war. I quote from "The China Story", page 16, as follows:

> By November, 1946, the white paper on China states, "the government's forces had occupied most of the areas covered by its demands to the Chinese communists in June and during later negotiations and had reached what turned out to be the highest point of its military position after V-J day."

If Marshall had kept his evil hands out of the situation Chiang would have won right then, without any question. Marshall throughout this period kept pressing Chiang—never the communists, always Chiang—for a third truce—Utley, page 16—until finally on November 8, 1946, after a two-day conference with General Marshall, Chiang ordered all his troops to cease fire—Utley, page 16. You will occasionally hear people say that the people of China lost their morale, that they fell away from Chiang in China and that they joined the communists. What kind of story do you suppose would be spread among the ordinary Chinese by the communist liars every time Chiang ceased fire? The story they would tell would be that he had betrayed them. There was no way in which that lie could be answered by Chiang.

The result of these truces was repeatedly to give the communists time to (1) rally and regroup their forces, (2) destroy more and more of China's economic assets and impair Chinese morale, and (3) learn to use the war materials coming from Russia. How vital those things were! The long delay also gave Russia, meanwhile, time to build up a munitions-producing potential in Manchuria ready to supply the Chinese communists with war munitions.

In the light of all that, recall the statement of Acheson that nothing the United States could have done or left undone could have changed the outcome of the civil war in China, and we begin to see the reprehensible and monstrous nature of the lie that Dean Acheson told as the consummation of a chapter of wickedness which I believe for outrageousness probably equalled anything ever committed in the annals of man.

We now come to the second phase of America's betrayal of China in 1946, namely that having to do with arms and ammunition. At the end of July, 1946, Marshall clamped an embargo on the sale of arms and ammunition to China—Utley, page 13—until July, 1947—Utley, page 35. Could you have anything more unjustifiable than to do a thing like that? For almost a year thereafter the Chinese nationalist government was prevented from buying, and was definitely not given, a single round of ammunition—Utley, page 13.

Again, on August 18, 1946, Truman issued an executive order saying that China was not to be allowed to acquire any "surplus" American weapons "which could be used in fighting a civil war", which could only mean a war against the communists. Meanwhile, of course, the war with the communists was going on. When in the summer of 1946 Chiang tried to buy one and a half billion rounds of ammunition from the United States, the state department informed him that export licences would be refused—the only nation on the face of the earth that could not buy arms and ammunition from the United States, as far as I know. Britain, presumably under United States pressure, followed suit. There was no other source of supply—Utley, pages 13 and 14. Imagine the injustice of a person who maintains that Chiang was driven out of China by the Chinese, in the face of things like that.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have maintained that the fall of China to the Russian communist conspiracy was the result of the work of American citizens operating in the United States or directly under the instructions of United States officials. May I now give some quotations in support of my contention? These quotations are from some of the finest authorities in the world. I quote from "The Iron Curtain Over America" by John Beaty, page 116:

> Thus President Truman, Ambassador Marshall, and the state department prepared the way for the fall of China to Soviet control.

Again from the same authority, on the same page:

> They sacrificed Chiang and they destroyed—

Notice that there is no doubt about it.

> —a friendly government, which was potentially our strongest ally in the world, stronger even than the home island of maritime Britain in this age of air and guided missiles.

In "The Iron Curtain Over America", page 146, we find this reference to Chiang:

> His failure on the mainland had resulted directly from our—

That is the United States.

> —withholding of ammunition and other supplies.

I give another quotation, again from "The Iron Curtain Over America", page 146:

> Chiang's forces—despite frequent belittlings in certain newspapers and by certain radio commentators—were and are by no means negligible.

Again I quote from the same authority, page 115:

> Although the Soviet was pouring supplies and military instructors into communist-held areas, Mr. Truman said that the United States would not offer "military intervention to influence the course of any Chinese internal strife".

An ugly picture, is it not, Mr. Speaker? May I give another quotation. This one is from "The China Story" by Utley, page 19:

> This threat of complete withdrawal of American interest in the outcome of the conflict usually forced the generalissimo to give way and halt his victorious offensives to the benefit of the communists.

Once more may I recall that monstrous lie of Dean Acheson, that nothing the United States could have done or left undone could have changed the outcome? Where in all history have you heard a worse lie than that?

Even after four years of the most inane betrayal on the part of the United States administration—mark you, it is the administration and not the people of the United States, who were kept in complete ignorance of all that was going on; it was the administration and certain men like Acheson, Lattimore, Hiss and other men in the administration—when Chiang, in December, 1949, withdrew to Formosa he still was a power with which to reckon.

On May 10, 1949, General Claire Chennault, a military man of many years' experience, giving his views in his "summary of present communist crisis in Asia" set forth that some 150 million people in southern and western China could supply "effective resistance to the communist advance". Chennault wrote, and I quote from his summary:

> Both the people and their leaders are prepared to resist the communists and will in any case resist whether we help them or not. But what we give in aid will make the difference between a hopeless and an effective resistance.

Here was a man who had been right out there fighting and knew all about it.

When in June, 1950, the United States seventh fleet was ordered into the Formosa strait, Chiang had a navy that was "quite an efficient force", with power to intercept and capture communist supply ships going up to Korea, according to Ambassador William Bullitt, testifying before the McCarran committee hearings on I.P.R. on April 8, 1952. Chiang had an air force of between 200 and 250 planes. Chiang, from Formosa, with his 200 to 250 planes was dropping ammunition to unsubdued nationalist troops on the Chinese mainland, 1,250,000 of them—see Beaty, page 146. He was bombing communist concentrations and was making hit and run raids on communist-held ports. He was intercepting supplies being sent to the communists from the United States and Britain—see Beaty, page 146. These supplies included, for example, 2,500 tons of Malayan rubber per month—see Beaty, page 146.

Chiang was holding two communist armies in China occupied in watching him—see

Beaty, page 147. Chiang Kai-shek was successfully blockading Shanghai and Tientsin when Truman ordered the United States seventh fleet to "protect" him—see Utley, page 96. Truman thereby indirectly actually stopped him from blockading and most likely reconquering the Chinese mainland.

Do not the facts, Mr. Speaker, indicate that the Korean war might have been another step in the United States administration's long, sordid series of moves to eliminate Chiang Kai-shek?

If my conclusion is not right I invite all people who doubt the probability of my suggestion to explain certain things. First, Acheson practically invited the communists to take over South Korea and Formosa. At that time, on January 12, 1950, Acheson made it clear to the national press club in Washington that the United States would not go to the defence of either Formosa or Korea—see Utley, page 93. Is that not an invitation? Then there are those who blame North Korea for striking down into South Korea!

Second, on April 3, 1950, Acheson threatened South Korea with the withdrawal of United States aid—the same old story—if she did not balance her budget. Of course this meant that she must cut her military expenditures in preparation for defending herself against North Korean attack—see department of state bulletin, volume XXII, No. 563, dated April 17, 1950, page 602.

Third, the men Truman had sent into South Korea had permitted the South Koreans to make ready to defend South Korea only "to prevent border raids and to preserve internal security". These are Truman's words of June 27, 1950, as quoted by Utley at page 92. All this happened, notwithstanding the fact that on February 19, 1949, the Korean aid bill was passed by the United States, and in October a majority of the Senate appropriated $10·5 million for arms aid for Korea! The United States administration neglected to deliver this aid!—see Utley, page 92.

Fourth, when the United Nations called for troops, the United States refused to accept 33,000 of Chiang's best soldiers offered to them from Formosa, though no other nation offered troops in substantial numbers—see Beaty, page 147.

Fifth, the use of the United States seventh fleet: 1. Released two communist armies to march up into North Korea to slaughter our boys and win South Korea, thus weakening Chiang's position. 2. Permitted great quantities of highly vital war materials to come up the Formosa strait to strengthen the Chinese communists, so they could come down to slaughter our boys.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Sixth, the United States administration, after all this, refused to allow General MacArthur to win!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think anyone who contemplates this recital of charges will recognize that we are in a chamber of horrors. When things such as I have indicated could be done by the United States administration in a way such as might threaten our very existence on this planet, and could put us in danger for no one knows how many years, it must strike almost anyone as being unbelievable. It is unbelievable until it is proven to be true, and it is proven to be true!

Now, in all our dealings with the United States we must bear in mind that probably, in large measure, the very same people who aided, abetted and directed in throwing China away are still in the American administration and will, if they get the opportunity, throw away Formosa just as they threw away China. Our efforts must be to strengthen those who would defend Formosa. For the communists want Formosa because, at the present time, Formosa is perhaps the most important strategic piece of territory on the face of this earth, so far as North America is concerned.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the honest and courageous budget he brought down in this house about a month ago. It is a budget which seems to be accepted by the official opposition most reluctantly. As they have been unable to find anything in it to criticize they have gone back to the theme song they started last January, that of unemployment.

That was the criticism offered by the official critic of the Conservative party. I also heard his address over the radio, at which time he used the same theme. So it would appear that they could find very little in the budget to criticize. From the information we are given, however, in provincial representations which come to Ottawa, and by people we meet in different parts of the country, it would seem that these two groups are a long way apart in their estimation of unemployment in this country.

I quoted on one other occasion a statement made by a member in the Ontario legislature in which he said he had visited hundreds of homes in his own constituency, and could not find a single person unemployed. I am another who believes that the unemployment question is one which has been greatly exaggerated. Even though lack of employment for one person is serious, I think we must all admit that the unemployment situation is improving, and improving rapidly.

Listening to the critic for the official opposition in this debate, my memory went back to budgets in the past. I shall not weary the house at this time by quoting from speeches made by the official critic in past budget debates; however, I do well remember that if a minister of finance declared a nice surplus it was always a great worry to the financial critics of the Progressive Conservative party. Budgeting for surpluses, it seemed, was contrary to what one might expect would help the economy of the country. We listened to that for several years.

This year the Minister of Finance declared a deficit, and again we find the critic for the Conservative party very much disturbed, stating that we should not have budgets that do not balance. I am wondering what sort of budget would be pleasing to this particular gentleman. I have listened to the presentation in the house of 13 or 14 budgets, and I have yet to hear one presented that met with his approval. I think it can be said, however, that in this particular budget his only complaint is with regard to unemployment.

Another matter which was very noticeable in the debate was that the press did not give the critics the publicity which perhaps they felt they should have had. I would refer first to the Montreal Gazette and an editorial which, I believe, is the first item I have ever seen in that newspaper that was favourable to this government. I shall not quote the entire editorial, but there are some parts of it I should like to put on the record. It states:

> Easing The Burden
> Hon. Walter Harris has decided to use falling taxes as a weapon with which to fight falling revenues. It is a courageous course. But it may well prove the right one . . .
> The cut Mr. Harris has made in corporation taxes at this time is not simply a cut for the corporations as such. It is a means of easing the burdens on that economic system which provides the nation with its livelihood. It is a means of speeding the wheels of industry . . .
> Whatever may be said of the political desirability of such a cut, the fact remains that it is also a sound one to make at this time. The whole principle of ponderous personal income taxes was said to be justified by the need to curtail spending for the sake of controlling inflation. This is not now the situation. An easing of the tax burden upon the individual is a move towards increasing purchasing power: it is also a move to restore the incentive for greater effort and greater earnings . . .
> It is a courageous calculation to make, when the white paper tabled by Mr. Harris in the House of Commons on Monday disclosed that gross national production in Canada had fallen in 1954 by $431 millions. For it means that Mr. Harris is not only estimating that the economy will regain the ground lost last year. He is actually counting upon the economy setting, in gross national production, the highest peak in all Canadian history—higher even than the peak reached in 1953. In other words, even to keep his deficit from getting greater than $160 millions he has to realize the biggest economic boom in all history . . .

And this last short paragraph:

> The economic lift they will give the economy may, in due course, produce new sources of revenue, by broadening the base.
> This is, surely, the right approach. And surely it comes at the right time.

As I said earlier, this is the first time in my memory—I am not saying it is the only one—that this particular newspaper ever paid any kind of tribute to a member of this government. For that reason I suggest it should be appreciated.

I should like to deal for a few moments with the speech delivered a few days ago by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). I listened to the hon. member and felt that his criticism, compared with speeches he had made in the past, was very weak. It will be recalled that a few years ago the sales tax was increased by 2 per cent, taking it from 8 per cent to 10 per cent. This increase was made to raise funds to pay pensions to every citizen in this country 70 years of age or over. In criticizing this increase in the sales tax the hon. member for Eglinton described it as a 25 per cent increase, not an increase of 2 per cent. It seems to be the habit of this hon. gentleman to juggle percentages and figures to suit his own purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does not the hon. member think what the hon. member for Eglinton meant was that it was a 25 per cent increase in the existing tax? And, on that understanding, was he not correct?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I will answer that in a moment. But why not use the same percentages and the same methods at all times? When it suits your purpose you use one method, but when it does not suit your purpose you use another.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a further question? Does he not agree that what the hon. member for Eglinton said was strictly accurate?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No; if it was 8 per cent before and it was increased to 10 per cent, that is an increase of 2 per cent, because eight and two make ten.

Mr. Macdonnell: But two is 25 per cent of eight.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes; but why not use one or the other system all the time?

The Budget—Mr. A. W. Stuart

On Tuesday last, speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Eglinton reversed the method he had used formerly when criticizing income tax reductions. He stated that in the lowest income tax group the savings that would result from this budget would only be about 15 cents or less per week to each taxpayer in this lowest income group who pay taxes in this country.

I should like to put on the record the reductions that we may expect as a result of the budget. I have taken the group from $2,000 to $5,000. On $2,500 the reduction is 25·7 per cent; on $3,000 income it is 26 per cent; on $3,500 it is 25·6 per cent; on $4,000, 24·9 per cent; and on $5,000, 24·5 per cent. If you group those figures together you have about a 25 per cent decrease. The taxpayer which the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) mentioned pays only $26 to start with, so how could you expect an enormous reduction in dollars and cents. Surely no one can say that a man paying $26 in income tax has a terrible tax burden to carry.

When the hon. member for Eglinton spoke on the budget on Tuesday night, after making these comparisons which seemed to suit his purpose, he went on to offer this brilliant constructive suggestion, which appears to have been overlooked by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris). In the opinion of the hon. member this suggestion would bring relief to the Canadian taxpayers and solve their problems to a great extent. At this part of his speech the hon. member for Eglinton seemed to be in his best form. The veins in his neck were nearly at the bursting point and his little moustache stood straight out from his lip. He announced that if the sales tax was removed from tea and coffee it would save the Canadian taxpayer $9 million. There was great applause from his colleagues in the House of Commons when he made that suggestion. They considered that at last something worth while in the way of a saving had been offered to the Canadian taxpayer.

Remember, this particular hon. gentleman had had four weeks in which to study the budget because it was four weeks previous, to a day, on which the budget had been brought down. Yet this was the constructive suggestion he made. I regret many times that I did not have the privilege of attending Osgoode Hall or a university or college. However, figures have always seemed to fascinate me. In my crude way, by using my fingers and other methods, I tried to bring down these figures to a point where I could make a comparison. Using my crude methods, which I admit may have produced the wrong answer, I took this $9 million and divided it among the population of this country, the consumers, and I found, after using the same methods of comparison as were used by the hon. member for Eglinton in his income tax comparison, that the citizens of this country would save by this brilliant suggestion approximately one cent per week each.

If you balance his criticism with his constructive suggestion you will find that where the taxpayer he referred to was saving 15 cents a week, he condemns that and comes up with a suggestion which would save him 1 cent a week. If we followed the hon. member's suggestion, instead of lowering taxes we would be increasing them extensively.

On the same evening we were greatly interested in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) in which he described a shadow government of his dreams. In that particular part of his speech I began to think of the hon. member for Eglinton. I can assure you that I was not dreaming; I was wide awake, but I did have some sort of a vision. I looked across the chamber and saw the hon. member for Eglinton delivering his first budget speech. He had changed a lot. There was a very neatly clipped goatee on his chin, and if I remember correctly he was wearing a wing collar and there was a piece of shoestring dropping down from his ear and fastened to his spectacles.

Next to him I saw the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) sitting on his right. But when I looked at the Prime Minister's chair I got the shock of my lifetime. I looked three or four times before I realized that it was Walter Kuhl, former member for Jasper-Edson. Then I looked over to where our Minister of Justice now sits and I saw there our old friend Pat Ashby, former member for Edmonton, all dressed up in his ten gallon hat. There were many strange faces over there, many of members who have gone.

The minister of finance, presently the hon. member for Eglinton, came to this particular part of his budget speech—the first part I might say dealt with debt-free money or tax-free money to which I did not pay much attention because I did not understand it—I waited for what we call the meat of the situation, the tax cuts. He then dealt with what I would call the beverage cut, the tax reduction on tea and coffee, this $9 million to be saved the Canadian taxpayer. When they heard that, his colleagues just went crazy. That is the sort of thing that usually gets them aroused. Then the hon. member stood there with his little goatee, he waited for the proper moment until everything was quiet, and then he went on to say, "I can also suggest that the same thing will apply to toothpicks". At that time the whole house just went wild. That is the kind of budget we could expect from the hon. member should he ever become minister of finance.

I should like to deal for a few minutes with the speech made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) on April 27. I want to say at the outset that the remarks I am making now would never have been made if the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) had not stood up in this house and made such foolish and childish remarks. I want to say right now that there is no one in New Brunswick whom I fear in so far as expressing views are concerned. I have never had any fear of expressing my views, but I do abhor remarks such as these. I have never interfered in any way with the hon. member for Saint John-Albert or the hon. member for Royal. They both thought that they had me backed up against the wall when they challenged the New Brunswick members to express their views.

I am going to meet that challenge in my humble way. I regret that I was not in the house at the time the hon. member for Saint John-Albert spoke. I was attending a meeting of the external affairs committee and did not hear what he said. However, in the meantime I have read what he said very carefully and have decided that it definitely requires an answer. I hope that the Saint John Telegraph-Journal will give my remarks the same publicity they gave his, because I want the people in the province to know where I stand.

In his remarks on April 27 the hon. member for Saint John-Albert apparently had one thought in mind—anyone reading his speech I am sure will be convinced that it is exactly as I say—and that was to convince the people of New Brunswick that the only representation they had in the house came from Saint John. I realize that from a political standpoint this young gentleman is perhaps still a little damp behind the ears and it will take some little time for him to become acclimated. For that reason I want to answer him. The hon. member said, as reported on page 3229 of Hansard:

> We have in New Brunswick a large amount of undeveloped natural power in our rivers. The situation began to take form in 1945 under the Liberal government then in power in the province.

The hon. member then went on to refer to the great boost that had been given since the government changed two years ago. I want to tell the hon. member for Saint John-Albert that the Liberal government which had been in power for 17 years had the Beechwood project well under way in so far as the engineering work was concerned. That was the situation when the Conservatives took power because four months from the time they took over, the report was completely finalized.

I wonder also if he would accuse Liberal members—federal or provincial—from New Brunswick of selling our birthright and heritage at Grand Falls; this was one of the most economical power projects in our province. In the grand Tory betrayal a few years ago, they gave it away. That is the power that we need today. At the time it was given away, I am quite sure that the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) was a provincial member. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell) should know by this time that I never hesitate to express my views, and I believe that when I express them I call a spade a spade. That is what I intend to do for a few minutes this afternoon. There is another statement of his that I question greatly. He stated, and I quote from page 3231 of Hansard of April 27, 1955:

> I refer particularly to one other matter that I put in the same category, namely atomic power development in the country. When plans were lined up and we realized, perhaps a few years ahead of time, that there was some hope for nuclear development of power we in the maritimes —New Brunswick and Nova Scotia—naturally felt that we would be given the first choice. Here was the area in Canada that everybody said he wanted to help. Here was the area that had the labour, that had the initiative and that had everything except the power. We were told that on many occasions. But what happens when atomic energy comes around the corner? What do the central provinces do? By some devious method they either hinder our chance to take part in this development, or they completely exclude us from it.

Now, the hon. gentleman put those remarks on the record. We all remember when the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Trade and Commerce, announced that all provincial hydro companies would be welcomed to Chalk River to study with federal engineers the development of power from atomic energy. To my knowledge, at the present time the only province that accepted that offer was the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert tries to make us believe that we have been squeezed out. I would like to say at this point that it might have been possible for Premier Frost to have decided to come down and develop atomic energy in New Brunswick but, human nature being what it is, he decided otherwise.

The only people today who can be held responsible for the attitude toward atomic energy in New Brunswick is the provincial government we have at the present time, and no one knows that better than the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. They were invited to take part in this development and absolutely refused. They were not interested.

Now he stands on the floor of this house and tells us that the premier of Ontario is responsible for New Brunswick not being able to participate. The general public knows that suggestions such as these are incorrect. Every member of this house knows they are incorrect. The Right Hon. C. D. Howe made that announcement on two different occasions that I know of in the House of Commons. I often think that criticism, if it is based on something constructive and well founded, is good in any government, provincial or federal; but statements which are made so recklessly and without foundation may create interest in the home constituency at that particular time, but I am sure they are of little advantage in the long run.

I have been asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert to express my views on Beechwood. That is the power development on which we are depending now, to be built in New Brunswick. I want to say at the outset that I have never said anything at any time in any place that would be considered to be harmful in any way to Beechwood. But I want to suggest here today, and every person in New Brunswick is going to know exactly where I stand, that I am one who believes that Beechwood is not economically sound.

Mr. Bell: That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): You could have asked me that. You did not have to challenge me on the floor of the house. That information was at your disposal at any time you wanted it. I have never hesitated to express my views at any time. I believe it is a great mistake to go ahead with Beechwood, and I say that for this reason. We have not gone into the study of power from atomic energy. I might also say that when comparisons are made between costs of hydro power and the cost of atomic energy, the power sites in Ontario and Quebec are always used as comparisons. It is not fair to compare them with New Brunswick, because the cost of hydro-electric energy in New Brunswick is far above that in Quebec and Ontario. The differential is quite different when you compare hydro developments in New Brunswick with those in Ontario and Quebec. I have also been informed that our provincial government has been offered cheap power from the province of Quebec on a long-term basis. I have been informed it is much cheaper than we could develop it ourselves. If that is true, I think it should be investigated very thoroughly.

I would not want the hon. member for Saint John-Albert to be leaving the impression that all the citizens of New Brunswick are in favour of Beechwood. I should like to assure him they are not. When they are given the facts that the building of Beechwood will never decrease the cost of electrical energy by one cent but will increase our provincial debt by over 50 per cent, they are going to take a second glance at it before they endorse it. I feel it is a matter that must be gone into much more carefully than it has been so far. I believe that there are other sources of power that can be developed which will bring about a much better result than we can ever hope to have from Beechwood. I believe the hon. member will understand exactly my feelings about this project. Again I want to emphasize the fact that never at any time have I said anything detrimental to this project, but those are my personal opinions—

Mr. Bell: Until now.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Until now. Those are my personal opinions and I am not in the least hesitant about placing them on the record.

Mr. Bell: May I ask a question if you are going to leave Beechwood now?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Yes.

Mr. Bell: Does the hon. member think the provincial debt will be increased greatly if the federal government assists us with low interest money?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am not in a position to discuss low interest money from the federal government. I am not the minister of finance. Low interest loans to a provincial government for the development of hydro are a matter that I know nothing whatever about. It may have been done, but I know nothing about it.

Now I shall mention one other fact. The hon. member for Saint John-Albert has challenged me to express my views. Now I am going to make a statement, and I shall get some reaction from him. During the unemployment debate in this chamber nearly every Conservative member took part in that debate. It was most noticeable that the member for Saint John-Albert held his seat. There was never a word from him. It was rumoured all through the corridors of this building that the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, knowing the conditions this year in his constituency were much better than last, wanted to get up on the floor of the house and express that opinion, perhaps taking it for granted that he would secure some credit for that improved position; but it was suggested that if he did it would be contrary to the arguments that would be put forward by his gloom casting comrades.

An hon. Member: Don't be silly now.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I am not being silly. I am answering exactly what you asked me to answer. I am told that he was asked to keep his seat. He can answer for himself. He knew the conditions were better in Saint John than they were last year. Why did he not get up? He says he does not believe in playing politics. Why did he not get up and say, "The conditions in my constituency have improved"?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in the budget debate I put on record the unemployment situation in Saint John, and I felt that was just as good a place as any to do it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): We will take it for granted that that is correct. He has spoken of co-operation between federal and provincial governments; both the hon. member for Saint John-Albert and the hon. member for Royal have spoken of that. We have a project which is being carried out as rapidly as possible. I refer to the Gagetown project. I am going to challenge the hon. member for Saint John-Albert or any other Conservative members from New Brunswick to show me one instance when they have ever said anything complimentary about the Gagetown project. You have all heard the hon. member for Royal criticize and criticize, even though the greater part of this present project is in his own constituency. Today that project means more to the province of New Brunswick than anything else we have had or anything that I can visualize. But there is never a word about it in a complimentary way. It is always condemning. I have here an article that I cut out of the Montreal Gazette in connection with Gagetown. It illustrates the requirements of that camp. To give you some idea of what it means to the people of New Brunswick, I should like to read from this article:

> The list of requirements includes everything from the daily number of bread loaves (5,000) needed to keep 10,000 soldiers marching on their stomachs, to the 5,000 haircuts barbers will give each week . . .
> To feed the division, scheduled to arrive at Gagetown in the late spring, planners are working on ways to obtain daily rations of 20,000 eggs, 5,000 pounds of butter, 10,000 quarts of milk, 5,000 loaves of bread, 5 tons of potatoes and almost 4 tons of fresh meat.

These requirements would be provided by New Brunswickers. But there is never a word in a complimentary way. Yet they are still seeking co-operation.

I am now going to turn to another matter for just a few moments. There is the trans-Canada highway which is being built in the province of New Brunswick. We all know that highways are exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, but this government saw fit to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the trans-Canada highway. Until it was brought to the attention of the provincial government of New Brunswick most vigorously, it was utterly impossible for a Liberal to get a job on the trans-Canada highway, though we were paying 50 per cent of the cost here as the federal government. It was a long uphill fight to get one single Liberal work on that highway.

If the hon. member for Saint John-Albert considers that to be co-operation, I may say that I do not. These people want co-operation when they are looking for something. It is all take and never give. That is exactly the way I have found them to be. In my own county I will say that road work was carried on under exactly the same conditions. It is an unpardonable sin ever to have voted Liberal. If you ever voted Liberal, you can go hungry; there is just no work for you. Those are the people who ask others to co-operate. That is the approach they make.

I am going to use this one other illustration and then I shall be through. In a sincere effort to distribute the wealth of this country equitably and fairly, this government paid to the province of New Brunswick, under the federal-provincial tax rental agreement, during the past fiscal year approximately $18 million. That is more than a third of our total revenue. At this point let me say that that is $13 million over and above the amount we can ever hope to collect ourselves from the same tax sources. In other words, it is 25 per cent of our total revenue which is over and above anything we could ever hope to collect ourselves.

That money is going to the provincial government of New Brunswick without any strings attached to it. But I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of this house that the strings are quickly tied on it after that cheque gets to Fredericton. People are told that not a single dollar of this money can be used as far as a Liberal is concerned. We are not given any consideration in any way. It is purely for their own people. I want this to be on the record and I want them to read this. I would not make these statements if I did not know what I was talking about.

In all fairness, I want to say at this point that I know Progressive Conservative M.L.A.'s in my own province who are not at all in sympathy with this attitude that I have described but who are bitterly opposed to it. But those in the driver's seat are calling the strikes and the balls, and this is the attitude they have taken.

I hope that I shall never be placed in the embarrassing position of screening those who are in search of work in order to find which way they voted. No one can say that it is fair to deny employment to those who, by their democratic right, voted as they saw fit. But under our provincial administration at this time, it is considered to be an unpardonable sin to have voted other than Progressive Conservative.

In my opinion, co-operation is much the same as trade. It is never a successful venture if confined to a one-way street. There should be no restrictions and there should be no barriers. If those from my province who are now seeking co-operation will approach, not with the olive branch in one hand and a stiletto up their other sleeve but with the frank and honest determination to co-operate, they will find that I am prepared now, as I have always been, to meet them halfway. Any lack of co-operation between our province and the federal government at this time is the result of the ruthless, narrow, selfish attitude taken by federal and provincial Conservative members from that province.

In conclusion I will say this, Mr. Speaker. So far as co-operation is concerned, in future my conduct will to a great extent be governed by that of my Conservative friends from New Brunswick. If they are sincere in their desire to co-operate, they will find that I am prepared to meet them halfway. But if they want to carry on as they have carried on in the past, and if our provincial government want to carry on as they have carried on in the past, there is no chance of co-operation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments on what happened in this house yesterday afternoon. I think all hon. members will agree that we had one of the most interesting afternoons that we have had in the House of Commons for a long time. It was delightful; it was entertaining; it was a top-rate performance.

The first two speakers or, if I may call them that, the principal speakers during the afternoon were certainly in top form. We were pleased to see the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) in such vigorous good health once again. Whether or not hon. members in various quarters were in agreement with what he said, the way in which he said it was enjoyed by all.

Similarly, I think we must extend a word of compliment to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). Realizing that his speech was made immediately after the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition, I believe we can agree that he did quite a good job of debating.

[Mr. Stuart (Charlotte).]

But, Mr. Speaker, after one has said that, and when one looks back on the day's performance, one cannot do otherwise than ask the question: Where were we when it was all over? I ask that question both with respect to the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition and with respect to the speech made in reply by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

For the most part, these two speeches dealt with the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and with the consequences that flowed or failed to flow from that conference in the intervening years. The Leader of the Opposition spent most of his time seeking to justify whatever stand it was he claims he took at the conference in 1945. He spent a great deal of time castigating the government. But I listened in vain for any statement from him as to where he and his party stand on the important issues that were raised at the dominion-provincial conference of 1945 and which, as a matter of fact, are not yet finally resolved.

It seems to me that the country has a right to expect from the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition not only the criticism of the government which it is the responsibility of that leader to render but a statement as to where he and his party stand on the issues of the day.

But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the same criticism must be levelled at the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). He made a speech, some parts of which I want to analyse in a moment, which in the main had to do with the past. It was an attempt to tell us that from his point of view the government has implemented, as he alleged, to the extent of two-thirds the proposals made by the federal government in 1945. It can be said for him that he at least, because he was talking about the 1945 proposals, found it necessary to refer to a number of important issues that are still before the country, but he did not tell us where we go from here. He did not tell us what the federal government proposes to do about those issues which as yet have not been finally or satisfactorily resolved.

So, Mr. Speaker, what I said about the Leader of the Opposition I must also say about the gentleman who spoke for the government yesterday, namely, that I think the people of Canada have the right to expect from people in these responsible positions not just an attempt to justify their past but a statement as to what their position is with regard to the future.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare indulged in a most intriguing bit of arithmetic. I note that the hon. member who preceded me questioned the arithmetic of another member of the house. I must certainly question the arithmetical processes which went on in the mind of the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday.

Mr. Macdonnell: He is a philosopher, not an arithmetician.

Mr. Knowles: Then he certainly got out of his field. I thought he was a lawyer. At any rate, he stood up yesterday and said that two-thirds of the federal government proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference in 1945 had been implemented. He set out to try to prove the assertion that the program had been implemented to the extent of two-thirds. In the course of that attempt he did at least refer to issues which were important in 1945 and which are still very important today. It is those issues to which he was called upon to refer that I feel call for a statement of intention and policy on the part of the government and the Leader of the Opposition.

First of all, the Minister of National Health and Welfare referred to the payments made to the provinces in return for the rental of certain tax fields. He made reference to the figure in the green books of 1945 to the effect that the payments in 1944 would have been $206 million whereas in the present year the amount to be paid is $320 million, and on the basis of that figure he suggested that the federal government has exceeded what it promised in 1945. I asked an innocent little question as to whether or not he had these figures in constant dollars. He said he did but he did not take the time to give them.

The fact of the matter is that the statement in the green books that the amounts paid to the provinces in 1944 would have totalled $206 million is in a column at the top of which it is made clear that this amount was based on an assumed gross national production of approximately $12 billion. As everyone knows, the gross national production today is twice that figure or more. Likewise, the value of the dollar is about half what it was in 1944 or 1945. I suggest, therefore, that the $360 million being paid today should be compared not with the $206 million figure suggested in the green books but rather should be compared with a figure twice that amount, namely, $412 million. On that basis the implementation of that aspect of the green book proposals is to the extent of about 77 per cent.

So far so good, Mr. Speaker. On that item the percentage of implementation is a little higher than the 66⅔ per cent indicated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I say so far so good. That is the only point on which the two-thirds figure is even reached. The Minister of National Health and Welfare then referred to the old age pension program. He pointed out that the 1945 proposal to the provinces was that a pension of $30 a month be paid to everyone 70 years of age and over without a means test, paid in full by the federal government, and that a pension of $30 a month be paid to those between 65 and 69 on a means test basis financed fifty-fifty between the federal government and the provinces.

He proceeded to jump right from the making of that offer in 1945 to the present program, completely forgetting of course all the prodding and agitating that was necessary in the meantime, completely forgetting the fact that there was a committee of both houses of parliament which dealt with this matter and made a report on the basis of which legislation was finally introduced in 1951, which became effective only in 1952. But without going into that, may I point out that the Minister of National Health and Welfare proceeded to try to tell us that since there was now an old age pension program almost identical with what was offered in 1945, except that the figure is $40 instead of $30, the government is doing better than it proposed in 1945.

Again, Mr. Speaker, there is that innocent little question of mine about constant dollars. Surely the Minister of National Health and Welfare knows that $40 in 1955 cannot be called more than $30 was in 1945. If the government is going to claim today implementation of what was offered in respect of old age pensions in 1945, the figure should be at least $60 a month, if not quite a bit more. I suggest to the government that this is one of the points on which the nation has a right to expect a statement at the present time. It is not good enough for the government to boast of what has been done in the field of old age security. Far too many of our people are suffering, particularly those who only have the $40 a month on which to live. After all, $40 today would be equal in value to $20 a month in 1944 or 1945.

I call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare not to delight us as he did yesterday with a speech that boasts of the past but tells us nothing about the future. Rather it is his duty to indicate to the house when steps are going to be taken to increase the amount of that pension. I suggest that there is a case where at the most the government has implemented—and only under pressure at that—its proposals of 1945 to the tune of 60 or 65 per cent, if you look at it in terms of constant dollars. I move on to the question of health.

Mr. Harris: Do you make it only that? I thought two-thirds of 60 was 40.

Mr. Knowles: It depends on the exact value of the dollar. If the dollar has only gone down 50 per cent it would be the exact two-thirds that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) seems to want to make it at this point. I do not mind giving the minister that much comfort. For purposes of this analysis I will say that in terms of the first item we were talking about, payments to the provinces, the implementation is of the order of 77 per cent, and that with respect to old age pensions the implementation is of the order of 66⅔ per cent.

Mr. Harris: On the basis of your argument.

Mr. Knowles: But remember that the minister's colleague said yesterday that the government had implemented the whole program to the extent of two-thirds. There are several other items on which the score drops very low.

The next item is health. Even the Minister of National Health and Welfare had to admit there was a terrible gap there. Even he who, like no other minister on the other side, can boast of what he claims the government has done, had to say on at least two occasions, "with the exception of health insurance". And what does that exception amount to in terms of this arithmetical calculation the minister was making yesterday? In the green books of 1945 the proposal on the part of the federal government concerning health was for $150 million a year, and that was to include what is now in the health grants program and the federal government's contribution to a nationwide program of health insurance.

Apart from the fact that the major item, health insurance itself, has not been implemented at all, and just looking at it from an arithmetical basis in terms of dollars, we have an implementation there of about $30 million or $31 million a year compared with the 1945 proposal of $150 million a year. Oh, I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare said yesterday that the government now stands committed to an annual contribution under the health grants program of $48 million. But he knows, and the Minister of Finance knows, that that is only a paper commitment in the back of the book of estimates which, when it comes to paying it out, amounts to only $31 million a year. The reason for the difference of $16 or $17 million is in what is sometimes called a shortfall, due in part to the fact that these are commitments the federal government is prepared to make, but they are on a matching grants basis. If the provinces are not able to take them up, of course, that money does not have to be paid out. The actual amount of money provided for the health grants program this year is thus just over $31 million.

Even comparing that $31 million with the $150 million of 1945, without worrying about constant dollars, you have an implementation to the extent of only a little over 20 per cent. If you look at it in terms of constant dollars, it is an implementation of only 10 per cent of what was promised in 1945. Remember that these promises with regard to health services and health insurance in 1945, while they were based upon cost figures which would be greatly extended today, nevertheless had as their objective the provision of full and adequate health and hospital services for the people of Canada. The green books, and I will not read them again today because I have read them often, contain some of the finest statements one could find anywhere as to the desirability of a health services program and nationwide health insurance. The purpose was not to just make a stab at the problem. The purpose was to provide full and adequate health coverage for all our people. In terms of that, in terms of constant dollars, in terms of the cost today, we have an implementation to the extent of about 10 per cent. Remember, so far as health insurance itself is concerned, the implementation to date is zero.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare also had to admit in his summary yesterday that, with regard to the promise of 1945 that the federal government would take full responsibility for the employable unemployed, nothing has yet been done. Oh, there is the offer, the proposal or suggestion or what have you that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made to last week's dominion-provincial conference, but as yet nothing has been done with regard to that. So far as the proposal of 1945 is concerned, so far as implementation goes, and that is what the minister was talking about yesterday, the extent is zero.

Likewise, the Minister of National Health and Welfare also admitted yesterday that there was another gap. He admitted that so far as the timing grants are concerned, those public investment programs that were to assist with the development of the country so as to avoid unemployment, nothing had been done. Again the extent of the implementation, so far as that aspect of the 1945 proposals is concerned, is zero.

Now, let us look at them all, Mr. Speaker. I shall take the figure the Minister of Finance wants me to take in one case, even though I think it is a bit high, and here they are. So far as payments to the provinces in return for the rental of certain tax fields are concerned, the implementation is about 77 per cent. In the field of old age pensions, the implementation is at best 66⅔ per cent. In the field of health, in terms of constant dollars, the implementation is 10 per cent. In the field of federal responsibility for the employable unemployed, the implementation is zero per cent. In the field of timing grants for the development of the country and for public works to avoid unemployment, the implementation according to the minister himself is zero per cent. Now, how he adds up 77 per cent, 66⅔ per cent, 10 per cent, zero per cent and zero per cent and arrives at two-thirds is an arithmetical computation which, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) would say, only a philosopher could achieve. Actually, it is a very meagre showing.

So, Mr. Speaker, what we had yesterday was a wonderful debate. Nobody went to sleep, and we all enjoyed it from start to finish. But in the end, all it amounted to was an attempt on the part of the Leader of the Opposition to justify whatever stand it was he took at the conference in 1945, and an attempt on the part of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to tell us that the government had implemented its proposals to the extent of two-thirds when, as I have just demonstrated, such is not the case. However, yesterday's debate did have this advantageous result. It did force the Minister of National Health and Welfare to discuss these five subjects and bring them out in the open. I submit they are five of the most important subjects facing the people of Canada at the present time. What I call for, even if it means we have to have another speech from the Leader of the Opposition and another speech from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is a clear statement by spokesmen for the older parties in this house on these important issues.

So far as we are concerned, we feel that federal-provincial taxation agreements should be worked out; that they should be on a basis that will provide for unity in this country; that they should be on a basis that will make possible the redistribution of the wealth of this country, so that it will get to Canadians in proportion to the extent to which they produce it and in proportion to their rights as Canadians from one end of Canada to the other to a decent standard of living. In the field of old age pensions, and pensions for the blind, we feel that the amount should be increased to not less than $60 per month. This and other improvements in our old age legislation should be made right away.

In the field of health we contend that here is one of the most important domestic issues facing our people, and that a nationwide program of health insurance must not be delayed any longer than October of this year when the federal-provincial conference is held. I call upon the leaders in all parties to make it clear where they stand on this issue. I call upon the Prime Minister not to remain satisfied with the statement he made in the election campaign of 1953. At that time he seemed to rely on the fact that there were only one or two provinces that seemed to be asking for a health insurance program. The picture has changed since then. The picture was changed somewhat last week. We know from what happened in public that four or five of the provinces are now interested in a health insurance program. If we knew what went on behind closed doors on Wednesday of last week, it might turn out that many more than five are interested in a program of this kind. I call upon the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare to have done with this business of reading us statements about the past. Liberal lore is full of them, right back to 1919. What we want to know is where the Liberal party stands on health insurance today.

In the field of unemployment we feel that, until such time as steps are taken to bring about full employment, it is still true, as was stated by the Liberals in 1945, that full responsibility for the employable unemployed should be taken by the federal government. In the field of what was referred to yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare as public investment timing grants, we feel that it is the responsibility of the federal government to launch public works on a vast scale for the development of this country, for the elimination of unemployment, and for economic progress so that we might have a nation in which there is well-being and abundance for all our people.

I have tried to do what I suggest the two major spokesmen failed to do yesterday. They talked about the past. They tried to justify their respective positions. They did not tell us where we go from here on the important issues to which they referred. I have stated where we stand on these five major issues, and I believe the people of Canada have a right to know where the other parties in this house stand on these same important issues.

(Translation):

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, on April 5 last, the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) submitted to the Canadian people his first budget for the fiscal year 1955-56.

Upon reading that speech every one of us was utterly confused in our attempts to discover just where genuine tax relief could be found that would ease the burden of the average taxpayer and especially that of the workingman.

I do not see any point in discussing the matter any further. That budget, like all previous ones, tends to glorify the government in power rather than ease the burden of the poor taxpayer.

Like most Canadians, I would have preferred to be told what the government meant to do in the field of dominion-provincial relations, a matter the importance of which cannot be minimized, because on an equitable solution of that problem, a solution fair to the provinces, or on the centralization of all revenues in the hands of the central government depends the life or death first of the provincial governments and second of that great Canadian charter which we call the British North America Act.

As a result of the aroused public opinion, but especially because of the heroic resistance of the province of Quebec, the Prime Minister finally agreed to call together the representatives of the ten Canadian provinces in order to draft the necessary agenda for the talks scheduled for next October.

The federal Liberal government, obviously embarrassed by Quebec's autonomist attitude, is all at sea. Its plans to centralize all provincial powers in the hands of the federal government having failed almost completely, it has become worried to the point where it now wonders what will become of the Liberal government in view of so many contradictory stands. Its shameful bargaining has not given the expected results, and government circles are now wondering what scheme would best enable Ottawa to hang on to the greater part of provincial revenues, revenues that they went out to seek sometimes by guile, sometimes by compulsion and sometimes even by blackmail.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to review briefly the main events of the past few years in this field which is of vital importance to the survival of responsible governments in Canada, and to show the disloyal and objectionable tactics used by the government in power to achieve its shabby purpose.

On the occasion of world war II and in the face of the danger that threatened all the free nations of the world, the central government had to spend colossal, fabulous amounts which were claimed to be necessary for the defence of our territory and for the salvation of the world, of civilization and of Christianity.

Not only did all Canadians make untold sacrifices, even to immolation on the altar of democracy, but for several future generations their earnings and the nation's were staked on the outcome. In the face of that crisis, we can proudly say that every Canadian faithfully did his duty and contributed substantially to the preservation of peace in our country.

It is however recognized that the governments which administer the affairs of a nation in wartime, in a war such as the one we went through from 1939 to 1945, are short-lived and normally overthrown when the war comes to an end.

Knowing what all the consequences would be, the Liberal party used every imaginable means to cling to power, that power in which it revels, representing as it does a perennial source of security for all of its members and for large numbers of its most devoted followers.

Suddenly a brilliant idea came to the mind of a corporation lawyer who, because of his centralizing outlook and the blessings of the late Mr. Mackenzie King, had become minister of justice with a formal promise that he would accede to the leadership of the Liberal party and, thereby, become prime minister of Canada.

In order to ascend with such suddenness the golden or red steps leading to glory and to the Liberal party honours, a Canadian belonging to a minority group must of necessity abdicate certain principles to which he had until then been devoted, and renounce, as it were, his freedom of speech, so as to become the screen and the instrument of the majority—

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) is now saying that the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) abandoned his principles in order to become the head of the Liberal party. I do not believe that that is parliamentary language, and I submit the hon. member should withdraw what he has just said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I have not, as both hon. members know, been able to follow what has just been said by the hon. member for Quebec West. I am sure he will appreciate that personal charges of, not exactly insincerity, but improper motives, are not permitted in the House of Commons, in respect of any member of the house. Perhaps I might express the hope that the hon. member, in his criticism of the Prime Minister—and he has the right of course to criticize the Prime Minister's policies—has not imputed improper motives; and I would be glad, as I am sure would hon. members, to have his assurance on this point.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: If the rules of the house do not allow me to use expressions like the ones I have just used, I am prepared to withdraw them, and do so generously. Let me simply say, instead, that when a French-speaking Canadian becomes prime minister of Canada, he must needs make concessions like those which the present Prime Minister has made to the majority which surrounds him.

The first responsibility entrusted to the then new minister of justice, who had been dubbed leader of the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, since he was assuming this position as successor to the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, was to secure willingly acceptance of temporary mobilization, permanent mobilization and then conscription.

In spite of a quarter of a century of Liberal propaganda against that measure, in spite of all Liberal solemn promises and unparalleled violent outbursts against those who were then being referred to as "those damned Tories", causing my fellow countrymen to forget that, even though the Conservative government of 1917 was headed by the late Sir Robert Borden as prime minister, his coalition cabinet was nonetheless made up of a Liberal majority; in spite of the most sacred promises made to Quebec electors, particularly in view of the fact that 90 per cent of them had refused to relieve Mr. Mackenzie King of his promises, a whole past was repudiated, and people whose only fault had been to believe in the sacred word of the Liberals, who had so often misled them, were being pitilessly harried and violently pursued by objectionable means.

Although that campaign, which had been skilfully launched and led by the present Prime Minister, met with such poor success in Quebec, he nonetheless reaped his reward.

On the other hand, those who stood their ground and respected their sacred commitments were compelled to withdraw from the ranks of the Liberal party for insubordination and lack of party discipline. Two of them suffered; one Mr. P. J. A. Cardin died of grief, a victim of the treachery of those he had served so well for a lifetime; the other, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), to whom I pay tribute for his dignity, had to leave the cabinet and, ever since, has had to sit as a private member of the house.

In view of the way the province of Quebec was betrayed, my French-speaking countrymen openly and strongly asserted their resentment for those who had so odiously misled them and they were determined to take sweet revenge at the first opportunity.

However, still thirsty for power, the Liberals thought that they would have to find a way of appeasing those people who were obviously dissatisfied. To what trickery should they resort to make them forget their repudiations and their treachery? They had it in their bag. Although all provinces, and especially the province of Quebec, had been promised that the revenues they had agreed to surrender to the federal government were for the duration of the war only, the time had come to abuse their good faith and to refuse to hand them back the essential sources of revenue needed to meet their obligations and ensure their survival.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that they had found a way to go about it. Although a person who borrows money and refuses to give it back to the lender would be accused of theft and condemned as a criminal, the Liberal party, scoffing at the law, and thereby setting a shameful example, decided not to give back the money collected from the provinces, I would even say under false pretences, and decided to keep it, in order to appease the people with social legislation, for which they now take all the credit, and which would enable the party to win future elections.

And here let me state at once, as a warning to those who might be tempted to do so because I know that some people are careless with the truth, not to construe my remarks as meaning in any way that the member for Quebec West is opposed to social legislation. My record proves the contrary. All the social legislation enacted by the Quebec government has been brought about since the death of the Liberal party in our province and I have been one of those who, modestly but sincerely, requested that legislation, having taken part in all electoral campaigns against Liberals in my province for the past 25 years.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to proceed undisturbed with my speech and if—

Mr. Lesage: I was just going to ask—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed with my speech without interruption, and I ask the minister if he would kindly be seated.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. minister wishes to put a question to the hon. member for Quebec West who, at the same time, says that he wants to proceed with his speech without being interrupted. So!

Mr. Lesage: It is because he had forgotten—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be compelled to reply to a lot of interruptions.

Mr. Lapointe: Where were you at the time of the by-election in Beauce?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I want to assert before all Canada that the Liberal party, which boasts of administering the federal budget so as to give the people all kinds of social legislation from which it benefits, is shamelessly misleading the Canadian people.

True, it is paying family allowances, distributing old age pensions; it is contributing by grants to public health and education; all that is true. But what is even truer and what the people should know, is that the federal Liberal government is being generous with money that belongs to the provinces, money it has taken away from them by means which the rules of the house do not permit me to qualify; money which it refuses to hand back, in spite of the most solemn promises which are today being disregarded in the same way that Hitler in 1939 disregarded his agreements with Poland. To sum up, it is scattering with lavishness money which does not belong to the federal government but which, to use the expression of Liberal senator Jacob Nicol, has been stolen from the provinces.

The proof, Mr. Speaker, that such social legislation has no other purpose than to secure the votes and the confidence of the Canadian people is that during all the elections that have been held since the end of the war, the attention of the people and of the electors has been deliberately turned away from the actual problems of an administration which is gradually upsetting our economic stability. The only matters discussed have been those that can provide certain classes of society with financial advantages which, I repeat, are made possible by the money taken away from the provinces and which they refuse to give back to them. Today, as a result of an inconsistent administration, that same government, responsible for one of the worst unemployment situations which our country has known, is cynical enough to refuse to live up to its responsibilities. When in 1945 unemployment insurance benefits were established—and the worker is entitled to those benefits because he is sharing the cost with his employer—the federal government undertook to assume responsibility for the consequences which could result from an unemployment situation such as we are facing today.

While at this very moment, more than 700,000 Canadians are being crushed by the weight of their misery and cannot find employment, while those unemployed are growing restless and are crying for work to provide for their needs and for those of their family, we are witnessing here, Mr. Speaker, a sad and shameful performance.

We see the Liberal government refusing to assume the responsibility to which it has committed itself; it is playing football in a brazen, daring style, thereby adding to the grief and misery of the unemployed.

Now that more than ever the time is ripe to do something to prevent Canadians from going hungry, our strong protests are being laughed at. What is being done by those who truly have a sense of honour and who have at heart the welfare of the Canadian people?

While in thousands of homes people are going hungry, while poverty and hardship have invaded those homes, while in those same homes small children are suffering from the lack of basic necessities and are undernourished, while we are demanding for them not abundance but at least something to prevent them from starving to death, we are given the pathetic performance of Liberal members—most of them elected by those unfortunate unemployed—laughing at our demands. Mr. Speaker, they are showing by their attitude towards the unemployed an utter contempt which will be remembered, I am sure, at the next general election.

The Liberal government, now that it must face the sad and shameful fact of unemployment in a country having unlimited resources like ours, refuses, I repeat, to recognize its responsibilities. It wants others to share that burden to such an extent that they will be unable to agree, so that once more it will be in a position to cast upon others the blame it does not have the courage to accept or to face.

Have you ever seen a more inconsistent government, more impudent to say the least, than the one which is now scuttling the future of our great country?

Not satisfied with collecting practically all the country's revenue, thereby depriving the provinces and municipalities of the means necessary to their administration, it is now shirking its duty and the responsibilities it had agreed to assume. The Liberal government in Ottawa wants to make the Canadian people believe that assistance to the unemployed is the responsibility of the provinces and municipalities.

Can you imagine more impudence on the part of a government? Cynicism goes so far as to say that although the matter is the responsibility of the provinces and of the municipalities, the government is nonetheless willing to grant generous assistance. What generosity, Mr. Speaker, with money that does not belong to us.

I repeat what I have already said, unemployment is entirely a matter for the federal government to deal with. I therefore urge the government to give it the immediate attention it deserves. Let us forget about conferences and political football games, and hasten to feed the hungry. Petty political interests have never done any good to the people. I therefore insist that the government forget about security of power, at whose altar it worships, and look instead to the needs of the people for whom the word security has unfortunately lost all meaning. Let the government stop acting with a view to winning elections. That is not the proper objective of a political party; nor does it agree with the definition of the word democracy. May I remind the Liberal party that democracy means government for the people, and not party security!

Let us take a look now at the situation facing the federal Liberal party and into the reasons why it clings to its policy of centralization. Why is the party acting in such a way as to prevent the provinces from recovering those sources of revenue which were borrowed from them? Why is it bent on conserving them at any cost?

Because the provinces, if these sources of revenue were handed back to them, would naturally have more money—and by the way, is it not theirs?—and then they would be in a position to dispense benefits in the fields allotted to them by the Canadian constitution.

If the provinces recovered their own money, the federal government would have less and could not therefore continue to pay for the social legislation it has introduced with somebody else's money. As a result, the Liberals could no longer brag to the electors, because they would automatically be deprived of their platform. They would have to tax, and everybody knows that that is hardly popular among the people who are already too heavily burdened with taxation.

I believe I have sufficiently demonstrated, Mr. Speaker, that every irresponsible measure brought forward by the government was by no means directed to meet the needs of the people, but solely to win elections and to remain in power.

Again I say to the government: you are shutting your eyes so as not to see, and closing your ears so as not to hear that in Quebec city, more particularly in my riding, destitution and poverty have long since made their appearance and extend into the constituency of Quebec East, which the Prime Minister represents in this house.

What is the Prime Minister waiting for? When will he deal with this situation which cannot be tolerated any longer in his native city? On behalf of mothers and fathers overcome by poverty and dire need, I ask the Prime Minister in particular to show at least a bit of compassion and come to the aid of those unfortunate people! I urge the Prime Minister to give these hungry and ill-clothed children some solace and comfort. They are part of our human capital, the nation's future, and it is a crime to contribute to their slow and painful extermination.

Before looking for a permanent solution to the unemployment problem, which brings disaster to our homes and endangers the future of Canada, let us grant temporary assistance through the immediate implementation of the works project I have been asking for in this house for more than a year.

Quebec city and the surrounding area being the section of the country most affected by unemployment are clamouring for the public works I have been requesting ever since I was elected to this house.

Not only is the destitution of the unemployed disregarded, not only are they left without any means of livelihood, but the entire population of Quebec is allowed to be slowly poisoned by the St. Charles and Lairet rivers, which keep giving off their sickening stench, a constant hazard to the health of our fellow citizens.

What is the Prime Minister waiting for before he takes action? This is a most urgent problem and I have no doubt that if the mayor of Quebec city is here in Ottawa today, it is for the purpose of asking that the unemployed be given work. Once and for all, let the Prime Minister rid us of those open air dumps and sewers, which are a shame and a disgrace to Quebec city, and also, I repeat, a constant danger to public health.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member uses parliamentary language when he says that it is unworthy of the Prime Minister to do this or that. The hon. member said a moment ago that it was a crime for the Prime Minister to act in such a way. I wonder if all this is parliamentary language.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is quite indecent.

Mr. Dufresne: I have never said that the Prime Minister was a criminal. I did not mean either that he was unworthy. All I said, and say again—I hope the minister is listening closely this time—was that, if the Prime Minister's residence happened to be near those foul sewers, in his county, instead of on Quebec heights, on Grande-Allee, in Quebec South county, he would soon realize that it is unworthy of a prime minister to let human beings inhale this noxious stench.

Mr. Lesage: That is what I mean.

Mr. Dufresne: I did not say he was. I mean that if he were there, he would realize that.

Mr. Lesage: It's a smelly interpretation.

Mr. Dufresne: If the minister were residing in that area, instead of the attractive part of the city, on Citadel heights, he would find out that the smell is not altogether pleasant and he would probably make representations to the cabinet and ask the Prime Minister, on behalf of his electors, to rid them of these open sewers.

Once again, I want to state the general feeling of our workers. These good workers are not asking for handouts or for direct relief from the government. They have inherited from their forefathers their industry and they want to pass it on to their children and their children's children. They want to have the satisfaction of earning their daily bread, and that of their family, by the sweat of their brow and by making use of those working abilities which Providence has given them.

Perhaps I have been a little harsh on the government and the Prime Minister, but I feel it is about time someone stood up in this house and spoke on behalf of the hungry. This is no time for flowery speeches.

Some hon. Members: Ha! ha!

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, do you hear those intelligent guffaws from representatives of people who are now writing them hundreds of letters each day, asking for something to eat. This is no laughing matter.

Mr. Lesage: It is permissible to laugh.

Mr. Dufresne: To me, those guffaws of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources are ludicrous and unseemly. One would think he had taken leave of his senses.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I don't consider it unseemly to laugh at a member who is having a good time indulging in clownishness in this house.

Mr. Dufresne: I thank the hon. minister for his statement. At a time when the government is being asked to feed the hungry, and to undertake work projects so that there might be bread on the tables of the needy, the hon. member for Quebec West is said to be indulging in clownishness. I take due note of that remark by the minister, and I hope that newspapers in the province will feature in bold headlines those very words of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources who, unfortunately, for a moment, has just lost his bearings. For the gratification of my hon. friend, I will merely say that I have perhaps been somewhat hard on the government and the Prime Minister—

Mr. Boisvert: Not at all!

Mr. Dufresne: Not too much?

Mr. Boisvert: No, no. Keep it up!

Mr. Dufresne: I am glad to know that the hon. member for Nicolet did not feel involved.

Mr. Lesage: Knowing where it came from—

Mr. Dufresne: But, aware as I am that it is time something was done about it, I am speaking on behalf of the hungry. This is not a time for rhetoric— and I hope I have not been guilty of any—but it is a time for action, and I made these remarks knowing that, as a member of this house, I was doing the duty I undertook to fulfil.

Mr. Speaker, if the government votes millions to assist other nations whose economy needs restoring, and to prevent their enslavement by communism, I am all for it. But I am praying the Lord to mould the minds of our leaders and make them realize that, if it is their duty to prevent other nations from falling under the sway of materialistic and godless bolshevism, they will have to legislate in such a way that Canada may stop this hideous plague of communism from implanting deeper roots among our fine Canadian people.

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly, go ahead.

Mr. Lesage: Did the hon. member not support the Liberal party in 1945 and, more particularly, did he not take part in a by-election campaign—in the county of Beauce, I think—as a Liberal party member?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I had been told so many wonderful things about the Liberal party that I thought it necessary to see for myself. I took a jaunt about that party, but was so disgusted with the things that went on that I rushed out of there and returned to the true fold of common sense.

Is the hon. minister satisfied with my answer?

Mr. Lesage: I asked, because at that time, you were criticizing on the Liberal side.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Before I leave the chair, may I invite all hon. members and our colleagues of the press to come to my chambers so that we may perhaps argue some of the points which have not yet been touched on.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate I am impelled first of all to join my colleagues in congratulating the minister on the first budget he has brought down. It discloses evidence of deep and considered attention to every phase of our economy and is almost characteristic of the minister's personality because in it he reflects cautious yet ingenious study but always with an eye to the well-being of our people. Those with a political axe to grind must of necessity, even though microscopically, seek reasons to criticize it, but I feel that deep down also in opposition hearts there is a secret admiration for the minister and his splendid budget, for which the entire country is grateful.

I should like to turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the two subjects which have principally engaged the attention of the house since the opening of the present session, unemployment and immigration. Neither of these two have by any means been satisfactorily solved. It is my respectful submission that, considered separately, it is difficult to solve them because, in my humble opinion, they are basically interdependent upon each other for solution, and since both of them seriously affect the overall national economy they are appropriate subjects for examination during a budget debate.

I therefore offer to the house some observations to indicate first the degree of interdependence of the one upon the other and then to suggest that in dealing with them jointly some progress might be made towards their solution.

I should like first of all to refer in a general way to a number of complaints that repeatedly come before parliament affecting these two subjects. We are told almost annually that a large portion of the wheat crop cannot be easily sold. The dairy farmers lack markets to absorb their produce. The coal mined in the maritime provinces is crying for customers and mines are virtually at a standstill. The lumber output for 1953 was too high for the market then available. Thousands of people are laid off by the railways, and we hear constant complaints from the struggling textile industry, as we did this afternoon from the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. White).

All these, Mr. Speaker, create an alarming growth of unemployment that cannot be lightly brushed off by the words "seasonal" or "functional". We should explore the basic causes of these problems and attempt to find a basic remedy.

Let us first of all examine the western farmers' quest for wheat markets. They grow much more wheat now than they did previously, although the number of farmers has not increased. This, of course, is largely due to mechanization. To sell this ever-increasing output there must be consumers at home or abroad. Satisfactory export markets are becoming more difficult to find. What then will the farmers do with the surplus wheat?

Does the house realize, for example, that every 100,000 people require 16 million loaves of bread yearly? By simple mathematical calculation it becomes obvious that sufficient people in Canada could turn the wheat growers' nightmare into a dream without having to depend on substantial foreign markets or on handout subsidies from the people of Canada.

The same applies to the dairy farmers in so far as their surplus butter, cheese and other products are concerned. More people in Canada supplying more domestic appetites and more domestic consumers of produce will certainly bring smiles to the faces of the dairy farmers. The advent of oil and dieselization is largely responsible for increased unemployment for coal miners, and cripples an industry that is already limping badly. Waves of new immigrants, many of whom may settle in the maritimes, will not only revive but will stimulate coal mining as an inexpensive fuel and restore employment for many of our coal miners.

The lumber industry, Mr. Speaker, is another poignant example of the urgent need for more immigrants. The president of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association called for a voluntary reduction—and I emphasize the expression—a voluntary reduction in output for 1954 because, he said, the 1953 production was not absorbed by the available market. Reduction in output means increased unemployment. The converse is equally true. Adequate markets mean increased production. More production provides increased employment.

Then the textile industry, we know, is suffering badly. Customers are its very lifeblood, and unless it receives a so-called shot in the arm large numbers of textile workers are facing unemployment. Does the house realize the extent to which technological advances have reduced employment in this industry? I am told that a factory's capacity, formerly requiring 100 employees working 40 hours per week, is now produced in half the time requiring approximately half the number of workers. To further aggravate the plight of textile manufacturers, it appears that notwithstanding all the legislation which we may enact it is impossible to stem the flow of American textiles into Canada. Consequently, without an export market and with the competition of low-priced textiles, there is little breathing space for Canadian manufactured textiles.

Most other industries in Canada are struggling with similar difficulties. Our markets are shrinking. Japan and Germany have now vigorously re-entered the export field. If a permanent peace is reached with the iron curtain countries, they too will seek additional foreign markets. With low priced labour in these countries we will find increasing difficulty in competing with them for foreign trade. That is a fact, Mr. Speaker, and almost all hon. members who have spoken in this debate have agreed upon this fact. We cannot, therefore, afford to ignore it. It is a hard and cruel fact. We may not like it, and we do not, yet it is one that we must seriously wrestle with.

What is the answer to dwindling foreign markets? To me there is but one answer. Markets we must have. If we cannot have them abroad we must have them at home, and these must be developed and maintained at the same rate and at the same pace with our production. Unless this is done our entire economy is seriously jeopardized. This largely explains our present unemployment problem causing the country much distress. It is my respectful opinion that providing spasmodic relief for unemployment by way of subsidies, unemployment insurance, increased public works or any form of social welfare relief is, as the Quebec premier quite properly termed it, only a palliative. They are definitely not cures. We must seek and find definite cures. To find them, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that we should meet the serious problem squarely head on. We should stop dodging it as we have been doing for years. We should nationally take a forthright look at ourselves in the mirror. We may be astonished at what we will see.

We will realize, Mr. Speaker, that our 15 million people are living at a national cost that could easily sustain a population of at least 30 million. For example, I am told that it costs about $60,000 to build an average mile of highway in Canada. It costs the United States, immediately across the border, the same amount to build a similar mile of highway. Yet, by ratio, a mile of highway in Canada services only 100 automobiles by comparison with 1,000 serviced in the United States.

The railroads offer a sharper illustration. It costs as much to build a mile of railway in Canada as it does in the United States. The figure, I believe, is about $100,000 per mile. Yet, the same mile of railway is put to much greater use in the United States than it is in Canada. Statements were made on the floor of the house that large numbers of railroad employees have been laid off. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is always so genuinely and extremely concerned about these matters, asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) during one of the debates, "to allay fears of further Canadian National lay-offs". The minister explained that the officials are most anxious to hire the men, and will in fact hire them as soon as the traffic improves. Sure, the hon. member's fears might be allayed if he and the members of his party will help to provide traffic for the railroad. But they will certainly not do so by supporting a program of selective immigration, as does the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis.) They will have to be more generous than that in their views on immigration.

Do they not realize, Mr. Speaker, that the lay-off is directly due to a lack of sufficient people in the country to use our expensive and costly railway systems. The two transcontinental railroads could, with present equipment or with little added rolling stock, handle at least two or three times the volume of their present traffic. This additional volume would certainly not only prevent lay-offs, but would moreover provide additional employment. Must there, Mr. Speaker, be only three or four daily trains between Montreal and Ottawa, and only two trains daily between Ottawa and Toronto or between any other similar terminals? This may be sufficient for the present population.

In the United States, on the other hand, there are trains between comparable centres every hour on the hour. We have the roadbeds in Canada. We have the rolling stock, but, alas, we do not have the traffic. If we had the population more trains would run, more people would travel, more freight would be carried, and thus many more railroad people would be employed.

The same thing applies to all our other public utilities, be it our canals, telegraph lines, harbours, air terminals or the seaway. The cost of operating these services, as well as the cost of government, defence, public works, and social welfare would also be more economically sound, following the well known economic theory that increased volume reduces cost.

The fact is that our present per capita overhead is out of proportion with that of other countries. The sooner we have the courage to recognize it, the sooner will we realize that only a greater number of taxpayers can distribute these carrying charges more equitably and to a proper ratio.

We speak with a sense of pride, Mr. Speaker, about our having astonished the world by our productive capacity. But we must realize that unless we provide consumers who absorb our production, we are actually in danger of being crippled by this industrial colossus which we have ourselves created. It seems to me that our increasing productivity, stimulated by technology and science, without adequate markets, will progressively constrict our economy and accelerate our tempo of unemployment to the point that our manufacturing needs in Canada today will require only a fraction of our present labour force to produce.

I repeat and emphasize, Mr. Speaker, our productive ability has actually outraced our consuming and marketing capacity to a point that may ultimately strangle us. It is like a spiral working its way inwardly towards the choking centre and is extremely dangerous.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker; we are just a tiny country populationwise and yet we are one of the largest producers in the world. We make nearly everything, aeroplanes, tanks, ships, locomotives, atomic products and so forth. We are one of the world's largest suppliers of aluminum, wheat, nickel, asbestos, gold and other minerals. We enjoy the reputation of having made more progress in the last 50 years than any other country in the world, and yet despite all that we have an aggravated unemployment problem.

In our position, we should be the last country in the world with this type of headache. It is not a natural consequence of our progress. Quite the contrary, it is a most unnatural one and should disturb us as to its cause. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that whilst we have raced ahead in every field of productivity, we have been woefully delinquent in the one thing that could sustain this development. We have failed to keep our population growing collaterally with our other levels of progress.

There seems to be an underlying fear of more people in Canada. Whether or not this emanates from labour circles I am not sure, but it does exist. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, its very existence is a disservice to the future well-being of our country. This fear, I believe, is the basic reason for this menacing imbalance in our entire national economy.

This is indeed a painful situation, Mr. Speaker, and forebodes increasing national problems unless vigorous and courageous steps are promptly taken to remedy it. I therefore, respectfully urge that we now accelerate our activities to make up for lost time and bend every effort to return to a proper balance our growth in population with our growth in industrial and scientific development.

This urgency is abundantly supported by Canadian public opinion. I have in my files a collection of editorials and statements from the press across Canada calling for more people. It will be most informative to hon. members to briefly review some of them, and with the indulgence of the house I would proceed to do so. I start by quoting from an article and editorial appearing in a paper on the west coast.

I quote from the Cowichan Leader of Duncan, British Columbia, for December 30, 1954:

> If we could wish Canada any one thing in particular for the New Year it would be a record-breaking immigration wave . . .
> We need immigrants. We can never develop fully without many millions more. The year 1955 is a good time to start, now that we are taking the lid off our large treasure house of resources.

And from the east of Canada, quoting editorially from the Truro, Nova Scotia, News of January 3, 1955:

> The case for immigration is simple. In peacetime, "New Canadians" mean enlarged domestic markets for Canadian products barred by restrictive trade practices from export markets . . .
> In wartime . . . "New Canadians" are a source of strength to this country's manpower resources.

Then the Kelowna Courier of June 21, 1954, states editorially:

> Canada needs more, not fewer immigrants; indeed it is ridiculously underpopulated at present, and this is reflected in a domestic market which is so small as to hamper both industry and agriculture. The Okanagan, for instance, would have no marketing problem if Canada had a population of thirty or forty million.

And from the Bowmanville, Ontario, Canadian Statesman of January 21, 1954:

> A greater population for Canada affords the solution of so many national problems, that it astounds thinkers on the subject that it is not more vigorously attacked and pursued by government on all levels.

The Hamilton Spectator of March 7, 1955, states editorially:

> Canada can now produce far more than our people can consume. The larger our population, the larger the Canadian market—and the more jobs and better pay.

Then the Swift Current, Saskatchewan, Sun, of February 10, 1954, states editorially:

> So long as immigration progresses at a snail's pace, economic independence for Canada from the vagaries of the export market will not soon be realized.
> Why this timidity about immigration? Surely people, and more people and still more people is the only answer to the problem of markets.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Charles Daley, minister of labour in Ontario, is quoted in the Port Arthur News-Chronicle of December 29, 1954, as follows:

> Canada needs more immigrants for her expanding economy, development of her domestic market and the spreading of her national overhead over more people.

Editorially the paper continues:

> Such views are both sound and timely. Just how timely is indicated by Mr. Daley's statement that in Ontario alone, since 1949, over 350 new industries have been established by immigrants from the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany and other countries.
> Number one target for tomorrow in Canada should be more people.

The Montreal Star of November 13, 1953, reports the statement of Mr. J. D. Ferguson, president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, as follows:

> Canadians are acting like a bunch of ostriches . . . They depend on the sale of goods to other countries for 24 per cent of their income, and Americans for only six per cent.
> Accordingly, Canada, to raise its standard, must either assure itself of its foreign markets and increase them, or else create a domestic market.

And from Ottawa, quoting the Canadian Labour Journal for January, 1954:

> With some adjusting of our economy, and a larger population, a much greater home market could be developed in Canada which would free us to a great extent from our present dependence on foreign markets as outlets for our products.

It is interesting to observe, Mr. Speaker, that much of this vast wave of public opinion some 25 or 30 years ago opposed immigration into Canada. Of course the times have changed, and the circumstances and conditions today most certainly justify this change in public opinion.

Some labour circles, however, do not go completely along with these views. They seem to prefer a slower and more selective form of immigration. They are apprehensive that immigrants would crowd the labour market. I would like to say that I would be the first to oppose any move that might be harmful to the workers of this country. In this instance, however, I do not share their view, because they seem to place the emphasis on the immediate consequences of increased immigration, while I prefer to take the longer-range view.

It is true that there may be some pockets of employment during the adjustment period, although I feel that it would not be worse than it is at the present time. But in the long run, Mr. Speaker, immigration would prove to be a great boon not only to our labour force but to the over-all future of our country whose well-being is our first concern.

There seems to be a view that immigrants may deprive Canadians of their jobs. I would like to attempt to explode this bogey. In 1953 I believe some 200 fur workers in the Montreal area were unemployed. They blamed this on the government for having that year admitted 194,000 immigrants, among whom they said there were some 200 fur workers who grabbed their jobs at sacrifice salaries. They therefore urged that immigration to Canada be stopped.

At first blush their complaint seemed to have a basis. What they did not realize however was that these immigrants were also 194,000 potential users of fur coats, since our climate calls for the use of fur coats. That, they completely forgot, or they completely overlooked. The immediate problem may have existed; there may have been some dislocation for the fur workers; but in the long run there were 194,000 additional fur coat customers in Canada, which would provide work in the years ahead for many more than just 200 fur workers.

This is so true of every other commodity produced in Canada and is abundantly confirmed by authorities on the subject and public opinion across Canada, some of which I would like to quote briefly.

The first quotation is from the Letter-Review of April 7, 1952—as far back as 1952—published in Fort Erie, Ontario, which states:

> Unemployment, in part seasonal, is causing leaders of labour unions to press for restriction of immigration. This is a short sighted policy advocated regularly by economic illiterates.
> More immigration, not less, is the cure for unemployment. Every immigrant is a new customer for the products of Canadian industry and agriculture, increasing opportunities for employment in all parts of the country.

I quote now from the Winnipeg Tribune of December 18, 1954, in which G. S. Thorvaldson, Q.C., president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, states that "experience through the years had shown that immigration creates jobs rather than unemployment".

Again I would like to quote the Hon. Charles Daley who, on November 25, 1954, is quoted in the Grimsby Independent as follows:

> Immigration in the long run creates work for others in Canada rather than taking jobs away from others.

And from the Amherst, Nova Scotia, Daily News of December 21, 1953, speaking editorially:

> The truth, of course, is that immigrants make jobs; that instead of an immigrant taking away a job from somebody born or already here, he actually makes more jobs for him.
> That, in its simplest form, is the case for more immigrants.

Then from the Windsor, Ontario, Daily Star of August 7, 1954:

> In normal times the argument that immigrants take jobs from other people is fallacious. Because they create, by their purchasing power, as many jobs as they take—or more.

Then my final quotation is from the Winnipeg Tribune of February 25, 1954, which contained an editorial which stated in part:

> During the past few years there has been a growing outcry from certain quarters to restrict immigration on the ground that newcomers grabbed jobs and caused unemployment. The government should ignore these outcries. The fact is that Canada needs more people to help the country develop and to provide stable markets for industrial and agricultural products.

To bulwark these opinions I should like to offer a few figures. Since the end of the war Canada has admitted over one million people. During this period we enjoyed years of reasonable prosperity, as one hon. member who spoke today clearly stated. The Financial Post made a survey which partly explains this prosperity. It points out that these immigrants produced a market for some 210,000 houses, 220,000 radios, 100,000 passenger cars, 100,000 refrigerators, 200,000 washing machines, besides food, clothing and everyday requirements.

There was little or no unemployment during the waves of immigration into Canada. Apparently our accelerated production is now catching up with our almost stagnant Canadian consumer market and our dwindling foreign market, and I fear that our problems will grow progressively worse until we compensate or create the necessary replacement markets.

We in Canada speak with the greatest pride of our God-given natural resources. We are fortunate to possess them, but let us recognize that the greatest natural resource of them all is not that which is buried in the ground but that which walks upon it in the form of human beings and is able to convert the buried treasures into their real national asset. Let us also realize that it is the people of a country that represent its very strength and its very life and develop its future.

What, after all, has contributed most to make the United States the world's greatest nation? Its natural resources? Or its people? It was the continuous waves of immigration between 1890 and 1910 that enabled our neighbour to the south to become the leading nation in the world; not its natural resources but its people, uniquely its people.

Therefore I urge respectfully that a courageous change in our immigration policy should be promptly and seriously considered. It should be altered from a negative to a positive approach. Our policy should direct the immigration inspectors to examine prospective immigrants with a view to finding grounds to admit them rather than to ferret out reasons to exclude them. There are thousands of prospective immigrants waiting. The department has the applications but processing is delayed because policy does not permit the officials to deal with them. What a pity!

Among those who are waiting are many highly trained technicians, skilled craftsmen and families of substance, but they are excluded because they do not yet fall within the so-called admissible categories. These must be changed. We should stop playing around with categories and with choking restrictions and display the dauntless courage of our convictions. Additional staff should be hired if necessary to expedite processing and a vigorous assault should be made on every possible source of immigrants.

Our fast-growing country, our vast industrial potential, our advancing standard of living and our defence requirements create a voracious appetite for people. This appetite cannot be satiated by a spoon-fed immigration program. No, not by a mere selective trickle of immigrants will we meet our country's ever-increasing need for people. We need millions, not hundreds or thousands, but millions.

Our approach should frankly be that we seek and want immigrants, and if they are in good health, if they meet our security requirements and have integrating possibilities, they should be welcomed. Our immigration officials are compelled by regulations to make decisions which I know they wish were otherwise. I know they would personally be much happier men if they could say "yes" more frequently than "no". A change in policy and regulations should be made to make this possible and help produce the results we seek.

It is my respectful submission that if we are really to benefit from our vast natural resources, we should not deal with them in a dog in the manger fashion. Some countries live behind an iron curtain; let us not behave as though we have dropped at our ports of entrance a golden curtain behind which we Canadians gloat and past which no one but the select can enter.

On the other hand I am convinced that only a generous lifting of this golden curtain, together with a farsighted and courageous immigration program, will enable us to enjoy the blessings of a happy country. More people will provide an abundance of consumer markets. This will sustain an abundance of production, and this in turn will provide an abundance of employment. This program will in addition help build our defences, assist in lowering our per capita overhead cost of maintaining our ever-increasing national responsibilities, and cumulatively shower upon our country heavenly benedictions for sharing with our brethren in greater numbers the bounteous natural resources which the Almighty has placed in our trust.

Mr. Fernand Girard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, before going on with my speech I would like to give a friendly welcome to the new member in our corner. While he is sitting to the left he is not a leftist member. If there are any others who feel that they would like to come here, they will be welcomed. We do not accept everyone, but we need some good members.

Mr. Speaker, during the next few minutes I would like to raise a problem which is now stirring public opinion in the province of Quebec, a problem which only Ottawa can solve equitably.

I do not intend speaking at length on the budget, because I fully approve the judicious remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin). As independent members of the house, we have, although with some reservations, deemed it our duty to support the present budget, because it is a step toward lowering of taxes. We regret, however, that the minister left aside other important matters, such as increasing the basic exemption for personal income tax, decreasing extravagant government expenditures, finding an efficient solution to the unemployment problem, and adjusting family allowances in conformity with the rate intended by the government in 1945 and the spirit in which they were enacted, from which they have strayed as a result of the increase in the cost of living during the past seven years. However, we believed that by supporting the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), we might be able to bring him to decrease government expenditures, which are truly extravagant.

Mr. Speaker, the matter I would like to bring to the attention of the house relates to the name of the future Canadian National hotel in Montreal.

I understand that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) have received numerous requests from every corner of the province and even from outside, asking that the hotel be called "Chateau Maisonneuve". If my information is correct I believe that over 200,000 protests and representations have been or will be received by the Canadian National. I have personally received several hundreds of them; that is why I am rising to support the project.

Mr. Speaker, why do we want a French name for this Montreal hotel? I hardly feel it necessary to indicate any reasons here since they all seem so perfectly evident, the point at issue being the respect due to the rights of the French-speaking citizens of this country, within the confines of their own home.

We want a French name for the very reason, no doubt, which has prompted the officials of the Canadian National Railways to refuse it. It is clear that the company has been guilty of no excessive zeal with regard to the respect of the confederative rights of the two great races of this country.

May I add that as far as the immediate interests of the tourist trade go, a French name would certainly be preferable, financially, since it is the very French character of the province of Quebec—where this future hotel is to be built—which constitutes an attraction for American tourists.

On behalf of various tourist trade promotion groups campaigns have already been launched in order to ensure that our Quebec cities and towns retain that French character which business interests are unfortunately causing them to lose.

There is already a Queen's hotel in Montreal; a second one would create confusion. Personally, I dare say that a queen must prefer having her name honoured elsewhere than in the commercial field.

Mr. Speaker, is it not unfortunate that, on matters which may seem so unimportant, we should have to create a movement of opinion in the midst of an entire population, as is the case in relation to the name to be given to that hotel?

Why is it that in addition to their normal legislative functions, French-Canadian members must insist so often upon the respect of the rights of the French-speaking element with respect to details, perhaps, but which are nevertheless important because of their dangerous recurrence?

We may be insisting upon many matters which may look trivial when compared to the great problems which confront our nation but it must be realized that the accumulation of little injustices encroach dangerously upon the sacred rights of the French-speaking population.

French Canadians would not deserve the title of true Canadians if they did not exert themselves to remain true to themselves, thereby contributing to the enrichment of our Canadian spirit.

Imagine for one moment that a French name were to be given a large Toronto hotel; maybe then our state of mind would be understood.

Our constitution and our government acknowledge, of course, the French fact and its handsome contribution to the cultural vitality of our country, but we must fight constantly and frequently to obtain constitutional bilingualism on a bit of a cheque.

The government treats us as equal partners in the development of our country, but its public service won't give us more than 13 per cent of its higher positions.

French is one of the official languages in our country, but on the very floor of this parliament it is spoken by only a few, at the risk of not being understood by the majority.

Furthermore, in order to show that we must fight always, even though the French fact is recognized by the constitution, I quote the following from page 2 of the Montreal Gazette of yesterday:

(Text):

Decision of the Senate-Commons committee currently studying capital and corporal punishment to hear evidence from one of Canada's two official hangmen, raises new problems. The official in question, Quebec's own official executioner, is reported to speak only French.

If indeed our rights were recognized, it should read instead that as the official representatives of our bilingual country were not able to understand one of the official languages, that had caused some difficulty. As a matter of fact, the recognition of our rights with regard to bilingualism should not be practised at the bottom but at the top.

Of course, we are at home within the confederation, but it is made unbearable for us. There is always a "but" implied in a thousand details, which is perhaps unpleasant for the house, but much more so for those who suffer from them and those who have to denounce them.

There might be the temptation to apply the famous speech from Rostand's L'Aiglon "Not a prisoner, but"; when talking of our people. There is always a "but", which is the only real obstacle to national unity, a "but" that fathers separatism, a "but" that keeps us constantly on the defensive, a "but" that stops us from co-operating openly in the normal process of our national destiny.

It is from Ottawa that the initiative must come for the removal of this "but" that is jeopardizing national unity in this country. By asking the Canadian National Railways to agree to give a French name to a hotel being built in one of the largest French cities in the world, this government would make a gesture of fairness and national unity. Therefore, in concluding my remarks, I would like to make a personal appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who cannot refuse his fellow countrymen not a favour but the recognition of their rights. He cannot refuse his intervention for a measure which not only is in the interest of the future hotel itself, but constitutes a safeguard for the sacred rights of the French-Canadian people.

Mr. Robert Perron (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, the economic slowdown in this country over the past fiscal year has been mainly due to the poor wheat crop in the west. Or so, at least, the Minister of Finance's budget speech would have us believe.

I would like to call to the attention of the government the fact that the crop in the province of Quebec has been no better. Because of constant rains throughout the summer our farmers, who have had great difficulty in seeding last fall, have had almost complete failures. I do not think it exaggerated to state that, at least in my county and adjacent counties, the crop has been just about one-fourth of what it generally is and that the grain produced is of inferior quality.

This has possibly not influenced the national gross product in as spectacular a fashion as the poor wheat crop in the west, but it has nevertheless placed the farmers of our rural counties in a difficult position. They are faced at this time with a shortage of good quality seed grain. This short supply means that the seed will cost more, so that farmers will have to spend hundreds of dollars more than before for spring seeding.

The situation is serious and many farmers do not expect to be able to sow their fields, which would be a disaster for themselves and for the economy in general.

Other members of the house have mentioned that situation, in particular the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault). The member for Bonaventure writes excellent books but sometimes makes bad speeches. He told the house about the situation in the province of Quebec on the agricultural front, but it is to the provincial government that he applied for help. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that he would have been wiser to put to good use the marked influence he exerts upon the federal government and ask it to take action to solve that very acute problem.

And he might have put forward numerous precedents. To mention only two cases, when Nova Scotia apple producers were heavily hit and when the western farmers needed help recently, the central government was not reluctant to grant them the help called for in such predicaments. I do not see why, when it is the farmer in the province of Quebec who needs help, the federal government should not be as liberal as it has been elsewhere, in the face of a situation which is exactly the same and which is due to identical causes.

Therefore I ask the government to provide them with some assistance, in co-operation with the different agricultural organizations of our province, either by way of loans—for our farmers do not want handouts—or by way of subsidies.

There is no doubt that the prosperity of our farmers is the very basis of the general prosperity of our country; as a matter of fact, unemployment is directly connected with and due to our agricultural recession. It will come to an end at the same time as the agricultural depression.

If you read the report of last year's operations under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, R.S.C., 1952, chapter 110, you will see that the loans to farmers, and guaranteed by the government, have gone down by $35 million in 1954. In other words they were reduced from $98 million in 1953 to $63 million in 1954, a difference of $35 million. These figures are clear enough, and show how the farmer is in need of money, either to buy agricultural implements, improve livestock, or to carry out certain building and improvement projects on the farm.

The effect of that situation is to paralyse the general economy of this country, and this is why the government should not hesitate to help eastern farmers who had a poor crop last year, in order to solve the economic problems of this country and prevent them from getting worse.

To go on with my suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the government should not amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act so that it might be possible to ensure the loans of money needed by the farmers in the spring for their seed purchases.

The loans made to date, under this legislation passed in 1945, amount to $513 million, and the loans which the government is called upon to reimburse, according to its guarantee, amount to only $149,814, which is a very insignificant figure, that is, 1/30 of 1 per cent. This means that loans to farmers are very secure investments. They are probably the best the government could make.

At all events, if the government decided to amend the law in this way, I would be pleased to vote in favour of the amendment.

There is another question I would like to deal with briefly and which concerns the price of pulpwood in the province. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the price of pulpwood is much too low when compared with the cost of paper.

The hon. member for Bonaventure suggested a minimum price of $15 per cord. Objectively speaking, being one who has never bought or sold any, I believe that the price should be much higher, in the neighbourhood of $25 or $30. When paper was cheaper, indeed much cheaper, companies paid from $25 to $30 per cord. In my opinion, such an amount would be fair to the farmers and settlers of the province. However, prices offered by the companies during the last season have been extremely low, so much so that the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had an inquiry made to ascertain whether there was collusion between the various companies to fix the sale price, so as to do away with competition. I congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice for having instituted that inquiry.

I am sure that this thing will be inquired into with that earnestness and that fair-mindedness typical of such inquiries.

However I should like to refer to a point which I note in the speech of the hon. member for Bonaventure, and which shows that my hon. friend was not in earnest. Here are his words as reported on page 3248 of Hansard for April 28:

2. I respectfully urge—

The hon. member wanted the provincial government to set a minimum price. I quote:

I respectfully urge the Hon. Maurice Duplessis, premier of the province of Quebec, and the members of his government, to adopt an order in council fixing the minimum price to be paid to pulpwood producers in the province of Quebec. Such a minimum price would have to be at least $15 a cord, delivered at a truck loading site, for the eastern part of the province.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada is most assuredly one of the most learned members of the Canadian bar. With your permission—if I may be allowed to digress—I would like to point out that this year marks the fiftieth anniversary of his admission to the bar of the province of Quebec. This happy occasion will be observed in Quebec city next Saturday, at the same time as the similar anniversary of the chief justice of Quebec, and of other distinguished members of the bench and bar. Chief Justice Albert Sevigny, by the way, once sat as Conservative member for Dorchester in this house before becoming its Speaker, a position which you now occupy with such dignity and which he himself also occupied with great dignity.

I would like to avail myself of this opportunity, even though the Prime Minister is not in the house at this time, to offer him my congratulations and my best wishes for a long and happy life.

To come back to the point, the member for Bonaventure has asked the provincial government to set the price of the wood at $15 a cord. I wanted to state that he had committed a great legal heresy when he made that statement and that the legal sense of the Prime Minister must have been shocked by such a request on the part of a government member.

No doubt about it, from the legal and constitutional point of view, no government has the right to fix the selling price of a given product unless as a measure of national emergency, as was the case during the last war when the federal government fixed and froze prices, under the authority granted by the War Measures Act. Outside of that, apart from those measures of national emergency, the fixing of prices is a legal impossibility under the system which now prevails in Canada.

Mr. Arsenault: May I direct a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Perron: Not now. I am coming to my conclusion and I have only a few more words to say. You may do so when I am finished.

In my opinion, the only way to act in the matter was to make an inquiry, as was done, and besides to ask the lumber companies to increase the prices paid to farmers, prices which are ridiculously low when compared with the price of paper and those companies' financial statements. There is nothing we can do now but wait for the result of that investigation, which will be properly carried out, I am sure.

Before resuming my seat, I beg the government to do everything in its power to tackle the agricultural problem prevailing throughout the country, thereby solving the economic problem of all Canadians.

Mr. Arsenault: Can the hon. member tell me whether it is the duty of the Quebec provincial government to do something for people who sell and produce pulpwood? Second, why did the government of the province of Quebec deem it advisable to set a maximum price for newsprint in the province? Third, why did the present premier of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Duplessis, consider, twenty years ago, on May 12, 1935, that it was the duty of the Taschereau government to set the prices that should be paid farmers and settlers for their pulpwood?

Mr. Perron: As for the first question, Mr. Speaker, I don't think that the hon. member for Bonaventure is able to prove that the government of the province of Quebec has ever fixed the price for newsprint. I don't think he is able to produce an order in council fixing the price for pulp or newsprint in the province of Quebec.

I know that some years ago the premier of the province of Quebec asked the newsprint companies for a special rate on sales to newspapers in the province of Quebec, as he had also for the price of pulpwood. If I remember well, recently, at a convention held in the winter, the premier of the province of Quebec asked pulpwood companies to increase their price on wood bought from farmers and settlers.

I don't want to add to the discussion, but I feel that the hon. member was mistaken when he suggested that the government of Quebec was going to fix a floor price on pulpwood. That would be incompatible with free trade and the economic system under which we live.

As for the second question, I did not understand it very well. I do not remember what the premier of Quebec said in 1935. If the hon. member had a text, I might perhaps answer him. Now, under the circumstances, I must say, in the words of Lafontaine: "I was not born yet".

Mr. Arsenault: So you admit that the provincial government cannot do anything for the farmers or settlers?

Mr. Perron: I did not catch that.

Mr. Arsenault: You are saying that the provincial government will not do anything by way of increasing the price of pulpwood for either the farmers or the settlers.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Perron: I admit that the provincial government can recommend to the pulpwood companies to pay higher prices, but there is the free interplay of competition to be considered, when it comes to buying or selling pulpwood. The federal government has made inquiries as to whether the corporations had set up a combine to prevent competition, which could result in the increase of pulpwood prices in the province of Quebec. This is precisely what is being investigated. I also believe this to be the only legal and constitutional means provided by our economic system.

Mr. Arsenault: Does the hon. member not know that in Ontario pulpwood producers have been protected by law since 1937?

(Text):

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, apparently topics for the budget debate are not exhausted. It is my intention this evening to talk about the weather and perhaps to be a bit unusual by suggesting it is possible that, in this case, we may be able to do something about it. Available meteorological records indicate that over the past three years there have been some of the most astounding and unusual storms, tornadoes, floods and droughts in the history of the world. Lack of reliable information on the effect which thermonuclear explosions may have on the weather, aside from their effect on human beings, raises doubts and fears in the minds of people everywhere. People everywhere are asking for the facts, and I submit they are not getting them.

This week the Canadian prairies were visited with the worst storm on record. Reports of that storm tell of a cloud of dust four miles thick blowing into the province of Saskatchewan and meeting there a snow and rainstorm from the north with the result that the worst flood conditions in the history of that province were produced. Reports tell us that it actually rained mud there for a matter of over half an hour and that there then followed a torrent of rain which left a large portion of the province under water. The immediate losses of millions of dollars in damage to roads, bridges, communications, power lines, and individual personal losses of people in livestock, buildings and other property, are only the immediate losses. The effects on the already rain-soaked soil of that province, which depends to a large extent upon its agricultural production, are predicted by many as putting an end to any possibility of a normal crop for 1955.

I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is in his seat, I notice, is taking steps to see that under P.F.R.A. drainage crews will be working on those projects where provincial surveys have already been made in order to help clear up the drainage situation. It should be remembered by all that the present catastrophe comes after three years of increasingly abnormal moisture conditions in that province which culminated last year in a flood and rust damage that wiped out 70 per cent of the farmers' net income.

As to the effects of nuclear explosions, it is quite natural that scientists should disagree. When man is experimenting with the unknown secrets of nature in today's scientific world, it is natural that some scientists will disagree with others as to the effects. They are going to continue to disagree until full research has been made. Our protest is that the research job is not being done. Therefore, great damage is being done to public morale and to the confidence of the people everywhere. The world needs the facts regarding the possible dangerous effects of radiation not only upon human beings but also upon weather conditions.

Professor Frederick Soddy, who is a British Nobel prize winner, is recently reported in the press as saying that he strongly denounces those scientists in the world who are saying there is no possible connection between unusual weather conditions and nuclear explosions. He is supported in this statement by another Nobel prize winner, the French physicist Charles N. Martin, who claims that among the dangers of thermonuclear explosions is the danger of not only deleterious but also permanent effects upon our climate. These men are supported by no less a leading scientist than the late Dr. Albert Einstein himself.

Surely, with the existence of the possibility of such dangers to the people of the world, an immediate independent investigation should be made by the most reliable scientific experts available. Important support for this idea of an investigation and the urgency of research was given at a conference in New York city just last month. The federation of American scientists met in New York and not only requested immediate establishment of a commission to make the investigation under the auspices of the United Nations, but they strongly urged that large scale atomic tests be discontinued until the investigation was made.

Surely, under those circumstances, Canada should move through representatives in the United Nations Organization to establish such an investigation at once. It is my belief we are about three years late now. We in this C.C.F. group demand this of the government, that until such an investigation under a competent independent scientific commission is made, H-bomb tests be stopped. We believe that such a request should be made to the United States government itself and to the U.S.S.R. through the United Nations Organization. It is important to the world.

People everywhere are always apprehensive of the unknown. Our urgent request is to ascertain the facts so far as humanly possible so that people will know the truth, and through that truth they can free themselves from their apprehensions, and act in the best interests of all.

I maintain that to permit ignorance to continue with a lack of proper investigation is criminal, is wasteful and is wrong. May I suggest to this government that if the facts later come out that nuclear tests do affect the climate and that the beliefs held by some of these scientists are correct, yet the government has done nothing about starting an investigation, then the people of Canada will rise in righteous indignation. They will be justified in doing so. If this government supports the move for the best possible scientific information by an independent commission under the United Nations, then the government will have done its duty. I maintain that that is the very minimum of its responsibility. The people of Canada demand the truth. The people of Canada are entitled to all possible information.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): While I was home during the Easter recess, Mr. Speaker, my constituents were kind enough to suggest to me that I should make a few remarks in this budget debate. I have recently come from the west. It was my privilege and pleasure, I can assure you, to ride on that crack new Canadian train of which every Canadian will be proud. It is a cracker-jack train. The first opportunity you have to ride on the new Canadian Pacific train, "The Canadian", or the Canadian National's new train, "The Super Continental", I am sure you will be well rewarded, happy and proud of this new service.

My constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek is so large that it takes even this crack train about three and a half hours of constant running to cross it. The time passes quickly with music and all the facilities on that type of train, so that one does not find the hours too long. The surprising thing to me is that for the past 50 years the employees of the railways have had the same kind of accommodation that is now available on the new train. The brakemen riding the freight trains of this country have had vista domes on the cabooses for the last 50 years, and it took that long to make them available to the passengers on these trains. However, it takes time to bring benefits to mankind, and I think all of us can forecast still greater improvement in Canadian train service in the future. We will have the best, if we have not already the best, train service in the world.

I think the Canadian National should be congratulated upon its window display in the Sparks street office. Since it is the jubilee year in Saskatchewan, there are scenes showing the various areas of Saskatchewan and Alberta. In yesterday's Journal, I believe, there was an item stating that only 25 per cent of the Canadian people leave their home province. Well, that is not good enough. If we in Canada wish to have any comprehension or understanding of what the rest of Canada is like, I think it is high time some method was provided so that we could have a closer association between eastern and western Canada, a much closer association than we have had in the past. I do not know of anything that will bind a country and a people more closely together than association, and through that association the understanding of the different people in different parts of Canada. The sooner that can be augmented, the better for all of us.

Canada is a vast country, almost several countries. The people of this country need this association more than the people of any other country of which I know. Let us this year, in this jubilee year of 1955, accept the invitation of Saskatchewan and Alberta to visit those great provinces, both of which have been associated with the Dominion of Canada since 1905. My province has created as much, if not more wealth, irrespective of whether it be mineral or other wealth, over that period of 50 years through the production of foodstuffs for mankind than any other province in the dominion. It is well worth seeing. While you are there, one particular place to visit, of course, over and above every other place, is that superior constituency of Swift Current-Maple Creek.

There are reasons for that. Every year they have one of the greatest celebrations in Saskatchewan, and it will be particularly good this year. It is the largest rodeo east of Calgary. They will give you three days of celebration, centring on July 1, that you will never forget as long as you live. Not only will you be in a position to enjoy yourself and see what has happened in Saskatchewan, particularly in the southwestern part of Saskatchewan where much of the dominion government's money has been spent—much of it has been spent for rehabilitation purposes since the thirties—but you will see that part of the country in the southwest that was believed to be in a hopeless situation during the drought and despair of the thirties.

As I mentioned before, no other area has recovered as southwestern Saskatchewan has. And we want to show the people of Canada where their money has gone and what it has done so they will know, as a result of that, and from that experience, that the same remedies can be applied anywhere, should similar conditions exist at any time in the future.

Now, that area is suffering some reverses today, because we know that in some areas of Saskatchewan there is too much moisture. But seldom has that situation existed in southwest Saskatchewan. Indeed, we are not even interested down there in Selkirk rust-resistant wheat, because we are always placed in a position—at least we think we are—that the only time we get a crop in southwest Saskatchewan is when the rest of the country is all rusted out. And when the rest of the country is not rusted out and has only sufficient rain to obtain a crop, then we have a crop failure in southwest Saskatchewan. Because for years we have been deficient in moisture.

Everyone will sympathize with the people and the farmers in Saskatchewan who have suffered heavy losses. But certainly there is nothing to despair of, because Saskatchewan can recover as no other province can. Its people have had to be experienced in knowing how to recover.

I noticed in yesterday's issue of the Regina Leader-Post that the province is ready to lend its assistance, and I am sure the dominion government will never be outdone. It never has been outdone by any organization or any government in providing assistance for all the people of Canada in every possible way, when need has arisen. And I am sure the dominion government will do so again—in fact, it has already offered—and will give service when it is needed in Saskatchewan.

Then, in addition to what you will see in Swift Current-Maple Creek, we have also some points of historical interest there. We had the north west mounted police at Fort Walsh in the Cypress hills in 1883. If it had not been for the mounted police, history would have been different in Saskatchewan, because after Custer's massacre in Montana on the Great Bend, 5,000 of the Sioux Indians moved north into Canada; and a handful of north west mounted police, honoured today as they were then, kept that band of Indians under control.

Swift Current was the stopping point of the troop movement west during the Riel rebellion, and the trail used was Battleford trail, during that war.

Then, we have other historical sites in that area, but it would take too long to describe them. You will have to come out there and see it for yourselves. We are having an old timers' reunion, where all of those who have been in that country for 65 years will be having a celebration, such as has never been seen in any other part of Canada during that period of time.

It is the greatest country in the west. And we have something more than that. We have beards out there in southwest Saskatchewan. Yes, we have beards. The he-men in Swift Current and in Maple Creek have beards such as you have never seen since the days of the apostles. We are known as the original bearded city of Swift Current, and the practice originated a number of years ago.

And there was a purpose in growing beards, because beards are important in that country. In fact, beards have been important since the creation of man. The downfall of man began when he became smooth-shaven. If you will read your history, particularly your biblical history, you will find one thing, dating back to the time of Samson, who, when his hair was shorn, lost his strength and was captured by his enemies, and was destroyed.

I think we should be on our guard, as we are in Swift Current-Maple Creek, in regard to what is going to happen to mankind if we continue as we have been doing in the past. Because as man became clean-shaven, and as he lost his luxurious beard, he lost his virility and masculinity, and man began to decline. And then it was the woman's influence began to rise. And if this situation continues we are going to be dominated by women.

Why, we see the day coming right here in the House of Commons; there are four of them here already. We will be exactly like some of the aboriginal tribes, where the men are cast aside—well, no, they are not cast aside; they have to do the work. Can you imagine anything worse than that? And the day is coming when we will be treated just the same as the male bees in a beehive—we will be worthless.

So, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is not only a local problem—this problem of beards —but that it is a world problem. And, you know, if you go through history you will find that all the conquering tribes were bearded. And what I am worried about is the number of people in Russia who are growing beards. I suggest we should give this serious consideration. But the men of Swift Current and Maple Creek have found the answer because they have placed man back in his proper position. For whoever heard of a woman with her lovely complexion, when she snuggles up and gets the feeling of those bushy whiskers—why, they become absolutely helpless. Because they are in the hands of man, from that time on, and they will never have anything further to do with the Schick-shaver, or a slick-shaver, man.

The only reason I, representing Swift Current-Maple Creek, have not grown a beard is that I am just too busy being a member of parliament to always have to carry a stick around to keep the women away. So, on July 1, on to Swift Current-Maple Creek in Saskatchewan. Every member in the House of Commons is invited, and people from the rest of Canada; and you will come back from there feeling that the trip was justified. You are invited to come out to that country, where men are men and women are women—and if there is any difference, thank the Lord for it.

While I am speaking on the subject of western Canada I would like to say this, that each one of us who believes in modern progress has appreciated the advent of television in our midst. I understand it is the purpose of television that it shall be a boon to mankind in any particular area of the country, and that those who are deprived of the benefits of this service will not be in a position to maintain the high standard of education and the full enjoyment of culture and religion experienced by the other areas in the country having it.

Swift Current-Maple Creek will be deficient in the matter of television service. I understand that the higher the television tower is, the farther the telecast beams are transmitted. In any case, we have the highest altitude of any area in Saskatchewan. I believe it is between 3,000 and 4,000 feet. And by putting a thousand-foot television tower in our area we could beam telecasts all over the province of Saskatchewan.

I think the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would do well to put a station there, and if they did we could service all the people in the province. While that has not happened yet, there is still time to have that service in that area of the country. I think we should adopt the principle whereby, when any member of parliament can show that a television station can give television service to cover a hundred thousand people, the C.B.C. and the government should give serious consideration to giving service to that number of people. We can do that in Swift Current-Maple Creek even though that country is sparsely settled because we have sufficient height of land and the beam will cover the whole constituency which is 300 miles from one corner to the other. It will service half the constituency of Kindersley, half the constituency of Rosetown-Biggar and will even extend into Montana and over into Alberta.

The only thing that has retarded us so far, the only reason why we may not be completely up to date is that we have not had the advantages of this service. Our people should have the educational facilities provided by television which are given to other people in Canada. We should have the cultural and religious benefits which only television can give. We should have the knowledge that can be transmitted through television in regard to agricultural production. We have a great number of organizations like the 4-H clubs and we have the second largest experimental station in Canada. Any investment made to provide television in southwest Saskatchewan will be more than repaid in the benefits granted to the people, and the investment itself will be repaid.

Coming back from Saskatchewan we were in contact with many farmers in our constituency. We have heard during this debate of the needs of the farmers and again a very poor picture has been painted by some hon. members of the House of Commons regarding the situation in Saskatchewan. Whatever the situation may have been it certainly has been aggravated by the weather conditions of the past week. If that catastrophe had not transpired the situation as I found it in Saskatchewan would not have been as serious as it has been described here in the House of Commons.

I do not believe that the government of Saskatchewan believed some of the speeches socialist-delivered in the House of Commons regarding the situation in Saskatchewan. If the government in the province did believe it and if that situation actually existed they should have done something about it rather than just wait for the dominion government to carry the burden. Of course if some members of parliament can convince the dominion government to carry a burden that it should not properly carry then they have an ability over and above the ordinary.

To my mind every provincial government in the country should carry its share. The provinces are in a unique position to be able to at least set an example. They may not have the facilities or the money to the degree that the dominion government has, but they could go a little way and set an example. I have not seen evidence of the least effort being made in Saskatchewan to make any move whatsoever to correct the condition which it has been claimed by socialist members in this house exists in Saskatchewan.

What the farmers need in Saskatchewan is the final payment on wheat, and more than that they need facilities to sell their wheat. The sale of their wheat will be of more value to them than the final payment. Those are two great needs. If there is a third one, most certainly it is good weather. If those needs can be satisfied I am satisfied the people of Saskatchewan will again put in their crops and unless weather conditions are completely abnormal they will deliver the same production as they formerly have.

I do not think we should overlook some of the difficulties which have been encountered in regard to the movement of grain. Some people in the west feel that it has not moved fast enough; they feel that the government or the wheat board has left undone something in regard to the movement of grain. What has actually transpired? There was the dockers' strike last fall in Great Britain which handicapped the movement of grain for almost two months. I do not know of anything that our government could have done about that because it was a foreign affair. Before that we had the grain handlers' strike on the west coast and lately the grain handlers' strike at the head of the lakes.

Nevertheless, in spite of all these difficulties, some advance has been made and, as has been stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), it is believed that most of the wheat in western Canada will be moved before the next crop year. Of course there is criticism and agitation in western Canada by political parties, and perhaps that is the way it should be. Do you know what I heard in Swift Current-Maple Creek? Our socialist friends were going around the country saying that the grain handlers' strike at the head of the lakes had been instituted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They were saying that the minister had made a statement during the winter that he was going to move this grain during the coming summer, and as he had failed to move the grain he had instituted that strike.

I do not know how many people in western Canada believed that, but there is one thing I think they know and that is that at no time when there was a strike, no matter how seriously it affected the farmers, did the socialist party lift a finger to stop it. We all have responsibilities. I did not expect the leader of the socialists when he was over in Britain to interfere with the dockers' strike there or try to settle it, but if he had the interests of the western farmers at heart perhaps he could have made some suggestions without making himself obnoxious. Perhaps the government of Saskatchewan could have put forth a little effort in connection with grain handlers' strikes wherever they happened especially as they affected the farmers.

Do not forget the time when we had a railroad strike in 1950 which paralysed industry in Canada. The socialists did not do anything about that. A special session of parliament was called in an endeavour to correct that situation and a solution was presented but every socialist in this house with the exception of one voted against the settlement of that strike. We are still suffering from that strike because you cannot make up lost movement of grain and you cannot regain markets that have been lost because of grain stoppages.

What do the socialists think of strikes? Are they in favour of them? Everyone has the right to strike, as we all know. No one would want to take that away. But I would say that the socialists actually favour strikes except when they have one of their own. They had a transportation strike in Regina in 1953, but that was a horse of another colour. What did the socialists do about that? They had advertisements in all the papers of Saskatchewan, and I quote the Leader-Post of July 6, 1953, which is a capitalist paper, do not forget, which said that the men should not strike because they were making more money than anyone else and that the cost of living had come down during the last eighteen months.

At the same time they were complaining about that and using it to their advantage in Saskatchewan. It all depends where the shoe pinches. If we are going to work together in the settlement of the nation's difficulties, then I think we should be able to honestly expect some assistance from all governments in Canada including a socialist government.

When there is a strike the socialists are hesitant to say anything. They are ready to talk about anything if they think they can get more prestige, but they are certainly silent on the occasions of strikes. Some of their leaders in Saskatchewan remind me of a little puppy, and in saying this I do not want to get into any dog controversy such as they had during the last election in the United States. A puppy is a harmless little creature, always lovable. When you take out a puppy and he knows where he is going he trots along in front with his tail up in the air full of life. But when he does not know where he is going he hangs behind with his tail between his legs and does nothing but whimper. That is about as close a comparison as I can make of what I have observed about the socialists. There has been great competition in connection with the selling of grain, as everyone knows. This government, through its Prime Minister, through its Minister of Trade and Commerce and through other members of the government, has left nothing undone to try to acquire markets and stimulate the movement of that grain. Has anyone else made any suggestions that would make it possible to sell Canadian grain? The only solution offered by the socialists, as far as I can see, is that we give it away. I do not know to whom we are going to give it. I do not know what government wants it. I do not know of any government that has made an appeal for it. In the meantime there is only one way in which the farmer can obtain the reward for his labours, and that is to sell it. The government has left nothing undone to make that possible.

I do not think that any socialist or any other member of the opposition has contributed anything to promote the sales. I would say they have retarded them in most of the speeches, the canned speeches that have been delivered in the House of Commons by the socialists from Saskatchewan. Not one jot or tittle have they contributed by any one of their speeches to the movement of one bushel of grain. I think they can do better than that. I would say that, if farming and agriculture is in such a condition in Saskatchewan as has been described by the socialists, then I wonder why they are not selling their land—no, not selling it, giving it away, because they are at least supposed to share part of that with someone else. Why are they acquiring more property? Why are the socialists in Saskatchewan acquiring more land if agriculture is on its way out? From the socialist speeches I have heard it is useless for me to go back and seed my land or raise chicks. We had 500 chicks and we had more trouble in caring for them than with some of the babies owing to the very cold weather that occurred. It is useless my raising livestock if agriculture has gone entirely to pieces.

I think we should have more encouraging words for the farmers of this country. I think the farmers have more faith in our country than other people and than other parties give them credit for. I think that, if we get a good crop again, the government will help them get it marketed. I think we can look forward to another good crop year and the prospect of selling the grain to the best advantage through our wheat board, operated under the government as well as or better than through any other system or through any other government that I know of.

With regard to our present budget, I think everybody in Canada is congratulating the Minister of Finance on this new budget. Some hon. members tell us that this budget is a bad budget. They tell us it is handicapping farmers and that no one receives any benefit from it; that the government perhaps made a move in the right direction but should have gone much further. The government could not remove any more duties on farm implements, because they have all long ago been lifted. You may go into Montana and buy any piece of machinery—and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) may buy any piece of machinery—and bring it back across the line, without duty, and purchase any repairs that you wish. I am glad that the government listened to our appeal last year, when we suggested that they take the duty off truck tires and every other commodity the farmers need. They reduced the taxes on automobiles; and everybody admits that the farmers need automobiles.

I suggest that the federal government has set a wonderful example in this budget to all the provinces of Canada; and if they followed suit we would have a much better economy. What is stopping the Saskatchewan socialist government from taking that $100 off an ordinary car, which is the tax they have to pay there. The federal government reduced the tax; certainly that province could follow suit. They are not in favour of taxes. What is stopping them from taking off the 3 per cent tax on farm fuels that the farmers have to use? What is stopping them from taking off the 3 per cent tax on building materials, to stimulate building activity? What is stopping them from making some kind of contribution which some members in the House of Commons say that the federal government should be making?

If this budget is bad, I hope we have a lot more just as bad in the future. I hope we continue to have tax reduction budgets. I hope we continue to have incentive budgets, so that the people of this country can invest their money and know that it will not be all taxed out of their hands. If the people of this country would invest their money in new enterprises, it would provide jobs in the country. In Saskatchewan they tried to do it through the state, and what happened? They have no qualms about it. Out there, if the government factory does not pay dividends—they are against profits, but if it does not pay a profit—out it goes, and the labouring people with it. Sometimes they take up the slack in regard to those they have discharged from employment by putting them into the government. They have that method of absorbing them into the government of Saskatchewan or having them unemployed or placing them in the position where they have no alternative but to join the army. The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) said that the Liberals were suggesting that that was the Liberal cure for unemployment, to have unemployed men join the army. If that were so, why have we not our quota filled in the army, the navy and the air force; which we have not up to date? That is not the Liberal solution to unemployment, but it is the socialist solution to unemployment, and we have no intention of stealing any socialist platform in regard to that method of settlement of the unemployment problem. So I would say that they are not worried in Saskatchewan over the depression. They have had the highest budget expenditure of any time in their history. So, if they would follow suit with the Dominion of Canada and reduce the taxes, certainly all the people of Canada could have the advantage of it.

I have been asked on several occasions by the labouring people in Swift Current-Maple Creek to make a speech on labour. I would very much like to do that because there is sympathy with both the farmers and labour. Everyone wants labour to prosper, and everyone wants the farmers to prosper. I think that labour has some very good representatives here in the House of Commons. They have certainly accomplished their aim in forwarding the objectives of labour. But I am not one who thinks that labour can make agriculture prosperous but I do think that agriculture can make labour prosper. I concentrate on what I think is a fine endeavour to augment, stimulate and advance production to the position where everyone in Canada can enjoy the benefit of it. Agriculture is fundamental and responsible for the welfare of labour. Never have I seen prosperity throughout the land when agriculture was not productive, when it was not in prosperity. Strange to say, farmers often are not in that position; farmers have the ability, capacity and productiveness to make everyone else prosperous except themselves. That seems to be one of the difficulties in connection with agriculture. I am sure the rest of the people of Canada will wish to see that the equilibrium is maintained in regard to farmers and other wage earners or other productivity in the Dominion of Canada.

So we have a budget that reduces the taxes, a budget that is an incentive to employment. We have a budget that leaves something for the little fellow. You cannot add nothing to nothing. You cannot take away nothing from nothing. Some of our critics say that we should have enlarged the exemptions. However, we have now the largest exemptions of any country that I know of. In Canada a single man has a $1,000 exemption, and a married man $2,000. In the United Kingdom, even under a Labour government, the exemption was $385 for a single man and $660 for a married man. In the U.S.A. the exemption is $600 for a single man and $1,200 for a married man. In Australia the exemption is $224 for a single man, and $448 for a married man. In New Zealand the exemption is $1,013 for a single man, and $1,350 for a married man. Comparing that with Canadian exemptions, we are far above all other countries on an equivalent basis in regard to the exemptions that are allowed. So the little man cannot be entirely exempted from paying taxes—at least he is not in Saskatchewan. I do not know of one single person, no matter how poor, who does not pay equal taxation with the rich in Saskatchewan. I see no exemptions there whatsoever. There are many more exemptions under our dominion government's policy than under any other government that I know of in this country. You cannot, as the socialists say, bring the rich down to the level of the poor. And then no one is in a position to pay taxes. We need to bring the poor up to the rich. That is our objective. We shall never be satisfied until we attain it. Then everybody can pay taxes. Then there will not be any necessity for exemptions that we are talking about today.

A royal commission was advocated in the budget. I think that was one of the most important things that was incorporated in the budget of this year. That is an indication of Canada's thinking with regard to the future: determine our economic responsibility and our economic possibilities for the future. While they are considering those economic possibilities, I think there is a wonderful opportunity for this royal commission to determine the earning power of the different groups, occupations and industries throughout the Dominion of Canada. When we can determine the income and the purchasing power of those different occupations, whatever they may be, across Canada, we shall then be in a position in which we can balance that economy as between one industry and another.

That procedure will eliminate the constant controversy in the different groups and occupations in Canada as to who is having the best standard of living, who is taking more than his share, and the constant agitation with regard to the farming population, and their contention that they are taking what is left and are not receiving their share of the national wealth. The sooner we accomplish that end and get on that basis, I think the sooner we shall be in a position where there will be a more satisfactory economic condition prevailing throughout the Dominion of Canada.

We have had considerable advice from the opposition groups in connection with what the government should or should not have done. But that advice cannot explain away the fact that this is a good budget. Any budget that reduces taxes is a good budget. As I mentioned before, I think we should continue to have that type of budget so that over a period of years we shall be in a position where more and more benefits will accrue to the people. I have heard no alternative that was of any consequence to what has been done. I have heard no alternative whatsoever except, incidentally—and this is by way of correction—what in some people's opinion should be instituted, but nothing that is permanent or that possibly could be adopted. I have heard nothing that the socialists might advocate that would be of any value, nothing that would indicate that they practise out in Saskatchewan what they preach here in the House of Commons. I have heard nothing from the Social Crediters who seem to be feeling more or less happy these days with regard to what their prospects may be in connection with future government here in Canada, the financial ability of the people and of the services that they may be in a position to offer to the people of Canada.

But before you can offer any social service to the people of Canada, there is one thing that you must do about it. You must vote for it. No one can obtain a social service in this country unless through this parliament we vote for that social service. If we vote against the social service, certainly none will be applicable. I think the Social Credit party is active throughout the whole country in connection with advocating family allowances, leaving people with the impression that Social Credit was possibly the originator of these family allowances and, as they were possibly the originators, they should be entrusted with the responsibility of increasing them. I have been told that even on the telephone poles throughout the province of Quebec there are posters suggesting that the people contact their member to have the family allowance increased or perhaps have the family allowance doubled. But as I mentioned before, you cannot have a social service unless you vote for it. You cannot claim to have had a part in the social service unless you can claim to have voted for it.

On looking at the history of family allowances, I notice that in 1944 it was incorporated in the speech from the throne through this Liberal government. Various subamendments were offered and then the final vote came to accept this speech from the throne which had the family allowance incorporated in it. In that speech from the throne were included these words:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

The vote on the motion for an address in reply was taken on February 10, 1944, and was as follows: Yeas, 146, composed of reactionary Liberals and reactionary Conservatives; and nays, 21, representing the progressive vote for humanity at large by the opposition members of the splinter groups.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Studer: They voted against the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, in which family allowances were incorporated.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the hon. member for Bow River is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I want the hon. member to indicate to this house whether or not, as he has inferred, the Social Credit party voted against that amendment for family allowances. I had occasion today to look up the record because I suspected that this speech was going to be made. However, I did not know by whom or when. Otherwise I would have had the Hansard here. I am saying to the hon. member who has the floor now that he is absolutely wrong. In that debate, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: At this moment the hon. member is going beyond raising a point of order. He is arguing that what the hon. member has just said is not correct. Having asked the hon. member to say whether the party to which the hon. member belongs had voted for or against the amendment in question, he should not go beyond that but should wait for the reply of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I shall be pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Studer: Page 364 of Hansard of 1944, on the main motion—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Studer: —in regard to the adoption of the family allowance measure,—

Mr. Knowles: It was no such thing.

[Mr. Studer.]

Mr. Studer: —the following names are written, and they are written there in indelible ink. There is nothing that any Social Crediter can do that will erase it. They are written there at page 364. The nays are as follows: Blackmore, Bryce, Burton, Castleden, Coldwell, Dorion, Douglas (Weyburn), Fair, Gillis, Hansell, Hlynka—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Studer: —Johnston (Bow River), Knowles, Kuhl, MacInnis, Marshall, Nicholson, Noseworthy,—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Studer: —and some more, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: No more nonsense.

Mr. Lapointe: Do not look hurt.

Mr. Speaker: At the moment the hon. member was asked a question he had just exhausted his time. Do I take it that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) will adjourn the debate?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

On motion of Mr. Robichaud the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Tomorrow we shall begin with the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Then we shall take the resolution with respect to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act; then the estimates of the department of northern affairs; and then those of the departments of post office and justice.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, before this matter is disposed of, may I say that I would have hoped that it might be possible to continue this debate. By everything that I can learn, it would seem to me that this debate would be concluded tomorrow. These interruptions over several days only have the effect of protracting the debate and separating the discussion. At a time when there is so much discussion taking place with regard to the rules and methods of facilitating the business of the house, I would think one of the ways in which that business might best be facilitated is to have debates of this kind continue on, day by day, until they are terminated.

Mr. Harris: I agree with all that has been said, but it has been my unhappy lot to find out that hon. members opposite are often just as inclined to change the debates from time to time as hon. members on this side.

Mr. Drew: We do not have the choice.

Mr. Harris: I have taken all this into account in deciding that it would not likely be possible to complete this debate tomorrow, and that is why I have announced the business in the manner I have.

Mr. Low: I wonder whether the minister's fears are not rather that there will not be enough here to approve his budget tomorrow if we go on with this debate. My own feeling is that we should continue the debate and finish it. I believe we can finish it tomorrow and that there will be enough members remaining here over the week end for the vote to be taken tomorrow.

Mr. Harris: I have not the slightest doubt that if all hon. members voted on the budget according to their real beliefs they would all vote for it.

Mr. Knowles: Let us take the vote tomorrow and find out.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 6, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE—WELCOME BACK TO HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: May I, with unanimous consent, tell the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) how pleased we are to see him back from his trip looking so well.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSTON (BOW RIVER)—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR SWIFT CURRENT-MAPLE CREEK

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. Yesterday in the house, when the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) was speaking, he indicated that I took a certain action in this house on a previous occasion. I did no such thing. Since he has accused me of that action, I wish now to state my part of that case, if I have your permission.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know exactly to what the hon. gentleman is referring at this moment, but I want to make sure that we are not going to confuse the situation which perhaps, if correction is necessary, should be corrected only when the debate is resumed. If I recall what took place last night, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek was referring to the way a member voted on a certain occasion. If the hon. member wishes at this time to correct the interpretation of that vote by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, it seems to me that the time at which to do it would be when the debate is resumed. I do not think a member, on a question of privilege, once a debate has been adjourned, could try to correct an interpretation of either words pronounced or views expressed or the manner in which a vote has been given in a debate that has been adjourned.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, of course I must abide by your decision, and I have no desire whatever to try to override the rules of this house, but it is not a case of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek misinterpreting anything. It is a case of his making a deliberate false statement, and he knew it to be false. If you suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I should refrain from speaking on this question now and wait until the debate comes up, I shall be glad to do that. I shall have to await your decision.

Mr. Speaker: As I said, if the hon. member wishes to refer to what took place last night in the manner I have indicated, it is a matter of opinion as to whether the hon. member knew what he said to be false and whether he spoke some falsehood deliberately or not. As the hon. member knows, until the matter has been clarified, the hon. member who has made a statement, certainly in good faith, should not be accused of having spoken any falsehood until the contrary has been proven.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I shall clarify it when the debate is resumed.

Mr. Speaker: That is the best procedure to follow.

Mr. Studer: I ask for special consideration. I was just reading the record. I was not making any charges on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

SUGGESTED SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE TO STUDY OTTAWA PLANNING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): On Wednesday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked me if it was still the intention of the government to set up a committee to look into the affairs of the federal district commission.

The speech from the throne indicated that a joint committee of both houses would be proposed to examine, in the light of the Municipal Grants Act and possible amendments thereto, the financial and other relationships of the government and the federal district commission with the city of Ottawa and neighbouring municipalities.

It is now the feeling of the government that there are so many committees in operation at this time considering matters of great importance that it would not be possible at this stage of the session to have a committee on the scale originally contemplated; that the municipal grants bill now before the house might therefore be referred to the banking and commerce committee as soon as second reading has been completed; and that there might be an opportunity before the close of the session to establish the joint committee with a view to laying the foundation for a wider examination of the work of the federal district commission at the next session.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PUNCTUALITY OF EMPLOYEES—REFERENCE TO CIRCULAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General or to the Acting Postmaster General. Has an order been passed having the effect of penalizing post office employees who are sometimes late for work by taking time off their annual holidays? If so, who thought up the order, and will it be cancelled?

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Parliamentary Assistant to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the publicity that has been given to the recent order, I wonder if I might not give a brief but comprehensive reply to the hon. member.

A circular was issued. The purpose of the circular was to ensure that employees are treated uniformly in the various offices throughout the service. Where employees are late owing to unavoidable circumstances, such as breakdown in transportation, heavy snowstorms and items of that kind, every reasonable cognizance is taken of these features.

In the postal service punctuality is exceedingly important. If employees are not on duty on time, mails are delayed and deliveries are retarded. Punctuality becomes all the more important with the advent of the 40-hour week. In many industrial concerns if the employees are not on time, the gates are closed and they are not allowed to work for a certain period of the day.

We felt that the employees should know the penalties they are likely to suffer so that they can adjust their arrangements accordingly, rather than to have imposed a penalty without any previous notice. Only a very small minority of our people are affected, as the majority have an exceptionally good punctuality record.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. If representatives of the postal employees make representations against this order, will those representations be considered by the government?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I should answer that question. The answer is: "of course".

BUTTER

PRODUCTION AND DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION—1954 AND 1955

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Proudfoot (Pontiac-Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What was the production and domestic disappearance of butter in Canada for the calendar year 1954, and for the year 1955 to date?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The production of butter in Canada for the calendar year 1954 was 312,600,000 pounds and the domestic disappearance or consumption was 292,600,000 pounds.

For the first three months in 1955 the production was 34,300,000 pounds, and the domestic disappearance or consumption was 66,500,000 pounds.

A comparison of the first quarter of 1954 with that of 1955 indicates that while production decreased by 3 per cent, consumption increased by 3 per cent.

STORMS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question. Has he received any message or request from the province of Saskatchewan with regard to the disastrous flooding in that province? Are any arrangements being made to confer on the matter, to send assistance or anything of that sort?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the best answer I can give to the hon. gentleman is to say that last night I received from the premier of Saskatchewan a telegram which reads as follows:

> Flooding of communities and farm lands on province wide scale has created disaster of major proportions. Urge your government to declare national emergency and give assistance on same basis as made available to other parts of Canada where similar disasters have occurred. Prepared to send ministers of provincial government to confer with you and your colleagues if you so desire. Situation urgent and immediate assistance would be appreciated.

I telegraphed the hon. gentleman this morning in the following terms:

Your telegram received late last night and I wish to assure you everyone sympathizes with all those affected by recent storms and flooding in your province. We have no information that would indicate shortages of immediately necessary relief supplies nor nature and extent of actual destruction.

In cases where federal aid has been extended the provincial authorities had taken the initiative in securing factual information. I suggest that much more such information is required before any discussion with your colleagues could be really helpful. Your government will no doubt be securing such information and may wish to supply it to us and we will give it the same consideration as was given to all previous cases.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister consider using the federal forces in Saskatchewan, officials in P.F.R.A. and P.F.A.A., who know every part of Saskatchewan, also to look into this matter and give it immediate attention?

Mr. St. Laurent: When the factual information collected by the provincial authorities has been brought to our attention we will take the best possible measures of checking it in order to satisfy ourselves that it represents the facts with regard to what has occurred.

INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS FROM GOVERNMENT OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister received any representations of a similar nature from the government of Manitoba.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Not in connection with what has happened within these recent days.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

59. Departmental administration, $493,651.

Mr. Decore: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister a matter within his department which I feel is far from being conducive to the promotion of good citizenship and the spirit of Canadianism and which to a certain section of our Canadian population is even insulting, to say the least.

May I start off first by saying that the population of our country is made up of people of different racial origins who either themselves came from different lands or whose parents or ancestors did so. They have different backgrounds, but these people have brought with them their skills and their cultures and each is making a contribution to the building of our nation and the development of our distinctive Canadian national culture. I say that the strength of Canada lies in the diversity of its population. Regardless of what may be our occupation, what church we attend or whence came our parents, one thing we have in common with our neighbours is Canadian citizenship. At the same time we are members of the British commonwealth of nations which is the greatest organization that the world has ever seen. Certainly it is the policy of the government, and I am sure it is the thinking of every hon. member and of the Canadian people generally, that Canadians regardless of their racial origin should be proud of their origin whether it be Scottish, Polish, Anglo-Saxon, Ukrainian, French, Irish, or any other, proud of the contribution that they are making to this country and proud of the fact that these things have brought us together to make us better citizens and Canada a better place in which to live.

Having said that, I should like to draw the minister's attention to applications for Canadian citizenship that have been made by prospective Canadian citizens of Ukrainian origin. In making such applications these people have stated that they were born in the Ukraine. I should like to read the part of the reply of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration which is pertinent to the point I wish to make. These people have been told:

I regret to inform you that Ukraine is not the name of a country. It refers only to a province or a territory. As the name Ukraine does not refer to the name of a country, it would not be correct to enter Ukraine on your application form as your country of birth.

It seems to me that this statement, contained in a document coming from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, is not only insulting to these applicants but also humiliating. It is not only insulting and humiliating to them as applicants, but I think that kind of statement is insulting to any person of that origin regardless of whether he lives in Canada or any other part of the world, and there are some 50 million of them throughout the world. When someone makes a statement to the effect that "Ukraine" is not the name of a country, such a statement is incompatible with history and certainly incompatible with present-day facts.

I am not going to go into the history of the Ukraine, but I should like to point out to the minister that in that country today there is a population of over 42 million people, that it comprises a territory larger than France, that it is a separate republic in the Soviet union and is a charter member of the United Nations. When I say it is a republic I should like to qualify that by saying that it is a so-called republic because we know that the people there are not free. But even the recognition that this country has received from the Russians has only been after many millions of people have died fighting for freedom. As recently as the 1930's millions of them were starved deliberately on directions from Moscow because they believed in freedom and wanted to separate themselves from the Russian empire. The Russians have not been able to suppress that spirit of freedom although they have tried to do so for many years.

To touch briefly on history, I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to what happened in the year 1863. The Russian government, by a special decree, ordered the printing of all books and newspapers in the Ukrainian language to stop. When the Ukrainians appealed this decision to the government the minister of the interior, at that time Count Valuev, replied:

> The Ukrainian language never existed, does not exist and shall never exist.

That happened in the year 1863. Yet since that time, after millions of people have died for freedom in an effort to break away from the Russian tyranny, they have at least been given the recognition of being a separate republic and have been recognized as a charter member of the United Nations. May I also point out to the minister that as recently as the 20th of November, 1917, after the czarist empire crumbled, the Ukraine became independent. If the western world had realized at that time the significance of what was happening, and if these people who had been trying to obtain their freedom and did obtain it for a short period of time had only received support from the western world, the Ukraine today would not be a part of the Russian empire, and Russia probably would not be the menace she is to the western world and to Canada in particular.

These newcomers who came to this country especially after the last war probably feel more keenly about this matter than any other ethnic group in the country and one can appreciate their reasons. They are the ones who have actually witnessed the liquidation of masses of their fellow countrymen on directions from Moscow. In spite of pressure they refused to go back to the Ukraine from the displaced persons camps, and they consider themselves very fortunate indeed to have been able to reach the shores of Canada and to be in a position to be able to make application for Canadian citizenship after spending some time here.

For such people in particular the kind of statement contained in the letter from the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is indeed most humiliating. Knowing the minister as I do, I am sure if he had known what was taking place he would never have allowed such a letter to be written to these newcomers. I am sure of that. We all know that is not the minister's way of thinking.

Mr. Ferguson: How would he know?

Mr. Decore: All you have to do is talk to the minister on any occasion with regard to his attitude to Canadians generally.

Mr. Ferguson: Born in this country or otherwise?

Mr. Decore: So I draw this matter to the attention of the minister with the hope that this sort of thing will not be repeated and with the hope that the minister will see to it that these people will be given the privilege of naming their country of birth as the Ukraine when they are making application for citizenship, because it is in conformity with the actual facts as they exist today and in conformity with history. If the minister should agree to that, then I would also suggest that any certificates already issued be changed accordingly if the people concerned want to have them so changed. With this in mind, I hope the minister will be able to see fit to make the necessary changes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to deal with this point right away. First of all, I want to express my sincere regret. As the hon. member correctly stated, I was quite unaware that to this circular letter sent out as a receipt for applications for citizenship in cases where there have to be some corrections or additions made—and that very often happens—the sentence to which he referred was added. The sentence was substantially as he read it, and I do not think there is any special reason why I should read it. The words are slightly different but the sense is quite the same. I can imagine how the hon. member for Greenwood, who like me was born in this country, would feel if the Department of Citizenship and Immigration said to applicants who put Scotland as their birthplace, "In your application you say you were born in Scotland; as this name pertains to a territory, district or province rather than a country it is requested that you state the name of the country in which you were born".

Mr. Knowles: What about your own constituents?

Mr. Pickersgill: My own constituents, as the hon. member knows quite well because he, like me, is a sea lawyer, except those people who immigrated into Newfoundland from some foreign country, were born in Canada. I do not wish to be diverted from what I am saying about this matter now.

Mr. Ferguson: Do not divert him now.

Mr. Macdonnell: You diverted yourself.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that if Scotland had been used instead of the Ukraine in this instance, there would have been indignation which would have reached the ears of the minister rather sooner than this did. I would say this practice is one for which I, as minister, am constitutionally responsible. No such sentence ever appeared until a few months ago. It has been used only since I was minister. I say that because I do not want anyone to think I am blaming my predecessor or anyone else. I had not had this matter drawn to my attention before.

Mr. Ferguson: We knew it was you.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right; the responsibility was mine. I am not going to plead ignorance, though I was ignorant of it. I say, sir, it was an error that was honestly made by a very conscientious civil servant who would not knowingly hurt anybody anywhere. It was made, and it was made with the intention of helping the people who make these applications.

Now, it is within the knowledge of many hon. members that citizenship certificates are used very frequently for identification of one kind or another. It has been the experience of the department that sometimes questions are raised about where some places really are. As the hon. member for Vegreville correctly stated, for many years the Ukraine has been juridically part of other states bearing other names. It is my honest opinion it is an advantage to the holder of a certificate, in certain circumstances, to have the juridical name of the country in which he was born also on his certificate. I have consulted my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, about this matter and from now on any applicant who wishes to state that he was born in the Ukraine and nothing else, will not be requested to amplify that at all so far as the country is concerned.

I shall have a circular prepared as quickly as possible to indicate that it might be to the advantage of applicants to indicate that the part of the Ukraine in which they were born was, at the time of their birth, under the jurisdiction of, say, Poland, Czechoslovakia or imperial Russia, or that it is now the Ukrainian S.S.R., or whatever the fact may be. However, no one will be required to say that; it will be entirely optional.

I do not want to mislead anyone. There is another question on the application form that has to be answered, and that is question No. 4. It says, "I am a subject or citizen of—", and there, of course, it is absolutely imperative that the applicant put what his juridical status is, however disagreeable it may be to him. If the nationality of which he is divesting himself is Polish or Czechoslovakian that would have to be put. In the case of many of these newcomers to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, they are stateless, and of course that is a proper answer if it is a truthful one. But so far as the place of birth is concerned, and that is all that is inserted on a citizenship certificate, it will be quite sufficient to give the name of the place and so on, and for the name of the country to say Ukraine, and nothing else.

Perhaps I should repeat that I think it might be of advantage, especially to those people who have cause to leave the country on visits, to amplify it a bit, but that will depend entirely on them and what they want to do. In the case of those who now possess a certificate, and who would like to have the certificate altered so as to indicate that their birth was in the Ukraine, the department will be happy to have that done just as quickly as it is possible after the receipt of the certificate. Now, that may not be by return mail because I would not want to hold up the current certificates while these corrections are being made. I am sure the hon. member for Vegreville would not want that either, but the corrections will be made just as quickly as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, there was a matter about which I wanted to ask the minister when last we discussed the question of immigration and dealt with the numbers who had come into Canada in recent years. I was coming to the point of dealing with the question as to the numbers of people who have left Canada in the last 10 years, since 1945. I realize that so far as the records of the department are concerned they might not reveal the entire picture. I have endeavoured to secure information on this subject as a result of investigations in the United States through departments of government.

If those records which I have are correct, they reveal a tremendous exodus taking place from Canada to the United States, which has even been accelerated to a degree in recent years. According to the records of the minister some one million people have come into Canada since 1945, over a million.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is about 1,200,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes. I should like the minister to let the house and the country know what records he has in this regard: first, the numbers of people who are Canadian by birth or naturalization who have left Canada year by year since 1945; secondly, what records has he as to the numbers of immigrants who have come to Canada since 1945, who have not stayed here long enough to secure nor have they secured naturalization but who have more or less used Canada as an intervening stopping-off place to enable them to be in a better position to establish themselves in the United States? So far as the latter figures are concerned, I know they are difficult to obtain.

I ask the minister whether or not the suggestion that has come to me, that the numbers of non-naturalized Canadians, in other words aliens who have stopped in Canada for a period of years and who have not taken out naturalization but have gone to the United States since 1945, would amount to about 240,000? I ask him what he has to say in that regard. If that be true, that number, together with the records which the minister has indicated concerning the numbers of Canadians who have gone to the United States, would appear to lead to the conclusion that for every million immigrants who come into Canada about 515,000 Canadians, or people who came in as immigrants, have in the same period emigrated to the United States. That is one of the serious problems that affect us in our country, and one that demands the serious consideration of those in authority. For, certainly, if Canada's population during the intervening years since confederation had not been depleted continuously by migration from this country, our population would be immeasurably greater than it is today.

By way of an aside, may I point out that only the other day I was reading the year book for 1868 in which the fathers of confederation estimated that by 1940, under normal circumstances, the population of Canada would be in excess of 41 million people—more than three times our population today.

I shall deal with several points at this time, because I do not wish to hold up the passage of the estimates, or to delay this general discussion. There is another matter in connection with immigration upon which I should like to secure information. I join with the hon. member for Vegreville, in the remarks he made a few moments ago.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I remember when the major portion of the first group of Ukrainian immigrants came to this country in the early years of this century. Today in the province of Saskatchewan the first immigrant of that race is still living. Through the intervening years I have watched the amazing record established by the people of Ukrainian origin, in their contribution to the building of a great Canadian citizenship. I know that people of that racial origin will be most happy with the announcement made by the minister concerning the rectification of applications, in accordance with the suggestion by the hon. member.

I should like now to ask a question connected with emigration. Has the minister any record to indicate that in the last year or year and a half large numbers of Canadian young men have appeared at immigration offices in this country and have been directed to the offices of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the purpose of having their fingerprints taken, so that they might go to the United States. This information has come to me from an official in the immigration branch—or, at least, who was in the immigration branch. I would ask the minister if, in fact, records are kept to indicate the numbers of young Canadians who have indicated their desire to go to the United States for the purpose of joining the United States army. I would ask the minister to deal with that question because, if my information is correct—and, having regard to its source, I have no doubt that it is—it represents a challenging problem and one that deserves attention.

The third phase in connection with immigration is this: Are we doing everything we can to secure desirable immigrants in parts of Europe and the Middle East? I have in mind particularly the state of Israel. While I was there last year one or two university graduates—one in particular, from Jordan—indicated their desire to come to Canada, and I took up the question with the department. Both these young men were of the Christian faith. When I asked what could be done to facilitate the sending of application forms to them, the reply I received from the deputy minister, Mr. Fortier, was to the effect that the department did not have complete facilities in Jerusalem for the necessary examination of prospective immigrants; and therefore it was regretted that the department was unable to consider the entry of anyone from there at this time.

The one referred to, in the reply received from the deputy minister, was a young man of high educational attainments and scientific skill. He was a graduate in science, and one who could have made a great contribution to this country. I would ask the minister whether it is intended to expand the number of countries to which will be accredited immigration officers so as to enable entry of those who are considered desirable.

I shall now pass on to one other subject, and then I shall have concluded the questions I intend to ask the minister. I come now to the question of the Indian population.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member mind holding that question until we reach Indian affairs branch. It would make it much easier to reply if we were to proceed in that way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I certainly shall. I shall not press the question now, because I do not want to do anything that would interfere in any way with facilitating the discussion of the estimates.

However, one other matter comes to my mind in connection with immigration. Are the applications for every applicant for naturalization checked by the mounted police before the grant of naturalization is made? I have in mind a certain person, whose name I shall give the minister, who made application for naturalization. When the police communicated with him to ascertain his record, about which there was some question, the answer he made was, "I have already got my naturalization certificate; there it is".

I suggest to the minister that if that course is being followed in other cases, then it constitutes a dangerous loophole, permitting the admission to the ranks of Canadian citizenship of those who, by reason of their communist background, should not be admitted to citizenship. I feel that every care should be taken to ensure that citizenship shall not be conferred upon those coming from lands where communist principles are followed. I refer to those who would come to Canada because of advantageous economic conditions but who, at the same time, would desire to retain their allegiance to a foreign philosophy. I believe strict and careful examination should be made in every case, and that no certificate of naturalization should be granted without full and complete examination of the antecedents of the applicant. There should be most careful scrutiny with a view to sifting out those who ought not to become citizens by reason of their communist activities. Careful scrutiny should be made of their past record, and we should have the assurance that when they come here they will not continue past activities.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, may I deal with these various points raised by the hon. gentleman before they are driven from my mind by listening to another hon. member? I should like to point out first that I think the hon. gentleman is allowing his Saskatchewan patriotism to carry him a little far. The first Ukrainian immigrant who came to Canada was Wasyl Eleniak who came to the constituency of Vegreville in Alberta, and is still living there at the age of 96. I had the great pleasure of sending him a message on his birthday anniversary the other day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister will allow me, he will remember it was mentioned in the classics that over the years several places have claimed to be the birthplace of Homer. I noticed that the Saskatchewan Star-Phoenix took that gentleman the other day and moved him, as I recall, into the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pickersgill: This emulation I think is worthy of both provinces, and I offer not the slightest objection to it.

To take the questions that I can answer most briefly first, to say that the immigration branch acts as an immigration department for the United States is not correct. If there is any paid servant of the taxpayers of Canada in the immigration branch who is conducting himself in that way I should like to have a report on him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no suggestion of that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that our branch was directing people to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I misunderstood—

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend does not understand it at all. In the case of people applying to have fingerprints taken I said the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has suggested that they be taken by the mounted police, but there is no participation in any such thing, and it was never suggested in the remotest degree.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, all I can say is that if it had nothing to do with the immigration branch, the whole thing is a complete mystery to me. I never heard anything about it before, and if it has nothing to do with the immigration branch, I do not think I can reasonably be expected to give any answer about it.

To come to the question of immigration from Israel, I am very grateful to the hon. member for Prince Albert for raising the matter, because there does seem to be a good deal of misunderstanding about it, which I do not want to contribute to and which I sincerely hope I can remove, at least in part. Israel, like Canada, is a country seeking immigrants. Israel, like Canada, is trying to add to its population by immigration, and it has been our policy since the war—and I have no doubt it was before—not to go to countries of immigration to look for immigrants. In other words, we do not try to encourage immigration into Canada from Australia, from New Zealand or from South American countries that are seeking to get people, or from Israel. I thing I am betraying no confidences when I say that representations have been made to us more than once by the government of Israel to the effect that they would view with concern any attempt on our part to look to Israel for immigrants.

Now, that does not mean that anyone who lives in Israel is automatically excluded from Canada. There are many cases where families have been separated and where the husband may be in Israel and the wife here in Canada, or where the children or the parents may be there. We do try to provide through the legation which was recently established in Israel a very limited service to deal with humanitarian and compassionate cases of that kind; but we are not seeking immigrants from Israel. As a matter of fact I think I may say that our department, like all other Canadians, welcomes the peaceful development of Israel and we do not want in any way to compete with them for people, and I do not think it would be a friendly act to do so.

It may be that there are individuals in Israel who would very much like to come to Canada, but if we systematically encouraged that kind of movement I think it would be considered by the authorities there to be a regrettable interference with what they are attempting to accomplish.

Mr. Michener: Will the minister permit me to ask a question on that same subject? That of course is an understandable point of view, but there is a different consideration where families are concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite.

Mr. Michener: The grievances that have come to my notice with respect to emigration from Israel relate to relatives here who want to bring close relatives from Israel, and they are finding the greatest difficulty in doing so because apparently there is no machinery for dealing with that situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, by close relatives I mean close relatives in the strictest sense. I mean parents and children, not nephews, not cousins or collateral relations of any kind, because I suppose a great proportion of the population of Israel have relatives somewhere in North America and if the net were widened at all it would not mean anything.

Mr. Michener: I am referring to close relatives.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the same sense?

Mr. Michener: For example, the daughter is free to come but there is no way to see whether her medical or other qualifications, formal qualifications, can be met, and so it is impossible for families who have close relatives to be reunited.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that situation is improving a little and will improve quite a bit more when our mission there has really found its feet. Of course, it has just been established in the last few months, as hon. members know.

I now come to the question of migration to the United States. I suppose I can make an answer that strictly speaking, in the narrow sense of the term, it is not the business of the immigration branch at all, but I am not going to make any such answer. I was asked some questions about this upstairs and I gave a table which is to be found on page 61 of the evidence of the estimates committee dated Monday, February 28. It was derived from the United States statistics. The hon. gentleman suggested that this should be put on the record. I wonder whether I might have the consent of the committee to have the second paragraph on this page inserted in the record without reading it?

The table follows:

Hon. Mr. Pickersgill: The question asked was the number of emigrants from Canada to the United States during the period 1945 to June 1954. I have here the number of emigrants from Canada to the United States for the United States fiscal year, July 1 to June 30 during the period 1945 to 1954:

Year	Total
1946	20,434
1947	23,467
1948	24,788
1949	24,516
1950	21,885
1951	25,880
1952	33,354
1953	36,283
Total	256,559

These are taken, for the period 1945 to 1950, from a Dominion Bureau of Statistics report which quotes the United States immigration and naturalization service as the source thereof. The figures for 1951 to 1954 were taken from a report prepared by the statistical branch of the United States immigration and naturalization service.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the total for 10 years?

Mr. Pickersgill: The total for 10 years is 256,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And these are naturalized Canadians?

Mr. Pickersgill: It represents Canadian citizens, whether native-born or naturalized. I am not really quite convinced that it is the net figure because, as everyone knows, particularly for Canadian citizens, and more particularly for Canadian-born citizens, there is the very greatest ease of movement back and forth across the border. I suspect that on many occasions someone is shown in these United States figures as having been a Canadian immigrant to the United States who goes there and perhaps spends a year, and then comes back, and is not registered as a returning Canadian resident in the United States but merely as a visitor over there, and therefore we do not get the net figure. The difference would not be very great.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister any figures to show the numbers who left Canada but were not naturalized?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am coming to that. I do not think I have forgotten the hon. gentleman's question. I have no figures of any kind in which I would place the slightest reliance to show what number of immigrants or aliens, even though they were not recent immigrants but resident in Canada for some time, may have gone to the United States in the past 10 years. I would be incredulous of the figure the hon. gentleman gave. Two hundred and forty thousand strikes me as much too high in relation to what we do know about the increase of the population of Canada over this last decade.

However, I think we will be able, when the census is taken and we get the figures in 1956, by the process of taking the natural increase and the known figures for immigration to arrive at a pretty fair figure of the numbers who have been lost, not only to the United States, but to all countries, by every form of emigration. Of course, it will not be possible from the census to break them down, but we will get the global figure in that way. To be quite candid about it, this to my mind is one of the biggest advantages of having the census taken in 1956, but I do not think we will really have any firm idea of what the net effect on the Canadian population has been of the post-war immigration until we have the census figures. As a matter of fact, I would appreciate from any source any practical, workable suggestions for measuring the emigration from Canada. It would be of the greatest possible help to the planning of our department to have such figures. We try to get every bit of information we can, on which we can place any reliance. For a variety of reasons unless we establish inquisitorial methods, it is very difficult to get it, except in the way I have suggested when the census is taken.

To come to the other question asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), about the checking of the applications for citizenship: as I think all members of the committee know, an application for citizenship must be filed with the clerk of the court. That is prescribed in section 27 of the act. It must be posted by the clerk in a conspicuous place in his office, or as otherwise prescribed by regulation, continuously for a period of at least three months before the application is heard by the court. The purpose of that is not merely to check the possibilities of what, I hope, I will not be misinterpreted in describing in a general way as subversive tendencies, but also to check the ordinary police records of applicants for citizenship. As the committee knows, under the Immigration Act the minister has a certain responsibility if landed immigrants are convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude. It enables interested persons to make representations to the court. The onus is placed on the judge of deciding these questions of good character and potentialities for good citizenship of the kind mentioned by the hon. member.

It is no secret, I think—at any rate it will not be from now on—that the department does avail itself of the services of the R.C.M.P. for that purpose. It may be that once in a while, in an individual case, something may happen so that it is not done as it should be. I would be very much surprised if there were not a slip once in a while. I am sure the county judges who do this work all over this country—I can say this from my own recent personal knowledge because I recently wrote a circular letter to all of them and have had a series of most interesting replies from many of them—are taking a deep personal interest in this work. I am glad to say that I think most of them are more concerned about giving a little encouragement to these people to become good citizens than trying to find too many flaws in their records. But if there are serious flaws, we try to do our best to find them, and I think the judges do too.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I wish to comment briefly on a question raised by the hon. member for Vegreville to which the minister has already made a reply. I do so because I think that the matter he raised is important beyond the technicalities involved. I am very glad that the minister has admitted that the department—I shall not use the words

"was at fault"—certainly was not using good judgment in some of the letters that went out. The hon. member for Vegreville stated that it amounted to an insult to have the kind of letters that were written to applicants. The minister and others may have thought that a rather strong word, but in view of the circumstances I think that was well justified because there has been, I think, a tendency for a certain amount of double talk on this question of these nations that have lost their sovereignty. When one takes into consideration that only as recently as the 8th of July, 1953, which date has some significance in that it was fairly close to a national event which took place that summer, the Prime Minister himself, speaking to the all-Canada congress of the Ukrainian Canadian committee, used these words, I would like to place them on the record because I think they are rather important coming from the Prime Minister of Canada. In reference to the struggle for the independence of the Ukraine, he used these words:

> There may be many setbacks and disappointments, but all who believe this world is presided over by a Divine Providence must believe that one day the Ukrainian people will find a solid basis for political and cultural self-expression under a government, which, because freely chosen, will freely represent them. Then the long night of oppression will be over.

I quote those words with approval. All through that speech made on that date the words "Ukraine" and "Ukrainian people" appear again and again. With that background and taking that into consideration, one can easily understand the disappointment and shock that a person would feel on receiving a letter from an official in the department of immigration informing him quite blandly and bluntly that there is no such place as the Ukraine.

Mr. Pickersgill: No such country.

Mr. Zaplitny: One can imagine the reaction of anyone who fell under similar circumstances. I believe that the minister has done himself a great deal of good today by having quite frankly and openly admitted that it was at least bad judgment and agreeing to have that change made. While on that subject, I think, because of the general interest in the question, it could be pointed out that when the minister referred to the political regions concerned, the impression should not be left that any large number—and certainly not the majority of the immigrants coming in recent years to Canada—of Ukrainian origin came from jurisdictions under the U.S.S.R., because that is not the case. As a matter of fact, at the end of the second world war the Ukraine was partitioned, as hon. members know, into four separate regions. There was a part under the U.S.S.R., a part that came under Poland, another portion that came into Austria, and a part under Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. gentleman say "the second world war"?

Mr. Zaplitny: The first world war. That situation continued until the second world war. As a result of certain agreements into which we entered at Yalta and other places the situation came about whereby all the regions known as the Ukraine fell within the boundaries of the U.S.S.R.—not only the Ukraine, but at least a part of Poland and a good part of some other nations. When that came about, the great majority of those who left those regions, and for the time being were in a state of exile as displaced persons in Germany, France and other countries, were people who came from that area which had been under Austria and under Poland. There would be a minority, and probably a small minority, that would be from Russia proper, simply because of the fact that they could not get out. Under those circumstances I should not like the impression to be left that they came from the U.S.S.R. in the first place, because they did not. Therefore stating to a person that he must not use the word "Ukraine" as his country of birth is not asking that he state his correct nationality but, as a matter of fact, it is almost forcing him to state his wrong nationality by trying to force him into a region from which he did not come.

I am glad that matter is being cleared up. It has more effect in the long run, as I said, than has the technical matter involved. As the minister will realize, and as do all hon. members, the cold war has not ended and the forces of communism in the Ukraine and in Moscow are extremely anxious to obtain any material on which they can lay their hands, and on the basis of which they can make political hay or propaganda. It is matters like these which cause discontent and irritation—and quite justifiably so—which fall into their hands and which are built up and exaggerated to great proportions in order to discredit the democratic countries.

I believe it is a fortunate thing many of the countries of the free world, particularly Great Britain, have taken some steps in recent years which have brought to the side of the western nations and to the side of freedom the peoples of Asia. I think it should be stated at this time that the one great act of statesmanship performed by the government of Great Britain under the leadership of Right Hon. Clement Attlee, when they granted independence to India, did more to tip the scales in favour of the free countries, so far as Asia is concerned, than did any other event since the second world war ended. One can imagine what kind of a field day the communists would have had at Bandung recently had it not been for the fact that Nehru and others were there to speak for the democratic world.

These things which may appear to be small on the surface and perhaps unimportant in the eyes of some people have projected themselves into the international sphere with an importance quite beyond that of their immediate effect in our own country. I think it is quite important that, from time to time when these matters arise, the minister be as cautious as possible and try to straighten the situation out before it creates resentment in the first place and before it becomes, in the second place, an excuse or a thin edge of the wedge for the communist forces, supplying them with something with which to make propaganda.

I think the minister is to be commended for the attitude he has taken today. I think the hon. member for Vegreville is to be commended for having brought this matter to the attention of the committee.

I think the minister is rather painfully aware—from the rather painful emphasis placed on a certain incident—of how easy it is to do something which causes resentment. In this case I think he has to a great extent retrieved himself by taking prompt and, in my judgment, reasonable action.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Dauphin. I agree completely with everything he has said. I must say that no one could regret more than I do that this action was taken. In fairness to the officials who took it, I feel I must say this. I do not object at all to the word "insult", but it was a most unintentional one. The moment the matter was drawn to my attention, the greatest regret was expressed by the officials concerned. These are devoted people who work extremely hard in this branch; and the last thing they want to do is to hurt the feelings of any Canadians, no matter from where they come.

Mr. Zaplitny: In order that there may be no misunderstanding may I at this point say that, so far as I am concerned personally, I have found that we have received good co-operation from the officials of the department of immigration. I am certainly not trying to leave the impression that anyone intentionally tried to insult anyone. But that is the reason I drew attention to the international phase of this situation. I think it is important that the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration work rather closely together in order that the policy of the government on these matters may be clear.

May I be permitted just to continue for a moment or two and say that the same situation will arise in a short time with respect to other countries. There is that sector, as I have mentioned, of Poland which is now in the U.S.S.R. There are the Baltic countries which find themselves in the same situation. For the time being the department has ruled that any territorial changes made as a result of the second world war shall not be taken into consideration. That ruling is fine so far as it goes, but the dead hand of time has a tendency to condone the acquisition of territory by conquest. We have seen that thing happen. I hope the government of Canada will be alive to that situation and will not allow itself to fall into that trap in the future.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am grateful, Mr. Chairman, to have at last been able to catch your kindly and benevolent eye. As a matter of fact, I have been waiting since last Friday to make a few remarks on this important subject of immigration. Usually under these circumstances there is a tendency for speeches to accumulate and to gather momentum; but I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall be brief in what I have to say here this afternoon.

I want to deal for a moment with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and its appearance before the committee on the estimates. I do so because I arrived on that committee late in the proceedings. My name was added to the membership when the departmental discussions were half concluded, with the result that I did not have an opportunity actually to take part in the important preliminary discussions which endeavoured to appraise the effectiveness of the committee method of handling the estimates of the various departments. I am also dealing with it briefly because I feel that this is an important innovation in our parliamentary procedure.

Unfortunately I came away from that committee feeling that we had not accomplished too much by way of settling fundamental difficulties and misunderstandings relating to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. From the extended discussion which has gone on with respect to this first item, I think it will be concluded that other members are of the same opinion.

In my opinion there are three reasons why the discussion in the committee on estimates was not as successful as it might have been. I am going to state those three reasons briefly and quite specifically. First of all—and there was some discussion on this point—I believe the committee felt somewhat inhibited because of the presence of the minister in a dominating role. I know the interpretation of the minister with regard to the work of the committee. He regards it as a miniature of the committee of the whole sitting on the estimates. Unfortunately, if that precedent becomes established where a department comes under censure by public opinion, there is a great possibility of the committee being substituted for a full-blown committee of inquiry, with the result that this estimates committee could become merely a whitewash procedure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate very much to interrupt the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, for whom I have very great esteem, but he is a member of parliament senior to me and it does seem to me there is a rule of the house that a question which has been decided should not be further debated in the same session. The question of whether the minister should be a member of the committee was debated and decided by the house.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether you are going to restrict me in discussing this point in a general way. As I have already indicated, I think it is important that particularly the members of the house who took part in the proceedings of the committee should have an opportunity to give their viewpoints on the matter. I am not actually saying that the minister should not be permitted to be a member of the committee. I am merely indicating that, from my standpoint at least, one of the reasons why I feel the committee was not as effective as it might have been was that the minister was there in a dominating role. I have not sought to deny him the right to be a member of the committee. He, as a native of Manitoba, has all the geniality of most Manitobans, and from that standpoint he added much to the atmosphere of the committee. In fact on certain occasions during the discussions the minister, by flattery, cajolery and the general art of ingratiation, was able to create an atmosphere of considerable congeniality.

I think the effect was somewhat disarming because when a member of the committee like the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, a man of considerable discernment, indicates at the end of the discussions that he is completely satisfied with what has taken place, one becomes aware of the minister's skill so far as winning friends and influencing people is concerned. Unfortunately, however, instead of the committee acting as a group conscientiously considering the many problems relating to immigration—they have been referred to here this afternoon and last Friday—the committee tended to become somewhat of a mutual admiration society.

That brings me to the second weakness that appeared in the committee. In my view it became a mutual admiration society because of the inability to call for persons and papers outside of the department.

Mr. Winters: I wonder whether the hon. member would mind if I raised a point of order. This particular matter was debated and voted on, and therefore I think it is decidedly out of order to debate it at this time. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether you would see eye to eye with me on that point.

The Chairman: I had intended to rise previously when the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration raised his point of order, but I thought the hon. member who had the floor was concluding his remarks. I must find that I agree with both points of order that have been raised, and I must ask the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to confine his remarks to a general discussion of the affairs of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, as we usually do on the first item of a department. I realize we are breaking new ground in that this is the first time a department's estimates have been considered in committee of supply after having been considered in an estimates committee.

At the same time, our rules have been well established over many years and they generally give us the opportunity of debating certain matters at the most opportune time. On the first item of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration we have one of the best opportunities to debate the policies and administration of the department. This is certainly not the best opportunity to debate the proceedings of the committee on estimates or the advisability or inadvisability of having a committee on estimates. Therefore I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to a discussion of the affairs of the department.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall abide by your ruling and will simply conclude this part of my remarks by saying that in dealing with the problems facing parliament in this day and age, when the business of the house is growing in complexity, unfortunately we tend to resolve the difficulty by shortening discussion instead of providing for new procedures and techniques that would bring about a broader, wider and deeper discussion of parliamentary matters. That is not in the best interests of the parliamentary processes, as many authorities have said in recent days in writings on such themes as the passing of parliament and so on.

I turn now to a few general remarks on the department. Since the estimates committee met, I have had occasion to present two or three cases to the immigration department for its consideration. While there was an indication during the proceedings of the committee, if I may refer to that body, that the processes would be speeded up and matters expedited as the result of the representations made there, I have discovered that we still face the same difficulty of delayed decisions on certain immigration matters. There is the same confusion, the same pious platitudes referred to in the press, and the same tendency to talk around the point. With respect to one case dating back to 1953 I have received a reply from the minister reading in part as follows:

> I am unable to state when these inquiries will be completed but you may be certain the officials concerned will do their utmost in the matter. I shall of course keep you informed of developments.

I have been receiving the same answer since March, 1953.

There is one specific point I should like to raise at this time relating to Chinese immigration. I am given to understand that the regulations relating to the migration of Chinese citizens into Canada apply to Chinese-American citizens in the same way as they do to any other prospective oriental immigrants.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is persons of Chinese race.

Mr. Dinsdale: Persons of Chinese race. Well now, that leads me to make another brief comment on the lack of lucidity in departmental policy. According to the general statement of 1947 one of the major categories in determining who were eligible to migrate to Canada was this factor of not altering the fundamental character of the people. It is difficult to know what is meant by "fundamental character". It is difficult to know whether it means race, culture or the other characteristics that might be summed up in that phrase "fundamental character".

In the case of a Chinese American citizen, of course, there is no difficulty of assimilation because his background is largely American. He has been educated in American schools; he thinks as an American, and there is no difficulty whatever from the standpoint of assimilation or from the standpoint of cultural conflict. It would appear, therefore, that one interpretation of this very vague definition of policy is definitely discriminatory on the basis of race. I should like to submit that that is not a very enlightened policy in the year 1955 when the world has become a veritable whispering gallery, and when we are faced with all these sociological threats of the atomic era.

I shall bring my remarks to a conclusion, Mr. Chairman, by stating that last evening we listened to a very comprehensive discussion of the immigration problem by the hon. member for Cartier. There is no need for me to repeat the many excellent points he raised in that discussion, but I think it is a speech that deserves the consideration of the department. Certainly he set forth a much more vigorous, much more visionary policy for 1955 than the studied vagueness of the 1947 policy which it would seem the department is still following.

Mr. MacKenzie: I have no desire at all at this time to hold up the estimates of this department. I must say that, by and large, I have had very good co-operation from the immigration officials. I have found them most co-operative when cases had merit and when there was some justification for bringing people into Canada.

But there is one particular case that has caused me a great deal of concern. I have written a great many letters and done a lot of telephoning in connection with it. I am not sure it has been brought to the minister's attention. The case concerns a family that I knew very well in Shanghai, China. In my opinion, they were good citizens. I believe their origin was central European, and they had a very good business in Shanghai. The family consisted of the parents, who were middle aged, a daughter who was married and the son in law. The daughter and her husband came to Canada a few years ago and settled in Vancouver. They would have brought the parents at that time but they were not in a financial position to pay the passage and, in any event, they had no place in which to settle.

These people have now become well established in Vancouver, and are endeavouring to bring the parents to Canada. Since Canada has no representative in China, I believe communication is had through the British consul situated in Shanghai. Application has been made to the British consul and a Canadian visa has been obtained. The parents have had their medical and have all assurances that they can come to Canada, but they are unable to get an exit permit from the Chinese government. My opinion is that they have never been able to get their case understood by the right authorities in China, because there would be no logical reason for the Chinese government keeping them there. They will never contribute anything to the national life, and they are only consumers.

I would suggest that the minister might use a little influence with the British consul in an attempt to show the Chinese government that these people should be permitted to come to Canada. I do not know whether or not that is regular, but I feel sure that these people are not able to get their request understood by the proper Chinese authorities. As a matter of fact, I would not mind writing to Chou En-lai myself if I thought he would ever get the letter or that it would do any good. I suggest that something along that line could be done, because these people are very anxious to have their parents come to Vancouver. They are well established and able to provide for them, and the family should be united if at all possible.

Mr. Winch: I am in somewhat the same position as the previous speaker, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to hold up these estimates, but this committee is the only place that I can get an answer to a certain question. I should like to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, how one proves he is a Canadian citizen. I ask that question because about two months ago the department under the control of the minister sent to all members I presume—I received one anyway—a certain communication.

I want to refer to the introduction. I do not know what to call it, Mr. Chairman, because there is no heading on it. The communication has these words at the bottom of it, "Department of Citizenship and Immigration; Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, minister; Laval Fortier, deputy minister". I am not going to quote all of it, but it says this:

> As a convenience to Canadian citizens, who wish to have a certificate of citizenship which can be carried easily with them, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration now has available a miniature certificate which fits into wallet or purse.

Mr. McIvor: Hear, hear; that is right.

Mr. Winch: Yes. Farther down, the communication reads:

> The application form, (C.R.1), which may be obtained from any clerk of court or from the registrar of Canadian citizenship, Ottawa, must be fully completed by the applicant, sworn to before a notary public, commissioner for oaths or justice of the peace, and sent together with the statutory fee of $2 to—

And so on. I have not replied to this as yet because the communication says this form C.R.1 must be fully completed. At the same time as I received the communication I got a copy of form C.R.1. Here is form C.R.1. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I am a Canadian citizen. At least, I was a member of the British Columbia legislature for 20 years, I have been here for two sessions, and no one has yet challenged that fact. If it is correct that form C.R.1 must be fully completed, then I say the reason I have not done so is that it is impossible for me to do it. It is absolutely impossible. So I am asking this question. Here is form C.R.1, and we will start on the first page. "My place of birth is"—O.K., I can prove that; I have my certificate. Then, "My date of birth is"—yes, I can prove that, because I have my birth certificate. Then, "My occupation is"—you know, that has me a bit stumped.

Mr. Pickersgill: It never bothered me.

Mr. Winch: It won't after the next election, either. I am an electrician by trade, and I sign that way. But for 22 years I have been an elected member.

Then, "Years of experience"—

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a question?

Mr. Winch: Sure.

Mr. Pickersgill: What occupation did he put on the ballot paper?

Mr. Winch: "Electrician".

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, that would be satisfactory.

Mr. Winch: Fine. It says, "State any other occupational skills". Do I say "M.P."? However, that is only by the way. But these questions can bother an awful lot of people.

And now I am coming to the important part—because I was not born in Canada, I was born in England. The minister is shaking his head, because he does not know what I am coming to. But you will shake your head the other way when you do.

Now, look, almost underneath this, on the front page, it says, "I am a Canadian citizen by"—well, I can come only under two of these classifications, namely (B) (C). We find that (B) says, "Birth outside of Canada. (See appendix A)". And then classification (C) says, "Being a British subject with Canadian domicile, or by maintaining a place of domicile in Canada for 20 years immediately before January 1, 1947. (See appendix B)".

I could come under only those two classifications. All right; now let us turn to the back page, to appendix A and appendix B—and I am not being facetious about this, at all. I am only referring to it because of this document—which I cannot properly name—which says that form C.R.1 must be fully completed if I want to have proof that I am a Canadian citizen.

O.K.; let us now look at appendix A and appendix B—because I must come under either one or the other. Let us look at appendix A. Well, sir, I can answer only one question in appendix A—and I have no proof of even that one. I can answer it only because I honour my father.

What is the first question? It is this: "My responsible parent"—yes, "my responsible parent"—I honour my father. I will answer it that way. But I always thought it took two to have me born.

Mr. Pickersgill: It only takes one to make you a Canadian citizen.

Mr. Winch: Maybe so, but it takes two to have me born. So, who is "my responsible parent". Is it my mother or is it my father?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I had better answer the hon. gentleman now.

Mr. Winch: Oh no, let me go ahead.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know whether the hon. member wants an answer.

Mr. Winch: Let me go ahead; answer later.

Mr. Hosking: He is only wasting time.

Mr. Winch: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Hosking: I said you are only wasting time.

Mr. Winch: Well, I don't think I am wasting time for the mothers and fathers of this country when I question having to answer who "responsible parents" are.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Maybe we will find out what babies the minister was talking about in Victoria.

Mr. Winch: I don't think I am wasting time. Now, this is something!—"My responsible parent". You know, it hit me as being wrong, as soon as I saw it. You ask me who my responsible parent is. That was an absolute insult, as soon as I saw it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, would the hon. gentleman let me answer.

Mr. Winch: You can answer after I am through.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly, and I shall be glad to.

Mr. Winch: "My responsible parent"—O.K.; let us go on after that. I come now to this: "Who was admitted to Canada on"—well, I know I came here in 1910. But, according to this, I cannot tell you the date, nor can I tell you the port of entry or the ship. In fact, I cannot tell you anything that would have to be answered in appendix A—except that my dad is Ernest Winch. That is all I can tell you. So, in this document you sent around to us a few months ago, which says that appendix A must be fully completed, I cannot answer the questions.

Then, suppose we go on to appendix B which, first of all, asks me to "Give full particulars of your entries and departures". Then it states "First arrival at"—and then there is a space for the "port", the "date" and the "ship".

Sir, in appendix B I cannot answer one single question.

Mr. Hosking: You could find out if you wanted to.

Mr. Winch: Time after time, in old age pension applications, we hit this question: When did you arrive at the port of entry, on what ship and on what date? And it cannot be answered. I cannot answer it, to get my own little card that I would like to have; because it says here that I must fully complete this document. I would say that to complete it would be almost an impossibility for the great majority of people born outside of Canada.

So I would ask the minister now—and he has been jumping up several times—to explain how you prove you are a citizen, under your orders, when it is impossible to complete the document that you say has got to be filled out in full.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman shares with me and with a few other new members the distinction of having had no part in defining the phrase "responsible parent", because neither he nor I was here when the act was passed. However, most members in the house helped to pass the Canadian Citizenship Act; and if before making his speech this afternoon, the hon. gentleman had looked, as I should have thought, as an experienced legislator, he would have done, at the legislation upon which this document is based, he would have found that the expression "responsible parent" is defined in the interpretation section.

I do not think there is need for me to waste the time of the committee in reading the section, because most hon. members helped to put it through parliament.

But, of course, that is not the point at issue. If the hon. member had read the document at all carefully he would have seen that all he needed to do to establish the fact that he is a Canadian citizen was to indicate, as he has indicated today, that he was a British subject and had resided in Canada for 20 years before January 1, 1947. And, having done that, no other proof of any kind would have been necessary.

Mr. Winch: "And", "and", "and"—sign appendix B. Come on, now—sign appendix B; that must be done. And I cannot answer appendix B—I cannot answer one question in it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, if the hon. gentleman would send me his birth certificate I would have the form filled out for him, and save him the trouble.

Mr. Winch: O.K. But it is not going to stop there, because I am not interested myself. I know that, without doubt, I could have gone to my friend and got my certificate. I am talking on behalf of the thousands of people in Canada who get this form and do not know what to do with it; I am not worrying about myself.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, on that point, the hon. gentleman read in the circular that the thing to do was to go to the clerk of the court. I think he would find that any clerk of the court would be willing to help him. I admit that some of the language sounds a little silly. I shall have a look at it to see whether we can improve it.

Mr. Winch: And the questions are stupid.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Perhaps there is something more than merely faulty language to it. I had the same reaction as the hon. member for Vancouver East and I was in the same position myself. I could not tell you what port I landed at or the date on which I landed. I was a child at the time. It is getting close to 50 years ago. But there are quite a lot of people in Canada who might have very serious difficulty in proving to you that they were qualified under that section. They were born in Britain; perhaps they had a British birth certificate. They might not even have that, and they might have great difficulty in proving that they had lived in Canada for the sufficient length of time.

Mr. Pickersgill: That of course was one of the reasons why the 20-year rule was put in. It was to obviate that kind of difficulty. If there are any serious difficulties of this sort I shall be very glad indeed to give consideration to them. I recognize that the hon. member for Vancouver East is having a little fun at my expense.

Mr. Winch: No, sir.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I think that most of us, myself included, have difficulties, even though I have not the difficulties of either of the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, but I have some others. I am allergic to forms. I hate filling them out. I get my secretary to do it, and she seems to know how. I do think there is a great deal to be said for simplifying those forms in any way that that can be done; but there is an inherent difficulty. When you live in a country as we do, a country with immigrants from all quarters of the earth, the number of variations of experiences is so great that it is very hard to get a simplified form that will elicit the first time all the information that is necessary, and you have to balance, on the one hand, asking too many questions, and sometimes too complicated questions, against on the other hand having to write a second letter, which is also very annoying to applicants.

Mr. Winch: I understand that and, Mr. Chairman, please, I am not trying to embarrass the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not suggest that; I know you are just having fun.

Mr. Winch: No; it costs almost $6,000 an hour to keep the House of Commons in session, and I am not having fun and will never have fun at that expense. Did the minister know—and this applies to members of the House of Commons—that under his name the form says that C.R. 1 has to be fully completed in order to get your registration and your certificate as a Canadian citizen, and did he know what it entailed because, sir, I cannot answer completely any of these questions?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do think that we who were, shall I say, unfortunate enough not to have been born in Canada and at the same time to have been born in the British Isles are in a rather anomalous position in Canada. We are, you know, Mr. Chairman, rather in the position of the man who said he was the only person in the gallery who had a certificate to prove that he was sane.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was in the house.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Well, sometimes I have felt that we are almost in a worse position than the other people who were born in Germany, in Italy, or anywhere else. They have a certificate to show that they are Canadians, but we who were born in the British Isles are sort of left floating in the air. It is rather difficult for us to prove our status. The minister should examine the wording of the act. Perhaps it may have to be amended to clear up the position of people like ourselves. It is simple enough for individuals like the hon. member for Vancouver East and me; we can prove it, but there are a lot of people who cannot.

Mr. Huffman: May I bring to the attention of the minister the problem of young people born to naturalized Canadians but of foreign birth? These young people grow up and attend our Canadian schools and universities. The young graduate from time to time finds lucrative employment in the United States or in some other country. Many employing companies feel that these young people will remain employed much longer if they become citizens of the country in which they are working, and often pressure is exerted on them to this end; consequently, they give up their citizenship. At this time I know that a number of these young people would like to return to Canada, but they hesitate to do so because they are required to wait five years before attaining Canadian citizenship again. May I recommend to the minister that this class of people be regarded as those coming within the one-year residence requirement for citizenship. I believe that these former Canadians will prove to be a great asset from the experience they have gained outside of Canada. This matter comes to my attention rather forcibly because only this week I had a senior class of boys from a Chatham school. This school was represented by seven different language groups. I believe the situation also comes about because of our close proximity to the United States border.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a provision of the law now. If they are natural-born Canadians it does not matter who their parents are.

Mr. Huffman: These young people came to this country with their parents, who were of foreign extraction.

Mr. Pickersgill: They were not born in Canada.

Mr. Huffman: That is correct.

Mr. Pickersgill: The provision is only for natural-born Canadians.

Mr. Weselak: A great deal of emphasis has been placed on some statistics in this debate in regard to questions relating to date and port of entry, and so on. I have had occasion to handle dozens of applications for citizenship for various people from various parts of the world in my constituency. In the majority of cases they do not know their port of entry or the exact date of entry and other related details; but I have always found that as long as the basic qualifications for citizenship are established the department has never refused an application on the ground that this information is not available.

Mr. McIvor: I will be brief, Mr. Chairman. The minister and the officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration have a great job to do in settling all the differences that come to them from every country in the world. Like the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, I have had something to do with the officials of the department and they have treated me fairly well. I did not get all I wanted, but perhaps I wanted too much. I know I wanted two Chinese boys out in Fort William whose fathers were citizens of Canada, and I have not been successful in getting them in yet, but the fight is still on.

The reason I rose was to say that I tried for two years to get a family out from Poland. They were Hebrews or Jews. We got them out, and that family has been a credit to the country they came from and an asset to Canada. The boy and girl have now graduated from the university and they paid me the great honour at Christmastime of addressing me as Rabbi Dan McIvor. I have a case now that bothers me, and I tell the minister that I am not going to let go. The young man in question has a father and mother, uncles and aunts and brothers and sisters in Fort William. He did a bad deed, but of course the temptation was not considered. He is now to be deported. His case should be reconsidered. I am sure that the parish priest and I will go good for the conduct of that boy in the future. It is not fair to punish his family by sending him out of Canada. He is now in Guelph. I can give the full particulars to the minister, and I shall keep on trying for his answer. I ask that this case be reconsidered, and not ended, as the letter which I received today indicated.

Mr. Winch: There is one statement I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. I always like to be absolutely honest. I do want it known that since I first came here as a result of the election on August 10, 1953, I have had a number of immigration cases. I ran into trouble on most of them. I want to say, because I think it is only fair to say it, that since the present minister has been in his post he has reviewed all the cases I have drawn to the attention of his department since I first came here. All have been adjusted by him, with the exception of one, and it is not his fault that this last one has not been adjusted. I want to say that I have had the finest co-operation from the minister and all cases have been satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, I want to make it plain at the outset that anything I might say is not with the idea that I am opposed to immigration. I am not opposed to immigration. I realize that all our forefathers were immigrants at some time, and some of them were even more than immigrants; they took over this country by brute force. The only genuine Canadian babies are the Indians and Eskimos in our country.

I should like to add one little matter to a point that was raised by the hon. member for Vegreville and the hon. member for Dauphin. When Canadians, even though they have been in Canada for a good number of years and are naturalized, happen to go to the United States just for a day or so, one of the first things they are asked is "Where were you born?" If the answer is, "Well, where I was born is now under the jurisdiction of the Soviet union", we find that Canadian citizens are at times unduly subjected to unnecessary interrogation. I believe that if adequate representations were made by the minister in co-operation with the Secretary of State, that difficulty might be eased somewhat.

Many of those people came to Canada many years before what is now the soviet regime had control over their territory. Because that area is now under soviet domination, these people face hours of interrogation at times. The Americans are rather sensitive, and I take it they want to make very sure that no communist is allowed entry into the United States even for a visit. I think that in those cases where this takes place the officials proceed merely under orders they have received from the authorities in the United States government and they do not mean any ill at all, but it causes considerable irritation in the minds of many Canadians.

A matter I wish to speak on is this problem of whether immigrants cause unemployment. I think most Canadians might say it has not been proven that immigration causes unemployment. However, I think that depends on what type of immigration we have into Canada. In looking at our Canadian population we see that out of some 15½ million people, some five million are in the Canadian labour force. In other words some two-thirds of our population—67 per cent of Canadians—who are not in employment could be classed as dependents. If we want to show that immigration does not cause unemployment, then I believe the same ratio would also have to apply to our immigrants. However, if we take a look at our statistics we find, for example, that in the year ending March 31, 1953, less than 46 per cent of the immigrants were classed as dependent wives or dependent children. I think the figure for last year is about the same.

I believe that is a clear indication that we are not receiving the average family such as we have in Canada. I think the percentage of single people entering Canada looking for immediate employment is far out of line. I often wonder whether these immigrants have no wives and children, and how it is that often much more than half our immigrant population seeks and obtains direct employment. I think the possible origin of this wrong percentage stems from the fact that it seems to be the policy of the government to lay down rules and regulations under which immigrants may come to Canada if they wish.

I feel that is a wrong attitude to take. I think our Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, with his cabinet colleagues, should decide on what immigrants the Canadian economy needs and then should actively pursue a course to see to it that we obtain these immigrants. They should not merely lay down rules and regulations and have a staff of civil servants administer them and leave it to the employers in Canada. Often employers look for immigrant labour because they can for a limited time obtain that labour at lower wage rates. I agree that we need a greater population in Canada, but I am also convinced that it is up to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to make sure we do obtain the immigrants we wish.

The hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned possible immigration into Canada from Israel. I understand that there are almost three-quarters of a million displaced persons immediately outside Israel. If we need more people in Canada, and I agree that we do, I sometimes wonder whether such a wealthy nation as Canada could not undertake such measures to relieve some of the serious tension that exists there. We all know that when the state of Israel was formed, roughly three-quarters of a million people of Hebrew origin flooded into that state. At the same time almost the same number of natives of Israel left the land and are today, and have been for years, looked after by the United Nations. The Arabic nations around the borders of Israel do not want these people to become permanent residents, and the state of Israel, naturally enough, does not want the people of Arabic origin to re-enter Israel and become settled there.

When I look at the table for the year I previously mentioned I notice that in that year we admitted 4,539 immigrants of Hebrew origin. People of Syrian origin are listed as 184. People of Arabic origin are listed as 70. When there is a camp—a future trouble spot—with three-quarters of a million displaced persons, and from those displaced persons as well as the four or five nations around Israel we admitted only 254, I hardly think we are doing everything we might do.

My main reason for rising in this discussion of the first immigration item in the estimates was to protest immigration policy in regard to citizens of India. I believe the same would apply to citizens of one or two other nations near India. I believe we have an agreement with the government of India and one with the government of Ceylon—and, I think, with one or two other similar nations—whereby we set a limit on the number of immigrants Canada will take. We do not set such a limit on other regions of the world, even on some of the other coloured regions of the world.

I feel that the continuance of this quota arrangement is not in the best interests of our nation. I agree that no matter how wide we opened the door to orientals or to immigration from India we would not ease the severe overpopulation and economic hardships over there. However, by the very fact that we have a quota we are showing racial discrimination. Whether we are prepared to admit it or not, it is nothing short of racial discrimination, and it is keenly resented by these people. I realize that the quotas may have been agreed to by the governments of those countries, but we have quite a few of those people living within our nation. They are showing themselves to be good citizens, and they deeply resent this racial discrimination.

Then, I do not like the harsh interpretation of the immigration laws and the way they are being applied to relatives of Canadian citizens of Chinese origin. I think we are being unduly afraid lest there enter Canada in any one year 100 or 200 Chinese more than we are obliged to admit. I think we are being overly cautious. I would not think that a great catastrophe would happen to Canada if one citizen of China was able to enter the country and settle in each of our ridings, or a total of 265 who, under our present system of law enforcement with regard to the Immigration Act, would not be allowed in. I think we are being overly cautious and that we are asking far too much of a people who have never followed the type of record keeping that we follow and who have the most difficult time in producing evidence.

I do not feel very happy about the great authority given to officers of the immigration department. I realize—and I believe the minister said this last year—that the minister must rely on the word of an immigration officer because the immigration officer is, after all, the only one who has a chance to see the applicant and decide whether or not the applicant would make a good Canadian citizen. However, I should like to point out to the minister the great temptations that are placed in the way of these civil servants. We hear rumours from so many places around the world that we cannot dismiss them lightly. I should not be too greatly surprised if, one of these days, one member of the House of Commons is going to be able to produce some evidence of the temptation to which these immigration officers are exposed.

I think maybe one of the causes of temptation is to be found in an advertisement for posting in the civil service of Canada, in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The minister is here hoping to obtain medical officers. He is asking that they be graduates of a medical school of recognized standing, with a licence to practise medicine in any one province of Canada. They must have completed one general rotating internship. Various other qualifications are attached. I notice that the salary offered is $6,600 to $7,200 a year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not think this matter concerns my department in any way whatsoever. If the hon. gentleman will look again I think he will find that is so. To the best of my knowledge we do not engage doctors.

Mr. Regier: I thank the minister for his interruption. I notice that the advertisement says "Department of National Health and Welfare". However, may I say this. If that is the scale on which we pay our doctors and other qualified men who must be relied upon to carry out their obligations with the utmost integrity, then I am not too much surprised that so many of these rumours reach our offices.

I am not very happy—and I hope the minister will be able to explain the matter—about the process of screening for political affiliation that is now taking place. Shortly after the war I believe the department was extremely careful not to admit into Canada people who had nazi or fascist sympathies. I hope that situation obtains even now. I also hope there is the closest screening for people who might have communist tendencies or a faith in communism. It seems to me that, with regard to certain areas of the world from which we take immigrants, there are instances where the area of the world is more important than the matter of the possible political sympathies of the would-be immigrant. I have heard the statement made—and I think there may be some reason for it having been made—that a would-be immigrant from southern Italy, for example, is obliged to face practically no interrogation as to his political sympathies. We know that southern Italy has people who had great leanings both toward communism and towards fascism. I hope the minister will satisfy the nation that we are not letting in those people.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can clear up that point at once. There is absolutely no foundation for the hon. gentleman's statement. The same care is taken in that area that is taken anywhere else.

Mr. Regier: I am pleased to have the minister's denial. I hope he will elaborate just a little bit further at a later time and outline to the committee exactly what he means by "the same care". I think the Canadian people are becoming a little bit alarmed, and that they would like to know just what the same care consists of.

In ending my few remarks I want to emphasize once again the point that, if we want immigrants to come to Canada—and I admit that we want them—it should be the policy of the department of immigration not only to set down the rules and regulations but to see to it that we obtain the type of immigrants we want in this land of ours. We should not leave it up to would-be employers to decide who is to enter our country.

Mr. Churchill: Catching the chairman's eye has involved much greater physical activity this afternoon than I had counted on, and I am happy to have achieved my object. My remarks are going to be along a somewhat different line. I have a question or two to ask on policy in connection with immigration, but I think I shall save them until we come to the immigration branch, to which I think the minister quite wisely has been wanting to get.

What I have to say now concerns in a general way the value the House of Commons is receiving from the work of the estimates committee. I am not going over the debate we had in the house on that matter. I am just offering some suggestions. For example, at page 426 of the report of the estimates committee, considering the estimates of the department of immigration—and this is to be found in proceedings No. 14—the minister used these words:

> I imagine that it would not be reasonable to ask the committee of supply to consider this department until the proceedings of this committee are all printed, because it would not be fair to the members who are not here, and it would not save the time that we wished to save by this procedure.

Quite right. This department did not come before the committee of supply until the proceedings were printed. But here is my objection, Mr. Chairman. If the committee on estimates is going to be continued another session I think those who take cognizance of these matters should consider very carefully some method of making it possible for interested members to find in the reports of the proceedings what items have been discussed. I spent a considerable length of time in endeavouring to locate in these various volumes the answers with respect to a problem in which I am particularly interested, and it was like searching for a needle in a haystack. I knew the number of the item I wanted to find, but how do you find it in 14 volumes of proceedings?

It surely will be necessary for some index to be put at the front of these volumes. Surely it will be necessary to print in a heading the number of the vote being considered and the title of the vote, just as is done in Hansard. For example, when we started the consideration of this department the following information was set out at page 3290 of Hansard of April 29:

> Department of Citizenship and Immigration
> 59. Departmental administration, $493,651.

You cannot find anything like that in the reports of the proceedings of the estimates committee. I shall give three examples. At the second line on page 293 of the reports of the committee the chairman said:

> We are on items 66 and 68 of the estimates.

A member of the house who was not a member of the committee has to look at the estimates book to see what is dealt with by these items. If you look at page 385 you find in the second line that the chairman said:

> We are on the items numbered 70 to 80 inclusive in the estimates of the Indian affairs branch.

Suppose a member was interested in item No. 74 under "welfare of Indians, operation and maintenance"; how would he locate it? Well, you find it at page 409 of the proceedings of the committee, about 20 lines down from the top of the page where the chairman says:

> Now, gentlemen, we are on "welfare of Indians", the first item 74, "operation and maintenance".

If we are to gain anything by the work of the estimates committee when that committee reports back to the house, the reports of the proceedings of the committee should in some way make it possible for members to find quickly where items were discussed in that committee and the topics that were considered. If the items were set out in that way and could be referred to rather easily I would think a minister might be saved some effort in making his replies here. It might even be a minister who is more reticent and somewhat less loquacious than the hon. gentleman who is responsible for this department, but I make this suggestion as an aid to the minister concerned who might say that the question the hon. member was raising could be found answered completely at such and such a page in the proceedings of the estimates committee, and that he had nothing further to add. The converse is also true. Later I intend to suggest that at such and such a page of the proceedings of the committee the minister's answer to a certain question raised there was not complete and needs to be elaborated on this occasion.

I quite freely offer these suggestions to those in charge of preparing documents for the use of members of the House of Commons. I hope they will endeavour to prepare something for the future that will make it much easier for members of the house and others interested in these topics to find the information they would like to have.

Item agreed to.

60. Citizenship registration branch, $226,598.

Mr. Michener: I understood the minister to say at our last session that we would go on with immigration first, but we are taking item 60, are we?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. member must have misunderstood me. I wanted to take the items in the order they appear in the book.

Mr. Michener: Very good. Item No. 60 deals with the registration of Canadian citizens, which is basically a federal matter and not, like immigration, a matter of divided jurisdiction. We had considerable discussion in the committee, and I do not propose to dwell on the point I wish to make; but I think perhaps hon. members would be interested in knowing something about the magnitude of the problem of registration as it appears to be developing.

I appreciate that not many of the 1,200,000 immigrants who have come to Canada since the war have yet been registered as citizens, and of course there are many who are not qualified yet because five years' residence is a basic requirement. The number who have received certificates in the past few years is in the neighbourhood of 20,000 a year. I believe the number last year was 23,000. That includes Canadians and others who have obtained certificates just to prove what my friend was worrying about a few minutes ago, as well as others who are granted citizenship certificates on application through the regular procedures laid down by the department.

Those procedures are settled by the department under authority which is fairly broad. Basically the county court system has been used for the purpose of hearing applicants for citizenship and to find out whether or not they are qualified to receive their certificates.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but as it is five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

Small Loans Act

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REDUCE COST OF LOANS

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 304, to amend the Small Loans Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to provide for a reduction in the maximum interest rate that may be charged by small loans companies in Canada from 2 per cent per month to 1 per cent per month. It is now 16 years since parliament dealt with the interest rates that may be charged by small loans companies. In 1939 parliament placed the present ceiling of 2 per cent per month for the first 15-month period of the loan on interest rates that may be charged by small loans companies, and reduced the rate to 1 per cent per month after the initial 15-month period has elapsed.

The purpose of the bill is to reduce the 2 per cent maximum to 1 per cent and make the maximum ceiling 1 per cent per month for the whole period over which the loan may be repaid.

The interest today, as I said, is 2 per cent per month or 24 per cent per year. I believe that just stating that maximum should itself be almost sufficient to convince members of this house that this rate is too high. I suggest that 24 per cent per year is a fantastically high rate of interest, and it is certainly monstrous that Canadians who have to obtain small loans should be forced to pay such a very high and exorbitant interest rate.

From time to time one reads of the high interest rates that prevail in many countries in Asia and Africa. We read of interest rates prevailing there of 24 or 25 per cent per year and up to 50 per cent per year. Our reaction to reading that such a thing does occur is, is it not wonderful to live in Canada where we do not have to pay such high interest rates? The fact is, however, that hundreds of thousands of Canadians are continuously paying interest rates of 24 per cent per year, and in many instances interest rates very much higher than 24 per cent.

I intend to have something to say about those much higher rates when on a later occasion I move a bill standing in my name which deals with interest rates. I will, however, say to the house at this time that there are prominent business firms in Canada today, some of our biggest, that are charging interest rates on instalment buying up to as high as 54 per cent per year. When we speak, therefore, of the exorbitant rates prevailing in certain countries of Asia and Africa we should not be horrified, because such rates are currently being charged in Canada.

Small Loans Act

Over the years I believe the trend has been to reduce interest rates. It has been the more or less consistent policy of the government in power to endeavour to get the rate of interest down, and make credit and money more easily available. We now have a prevailing rate of interest on government bonds in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent, and in all instances I believe less than 4 per cent. The large sums of money that are now lent under the National Housing Act are being lent at a total interest rate of 5·25 per cent per year. The interest rate charged under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, about which I shall have something to say later, is 5 per cent per year. The regular rate of interest charged to people who borrow various sums of money from the banks is generally in the neighbourhood of 5 or 6 per cent.

Surely it is the job of members of parliament to study the Small Loans Act and the legislation pertaining to small loans companies and their practices, to see if we cannot do something to reduce the maximum of 24 per cent per year, which is four times as high as the interest rate charged on most loans obtained from our banking institutions. Members of this house should bear in mind that the people of Canada who accept loans from these small loans companies are, by and large, the people least able to afford such a high rate of interest. The job of government should be to make the rates that apply on loans to low income people as nearly as possible comparable to the rates that may be charged to people who are considered better risks. No matter what argument may be advanced as to the difference that must prevail in the rates, I suggest that the wide difference between the 6 per cent on ordinary bank loans and the 24 per cent on small loans is a drastic difference about which parliament should do something.

This is not the first time the C.C.F. party has advocated such a reduction in interest rates. As a matter of fact, when the legislation now on the statute books was introduced and passed by parliament in 1939 an amendment was moved and seconded by the present hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Their amendment asked that the maximum rate be reduced from 2 per cent per month to 1 per cent per month, as is provided in this bill. It went even farther and asked that the 1 per cent rate which prevails after the loan exceeds a period of 15 months be reduced to one-half of 1 per cent per month.

In the hope that this legislation might be more acceptable to all members of the house I decided that it might not be wise at this time to advocate that the 1 per cent be reduced to one-half of 1 per cent after 15 months, even though such a move might be desirable. I felt rather that the bill should be confined to something so reasonable that all members in all parts of the house could give it their full support. I want to point out that the credit unions in Canada are lending very large sums of money to their membership at a rate of 1 per cent per month. They are doing that successfully. They are covering all their expenses, and are able to declare a saving from time to time.

I should like to quote a short paragraph from an article written in the Canadian Unionist entitled "Desjardins States his Philosophy", by Ralph S. Staples, president of the Co-operative Union of Canada. This article, as is suggested by the title, deals in the main with the Desjardins philosophy and the great contribution he made to public life in Canada by promoting and fostering the original credit unions of this nation. The paragraph reads as follows:

> Already there are nearly 4,000 credit unions in Canada, with about 1·5 million members holding assets of about half a billion dollars and loaning well over $200 million to their members each year. The number of credit unions and the scope of their operations is growing rapidly. Only five years before, in 1948, credit unions numbered 2,600 and the membership was 850,600.

As I say, the credit unions have operated successfully on an interest rate of 1 per cent per month, and I suggest to members of the house that such a ceiling is indeed reasonable. I believe that the provision of credit is very important to any progressive nation, and that much of our prosperity at any given time depends upon Canadians being able to meet their credit needs readily and at reasonable interest rates.

Most of the loans that are obtained from the small loans companies, I suggest, are obtained for good purposes. They are obtained by the mother or father of a family, usually for the purchase of needed clothing, furniture for the home or in other instances to meet bills of an emergency nature.

Someone may say, "Well, these people should not be obtaining credit". But I suggest that in practice the average Canadian uses credit as a means of making a saving. That is, he obtains at one time a reasonable sum of money for the purchase of a given article, and arranges to repay the loan in instalments. At the end of the period of the loan he has made a saving, as represented by the article purchased when the loan was obtained. I suggest that the refrigerators, pianos, electric stoves, chesterfield suites and main items of household furniture in the majority of the homes in Canada have been obtained on some basis of credit—perhaps through a loan from a small loans company or, in other instances, by being purchased on a credit or instalment basis. And I believe that kind of practice should not be frowned upon. It is going to go on in any case, because people on low incomes are going to have to go without many of these items unless they can obtain reasonable credit.

That being the situation, I should like to see this legislation enacted, whereby such loans could be obtained at reasonable rates. As a matter of fact the kind of interest legislation we have in our nation today is class legislation. There are high interest rates for the low income groups and low interest rates for the high income groups. I am not suggesting that those rates can be equalized, but I do say that the difference in those rates at the present time is far too great. We should attempt to bring them closer together by reducing the maximum rates that may be charged by small loans companies.

Present legislation makes provision for a maximum loan of $500. I might have placed another section in the bill which would have increased the ceiling on what might be termed a small loan. I think if such provision were in the bill it would be a good one, because I would like to see the $500 ceiling greatly increased. It should be increased from $500 to shall we say $1,200, if it is to be kept in the same general terms as the 1939 act from the standpoint of purchasing power. Perhaps it should be $1,500, because even $1,500 in 1955 in many instances will buy very little more than could be bought for $500 when the legislation was enacted in 1939.

But even this, I suggest, is not going far enough. Perhaps the ceiling should be placed as high as $3,500, and I do not pick this amount at random. Rather I take it from section 75 of the Bank Act, which now provides that a bank may lend up to $3,500 and take security by way of a chattel mortgage. I suggest if it is found, for the purposes of the small loans departments of chartered banks, that a figure of $3,500 is reasonable, then in legislation of this kind, designed to keep interest rates down to a reasonable level, we might consider increasing the ceiling on the so-called small loan to at least $1,500. I would go so far as to say that it might be preferable to bring the amount up to $3,500, as is provided in the Bank Act.

The small loans business in Canada has become more and more important over the years. I have some figures here that will demonstrate just what rapid growth there has been in the business of small loans. A table showing the interest earned on small loans by small loan companies shows that in 1941 the interest earned amounted to $1,642,000, that in 1946 it had increased to $2,926,000, that in 1949, three years later, it had increased to $8,173,000 and that in 1953, the last year for which figures are available, the interest earned on loans by small loans companies in Canada amounted to $16,099,000, or an increase of 900 per cent within a period of 12 years.

These figures not only show the rapid growth of our Canadian economy, but show also that the growth of the small loans business has even exceeded the general expansion. The fact that the small loans business assumes such an important place in the economy of our nation offers a further reason why at this time we should give consideration to a reduction in the maximum interest rates.

To show what large sums are placed out on credit in Canada I have here the Bank of Canada statistical summary for March, 1955, which shows that outstanding in charge accounts at the end of 1954 was a total of $503 million, that instalment credit placed by retailers amounted at that time to $315 million, that instalment credit provided by finance companies amounted to $480 million, and that cash personal loans by chartered banks, small loans companies, licensed moneylenders and credit unions amounted to $665 million, making a total credit of $1,963 million. Without attempting to find out how many loans might be involved, assuming—and this might be far from the actual case—that loans amounted to an average of $1,000 each, we would find that two million persons had credit in one form or another at the end of 1954.

With general credit in such proportions and of such outstanding importance to the whole Canadian economy, I suggest it is wrong that the low income group should have to pay the exorbitant charges made by the small loans companies—charges that very often are higher than those made by our business firms in connection with goods they sell on an instalment basis.

In my judgment the banks have not done all they might in this field. As was demonstrated in evidence before the banking and commerce committee last year, the banks could do much more by way of expanding their small loans departments; and I suggest the government might take certain action to encourage the banks to expand and to cultivate their small loans business. As to why the banks have not been expanding their small loans departments, I suppose it is the easiest thing in the world for them not to do so because much of that business, as it now exists, goes through the small loans companies; and they in turn—and this is shown by the statistics—obtain a good deal of their credit from the banks.

So the banks have the business anyway. They lend the money to the small loans companies, and the small loans companies in turn lend the money out to the ultimate borrowers. Evidence before the banking and commerce committee last year showed that the banks had in loans outstanding to small loans companies the sum of $29,500,000.

I know the argument is going to be made—and it is one of the strong arguments that might be advanced, unless it can be successfully answered—against this bill that if you bring down interest rates, laudable as that objective is, you are going to turn a lot of people who previously could obtain money from small loans companies to the loan sharks, and instead of getting money at 24 per cent a year they will have to pay 50 per cent a year or even more.

I do not think that is a necessary alternative at all. If such a lowering of interest rates may encourage the loan sharks, the government should not let such a fact—if it is a fact, and I do not admit that it is—stop them from passing this bill, because the thing the government needs to do is to take whatever action may be necessary, by passing this and other measures, so that people who are now getting money from small loans companies at 24 per cent will be able to get money at a much lower rate of interest.

Mr. Benidickson: What are those steps?

Mr. Argue: I am coming to those steps. The legislation which the government has on the statute books today in other fields shows the kind of steps that need to be taken. The National Housing Act is a special act of this parliament with special provisions as far as bank lending is concerned. It encourages the banks to make money available to home owners. I am sure the parliamentary assistant will agree with me that had it not been for the National Housing Act, had it not been for the amendments to the Bank Act that the banks were not asking for—in fact, in some instances were rather reluctant to accept—we would not have the valuable contribution that this legislation is making to our Canadian economy.

Something on which I can speak with greater authority is the success of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Under that act almost any farmer—perhaps 95 per cent of the farmers of Canada—can go to the bank and obtain money, if he asks for it, for the purchase of farm machinery, for the remodelling of the farm home, for the installation of electricity, for the buying of better cattle, for the purchase of good seed, almost anything that will improve the farm as an operating unit, or improve his home, at an interest rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: On the security of the farm.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no, not on the security of the farm; on the security of the machine that is purchased, that is all, and the personal reputation and honesty of the farmer who goes into the bank to do business. But as far as the bank is concerned there is a further guarantee from the government. The government and the people of Canada will stand behind those loans to the extent of 10 per cent of the aggregate amount of the loans in case of loss. What has happened? Has it cost the federal government tremendous sums of money? It has cost the federal government practically nothing. I suggest that without this legislation the farmers of Canada would be facing the same interest rates that are now charged by small loans companies.

The government's guarantee under the Farm Improvement Loans Act has been in effect for quite a number of years. A great deal of money has been lent under the legislation. The number of loans since 1945 have totalled 415,000, amounting to $451 million. The government has had to pay to the banks on account of losses the relatively tiny sum of $92,000 on just 175 claims. Someone behind me reminds me that they are still collecting some of that money, so even that loss on the loans covered may subsequently be reduced.

What is the cost to the government in the aggregate loss, compared with the amount of the loans? It is ·02 per cent, or 1/500 part of the original government guarantee of 10 per cent of the aggregate amount of the loans. I suggest that without such a guarantee, which has cost the public of Canada over this long period of time much less than $100,000, the farmers of Canada would have had to pay many millions more in interest charges than they have had to pay because of this legislation.

Therefore I suggest to the government that they bring in another act—and they might call it the family welfare improvement act, an act to encourage banks to expand the legitimate small loans business that some of them are now providing—designed to make available to Canadian consumers generally the kind of credit at a reasonable rate of interest on which they are now forced to pay interest charges of 24 per cent a year.

I am one who has great faith in the honesty and integrity of the vast majority of Canadian people. I believe that if such an act were backed by a guarantee by the federal government, perhaps similar to the guarantee under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the experience would be precisely the same, namely that the loss the government would have to pay would be very insignificant indeed. Such an act would provide great assistance to—and I repeat—the majority of families in this country who today are buying on the instalment plan or buying on credit through the small loans companies.

Since I have proposed this legislation I have been surprised to find out just how many people and how many households of this country buy on the instalment plan. I know many instances of men who may be earning such high salaries as $6,000, $8,000, $10,000 or more a year who are buying goods on the instalment plan. In many instances people who one would expect to know precisely the rate of interest they are paying are not aware of it until it is pointed out to them what a tremendous rate of interest they really are paying.

Mr. Michener: He pays his taxes on the instalment plan.

Mr. Argue: That may be so. Because the need is so great and the cost to the government would be so small, I am suggesting that not only should they pass such an act, but they should bring in legislation that would provide a satisfactory alternative method of obtaining credit at a maximum rate of 12 per cent—yes, I would say that should be the very maximum—and if possible steps should be taken to get the interest rates reduced even further.

I know the argument is going to be made that the small loans companies have a lot of losses and they must have a huge interest rate in order to pay those losses. It will be claimed that there are so many dishonest Canadians, you know, and they have to repossess things and lose money. Well the small loans companies lose practically nothing. The main company in the small loans business in Canada makes the boast—and I am glad that they can make it—that they have yet to make their first repossession.

A table placed before the banking and commerce committee last year shows that for the period ending December 31, 1952, the reserve for bad debts of small loans companies, out of a total interest charged by those companies of 23·42 per cent, amounted to ·26 per cent. So one-quarter of 1 per cent is all that the small loans companies have set aside for that purpose. But their operating profit was 9·35 per cent, a very neat profit. It stands as a blot on our nation, when you think of the hard-working people who are pennypinching to pay this exorbitant interest rate so the small loans companies before our banking and commerce committee can set forth the fact that their operating profit before income tax amounted to 9·35 per cent.

At the same time there was placed on the record a table of the operational costs of the Canadian Bank of Commerce small loans department. That has done and is doing a relatively good service for the Canadian people. They were able to make the same kind of small loans in the same field, not at a total interest rate of 23·42 per cent but at 10·43 per cent. They were able to show, after having taken all the losses—which were small—that they had concluded the year with a satisfactory operating profit of 2·48 per cent on the business involved.

I can tell you why the Canadian Bank of Commerce are able to do as well as they have done in this field. It is because they are more efficient than small loans companies. The salaries of the Canadian Bank of Commerce department amounted to 2·81 per cent; those of the four loans companies amounted to 5·68 per cent. So the small loans companies have to have another 2·87 per cent for salaries. For advertising the Canadian Bank of Commerce spent ·03 per cent; the small loans companies spent 1·19 per cent. That is the cost of their high pressure advertising; they drag in as many people as possible in order to give them loans at 24 per cent per year. The cost of funds to the Canadian Bank of Commerce was 2·09 per cent; the cost of funds to the small loans companies was 3·07 per cent. That is another place where a saving of ·98 per cent could be made.

Of course the field of operating profit is where the largest saving could be made, a saving of 6·87 per cent. If you add up just those few savings I have mentioned—and I have not added the large item called "expenses" and some other items—you find that in this field there could easily be a saving of 11·88 per cent, which would bring the cost of loans down from 23·42 to 11·54 per cent.

The reason the rates are high is that these people make exorbitant profits and spend large sums of money in high pressure advertising in order to get the business through their doors. So I am suggesting to the government that the passage of this bill would not mean, and should not mean, that the Canadian consumer will be placed at the mercy of loan sharks. Last year the government took a step in the right direction by making it possible for banks to accept chattel mortgages as security for moneys they loaned through their small loans departments. The government has already taken a good step by amending the Bank Act to raise the maximum ceiling on these loans to $3,500.

I suggest to the government that they should not stop there, and that once and for all they should get rid of this exorbitant rate of 24 per cent by at least cutting it in half. I do not think any loan company in Canada is worthy of being in the business if it cannot make a reasonable profit at 12 per cent. If it has to get out of the business because it is so inefficient, let it go; good-bye and good riddance. Let the government amend the Bank Act and bring in legislation such as I have suggested, which will give the Canadian people a satisfactory alternative whereby they can get loans at reasonable interest.

When I move my other bill, I intend to go into the even higher rates of interest which are currently being charged in Canada, not by the merchant who operates a small business but by Canada's largest and best known retail firms.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I find some difficulty in speaking after my hon. friend from Assiniboia. I think many of us are finding difficulty in following my hon. friend, because he is usually so efficient and thoroughly covers the matter at hand. My particular interest at this moment, since he has covered the essentials in regard to the rate of interest, is in the methods of advertising that these people practise. We had some discussion not very long ago about the deceptive packaging of bacon, and I was glad that the government took some action in the matter. I can see now the results of that action.

I think the government should take some action too—and I thought it would have been a good idea if my hon. friend from Assiniboia had written into his bill something to that effect—which would prohibit the type of deceptive advertising used by certain vampires of the small loans business. This matter is brought to my attention at the moment by an item in my own local newspaper, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of April 22, 1955, which I quote:

> The Co-operative Union of Canada decided in convention Thursday to make representation to the federal government to require finance companies and business organizations to declare to the borrower or the instalment purchaser a total yearly—

The emphasis is mine on the word "yearly".

> —rate of interest being levied in each transaction. Delegates claimed that the existing practice of interest charging by the month on small loans and on instalment purchase financing by some companies did not disclose to the borrower or the purchaser the true rate of interest.

There is a footnote, which says:

> The Co-operative Union of Canada represents 860 local co-ops and 770,000 members.

As an example of the particular type of thing I mean, I think I might say, without making any derogatory remarks about anybody, that the people who avail themselves of these small loans, or a great many of them, are not accustomed to business methods and business practices. Some of them are rather easy to deceive in that particular matter.

Let me give an example of the type of notice which is very common in our newspapers. Let us assume that we are going to make a loan of $100. We see the advertisement saying "You get $100. You pay at the end of the first month only $9. At the end of the second month you pay only $9." So it goes on down the line till at the end of 12 months you discover—and the advertising emphasizes the word "only" you have only paid $108. Victims of this system have said to me, "That is not an exorbitant rate of interest; that is only 8 per cent". Of course we all know better than that. We know that the borrower has not the use of the $100 for the 12 months. He has the use of the $100 for only one month. Then when you get down to six months he has the use of only half that amount, and so on until you get down to the final month when he discovers—or he does not discover, in many cases—that for the use of one-twelfth of the principal which he has borrowed he is paying exactly the same charge as he paid during the first month. That is what I mean by deceptive advertising, and there is a great deal of it. There are many different types of that same deceptive advertising. The trouble is, of course, that these borrowers do not realize that the principal in their hands has been steadily decreasing while the interest payment is maintained and is constant.

As to the general or larger question which was dealt with by my hon. friend, I agree with him that the government has some responsibility in this matter. I agree that the government should accept some blame for what certain loan sharks are doing. These people are running a perfectly legal and often respectable business, but some of the people I know who have borrowed money from them have been extremely sorry they did so. They are little people, those who least of all can afford to indulge in the luxury of obtaining a loan of that kind. I think the government has some responsibility, in that since 1939 it has been possible for these interest rates which have been pointed out by my hon. friend to be collected legally, by virtue of an act which allows up to 24 per cent per annum—I think that is the rate—to be charged.

One answer, of course, that one might get to this argument is that these people are fundamentally a poor risk, and that the rate therefore must be extremely high in order to compensate the companies for the losses sustained. Statistics give the lie to that argument. My colleague said that the amount lost amounted to twenty-six one-hundredths of 1 per cent of the yield of the loans. I think he should have stated that this is the amount of the reserve which was set aside by these companies. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reserve which these companies set aside, on the average and over the years, would be more than the actual loss which it is meant to cover.

Of course, the free enterprise people would say that if these people do not want this type of loan they are not obliged to obtain it. However, may I say that the human element enters into all these things. We have people who need money because of sickness, accident, or the death, if you like, of some one of their relatives; and may I mention death particularly because for most people it is an expensive business to die these days. I suggest that these borrowers get into difficulty. They do not know in what direction to turn. Then suddenly along comes someone who says, "We will give you some money on your own note of hand, no questions asked" and all the rest of it. Of necessity they fall for that type of propaganda.

This business of caveat emptor—let the buyer beware—is part of the law of the jungle. In these enlightened days I suggest that governments should assume some responsibility for the protection of people who do not know how to protect themselves. People who are qualified financially have no difficulty in getting money at reasonable rates—I would say the average is perhaps 6 per cent—from the banks. The banks can now operate small loans departments. They do so at an effective rate of interest about half that which the loan companies charge. Why cannot these latter companies operate at the same rate as that at which the banks operate? That is a question I cannot answer.

This small loans business, as I said, may have assumed an air of respectability, but I do not think that fact makes it any less dangerous. Of course we no longer have the situation prevailing where a woman on Monday morning wraps the clock in her shawl and takes it down to the pawnshop; but I suggest than when she took the clock down to the pawnshop she obtained just as good a deal as she does when she approaches some of these financial advisers, with their plush offices by day and their neon lights by night attracting you in there so that you may borrow some money and be rooked just to that much greater an extent. They call themselves financial consultants, forsooth; and they invite you in to have your many little debts consolidated, in order to get them all in the same place; "the same place", of course, being your name on a note in their office.

The advertisements are screaming at these potential borrowers all the time. All day they are screaming at them to come in and borrow money on their own note of hand, without security. They offer advice by which these people can be induced to borrow money. I do not know whether or not my friend gave the figures, but I obtained them. According to those figures 70 per cent of these people do labouring work, artisans, people working in offices doing clerical and other non-manual work. In other words, they are the poorer-paid people of the country.

I think they should have protection at least to the extent recommended by my hon. friend, and that the interest rate should be reduced from its present legal maximum of 24 per cent to a maximum of 12 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) I think I should say something in reply to the sponsor of this bill.

The Small Loans Act, which was enacted in 1939, resulted largely from the work of the parliamentary committees. This whole problem is something in which members of parliament have taken a good deal of interest. The problem received a great amount of study by the banking and commerce committees in the sessions of 1937 and 1938. This attention was given to the matter because, prior to that time, the banking and commerce committee was being asked to review regularly petitions for the incorporation of a number of individual companies in this field.

There was a great deal of evidence showing that, without regulation and government supervision, some extremely unfortunate circumstances had developed and that a very high rate of interest—much higher than that described by my hon. friend—was being charged in many instances.

As a result of the deliberations of that committee, it is true that a maximum monthly flat rate of 2 per cent for small loans was recommended. Admittedly this rate was considered to be experimental. However, before these committees evidence was taken from representatives in the field in the United States. The parliamentarians had a great deal of experience, as I say, as a result of hearing applications for incorporation of individual companies. This maximum rate of 2 per cent was set, and it has been in existence since 1939.

In 1946 the government introduced an amendment to this act. It was then proposed to reduce the rate to 1½ per cent per month. This bill received second reading in the House of Commons and was referred to the banking and commerce committee which gave it some study, but the bill itself was not reported.

It happened that at about this time, between 1945 to 1948, the largest lenders in this small personal loan field had in fact reduced their general rate to borrowers to 1½ per cent. However, about this same time the general costs of doing business in any field were on the rise. In 1948 the lenders generally returned to a rate of about 1¾ per cent. Since 1950 the general rate, according to the reports that are filed, works out again at about 2 per cent.

I am sure hon. members will be interested in the experience of other countries. As I say, when our legislation was enacted in 1939 and prior thereto, considerable evidence was available as to the experience in the United States. In that country legislation in this field is within the jurisdiction of the states rather than the federal government, so practices and rates vary. However, the maximum rate in most of the states of the United States for loans in this field is 3 per cent per month, and there the ceiling under which the law applies, generally speaking, is even less than ours, being $300 rather than $500.

In Great Britain I understand that at the present time there is no statutory maximum interest rate but the courts place the onus on the borrower to prove that the rate being charged is unfair if the rate is less than 4 per cent per month, and if the rate is more than 4 per cent per month the onus is on the lender to establish that the rate is not unfair.

The main purpose of this small loans legislation is to ensure that lending facilities are available to necessitous persons who have need for small sums of money and are not able to get them from sources used by others. That is why there is a ceiling. At the present time the ceiling is $500. I could not tell from my hon. friend's remarks whether he entirely understood that the Small Loans Act has no application whatever to time sales of goods. It does not apply to conditional sales agreements, hire-purchase agreements and so on, to which he did make some reference. I assume he did so by way of reference to the other bill he has on the order paper to amend the Interest Act, which would have a bearing in that type of business.

We are discussing in this bill the application for a loan on a personal note without the element of a business transaction. Experience has shown that only by strict regulation and by providing an adequate rate is it likely that the public will be protected against excessive rates. This was the evidence before the banking and commerce committee in 1937 and 1938. If the maximum rate is too low the result is simply that regulated loans dry up; and it was established, in the opinion of the parliamentary committee, that the loan sharks would be the alternative and would enter the field.

I should like to read to the house a few extracts from the report of the banking and commerce committee of 1938 on this point. At page 424 of that report this was said:

> Obviously the state can intervene over rates only within a limited field; for naturally a legislative rate at which money is not obtainable is of doubtful benefit to necessitous people. In the debates over the subject it would almost seem to have been at times forgotten that to legislate a maximum rate is an injunction that, if people cannot borrow at the prescribed rate, they cannot borrow at all.

Again, at page 425 the committee report had this to say:

> The rates of the several states—

Of the United States.

> —were presumably established after exhaustive inquiry and, in several instances, after the legislative prescription of lower rates had led to a diminution in the supply of licensed credit with a return of bootlegged loans in volume.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I adjourn the debate?

On motion of Mr. Benidickson the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

60. Citizenship registration branch, $226,598.

Mr. Michener: I was referring, Mr. Chairman, to the problem of the registration of citizens, particularly new citizens, and I had indicated that of the 1,200,000 immigrants who have come to Canada since the war not more than 100,000 have received their citizenship certificates. I should think the number would be substantially less than that. The total number who received their citizenship certificates last year, the biggest year, was some 23,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it was nearly 27,000.

Mr. Michener: I suppose that was taking the calendar year, but even at 27,000 and going back over the last four or five years, it would appear that perhaps not more than 100,000 have received their certificates of citizenship. We have, therefore, immigrants in Canada to the number of 1,100,000 who will be applicants for citizenship certificates in due course. If the present rate of immigration continues, as I hope it will, or increases, that number is not likely to diminish.

When we reach the normal annual number of applications for citizenship it may be in the neighbourhood of at least 100,000 per year. We are taking immigrants at more than that rate. One of my colleagues referred to the possible loss of people who came here with the intention of going to the United States, and that may reduce the number. But in the long run I would think almost as many as enter the country will be applicants for citizenship. The department, therefore, has a problem of substantial proportions in the processing of the applications and the registration of that number of people.

As I said, this problem has been tackled through the county courts. While that machinery may be adequate in most parts of Canada, it certainly has been found to be inadequate in the larger centres of population, Montreal and Toronto particularly. We went over that problem rather carefully in the committee, so I do not propose to dwell on it now. I do want to say I am delighted to see that the difficulty is now being recognized. I know that in my city Toronto there is an entirely new method of processing these applications. We are not relying now on the judicial machinery to handle these applications. I commend that change, and I trust the department is making provision for the fairly substantial numbers that may have to be handled in the future.

I say this because the certificate of citizenship is the great possession of anyone who has adopted this country as his. It gives the franchise; it gives the status. Anyone who has torn up his roots and moved from another country in order to bring his family and establish himself here will not lose any time in getting that certificate; it is the seal of his citizenship. We hope, therefore, that when people apply for these certificates they will get them without delay. It is the delay that exists now, and which is to be met by these new methods, that I wish to draw to the attention of the house. I do so for the purpose of making some reference to the proportions of this problem.

Last year I believe the minister said there were something like 4,000 certificates issued in the York area. We can readily contemplate four or five times that many in a year. If it was a problem to deal with a few thousand, certainly preparations will have to be made to deal with many more thousands.

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—

66. Administration of the Immigration Act, $892,756.

Mr. Churchill: This is the item I have been waiting for, and I think the minister has as well, because we want to discuss the problem of immigration. However, I do not propose to take too much time. I have been raising the question of the general policy with regard to immigration for the last three years in the hope that I could get an answer from the minister. I was not able to get one from the present minister's predecessor, so I raise the question now for the minister's benefit.

Earlier this year I drew attention to this problem. I am interested in the racial groupings within the country, and I am interested in knowing what is the policy of the government with regard to retaining the racial groupings we have had in this country from the early days. On other occasions I have pointed out that the percentage of people who trace their origin to the British Isles has been declining. I have drawn the attention of the house to the fact that in the days of the great immigration into this country, in the first few years of this century, 60 per cent of the immigration came from the British Isles. Over the first 50 years of this century, 50 per cent of the total number of immigrants entering Canada came from the British Isles.

I point out that I am not thinking of excluding anyone; I am not talking as an exclusionist. There was no exclusion of people of various racial origins in the days of the great migration to this country in the first few years of this century. Yet at that time 60 per cent of the immigrants were from the British Isles. Similarly, I suggest no exclusion now. If we are to have an immigration policy at all and want to attract people to this country, we naturally want to get them from as many places as we can suitably obtain them. I am not objecting to the present policy of the department or its extensive attempts to gain immigrants from the various countries of the world. We have many racial groups represented in Canada. but it is still our duty to look to the future.

Are we, through lack of care or lack of success in attracting immigrants from the British Isles, creating a trend whereby in the course of time the racial groupings within this country will be materially altered? As I said last year, that may be good or bad. I raise the question, but I do not myself say it should be necessary for the government to use any policy to alter the basic racial divisions within this country from what they were 50 years ago or even 20 years ago.

It does not mean excluding other people in order to bring people in from the British Isles. But I noticed from the survey I made —and if my survey is incorrect I presume there are people here who will put me right—an apparent change in policy in 1949. In the half dozen years that have passed since 1949 the average of people coming into this country from the British Isles has been 26 per cent of the total number of immigrants admitted. That is a far cry from the 60 per cent of the first few years of this century, and a far cry from the average, for practically 50 years, of 50 per cent from the British Isles.

What caused the fundamental change in policy in 1949? Why is that policy being continued? Is it an accidental occurrence, or is there any explanation for it? I was not able to get a satisfactory answer to my question a year ago, and when I raised it earlier this year perhaps the minister did not have an opportunity to deal with it. Although I have searched the proceedings of the committee on estimates with some diligence, as I pointed out before five o'clock it is a difficult matter to locate the information in the reports of that committee, due to a lack of index and a lack of paragraphing according to subject matters. Consequently I may have overlooked some discussions on this particular subject.

I did find at pages 294 to 299 of the proceedings of the committee on estimates a discussion of immigration from the United Kingdom. However, I did not see any discussion on the other point I raised, as to the racial or ethnic divisions within Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): You should ask Duncan MacTavish.

Mr. Churchill: I do not see in the record of proceedings of that committee any declaration on the part of the minister as to the policy of the government with respect to that particular point. Consequently I raise it again now, in the hope that the minister will be able to enlighten the committee.

Mr. Balcom: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question relating to immigrants coming to Halifax and being transported from there. The immigrants who arrive at Halifax are well looked after by the immigration officials and by the Canadian National Railways. Upon disembarking they receive free food and are looked after by volunteer workers. For the most part they are very happy. In Halifax we have canteens from which they are given food at reasonable prices, prices that are probably a little lower than those in effect generally.

The immigrants stay around the city for some little time, after which they go on the trains and, en route, they have to buy food. My understanding is that this food is not supplied by or under the control of the immigration branch or the Canadian National Railways, but that it is handled by an independent company having that privilege on our regularly scheduled trains.

I question whether it should be done in that way, and whether it would not be better if the railways or the department were to handle this food. I believe the immigrants are charged what might be termed exorbitant prices—for instance, 20 cents for a half pint of milk. And if this applies to milk, it might apply to anything else. These people, many of whom do not understand our language or our money system, resent this. The welcome they receive at the pier in Halifax is somewhat worn off en route to Montreal or some other point in Canada. One can readily see that they might be caused some embarrassment.

I would ask the minister to have his departmental officials look into the matter, with a view to seeing if there is any way of improving the service these people receive. My understanding is that the food they buy on the trains from the company in question is not served in a dining room, but is served right in the coach.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister if he is prepared to reply to my question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. If there are no further questions I am prepared to reply to the junior member for Halifax and to the member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Lennard: The member for Winnipeg South Centre and the junior member for Halifax; that is the order in which they were asked.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand, sir, that we still have, even in this chamber, a little measure of freedom of speech. I am going to reply first to the junior member for Halifax, because I can reply to him in about three words. I shall be delighted to have someone look into that question.

And now, to the very complex question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, I can make a very brief reply —and be misunderstood. My brief reply would be to say, and I am going to say it anyway, at the risk of being misunderstood, that to the best of my knowledge this department does not now and never has paid any attention to keeping a racial balance, and I hope it never will.

I thought we engaged in a war, in which the hon. member served very gallantly, that was directed against that kind of thing. Now, it is true that we do give preference, and for many years have given preference, to immigrants from the United Kingdom; and the reason we do it has been stated over and over again. It was stated by me in the debate on immigration, as will be found in Hansard for February 17 at page 1258. I do not know that there is any particular advantage in stating it again but, very briefly, it is this; that we believe that because immigrants from the United Kingdom have the same kind of political institutions we have and, in the main, the same kind of social customs and, in the main, the same kind of economic system and, in the main, the same ways of doing things, it is easier for them to adapt themselves quickly and readily to this country. And, as the hon. member for St. Paul's has said, we do ask immigrants to come here for the purpose of transforming them as quickly as we can into citizens of Canada.

May I suggest it would repay the hon. gentleman if he would reread those few paragraphs in Hansard, which I uttered for the first time in Dauphin in the speech I made to the Manitoba chamber of commerce, and which indicate the basis of this preference or selective system. It is not based upon race, and it is not based upon creed. It is based upon a conception of adaptability to the kind of society we have tried to build in this country in the last 300 years. I am quite confident that when Mr. Mackenzie King said in 1947 that we did not want to make a fundamental change in the character of the population of this country, that was what he meant, and that was all he meant.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I noticed that in his statement the minister seemed to wish to draw an inference that I was suggesting something in the nature of discrimination. I thought that was an unnecessary comment, but not an unexpected one from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I was at pains to point out that there need be no exclusion of immigrants to this country. To my knowledge, or in so far as I understand the problem, there has been no exclusion in the past and I certainly am not suggesting any now. There is nothing very complex about it. I am asking the minister whether he understands that a shift is going on in the racial grouping within this country. He apparently understands that, and says it is not a matter of any great concern.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. Churchill: Well, that is what I understood from the minister's remarks and from his quoting of that characteristic confusing statement of the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, which certainly does not clarify the situation at the present time at all. I wanted to know why immigration from the British Isles was not equal on a comparative basis to what it had been in the past, not in the same ratio to the total number of immigrants who come to this country. The minister gave no explanation of that.

Let me ask him this while he is thinking over some of these problems, and this is where I refer to the record of the committee on estimates which contains, on page 299, the discussion with regard to immigration from the United Kingdom. It is a most incomplete statement. There I ask, was the answer given elsewhere? Is it to be found somewhere else in the proceedings of the committee? On page 299 of the minutes and proceedings of the committee there is discussion in regard to the difficulties facing people coming from the British Isles in respect to the amount of money they can bring with them. In reply to a question by the hon. member for Kamloops the minister said:

> I would be prepared to present a statement on it, but I do not know anything about it at the present time. I do know however that the subject had once been canvassed, but I do not know more than that.

Here are the hon. member's words, which are to be found a little higher up on the same page:

> Have we ever considered lending money to immigrants against balances which they have in the United Kingdom?

Perhaps the minister will tell us that the problem was dealt with later in the estimates committee. If not, is he prepared now to make a statement on the result of his research and let us know what are the problems that stand in the way of people coming from the British Isles? We find that they move in large numbers to Australia and apparently are still willing to migrate from the British Isles despite full employment in that country. The pioneering and colonizing tradition of the British Isles is still evident. Why are we not getting greater benefit from that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I can say, Mr. Chairman, that this question of loans and quite a number of other possible devices have been considered. Of course there is a loan scheme, as the hon. gentleman, I am sure, knows, for the payment of passage. This question of loans against sterling balances, and a good many other devices of that sort, have been considered from time to time but, as I indicated to the committee—I was looking for the page number, but like the hon. gentleman I cannot find it. I quite agree with him on this point. I do agree that we need an index to these minutes. Perhaps it would not have been quite so difficult to follow them if my suggestion in the committee had been followed, that we take things up in a consecutive order. That seemed rather difficult to get done, just as it seems difficult to do in this committee, but that is just by way of parenthesis. I agree with the hon. gentleman.

I think the relaxations that have been made by the British treasury in the last two years are such that for all but a very rare immigrant the problem of transferring any balances any prospective immigrant is likely to have is now pretty largely solved.

Some point was also made in the estimates committee about the possibility of lending money to the dependents of immigrants for assisted passage. If I could persuade myself that this would really stimulate immigration from the British Isles I would be very happy indeed to recommend to my colleagues that we extend the scheme to the dependents of immigrants; but our experience has been—at least I would say we have deduced from our experience—that in the kind of full employment and the kind of prosperity we have had in this country in recent years, it has taken the immigrant himself such a relatively short time to accumulate enough money to bring his family—and moreover he could pay for their passage in sterling—that there would not have been very much advantage, except for impecunious people, to have loans of this sort, and in many cases even they did not seem to have been much deterred by this difficulty; but I am still quite open to conviction on that point.

[Mr. Churchill.]

I want to see more immigration from the United Kingdom. I would not want anyone to misunderstand my position on that; but fortunately or unfortunately—perhaps I should not use the word "unfortunately"—we cannot conscript people in the United Kingdom to come here. We have to persuade them to come. Happily, in the United Kingdom economic conditions have improved vastly in the last few years, and as a consequence there is less willingness to leave the United Kingdom and come here. This is a matter of grave concern to the department. I would certainly welcome from any source any practical suggestions for increasing the flow.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I do not wish to provoke the minister, and also I do not wish to pour any coals of fire upon his head. We all agree that in Canada we missed the boat so far as the immigration of Anglo-Saxons is concerned since the end of the last world war. Australia and New Zealand beat us to the punch. I have no axe to grind, but I should like to get some information from the minister. A lot of good immigrants have come over from Britain, and of course there must be more willing to come. The information I want to get from the minister is this. If an immigrant comes to Canada from Britain and gets himself in debt to quite an extent in Canada, then leaves Canada and goes back to Britain, what can be done if he tries to come back to Canada? Can the minister give me any information in that regard?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid I did not get the last phrase.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): What can be done to collect the debt the chap contracted if he tries to come back to Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. gentleman referring to debts to the crown or to private individuals?

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Private individuals.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think that in this relatively free economy we have in Canada the department has ever set itself up as a debt collection agency for private individuals. I do not think it would be a very good way to stimulate immigration if we did. A debt, after all, is a civil obligation, and I presume that if the immigrant came back within the jurisdiction of the courts here the person to whom he owed the money could take whatever action was necessary for the recovery of the debt. Certainly I do not think we would regard as an impediment to his return to Canada the fact that he had some unpaid debts. I think most people would imagine that there was a slightly better chance of collecting them if he did come back to this jurisdiction. The problem is a novel one to me. I have never encountered it before.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have encountered those circumstances in our riding. I would think in such a case of a man deliberately incurring debts, if that man ever tried to come back to Canada he should be interrogated and an understanding reached with him. I think it would be very good if the department took that point into consideration and did not let a man of that kind in.

Item agreed to.

67. Field and inspectional service, Canada, including $10,000 for grants to immigration welfare organizations, $5,648,955.

Mr. Monteith: With regard to item 67, Mr. Chairman, we had several discussions in the estimates committee about the fact that in the estimation of certain people, and possibly myself, the department insisted on overestimating its expenditures for several years. I think we ought to keep in mind that the tax rate which the citizens of Canada finish up by paying is eventually decided by the estimates which are passed by this house. If a certain amount of expenditure can be saved, that means there will be that much less money to raise by taxes.

In questioning officials of the department, including the minister, we came to the conclusion, I think, that in estimating for this current year 1955-1956, on which we are now working, probably the first step taken was to refer to the estimates for 1954-55 and maybe for previous years. I do not think that is quite the correct procedure. I believe more attention should have been paid—if any attention has been paid—to the actual expenditures in prior years.

In the estimates committee certain comparisons were made concerning the immigration branch. It was shown that in the year 1952-53 the department overestimated by over 30 per cent. In the year 1953-54 they overestimated by over 22 per cent of the estimates. Actually, the percentage of the amount expended in 1952-53 was 43 per cent, and in 1953-54 29 per cent. Coming a little closer to the present time, 1954-55, the lapsed vote, shall we say, was 7·3 per cent of the estimate and over 7·8 per cent of the actual expenditure.

I think this is a bad procedure to follow. I do not believe it is fair to the taxpayer. On this particular item, No. 67, I would like to review what has happened over the last two or three years. In the year 1952-53 the estimates were approximately $4,832,000. The actual expenditure was approximately $4,482,000, or a lapsed vote of roughly $350,000. In the year 1953-54 the estimate was $5,204,000; the expenditure was $4,728,000, a lapsed expenditure of over $476,000. In 1952-53 it was 7·8 per cent, and in 1953-54 over 10 per cent. In 1954-55 the estimate was $5,691,000, the expenditure $5,367,000; a lapsed expenditure of $324,000, or over 6 per cent.

Apparently this has been a consistent procedure in the immigration branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I do not think it is correct. I am convinced that this overestimating is not necessary. It has been proven that such has taken place in the past by the figures which are taken from the accounts.

As a consequence I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Paul's, that item 67 of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, amounting to $5,648,955, be reduced by 5 per cent, or by the amount of $282,447.75.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, in seconding the motion I should like to say this about overestimating. Although it might appeal to some people as being simply providence to ask for more money than you expect to spend, in other words to leave some room to turn around, there is another aspect to the matter in public finance which is very important. This motion may be more by way of token than of great consequence to the budget, but I suggest that it is worth consideration on this ground. If the practice which has been demonstrated with respect to this item were followed throughout the departments and there were a consistent overestimating of probable expenditures on the part of all departments, the Minister of Finance would be under the onus of raising 10, 15, or as much as 30 per cent more money than would actually be needed in the experience of the departments.

The consequence of that, of course, would be to upset any rational theory of budgeting and finance. The result would be a surplus which was not intended, a surplus which depended on departmental overestimating and underexpenditure, a policy of raising more money than was needed rather than a deliberate reduction of the public debt.

I second the motion with the thought in mind that this practice, if it were general, would be destructive of any sound fiscal policy on the part of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I of course oppose this motion, and I invite my hon. friends in the house to support me in opposing it.

Mr. Lennard: They will; don't worry.

Mr. Pickersgill: On this particular item, it might be interesting to note that the hon. gentleman very carefully selected the year 1952-53. If he had selected 1951-52 he would have found that the lapsed amount was 2·9 per cent, but he chose instead to begin with the year when it happened to be 7·2 per cent.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, I take exception to what the minister has said. I did not deliberately begin with the year 1952-53.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor. In 1952-53 it was 7·2 per cent; in 1953-54 it was 9 per cent. This past year it was about 5 per cent. I do not think it will be more than 5 per cent in the present year. I was going to say that I hoped it would be closer than that, but I do not really hope it will because a certain contingent amount is provided here to pay for deportations, and the fewer deportations we are obliged to pay for, and the more money we can save in that way, the better it will be for the taxpayers.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Monteith) negatived: Yeas, 9; nays, 66.

The Chairman: I declare the motion lost. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knight: I was just going to ask the minister whether he would not explain something of the functioning of the people mentioned here. I refer to the field inspectors and so forth. In other words, will he give us a little story telling on what kind of services the money is spent?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should very much like to oblige the hon. member for Saskatoon. I am trying to say this without giving any offence. I wonder whether he has read the proceedings of the estimates committee. In those proceedings is given a most minute and detailed explanation. I should be glad to give the hon. member the page reference.

Mr. Knight: I thank the minister for bringing that fact to my attention. I have not had the time to read the minutes but I shall do so. I shall be quite satisfied with that answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you.

Mr. Michener: One or two aspects of the administration of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration that came out in the committee proceedings deserve attention, in my opinion, at this time. They have to do with the relationship of this department to two other departments. I think this item is perhaps the appropriate one on which to make the point I have in mind.

What we are doing, of course, is voting funds to enable this department to carry on its administration. In doing that I think we should look first at the purpose of the department and, in the second place, the efficiency and economy of its administration. In this item No. 67 provision is made for field and inspectional services. Coming under that provision are 139 special officers whose function is to do the same kind of work as that done by the national employment service of the Department of Labour. That is the first point I want to make. I wish to point out that here we have two departments doing the same job.

What is that job? It is to advise immigrants as to labour conditions in Canada, the work that is available, the opportunities for employment and for farming or business which are available in this country. When we have set up under the Department of Labour a nation-wide system of employment counsel covering every part of Canada and presumably familiar with work conditions and opportunities in every part of Canada, one would think that service would be the appropriate one to supply information to intending immigrants.

It is true that this information must be supplied in their own countries. Therefore I suppose the information which these officers collect must be sent abroad to be delivered to the prospective immigrants in their own countries. But why should this department of immigration have 139 officers in Canada going about the country collecting information which, it seems to me, already is or should be available in the Department of Labour? That is the first conflict between departments that I think deserves the consideration of the government.

Let me point out this fact. In Canada itself we have the labour department and the citizenship and immigration department both collecting this information, whereas abroad we have the immigration department using the information by delivering it to the immigrants.

The other administrative question is the relationship of this department to the Department of National Health and Welfare. Although this department chooses to have its own employment officers, it does not choose to have its own doctors. There is nothing in the vote here to provide for medical inspection of immigrants abroad. That provision appears in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

On referring to the appropriate place in the estimates, Mr. Chairman, you will find that some 315 personnel are to be supplied for immigration purposes by the Department of National Health and Welfare at a cost of $1,151,000, which is properly a part of the expenses of the department of immigration. Purely as an administrative and accounting problem, and as a matter of efficiency, I suggest that the government review this separation of services.

I suggest that the duplication should be reviewed from another viewpoint because, with two departments responsible, the tendency is for neither to take the full responsibility. There is the possibility that you will find the unfortunate immigrant, in places like Toronto or Montreal, being sent from the department of immigration to the Department of Labour in order to find a job, and then being sent back from the Department of Labour to the department of immigration because they both have some responsibility and each can pass the buck to the other. Hence for more reasons than one I suggest that this problem should be reviewed with the idea in mind of putting the labour counselling service under one department and coordinating it in that place.

The question of the productivity of the department is not an easy one to deal with. One can only compare the number on the staff and the number of immigrants brought in. That is a mathematical comparison, and perhaps it does not mean a great deal. Actually the figures the minister gave indicate that five years ago the department was staffed with 2,913 civil servants, after making some adjustments and including Indian affairs which have nothing to do with immigration, compared with a total at the present time of 3,954, or an increase of 1,041 in the staff of the department in five years. That is an increase of more than one-third. In the same period the number of immigrants admitted to the country has not shown the corresponding variation. I believe 1950 was a relatively small year but in 1951, the year of heaviest immigration since the war, 190,000 or more people came to Canada, compared with 154,000 in the last calendar year, 1954.

As I say, I do not put too much weight on these figures because I feel that the problem of the immigration department is probably more difficult today than it was immediately after the war, and is getting more difficult all the time. As has already been said, the great opportunity to get immigrants from the United Kingdom was immediately after the war. At that time would-be immigrants were lined up for six blocks in front of the Liverpool office waiting to come to Canada. The problem then was transportation. The house is aware of the steps taken by the government of Ontario at that time to provide air transportation, but because the problem of transportation was not adequately met at the time by this department that opportunity was allowed to pass. Today we have not the same scope in securing the immigrants we want in this country.

I believe it is a fallacy today to expect immigrants to drop into our lap. They are not hanging in the trees any more, and we have to go after the kind of immigration that meets the requirements of the country. I do not place too much emphasis on the figures, and I do not intend by what I say to try to restrict the department in its expenditures because I feel the problem is more difficult now than it was and that every effort should be made to go to the places where suitable immigrants are available and get them to come here.

We have been lucky in many respects. We have had a good many from the Scandinavian countries, but such immigrants are not now available. We were fortunate in the immigration of the displaced persons. We got very fine immigrants, among them professional people whose training would cost a great deal if it had to be duplicated in this country. A great many people came here who were able to establish their own businesses, and we were fortunate in securing them. We were fortunate in getting the Dutch farmers who came here. They were a fine lot. But these sources are drying up, and we have to work a little harder now. It is only in the spirit of promoting efficient administration that I point out these problems of overlapping and separation of function which have been discovered in the course of the examination of these estimates in the special committee on estimates.

Item agreed to.

69. To provide, subject to the approval of treasury board, for trans-oceanic and inland transportation assistance for immigrants, including care en route and while awaiting employment, $500,000.

Mr. Monteith: I do not propose to move any motion at this time, because it is quite obvious what would happen to it; but I think this is the most glaring instance of overestimating to be found in the whole immigration branch or in the whole Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I should like to remind the minister that I did not go back beyond 1952-53 simply because I thought that was far enough to go to show the great discrepancy between actual and estimated expenditure, but if there are figures beyond that point which the minister cares to bring into the picture, that suits me fine.

However, I would point out that in 1952-53 the estimate was $2,600,000 and the actual expenditure was $311,000. That is an overestimate of over 80 per cent, and involves big figures, not chicken feed. In the year 1953-54 the estimate was $1,500,000 and the expenditure was $98,000. There was an overestimate of $1,401,000 on a $1,500,000 estimate, or over 90 per cent. In the year 1954-55 the estimate was $500,000 and the expenditure $290,000, an overestimate of $210,000, or 42 per cent.

Concerning this year, as I said I do not propose to move any motion because it is obvious what would happen, but I should like to read an extract from the transcript of the proceedings of the estimates committee, which is found on page 320. It reads:

> Hon. Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, I admit at once, Mr. Monteith, that there is some cushion, as you call it, and we admitted that the other day. That is the amount for transportation, $100,000, which we do not expect to spend at all.

Incidentally, that $100,000 is in the $500,000 which is the estimate for this year. To continue with the minister's words:

> We do not expect to spend one nickel of that but it was included, as was pointed out to members of the committee, just in case we might find it necessary during the year, because of an abnormal movement or shortage of shipping, to charter shipping or aircraft. I do not think it would be a disaster if that were cut out of the estimates, but it is our intention to use it only for that purpose, if we use it at all. To that extent I plead guilty right off.

May I say that the minister pleads guilty to overtaxing the people of Canada by $100,000 in that one item.

Mr. Dinsdale: I believe this item covers emergency relief for immigrants. I should like to know if there has been any unusual call upon the fund during recent months. If so, is the immigrant who accepts assistance from the fund required in specific terms to repay the amount?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am most grateful to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris for raising this question. I almost got up and raised it myself. I wish we did not have to spend any of this money for emergency assistance; but in spite of the long debates we have had in the house during this session on the subject of unemployment I am pleased to be able to tell the committee that never at any time during the course of the whole winter have there been 400 people, men, women and children, receiving assistance at the same time from the department, although I have done my best to make it clear that any immigrant who had been in the country less than 12 months and was in need of assistance for himself and his family could receive it without the slightest risk of being considered a public charge and thereby deportable. Therefore there need have been no apprehension about coming to the department.

I think this indicates that our economy is not in a very shaky condition. It is true that we do make provision for this amount of $500,000. As the hon. member for Perth indicated, we have that provision there in case we need to charter a ship or aircraft in order to avoid losing some immigrants. There is this provision for assistance if it is needed. I would be very happy to be able to report at the next session that almost none of this money had been spent. I hope none of it is spent, and if none of it is spent I do not think it will be a case of overtaxing the Canadian people.

Mr. Dinsdale: There was a second part to the question, Mr. Chairman. In the case of immigrants who receive assistance, are they asked for repayment, and if so in what manner?

Mr. Pickersgill: No undue pressure is exerted at all. We do indicate we would like them to repay if they can, but they are not pursued or hounded or anything of that sort.

Mr. Brooks: Do you ever get repayment?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, we do get some of it sometimes. All these immigrants are self-respecting people who do not want to receive handouts.

Mr. Dinsdale: Are they sent any definite statement of indebtedness that indicates a certain obligation?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am informed we generally send one letter.

Mr. Montgomery: The question I should like to ask the minister is this. Supposing immigrants get into difficulty after they are here 12 months, but before they gain a settlement whereby they have a right to look to the municipality in which they are living for aid. In my province that takes three years. Who is going to look after them in the second and third years? Is there any provision for that?

Mr. Pickersgill: The general assumption, sir, is that immigration is of benefit not merely to the federal government but also to the provinces. While we have a special obligation during this first year while the immigrants are finding their feet, as the great majority of them do, we assume that after they find their feet they will be paying provincial taxes and helping to support provincial and local administrations just as the rest of us do, and we feel they ought, after a year, to be entitled to the same kind of local services from the local authorities. It is for that reason we limit it to a year. I am sure if the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton found that we were giving assistance to immigrants for two or three years, when we do not give it to Canadians, he would complain and so would most other Canadians.

Mr. Montgomery: I am not going to swallow that, Mr. Chairman. I asked a question because I know of some cases in which church and other organizations have had to step into the picture. You cannot blame the municipality collecting the taxes if it does not assume the obligation when it is not supporting our own people. These municipalities do not support ordinary Canadians who have not resided in the locality for at least three years. The people must gain a settlement. There is a gap there. I was not trying to embarrass the minister in any way; what I was after was information. I know of one or two cases where people have had to step in and help these immigrants, and I was wondering if in these cases the department ever stepped in.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, the department does not.

Mr. Gillis: I wanted to ask the minister what percentage of the unemployed in Canada today he calculates would have been immigrants within the last five years?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know at all.

Mr. Gillis: There is a camp or a pool near the city of Montreal to which immigrants who cannot find jobs are permitted to go. They receive assistance during the time they are awaiting employment, and there is provision for medical treatment and so forth. What amount of money was spent last year in that connection, and approximately how many people in that category are in that camp at this time?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is a place at St. Paul l'Ermite, maintained by my colleague the Minister of Labour, but I am afraid I could not answer the hon. gentleman. It is not my responsibility. There are a few immigrants who go there pending employment. The whole establishment is maintained by the Department of Labour and I have not the information.

Mr. Gillis: I feel the minister should have the information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I find that my estimates are quite a job, without taking on my colleague's.

Mr. Gillis: I did not say anything on the main item, but I did make some extended remarks on this subject. I have always contended that you cannot do a good job in immigration unless there is very close liaison with the Department of Labour. The two departments work together on this particular item. The Minister of Labour is not likely to have much information on the subject, because the immigration department sends these people to that camp. The Department of Labour would have to get the number who are in that camp from your department. The Department of Labour cannot send people there. When questioning the labour department I was always led to believe that this particular phase of unemployment in Canada belonged to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It is certainly an indication that your department cannot do effective work in immigration and placing people in this country, unless they work very closely with the Department of Labour.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which we do.

Mr. Gillis: This is the total amount of money required to take care of that particular kind of thing. This half million dollars is part of the cost of maintaining these people in that pool?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir.

Mr. Gillis: It is not?

Mr. Gregg: No, Mr. Chairman; I interject here because I will be prepared to discuss that on my own estimates. The particular item concerning St. Paul l'Ermite comes under my department. I can assure my hon. friend that the closest liaison is maintained with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration as to the people coming in and going out of this hostel. I cannot tell the exact number of guests we have there just now, but it is very small. I think it is something like 15 or 18.

Item agreed to.

Indian affairs branch—
70. Administration, $444,602.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are a number of questions that arise in connection with this general section, Mr. Chairman, on which I wish to secure from the minister the opinion of his department.

The first has to do with the liability of the Indian for income taxes. One does not have to go back very far—it was toward the latter days of the first great war—to find when income taxes were introduced into the law of this country. It was believed at that time that it was a temporary measure that would be abolished as soon as the war was over. Indeed, that fiction has been carried on pretty well ever since by referring to the act as the Income War Tax Act.

However, in recent years, and certainly I think within the last year or so, the department administering the income tax has been imposing that tax upon Indians in respect of income which was earned outside the reserve, or in respect of any transactions executed beyond the confines of the reserve.

This has been a cause of great alarm, if not indignation, amongst the Indians. They claim, and I think rightly, that under the law, tradition and history and the treaties of the past indicate that at no time was the Indian to be subject to taxation. This was the principle back in 1763, with the royal proclamation of that year, and it was followed year by year after the establishment of responsible government in Canada until very recently.

The fiction upon which it is founded is this. We pay the Indian treaty money in recognition of the fact that he owned this country and still exercises an ownership over it, and that the government, representing the crown, is required to pay a yearly amount in ransom in compensation to the Indians for their rights and in recognition of the sovereignty they at one time enjoyed.

The Indian today is very much aroused over the imposition of income tax upon him, under the circumstances to which I have alluded. The halcyon days of no income tax upon other citizens of Canada have disappeared, but the Indian contends that there is no legal justification for the imposition of income tax upon him. Indeed, representations have been made from time to time by the chiefs to the Indian affairs branch, and the indignation of the chiefs has been intensified by the fact that at no time have successive ministers of Indian affairs been able to point out to them the legal justification for what is being done.

My information from the grand council of the North American Indian brotherhood is that two conferences under the Indian Act took place under my hon. friend's predecessor in office, but that on neither occasion was the minister able to place before the Indians the constitutional authority upon which this taxation is based.

I have the Indian Act before me, and I am familiar with the interpretation that has been placed thereon. I ask the minister if he will explain to the Indians, as clearly as he can, the legal justification in this instance, having regard to the original proclamation that was made immediately after the cessation of French rule in America, and the subsequent treaties. Will he explain how it is that his department has not had a submission made to the courts for the purpose of determining this matter once and for all? If there is liability then let the minister, representing the Indians, make a submission to the courts to determine the question; and if the supreme court of this country comes to the conclusion that the law does permit the imposition of income tax on the Indian, that will be the end of it. But I believe that so long as the income tax is imposed there will be considerable ill feeling and remonstrance among the tribes.

I am sure another chief, who is sitting in the house at the moment—I am referring to the Minister of Agriculture who, I believe, was honoured a few years ago as Chief Thunderchild—will have received representations—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the minister has no exemption from income tax.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, he is only honorary; and I am only honorary, too. For that reason the rights that flow from proclamations and subsequent treaties do not apply to us. All we have are the prerogatives and privileges, but none of the rights.

Mr. Pickersgill: And the feathers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And we do not receive the payment of treaty moneys from year to year.

I suggest in all seriousness that the minister could deal with this subject, which is of greatest concern to the Indians, by the simple procedure of having this question submitted by the Minister of Justice and the law officers of the crown for the consideration and determination of the supreme court.

Then I return once again to a matter that has aroused intense indignation among the Indians. I refer to the use that has been made by the department of section 9 of the Indian Act. This has to do with the preparation of the band list, on the basis of which the question of membership in the band is determined and decided. Section 9 reads as follows:

> Within six months after a list has been posted in accordance with section 8 or within three months after the name of a person has been added to or deleted from a band list . . . may, by notice in writing to the registrar, containing a brief statement of the grounds therefor, protest the inclusion, omission, addition, or deletion, as the case may be, of the name of that person.

Then subsection 2 says:

> Where a protest is made to the registrar under this section he shall cause an investigation to be made into the matter—

And so on. Quite a number of investigations have been made. The result has been that Indian has been set against Indian within the band membership. A vast amount of ill feeling has been aroused. Gossip and hearsay have taken the place of legal evidence to determine whether or not given individuals have the right to be on the list, because of the fact that somewhere in the past white blood found its way into the veins of some ancestors.

The result has been a great degree of ill feeling engendered and a belief that unfairness is being done. These cases of unfairness are apparent in the incongruous definitions of what is a white and what is an Indian. I am not going into the particulars of those paradoxical conclusions and decisions, but it is very difficult to understand why a half-blood becomes a white or an Indian, depending upon whether or not the Indian blood is either maternally or paternally inherited.

A large number of investigations have taken place, and I am not going to review those cases except to say that I know of no decisions that have been handed down by the registrar. I hope no decisions are handed down. I hope this species of emasculated court will not be permitted by the minister to dignify its conclusions as judgments determining the rights of individuals. I hope the minister will find a way whereby, without in any way eluding or circumventing the law, a state of affairs can be brought about which will remove this serious source of grievance.

I have known Indians over the years, since the earliest days in the prairie provinces, going back to the days of Gabriel Dumont, who returned to the area which is now Saskatchewan; I have known of the Indians of the territorial days. They are a people who are intensely loyal, and a people whose patriotic services in two world wars have been beyond words of commendation. They have the right to ask that every consideration be given to their feelings. In this regard they are aroused. They feel that something in the nature of tyrannical administration, affecting their rights and in some cases casting doubt on their ancestry, has been introduced into the law by section 9.

Will the minister not give consideration to obliterating what has been done, or at least assuring us that what has been done will not be continued in the future and that what commissions have been appointed will not render final decisions? I think fairness, justice and equity would be assured if a simple, retroactive declaration were made by law, that those who were resident in the bands several years ago shall be considered to have been regularly constituted members of the bands, thereby putting their descendants in the same position. Something of that kind would certainly bring about a condition under which many cases of injustice, as the Indians see it, would be avoided.

I make this appeal to the minister because I know that since he has taken over his portfolio there has been nothing in the nature of any decision by the registrar. Nothing has been done beyond the hearings by the commissions. For all that he deserves the thanks of the Indians, and I am sure he will receive them. But I do ask him to go one step further and give these people the assurance that their rights will not be subject to periodic challenge based on hearsay and suspicion. One just has to read the evidence given at these commissions—I dignify it by the name of evidence, because I have no other word that would apply; "testimony" might be more applicable—to learn that witnesses come along and give evidence to this effect. They say their grandmother allegedly told somebody else that a third party had a doubtful ancestry.

Well, that kind of thing may be the only testimony available; but when there is the incentive to exaggerate the evidence because of the fact that the more who are removed by such evidence the fewer there will be in the band, and the fewer in the band the more money there will be to distribute, one can understand the forces that motivate the giving of that type of hearsay evidence.

I ask the minister to give reconsideration to this matter, for I have never known the Indians on the western plains to be more aroused than they are at the present time. They are aroused at what they believe to be an injustice, the basis of which they cannot understand. They do not realize the purpose of the commissions nor the ends to be attained.

Mr. Campbell: I am hoping that because a committee has been set up to study the estimates we shall not do away entirely with the discussion of a problem as serious as our Indian problem in Canada. I have several thousand Indians in my constituency who are living under deplorable conditions. It is true that conditions have improved a little. I hope the improvement will continue more rapidly.

There has been no discussion of the Indian problem on the floor of the house during this session. At the last session there was very little. During the years of the twentieth parliament a committee was established, composed of a lot of very fine gentlemen and one lady senator. They studied this problem at great length. There was a lot of discussion, and the people of Canada and the members of the House of Commons generally realized that it was a major problem. The Indian Act was revised, and steps were taken to make a start on making conditions easier for the Indians and teaching them a new way of life.

First I want to say I am not on my feet tonight to make carping criticism of the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. When the present Minister of Finance took over this department he showed a great deal of interest. He gave this problem a great deal of thought. Indians came in and talked to him on many occasions. I will say this for the minister; he won the confidence of the Indians. Any minister who is to properly administer this department must first of all get the Indians to have confidence in him. I am hoping the present minister will do as good a job and be as thoughtful in dealing with the Indians as the present Minister of Finance when he was in that department.

One thing I have learned about the Indian is that he never forgets. If you do him a good turn he will remember it; but if you do him a bad turn, or if you speak hastily at times without giving consideration to what you are saying, you make an enemy instead of a friend.

I did not speak on Indian affairs last session because I had been out of the house for four years. I had lost contact with my Indian friends, and I was not in a position to know what had been done since the new act was proclaimed and the new thinking regarding the whole Indian problem had been adopted. Last summer I did make it my business to go to a number of reserves in my constituency. It was so muddy that I was not able to get to them all, but I found that quite an improvement had taken place.

When I was in the House of Commons in 1945, 1946 and 1947 I emphasized two things. The first was that we had to provide Indians with schools so they could get an education. Schools were built on all the reserves. Another thing I mentioned was the need of hospitals. We have a good hospital in our area that takes good care of the sick Indians. The second thing was housing. Houses have been built for a few of our older Indians.

By the way, the Indians in one particular reserve, the Thundercloud reserve, sent word and asked me to come up and see them. I went. I sent word of the day I would be there. When I got to where the road turned off the highway I was met by an Indian who guided me in to the reserve. I am sure if he had not been there to guide me I would not have been able to find my way through the potholes.

I was met and welcomed by the chief of the band. He held my hand for a long time and said, "I think I never see you again. You good friend." I think that repaid me for any little work I have done in connection with Indians. We had a long conference. Most of the band were there, and a number of suggestions were made by the Indians, who asked me to bring their case before this House of Commons. That is why I am on my feet tonight.

One of the first things I asked them to do was take me to some of the houses in which they were living. Mr. Chairman, I wish all the members of this House of Commons and the people of Canada generally could see the type of houses in which the majority of these Indians are living and the conditions under which they are living. There would be no hesitation whatsoever in giving all the assistance possible to the Indian affairs branch and the minister who is administering that department to make things different, although there have been a few houses built for the older Indians.

Here we have people who for generations had a whole country from which to get their living. Whenever they got hungry they could go out and kill buffalo, deer or antelope, and provide themselves with plenty of food. They could make a shelter, and they could get their clothing from the skins of those animals. Those days are completely gone. The older generation that got its livelihood in that way are completely lost. They do not know how to do any of the kinds of work the white man requests of them. They have absolutely no way of making a living. If it were not for the fact that we have family allowances, and that the old Indians are now getting old age pensions, the Indian affairs branch would either have to feed all those people or let them starve to death; one or the other.

I looked at a number of these houses lived in by the majority of whom I am talking. What kind of houses do they live in? They have gathered a few logs—and not very good logs—they have a wall six or seven feet high, and they have put on an earth roof on which there is very little pitch. Last summer it rained almost continuously for weeks, and for days on end water poured through those roofs on to the people who were in those shacks. I want to warn the department here that if something is not done soon, at least to get roofs that will shelter these people from rain, we are going to have a recurrence of tuberculosis. Neither an Indian nor anybody else can live in that kind of housing and be free from tuberculosis and many other diseases.

I find that this has taken place during the last few years. As I said earlier we have had day schools on these reserves for the last three years. Now we have a generation of boys and girls between 16 and 19 years of age coming out of school who can read and write but cannot do very much else. In the village where I live we are not far from three different reserves. In the last two or three falls dozens of young men have come into our district looking for work. What kind of work can they do? They cannot do any work. They do not really know how to do anything. There are jobs. There is a scarcity of farm labour in my constituency, and in my district particularly.

The white farmers do not hire these boys. Why? Because they cannot drive a truck, they cannot handle a combine, they cannot handle a tractor. Today we have mechanized farming, and unless these young men have some kind of training in operating these machines I do not know what is going to become of them. They are going to become a charge on our people. They are going to become a group of tramps. I think something should be done to provide these boys with some kind of help to learn how to do things.

I had a conference with some of the officials of the department yesterday or the day before, and I made the suggestion that some kind of technical training should be given these boys. I am not proposing that the government or the department set up a large technical training scheme. I do not think it would be practical and I do not think it would work. It would be costly, and it might be a complete failure. But I do think that the department could have a few mobile units—a van with a mechanic and a carpenter—which would spend perhaps two or three weeks on each reserve and then move on. We could see next year what progress they had made.

As I have stated, these Indians need homes. That is one of the first things they need. They have no idea how to set about building a wooden house. If they could get some training so that even a few of them could get started, it would be of great benefit. It does not take a very clever carpenter to build a house. Nearly anybody with average intelligence, after working with a carpenter for a few weeks, could learn how to build a house. A mechanic could give some basic training in practical mechanical matters.

Some of the reserves are getting a few tractors, and a few of the Indians on these reserves are getting a small number of old trucks. I have not seen any good trucks; I have seen a number of trucks which are barely hanging together as I passed through on the road. When the trucks broke down they were not able to repair them. One of the reasons these trucks broke down is that these people did not know how to operate them or take care of them. That is a suggestion. I think that some practical beginning has to be made along these lines.

I do not know what they are going to do about the girls. The girls are in this position, that they are leaving home. When they come out of school a few of them have been taken into the Indian hospital in North Battleford and have received training. Some of them have lived in the hospital for two or three years. They have learned how to cook with an electric stove, and they have had frigidaires. They have had nice rooms and clean beds and have been well dressed. They meet young Indians and decide to get married. Then you are up against a serious problem. When they get married they just go back to the reserve and live in one of these shacks.

The day I was on one of the reserves there was a very clean, well dressed, nice looking girl. She had spent three or four years in the hospital and had that training, and she had married an Indian and gone back to one of these houses, about which I am talking, to live with the parents. There is not much hope for the girls, as far as I can see, until we get the boys trained so they can earn a living and are able to build a decent house to which to take their wives. This is a problem to which I have given much thought and about which I have been very much concerned.

When I was reading the reports of the estimates committee, in report No. 14, at page 413, I found a statement that made me feel badly. This was a statement by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. The committee were discussing housing, and the item in question was to provide a sum of money to build houses for these Indians who could not afford to pay for them themselves. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre said:

> I should like to make it clear that I think it is fine to build these houses if you are going to try to make the Indian pay it back over a period of years, like any other citizen, but for the life of me I cannot understand why we build homes for Indians—I do not care how destitute they are—unless we try to get some of the money back.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, I felt badly about that statement. I hope the hon. member did not really mean it. I hope there are no other members in the House of Commons who have the same idea. I want to make this promise to the minister. As far as I am concerned, and as far as this group are concerned, we will give him every encouragement not only to build houses but to do as much as possible for the Indians who are in the desperate condition most of us know about.

I want to cut short what I was going to say; nevertheless I want to make one or two more suggestions. One of the questions the Indians discussed with me was the difficulty they had in getting meat. I said to them, "Can you not get any deer, moose or anything like that?" They said, "The trouble with us is this. When the season is open for deer, while it is true there are deer in this country the white men come out by the hundreds, and we are afraid to go out in the bush while the white men are hunting. If you could just get the government to give us one day or perhaps two days so we could get some meat for ourselves, we would appreciate it. We do not hunt for sport. When we go out, we go in order to try to get some meat." I said, "That is a provincial matter, but I will draw it to the attention of the government and ask if they cannot make some arrangement with the provincial government to give the Indians that privilege."

Shortly after that discussion I came across an article in the Saskatoon Star-Phœnix of February 11, 1955, which illustrates this point clearly. It is headed "Disgraced" and it reads as follows:

> Saskatchewan hunters must look upon the 1954 game bag with mixed emotions. True, they carried home more than one million ducks and more than 20,000 deer, as well as much other game. But they can scarcely be proud of the fact that 13 hunters died from wounds and that 39 others suffered non-fatal injuries. Such sombre statistics are indeed cause for reflection.
> Other figures should cause not a few red faces. Apart from human and legitimate game targets, hunters' bullets found their marks in 19 cattle, three calves, six horses, one goat, several gasoline drums, a combine, a car and a truck. Some of the shots which did this damage were fired deliberately and criminally. Others were fired in thoughtless stupidity. Hunters must accept public ridicule for such acts and vow to reform, or they must accept the doubtful reputation of being anything but keen-eyed. As such they disgrace their prehistoric ancestors, who lived by taking careful and unerring aim.

Mr. Chairman, the committee has listened to me patiently. I know the minister is in a hurry to get through. I am therefore going to curtail my remarks. However, I want to assure the minister that even though I am sitting on the opposition benches, if there is anything I can do to help to solve this problem he can count on my support.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this item. During the first two parliaments that I sat in this chamber I had many Indians in my constituency. Then there was a redistribution and I lost the Indians but I never seemed to lose contact with them.

Before I say the few words I wish to say, may I assure the minister that I do not rise with any animosity toward him, the department or anybody else. I am like the hon. member for The Battlefords; if I can do anything at all to help in solving this Indian problem I shall be only too pleased to do it.

When the minister replies—and he does not need to do so until he is ready—I should like to know how many more houses have been built at Norway House since the last time I represented the constituency. I might assure the minister that I am going there this summer. I have made arrangements to go this summer to Cross Lake, and Norway House, when the house finishes its work. I should like to know about the hospital stations. I had some trouble getting to see them but I got there anyway, and I saw how they were working. I thought they were a credit to the department.

In about 1949 the department of Indian affairs sent four Indian nurses to New Zealand to be trained as midwives. What happened to them? Did they come back? Where are they working today, or have they gone into the ranks of the married? In the veterans affairs committee I asked questions about our Indian soldier settlers. I obtained the information that in Manitoba there are 78 such settlers. I should like to know from the minister what progress they have made. Have they their farms half paid for yet, or is the interest going to beat them? What is the situation there? The minister can either drop me a note and tell me about that matter or he can tell me when he is answering the other questions.

The hon. member for The Battlefords spoke about vocational training. I think that is a wonderful thing. My experience in the north country has been that when you teach the Indian something he does not forget it. He is also quick to learn. At Norway House there was a young Indian—I think he was about 18 or 19 years old—who could slab logs better than any white man I ever saw. Unfortunately that boy was drowned, but there will be more like him there.

I did some visiting in some of the houses there. In one of the houses I visited there were parts of two outboard motors lying around. I do not know how many pieces there were, but to me there looked to be about 30 or 40. I asked the young chap there what he was going to do with them. He said he was going to make one engine out of two. I served a good apprenticeship on the river Clyde, building boats, engines and so forth, and I thought he had quite a job in hand. But two days later I saw him coming up the Nelson river with the two engines made into one. He had done a wonderful job. I might tell you that the only tools he had were a pair of pliers and a soldering bolt.

I therefore say this. Do not have any hesitation about this vocational training. I do not know just how it can be done, but there must be plenty of brains in the Indian affairs department which can devise ways and means to bring this vocational training to these young men.

What has happened since we brought health services to the Indians? Let us go back to when I came to this house first in 1943. Conditions among the Indians then were deplorable. The death rate was very high on some of the reserves. That situation has been remedied by the services the Indian department has rendered, but you have a bigger problem on your hands now than you ever had before because the Indians are not dying in such numbers. There are gradually becoming more of them, and you have to face the problem whether you are going to make the Indians wards of the government for all time to come or whether you are going to put them on an equal basis with white men.

The Indians were the original settlers of this country, and I think we should try to get them straightened out before we have more Indians than white people. I want to ask the minister one more question. Why does Manitoba only get a grant of $250 for fairs while Alberta and Saskatchewan get more? I do not like to see Manitoba discriminated against in these matters. I am not going to take any more time, because maybe somebody else wants to say something.

Mr. Blackmore: I have no desire to hold up the proceedings tonight. I have been deeply interested in all that has been said up to the present time. There is no doubt that most of the Indians are in a very deplorable situation economically and that they face a yet more deplorable situation if unemployment develops as it appears it is going to develop and they become unable to obtain the employment which they have been obtaining during the last few years. I ask hon. members to imagine the state they will be in. I thought I should like to have the minister give us some idea of what he has in mind in connection with the various problems which have been so well indicated by those who have already spoken. Could the minister talk to us a while about this matter?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before I attempt to do that, perhaps I might anticipate the hour and ask if the committee would give its indulgence for a very few minutes after ten o'clock. I am informed there is a real prospect of finishing if we could have that indulgence. I shall make my remarks very brief. With respect to the specific questions asked by the hon. member for Selkirk, perhaps he would, as he rather indicated, let me give the answers on another occasion, because they involve a little research.

Mr. Bryce: Don't forget. That is all I ask.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I have a fair memory, and I can assure the hon. member for Selkirk that if there is one province—well, with one possible exception—I would not want to discriminate against, it is Manitoba.

I thought the remarks made by the hon. member for The Battlefords and the hon. member for Selkirk were most constructive. There is no doubt that the very excellent work done in recent years by the Department of National Health and Welfare in eradicating disease among the Indians and improving their general health has, as several hon. members have indicated, created a very serious problem.

The traditional way of life of many of the Indians, especially in the northern part of the country, cannot be pursued by all those who are growing up now. I feel pretty sure that education and the kind of housing which will make it possible for them to profit by education are, as the hon. member for The Battlefords indicated, the two real keys to this problem. We are deeply concerned about the problem of technical education and the best and most practical way of accomplishing it. I could continue at considerable length about this matter, and on another occasion I shall be very happy to do so, but perhaps just saying what I have said is almost enough.

In my view these are the two key things, and the more closely the education of the Indians is integrated with the education of the rest of the population the sooner the Indians will be able to live with the rest of us on equal terms, compete on equal terms and become indistinguishable from other Canadian citizens. That, it seems to me, should be our ultimate goal. By that I do not mean to suggest for one minute—I have been warned about this—that anyone has the slightest thought of taking away from the Indians any of their treaty rights, traditional rights, or anything they feel especially belongs to them, or of using any form of compulsion whatsoever to make them change faster than they are willing to change. I think the task is to try to persuade them that by changing, by improving, by becoming educated, they will have a better way of life. This is not going to be easy.

One thing I appreciated very much in what was said by the hon. member for The Battlefords was the tribute he paid to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. It is true. In my very limited experience of visiting reserves I have found that the Minister of Finance did gain the confidence of the Indians all over the country, and I can assure the hon. member that he set a very high standard for me when he said he hoped I would do as well. So do I.

Mr. Michener: Because they do not pay any taxes.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to extend the discussion of this subject at any length, but I should like to mention one or two points arising out of my observation of the situation in respect of the Indians in the area from which I come. I remember visiting one of the Indian villages during last summer. I made some comment to the chief, who was showing me around, that the children looked to be quite healthy. I still remember clearly the gleam that came into his eye when he pointed out to me that for the first time within his memory, and he was not a young man, the population of his little tribal group was on the increase instead of the reverse being true.

I also had the opportunity of visiting two or three of the schools, and I must say I was very pleased with the type of buildings and the equipment that appeared to be available in schools in fairly isolated locations. Certainly to my way of thinking they compared quite favourably with the general public schools of that district on the coast of British Columbia.

There is one matter of policy on which I should like a word of clarification from the minister, if he is in a position to give it. It has to do with a subject on which he only touched in his recent remarks, the question of when our Indians become full citizens of the country. Perhaps I might put the question in the form of a riddle. When is a fisherman not a fisherman on the coast of British Columbia? I suggest that possibly the answer to that might be, when he is an Indian.

Mr. Pouliot: Or when he does not catch fish.

Mr. Barnett: The reason I have put the matter in that way is that I should like to know first of all whether there is a policy and, if so, what is the policy with respect to the construction of certain works in connection with fishing operations and that sort of thing in the coastal areas of British Columbia? About a year ago I had occasion to look into a proposal for providing certain facilities which fishermen need for tying up their boats and so on. I must say that a very thorough investigation was made of the project, but I shall not go into any of the details. I discovered that in this particular case if the project had been proceeded with it would have been constructed by the federal department of works, but that the funds would have come from the money provided for the Indian affairs branch.

On the other hand I know of other instances, and I can mention one example, where that was not the case. There is an item appearing in the details on page 498 of the estimates book, under public works, harbours and rivers engineering branch, which provides for breakwater repairs at a location which is definitely in Indian territory.

I should like to know whether there is any general policy in respect to where the line is drawn, or whether the policy is perhaps made on an ad hoc basis. I should like to know whether this matter has been discussed among the Indian affairs branch, the Department of Public Works and possibly, as I suggested, the Department of Fisheries. Is there any real policy in respect of that, or is it something that has not been clarified? If there is a policy, could the minister tell us briefly what that policy has been or is likely to be?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is a question to which I should really like to give consideration before answering. If the hon. gentleman would not mind letting me give the answer at a later time, I shall undertake to do that.

Mr. Barnett: That would be quite satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman. It is something that I feel would be useful to know in the event of other matters coming to my attention or that of the other members who live in coastal areas in which these problems are apt to arise.

Mr. Herridge: I am going to be quite brief, Mr. Chairman, so I do not want you to look glumly at me. I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that I have one Indian and one reserve in my constituency. I am speaking now of the sole survivor of the Arrow Lake band and the Arrow Lake Indian reserve. It is a small reserve in a very beautiful spot on the lake. I am just bringing this to the minister's attention, and asking if it is possible for a few other families to be brought in to utilize that beautiful reserve on a lovely bay with a sandy beach. There may be a possibility of bringing some other Kootenay Indians in there so they could enjoy the facilities, and continue the reserve as the Arrow Lake reserve. I just bring that to his attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall have a look at the matter.

Education—

78. Administration, operation and maintenance, $8,521,245.

Mr. Dinsdale: There are a few brief comments I want to make on this item. I have listened carefully to everything that has been said thus far in this discussion. I would agree that this item concerning education is crucial in everything that has taken place here this evening. I appreciated the information that was revealed in our discussions in the estimates committee on this topic of Indian affairs. It was also encouraging to note the minister's emphasis then, and again tonight, on the need to gradually move away from paternalism by gradually breaking down the segregation of our Indian population.

In this connection I would say that education is fundamentally important. It seems to me that the emphasis on establishing day schools on the reserves rather than depending upon residential schools is important in this whole process. During the Easter recess I took the opportunity of visiting two reserves in my own constituency to see the sort of activity that was taking place out there. I am glad to see this move toward establishing schools on the reserves, and I would merely say that I hope the educational program carried on there will be just as broad as possible under the circumstances. I hope it can include the adult population as well as the juvenile population, because an adult education program goes hand in hand with breaking down this segregation.

Finally there is the matter of coeducation which is also proceeding; that is, the mixing of white and Indian children in the same schools. I investigated the situation in my own city of Brandon, and I found that the superintendent of education is very keen about this coeducational program. He is anxious to promote it just as far as is possible. However, he had one small complaint. He finds there are not sufficient students of high school age arriving at the local residential school to incorporate into the city high school program. There was a feeling this might arise as a result of a certain misunderstanding and difference of interpretation between the local superintendent of schools and the superintendent of Indian schools.

In summing up, I would say I do agree that we are moving in the right direction in connection with this problem. If what we have on paper is vigorously implemented in the years that lie ahead, we will gradually work toward the desired goal of uniting the Indians with the general population.

National gallery of Canada—

81. Administration, operation and maintenance, including industrial design division, $250,808.

Mr. Knight: May I ask the minister if these items from here to the end of his estimates were considered by the estimates committee?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, we spent one whole session on them, and they were quite fully discussed.

Item agreed to.

82. Payment to the national gallery purchase account for the purpose of acquiring works of art, in conformity with section 8 of the National Gallery Act, $130,000.

Mr. Monteith: I have just a short comment on this item. I do not want to hold up the committee at all, but I should like to say that these cash accounts, as they are called, are quite confusing both to the house and to the general public. For instance, it was intimated in the estimates of 1952-53 that the estimates totalled $406,000. Actually the amount spent was roughly $108,000 out of this purchase account; that was just the amount spent, and this actually was charged up in the estimates. Conversely, in the year 1953-54 there was $490,000 in the estimates and the amount spent was $699. My only point in bringing this to the attention of the house is that I do not think the estimates as they are presently drawn give a true picture of the estimates and expenditures.

Mr. Pouliot: Perhaps the minister made great bargains in buying paintings.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to think that the gallery had, but I have not done the buying myself.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: On Monday we shall begin with the second reading of the bill respecting unemployment insurance. I understand it is going to a committee for study. After second reading is given we shall revert to the budget debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 9, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—BIRTHDAY FELICITATIONS

Mr. Speaker: May I take advantage of this first opportunity since Saturday to wish the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), who celebrated the anniversary of a birthday on that day, many happy returns.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to thank you as well as all hon. members for your kindness. Perhaps it is a platitude; nevertheless it is true that there comes a point where the only pleasant thing about a birthday is that it provides an opportunity for your friends to say that they remember you.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GOODE—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN NEW WESTMINSTER "COLUMBIAN"

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. A newspaper report datelined Ottawa, May 6, and published in the Columbian of New Westminster, British Columbia, is headed "Goode moves in with Socred group". The item goes on to say this:

> Tom Goode, Liberal member for Burnaby-Richmond, has moved in with the Social Credit members in the House of Commons. Goode, who shared an office on the main floor with J. A. Byrne, Kootenay East, has now moved upstairs to the sixth floor where Social Credit members and some C.C.F. are contained.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Goode: This is a most serious matter to me, Mr. Speaker. After listening to my statements I hope that my friends will also consider it to be serious. The article continues:

> Liberals are housed on the ground floor and third floor. Conservatives and some C.C.F. are on the fourth and fifth floors and Social Credit, some independents and C.C.F. are in offices on the top floor.
> Goode, who has served on the government's standing committee on external affairs, has been replaced on that body by Maurice Boisvert, Nicolet-Yamaska.

Mr. Speaker, the statement has no substance whatever in truth. I do not need to tell you that the office arrangements listed in the article are entirely wrong. I have had an office on the sixth floor of this building since the first of this parliament. I share that office with the Liberal member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier), and I am most happy with those arrangements. Alongside of me are ten other Liberal members of parliament, each of whom, because of the arrangement, could be accused of joining another party. I think the house will agree that the statement which I have read to you is an example of yellow journalism at its very lowest. It has always been my impression in this house that legislation has been suggested from opposition parties which I could support, because in my view it would build towards national unity and was for the betterment of the Canadian people. I propose to continue that course.

This article has been printed by an irresponsible newspaper and I have been assured that no member of the press gallery in Ottawa sent the article to the west. Nothing but contempt can be held for a paper whose policy would direct that an article of this kind should appear on its pages. I challenge the Columbian in New Westminster to prove that this article is correct, and I challenge them to name their Ottawa correspondent. The people of my riding will know how to deal with such a contemptible political move.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is going beyond correcting the statement concerning him which has appeared in the press. Having done what he thought he should do, the hon. member should not go further.

Mr. Goode: Perhaps I might answer the last statement, Mr. Speaker. I serve on many committees of the house. During this session I asked the British Columbia Liberal whip, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), to have me replaced on the external affairs committee for this session. There have been days when I have had six committee appointments in one day, and I felt it fair to my colleagues from British Columbia to tell them I could not attend to all my commitments. The B.C. whip immediately had me replaced.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CRIMINAL LAW—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West) presented the first report of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BROADCASTING—FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf) presented the first report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.

[Later:]

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I move, by leave of the house, that the first report of the special committee on broadcasting and television be now concurred in.

Mr. Low: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if it would not be possible to ask for concurrence in this motion on another day when the members of the committee and the house have had an opportunity to read the report?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It has been read by the assistant clerk of the house. It is a very short report.

Mr. Speaker: The motion has to be put by leave. If the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) obects to concurrence being moved now, it will have to wait. I understand that is the position of the hon. member; and therefore the motion will have to be put at a later date.

Motion stands.

MEAT

INSPECTION OF PRODUCTS ENTERING INTERNATIONAL AND INTERPROVINCIAL TRADE

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 352, respecting the inspection of meat and meat products entering into international and interprovincial trade.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

VOCATIONAL TRAINING, N. S.—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Balcom:

What contribution under the various classifications have been made in 1954 by the federal government towards vocational training in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gregg: Following are the federal government contributions in respect of programs operated under the vocational training act in Nova Scotia for the fiscal year 1953-54: Training of unemployed, $76,741.15; youth training, including student aid, $39,099.37; training for the armed forces, $5,917.63; training of workers for defence industries, $56,947.26; apprentice training, $47,312.60; assistance to vocational schools, annual allotment, $119,559.39; vocational correspondence courses, $309.00. Complete figures for fiscal year 1954-55 are not yet available.

FISHERIES STATISTICS, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Balcom:

1. How many men are employed at deep sea fishing in Nova Scotia in (a) trawlers or seine liners; (b) inshore fishing?

2. What is the value of (a) catch of trawlers or seine liners; (b) equipment used in trawlers or seine liners; (c) catch from inshore fishing; (d) equipment used for inshore fishing?

Mr. Sinclair:

1. In 1953 the following numbers of men were engaged in primary fishing operations:

On trawlers	476
On draggers	378
On vessels (10-40 tons)	2,762
In boats (less than 10 tons)	10,112
Other	597

The men employed on trawlers were definitely offshore fishermen.

Those on draggers and on vessels of 10 to 40 tons were probably predominantly offshore fishermen.

Those fishing in boats of less than 10 tons or those fishing without boats would be inshore fishermen.

2. Value of catch and of fishing equipment, Nova Scotia, 1953:

	Millions
(a) Value of catch taken offshore	$ 6·2
(b) Value of catch taken inshore	15·3
(c) Value of equipment used in offshore fishing	10·0
(d) Value of equipment used in inshore fishing	9·8

The value of the catch taken offshore and inshore is estimated. Value of equipment used in offshore fishing includes the value of all vessels of 10 tons and over; that of equipment used in inshore fishing includes the value of boats (less than 10 tons) and of all fishing gear used in the inshore fishery like nets, traps, weirs, etc. The value of shore installations of all kinds is omitted from both categories.

FEDERAL BUILDINGS, VANCOUVER, B.C. —JANITOR SERVICE

Mr. Winch:

1. Has the janitor service in the new customs building at Vancouver been let out on contract?

2. If so, what is the amount of the contract and to whom was it let?

3. Does the contract make provision for maintenance of wage standards, hours of work and benefits in line with those existing in the civil service for similar work?

4. Are janitor services in the other federal buildings in Vancouver and in the new post office to be let on a contract basis?

5. If so, what is the purpose of this change in policy?

Mr. Bourget:

1. Yes.

2. (a) $37,200. (b) Modern Building Cleaning Service of Canada Limited, Vancouver, B.C.

3. The contract provides that no workman employed on the work shall at any time be paid less than the minimum rate of wages as set forth in schedule of wages issued by the federal Department of Labour and to work not more than eight hours per day and 44 hours per week.

4 and 5. There is no change in policy. A contract was awarded for janitor service in the customs building for the purpose of establishing comparative costs.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

P.F.A.A., TOWNSHIP 30, RANGE 22, ALBERTA

Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

1. What was the number of each of the sections which made up the eight-section block in township 30, range 22 W-4 M.D.-48, Alberta, for the year 1954 under P.F.A.A.?

2. What was the yield per acre for each of the above sections?

3. What was the name of the farmer in each case and how much was he paid under P.F.A.A.?

DISTANT EARLY WARNING LINE

Mr. Castleden:

1. Is the Canadian government committed to assist in the construction or the manning of the distant early warning line?

2. Have any arrangements been made through which Canadian construction firms may tender for construction contracts on this line?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—CROWN ATTORNEY

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice and the crown attorney of the Northwest Territories in the month of April, 1955, relating to the position of crown attorney of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Garson: I wonder if my hon. friend from Kamloops would agree to adding after the words "the month of April, 1955," the following words, "and up to and including May 5, 1955." There is a reply of mine which went back as of that date, and the return would be incomplete if it were not included.

Mr. Fulton: I am agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry, as amended?

Motion as amended agreed to.

NATO Council Meeting

GRAIN COMMISSION—COMMISSIONER

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since March 8, 1955, which have passed between any department of the government and any person, persons or organizations, relative to the appointment of a person or persons to the board of grain commissioners.

GRAIN COMMISSION—ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER

Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents since January 1, 1954, which have passed between any department of the government and any person, persons or organizations, relative to the appointment to the position of assistant commissioner on the board of grain commissioners.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE SALARY OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Canada Elections Act including provision for an increase in the salary of the chief electoral officer.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the house.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION OF FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY IN MEETING OF NATO COUNCIL

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members would not like to see pass unnoticed in the records of the house the significance of the participation for the first time of the representatives of the Federal Republic of Germany in the meeting of the North Atlantic council in Paris today. Perhaps I might be allowed to read into the record the statement made in that connection on behalf, I am sure, of all members of the house and of the people of Canada generally on the importance of that event. It is as follows:

The historic significance of this council meeting is apparent to us all. The German Federal Republic, as a result of agreements freely concluded, and which have been approved by our legislatures, now becomes a member of NATO— an organization devoted solely to international peace, security and welfare. We warmly welcome Chancellor Adenauer as the first representative of Germany to our council, and as a man who has already proven his devotion to the ideals we share.

We are here also to examine in confidence and frankness the international situation, particularly in the light of recent developments. That situation, at least in Europe, has improved. This gives us reason for satisfaction, but none for abandoning those policies which have to a large extent been responsible for that improvement.

This council meeting marks the successful completion of long and patient effort by those around this table and by others who are no longer with us on the council to broaden and strengthen the basis of our NATO association.

It marks also a new phase in the development of both European unity and the Atlantic community. France and Germany, not because they forget, but because they remember the past, have come together in a western European union which includes Italy, Belgium, The Netherlands, Luxembourg and also Great Britain whose vision across the seas has not prevented the acceptance of a new and indispensable European role. Europe, however, even a uniting Europe, is not enough, and NATO, the vigorous and hopeful expression of the Atlantic idea, is recognition of that fact.

NATO is growing stronger and free Germany adds to that strength. This strength is, however, merely a means to an end, international peace and security. Therefore we must exploit every genuine opportunity to seek by negotiation solutions for the problems which today keep alive fears and tensions in the world.

This remains our most important NATO task. Only strength and steadiness will see it through to a successful conclusion.

All these things have been said so often by so many so much better than I have been able to do that I feel almost apologetic for repeating the obvious. I am, however, grateful for the opportunity to reaffirm, and on an occasion of such momentous importance, the loyalty of the government and people of my country to the ideals of peaceful and fruitful co-operation which inspire this great Atlantic organization, into which we now welcome our German colleagues. The developments which have culminated in this meeting give us greater reason for faith and confidence in the future.

I am sure we all share that faith and confidence in the future and we all hope that France and Germany will not have to forget but rather will remember the past to make effective and lasting their united efforts to further peace and happiness in the world.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel it would be appropriate that I should say a few words with regard to the statement the Prime Minister has placed on the record concerning this extremely important event that has taken place today. It is in fact one of the most unique events in history. It comes on the tenth anniversary of V-E day. It comes on the tenth anniversary of a time when our forces were discovering the full horrors of Dachau, Buchenwald, Belsen and those other camps of terror. Let us never forget this because the things that happened there are things with respect to which our purpose must always be the prevention of any repetition of human suffering of that kind.

Remembering these things, we will have a firmer basis for the grounds of friendship that have emerged on this tenth anniversary of the day when Germany surrendered. Chancellor Adenauer said today that Germany had paid the price of the terrible leadership to which the people had submitted. He could say that because he was one man who paid a price himself for opposing personally the evil forces that Hitler had let loose. Chancellor Adenauer also said in his remarks today, and I thought these words were memorable, that from this dreadful punishment Germany had emerged cleansed and purified and that the German people were ready to go forward recognizing the price of leadership of the kind from which they had suffered.

It seems to me this is a day to remember the things that have happened but it is also a day for great hope. As we welcome Germany into the western fellowship, I think we should also pay our tribute to France which, with all the millions of graves to remind her of German aggression, has welcomed in terms of friendship an enemy of so short a time ago. France has more reason than any other nation in the world to be conscious of what German aggression means. This day can be one of the turning points of history. This can well become one of the most memorable dates that people will recall centuries from now if the spirit of that great German, Chancellor Adenauer, continues to guide the German people in the years ahead.

AUSTRIAN PEACE TREATY—EFFECT ON STATUS OF POLITICAL REFUGEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whom notice was sent, may I address this question to the Prime Minister and perhaps he will take it as notice. With respect to the Austrian treaty now under consideration, has the minister or the government made any representations to the United States, Great Britain or France with regard to section 16 of the proposed treaty which may have drastic effects upon the status of political refugees now residing in Austria?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I shall bring the question to the attention of the officers of the Department of External Affairs, and have a reply prepared which I will communicate to the house.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RELEASE OF INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue? In view of the speculation raised by an editorial in today's Globe and Mail regarding the minister's previous knowledge of the Dempsey affair, will the minister clarify the situation by making a statement to the house? I have sent him a copy of this question.

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. gentleman sent me notice of his question a few minutes before I came into the house. I might say that I am not overly interested in the speculation from any source. I have certain duties and responsibilities as Minister of National Revenue, and those duties and responsibilities I have discharged for the past ten years without fear or favour.

Under section 133 of the Income Tax Act and section 55 of the succession duty act, I must observe the secrecy provisions of those acts and not disclose to anyone, not entitled to know, any matter concerning any estate in question. The estate in question involved both income tax and succession duties. The Ontario provincial treasurer, Premier Frost, is entitled to any information the Department of National Revenue has with reference to succession duties. Interchange of information is a common practice. I admit that I had a conference with Mr. Frost while he was in Ottawa. He had to leave hurriedly, so that the conference was incomplete. I am not in a position to disclose any information that passed between us at that time.

[Later:]

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of National Revenue a supplementary question, arising out of his answer to the earlier question addressed to him. In view of the speculation which this whole matter has naturally aroused, I would like to ask whether he shares the views which were expressed in connection with another appointment elsewhere, which might be summarized by asking him whether he feels that what is good for the Guaranty Trust is good for the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McCann: I am very much interested in the hon. member's interest in Ontario politics.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Revenue. Can he tell us where he finds in section 133 of the Income Tax Act permission to disclose information to Premier Frost which he is not able to disclose to this parliament, to which the minister is responsible.

Mr. McCann: I quoted section 133 with reference to the Income Tax Act and section 54 of the succession duty act; and it was under section 55 of the succession duty act that Premier Frost, as treasurer of Ontario, was entitled to any information we have.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES IN KOREA—CONTINUING COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, some days ago in answer to a question by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) I told the house I would make a statement shortly regarding the Canadian forces in Korea.

As the house is aware, the 2nd battalion, Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, which had completed its normal tour of duty with the commonwealth forces in Korea, embarked on April 6 and has now returned home.

Discussions concerning the reorganization of the commonwealth forces in Korea are continuing between the commonwealth governments concerned and the United States government which, at the request of the United Nations, provided the unified command for the United Nations forces in Korea. Pending the outcome of these discussions, the Canadian destroyer H.M.C.S. Sioux, and the 3rd Canadian field ambulance, Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps, supporting the commonwealth forces, will remain in Korea.

It is not intended to replace the Queen's Own Rifles in Korea; and the 1st battalion, Royal Highland Regiment of Canada, Black Watch, which would have relieved the Queen's Own, will continue its normal training at Aldershot, Nova Scotia.

[Later:]

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence, based upon the reply he gave to the hon. member for Kamloops. Are any headquarters of the Canadian forces being retained in Japan, or at other points in the Far East, in addition to the field ambulance and naval units to which he referred?

Mr. Campney: Administrative troops and supplementary details have been pretty well run down, and while there are some officers remaining there will not be a full headquarters.

STORMS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONDITION IN SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give a report on the result of the recent storm and flood condition in Saskatchewan, and state whether the situation will be declared a national emergency?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent notice of his intention to ask this question. I am not in a position to make a factual report as to the results of the recent storm and flood condition in Saskatchewan.

As to the second part of the question, there is never any occasion for declaring a national emergency. What we have to decide on the information we receive is whether or not the disaster is of such magnitude as to require assistance from the federal government, to cope with its consequences.

In that connection I am still exchanging telegrams with the premier of Saskatchewan, and I am still expecting factual information about the situation, which information will be carefully considered and on which my colleagues and I will decide whether we would take the responsibility of recommending the application of federal funds to the restoration of the situation which has arisen.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask this supplementary question. In view of the reports we heard over the radio today about the flooding of the Qu'Appelle valley and the extent of the immediate damage, has consideration been given to the wisdom of assisting local communities out there by moving in members of the armed forces, particularly the engineering services, to assist in what is undoubtedly a very urgent problem?

Mr. St. Laurent: The premier of Saskatchewan has not suggested that there would be advantage in having engineers from the armed forces moved in. I am sure that he is looking very carefully after the interests of the people of Saskatchewan and that he will not fail to bring to our attention anything that he feels should be done on behalf of the Canadian people as a whole through the federal government.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without extending this discussion unnecessarily, I would point out that there may be occasions upon which even the provincial premiers, with their deep concern, might not be aware of all the facilities that are available to move the engineers in there by air transport.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the premier of Saskatchewan has made himself quite familiar with everything that has been done in recent years, when there were other disasters which occurred in other parts of Canada, and that he will not neglect any aspect of precedents that have been established to support his contention that this is a case where there should be federal assistance.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO INCREASE BENEFIT RATES, ADJUST CONTRIBUTIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gregg for the second reading of Bill No. 328, respecting unemployment insurance.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the other evening when the minister moved second reading of the bill, we had had it in our hands for some considerable time. We have now had the bill for something over a month. I suppose if we had it for a year we would still see in it something that had previously escaped our notice.

Since it is the duty of the official opposition to inquire into the provisions of any legislation presented to the house, there are a few things I would like to bring to the minister's attention. It is true that we shall have the opportunity to examine the measure clause by clause when it is placed before the standing committee on industrial relations. However, there are one or two points I should like to make at this time.

This bill proposes amendments which will have a serious effect on the administration of the act. Some of the provisions of the bill are rather wide in their scope. For one thing, up to the present time insured persons have been educated to the daily contribution basis of making contributions to the fund. They will now have to be re-educated to the weekly contribution basis. Members in the house will be interested to know just what plans the department has made for this change-over.

I recall very well that when the Unemployment Insurance Act first came into being there was an extensive educational program, involving regional conferences, where employers and employees were instructed as to the effects of the act, and representatives of commerce and industry had laid down to them the manner in which they must proceed to insure their employees. I was at two or three of these conferences myself and I recall the time which was spent in instructing employers generally with respect to the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Now that the basis of contribution is changed rather radically, I wonder what provision the minister has made for re-educating people who have become so used to the old system of daily contributions.

As I said at the resolution stage and again the other evening, Mr. Speaker, the members of this group are opposed to the reduction in the maximum benefit period from 51 weeks to 30 weeks. If I recall the minister's remarks correctly, and if he claimed that only 3·5 per cent of payments were paid for the maximum period, a matter with which I would like to deal at a later stage, then I fail to see why it was necessary to reduce the maximum period, as is now suggested. I am not using particularly as an argument the fact that only 3·5 per cent were paid for the maximum period because, in my opinion, the matter must be viewed from the standpoint of the rights of the individual rather than from the impact which such action would have on the fund.

I might also draw attention to the fact that contribution rates have likewise been raised, notably in the case of those workers who are in the higher wage bracket and who have more continuity of employment and consequently are not so apt to benefit. I might say in this regard, Mr. Speaker, that persons over the age of 60 years, let us say, have received a relatively high proportion of the total benefit days paid. For instance, such persons received in the calendar year 1953 a total of 8,125,160 benefit days or 18·2 per cent, out of a total benefit days paid of 44,660,188. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it would seem that elderly people—I would not have the temerity to call a person 60 years of age elderly, but those persons who have passed 60, let me say—are more likely to be eligible for the maximum duration of regular benefits. Retired persons would therefore constitute a group most likely, in my opinion, to be affected by the reduction in the maximum benefit period.

Much has been made of the new classifications in the act, under the new rates of contribution and benefits. I should like to draw attention to the fact that in the top bracket the employee and the employer alike are now supposed to pay 60 cents a week as against the old maximum of 54 cents a week, so that there is an additional contribution of 12 cents per employee per week. Added to that is the government's share of the contribution, which means that the fund will benefit to the extent of approximately 15 cents a week per employee for those persons who are in the highest contribution bracket. Despite those additional contributions, the claimant will actually receive considerably less than he would have received at the old rate. At the old rate he would have received 51 weeks' benefit of $24 a week, a total of $1,224. Under the new scheme he will receive 30 weeks' benefit, at $30 a week, or a total of $900. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I am not dealing at the moment with supplementary benefits, or with what now would be called seasonal benefits.

In other classifications maximum benefits under the new act are in excess of $300 less than those obtainable under the old act. I hold in my hand some calculations which have been made, and I find that persons who are now in the $35 a week class of earnings actually will receive $441 less under the new act, or actually could receive as a maximum benefit $441 less under the new act than they could have received under the old act. At $30 a week they will receive $378 less, and even at $50 a week they will receive $414 less than they could have received as maximum benefit under the old act. Of course, those calculations are based on just what information is available to us. For instance, under the amendments which are being made to the act, the regulations under which those seasonal benefits will now be administered are still a mystery to us. As a matter of fact, until the commission has made the regulations which it is entitled to make under the provisions of these amendments, none of us will know precisely what the seasonal benefits will amount to, nor how they are to be administered.

With regard to the contributions which I referred to a moment ago which will be made to the fund, I have taken the figures which appear in the Labour Gazette for April, 1955, showing estimates of the insured population under the Unemployment Insurance Act. These figures appear on page 483 under table E-4. There I find that in December of 1954, the last month for which figures are available, there were 3,275,000 persons insured under the Unemployment Insurance Act. If we estimate that 50 per cent of these people are in the top contribution bracket—and I think that is, if anything, a little on the low side because the last figures which are available to us are for 1951, four years ago, when there were 47·39 per cent in the top insured bracket, and everyone knows how wages have increased since then—we find in the last report which is available for unemployment and payrolls, the average weekly wage for Canada as of February 1, 1955, was $60.12, and the employees reported numbered nearly 2,500,000. As a matter of fact, with the exception of four provinces, all provinces reported their averages as considerably above the maximum mentioned in the provisions of the new act. If then we tend to be a little on the conservative side and take only 50 per cent of the insured population as a reasonable number, and calculate the amount of the additional contribution which will be paid by this 50 per cent from employer and employee and the government's contribution, we shall find that in one year, even if the number of insured persons does not increase, the additional contributions to the fund will be something of the nature of $13 million. As a matter of fact, just on those figures which I have quoted, I make it $12,772,500 additional contributions to the fund from that class of workers in the coming year. Far from being a drain on the fund, this class of worker, who over the years has been the backbone of the fund, who has contributed more to the fund than any other class, will continue to contribute a great deal more than any other individual class.

I would think it might be well for us to consider again this maximum period; rather than to cut the maximum period for benefits we should find jobs for these people. Employed persons are not a drain on the fund; quite the reverse, they are the people who build it up. Those people who tend to lose most from this deal which is proposed in the amendments are those persons who have given, and who will continue to give, the most to the fund.

I should like also to make some remarks with reference to permissible earnings. I hope that when we are in committee the minister will be able to tell us just what type of thinking prompted the limitation on a man earning from $6 or $8 a week to earning no more than an additional $2 a week while the man who receives $30 a week is to be allowed $13 a week in addition. Under the old act and regardless of the benefit classification a man was permitted to earn up to $2 a day which frequently amounted to some $14 a week and in the majority of cases amounted to about $12 a week.

It is almost impossible to determine the intent of some of the sections of this bill without knowing what regulations are likely to be put into effect. I have mentioned already the difficulty that we have had trying to discover just what the benefits are likely to be for those persons who qualify for seasonal benefits, particularly if they are in the class of persons to which I have referred, those who have been retired from business but who still apply for employment.

I notice instances where conditions governing rights are described merely as being subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by the commission. I suppose we shall not know for some time just what those regulations will be. How can we know whether the provisions of the act will meet the situation if such provisions are limited by phrases such as the one I have mentioned?

In my remarks at the resolution stage I referred to the necessity of evolving some plan to cover fishermen. I had rather hoped that when the amendments were available in bill form we would find that this matter had been taken care of. However, on going over the amendments very carefully I find that there has been no inclination to cover this class of worker. I strongly urge the minister and his officials to undertake such planning without delay because now that we are coming into the summer season we should be making plans to cover people who are likely to be affected when cold weather strikes us once more.

I must say that I am disappointed in the various sections which deal with the setting up of committees. Even in the description of the personnel of the commission there is no reference to the inclusion of women either on the commission or on the committees. I feel most strongly that there should be a woman commissioner. I have spoken on this matter before in this house, on the estimates and when we were considering amendments to the act, and I once again draw to the attention of the minister the fact that no provision has been made for the appointment of a woman commissioner.

I think this should be done even though it means the enlargement of the commission by one person. I believe also that the advisory committee and the national employment committee should likewise have women members. It would appear to be a simple thing to stipulate this in the redrafting of the act. I hope that when the matter is before the committee the minister will show an inclination to consider this point and make the necessary amendments to put it into effect.

Speaking of the commission and the rules which govern the appointment of commissioners, I must say that one is led to wonder why the government, which has expended such large sums of money and such a tremendous amount of eloquence in advocating that older workers should not be retired on the ground of chronological age while still physically and mentally fit to perform the duties of their office, should now reduce the eligible service age of commissioners from 70 years, as specified in the old act, to the 65 years now prescribed in the revision.

With regard to the composition of the boards of referees, again I submit that there should be women on these boards. When I make that comment I am thinking of the substantial percentage of appellants to the boards of referees who are women. I am sure that those members of the minister's department who are thoroughly experienced in this field will agree with me that a large percentage of appellants are women and consequently there should be women appointed to these boards of referees.

I cannot find either that the new bill makes any reference to veterans other than in one small instance. Undoubtedly there will be problems affecting those who are presently in European service and those who have returned from Korea. There is no section of the act as it now stands which permits special service to these men. I should like very much to know just how the commission proposes to handle their cases and whether they are to be given any special consideration, consideration which I think they deserve because of their long absence from this country.

In the explanatory notes which appear at the beginning of the act it is noted that one of the objectives was the rearrangement of the sections and parts of the act to bring them into context with other sections of related nature and to clarify the text. At first study it appears to me that the rearrangement consists in substantial measure in the elimination of those clauses which are difficult to administer, and again I cite the old sections Nos. 101 to 107 dealing with veterans. I realize that some of the provisions relating to veterans are no longer required in connection with those particular workers, but undoubtedly those sections were difficult to administer. Then there are the sections dealing with short-time claimants and others of a like nature.

In my estimation the general tenor of the revisions has been bureaucratic in the extreme. Apparently anything which irritates the administration must be dealt with. As I said the other evening, nothing has brought this attitude to my mind so emphatically as the minister's reference to what he termed interim arrangements. On looking up my previous remarks I find that I referred to this on April 26 as reported on page 3202 of Hansard. I should like to place my words once more on the record, and they are:

> The minister referred a few moments ago to an interim arrangement which would take care of those persons who have had their benefits drastically curtailed by the reduction which is contemplated, from 51 weeks to 30 weeks. He used a few words in describing these people which brought home to me, even more forcibly than an examination of the bill had done, just how far the thinking of the government and the commission has gone along the lines of a bureaucratic approach to the administration of this act.

I have already mentioned the elimination of the clauses dealing with veterans and with short-term claimants. In addition, right through the act there is the tendency to substitute the word "is" for the former words "may be". There is also a tightening up of the time element with reference to appeals. In many instances where 60 days, 90 days or 6 months were allowed, the new act stipulates that 30 days only will be allowed.

As I examined this act I was amazed at the number of instances where I found the words "is final and is not subject to appeal to or review by any court". In the old act, Mr. Speaker, I can find only one circumstance which prohibits appeal to the civil courts, but in the new act there are a number of them; there are at least half a dozen and probably more. I am not a lawyer, but as a layman I fail to understand how it can happen that a body corporate which can sue or be sued can inaugurate legislation which deprives citizens of their inalienable right of impartial hearing and judicial decision as to whether the citizen's views or those of the commission shall prevail. I find this to be a step in the wrong direction. Once more we slide towards the bureaucratic philosophy. In any other group such provisions would be met with the charge of calculated lawlessness. In this group, where the backing of the government is behind those who propose these changes, I must admit that I can hardly think of a term with which to describe the tendency.

I should like to draw attention to the problems which face administrators of this act. Probably the main point which immediately assails the eye, on perusing the statistical data which are available, is that the average period of unemployment has been lengthening each year. I refer to the recently published reference paper No. 58, entitled "The Labour Force", which covers the period of the last ten years and which just came to my desk the other day. From this report and from the reports which I have received since January from the bureau of statistics, I find these interesting facts.

In January of this year there were 23,000 persons who had been looking for work for between seven and twelve months. When I speak about the term of seven to twelve months, Mr. Speaker, I should like the members of this house to recall that these are the people who are going to be affected by this reduction from 51 weeks to 30 weeks. There were 23,000 of those people in January of this year as against less than 10,000 in January of 1954; in fact, in every January reported for the last ten years there were less than 10,000. In February of this year we had 26,000 persons reported as seeking work for more than seven months. Last year in February we had 13,000. The year before we had less than 10,000, and that record goes back for several years. In March of this year we had 31,000 people seeking work for more than seven months. Last year in March we had 17,000. There were nearly twice as many this year. The year before that we had less than 10,000 and so on. The picture is pretty much the same. Going back to 1950, which now seems a long time ago, I see that there were 20,000 in that year also. However, in 1954 as the season progressed right up until the end of June, these figures with regard to persons seeking work for more than seven months gradually increased; and if the same pattern is followed this year we can expect that the figure for those persons seeking work for a period of seven to twelve months will have increased in 1955 as it did in 1954.

I do not know whether that is the reason that the government has decided to cut these off from benefits. I do not know whether they have decided that, since there are so many more who are seeking work for a longer period of time, they must refuse to them the benefits to which they are entitled under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should not like to think that. I hope that, when we come to the consideration of these individual clauses, it will turn out that there has been some other thinking which prompted that action. But whether or not that was the reason, Mr. Speaker, that is the result. There are more and more people each year who are unemployed for longer and longer periods of time. I do not intend to put on the record any more statistics in this regard, but I refer hon. members to this copy of "The Labour Force", page 67, table 11, from which they can see that the same situation applies to all of the applicants. In the four to six months' period looking for work they will find that the numbers have substantially increased.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that we have a special problem in the winter months. It is a problem which has been recognized by everyone who has examined unemployment insurance and the causes of unemployment. As winter is a formidable foe in warfare, I think it would be well if we considered that it is also a formidable foe in employment. Thinking along these lines, I recall the time when Sir Winston Churchill, the prime minister of the United Kingdom, was speaking of the alibi which Hitler had given to his people for the losses in the winter campaign. Sir Winston Churchill said, "He found out they have winter in Russia", a very elemental lesson, and one that Napoleon also learned. I suggest that it is about time this government found out that we have winter in Canada every year.

Every year the figures with regard to unemployment have increased over the last few years until this year on March 19—the date for which we received the highest figures on applications for employment—they had reached the staggering figure of 633,000. I do not wonder that those persons who are charged with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act should feel a little bit nervous about this situation. But after all, Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance is, at best, only a palliative. Undoubtedly it has saved us this year from a major crisis but I urge the minister to get busy now to make plans for employment, not for unemployment. I urge that he do not sit back and wait for the report from the new royal commission on economic prospects. You will not have that report for at least two years, and that means two more winters that we must go through before we can even find out what the findings of that commission will be. Spring is the time, in my estimation, for the start of an investigation into and assessment of the situation with which we are faced. I noticed a Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa in the Hamilton Spectator of last Saturday headed, "Jobless Figures Falling Faster, Officials Claim". The article reads in part as follows:

> However, present information indicates that the number of jobless still is numerically higher than at the same time last year.

Apparently it is a matter for some elation that the figures as to jobless are falling despite the fact that we still have more people unemployed than at the same time last year. The article continues:

> One of the reasons for this, the informant said, is that employment has not kept pace with a growth of 100,000 in the labour force.

If that is true, if that is the reason, then I would think it is all the more reason why the minister should be considering seriously what he is going to do about the winter of 1955-56. Now that the unemployment figures are falling, as this press release indicates, now when an inquiry into the causes of the circumstances surrounding unemployment could scarcely be termed traitorous, as was the allegation almost against those persons who did make some inquiries into it, now in the spring when everyone feels a little hopeful we might take an objective view of the whole employment picture not merely to determine the number of people who are without work but in order to make a careful study of the steps necessary to provide the maximum of employment for the workers of this country.

It is no use to procrastinate until a crisis is upon us. In this regard the government has acted very much like the lazy man with the leaky roof. When it was raining hard he could not get up on the roof to repair it and when it was not raining it did not leak, so he just let it go. I was very much interested to read in a recent issue of the Fundy Fisherman some remarks with which I should like to close these few comments. In doing so, I urge once more upon the minister careful consideration of the criticisms that have been made of these amendments, and in particular some action with regard to unemployment. The editorial commences by saying:

> Unemployment in any country is not only a useless luxury but a terrific waste which no nation can really afford.

After further pertinent remarks, the editorial concludes in this way:

> But, to accept unemployment in Canada as something of a chronic condition is both unwise and unnecessary; and unworthy of a strong and vigorous people that has a mighty task ahead in building up the nation to become one of the truly great nations of the world.

I hope that all the way through the consideration of the bill we can keep these views before us and that we will judge these amendments not only from the standpoint of expediency or the ease with which the act can be administered by the officials but also from the very human aspect of what it is that is needed in the country to give employment to our people and how best the government can serve the workers of Canada.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of going into the ramifications of unemployment. When the minister spoke on the resolution preceding the bill he made a pretty comprehensive statement which enabled members taking part in the discussion to make a broad survey of unemployment and the necessary amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Therefore I am not going to go into that again but am going to try to say a few things at this time that I did not say when I spoke previously.

I have listened to a lot of people talk about unemployment and unemployment insurance, but while they talk for 40 minutes and tell us everything we know about unemployment the only solution they have to offer is: What is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) going to do about it? That is a pretty broad question to ask the poor little Minister of Labour.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is his job, is it not?

Mr. Gillis: No, it is not. He does not create employment and he does not operate any plants or factories. You see, the solution to the question posed by the hon. member who spoke last lies outside of the house. After the criticisms I heard her make I was reasonably sure she was going to finish her speech by saying that for the past few winters, in fact, since 1945, the situation has been growing worse, and I might remind her here that there is nothing wrong now that a little war would not solve.

Mrs. Fairclough: You could say that but I could not.

Mr. Gillis: I know you could not. You would be thrown out of your party, but it is true. You know what Korea did for us when we were tailspinning.

Mrs. Fairclough: You and I are both too old to get into it anyway.

Mr. Gillis: I did my share in the one I could get into; make no mistake about that. I figured that the hon. member was going to finish her speech by saying that after a pretty thorough test of the efforts of those outside the House of Commons to run the country, the exploitation of our natural resources and to provide employment, we still have unemployment. We have given our free economy a fairly good chance since 1867 to demonstrate whether it could cure the problem of recurring unemployment, and it has not done so. The hon. member recognized that quite clearly in her criticisms. I thought she was going to finish her speech by saying that the one thing that would help a great deal would be if the employers of the country would sit down around the bargaining table with the employees and say that they accepted the principle of a guaranteed annual wage and would work it out by collective agreement.

That would be one good bit of advice to those who employ people in this country. The government has already done that. All civil servants have a guaranteed annual wage. They know that over 365 days of the year they are going to receive a pay cheque twice a month to pay the accumulation of bills brought about by the necessity of living.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the hon. member permit a question? Would the hon. member say that the great number of people laid off by the government in the income tax department three or four years ago could say they had a guaranteed annual wage?

Mr. Winters: They were not civil servants.

Mrs. Fairclough: They certainly were.

Mr. Gillis: I said civil servants. I did not say temporary employees.

Mrs. Fairclough: Nine years temporary.

Mr. Macdonnell: Splitting hairs.

Mr. Gillis: What about the guarantee they had in 1930 when charwomen were thrown out on the street? Let us not get into that kind of argument.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right, but you brought it up.

Mr. Churchill: You are losing. That is why.

Mr. Gillis: No. I can take you back to some of your solutions for unemployment in the 1930's—slave camps with people being paid 20 cents a day. I am not vulnerable on this question at all. I have always done the kind of thing I am doing now. I have always tried to make sensible proposals with respect to the unemployed in order to enable them to get food, clothing and shelter. I never did consider it a subject for propaganda. It should not be used as such. That is the great difficulty. There are so many people who pay lip service to the problem but refuse to face up to it and find a solution by making changes. You cannot cure unemployment by carrying on as we have carried on since 1867, that is by getting the occasional war to relieve it and then returning to a condition of unemployment as soon as this supply and demand formula fails.

As I said in the beginning, I am not going into all the ramifications of this bill. The bill is going to a committee where it will be studied clause by clause. Before the committee studies the bill we are going to have the benefit of the opinion of the two labour congresses, who have been studying it for some considerable time. We shall also, I hope, have the benefit of the views of the manufacturers association, who will give us the other side of the story. Any specific criticisms I have to make concerning this bill I shall hold until I have the benefit of these discussions. Then, when the bill is before the committee, we will study it section by section.

I should like to say this for the benefit of the minister. Since we received the bill we have looked at it and have done some work on it ourselves as a committee of our caucus. We have talked to some people about the bill. Before the bill is finally passed, there is one change about which I feel the minister should think and that is the change from 51 weeks to 30 weeks of benefits. As the minister himself pointed out during the course of his presentation, actually only about 4 per cent of the recipients of unemployment insurance are affected. If there are only 3 per cent or 4 per cent affected, the cost is not very great and I do not see any reason for the change. If 3 per cent or 4 per cent of the recipients of unemployment insurance are going to lose out by this change from 51 weeks to 30 weeks, then I feel the minister should consider continuing the old section of the act.

The next point I should like the minister to consider is the change in the categories. Something has been done about it. A couple of additional categories have been created. About 43 per cent of those now covered by unemployment insurance will fit into the ceiling of $57, but I think there should be another category from $57 to at least $63. There are a great many employees, particularly in the building trades, who make up to $100 per week. Now, these people are seasonal employees and by making $57 the top bracket those who earn much more than that will suffer. I am thinking of those in the building trades, the automobile industry, and there are categories in other industries in which the wages are much higher than that. I feel the minister should consider establishing another category from $57 to around $63 or higher if he so desires. I think he should take a look at that particular problem.

I am disappointed also that regulation 5A, section 35, of the act, still remains there. This is the beartrap to which I referred when I spoke at the resolution stage, under which married women are penalized. Everyone with whom I have talked about that particular section, both in and out of the house, thinks it should be removed. It is an administrative headache, anyway. I know that in my own part of the country the board of referees would like to have it removed because the case of every married woman who makes application finally gets into their hands, and it is a headache.

The supplementary benefits also require looking over, I believe. Those who receive supplementary benefits under unemployment insurance year by year are the seasonal workers. In this country the seasonal workers make up about 25 per cent of the working force. The change that is being made now in that particular section will cause suffering to a lot of people. These are the ones who are obliged to go the full term under the act, then take supplementary benefits, and finally even those run out and they are totally unemployed. I believe we will have to take a good look at that. In my judgment the act should provide that any person who is unemployed should receive unemployment insurance until such time as he is gainfully employed; that has always been my conception of an unemployment insurance act. Unless it does that, it is not serving the purpose it was intended to serve.

There is another matter about which I should like the minister to think. I do not know whether he can do anything about it except consult with the Department of National Defence. The Canadian Legion made a proposal to the veterans affairs committee when we were considering the Veterans Benefit Act a week or so ago. At the moment service personnel are covered if they are in the special force in Germany or Korea. Service personnel in the regular forces are covered up to July of this year. Any person who enlists in the regular army for a period of five years or seven years will not be covered for unemployment purposes after July of this year. The Legion recommended that the committee should consider the possibility of bringing all service personnel under unemployment insurance on a contributory basis.

We discussed this proposal at considerable length and reported to the defence department that consideration should be given to it. There are men who will enlist in the regular forces for three years, five years or seven years and after they are in for a couple of years they discover they just cannot go through with it and make the armed forces their vocation. There are many reasons for that. These people find themselves coming out of the service after three or four years, with no right to unemployment insurance. While I am not committed in my own mind one way or the other, I think this is a problem that is going to develop after July of this year. The veterans affairs committee referred the matter to the Department of National Defence, requesting them to conduct a poll of opinion in the services as to whether or not service personnel wanted unemployment insurance on a contributory basis. I believe the Minister of Labour should consult with the Minister of National Defence and get the officers of their department who have training in that field to take a look at the matter. The Legion was rather strongly in favour of insurance for the regular forces on a contributory basis after July of this year.

As I said when I began, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of going over all the things I said at the resolution stage. I am going to conclude my remarks at this point, Mr. Speaker, and shall wait for the committee stage to discuss it clause by clause.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) I do not intend to detain the house for any lengthy discussion at this time. Like the hon. member, I believe that discussion can take place more properly in committee. It has been our experience in the past that committees have done good work, and I believe that is the best place to discuss any changes we think should be made to the bill.

However, as the discussion proceeded in the house this afternoon, I could not help thinking that perhaps the minister in charge of the bill has the wrong title, and that he should be known as the minister of unemployment. Certainly in no sense is he the Minister of Labour, and reference was made to that point only a few moments ago.

Some may say, "That has nothing to do with the bill", but in my judgment it has everything to do with it. It is a good and commendable thing that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg)—and as that is his proper title I shall refer to him in that way—has the responsibility of making provision for people when they are out of work. But that is not the solution to the problem. In my view the only solution is to see that people are employed. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has said that this is a duty of some organization outside the House of Commons. I do not share that view; I think it is very much the duty of the political party in charge of this parliament, and of which this government forms a part. The inference was left of course that it was the function of industry to provide jobs. That of course is the socialist conception, and we hear them clamouring when there is unemployment to the degree we have it today. They say that industry is at fault.

Let me point out to them that the primary function of industry is to provide goods, and that it has done an excellent job. In fact, industry has done such a good job that it has produced more than we are consuming, with the result that they have actually worked themselves out of a job.

Reference has been made to the guaranteed annual wage. I shall not discuss that subject on this occasion but—

Mr. Knowles: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You will find out, without any doubt, when the question is under debate. But let me say this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Knowles: You could answer very quickly; it is just yes or no.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Let me say this to him, that ever since 1935, if his memory goes back that far, and I am sure it does—

Mr. Knowles: It goes back to 1919, too.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —we were the first in the House of Commons who came out clearly and stated that the people should be guaranteed an annual purchasing power, so that they could buy the goods industry was producing. And we have had plenty of criticism for the stand we took. Let anyone stand up in the House of Commons and say this is not so. We have been criticized by other parties in the house because of that very thing. Despite this we see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre standing in his place and saying, "Are you in favour of it, or are you not?" Since when did he come alive?

We have always maintained that the way to solve the unemployment problem is to put purchasing power into the hands of the people, so that they can buy the goods industry is producing. Once that is done, immediately industry will begin to produce more goods and create jobs, without any force being used. The demand will be there, and the jobs will be forthcoming.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said, in effect: "Well, this unemployment problem is not so great that it could not be solved by a little war." Of course the hon. member was not suggesting that we should have a war; but the cold, hard fact is that in this country, under a Liberal or a Conservative government, we have never been able to solve our problem of unemployment until war came along and did it for us. There is no use hanging our heads and saying, "Well, that is not the way to talk. You are talking war, and that is a lot of silly nonsense". But when we look at the cold, hard fact we see that that is the only way our unemployment has ever been solved.

When I say to the minister that probably his department is wrongly named, there may be some merit in my suggestion. If the Minister of Labour had the job of creating conditions to defeat unemployment I believe he would show results, because he has shown great interest in the problem. I do not know of any minister who has held his portfolio who has shown greater sympathy and interest. I know the late Mr. Mitchell was highly respected in the house, but I do not think his enthusiasm or desire went beyond that of the minister now in office.

But he has an impossible task, because the government has failed to recognize this economic principle reflected in a lack of purchasing power. Then when unemployment comes along as a result of the government's policy the condition is thrown on the doorstep of the Minister of Labour, and he is told, "Get these guys jobs". It just cannot be done by any unemployment program.

I do not have to be a prophet when I say it cannot be done that way. There can be no doubt that unemployment insurance is a good thing, and I believe the minister is trying to do all he can to patch up an old and outmoded method of financing. I wish him the best of luck, but I think his efforts are not going to achieve the results he would like to see.

There are some things in the bill about which I am not too fussy. I am glad the act is going to have a general revision. Since its inception in 1941 this will be the first. To deal in greater detail, I do not care particularly for section 52 which carries the marginal notation, "Only one period between December 1st and April 15th". I believe if we are going to have unemployment insurance it should be made applicable to an individual whenever he is unemployed. If an insured happens to receive his benefits within that stated period of time, no matter how short the time may be, he is limited to that one period. If individuals are to pay their contributions into an insurance fund, then it should be truly an insurance fund, and whenever an occasion arises the individual should receive assistance.

As I indicated at the outset of my remarks, I do not think this is the proper time to discuss details of the bill. If I began discussing the clauses I would no doubt be called to order, and quite properly so. Speaking generally, I believe the minister is endeavouring to make an improvement in this instance. At the committee stage we shall take advantage of the opportunities presented to us to discuss the measure clause by clause. Therefore, with that in mind, I shall leave any further remarks I might have to the committee stage.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I assure the house my remarks will be brief, and I say to the minister that my expressions of disappointment will not be as numerous as those indicated by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). My observations will be limited to one clause in the bill.

In spite of views expressed this afternoon, I am convinced that the labour force in Canada will receive with great satisfaction this measure to amend and to consolidate the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) must be congratulated on introducing this measure which will strengthen further the purposes of the act and make it more effective as an insurance policy protecting our working class. I am particularly interested in the application of this act to fishermen and on this point I wish to quote remarks made by the Minister of Labour when he spoke on the introduction of the resolution. I quote from page 2714 of Hansard of April 5:

> I have not given up hope that we may find a solution. I know it will not be a perfect solution but I hope we can find a good solution somewhere, whether it comes within the field of unemployment insurance, under some special measure administered by the Department of Fisheries, or a combination of both.

I am rather disappointed, however, that no decision has been reached to date during the present session with regard to extending unemployment insurance to fishermen. I am prepared to admit that such a proposal poses some very difficult problems from an unemployment insurance standpoint, but situations offering similar or just as serious objections have been given consideration and dealt with to the satisfaction of the labour class concerned.

In April of 1951 the unemployment commission issued a report of a survey of the fishing industry and concluded its summarized recommendations with the following, as found on page 82, paragraph 279, of the report of the survey of the fishing industry in Canada by coverage division of the insurance branch. I wish to quote this paragraph from the report:

If it is necessary to augment the income derived by fishermen from fishing, subsistence farming and other employment, some form of unemployment assistance should be provided by the proper authorities rather than attempting to strain the framework of unemployment insurance to take care of a situation that is not properly an insurance function.

It is therefore recommended that the exception of employment in fishing be continued.

I have given a complete and serious study to this report, Mr. Speaker, and particularly to the section dealing with the gulf of St. Lawrence area. For this study this area covered the fishing industry of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, the Magdalen islands and the Gaspe peninsula. According to the said report, in the area covered, 19,800 fishermen are engaged in inshore fishing and 560 in deep-sea fishing. Of these 20,000 fishermen over half, or 11,000, are from New Brunswick. In dealing with inshore fishing the report states that approximately 83 per cent of the fishermen are working on shares, which is about correct. However, on page 25 of the report dealing with deep-sea fishing I find the following statement:

The home of deep-sea fishing in this area is in Gloucester county in New Brunswick. The deep-sea fishing force is about 560 fishermen. The survey covered 17 vessels or 17 per cent of the total vessels in this group. These vessels fish on the New Brunswick banks, or on the north shore banks. They are owned in the proportion of about 55 per cent by fishing firms or fish buyers and 45 per cent by one member of the crew, generally the master. The equipment is owned by the owner of the vessel.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, to have to admit that I cannot agree with this statement, which is not entirely according to facts. No fishing firm in Gloucester county, handling deep-sea fish, has any ownership or share in the existing fishing fleet. This deep-sea fleet, now consisting of over 60 draggers and a number of smaller vessels, is owned exclusively by individuals or by groups of fishermen who are the sole owners of their vessels.

It appears that of the total fishing force of 88,000 men in Canada, only 6,000 are wage earners; over 18,000 are loan workers and 63,000 are working on shares as working owners or as members of the crew. I realize that it may not be possible or logical to insure the owners of fishing vessels, but it seems to me that a solution could be arrived at by which wage earners and fishermen fishing on shares would be granted the privilege of unemployment insurance benefits. The share received by these fishermen, be it on a daily or on a weekly basis, is considered as the total amount of their salary or wages based on the total quantity and value of the fish landed. There is, in fact, very little difference and much similarity between the earnings of a person working in a factory being paid on piece work and the earnings of a fisherman deriving his salary from the proceeds of the fish catch landed.

I cannot agree with, and I must take exception to, the decision or recommendation of the unemployment commission report following its 1951 survey which I quoted earlier in my remarks. I cannot agree with the conclusion that some form of unemployment assistance should be provided by the proper authorities rather than attempting to strain the framework of unemployment insurance to take care of a situation that is not properly an insurance function. Whether it be the inshore fishermen spending two or three months of the year at lobster or herring fishing, whether it be the deep-sea fishermen engaged in New Brunswick at least from May to November and fishing on a share basis, these men are part of our labour force and are entitled to the benefits of this great insurance scheme instituted for the protection and welfare of our Canadian working class. Their employment is no more seasonal than that of the carpenter who has to lay off work during the winter season on account of the drastic cut in construction work, or the longshoreman who has to wait for the opening of the shipping season in the spring before resuming his work.

I realize that problems will arise with respect to the collection of contributions and the control and the administration of the act if it applies to fishermen. Some arbitrary rules may have to be enacted to determine when a fisherman becomes unemployed, but, Mr. Speaker, in most cases a fisherman is not working for himself and a certain contract of service does exist between him and the vessel owners.

Paragraph 278 of the report of the survey previously mentioned states:

> It is hard to see how, under these circumstances, the extension of unemployment insurance to the fishing industry would be any advantage to most of the persons engaged in it, whether they were wage earners or share fishermen.

Here again, Mr. Speaker, I must take exception to and I cannot agree with the conclusion arrived at by the commission. We have in this country a certain group or proportion of our labour class which is known as or could be called a diversified labour group. The majority of our fishermen could easily be classified as part of this group. Let us take as an example the helper of a herring and lobster fisherman along the Northumberland strait area. From four to five weeks in the spring he is engaged in herring fishing and for two months, August and September, he is back again to help a boat owner with his lobster operations. In October he is out to the lumber camps to help in the annual cut of pulpwood, pit props or long lumber. Early in January this man is back home again after the closing of the camps which have completed their quota for the year. During this short period of employment this man has not paid enough unemployment insurance daily contributions to claim benefits for his period of unemployment from January to April. If this same man had been allowed to contribute under this act during this period of fishing in the spring and late summer, he could now qualify for benefits, and his family would not suffer the hardships and privations faced by a large number of similar cases along our entire fishing districts. Similar situations exist all along the shore of my constituency of Gloucester and in many other sections of the maritimes. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the present act still offers the possibility for the unemployment insurance commission to reconsider its decision and include a certain number of our fishermen under insurance benefits.

The immense fishing resources of Canada have contributed substantially to the general economy of our country and its considerable expansion is still of paramount importance to the coastal provinces where commercial fishing is pursued on a large scale. Canada after all leads the world in the export of its fishing products. Are we going to allow this industry to be curtailed in its expansion by penalizing the primary producers, those hard-working fishermen to whom a 44 to 48 hour week is a thing unknown? Are we going to endanger this expanding industry by refusing to these fishermen the security offered in other working fields?

In conclusion I urge that during this present session the Minister of Labour insist upon the unemployment insurance commission reconsidering its decision and giving further consideration to the adoption of a system which would qualify at least a certain class or type of fishermen under the unemployment insurance benefits.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time since its introduction in 1941 that there has been a general revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act. In so far as this bill proposes to rearrange the sections and parts of the act to bring together all provisions which deal with the same subjects and to clarify the act, it is good, commendable and sound and I am sure will have the support of every hon. member of the house.

My criticism of this bill is that it represents one further bit of evidence that the government has receded from the position it took in 1945 regarding the whole question of unemployment and unemployment insurance. At that time, ten years ago, when the government was considering the whole question of unemployment insurance, it was tied in with provisions for employment. At that time the government assumed responsibility or indicated that it would assume responsibility for maintaining full employment. Where there was unemployment not covered by unemployment insurance the government was to make provision through an unemployment assistance act.

The government has receded from the position of providing a shelf of public works with which to take up the slack which develops from time to time under the private enterprise system, and apparently has now reached the conclusion that such an undertaking is not a function of the government but is one that must be left to industry and commerce.

The government appears to have receded from its position regarding unemployment assistance as distinguished from unemployment insurance. The unemployment assistance fund was to take care of those who did not qualify for unemployment insurance. Ten years have passed by and no effort has been made by the federal government to reach any kind of agreement with the provinces for the setting up of such unemployment assistance fund. The government has persisted in its position that this is the responsibility of the provinces, that the first approach should be made by the provinces, and that only when the provinces came to Ottawa for help would they come to their assistance in this matter.

This bill indicates a further retreat on the part of the government from its 1945 position in the matter of unemployment insurance. Unemployment insurance is now the only measure upon which the government has come to rely for the alleviation of want created by unemployment, and it is receding even on that front. According to the green book of 1945 one of the objectives of the unemployment insurance fund, or one of the objectives of those who in that day were responsible for it, an objective which was repeated again and again in that 1945 green book, was that as rapidly as possible the Unemployment Insurance Act would be widened to embrace all employed persons. One of the measures which the government was to adopt in order to provide for unemployed employable persons was, and I quote:

> The extension as rapidly as possible of unemployment insurance to cover all employees.

And again:

> As already stated the objective would be to bring into insurance in a relatively short time the whole employed population; when this had been accomplished the only employees who might require assistance, in contrast to insurance, would be those who had exhausted their insurance benefits or failed to qualify.

This is interesting in the light of what we are getting today.

> By that time experience with the extended insurance scheme would enable a decision to be made whether to extend the duration of benefits and shorten the period of qualifications for insurance.

What do we get in this bill? First of all there is no attempt in this bill to broaden the field covered by unemployment insurance, there is no attempt to bring under unemployment insurance all employed persons. In 1945 the scope of the unemployment insurance scheme did not extend to those previously employed persons whose employment was not insured, that is farm employees, domestic servants, certain government employees and office employees, insured persons who did not qualify for or had exhausted their benefits, young persons who had not been able to start employment and previously self-employed farmers, tradesmen, trappers, etc. In 1945 all those were to be brought within the protection of the Unemployment Insurance Act within the shortest possible time. None of these classes is being brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act by this bill.

Instead of extending the duration of benefits and shortening the period of qualification, the bill in fact shortens the duration of benefits and does nothing to shorten the period of qualification for insurance. So that by and large the groups who were left without unemployment insurance in 1945 will still be left uncovered by unemployment insurance.

It will still be just as difficult in 1955 as it was in 1945 for the young person graduating from high school or college to build up any protection under unemployment insurance. My criticism of the bill is that in it no effort whatever is made to meet the need of that increasing group.

I think the insurance statistics will show that the labour force under the age of 24 is about twice as great, proportionately, as is the labour force over the age of 24, largely because of the number of young people who are coming into the employment field each year. Under the new act, as under the old one, these people will still find it extremely difficult to build up any protection. So long as the government is going to rely on the Unemployment Insurance Act only to alleviate the distress caused by unemployment, I suggest that some steps should be taken to bring in other groups who now become unemployed and have no protection, especially the group of younger people who are coming into employment for the first time.

We are inclined to think of unemployment in terms of the over-all number of people unemployed, be it 400,000 or 600,000. We think of unemployment in terms of statistics. Whether it is 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 6 per cent or whether it is only 1 per cent of our working population who are unemployed, we forget that this situation represents individual human suffering. I am going to put on the record a few case histories that have been brought to my attention by the Toronto branch of the Canadian Association of Social Workers. These are bona fide cases that exist today in the city of Toronto, at a time when we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars to build up our defences against communism. At the same time we are letting good Canadian citizens and good Canadian families actually suffer hunger in this country in this year 1955. I think every hon. member in this house will agree with me that nothing we can do will facilitate the growth and spread of communism in our own country so much as will the want, privation and discouragement which is brought on through unemployment.

Here are a few cases. Here is one of a father, a veteran. Because he was unemployed, the veterans affairs department could do nothing for him. He was a skilled mechanic, self-employed for many years, the father of seven children. For all the years that he was self-employed he was able to provide a satisfactory income for himself, his wife and seven children. First, there came a large expense for psychiatric treatment for one of the adolescent children, a heavy medical expense. Then followed a prolonged period of unemployment.

Then followed the family's ejection from a rented property. To find shelter for a family of seven children it was necessary to purchase a home. To purchase a home it was necessary to place a chattel mortgage on their furniture and to undertake to carry a first mortgage and a second mortgage on the property as well. Naturally it was not long before there was a foreclosure and another eviction. Today the father lives with one relative, the wife and baby live with another relative, and friends have taken in the other children in order that a home may be found for them.

Here is case No. 2, also provided by the Toronto branch of the same association. In the family are the father, mother and four children. The father was laid off work last fall; no unemployment insurance was available because of lack of sufficient days. The welfare department of the city of Toronto helped the family out for a week or two. The Salvation Army provided some relief. Neighbours did what they could. The family were eventually driven to such straits that the father applied to the children's aid society and asked the children's aid to place his children in homes because they were going hungry and he could not provide for them. The children's aid society assured him that, as a respectable citizen, it was his duty to provide for the children and that they could not, under the circumstances, place them in homes. Eventually the landlord, whose rent had been getting in arrears, served eviction notice. The day the notice was received, the father walked out and has not been heard from since.

As to case No. 3, this man had been unemployed for six months. At first he was optimistic; he would get a job even though others could not. When this effort failed, he decided he would go into business for himself, selling silverware from door to door. By Christmastime he had to give it up; it was no go. The family was desperate. He became irritable and quarrelsome, his face thin and white. Finally his wife got work. He stayed home to cook. He took the children to the nursery as their mother used to do. As the weeks went by he became more ill-tempered. He began to slap his children for little provocation. He has developed a bad cough and looks sicker and sicker as the days roll by. When this man was gainfully employed, the social worker says, he was a happy, useful citizen. Today he is despondent, sick and dependent on his wife.

I have 15 or 20 such case histories. I do not need to read any more, other than to raise the questions which these social workers raise. They are questions that I think we, as legislators, should seek to answer. These are the questions raised by these social workers. What does a father of a family do, who is unemployed, not eligible for unemployment insurance, who day after day has gone out to look for work and day after day has had to come back at night without a nickel with which to buy food? How does he act with the most responsibility for his wife and children; by continuing to come home and thus ensure their continued hunger and possible eviction, or by desertion after which they will be taken care of by our municipal welfare departments? What health problems are we creating for the future? What does serious malnutrition over weeks and sometimes months do to adults and children? What about families whose only food for a week has been the stale loaves given to them by a sympathetic bread salesman who cannot bear to see them starve, and the mother giving a young baby sugar and water three days at a time, right in the city of Toronto? What is the use of all our research into the importance of nutrition, particularly during pregnancy, to mothers who cannot even be assured of a minimum diet?

Those are a few of the questions being raised by these social workers. Here is a government that has receded from the position of responsibility for providing employment when private industry fails, that has receded from the position of providing unemployment assistance apart from unemployment insurance, and that, finally, apparently makes no effort to bring under unemployment insurance those large groups who still remain outside, particularly the tens of thousands of young people who are seeking employment for the first time.

I suggest that the government should reconsider its whole stand and revert to the position it took in 1945. Those proposals were sound. Those proposals had the backing of every party in the house. Those proposals had the backing of the government's own research workers and economists. Those proposals are as sound today as they were in 1945. The fact that the government has not been able, in the course of ten years, to reach the agreements it desired with the provinces is no good reason why the government should shirk its responsibility regarding employment and the needs of those who are unemployed.

There is one thing the government can do to relieve a great deal of the distress existing at the present time and which will exist throughout the coming summer. It can extend the supplementary unemployment insurance benefits to the end of May at least, and make them retroactive to the date on which they were cancelled. That in itself will relieve some of those people who are now unemployed, cannot get employment and have no unemployment insurance benefits. I suggest that extension of the unemployment insurance benefits is the very least that a government having any concern for the problem of unemployment or the needs of the people who are unemployed should do at this time.

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise one point I have raised before but which, it seems to me, is worth repeating. I think one of the greatest weaknesses in the unemployment insurance set-up as it exists in Canada today lies in the fact that pregnant women are excluded from its benefits. I know that the most vexatious cases with which I have to deal are those arising out of the clause excluding pregnant women.

It seems to me that when the act was framed in the beginning there was some justification for this provision, but now that we have had 12 to 15 years' experience of the legislation in operation we have learned enough to establish that to include pregnant women in the benefits of unemployment insurance would not cause any undue drain on the finances of the country and would remove what I think is a great human grievance.

I do not want to get into the argument arising out of the statement made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill), but I want to place it clearly on the record that I believe the most desirable way to increase the population of Canada is to increase it in the way the Almighty himself intended it to be increased when he said, "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth."

Therefore when we come to the Unemployment Insurance Act I do not think it is a very good principle to be too technical about ruling out a woman who happens to be pregnant. Over the past few months I have had several women writing to me saying that after paying into the unemployment insurance fund for many years they became pregnant and were much astonished to find that they were excluded from the benefits. There is another point I want to raise, because I am not a member of the industrial relations committee. I certainly hope that the matter I have mentioned will be brought before that committee. I hope the whole question will be examined and evidence given by those able to do so as to what it would cost the country to make this necessary change.

If a thorough investigation of the operation of the Unemployment Insurance Act were really made—I am not talking now about the committee—I think we would find there are a great many abuses in the way benefits are drawn by certain people, and even certain abuses involved in the way that industry looks upon unemployment insurance. I am not at all sure that some industries do not look upon unemployment insurance as simply a means whereby they can keep on hand a certain number of reserve workers, to be laid off when they feel like laying them off. They know they will not disperse too quickly because of the unemployment insurance benefits; therefore they can bring them back when they feel like it.

I for one would not want to be too specific about abuses, but I am informed by people who should know that in a great many cases women who become pregnant manage to make themselves made eligible for unemployment insurance benefits by knowing what to do at the right time and by having the whole situation fixed up in the right way. In other words the woman who is absolutely honest, who has her baby in the right way, who walks up to the unemployment insurance office and says, "I am pregnant", is the one who is told that she is not entitled to any benefits, so she really gets it both coming and going. She has to undergo the expense of having the child; yet in spite of the fact that she needs money she is not entitled to any benefits whatsoever.

I for one believe this great country is rich enough and has had enough experience with unemployment insurance to remove what I consider to be an unnecessary, vexatious and most unjust discrimination against women who should be the deepest and most cherished concern of all the people of Canada, the working women of Canada who are adding to our population in the way the Almighty intended them to do.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I should like to refer to the remarks of the last speaker. I suggest that probably he and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration should get together and bring their influence to bear upon the government, because there seems to be some question as to how the increase in the population of the land should be brought about. Possibly their combined influence would be of some help in solving this very vexatious problem.

In so far as criticism is concerned, I think perhaps I can go along with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when they say that the Minister of Labour is doing a remarkable job and should not have this government's errors of omission and commission chalked up against him. They said he was not to blame, that his department is concerned with unemployment and finding work for the unemployed, that is providing some form of subsistence within the framework of the Unemployment Insurance Act for those who are out of work.

Well, if he is not to blame, we must look elsewhere. This government have taken credit for everything that has happened in this country for the last 25 years; therefore we have to place on their doorstep the blame for the unemployment condition that exists in the country today. Whether or not we can tie the responsibility down to any particular minister is questionable, but I suppose in the aggregate they have to take responsibility for what the government does.

I should like to follow up the criticism offered by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) concerning the unemployment insurance bill that has been submitted to this house. It is contended this bill improves the act, but there is one weakness in that argument or at least it is not on very solid ground. The minister has said that there is going to be a change in the amount of benefit the unemployed can receive. For instance, in explanation of the move he said that those receiving benefits for from one to 19 weeks made up 90·1 per cent of the total. Those receiving benefits from 20 to 29 weeks comprise 6·4 per cent, and those receiving benefits for over 30 weeks comprise 3·5 per cent. The reason he gave for reducing the benefit period from 51 weeks to 30 weeks was that the average claim was for 9 weeks.

However, the supplementary benefits are to continue when the unemployed have exhausted the regular benefits they have built up. In other words, the total period during which benefits can be received will now be 45 weeks. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) mentioned certain abuses in connection with the operation of the fund. I believe this is an outstanding example of a place where abuses do not exist, according to the minister's own submission. It is quite apparent to everyone in the house that there has not been any abuse, and that the inherent honesty of these people is so great that they have not attempted to exhaust their benefits. They went back to work as soon as possible. This speaks very well for the people covered by the fund, and I feel that people who show such outstanding honesty should not be subjected to any abridgment of their rights. The benefit provision should remain as it is because, as we all know, during the last two or three winters the period of unemployment has been gradually extended and the numbers of unemployed have been increasing. There is not much argument, therefore, for reducing the number of weeks for which benefits can be received.

If the government do pass this provision, they are working an injustice on the people by reducing the period of benefit from 51 to 30 weeks. The supplementary benefit period is 15 weeks, and when it is all added up it makes 45 weeks. Under the old scheme the unemployed received benefits for 51 weeks plus 15 weeks, but now that is to be reduced. Before reducing this period the government increased the amount that could be received both during the 51-week period and also during the supplementary benefit period.

This is a kind of double shuffle game. It is the old shell game; first you see it and then you don't. If the benefit period were left as it was and the payments increased, that would be worth while. The minister should be highly commended for the increase in the payment, but I think the government should be severely criticized for this double shuffle hocus-pocus that has been delivered to the unemployed.

Then there is the provision concerning those who retire at 65. These people have been paying into the fund but have never received benefits and were never expected to receive any benefits. They are compelled, under force of circumstances, to retire. It is quite true that they are given a three-year reprieve; nevertheless they are deprived of something to which they are justly entitled. I think the minister would be well advised to reconsider that provision and bring it more into conformity with the principles of justice.

There is one other point that was mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West concerning clause 3, paragraph 4. It reads as follows:

> A commissioner may be removed by the governor in council at any time for cause, and a commissioner ceases to hold office upon attaining the age of 65 years.

I should like to put added emphasis upon that clause, for the simple reason that I have received suggestions on many occasions from labour department brochures that some means should be found of amplifying the opportunities for employment of those people who are unfortunate enough to have reached 65 and are going to lose their position. The suggestion has been that something should be done to broaden the field of employment for these people. Here we find the government setting an example for everyone else to follow. I believe the members of this house have had the fact brought home to them rather forcibly upon learning that some of the stenographers who have served long and well are going to be retired at 65, whether or not they are giving good service. I think probably the government should search their souls on this question. I do not want to dwell on this point, but if the government are going to emphasize it in the general labour fields they should support it.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South said the civil servants were supposed to have a guaranteed annual wage or a guaranteed job, yet we find they have not. Some of them have been let out. Some of those who have been let out were probably within two or three months of ten years' service, but they were put on the skids. They are being gradually let out, so the civil service does the very same thing of which business is accused, in that it lays off its employees. We see that most of these glaring examples have taken place in civil service groups, whether they are employed by provincial or federal governments. If it appears that the time is near when they will be classified as permanent employees, then on some pretext or other an excuse is found for letting them out before they qualify as permanent employees. And I have no doubt this government has resorted to that sort of practice. I suggest further consideration should have been given before this measure was brought in, with a view to giving work to older people.

Before passing on to another point, I would direct my remarks to the statement by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) that he would like anyone to point out any time in this country's history when an unemployment situation had been solved. He proceeded to say that his question could not be answered. Let me tell him that it can be answered.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not say that at all.

Mr. Small: What did you say, then?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I said if anyone could tell me when, under the orthodox system, either a Liberal or a Conservative government had solved unemployment except in a time of war, I would like to know when it was.

Mr. Small: Then I shall tell you.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am listening.

Mr. Small: After confederation it was the Macdonald regime that introduced the national policy which solved the unemployment question.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What did the Conservatives do in the thirties?

Mr. Small: You said it could not be answered. I will say it was also answered in the twenties, whether by a Conservative or a Liberal government. They solved the problem of unemployment in those days. And if Mr. Bennett had been given a chance to become established; if he had not been blackguarded and held up to ridicule and contumely from coast to coast by those who then formed the official opposition, he would have solved the unemployment problem, too. If he had been permitted to continue he would have done it. But he was accused of erecting armouries throughout the land to consolidate himself into a dictator. That is the kind of bunk that was handed out in those days.

When the hon. member says the unemployment problem was not solved in the past without recourse to war, then I say to him that I have given him the answer.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Does not the hon. member recall that it was his own party that kicked Mr. Bennett out? Does he not recognize a good leader when he has one?

Mr. Small: I was answering the hon. member's question. I think that will silence him, for a change.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That kind of argument will not silence anyone.

Mr. Small: I do not intend to go into the question of unemployment, which has been discussed by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy). However, I can go along with the case histories he mentioned, because I attended the meeting to which he referred, in which members from the Toronto district were invited to participate with Toronto social and welfare workers to help solve unemployment.

This is a contributory insurance scheme. What is going to happen when the reduction is made from 51 weeks to 30 weeks, with an additional 15 weeks of supplementary pay or whatever the governor in council wishes to add under the new regulation? I say this provision is going to drive more people into the position where they will have to seek help from welfare agencies.

When the act was inaugurated we understood one of its purposes was to remove the necessity of appealing to the welfare agencies. Instead of removing that necessity, this measure aggravates the condition over a period of years. I suggest the period should be restored to 51 weeks, where it rightfully belongs. Instead of improving the situation we see today, I say it will be made worse under these amendments.

I sympathize with the larger cities, where the unemployment situation predominates, in their efforts to meet the problem. I do not intend to discuss the subjects set out in the green book of 1945, any more than to say that the government has gotten out from under its undertakings and promises of that time. If the government had carried out what it suggested in 1945 I doubt whether we would have this unemployment situation today, affecting those who are classified as the employable unemployed.

My chief criticism today is that an injustice is being done those people who have been paying into the fund for a long time. An injustice is being done those people who have been honest in their applications for assistance under the act. Not only that, but an injustice is being done in that these people, when their benefits expire, are being forced onto the relief rolls in the cities.

The federal government has made promises and recently abandoned them, and now the municipal and provincial governments find they have to assume this burden, one very much like that of the hungry thirties.

Some hon. members have referred to the guaranteed annual wage. I would go along with the hon. member who levelled criticism against the automobile industry. In my view the worst offenders who have been responsible for this condition of unemployment, or who have aggravated it in the past, have been those connected with the automobile industry. While they paid high wages and gave employment for certain limited periods of the year, their employees were laid off and thrown on the relief rolls for the balance of the year in the hungry thirties. We find in the past actions of the automobile industry a glaring example of what automation will mean for the future.

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Since the Unemployment Insurance Act became effective in 1941 many modifications have been brought about. One of these, made in 1950, applied to the logging and lumbering industry. Today I shall direct my remarks to that industry, as it exists in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

I hope my words will not be construed as a criticism of the department, because I take this opportunity to thank the minister and the government for the great care they took at the time of the amendment in 1950, following representations not only from my district but from other parts of Canada. I would hope that what I say today would receive consideration when the bill is referred to the committee on industrial relations.

Under article 26 of the regulations the lumbering and logging industry of the province of Quebec is considered a seasonal industry. That is, it is an industry purporting to run from September 30 to April 1. This may have been true five or six years ago, at which time lumbering and logging in Quebec took place for the most part in the winter months. In the last two or three years conditions have changed to a very great extent. The result is that today lumbering and logging operations in the province of Quebec extend into the month of June. I know that right today in the constituency of Charlevoix lumbering is taking place on a scale just as great as in the months of December and January. This change has been brought about through the use of mechanical devices in the lumbering industry. A person who is now employed in lumbering sees his benefit curtailed as soon as the seasonal period ends, owing to this seasonal restriction; or if it is not curtailed he is required to possess more qualifications than the ordinary employee.

One has to understand how the lumbering business is carried on to appreciate the discrimination which exists against that group of employees under the law. In the province of Quebec a person goes into the woods lumbering early in September and carries on all winter long. In a few instances he leaves the job around the end of April, to come back again around May 15 to get the wood out. That is known as the hauling business in the industry. When that is finished around June 15 many of these employees, who are sons of farmers, find that they are out of jobs and they often go back to the farms to carry on during the summer months the same type of work they had been doing during the winter, with the exception that the farms usually belong to their fathers, or the farms are family units.

Under the law, people who work on farms cannot qualify for unemployment insurance. Therefore these people again suffer discrimination when they become unemployed the following year, because the period during which they were employed on the farm cannot be counted as a period that would entitle them to stamps. When the bill goes before the committee I hope consideration will be given to either extending the seasonal period for lumbering in Quebec or to treating lumbering and logging in the same way they are treated in British Columbia, in the light of the change that has taken place in that particular industry in the last two or three years.

The law as it now stands discourages people in the logging industry from accepting employment with farmers who are also cutting wood for the pulp and paper industry. The farmer himself is experiencing some trouble because he finds it very hard to get people to work on his farm cutting wood. One can understand why people do not like to work for farmers. It is because they cannot take advantage of the Unemployment Insurance Act as it now exists. From the employer's point of view it is rather embarrassing, because he finds it very hard to get employees. The employee is reluctant to accept a job on a farm, and he would rather try, even if he loses time, to get a job in a place where he can get some unemployment insurance benefits after the work is done.

I also believe that from an administrative point of view it is a most complicated matter. I have examples, which have been submitted to me, of persons who have been employed in the lumbering industry from the month of October to the month of May. Then they went on a farm to carry on the same type of work. During the summer one of those persons applied for benefits from the unemployment insurance fund. Before he could get anywhere he received four letters, three in the same day, explaining why he could not qualify. The other letter explained why he did not have enough stamps. It was a request for a prolongation of time. I presume that meant that to establish his period of benefit he would have to go back two years and try to find some more stamps. The third letter explained that unless this time was obtained by him he could not benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act, because he had worked on a farm.

This qualification which is imposed on a person working either in the lumbering industry or on a farm is, I should say, very hard to understand, because in the province of Quebec, and especially in my riding, it very often happens that the man who goes on a farm cannot qualify although the farmer sometimes has only chickens and perhaps a couple of cows to look after. I do not think that should be called a farm, because this man has a small farm and derives most of his revenue from outside his farm.

It might be appropriate if in some parts of this country the word "farmer" were defined. If it is very hard to define the word "farmer", then part of this country should be divided into zones and the people in those zones should be called farmers or employees working in the lumbering and logging industries. That would avoid a lot of trouble in the administration of this act.

I do not make these comments to criticize the government. In the light of the changes which have been made in the lumbering industry everywhere in Canada, where mechanical devices have been introduced, such as huge tractors to clear away the snow and equipment to improve the roads so operations can be carried on from October 1 to May 31 or sometimes into June, I would urge the unemployment insurance commission to revise its regulations and make the employment unseasonal. If it has to be seasonal it should be from early September to the end of June.

If that were done, many employees whose main living is made in the bush will be able, when they are unemployed, to take full advantage of the law. They will not be placed in the position that some other qualification will be required of them to obtain benefits under the law. I make this plea because of the many representations I have received from farmers and people employed in the logging industry in my riding.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it must be obvious to the Minister of Labour from the speeches that are being made today that there are quite a few improvements that still have to be made in the Unemployment Insurance Act. Surely it is significant that suggestions as to shortcomings in the act are being made not only by members in opposition groups but also by those members of the Liberal party who thus far have participated in the debate today.

It seems to us, now we have had a chance to study the actual bill since the debate on April 4, at which time we had the resolution and first reading of the bill, that the main improvements in the bill are in the nature of administrative changes. Most of these changes are to the good. As has been pointed out, there are some which although administratively are an improvement are not too beneficial to the workers. However, our complaint is that although there have been many administrative changes there has not been enough change in the act in terms of policy and in terms of real substance.

As I pointed out when I spoke during the resolution stage on April 4, we feel that the action the government took in 1940, in asking parliament to concur in a resolution seeking an amendment to the British North America Act to write unemployment insurance into section 91 of that act, had the effect of obligating the government, morally if not legally, to federal concern over unemployment and federal responsibility for all unemployed. Government spokesmen may make different comments on the subject now, but we feel that the acceptance of that moral obligation arising from what was done in 1940 was confirmed by the green book proposals of 1945, when the federal government talked in terms of full federal responsibility for the employable unemployed.

Even we in the opposition could not complain too strenuously when the first Unemployment Insurance Act failed to go all the way in that direction, but surely when the time has come for an overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act the government should be making further progress in the direction of the moral obligation that was undertaken in 1940. In our view the government should now meet the commitment that we feel was made in this field by the government in 1945. However, we look in vain in this legislation for any broadening of the acceptance by the government of federal responsibility for all unemployed Canadians.

On the other hand, at the second reading stage on April 26, which was the same day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made his speech to the federal-provincial conference in the railway committee room, we had the statement of the Minister of Labour that in certain circumstances he regarded what was proposed by the Prime Minister as more appropriate than unemployment insurance. I must be fair to him and say that he was speaking particularly of people along in years who at present are able to qualify under certain circumstances for 51 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits but who under the terms of this new bill will qualify for only 30 weeks of benefits unless they are able to qualify for supplementary benefits for a few weeks.

It does seem to us a shameful admission on the part of the government for the Minister of Labour to say that what was proposed by the Prime Minister, namely a form of relief—that is what it is, even though it is to be shared among three levels of government—was more appropriate in some cases than unemployment insurance benefits, which as we know have been built up in this country as something the workers have as a matter of right.

We feel that this is a retreat in principle; we feel that this is a retreat from the green book proposals of 1945; we feel that it is a retreat from the moral obligation which the federal government accepted when in 1940 it asked that insurance against unemployment be written into our constitution, into section 91 of the British North America Act.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Therefore, although the government and the unemployment insurance commission may have some feeling of satisfaction that when this bill is through the act will be in better form administratively than it was before, it is a disappointment to us that it does not move further in the direction of full federal responsibility for all employable unemployed.

When some others have talked in this vein the Minister of Labour has tried to suggest that this was an attack upon the actuarial soundness of the fund. The minister knows that some of the responsible labour bodies in this country have urged that those outside of unemployment insurance as we now have it should be covered by the federal government, but that the administration of whatever payments need to be made to these people should be under the unemployment insurance commission, with any additional grants of money that may be necessary to be made from the consolidated revenue fund. We feel that an approach of that kind would be much better than the one now being considered because it has been proposed by the Prime Minister. We feel that it would be more in line with the sound principles which the federal government laid before this country in the green books of 1945.

Because I spoke at some length on April 4, and because I expect to be a member of the committee to which this bill will be referred, I am not going to speak at length now. Neither am I going to raise all the issues which I feel we must raise when the bill is before that committee. However, there are one or two items which it seems to me are of sufficient importance that attention should be called to them now.

As I indicated in the reference I made a moment ago, I join with others in protesting against the reduction of the maximum period from 51 to 30 weeks. Here we have a case of the government giving with one hand but taking away with the other. I recognize that for three years after this bill comes into effect there will be no loss in actual dollars compared with what one would have had under the old act, but once that three-year period is over we will be down to the 30-week maximum rather than the 51-week. This will come at a time when the employment situation in Canada is still a question mark. We will be faced with all the various factors, including the tremendous factor of automation. We feel that this is no time to be reducing the maximum period for unemployment insurance benefits.

We feel that there is a deficiency in the new legislation in that although there are slight increases in the rates of benefit, the gap between the rates of benefit to be drawn by insured workers and their wages before going on unemployment insurance is forever widening. The increase in benefits does not keep up with the increased cost of living, which is reflected in part in increased wages.

Workers who go on unemployment insurance today, or after this act goes through, even though they may get more dollars than was the case in 1940 or in 1945 will find the gap between what they are getting on unemployment insurance and what they were getting before they became unemployed much wider than it was. We feel that consideration should be given to the need of a higher rate of benefit.

I should also like to draw attention just in passing to a change which concerns me and which I have found in the section having to do with what we call the fair employment practices aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Act. As I read the section in the old act, which was put in only a few years ago, there was a small loophole in it. I admit that loophole was there, but it was a loophole of only two or three words. In the new act that loophole has been enlarged to two or three lines or even more. It seems to me that was a fairly important amendment, and I am sorry to see the loophole being made larger.

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, as an example of a type of change that is being made, may I say that I find the position of those employed by municipal public utilities is being altered. Under the old act the wording was such that employees of municipal public utilities were, by statute, made workers in insurable employment. Under the new act that is a matter of regulation; at least the commission can, by regulation, rule such employees to be excepted from the category known as insurable employment.

I mention that point, Mr. Speaker, because I am concerned about it in its own right, and also because I think it illustrates my point that in this legislation many changes have been made which seem to have as their aim the desire to make it a little easier to administer the legislation. I sympathize with the unemployment insurance commission in the tremendous job it has and the good job it does in administering this act, and I understand it wanting to have things so that they can be worked smoothly. We understand its desire to have leeway here and there so it can adjust things to fit various situations. But we do not like to see groups of people who were specifically covered put in an uncertain category, as is the case with those working for municipal public utilities.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to keep to my promise that I would save most of the points I want to raise on this bill until we get into committee. I am glad the minister has agreed that this bill is to go to the committee on industrial relations, where I know there will be representations from interested bodies and organizations. After we have been able to go over it in that committee I hope we shall be able to bring it back to the house a better piece of legislation than it is at the present time.

But even after we get such improvements as we can win in the Unemployment Insurance Act, I remind the government that this is not the whole answer to the tremendous problem of unemployment facing Canada at the present time.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I discussed these amendments at the resolution stage of the bill, and I shall now take only two or three minutes of the time of the house. At that time I think the minister said that 95 per cent of the unemployed drew benefits for 30 weeks or less.

Mr. Gregg: Twenty weeks or less.

Mr. McMillan: This means that 5 per cent of the unemployed will be worse off than before. Their position would not be as favourable unless, of course, their unemployment exceeded this time by a very short period, in which event they would gain by the increased payments, or if the termination of their regular benefits came at a time when they could qualify for seasonal benefits.

This 95 per cent mentioned by the minister has reference to an over-all percentage for Canada. I know that for certain depressed areas, where there has been considerable unemployment, there would be considerably more than 5 per cent unemployed after the 30-week period during which it is now proposed to pay regular benefits under these amendments.

I would appeal to the minister to extend this period beyond 30 weeks, for the following reasons. I think most Canadian workmen prefer to pay into the unemployment insurance fund and draw benefits while they are unemployed. They want to retain their self-respect. They do not want to be obliged to depend on relief and charitable measures. If the unemployment insurance were paid for this full time, I think there would be less need for these relief measures. In these depressed areas I think it is fair to say that the people are less able than they otherwise would be to raise money for charitable purposes. Rents and taxes are in arrears. The people and the municipalities themselves are less able to raise money than when their economy is normal or buoyant.

We must not assume that a man who has not found work in the 30-week period does not want to find work. I know of a number of good, responsible men who have travelled across Ontario at least, getting rides with motorists, in an effort to find work. They have been unable to find work, and their benefits have expired. I was glad to see the seasonal benefits increased earlier this session. I am also glad to see the regular benefits increased under this act. However, I regret to see the time shortened with respect to payment of these regular benefits.

We live in a country of plenty, one with agricultural surpluses. I do not like to see anybody in this country go hungry because of our inability to deal with this particular phase of unemployment. I fully agree with the Prime Minister that we should not class those in need as employable and unemployable. The term "unemployable" is in many instances a relative one. Medical men are often puzzled to know how to classify these people. For example, a man might be unemployable as far as heavy, laborious work is concerned, but he might be better off physically and mentally if he had some lighter work to do.

In the debate at the resolution stage of this bill I emphasized the difficulties experienced by older workers in finding work, particularly the difficulty experienced by those 45 years of age or older in finding insurable employment under this act. Retirement at too early an age is causing a real social problem. In many cases it results in early physical and mental break-up. I have observed this result many times in my practice, and I am sure that is true in the case of other physicians. I would hope that our government will give consideration to this problem of the older worker, with a view to helping him prolong his years of contentment and usefulness.

I do not propose to deal with the other matters that I dealt with at the resolution stage of the bill. I then talked about wider coverage, but I think I shall leave that matter until the bill is in committee.

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, the government has shown realism and vision in bringing to this act such amendments as are likely to benefit the unemployed. Moreover, as evidenced by the proposals recently submitted to the provinces at the preliminary federal-provincial conference, the government clearly has no intention of shirking its responsibilities in connection with unemployment and is resolved to implement whatever measures are necessary to solve this problem.

There is nothing surprising in the fact that this new bill respecting unemployment insurance is more generous and liberal, while imposing on the worker as small an increase as possible in those contributions necessary to give effect to this splendid social legislation. The minister has tried to make this legislation more flexible by requiring that contributions be now collected on a weekly rather than on a daily basis. The increase in benefits from $24 to $30 for married people and from $17.10 to $23 for single people will make it easier for these unemployed to provide for the basic necessities of life.

An important point to consider is that the integration of seasonal benefits, granted early this session, together with the advantages that will come out of this redraft, aimed at alleviating current unemployment, are not a result of a temporary measure merely for the duration of the present slack period. On the contrary, it will remain permanently in our statutes and, for years to come, citizens affected by seasonal unemployment will benefit from it.

I wish to commend the government for its energetic efforts to ease the people's burden and for its evident desire constantly to improve the lot of the workers.

Like everybody else in this house, I am eager to see this bill adopted, although I think it my duty to call the attention of the government to certain aspects of that legislation which have to do with men employed in lumber camps. In the province of Quebec, employment in the lumber trade and industry has been insurable since April 1, 1950. I might recall that, early in the first session of last parliament, I insisted on having lumberjacks covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act, because I felt that those who are most affected by the ups and downs of the employment situation are in the greatest need of protection.

The commission then thought that most workers in that industry only worked part of the year. That is why it was declared seasonal and a subsequent ruling imposed additional reservations with regard to the receipt of unemployment insurance benefits during the off-season. In the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, this off-season extends from April 1 to September 30.

Conditions in which lumbering operations take place tend to change from year to year. Automation, for instance, has contributed to change the lumber industry into a year-round proposition.

Thus tractors and trucks are put to use as early as September and October and, very often, lumbering operations start just after the floating of the timber, usually between May 15 and July 15. The off-season for the lumberman therefore actually extends from July 15 to September 1st, while during the rest of the year he is actively engaged in cutting and other related operations. That is why I am requesting that seasonal regulations be lifted in the case of lumbermen. I am well aware that enforcement of these regulations is a source of misunderstanding, misapprehension and bother. By exempting the lumber industry from seasonal regulations, the commission would only generalize a situation which is already prevailing in the same industry in western Canada, especially in British Columbia.

I would not like to resume my seat without a word on behalf of the farmer who, during the slack season on the farm, goes out to lumber camps. Because of regulations governing seasonal employment, he does not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits unless he can prove that he has worked at least 135 days during the active farming season.

Mr. Speaker, those regulations are outmoded and complicate the life of everybody, including the insured people as well as the administration. I know that the intention of the government in making this revision is to apply the benefits of the act to more people, so as to extend the scope of this excellent social legislation. I am therefore satisfied that the commission, which is being authorized by the present act to draft regulations, will take my suggestions into account.

Mr. Speaker, I live in a district where lumbering operations are of prime importance. I know lumbermen very well and I know too of their needs and of their problems. That is why I am confident of speaking on their behalf when I request that they be exempted from the regulations regarding seasonal employment. The small farmer and the settler, who has to work away from home in the wintertime to earn a living for their family would undoubtedly be grateful if the commission decided to show more generosity towards them when drafting the new regulations, so that they may benefit, in the same proportion as other workers, from the unemployment insurance stamps they have in their books.

(Text):

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would not be too happy about dragging out the debate on second reading of a bill that is to go to a committee for special consideration, but the other day the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) referred to certain things in connection with myself and unemployment. I should like to refer briefly to what he said and connect it with the thoughts I have respecting the legislation now before us.

It is true that in a speech I made the other day I perhaps invited a reply, but I was a bit disappointed that the hon. member for Charlotte could not find any criticism except the one he levelled at me. I do not refer to this matter now in any malicious way, but I should like to read what he said on that occasion. At page 3484—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just say that the hon. member for Charlotte suggested that I did not get up and speak on unemployment during the debate on that subject a short while ago. Last year I spoke on unemployment in the throne speech debate, in the unemployment debate and on the budget. This year I spoke on unemployment in the throne speech debate and was prepared to speak during the unemployment debate when I realized that the debate had gone on for a longer period than perhaps was desired by both sides of the house, and refrained from making my remarks at that time.

However, at the first opportunity, during the budget debate, I referred to the unemployment situation in Saint John. I mentioned that it was much better, and I thought I gave the government full credit for that. I realize that the provincial situation is another story. However, I did want to clear up the matter since I am a member of the industrial relations committee, come from a labour riding, and am concerned about these matters.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member whether he should not deal with the so-called accusations or other remarks the hon. member for Charlotte has made affecting him when we resume the debate on the budget. I notice that the hon. member spoke on the amendment to the amendment but has not spoken on the amendment. The hon. member for Charlotte also spoke on the amendment to the amendment, which has now been disposed of. The hon. member may deal with him further in the budget debate.

Mr. Knowles: Never turn down Mr. Speaker's invitation.

Mr. Bell: I believe you are quite right, Mr. Speaker. I was merely suggesting my reason for taking part in this debate on second reading, and saying it was not perhaps so serious. I wanted to leave it at that.

Then looking over Bill No. 328, which is now under consideration, I think perhaps the entire bill has been covered both at the resolution stage and now on second reading. The history of the Unemployment Insurance Act was reviewed. This is a complete revision of the act, 121 sections. It is divided into five parts, and I think we all give the minister credit for introducing this in a businesslike way.

There is one phase of the life of our people that has not been covered in this bill to the extent I believe it should have been. I feel that perhaps we are not aware of this group of people to the same extent we are aware of the entire labour and employment field. I was pleased to hear the previous speaker, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), refer to the older age group who are increasingly becoming a problem in our community life. There is a new interest in this age group. Those of us who represent industrial ridings and have calls for employment assistance, relief and other considerations, would probably all agree that people from 55 to 65, the non-veteran group, are a serious problem.

Recently the Canadian Welfare Council published a special issue dealing with this problem. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps this legislation could take more cognizance of this age group than has been the case. Some interesting facts in connection with this group are contained in this special issue, but I shall not go into them. The entire issue presents the case for this group, and I merely suggest that this legislation does not seem to be completely in conformity with the present plans of the department. The department published an interesting booklet concerning the problems of the older worker, and I have looked it over. It is probably fair to say that it does show an interest, but that interest was not carried through into this legislation.

I refer specifically to the controversial provision in this legislation which has been mentioned by nearly all the speakers so far, concerning the reduction of the maximum benefit period in the year from 51 to 30 weeks. It is true that less than 4 per cent of those receiving benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act during the year take the full 51 weeks now available. It is true that the transition period which has been planned for the next three years does assist this situation. It is true also that the seasonal benefits which were added this year do add 15 weeks of benefit in some cases, but I suggest this matter has not been covered completely in this reduced period.

I have some figures I should like to mention that are contained in the annual report on benefit years established and terminated under the Unemployment Insurance Act for the calendar year 1953. The source is the dominion bureau of statistics. Persons over 60 receive a relatively high proportion of the total benefit days paid. Such persons received 8,125,160 or 18·2 per cent out of a total of 44,660,188 benefit days paid on benefit years terminated during the calendar year 1953. While they received 18·2 per cent of the total benefit days paid, persons over 60 accounted for only 10 per cent of the total benefit years terminated in 1953. I think it is fair to say that elderly people are apt to be eligible for the maximum duration of regular benefits. Retired persons who have paid into the fund for some time, therefore, constitute the group most largely affected by the reduction in the maximum benefit allowed from 51 to 30 weeks.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, while this legislation is welcome to some extent, this reduction is going to create a hardship on our older citizens, those who have been forced to retire at 60. In the past they were able to take the full 51 weeks' benefits, but now that is being cut down to 30 weeks, with a possible extension through supplementary benefits. I do suggest there is a slight inconsistency in the attitude of the department toward this age group when they send out propaganda in connection with them, yet do not consider them to the fullest extent in this change that is being made.

No reason for the change was given by the minister, except that only a small percentage would be affected. I do hope that when the measure is before the committee every consideration will be given to the employment problem of this older age group, which is becoming such a sore spot in our community.

Mr. Barnett: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when one rises at this stage of a debate he is apt to discover that not all of his thinking on the principle of a bill, such as the one we have been considering, has been completely unique or original. So perhaps I shall take as read some portions of the speech I had intended to make.

Nevertheless there are some matters which have not yet been touched upon by other hon. members which I feel are of sufficient importance to merit consideration at this stage. I should like to mention those while I have the opportunity, and before this bill goes to the committee on industrial relations for consideration. May I say that, along with a good many other members, I am very happy that this type of study is to be given to the bill.

I think it becomes evident that one's reaction to the bill and the changes it proposes to make in our Unemployment Insurance Act depends very much upon the context in which one is considering it. One or two hon. members from this group who have preceded me in the debate have pointed out that the bill, and the general set-up of unemployment insurance, come far from meeting all the needs that arise in respect of unemployment and the problems connected therewith. I would suggest that those shortcomings arise largely from the fragmentary and piecemeal nature of the various measures of social security which thus far we have seen put into effect in Canada. However, if one does consider the bill in a narrower context, that is in relation to the present Unemployment Insurance Act, then I for one am inclined to feel that on balance this bill does represent something by way of a step forward in our unemployment insurance legislation. For that reason I am happy to see many of the provisions the bill proposes to introduce.

Along with others I have been giving special thought to those sections of the bill which have to do with the qualifying period, and the changes made in respect of the duration of the benefits. I think we must recognize that while this bill applies to a broad group of Canadian citizens, nevertheless under the present act, and even if the bill now proposed becomes law, the fact still remains that those able to secure benefits under the unemployment insurance legislation will remain in effect a privileged group of Canadian citizens.

It can be argued that under certain circumstances the clause in the bill which changes the qualifying arrangement from that of so many contribution days to that of so many contribution weeks does make it somewhat easier for persons to achieve qualification under the bill. Nevertheless it still remains a long way from providing that principle of complete insurance coverage which I suggested in a former speech could very well be applied and must be applied before this legislation is all that it should be. I suggested that, following through with the generally accepted insurance principle, it should be possible if one had paid, in effect, one premium under unemployment insurance, such person should thereby become qualified to benefits if, through no fault of his own, the need for such benefits became apparent. I still feel that should be our objective.

Obviously the present measure falls far short of measuring up to that kind of requirement. I do appreciate that section of the bill which increases the minimum period of benefits, the period during which people who have not achieved a great length of contribution under the bill can receive benefits, if they become qualified. To my way of thinking that does go some distance toward meeting the needs of those who are most likely to require the benefits.

There has been a great deal of talk over the fact that the maximum period for which benefits can be paid is being reduced from 51 to 30 weeks, and I know that various labour groups in the country have been making representation on this point. So long as the general situation in Canada continues in its present state, representations are going to continue to be made on that point. However, it has become apparent to me that the approach the government has taken toward the question of unemployment insurance coverage is still basically that outlined some time ago by the minister, when he said it was designed to meet the needs of frictional and seasonal unemployment. I suppose it might be argued that under the Unemployment Insurance Act as we have understood it thus far in Canada, that is all this particular legislation is designed to do. This particular proposal in the bill makes it clearer than ever that that is still in the mind of the Minister of Labour and in the minds of his colleagues in proposing the present measure.

I might point out that the fact this proposal is being advanced makes it more evident than ever to me that there is a need in the country for something over and above what we have in our Unemployment Insurance Act. It may be true, as the minister has pointed out, that the proposal contained in the bill will meet the needs of those requiring unemployment insurance benefits or at least a large percentage of them. However, that still does not alter the fact that there are people in the country who are going to need something more than that; and when one hears talk about developing automation, and when one gets little glimpses every so often of the speed with which technological change is taking place in the country, then, should the bill return to the house for third reading with the proposal for a 30-week maximum intact, it will become more apparent than ever that we do need to have developed some other form of insurance which will cover those the present act is not designed to cover.

I am glad to see that provision is made in the bill for a three-year period during which the present arrangements can be tapered off. I should like to suggest that in that three-year interval the government might give serious consideration to the proposals advanced in the form of the resolution I had on the order paper last session and again this session, having to do with a new national insurance plan covering individuals against dislocations caused by technological advances, changed marketing conditions and other related causes. If we can have some serious indication from the government that they have some such proposal in mind in order to deal with those other problems related to the unemployment question which, it has been made plain by the statement of the minister, the present Unemployment Insurance Act is not designed to cover, then there would be a good deal less concern over this proposal to reduce the maximum period during which benefits can be paid.

I hope that in the tapering off period to which I have alluded serious study will be given to the manner in which some such proposal as I have suggested can be brought into being in this country. I might suggest, of course, if some of our present economic trends continue, the need for something of that kind will become increasingly apparent long before the three-year tapering off period is over.

I shall not deal at any great length with that subject, but there are two or three points covered in the bill with which I should like to deal briefly. In clause 27—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member be good enough not to refer to sections at this stage? We are discussing the principle of unemployment insurance, and this is not the time to go into the various sections of the bill. The hon. member will have to wait until the bill comes back and is considered in committee of the whole.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to bow to your ruling in that regard. It was not my intention to go into a detailed analysis of the section. It was merely for convenience of reference that I mentioned the number. I hope Your Honour will agree that in a bill of this kind complex principles are involved.

I wish to discuss the matter of excepted employment. Reference has already been made in the debate to one particular aspect of the subject, namely the fact that employment in the fishing industry is still excepted employment. I am very glad to know that a number of hon. members have taken up this matter. The present bill still proposes to except those who are employed in the great fishing industry of this country from the coverage of unemployment insurance. This is a matter on which I feel very strongly myself. It is a fairly complex matter.

I should like to have some assurance from the minister that when this bill goes to the committee thorough consideration will be given to all aspects of that matter so hon. members can discuss in detail the pros and cons that it is not possible for us to discuss at this stage of the debate. I hope following that discussion the bill will come back to the house with an arrangement whereby those in the fishing industry will come within the provisions of the bill as we finally pass it.

One other group of people are mentioned as being in excepted employment, and I should also like to refer to them. It is a fact that those employed in a hospital not operated for purposes of gain are still listed among those in excepted employment. Unless my understanding of the situation throughout this country is completely wrong, the proportion of hospital beds involved in institutions which are operated for gain is very small indeed in Canada. Therefore, for all practical purposes the section eliminates from the coverage of the bill those who are employed in hospitals.

I notice that provision is made for the commission, with the consent of the employer, to include those who are employed in hospitals that are not operated for purposes of gain. That principle is embodied in this bill. I feel that the sections which deal with it are completely at variance with the basic principle embodied in the bill. I suggest this section should be taken out of the bill. The fact that this bill makes the employees of the hospitals of this country subject to the whims and fancies of the employers is most repugnant to me. What does this mean? It means, for example, that a stationary engineer working in a sawmill or in a factory is in insurable employment, but if he moves into a hospital he disqualifies himself for the benefits of unemployment insurance coverage.

I might point out that another principle is expressly set out in the bill. It says that in determining whether any employment is or was insurable, regard shall be had to the nature of the work rather than to the business of the employer.

I understand that representations have been made on this question by those who are managing hospital institutions. If such representations have been made, I would suggest that they represent a very serious blind spot in the thinking of those who may otherwise be carrying on a most useful and desirable function in the life of this country. I would suggest to them that the time has come, if they still hold those views, for them to revise their opinions.

Because of the way in which some hospitals and charitable institutions are run in this country, it may not be possible or desirable to have complete and universal coverage in that connection; but I would suggest that if that is the case this section could be much more desirably drafted by having it read in this way: "At the request of the employees, the commission shall bring these people into insurable employment".

In the province from which I come the hospitals are supported by the populace as a whole. It is a very poor situation when many thousands of workers who are supporting the hospitals are themselves covered by unemployment insurance, yet their fellow workers, who may be called upon to minister to them in their illness, because of some whim of the hospital board, are denied what to those who are patients is a right and privilege which they enjoy as Canadian citizens because of this act.

There is one other group of citizens of this country which is in effect an excepted group, although they are not named as such in the Unemployment Insurance Act. During my visit last year to Newfoundland I was surprised and shocked to learn that many hundreds and probably over the course of time many thousands of my fellow Canadian citizens in that province receive no benefits whatever under the Unemployment Insurance Act because they are or have been employed on certain leased bases in that province. I became interested enough in the situation to do a little reading on the subject to find out how it came about. I realize, as all members of the house do, that basically it arose out of a treaty to which Canada was not a party in the first place. I discovered that this treaty has been modified since the time Newfoundland became a part of Canada, and I assume there is a possibility that some further modifications might be made in that respect.

Apparently such modifications as have been made have not been such as would cover those who are employed, for example, by a civilian United States contractor at a leased base. As far as I can see that is not a good situation, that is not something which Canada as a whole should continue to countenance. I notice that article 28 of the original treaty makes provision for giving sympathetic consideration to any representations which either party to the agreement may make from time to time after the agreement has been in force. I notice also that after Newfoundland became part of Canada certain modifications were made.

On page 46 of treaty series 1952, No. 14, it is pointed out that arrangements were made whereby exemption from Canadian income tax, which apparently had been in effect, was removed from United States contractors or contractors ordinarily resident in the United States in respect of profits arising from work performed at the leased bases. I suggest that when such modifications of the treaty were made it would have been desirable at the same time that a further modification be made to require such contractors to have their employees covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, I understand that was not done and, as I say, over the years many thousands of the citizens of Newfoundland have been denied the right to build up unemployment insurance coverage.

Unless the Minister of Labour can persuade the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make some immediate adjustment in the arrangements with the authorities of the United States of America, I would suggest that when this Unemployment Insurance Act is being revised provision should be made to cover these people. Those of us who live in the rest of Canada and who directly or indirectly were responsible for the partial alienation of what is now Canadian soil should be prepared to accept the responsibility of seeing that no citizen of Newfoundland is thereby deprived of his right to unemployment insurance. If it is necessary to draft an arrangement whereby the unemployment insurance commission will assume the employer's share in connection with workmen engaged in these areas, I think that is something this parliament could very well support.

I realize that there are a number of matters in respect to this bill which have not been touched upon either by myself or by other hon. members. There may be other hon. members who wish to take part in the debate, and certainly there will be opportunity for full discussion of all sections of the bill when it gets into committee. Therefore I shall not prolong my remarks at this time.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Cape Breton South and the hon. member for York South have as usual offered the constructive criticisms and suggestions which are put forward by this party and other members of our group. There is no necessity for me to take up the time of the house to repeat them, but I do want to bring to the attention of the house and the minister two or three groups who are excluded under the present bill whom many of my constituents would like to see included.

Before proceeding with this matter, I must say that I was most interested in listening to the debate this afternoon to note the exceptionally large percentage of Liberal members who spoke in the debate who had criticisms to make of the bill and suggestions to offer to the minister. I was most interested in listening to the two hon. members from the province of Quebec who spoke just prior to the recess at six o'clock, and I noticed that both hon. members put forward criticisms very similar to those I am going to make at this time.

First of all I refer particularly to farm workers. A good many of the people I represent are very sorry that farm workers are not included in the coverage of this legislation. Farm workers should be covered by the act. In my opinion the present exclusion of farm workers is unfair to the farm worker and to the farmer.

I say it is unfair to the farm worker because it penalizes him for doing a most essential job, a job which is not popular with a great number of people in this country at this time. We should do everything possible to keep our farmers on the land and encourage farm workers to assist in the working of those farms. A farm worker usually works for lower wages and in many cases he has less security than the industrial worker. If any section of workers needs it, he needs this protection. I think we should do all we can by amending this legislation and in other ways to make employment on the farms of this country as attractive as possible.

I say it is unfair to the farmer because it makes it very difficult under some circumstances for him to obtain farm labour at the right time, particularly casual labour. I know that in my own constituency quite frequently a man would like to go to work on a farm for a month or two, but if he has any choice of employment at all he will accept employment where he is covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think it is most unfair to the farmer as well as to the farm worker, because it puts the farmer in a difficult position when it comes to competing for necessary labour, particularly at certain periods of the year.

This is an extremely important matter to the farmers in my constituency, particularly those engaged in the fruit industry who usually do their pruning in the spring months of the year while the snow is on the ground, then have considerable thinning to do in the summer months—there is a great deal of hand labour in orchard work—and then in the fall require extra help in the harvesting and packing of the fruit. It affects fruit farmers particularly, and other farmers as well. I say that the exclusion of farm workers from the terms of this act is unfair to the farm worker himself—it is distinctly unfair to him—and presents an unnecessary problem to the farmer.

Of such great concern is this matter to the farmers in British Columbia that I know it has been discussed at numerous farmers' conventions and farmers' institutes. I have heard it discussed at institute meetings in the Kootenay district and in other districts in British Columbia. It was the subject of considerable discussion at the recent convention of the British Columbia fruit growers' association held in Kelowna on January 18, 19 and 20. I might say that this is a convention of all tree fruit growers in the province of British Columbia covering the Okanagan, the Kootenays and the main-line points along to the west of Kamloops.

This subject was of such great importance that it was raised on the first day of the convention, and considerable discussion took place. Then it was decided that it would be a good idea to get the head of the unemployment insurance office to come and address the convention, to inform the convention of the terms of the act and so on. This gentleman kindly came to the convention and gave an informative address to the delegates. Following his address there was a thorough discussion of the whole problem and by unanimous vote the delegates to the British Columbia fruit growers' association convention adopted this resolution:

> Whereas in almost every other industry there are unemployment insurance benefits.
> Therefore be it resolved by this 1955 British Columbia fruit growers' association convention that steps be taken through the proper channels to persuade the dominion government to include full-time farm workers in the national unemployment scheme.

I support that resolution, Mr. Speaker. I might say that I am one of those who have been asked to try to persuade the government to give effect to that resolution.

In addition to provision for full-time farm workers, I think provision should be made for part-time or casual farm workers. In our district we find a situation which is similar to that described by the Liberal member from Quebec who spoke prior to the recess at six o'clock. There are a great many farmers who carry on a combination of farming and lumbering. We have lumbermen who are willing to put in a few weeks on a farm, or who would be willing to put in a few weeks on a farm if they could continue to be covered by unemployment insurance benefits and so on.

I urge the minister to give serious consideration to these representations from the British Columbia fruit growers' association and other organizations, and to the requests that have been made in the house by members of the various parties during this debate. I also hope the committee will inquire thoroughly into this aspect of the question, because I am distinctly of the opinion that the exclusion of farm workers is unfair to those working on farms and is distinctly unfair to the farmers.

I now want to deal very briefly with another group. On April 4, when the resolution preceding this bill was under discussion, I raised this matter but, after listening to the minister and after carefully reading the record, I note that the minister did not rise to my bait. I am therefore now going to cast another fly in his direction. I want again to bring to the attention of the minister the unfairness suffered by certain groups, particularly in British Columbia. I refer to certain people who are employed in the forest branch to carry on tree planting, snag felling, land clearing and the burning of brush in order to provide forest protection and conservation. Here is what to me is a peculiar thing.

By an arrangement between the federal government and our provincial government the clerical staff, the research workers, the draftsmen, the mechanics, the scalers and the truckers of the British Columbia forest service receive unemployment insurance benefits, but the very men of whom I have spoken are not covered. These men are usually employed in the months of the year when there is no snow on the ground, and quite frequently they are laid off as soon as the first snow comes. At that time of year it is often extremely difficult for them to obtain employment. These men who work in the forest branch on forest conservation are the very ones who should be brought under the terms of this act.

I hope the minister gives consideration to that aspect of the problem, and I also hope the committee will study the question. I cannot understand the logic of the present arrangement. These men are doing almost exactly the same type of work as are the lumbermen in the woods, those working in the sawmills and for the logging companies. For instance, I was in a camp last summer in which men doing this work were not covered by the act. But the truck driver in the camp was covered, and the cook in the camp was covered. It is a situation that creates some unfairness to these men who are willing to go in the woods in the summer and do this forest protection work. I ask that their case be given consideration by the minister and by the committee.

Before concluding, I want to support all those hon. members who have presented the case of the fishermen. I understood the minister to say that the matter was under study and was receiving careful consideration. I am not well acquainted with all the complexities of that occupation, but judging from the representations that have been made to members of this house and the representations that have been made by members of this house from all parties to the minister, I am quite confident that there must be a great deal of validity in the arguments put forward.

I trust that the position of farm workers, those engaged in the forest service of British Columbia in the conservation of our forests, and those employed in the fishing industry will receive from the minister, from the committee, and finally from this house the consideration that their situation and their contribution to our production deserves.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Before the minister closes the debate, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the reference by the hon. member for Kootenay West to casting a fly and hoping to catch a fish prompted me to make one more appeal on behalf of the fishermen.

It will be recalled that the Minister of Labour earlier this session said he was giving consideration to the finding of means by which the fishermen, and those to whom he referred as near-fishermen, might be included in the coverage under amendments which he hoped to bring in to this legislation.

I do not intend to repeat at any length the arguments I have advanced on behalf of these men who are employees of companies engaged in the fishing industry. In certain companies there are men employed in various trades. In these trades employees of other companies which are not actually engaged in fishing are covered. I have called the attention of the minister to the fact that it is necessary to maintain the fish traps and weirs. The number of piles to be driven at certain seasons of the year requires the fishing companies to employ pile drivers who work for companies which are engaged in the construction industry. Those pile drivers, working on the same project alongside the pile drivers who are employees of the fishing company, are covered by unemployment insurance, but those who are employees of the fishing company are not. I have referred to pile drivers, but there are several other kindred trades in which men are employed by the various companies engaged in the fishing industry.

Of course there is the question of the men who actually go out in the boats to harvest the fish from the ocean. A few of them own their own boats, but the majority are either working in some co-operative or are working as employees of a fishing company. Sometimes the query is raised as to who is going to pay the employer's contribution. I do not know whether the minister has explored the angle that the buyer of the fish, who is really the employer of the fishermen, might possibly be expected to pay the employer's contribution. These companies are keenly interested in the catch made by the fisherman. The success of the packing company or the purchasing company depends entirely upon his catch. Could they not be classed as the employers?

I have put the various arguments before the minister personally and in the house on other occasions. I am not going to repeat them, but I hope that when the bill goes to the committee some way will be found whereby employees of fishing companies and the fishermen themselves can be covered by unemployment insurance. I know the work of the fishermen is largely seasonal, but because they are engaging in more and more different types of fishing and are not restricting their catch to one particular species the work is being spread over a much longer period than was the case a few years ago. The work is not nearly as seasonal as it was 10, 15 or 20 years ago, and the fishermen must have different types of equipment to catch the various species of fish throughout the greater portion of the year in order that they may make a living.

I make a final appeal to the minister to urge the committee to which the bill is being sent to give the most earnest consideration to some way of covering the fishermen employed in this great industry on the Atlantic, the great lakes and the Pacific coast with unemployment insurance.

Mr. Gregg: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the debate today has indicated the keen interest there is in unemployment insurance and in this measure to improve our Unemployment Insurance Act. I believe it is correct to assume from what we have heard this afternoon and this evening that nearly all the things we are trying to do in this measure meet with general approval. Of course there are strong differences of opinion as to how we should go about it, and as to some of the details.

I have made a note of the various points that have been raised in the different speeches. I noticed during this debate on second reading, when the principle of the bill is before the house or, as one hon. member said, the various principles of the bill, that most hon. members expressed the view that a closer examination should wait until the measure comes before the standing committee on industrial relations.

I think it would be well for me to follow that good example. In doing so, however, may I say that I appreciate the helpful and interesting manner in which the discussion has been carried on today. Even though I may not now dwell on the various points raised, I should like to assure hon. members that I am fully aware of their seriousness, and I give them the assurance that there will be a full opportunity for their discussion in the standing committee. For instance, just a few moments ago reference was made to fishermen. They and farm workers were mentioned this afternoon by a number of hon. members. I can tell the house that these matters have received and will continue to receive attention and study to see what we can do.

In saying that, I should like to state that the fringe group, if I may call it that, associated with the fishing trade, referred to by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, and the forestry group referred to by the hon. member for Kootenay West, do not come exactly within the category to which I am referring now. I think we should have less difficulty in finding a formula for those two small groups than in the case of the main bodies of fishermen and farm workers.

I think the house will understand some of the difficulties that will face the committee when I say it is recognized, according to the 1951 census, that there were 50,222 non-wage earners amongst our fishermen, or 93 per cent, and 3,775 wage earners, or 7 per cent. I am not going to pursue that matter now; we shall discuss it again in the committee.

I can say with regard to these two groups that the commission can by regulation, subject to the approval of the governor in council, bring under the act any group of workers, and the commission constantly has in mind the possibility of increasing the coverage and bringing in as many people as possible. But there are a great many more difficulties, some of which have been referred to today, and they can be discussed when the bill goes to the committee.

Among other things, in the debate there was reference to seasonal benefits, the length of the benefit period—perhaps talked about more than any other point—and the question of a closer relationship between the benefits and the coverage, which is a feature of the bill. In the first instance all these matters gave the commission and the government a great deal of concern before the measure was introduced. I feel the discussion today has been useful, and hon. members will be able to appreciate some of the other considerations when the bill goes to the committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 5, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Before resuming my remarks in this debate I want to congratulate the Prime Minister, who was guest of honour with six other members of the legal profession at a dinner tendered by the Quebec City bar association to mark their fiftieth anniversary as lawyers. I also want to congratulate the Prime Minister for the remarks he made on that occasion, which were reported in this morning's Montreal Gazette. I want to make special mention of this remark:

> "We must remain what we are—the sons of our ancestors", he said, "but we must not sever the providential link that binds us all to other Canadians.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that all members of the Quebec City bar association are just as proud to have our Prime Minister as one of their members as we Canadians are to have him as our Prime Minister. Once again I want to congratulate him on this occasion and express my wish that he may spend many more years as a member of the Quebec bar association, and many more years as our Prime Minister.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): I can go along with the first part of that.

Mr. Robichaud: With all of it. I want to join with my colleagues and express my approval of the main motion now before us. I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his masterful presentation of his first budget on April 5 last. The first annual statement of our finance minister has been well received and favourably commented upon by the large majority of thinking Canadians. His belief that a healthy expansion of the Canadian economy is everybody's business will lead to greater activity in our entire national economy. He has taken a courageous position in providing a measure of tax relief to be enjoyed by personal income taxpayers and by corporations alike.

Some members of the opposition have criticized the minister and the government for budgeting for a possible deficit, while others have claimed that his deficit is far too small. The general feeling throughout the nation is that the attitude taken is sound, based on good judgment, and according to the principles of good business.

I also want to express my appreciation to the Minister of Finance for having included in this year's budget a clarification of two special items under schedule A of the Customs Tariff, which will be of immeasurable value to one of the leading manufacturers of my constituency and to the entire community.

Since the early part of 1953 base metal discoveries, followed by preliminary and normal development in the northern part of New Brunswick and particularly my constituency of Gloucester, have made news highlights. The great variety of minerals located in the Bathurst area, lending themselves in many cases to open pit mining, together with extremely low transportation costs, have led to the conclusion that New Brunswick could in the near future become one of the world's leading producers of lead and zinc. These discoveries were followed by substantial finds by American Metals Properties in the adjoining Miramichi area. Today prospects are bright for a mining future that could eventually revolutionize the entire economy of the maritime provinces.

It is recognized, however, that no mining developments of consequence and of advantage can expand without the availability of cheap electric power. No one can deny that cheap power is the key to New Brunswick's future mining development. I agree with previous statements to that effect made in this house by members from New Brunswick, whether originating from the opposition side or from the government side of this house. On different occasions the New Brunswick representatives on the government side of this house have been accused of not supporting the demand for federal assistance in the financing of hydroelectric projects for the province of New Brunswick. We realize that our mineral deposits must be developed in such a way as to be of maximum benefit to the people of our province. To take advantage of this opportunity we need large quantities of relatively cheap power. We are in favour of federal financial assistance to the Beechwood project. We are just as anxious as the members of the opposition to see that this project is carried through to a full and successful conclusion.

While discussing power I want to place on the record my personal opinion on this matter, so as to make my personal stand on the need for power in my native province quite clear. I have some doubt that the 135,000 maximum horsepower, or I should say the possible 90,000 to 95,000 average horsepower, that may be derived from Beechwood will have any effect in accentuating the mining expansion now under progress in New Brunswick.

I am not entirely convinced that proper steps have been taken to assure the possibility of water storage in the upper regions of the Saint John river and its tributaries. The report of the international joint commission on the Saint John river have made it clear that the storage possibilities are in territory outside of the jurisdiction of the province. It has been made clear that most of the storage areas that could serve generating sites in New Brunswick are not under the control of New Brunswick but under the control of Quebec and the state of Maine. This province and state must have their say before the over-all development of the Saint John river can become a reality. Federal financial assistance to power development within the province of New Brunswick is not impossible, but it will have to result from the adoption by Ottawa of a new federal policy which could be made applicable to other provinces in similar circumstances.

I am not entirely convinced that New Brunswick can or should depend on hydroelectric power for the realization of its mining expansion program. In support of this view I should like to quote a statement by Mr. L. Riggs, manager of Brunswick Mining and Smelting Corporation, with head office at Bathurst. As reported in the Northern Light, under date of January 20, 1955, he said:

> The company plans this year are to make a study of the mining and milling of ore. The problem of whether or not there is to be a refinery in New Brunswick depends largely on the availability of cheap power in large quantities. Mr. Riggs gave as an example that the zinc smelter owned and operated by St. Joseph Lead in Josephtown, Pennsylvania, used more electrical power in 1954 than was developed by the New Brunswick hydro commission in the same year. He stated that he was informed that Beechwood and the entire Saint John river proposed development would not have sufficient firm power to operate a similar type smelter in addition to the normal growth of power demands for the province. The solution to this very important problem rests in the hands of the New Brunswick government.

In the statement I have just quoted, Mr. Riggs has mentioned the smelter owned and operated by St. Joseph Lead in Josephtown, Pennsylvania. The power for this particular smelter is supplied by the Duquesne Light Company. Approximately 50,000 kilowatts are produced from steam turbo generating plants, and coal is used exclusively. It is true the cost of their coal is far below the cost of any coal that can be produced anywhere in the maritime provinces.

We must not overlook the possibility that hydroelectric developments will not be in a position to supply the necessary power for the operation of a smelter and other regular mining developments in northern New Brunswick. But I want to stress the fact that we have quantities of coal available in New Brunswick, and should the quality not be satisfactory for economical use we still have the possibility of transporting coal by water from Cape Breton to the proximity of the mines in the Bathurst area at a low transportation cost of 50 to 75 cents per ton. We have in Gloucester county, at Pokesudi, year-round water facilities which would be of great advantage in the erection of a steam generating plant to serve the adjoining mining district. One must not overlook the fact that the demand for power will expand at such a rapid rate in New Brunswick that steam will always play an important part in the generating facilities.

As stated by the manager of Brunswick Mining and Smelting Corporation, Beechwood and even the proposed Saint John river development do not have sufficient potential power to operate a smelter in view of the additional normal growth of power demands in our province. If coal is not the practical answer to our power problems, if it is too expensive, no one can deny or should try to minimize the importance of atomic power in the generation of electricity. In this connection I want to quote and have on record part of a statement by the Canadian Press appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, April 27, last:

> A foreseeable limit to Canada's ability to produce low cost electricity by hydro and coal is the major incentive for the development of atomic power stations in this country.
> Research at the Chalk River, Ontario, atomic energy plant and elsewhere in the world has proved that it is practicable to produce electricity with atomic energy. However, it is not yet possible to do this cheaply enough.
> Canada must design atomic power stations capable of producing electricity at a cost of five to seven mills a kilowatt hour. Any higher cost would not be economical in Canada because electricity now is being produced by coal-burning plant at that figure.

The United Kingdom and other countries lacking cheap coal and other thermal fuels may be ahead of Canada in starting to use atomic power to produce electricity. It will be economical for them to operate atomic plants which produce power at a cost greatly in excess of five or seven mills a kilowatt hour.

"This will not mean that Canada will be behind in the field of industrial atomic energy", said Dr. G. C. Laurence, director of the reactor research and development division of Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd., during a recent tour of Chalk River plant by newspaper men.

"The United Kingdom and other countries pay the equivalent of 10 to 15 mills a kilowatt hour to produce electricity by coal," he said. "If they can produce electricity by atomic power at the same price it will be economically advantageous."

Research here now is aimed at solving problems preventing production of low-cost electricity by atomic plants. Processes are sought to permit low-cost production of metals, equipment and fuels required to build and operate a power plant.

At the same time, design work is proceeding on a small experimental atomic plant to produce electricity.

When it is announced that the United Kingdom is prepared to spend $840 million for 12 atomic power stations, to produce power at a price equivalent to that for power generated by conventional means, one must not fail to recognize that atomic energy is of crucial importance to the future of our national economy.

It is recognized that all available sources of hydro power in Ontario, even with the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, will be used by 1962, according to Dr. D. A. Keys, scientific adviser to the president of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Some additional source must be found, and atomic energy is obviously the answer. The first prototype of atomic reactor to be created in Ontario will develop 20,000 kilowatts of electric power, and is expected to be ready in 1958. From this small reactor will follow much larger units and electric power generated from atomic energy will then be used on a commercial basis.

Great possibilities are offered in this particular field by the application of atomic energy to provide the power which is necessary for the advancement of industry in New Brunswick. Not longer than ten years ago if anyone had stated in this house that in 1955 the entire deep-sea fishing fleet of Gloucester county would be 100 per cent diesel powered, the hon. members of the opposition would have suggested that he was not practical. If anyone even five years ago had stated that in 1955 diesels would be the main source of power for our Canadian railways, here again someone would have objected and stated that he was not practical.

I want to take this opportunity to place on record before this house my personal conviction that atomic power could easily be the answer to the low-cost electricity so urgently needed in the mining areas of New Brunswick. I do not agree with the statement made in the course of this debate by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell), when speaking of the federal government he is reported at page 3231 of Hansard for April 27 as follows:

By some devious method they either hinder our chance to take part in the atomic power development or they completely exclude us from it.

Further on he said, as reported at the same page of Hansard:

Again there is an amusing and ironical element about the matter. They had edged us and coached us along. It is discouraging to see the way in which Nova Scotia, in their bid for hydroelectric power, was encouraged along. It had the first application in. It was told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce at various times that it was being considered; it was given to understand that its application was first, or No. 1. But what happened? There again it went to industry in central Canada.

The hon. member should have enough understanding to realize that an experimental pilot plant should be logically located not too far away from the Chalk River atomic plant. Can you imagine the scientists from Chalk River and from the industries interested travelling daily back and forth from Chalk River to any point in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia in connection with the construction of such a plant?

However, when the experiment has been completed and the first pilot plant of this kind in Canada is in operation, I feel that the province of New Brunswick and the Bathurst area with its huge mining possibilities should be the logical location for the construction of the first commercial electric plant operated by atomic power. Tonight I ask the government to give this request first consideration, and on this I am convinced of the support of all members of this house.

We all realize that immediate additional power is needed to carry on with mining expansion in northern New Brunswick; and personally, as I have stated, I am not entirely of the opinion that such power can be supplied from Beechwood. Tremendous amounts of power will be generated at Bersimis; and the immediate partial and temporary solution to our problem could easily be a short 10 or 15 year contract with the government of the province of Quebec to supply power to northern New Brunswick mines until the atomic power generating station can become a reality.

It is not right, Mr. Speaker, to try to leave the impression in this house that the federal government is completely neglecting the maritime provinces. Even the hon. member for Saint John-Albert was proud to quote during the course of this debate from the "Supplement to Private and Public Investment in Canada, Outlook 1955, Regional Estimates". I want to quote from his remarks as reported at page 3231 of Hansard:

> I followed along by saying that in New Brunswick things are beginning to move. We definitely have a good optimistic mood down there now. We have a new government. They have tackled our economic problems in a sensible way. We have invested in ourselves, Mr. Speaker. That is something which a great many of the other areas of Canada cannot say. We have led in that investment in ourselves in the last few years, and I put the figures on the record for everyone to see.

The figures which were placed on the record by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert showed that in 1953 New Brunswick had an industrial expansion of 7·9 per cent, and in 1954 it again led the way with an expansion of 27·7 per cent. What the hon. member failed to prove in the course of his remarks was who is responsible for this large increase in the capital expenditures made in the province of New Brunswick in the last two years.

To answer my hon. friend I shall quote from the annual report of the province of New Brunswick, department of industry and development, 1954, as tabled in the provincial house during the last session of the New Brunswick legislative assembly by Hon. R. J. Pichette, minister of industry and development of New Brunswick. I shall then answer my hon. friend by quoting from a report originating with a provincial government which he is supporting, as are the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Montgomery). I quote:

> While industrial development in the province this year did not reach the tempo we had expected, it is quite evident that the impetus to our economy being provided by Camp Gagetown and the sustained program of mineral exploration, spreading to almost all sections of the province is beginning to attract the favourable attention of a wide range of manufacturers, and services firms. Unquestionably, as camp Gagetown reaches full operational status and mining reaches the producing stage, we can expect industrial growth to keep pace.

Camp Gagetown, a federal project, and the mines financed by private enterprise are then responsible for this increase in capital expenditures in New Brunswick about which my hon. friend feels so proud. One must not neglect the importance to New Brunswick's economy of the construction of Camp Gagetown. While contracts amounting to $30 million have been awarded by Defence Construction Limited, as at February 1 of this year, it is estimated that further tenders amounting to $20 million will be let on this project within the next 12 months. This does not include the construction of 1,400 houses at a cost of approximately $16 million by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a project which will be undertaken in the near future.

One must not forget that the 10,000 servicemen training at this army camp and a permanent staff of 1,500 to 2,000 will add substantially to the general economy of the province of New Brunswick. I hold in my hand a bill to incorporate the town of Oromocto; a small village, previously unknown, will become a town owing to the federal project at Camp Gagetown. Already tenders are being called for the supply of perishable food, such as large quantities of bread, milk, and meat which will be used during the long training periods at this army camp, the largest in Canada.

When a decision has to be made on the construction of a central heating plant, there again consideration was given to New Brunswick and a central furnace will be installed which will use from 40,000 to 50,000 tons of Minto coal a year. In view of the numerous challenges which we have received in this house from opposition members, I feel it is my duty to place on the record figures which will tell the truth about the situation so far as New Brunswick is concerned.

Let me outline some of the federal expenditures for New Brunswick during the fiscal year 1955-56: Department of National Defence at Camp Gagetown, $50 million; at Chatham air base and Ste. Marguerite, $7 million; Department of Public Works, $16 million; Department of National Health and Welfare in hospital construction grants, $976,000; other health grants, $1,287,000; old age security, $12,600,000; old age assistance, $1,250,000; Blind Persons Act, $265,000; family allowances, $15 million, or a total of $104,378,000.

In other words, three of the federal departments will spend in New Brunswick this year over $100 million, which is over twice the total amount of the provincial budget for the same period. Furthermore, out of a total budget of $54 million the province of New Brunswick will receive in 1955 over $17 million from the federal government under the 1947 tax agreement, which is close to one-third of its total proposed expenditure. These are the figures, Mr. Speaker, that I want to place on record in answer to the challenge from the hon. members of the opposition.

I welcome the announcement by the Minister of Finance of the appointment of a royal commission with instructions to look ahead and examine carefully our future economic prospects. The maritimes are today placing their hopes in the field of mineral development. It has been recognized that to make the most of it, these minerals should be refined on the spot, and the erection of a smelter should be followed by the necessary plant for the production of acids and fertilizer from the large sulphur content of its ores. The achievement of these objectives is only possible, as I have just said, by the introduction of a missing element, namely cheap electric power.

The first duty of this royal commission should be to launch without delay a complete study of the maritimes' general economy and its possibilities. It appears to be an established and well-recognized factor that the maritime provinces, and particularly New Brunswick, are not in a position to finance adequate power projects to permit the normal expansion of potential developments which could revolutionize the entire economy of this particular section of our great country. We cannot expect to solve our problems overnight; but we, as representatives of the Canadian people, have assumed a responsibility which none of us can deny. It is our duty to unite our efforts and assure the participation of the maritimes in the Canadian boom which to an astonishing degree is still confined to the industrial areas of central Canada.

These are my concluding remarks in the budget debate, Mr. Speaker, but before resuming my seat I want to assure hon. members of the opposition from New Brunswick, that I, as a sitting member on the government side, am in favour of any assistance and any government measure that will add to our provincial economy and to the welfare of our people.

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of entering this debate, but after listening to so much of the unadulterated buncombe about the government's record I just could not resist saying something about it. The taxpayer has found out to his sorrow that it is just pure illusion. The St. Laurent, Abbott and Harris dollar which they are receiving is worth less than 50 cents after all taxes are paid. The administration, because of its waste and extravagance, has had to levy higher taxes than are absolutely necessary.

One of the previous speakers, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), was quite strong in his adulation of the cabinet and the ministers of the crown. I did not know whether he was going to start out with a series of Studerisms, but I soon found out they were just plain ordinary "Studermen", not supermen.

The government by its waste and extravagance has in devious ways punished every Canadian citizen who has been patriotic or prudent enough to invest in government bonds, or whose life savings are tied up in insurance or other forms of security. These people now realize what this government has done to them through its inflationary policies. Veterans and pensioners are likewise in the same position, because they are on fixed incomes. The rapid inflation has affected them also and reduced them to a subsistence allowance; it has almost impoverished them.

While the government is very glib in taking credit for all the social legislation enacted, the truth of the matter is that most of our welfare laws originated in the fertile minds of Conservatives, although this emaciated and decrepit form of Liberalism has leeched on to them and they have fattened, as they always have done on their exploitation of the ingenuity of others.

It might be advantageous to read an article by Bruce Hutchison published last week in which he outlined the progress made in Canada since confederation. He said that the only outstanding idea that had been developed in this country was confederation itself, and that was the brainchild of Sir John A. Macdonald. The next was Sir John's national policy, that has been the base of our prosperity. The next along the line was reciprocity, which the people of this country turned down in a very decisive manner. In as much as this government has by indirect methods tried to introduce reciprocity with the United States, they should have the courage to go to the people and tell them they are trying to inflict reciprocity on them again.

However, that is up to them and their conscience, if they have one.

Our standard of living has advanced, in spite of this government, because of the initiative and incentive of our people. They are the ones who have created the wealth of this country. Our wealth has been created through labour's continuous productivity, and it is not the invention of Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent or even the wizardry of Ilsley, Abbott or Harris. They were just the factual, physical substance that was carried forward on the strong flow of the nation's destiny, and if we have prospered it has been in spite of them.

Last year when the minister of finance presented his budget he was most nonchalant, free and easy and indulged in many loose conjectures, or what you might ordinarily call economic double talk, the gist of which was that we were going to have a good year if we did not run into the hard times that he saw ahead and hoped we would miss.

He forecast a surplus of $4 million, with a possible deficit of $140 million if the tough times he saw ahead arrived. Well we did have the tough going to the tune of a $160 million deficit.

There was considerable similarity between the budget of last year and the budget of this year, but they could not be called twins by any stretch of the imagination. This year the nonchalant manner of the previous minister of finance was lacking. Because it was his initial appearance the Minister of Finance this year was rather tense and nervous, which we all rather expected, but he did not abandon the same chopstick logic in the juggling of finance practised by his predecessor.

Last year the minister of finance played up the recommendations of the Randall commission in the United States, which were rejected, or which if accepted were ignored and not enforced. Here is what the Minister of Finance said last year, as reported at page 3724 of Hansard of April 6, 1954:

> For most of this period the United States has been in the process of re-examining its foreign economic policies.

And again:

> The recommendations of this commission—better known as the Randall report—provide, in my view, a reasonably promising basis for action by the United States in a co-operative movement towards a sounder system of trade and payments.

And further down:

> —and it was recognized that enlightened economic policies on the part of both the United States and Canada would contribute materially to the achievement of a better trade and payments system throughout the free world.

And again:

> To this end the United States administration has just placed before congress a program designed to give effect to the main recommendations of the Randall commission.

And finally:

> As might be expected, this development has brought with it growing protectionist pressures in many countries, including Canada.

Here is what the present Minister of Finance said this year, as reported on page 2727 of Hansard of April 5:

> In the past twelve months, however, while there was no basic change in American policies, there was a disappointing lack of progress toward actual reductions in trade barriers and there were disconcerting signs of a revival of protectionist feeling in response to the increase in competitive conditions.
> I should remind the house that the United States administration has resisted proposals which, in our opinion, would not advance the cause of friendly and mutually advantageous trade. This resistance we welcome. On the other hand, it must be confessed that the resistance has not been uniformly successful. We all have our difficulties and it is not always possible to achieve ideal solutions. But it must be recognized that actions taken or even implied by the government of the United States may weaken support for liberal commercial policies and may impose upon those of us who are firm supporters of such policies a greater burden in defending them in our own countries.

And later:

> It is of the utmost importance for the future of international economic co-operation that the United States should continue to give positive direction and leadership in reducing barriers to the free flow of world trade.

I could go on and quote more of this, but I think I have quoted sufficient to show that while efforts can be made to bring discord and frustration and impotence into an acceptable medley, acceptable to the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the minister of external affairs, they have simply ended up in a muddle. They are very sorry for what has taken place, and they have expressed their outstanding and emphatic dissatisfaction with the policies of the United States.

Nevertheless they say we cannot do anything about it, because if we do they might slap us down. Therefore we must remain on good terms with them. This effort to reconcile the glaring barriers of United States protective policy with the intangible devices of the free trade policy of this government gives you the picture I have just outlined; it is too bad, but we cannot do anything about it.

This year there is such a hullabaloo made about the few changes in the budget that you really would think it was something. The budget contains a very few changes. The benefits certainly are lean, and they will not bring the kind of relief the taxpayers have been looking for. They have been looking for an increase in their exemptions and a considerable reduction in the hidden sales taxes of this country. Changes of this kind would have made an immediate and, I would say, effective improvement in the financial position of the average taxpayer in this country. Particularly if they would allow greater exemptions up to the $5,000 a year wage earner it would give immediate relief.

The budget is deceptive because in it there appears to be a great deal but in reality it gives very little. Its augmentation of the pay cheque of the average worker will scarcely be noticed. It is also an insincere budget because it enters the field of deficit budgeting in order to take care of a condition the existence of which the government denies. It will lengthen the life of the inflationary situation in which we are living and which has such a dire effect on the living costs of those who are on fixed incomes.

The government should be ashamed of themselves for the plight in which they have placed these people. They have allowed inflation to take place; they have allowed prices to rise and spiral. Everyone else has been in the position where they have had their wages increased and have had allowances made to them, whereas these people must subsist on what they were expected by this government to live on some 10 or 15 years ago. True, there has been a little added, even to the soldier's pension. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe) probably summed it up right when he said, "A little more for the soldier"; just a little and that is all.

Of course we all know that it is too soon to expect alluring programs of continued prosperity, pie in the sky and job security. These things must wait for an election year. The taxpayers know by now that they cannot expect these things at present because it is too soon for the promise of an improvement in financial conditions that will be offered as bait for votes. Probably that promise will come next year. We can hope it may be next year. For the sake of the people of this country I hope it is. However, financially the budget itself is a dud.

Everyone is anxious that our economy shall continue to expand. While the economy is now in an apparently healthy condition, this condition will not continue unless business expansion accompanies it. Such an expansion will spur a general activity which will create new employment. The reappearance of unemployment every year can no longer be regarded as of only temporary concern in view of its increasing proportions and lengthening periods. The recurrence of unemployment every year is extremely ominous.

Everyone seems to indulge, year after year, in giving a name to the budget. Some call it an alluring one. Some call it ambidextrous because one hand does not know what the other hand is doing. I think the hon. member for Eglinton started out by saying that it was a budget of crumbs. He probably made a mistake and should have said that it was a crummy budget. I probably would accept the Minister of Finance's own description of it. An article appeared in the Telegram of April 16, when the furor took place about the other convention that was being held and some reference was made to Trotskyites or something like that. I do not know the interpretation of these academic questions. I read the article and after I read it I said to myself, "This is an amazing statement to come from the Minister of Finance", so I read it again. The article reads in part as follows :

I think everyone will agree that it is a pain budget because everybody in the country has a pain from it or is going to get a pain from it sooner or later. As he said, it certainly is not a fantasy of imagination, because if you have a pain, there is certainly no fantasy about it and it is not imaginary. It is not a stand-pat budget—and again he has aptly described it—because if you have a pain, you do not stand pat; you do something about it. I therefore think we will probably let the budget go at the Minister of Finance's own interpretation of it, namely that it is a pain, ordinary Liberal budget.

I probably could go a little bit further with the Minister of Finance. The other day he was speaking to a luncheon club and made some reference to the coming provincial election, particularly to Premier Frost's 14 points that he had read in the newspapers. He said he was "astonished" at the premier's claim that his government was responsible for old age pensions at the age of 70 without a means test, and he wondered when one starts to rewrite history. The Minister of Finance ought to know that very well, because that is all the Liberal party have been doing during their existence. They have been rewriting the policies of the Conservative party ever since confederation. Not only that, but they have revamped many of the Conservative party's policies, have filched them from their niche of proven worth and time-honoured tradition and then have masqueraded them in a cloak of simulated free trade. What a predicament!

While I am at it, let me just say this to the pesky lot of free traders over there who ever since confederation have deluded the people by adopting all the protective policies which the Conservative party introduced in this country, disguising them or dressing them up, and then parading under them as if they were free trade policies. The references made by the Minister of Finance the other day when he was outlining a few of the outstanding finance ministers who had functioned in this great dominion and who did yeoman service, brought back to my mind certain things which happened and which cause one to do a little bit of thinking.

The minister mentioned the great finance ministers of the Liberal party since confederation. He also went on to mention some of the finance ministers of the Conservative party. One stood out in his mind and stands out in mine, because for a while I thought the day of political and intellectual honesty had departed. But here was a man who, because of his strong convictions at the time of the reciprocity campaign, left his party. Because he was conscientious, had firm convictions and a grasp of the circumstances of the situation he left his party and came over to the Conservative party.

The situation was repeated when the conscription issue was before the country in 1917. There was some soul-searching taking place, and there were those who walked from the government side of the house to the opposition side and those who crossed from the opposition side to the government side. They were showing the calibre of men there were in those days. Indeed, one does not like to see dissension taking place in any party or turmoil raising its ugly head in any organization, but it was heartening to see the action of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) when he came to the decision a while ago, in good faith, that he must come to a parting of the ways with his party. I said to myself, surely this is a return to the days when conscience possessed each member and they could not live with themselves unless they did the honest thing.

I hope there will be a return to probity of conduct when each one will follow the policies he feels in his heart he should support, when there will no longer be any camouflage in this house or in the country. I said to myself, well, I guess others have offered up a prayer with me that honesty shall prevail.

In the short time I have been in the house I have listened to individual members on the government side stand up and give voice to utterances that are nothing but pure Conservative doctrine and policy of protection. They talk about the Conservative party all the time as the high protection party, but they only want for the nation protection that will give work to our citizens, that will keep them working and keep the wheels of industry turning. Surely this is the time there should be a grand exodus from the government side of the house to this side, because if these members were honest with themselves over 40 per cent of them would be over here with us fighting for the things their people need, and not hiding behind a simulated free trade cloak that is nothing more than protection. They are all giving vent, in some shape or form, to some protectionist policy or protective idea for the good of their ridings or for the good of the country, and eventually the Liberal party will be found out.

There is something in Abraham Lincoln's statement years ago that you may fool some of the people all the time and all the people some of the time, but you will not fool all the people all of the time. I think the day is near at hand when the people will waken up to what the Liberal government is doing to this great dominion. I should like to review a few of the things that have been done by the Conservative party, not necessarily by the federal party but also by the party provincially. The reason I do so is that the Toronto Daily Star had an article a few days ago headed, "Mr. Frost Steals the Credit", which reads in part as follows:

> Three of Mr. Frost's 1955 election planks are old age pensions, housing and the St. Lawrence waterway.

The article goes on to say that the federal government was responsible for these things. Mr. Frost is not stealing the St. Lawrence waterway, national housing or old age pensions. These all had their genesis in the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Small: Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: Do you know any more jokes?

Mr. Small: I have heard donkeys bray before. I will give you a few more in case you want another laugh.

An hon. Member: Give us a good one this time.

Mr. Small: Sure. They consolidated the Canadian National Railways. Laugh that one off.

Mr. McIlraith: They were going to amalgamate them at one point, too.

Mr. Small: Unemployment insurance originated with Mr. Bennett. Then there is the province of Ontario, workmen's compensation and the hydro system. I suppose you will be delighted to hear that the national housing scheme, for which you take so much credit, germinated in the fertile brain of Tommy Church. You can laugh that one off too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Small: You are entitled to laugh. In the predicament you are in you need to laugh.

An hon. Member: Back to the barn, my boy.

Mr. Small: Let me cover the situation as far as the St. Lawrence seaway is concerned. This undertaking was not brought about overnight by the government.

An hon. Member: It has been there a long time.

Mr. Small: May I remind you that the fight for this project was commenced about the same time as the hydro project in Ontario, over 50 years ago. It was a Conservative government in the province of Ontario that kept it alive. There were a goodly number of conscientious Liberals identified with it from time to time, but the outstanding protagonist of the project in those years was Adam Beck. At that time the Evening Telegram was the most outstanding proponent of public ownership through its brilliant editor, John Robinson, and its owner, John Ross Robertson. They kept the campaign going over the years, and associated with it were Joe Oliver, Tom Foster, Tommy Church, Reg. Geary, Alf. McGuire, Tom Hannigan from Guelph and a number of other individuals from the United States, whose names I have forgotten for the moment, who were greatly interested in the deep-sea waterway.

The power barons in Montreal were most desirous of seeing that the project did not come to fruition. Through years of frustration these people carried on the fight. It was very discouraging, but finally those in the province of Quebec, who thought their interests were going to be hurt, decided they would throw in their lot, making it possible to reach an agreement. Then came the lobbyists in the United States who were determined that the seaway would not be built. The only reason the project is going ahead today is that we have to have the iron ore of Ungava transported through the seaway and across the great lakes to replace the high-class iron ore that has been exhausted in the United States Mesabi range. That is the only reason the St. Lawrence seaway is being constructed today. If you want to know why it is coming into being the reason is the efforts of Conservative governments in the province of Ontario under James Whitney, William Hearst, Howard Ferguson, George Henry, George Drew and Leslie Frost. They are the ones who should get the credit for the seaway. That is a basic fact. They can take the credit for it.

An hon. Member: A stout effort.

Mr. Small: I think I have said sufficient. I could go on. Probably I had better give you another little tidbit that will do your hearts good. In 1944 the Toronto Daily Star—

Mr. Knowles: Was the Conservative party responsible for that, too?

Mr. Forgie: May I ask the hon. member a question? Will he explain to the house, while he is on the question of hydroelectric power in the province of Ontario, why it is costing the people of the province $450 million to make the changeover from 25 to 60 cycles, and who was principally behind that, when he is talking about Sir Adam Beck?

Mr. Drew: Perhaps I might answer that on a question of privilege.

Mr. Forgie: I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. Drew: I should like to very much. It was the Liberal government of Mitchell Hepburn that held the thing up and created that tremendous cost.

An hon. Member: No, it was Sir Adam Beck.

Mr. Forgie: May I reply to the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Small: I think you should refrain from sticking your neck out any farther. Let me read you an editorial appearing in the Toronto Daily Star of July 25, 1944:

> On December 22, 1942, Mr. John Bracken made his radio debut as leader of the Progressive Conservative party. Said Mr. Bracken: "Every human being that is born into our society has a right to feel that he is welcome in it . . . and that, in the event of old age, ill-health or other misfortune overtaking him, he will have the assurance of a reasonable standard of social and economic security."
> In the following February, the Progressive Conservative leader made another speech in which he declared: "The human family is our greatest asset. There are 11,500,000 human souls in Canada. Some come into the world handicapped from the beginning. Many grow up ill-nourished. Some die at an early age. It is reported that there are a third of a million sick on the average every day, and that the sick bill comes to $300 million a year. We have made a poor job of conserving and developing our human resources. We must increase the preventive services. We must make ours a race of healthy and efficient men and women."
> These and many similar statements which Mr. Bracken has made in the period which has since elapsed are in accordance with the purpose which was allegedly to be served by reforming the old Conservative party. It was to become progressive. It was to favour "a reasonable standard of social and economic security". It was to support social service measures. Well, it has now the opportunity to support two of these—children's allowances and a national health service.

I want you to get this.

> But Conservative papers are already fearful about the cost, and there are indications that the party will oppose one or both of these bills in parliament.

Who is worrying about the cost? Is it the Conservative party that is worrying about the cost? Neither we nor any other party in the house except the Liberals are worrying about the cost.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Small: You sing a different tune when the matter is laid on your own doorstep. More than that, you have been sailing this Liberal scow with the chart that was given to you by William Lyon Mackenzie King in 1919 when he espoused, as one of the planks in his platform, a national health program. The clipping from which I have quoted was dated 1944, about 11 years ago, and the statement was made that the Conservative party would probably be opposed because of the cost. Yet 11 years later the government is singing the same old song, it is going to cost too much money. We could have told them that then, but they are waking up 11 years later to the fact that this is going to cost the taxpayers of Canada a lot of money. When will you get some sense and let a party that knows how run the country?

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): I am quite sure the hon. member for Danforth would have been very pleased if he could sing words of praise as a result of tax decreases levied in the 1954 Ontario budget. I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance on the fine budget he has presented to this house. I might say that his record showed that he was a master at deriving sound results, and he has not let us down with his first budget.

My remarks will take a very short time tonight, and I should like to direct them in support of those men and women who are employed in the penitentiaries of Canada. I should like to support their request for the five-day 40-hour week. I might say that I am not alone in giving this my support. I am sure my remarks are in accord with the opinion of the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir). He has spent a great deal of time investigating matters and putting forth his ideas. He has joined me in all the work I could do on behalf of these employees. I might say also that I appreciate the assistance which has been given to me by the amalgamated civil servants of Canada and more particularly the local representative at Kingston, Mr. Reid.

Referring to the situation in Kingston alone, may I say that it affects 350 employees at the Kingston penitentiary, Collins Bay and the women's penitentiary. It is not limited to the employees alone but affects the husbands and wives of these employees. As I understand government policy, it is that civil servants are given a five-day 40-hour week in areas where the five-day 40-hour week is prevalent in industry. This is the case in the city of Kingston in so far as industry and the larger companies are concerned. Civil servants in other departments in that city have been granted these working conditions.

I must admit that the Department of Justice has a problem on its hands, because these penitentiary officers are dealing with human beings. I suggest for these reasons that the type of men we need as guards, and which we have been fortunate in getting, are men of good character, alert, considerate and able to stand tension. In order to get this type of individual to work as a guard in the penitentiary we must be able to at least compete and have equivalent working conditions with other kinds of employment.

These men who work as guards and in other positions in the penitentiaries are working under hazardous conditions, and under great tension. As a result of tests it has been shown that the greatest cause of sickness and death amongst the employees of penitentiaries has been hypertension. This is another reason why these employees should have long periods of relaxation.

In order to put the five-day 40-hour week into effect I realize that additional employees would be required, with the resultant additional expenditure of funds. You cannot lock up human beings over the week end and let everybody go home. It has been suggested to me that there might be a shorter work week, without the inmates being locked up for additional time, if the shops were closed on Saturday morning, housekeeping activities such as haircutting, baths and clothing changes could be effected, and Saturday afternoon and Sunday left for recreational purposes. With a system of alternating the essential officers and increases in the number of custodial officers only, a shorter work week could be put into effect. Another point would be that the five-day 40-hour week would result in happy, contented guards, and I am quite sure this system would bring about, indirectly, the rehabilitation of the inmates. I am quite sure that happy, contented guards would impart the same feeling to the inmates of the penitentiary.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I appeal for the five-day 40-hour week for the penitentiary employees. I might conclude by saying that would be most difficult for any member of this house to explain to the wife and family of a guard, whose job is tense and hazardous and who cannot spend two days out of seven at home, why the man next door, who is employed at a desk job by another department of government, is able to spend two days out of seven at home with his wife and family. I hope this suggestion will obtain some results.

I wish to adjourn the debate, Mr. Speaker.

On motion of Mr. Henderson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow, and if it is concluded we shall go on with item No. 3 on the order paper concerning the Toronto Terminals Railway; item No. 4, the Veterans Benefit Act; item No. 5, the Government Employees' Compensation Act; item No. 10, the Precious Metals Marking Act and item No. 9, the Municipal Grants Act.

Business of the House

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister a question? When he says, "if the debate is concluded", does he refer just to the stage with the Speaker in the chair or to the consideration of the resolutions in committee?

Mr. Harris: No, just with the Speaker in the chair.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, May 10, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Eighth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

BROADCASTING—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf) moved that the first report of the special committee on broadcasting, presented on May 9, 1955, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS—REFERENCE OF REPORTS TO COMMITTEE

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I move:

That the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1953-54, tabled on February 23 last, together with the report of the board of grain commissioners for Canada for the year 1954, tabled on April 6 last, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SALE OF STOCKS IN UNITED STATES—REPORTED INVESTIGATION BY UNITED STATES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the government been informed by Senator Alexander Wiley, chairman of the American Senate foreign relations committee, that stock racketeers are peddling phony securities from Canada to American investors? If so, what action is the government taking, and are such phony securities being peddled in Canada?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Ordinarily communications of this sort coming from representatives of another country are addressed to the Department of External Affairs, and I think it would be more appropriate for my hon. friend, the acting minister, to reply to the question.

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has not received any official information to indicate that a United States congressional committee intends to investigate the sale of stocks from Canada in the United States. However, Senator Wiley, the minority leader in the Senate committee on foreign relations, wrote the Canadian ambassador on April 16 asking for the opinion of the Canadian government on ways and means by which our respective nations can further co-operate towards the end of protecting investors. I do not think it would be appropriate or helpful for me to comment on a possible Senate investigation until we are in receipt of definite information that such an investigation in fact is planned.

Mr. Argue: Is any investigation being considered in Canada?

Mr. Martin: I should think that normally that might be a question for the attorneys general of the provinces, but as this aspect of the matter more appropriately concerns the Department of Justice I might throw the ball back to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, this almost seems like a tennis game. My hon. friend the acting minister of external affairs is quite right in his suggestion. The responsibility for the administration of the security laws which are passed by the provinces is that of the provincial authorities, as is also the responsibility for enforcement of the Criminal Code. Therefore it is only in those cases in which extradition is being sought of some American offender who, having escaped into Canada, has been apprehended here, that the facilities of the federal department are invoked.

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION TO SECURE RELEASE OF 16 POLISH WAR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I put a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs? On April 26 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he had received from the Polish ex-combatants' association in Canada an appeal that the government intervene to seek the release of 16 war veterans who were leaders of the underground movement and who have served terms of imprisonment imposed by the Russian authorities, which terms have expired. May I ask the Acting Secretary of State if he has now received from the rally of the Canadian Polish congress held in Toronto last Sunday a similar appeal and, if so, what action the government proposes to take on this very meritorious appeal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have been advised that as yet no request of a formal character has come from any Canadian Polish organization in Canada to inquire about the fate of 16 Polish underground leaders who were arrested by the Soviet union in 1945. The government, however, is very much interested in finding out what has happened to these men. Some are believed still to be imprisoned in the Soviet union, although the sentences imposed upon them in 1945 should by now have expired, and others may be in jail in Poland. Hon. members may have noticed newspaper reports of a request made by the United States government to both Poland and the Soviet union on April 21 for information about the fate of these men. We expect to receive further information about the progress of this inquiry.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

AVAILABILITY OF COPIES OF REPORT OF PRELIMINARY MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister when copies of the report of the preliminary meeting of the federal-provincial conference, which has been printed and was distributed to the press last week, will be made available to the library, the distribution office and members of the House of Commons?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There was a report printed of the public meeting that was held. I was under the impression it was available to any member of either of the houses of parliament who might be interested in securing it. I will ascertain if that is the case, and if so I will let the hon. member know to whom he may apply for a copy.

POLIOMYELITIS

INQUIRY AS TO CONTROL OF VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister give assurance, in view of the experience in the United States in connection with polio vaccine, that all sources of vaccine allowed for distribution in Canada will be under strict government control?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I suppose by "government control" my hon. friend wishes to imply, has the government taken steps or is it taking steps to make sure that a strict investigation is made of the imported vaccine. The answer is yes.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When will the minister be able to make the announcement which, up until last year I think, was nearly always made before the end of April as to the initial price of wheat, oats and barley for this coming year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): My hon. friend is quite mistaken about that announcement usually being made in April. It is usually made about the first of July.

Mr. Harkness: It was last year, but it was not in previous years. The minister has not answered my question as to when we might expect that announcement.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will consult with the wheat board and later with my colleagues, and endeavour to make it as soon as conditions warrant.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO FINAL PAYMENT AND GRADES, 1953-54 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Possibly the minister will be able to say when the farmers will find out how much they are going to get per bushel for the 1953-54 wheat crop?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The cut-off was made on April 29, Mr. Speaker. The auditors of the wheat board are working night and day endeavouring to ascertain the value of each of the many grades of wheat. The price, of course, results from a mathematical computation and nothing else. As soon as the mathematics are finished, the results will be announced.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister allow this further question? Now that they are going to have a summary of the various grades of wheat that are on hand, would the minister be in a position, after they have that, to furnish the house and the country with a record of the amount of wheat of different grades that is actually in storage?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, Mr. Speaker, I take it my hon. friend is referring to his question on the order paper, and that question is being dealt with.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Monday, May 9, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. A. R. Lusby (Cumberland): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations to those numerous congratulations which have already been extended to our new Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) during the course of this debate, both upon the content of his budget and upon his very excellent presentation of it. It is natural, I think, that anyone from Nova Scotia should have a particular interest in the finance portfolio. First, of course, we have a strong Scottish leaven in our population, and as you know the Scot is a notoriously canny financier. Secondly, if you consider the list of distinguished men who have held that portfolio from time to time since confederation you will find that on that list there is a surprising sprinkling of the names of Nova Scotians, beginning with Tupper and coming down to as recent a time as Mr. Ilsley's. Consequently, we from Nova Scotia have a very particular interest in any incumbent of that position. I think I can pay the present minister no higher compliment than to say that on the basis of his budget he has left no room whatever for doubt that he is a worthy successor, not only to his immediate predecessor the Hon. Douglas Abbott, but also to all those capable and distinguished statesmen who have in the past carried out the onerous duties which now devolve upon him. I offer him my most hearty congratulations.

Compared with the budgets of the last few years this one in contemplating a deficit has an element, I think, of boldness, of experiment and of flexibility. Certainly it should silence that cry which we occasionally hear from the opposition benches that this administration is too set in its ways ever to depart from the beaten path. I think this is a departure. Then, too, in the light of the public reception which this budget has been given I think it has been amply demonstrated that this government is still intent upon carrying out the wishes of the people, a fundamental principle of our democracy. In spite of whatever the opposition may choose to say, my observations over the course of the last few weeks have convinced me this is definitely a popular budget. It has received considered approval from the vast majority of Canadians and, whatever opposition members may choose to think, the people are usually right—or else how could our democracy survive?

Indeed, when I contrast the public reception which has been accorded to this budget with the railing from the opposition benches against it—here I am not in the least impugning their right to rail, and perhaps it is even their duty—I am inclined to wonder how the opposition members could dare to trust in the validity of their own arguments. Naturally, when the budget debate is on, the order of the day in the opposition ranks is, "curse the budget", if I may say that. But I wonder if many of the opposition stalwarts, as they go to work loyally in this debate, have not entertained feelings somewhat akin to that ancient biblical character Balaam, incidentally a false prophet, when he was invited to curse Jacob and defy Israel. He did not fancy the assignment. In any event, to curse what the people have not cursed, to denounce what they have approved, is never an easy task in a democratic country such as this, and those who are attempting it are meeting, I think, with a deserved lack of success both within this chamber and without.

In my opinion, this budget has gained the approval of the intelligent and informed citizen in this country, not primarily because it represents a substantial saving to him in income and other taxes but because he is firmly convinced that these changes which it has brought about will achieve their primary purpose of stimulating the national economy. I agree with that belief; I expect these changes to exert a substantial influence in this regard by virtue of the additional purchasing power which they make available. As the minister indicated in presenting the budget, national fiscal policy is an important means of promoting economic stability and expansion. I am convinced that in his capable hands it will prove to be an instrument skilfully and successfully applied for that purpose.

There are one or two points upon which I am not entirely in accord with the provisions of the budget. For example, I should have preferred to see the special excise tax on soft drinks and the like eliminated or at least further reduced, so as to avoid any suggestion of unfairness. Not strictly in the budgetary field but arising out of the measures taken there, is the question whether, in view of the reduction of 5 per cent in the excise tax upon automobiles, the dealers across the country should not be given some relief in respect of any losses they have sustained in connection with vehicles purchased by them before the budget was brought down. I realize that the decision of the Department of National Revenue, as announced by the Minister of Finance, is in line with the usual policy in such situations. But I have since had representations from a number of dealers in my constituency, and I suppose the situation is very much the same all over the country, and I find that substantial amounts are involved in each case. And as between the practical impossibility of making a rebate in every case of a reduction in excise or sales tax and the exigencies of the situation in which the automobile dealers now find themselves, it is my thought that possibly, without setting any binding precedent, some suitable ground of compromise might be found in this instance.

In presenting the budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) made an announcement to which, as a representative from a maritime constituency, I pay particular attention. That was the announcement that a royal commission is to be appointed to examine carefully into and report upon the future economic prospects of this country. The minister has mentioned among the contemplated aspects of the commission's work such matters as the charting of probable developments both in our productive capacities and our external markets, an examination of population growth, and the magnitude and nature of our future requirements. Although, as he said, it is not intended that the commission shall make a long series of detailed policy recommendations, I assume that one of its fundamental purposes will be the assembling of material upon which the government may base its economic policies of the future.

It seems to me that this sort of national inventory and stock-taking at this time with regard to our economic future is an excellent project indeed. And in this connection I should like to point out that one of the greatest of the internal problems which this country faces, and must continue to face, is that of effectively maintaining a reasonably equitable balance of economic development and activity in all its parts. I said a moment ago that as a representative of a maritime constituency I took a particular interest in the minister's announcement that this commission was to be set up. Why? Because I see the possibility that through its work may come some positive indication as to how this government, in conjunction with our maritime provincial and municipal governments, and all other bodies which may be concerned, may best work in order to ensure for the maritime provinces their fair share in that mighty economic and industrial development and expansion already far under way in so many parts of this country—a development and expansion which, barring perhaps the disasters of war, will continue as surely as the sun is going to rise tomorrow.

In its over-all national aspects, our future is such as to rejoice the heart of every Canadian. But I need hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that it is of relatively little importance to an unemployed coal miner in Nova Scotia, for instance, to know that the oil industry in Alberta is flourishing, and its prospects are bright. And I have referred to the oil industry only as an example. It is imperative that some means be found, some policy adopted, which will ensure to the maritime provinces a fair share in the prospective national economic and industrial development, a reasonable level of prosperity as compared with those provinces which, by virtue of greater population, central geographic position—which is one of the most important items—endowment of natural resources, or other advantages which we in the maritimes lack, are now far in the lead.

Perhaps I should say here, Mr. Speaker, that I do not wish to be accused of pessimism. I am not at all unmindful of the many bright spots in the maritime picture. Just last night the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) gave us a description of the astounding development of base metal mining in northern New Brunswick, which is now in assured and immediate prospect. That is perhaps the most encouraging event that province has ever seen. The intensive search for similar metals in Nova Scotia, which has been carried on for some time and is still being carried on, gives ground for hope that at least to some extent we may enjoy a similar boon.

It is my firm belief, too, that in the years ahead our forest industries, our fisheries and our tourist trade will grow to be of increasing importance, and will reflect a far higher level of activity than has generally been the case in the past. Nor am I one to fear that any development in some other part of Canada—and at the moment I am thinking particularly of the St. Lawrence seaway development—taking the long-term view, will injure us in the maritime provinces. My view is entirely to the contrary.

But in certain aspects, notably—and I think this is the chief one—in the field of the development of manufacturing and other secondary industries, I think it is perfectly true to say that our economy has not overcome its traditional lag as compared with other parts of Canada.

Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Finance, to the government and to the House of Commons, that one of the first and fundamental objectives of any such royal commission as is proposed should be the assembling of all available facts and figures which may make possible the formulation of policies designed to redress, so far as conceivably it can be done, that regional imbalance of economic development, industrial activity and resulting opportunity and prosperity which now exists as between various regions of this country and which to my mind, as I have said, is one of the real internal problems which beset us as a nation.

In an earlier speech in the house during this session I made the suggestion that some permanent federal agency might well be set up or designated to keep under constant watch the peculiar difficulties with which we in the maritimes contend in our economic and industrial life and, acting in conjunction with all provincial or other bodies having the same interests, to devise and recommend such measures as from time to time may seem advisable further to overcome those difficulties.

The royal commission outlined by the Minister of Finance is not, I take it, intended to be a permanent body, or even a quasi-permanent body, although I assume its activities will be carried on over a considerable period of time. However, I do urge most strongly that it be directed during its lifetime to devote a full share of detailed attention to the economic prospects of the maritimes, the bright as well as the dark. Indeed, I think it might well set up a distinct subcommittee to deal with that aspect of its work.

One or two aspects of our maritime economic and industrial life, however, require in my opinion an entirely separate study. First of all is the state of the coal mining industry, which urgently—and I repeat the word "urgently"—requires immediate consideration. Such consideration would consist largely of correlating known facts and, upon the basis of those facts, making recommendations for action. The urgency of the situation is starkly emphasized by the threatened closing of No. 1-B colliery at Glace Bay, Cape Breton, which is one of the most important coal mines in the province.

We know of course that the first problem of the coal industry in Nova Scotia is the increasing competition from other fuels. We also know, however, that coal is still the chief source of fuel energy in Canada, and that in the event of war assured Canadian sources of supply would become vital at once to the safety of this country.

In certain fields, such as that of the coal fired gas turbine engine, there is the prospect—unfortunately at the present time it is not much more than that—that coal may again become fully competitive with oil. There is the possibility that new and more efficient processes may be discovered for the extraction on a commercially profitable basis of the endless variety of chemicals and other by-products which are known to be available from coal.

Then we have the often repeated forecast of the dominion coal board that by the middle 1960's, if our coal industry survives the difficult intermediate period, Canadian industrial expansion, in spite of the inroads of other fuels, will provide an assured market for coal sufficient to maintain activity in our mines at least at something like its present level. I hardly need add that a coal mine once closed is very unlikely to be reopened. After considering all these things, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the preservation of the Canadian coal mining industry—and I of course am thinking more of the Nova Scotia segment of it, upon which the livelihood of perhaps a fifth of our total provincial population depends—is a matter of national concern and merits the utmost efforts of all, management, labour, the provincial government and the federal government. Each one of these has its part to play if the industry is to be preserved.

If the forecast of the dominion coal board is correct—and I think for the present we must assume that premise—the problem is to tide the industry over the difficult years immediately ahead. I suggest a concerted effort by all those concerned to devise a workable plan for the preservation of the industry at approximately its present level over that period. Call it a ten-year plan, if you like. That may be slightly reminiscent of our friends in Russia, but certainly if such a plan can prevent poverty and unemployment in the coal industry you cannot find a better defence against the inroads of communism.

Another matter which is of some concern, at least of some interest, to the maritimes—and which I strongly think deserves a separate study by a separate royal commission—is the construction of the Chignecto canal. Such a study would determine once and for all the benefits which might reasonably be expected to accrue to this country and particularly to the maritimes if the canal became a reality. No such commission has been appointed by the federal government since the 1930's. In view of the great changes that have taken place, I believe a thorough study of present-day conditions should be made by such a commission. Once and for all it would settle the question whether the benefits which would accrue would justify the cost of construction and maintenance. I have urged before in this house the desirability of such a study by such a commission as the only proper means of settling this long-standing question. Only the other day my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy), whose constituency, when the canal is completed, will be on the bank opposite to mine, raised the matter at some length in this very debate. I have no wish to repeat the statistics which he has placed upon the records of the house from time to time, but I do wish to say that there are weighty arguments in favour of the canal which deserve the careful and sympathetic consideration of a competent and authorized body.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say I am happy to note that the budget makes several tariff reductions which will be of benefit to this country's farmers. Agriculture remains, in my opinion, the real foundation of this country's economy. I should like at this time also to commend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the further extension of the price support program for butter, a measure which is of very real assistance to the dairy farmer.

In my constituency the role played by the federal Department of Agriculture in the promotion of efficient farming methods is particularly well known because we have a dominion experimental farm at Nappan, on the very edge of the marshlands which are the subject of the maritime marshlands reclamation project. During the Easter recess I had an opportunity to visit the farm and to find out something about the work that is being carried on there in order to promote the raising of beef cattle, not only on those marshes but elsewhere in Nova Scotia. In fact, on that very day there was a well-attended group meeting there of farmers interested in these subjects. It was just a coincidence that I was there.

Since it is highly desirable that the most profitable use available shall be made of the reclaimed marshlands, I hope the department will continue to carry on and expand its research into the possibilities of beef raising on those lands as well as on other lands in Nova Scotia.

In conclusion, I should just like to say that the work of such a royal commission as the Minister of Finance has in contemplation would certainly be far from complete if it did not include as one of the most important items on its agenda a thorough study and assessment of the future prospects and possibilities of agriculture in every part of this country where arable land is available.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to traverse much of the ground which has been covered already. However, there are a number of matters to which I intend to refer which up to the present moment have not been dealt with or, if dealt with, have been dealt with only generally.

I want to say immediately to the minister that I congratulate him on having brought in his first budget; as Harris came in, Lord Keynes went out. There has been a complete transition in the philosophy that heretofore activated the government, a change of point of view, an alteration of direction and in effect an admission of the validity of the criticisms which we of the official opposition have been advancing in recent years.

At the beginning I am just going to say a word in regard to employment. Strangely enough, there has been no serious answer from the government regarding the unemployment problem that still fills the hearts of many Canadians, no answer whatever as to what is to be done now by the government, except a speech by the Prime Minister at the dominion-provincial conference as to what is to be expected at a further meeting to take place this coming fall between the federal and provincial authorities. For some reason or other the plans of 1945, the green book of that day and all that it stood for and the principles which in a measure contributed to the success of the government at the polls in two subsequent elections, now have been set aside, departed from, forgotten. Indeed, the great and abiding principles that were to bring about a new millennium in dominion and provincial relations now have been embalmed in the records of history.

I intend to make a general reference to the budget, and to mention a few suggestions as to matters that might be dealt with and should be dealt with at this time. First, I wish to make reference to a purely western condition. After years of drought periodically occurring in the western provinces, today we in Saskatchewan, and to a lesser degree in Manitoba, have suffered a disaster, the like of which I have not seen in the many years that I have been in western Canada. During the days of the 1930's larger areas were devastated by drought; now there is need of immediate action by the federal government because of floods. I see no reason why there should be such unnecessary delay in determining whether or not what has taken place is a national emergency. I believe that what has taken place in Saskatchewan, and to a lesser degree in Manitoba, is far and beyond any responsibility that should rest upon the provinces. The costs of rehabilitation should be assumed in considerable measure by the federal government.

There were great hopes on budget night. The minister made his speech and reports went across the country that income taxpayers would save 13 or 14 per cent across the board. However, when examined in the light of the actual circumstances and reviewed carefully, as it was by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) in his opening speech, the hopes of budget night have been dissipated in subsequent days.

The sales tax stays upon the needs of the home and upon almost everything but food. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat referred to the help being given to agriculture in the tariff reductions. There are a few reductions which will benefit limited areas of agricultural endeavour, but generally speaking the budget holds out no material benefit for Canadian agriculture or for reductions in the cost of production of Canadian agriculture.

As far as the income tax is concerned, the meagreness of the reductions will be realized only when the deductions commence to be made—small, trivial, unimportant. The reduction in the excise tax on automobiles is a worthy step, but it is only a step. With automobiles being the necessity they are, a 5 per cent reduction in no way meets the situation and the government ought to have gone considerably further than they did.

As I mentioned a moment ago, the sales tax remains, and the taxes on television and radio remain. The costs of government are on the increase in every department of government as far as I can read the record, with the exception of agriculture, defence production and national defence. There are increases in expenditures when there should be reductions. Agricultural expenditures are reduced by some $25 million; defence production by $28 million; and national defence by $118 million. The total reduction in expenditures this year for all departments is $95 million, which indicates that in the other departments of government there have been substantial increases.

I think one of the purposes of this budget was to spread plenty of little among many, not to attack the need for immediate action to be taken which would bring about the restoration of lost markets and provide an impetus to trade within our country by reducing costs through lower taxes, but simply to thinly spread a series of small benefits to the few. The budget will not have the effect of bringing about a restoration of impetus and an encouragement to initiative.

Some have spoken of Canada receiving a shot in the arm by the budget, but on examination it is shown that what Canadians have received from this budget is merely a scratch on the arm. There has been plenty of little spread among the many but without sufficient emphasis in any particular to encourage the expansion and development of industry.

Costs of government have not been cut. I should like to quote what Mr. J. A. Calder, president of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, said in a statement he made in St. John's, Newfoundland. The article states:

> He said that in five years, from 1948 to 1953, government spending rose to 18·1 per cent of the gross national product from 11·5 per cent.

He went on to point out that corporate taxes had not been reduced to any extent. I remember so well past years when Mr. Abbott referred to the dangerous situation when corporate taxation was exacting almost 50 per cent of the amount being made by corporate business. Such high taxation establishes a socialist system under the free enterprise system. Mr. Calder went on to say that there were not sufficient economies in government; there was no lowering of corporate taxes which would attract more venture capital which would mean increased productivity and lower prices, which would mean increased sales, which increased sales would more than offset any loss of government income.

The government has chosen to do very little at a time when drastic action is necessary. There are three or four things which I think the government could have done at this time and should have done. I have mentioned one, the removal of the sales tax upon the needs of the home. The cost of living continues to rise. According to the records of the bureau of statistics of May 4, there had been an increase in the previous month to 116·1 from 116. It reports rising prices for flour, tea, eggs, potatoes, fresh fruits, gasoline, etc. There can be no justification for the maintenance of the unusually high sales tax upon the needs of the home.

What business needs to meet the challenge of international markets, of improved techniques of production, is tax relief for programs of research. West Germany is once more in the family of nations, a step forward which may establish the certainty of peace in Europe, an act of faith which is already having its effect. It must be realized that West Germany is the third trading nation in the world, and as she will now be free to establish her steamship lines, her air lines and the like, the competition of recent months and years is bound to be intensified.

Last year business in the United States spent more than $3,000 million upon research designed to enhance competition in export markets, to preserve the domestic market against the competition of low-economy countries, and to meet the problem of dwindling resources. Canada can do no less. The government of this country should give encouragement to research development on the part of industry by extending the degree by which such expenditures may be deducted when determining liability for income tax. If Canadian industry is to compete it cannot afford to be a mere rubber stamp producer of commodities developed by research in the United States. Encouragement should be given to an extension of the field of research so that expenditures in that direction may be deducted as a proper expense.

Third, one means of encouraging the expansion of jobs is to encourage industry to expand its physical equipment in the form of buildings, machinery and the like. That can be achieved and was achieved during the days of war by accelerated depreciation allowances. The same course is needed now to provide the encouragement that expansion will assure and also to increase employment within this country.

Statisticians say that it requires a million dollars of capital investment to provide 117 extra jobs. If all the savings that are to be effected this year by the 2 per cent reduction in corporation tax were translated into jobs, it would mean an increase of only 3,000 jobs in toto. If the government would give encouragement to industry to expand in this way, many jobs would be created.

Fourth, I regret that the minister has not seen fit to reform the obsolete, unjust and unjustifiable provisions of the succession duty act. There is an act that represents in some particulars a disregard of the rights of the individual. There are anomalies. Anyone who has had experience with the operation of the act knows of them. There is the injustice that affects many people in this country, whereby if one's share is $1 less than $50,000 there is no liability, but if it is $1 over $50,000 the full amount becomes liable to the impact of the tax. There are also provisions regarding pensions and annuities being capitalized which were never intended to be interpreted in the manner in which they are today. They have the effect of operating as a bar to the development of our country and also a discouragement to those who, through thrift, endeavour to better themselves and protect their dependents.

There are many members of this house with ability that is not being used, reservoirs of capacity that are available, who understand the operation of the succession duty act. A committee could be set up of such members who would hear the representations made by the officials of his department and of the Department of National Revenue and it could recommend changes in the act that would maintain to a greater degree the equities that should prevail and would also assure to a greater extent justice in the administration of the act.

Next, I am one of those who believe that, to discourage the drift toward socialism, something should be done to encourage individuals in this country to save so as to build up their own pension systems, by permitting them within limits to deduct the annual payments they make for the purpose of providing themselves with retirement pensions. I went into considerable detail in this matter with one of the outstanding chartered accountants in western Canada, M. E. G. Gery. I would like to place before the minister not only my suggestions but those that have come from representative organizations of chartered accountants across this country.

Mr. Harris: I have them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: At the present time the employer may deduct a total contribution not to exceed $1,500 of approved schemes; for past services an additional amount regulated by the terms of the approved scheme; and in respect of retirement allowance, a lump sum payment made in the year of retirement. The employee may deduct a percentage, usually 5 per cent of the employee's wage, but in no case exceeding $1,500; and, as far as past services are concerned, an amount not exceeding $1,500 a year in respect to past services when he was not a contributor.

The privilege of tax deferment on the above basis is open only to employees of employers who have arranged for an approved scheme. The result is that many private individuals across Canada are denied an opportunity to follow a similar system—farmers and fishermen, small business concerns operated chiefly by proprietors or partners, professional men practising singly or in groups, and employed persons whose employers have not provided an approved pension scheme.

I feel that something should be done in order to encourage people of this type to do what those under approved pension systems may do, namely purchase now for their security in the future. I believe that a system could be evolved, and I would be prepared to submit to any committee set up for the purpose a series of suggestions in that regard which would bring about equality with those in approved pension plans for those who do not come within such schemes; so that many people who are now denied the opportunity of doing that which employers and employees under approved schemes are able to do would thereby be encouraged to save and make provision for themselves for the days ahead.

I know one of the criticisms of the plan I suggest, that one type of saving should not be singled out for tax exemption. Well, it is being done now in the case of approved schemes. It is argued that a widespread extension might seriously affect the economy of the country in lowered tax revenues. My answer is that the plan evolved would have to be within restrictions and subject to regulations.

There are others who claim that it would deny expansion in our country, that it would dry up the sources of moneys that are necessary for development purposes. My answer to that argument is that such pension funds would be available to be loaned to industry and the like, in much the same way as loans are made by credit unions. I believe that, if this type of thing were brought into being and extended to the groups I have mentioned, it would be an encouragement to savings, it would pay off dividends in the future, and it would bring about equality which is being denied, when one section of the community is allowed to do this while others are denied the opportunity and the privilege of so doing.

I suggest those four matters for consideration by the government, matters that do not receive any attention to speak of in the budget. I know there are those who say we can soak the rich in this country, and that corporate taxation can be continued indefinitely. I can think of nothing that would encourage greater development today, when it is so necessary and when we face deficit financing, than a very considerable reduction in the amount of corporate taxation and an increase in the personal exemption for income tax purposes.

Look at the record, which reveals how the purchasing power of money has gone down in recent years. Compare 1938 with today. On the basis of 1938 an income of $2,000 has a purchasing power today of $1,103. Present income of $3,000 has a purchasing power of $1,567, and a present income of $4,000 has a purchasing power of $2,020. An income of $6,000 today has a purchasing power of $2,955, in every case after taxes have been paid. That indicates the answer to those who speak of the higher prices the farmer receives for his wheat compared with the prices in 1938. The other day the hon. member for Calgary North dealt with that matter and showed that one of the reasons agriculture now finds itself in a difficult position is the fact that the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is less than it was in 1938.

There is nothing in the budget to indicate a realistic approach to conditions in Canada The government sits in its supremacy. It does not even accept any more the recommendations of its own party friends in convention assembled. When only recently the national executive of the Liberal party recommended something that we of the opposition have suggested over the years, the setting up of an administrative body to govern relations between the C.B.C. and the private stations, the answer given by the Prime Minister the next day, using the words that I had placed before him in the question, was that such a body was not desirable or necessary.

Demands for reductions in taxation have come to the government not only from the opposition groups but also from various Liberal organizations across the country, and the attitude of the government is in effect, "After all, we know what is best." The budget indicates that the government follows the myth of its own self-satisfied perfection which its publicists across Canada so often indicate it possesses, and refuses to act realistically. There is nothing in the budget that will start the wheels of industry turning. There is nothing that will bring back into employment the thousands who are unemployed.

Do we receive any reply from the Prime Minister when we ask him what is to be done for labour and the farmer and industry? What stand are you going to take, what encouragement are you going to hold out to the Canadian people? We have gone through a long budget debate. No minister has yet stated during this debate what is to be done to encourage the expansion of employment in this country. The attitude of the government is the attitude of those who, during the days of private buccaneering in the United States, used to say, "The public be damned". That has been the attitude of this government in these days. We have wondered on occasion why the government resents being criticized. They do resent it.

A few weeks ago Mr. Duncan MacTavish stated in Edmonton at a party meeting that there is no danger in the one-party state as long as the one party contains such fine men as there are in the government now. One can only say that the government did not regard that as eulogy. They regarded it as unadulterated fact. At the national Liberal federation meeting, in the accents of dictatorship, he asked himself some questions. What about these opposition members? They speak of unemployment, and they do this in the hope of improving their chances of capturing the federal government. Has it become one of the major sins in a democracy for the opposition to believe that ultimately it will become the alternative government? Then he went on to say:

> Mischievous little boys who play with fire and cause public damage can be punished . . . But mischief committed in the guise of free speech... escapes the punishment it deserves . . .

Shades of Mackenzie King, Mr. Speaker! These are the accents of dictatorship. These are the thoughts of those too long in power. They are not only the views of Mr. MacTavish but also the views of the Prime Minister. Recall that he has not disavowed that outrageous doctrine enunciated by the president of the national Liberal federation. In a speech he made on the same occasion the Prime Minister, dealing with the criticism of unemployment, said:

> That sort of talk can easily lead to defeatist thinking and can destroy that buoyant confidence which has been so large a factor in building our nation.

Not only did the Prime Minister not disavow what Mr. MacTavish said, he actually adopted it when he himself spoke. These are dangerous views on the part of any government and reveal what happens when governments become all-powerful and remain in power beyond the term that governments ordinarily remain in power. I ask the Prime Minister: Is he going to tell the people of Canada before this debate is over what is going to be done, what plans he has in mind, what hope there is for the unemployed?

The Minister of Finance has his own views on the subject. He has even become saturated with a similar philosophy. He spoke the other day at Toronto and I have his words here. He said—and he can deny it if I misquote him in any way—that he did not believe there was much unemployment.

Mr. Harris: I did not say that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will find the quotation in a moment. He said he did not believe there was much unemployment because if there was the government would not be as popular as it is. I hope I have the quotation available. It has to do with a speech the minister made in Toronto within the last two or three days on the subject of unemployment, and is taken from the Toronto Star. I had it before but I do not have it at the moment. However, I will certainly see that the minister gets it so that he will be in a position to deny its accuracy. He could not understand that unemployment was as serious as it had been pictured to be. He could not understand that situation at all. According to the Toronto Daily Star this is what the minister said:

> Turning to the federal field Mr. Harris said he did not think unemployment in Canada is as bad as opposition spokesmen say it is.

Opposition spokesmen say so, and so do the bureau of statistics and the employment bureau.

> "If it were, if, as the opposition claims, people are really suffering, which I doubt, then I would like to ask the opposition how it is the government retains its popularity."

In other words, instead of admitting the seriousness of the situation as revealed by the bureau of statistics the minister says in effect, "It cannot be because, after all, look at us—a government the epitome of all popularity, the acme of all the perfections." When the people of Canada need a shot in the arm, they receive a scratch on the arm. Then the minister went on to say this:

> "I have never known a time when any grievances the people had were not reflected in their opinion of the government of the day."

That is a sorry answer to the unemployed across this country. As to the future, they are simply told that the records may reveal unemployment but so far as we are concerned, look at us; we know what is right and are the personification of all popularity.

Mr. Calder suggested the need of economy in government; what is being done in that regard? The minister mentioned economies of some $4 million out of non-defence expenditures amounting to some $2 billion. No serious endeavour whatever has been made to meet the situation. One could quote examples, and the opportunity will come when the estimates are being considered.

A few years ago Gladstone, that revered leader of Liberalism, said "Public economy is a public virtue." A mere $4 million cut off such vast expenditures outside of defence and defence production does not indicate that serious regard for economical government that ought to characterize good government. The explanation given by the minister for the reduction in national productive income was the failure of the western wheat crop last year. Trade has disappeared and our wheat exports have been decreasing during the last year. They went down last year, although in the last few weeks there has been some degree of increase over and above last year's corresponding period.

What do we find so far as the farmers are concerned? The Canadian farmer faces one of the most serious challenges to his continuance. His costs are rising and the prices of the things the farmer has to sell are going down. During the five years between 1949 and 1954 farm costs in Canada increased by 17 per cent; living costs by 13 per cent; and farm prices in general across the board were down by approximately 21·6 per cent. The explanation given for this condition is the failure of the western farmers' wheat crop, and that is nothing but an excuse.

The western farmer suffered a serious crop failure in 1954. The farmers' income in 1954-55 has been maintained through the sale of the wheat and other grain products that were produced earlier. It will not be until this year that we will begin to realize the terrific impact of last year's failure of the western farmers' crop on the Canadian economy. One of the main reasons for the depression in the national income last year was the fact that we lost our markets abroad for wheat. The annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway which came out in the middle of April so states in regard to the reduction of the traffic volume:

> The greater part of the reduction in traffic volume was accounted for by a decrease of about one-third in the movement of grain and grain products because of reduced export demands.

The Regina Leader-Post says this:

> The government budget white paper confirms that wheat export difficulties were the major factors in the dislocation of our economy in 1954.

I emphasize those words. It was not a fall-off in farm production in 1954 that caused the farmers' reduced income; but was the result of the government's inability to sell wheat. Grain exports dropped by almost $300 million in 1954, an amount greater than the total decline of all exports in 1954 of $223 million. While exports of motor vehicles, primary iron and steel and defence materials also declined, there were significant offsetting increases in other export categories. I repeat that it was not the failure of the western wheat crop in 1954 that reduced national income; it was not climatic conditions in western Canada in 1954, but it was the failure of this government to take any effective action to assure the preservation of our wheat markets abroad.

As of March 9, according to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, 143,900,000 bushels of wheat are stored on Saskatchewan farms. Whenever agriculture suffers and the farmers' income goes down, it immediately disrupts the economy everywhere within the dominion. In 1953 Canadian exports of wheat and wheat flour amounted to 385 million bushels; in 1954, they amounted to 255 million. Because there was no export market there was no sale for the farmers' wheat at the local elevator. During seven months, the period for which I have been able to secure the information, from August to February in 1952-53, there were 207·8 million bushels of wheat exported by Canada. In 1953-54 for the same seven-month period the export was 152·7 million bushels. In 1954-55, for the same seven months, the export was 152 million bushels. In other words, the fall-away since 1952-53 in both years for the seven months was approximately 54 million bushels. Canada's carryover on August 1, 1953, was 369·2 million bushels, and on August 1, 1954 it was 582·7 million. So it is all nonsense to explain that the reason for the fall in the national product was in large measure due to the failure of the wheat crop on the prairies last year.

The situation may also be viewed from another angle, a reference to the actual sales of wheat made by farmers between August 1 and April 20 in two succeeding years. Between August 1, 1953, and April 20, 1954, the sales amounted to 270,080,000 bushels while between August 1, 1954 and April 20, 1955 it was 167,490,000. I repeat that in large measure the fall in national income was due to the fact that the western wheat farmer took the rap, through the failure of this government to provide and maintain markets abroad.

Again, I make the appeal I have made on other occasions, for the intensification of the campaign to sell our wheat in the markets of the world. How is this to be done? That is a problem, a tremendous problem; but it is worthy of note that when in 1950 and 1951 this party made motions in the house to the effect that there should be convened British commonwealth trade conferences, and pointed out the danger to the markets of Canadian farmers in respect of wheat and other grains, each and every member supporting the government ridiculed the suggestion and voted down the motions. I believe one thing that could be done even now, with Australia, the United States and the Argentine securing a larger share of the world wheat market than they secured proportionately three years ago, would be for Canada to begin now to place in each of our embassies—and they are spread all over the world—agricultural market representatives whose duties would be the intensification of a campaign for the sale of our wheat.

Sir, my time has expired, and I will now conclude.

(Translation):

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, it is only proper that, at the outset, I should speak in the language of the majority of the people of the province of Quebec, being one of its representatives, for it is the language of people who have had such a glorious part in the development of this country.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, I was born in Acadia, in that region now known as the province of Nova Scotia, a fact of which I am proud. I have however chosen to live in the province of Quebec, where I have been residing over the past 30 years.

My French being far from excellent, my colleagues—those from this side of the house at least—will no doubt allow me to continue my remarks in my native tongue.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, there are few observations of real value that a member entering this chamber for the first time can probably make. Your new member for St. Lawrence-St. George has made a solemn pledge with himself that certainly, for at least one session—this session—that member shall not use up the 40-minute allotment, but shall restrict himself, as well as he can, within, say, 15 or 20 minutes. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, when hon. members opposite see the hands of the clock approaching 20 minutes after four I ask that they call "time" upon this speaker.

The member for St. Lawrence-St. George is essentially and basically a man of peace, but he suggests that on this sunny afternoon we declare war. Now, I do not mean by that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) should enter the chamber and state solemnly that no longer are we at peace with a certain country. But, with greatest respect, sir, and fellow members, following the example set by the government on many occasions, could we not, man for man and regardless of party, renew our declaration of war upon waste of human personality in Canada, waste of effort, waste of our great natural resources and, without wishing to show any disrespect to hon. members to whom I have listened for four months—and, may I say, with great profit to myself—waste of time.

Without any desire to transgress the rule I have laid down for myself, and not wishing to waste even one of the 20 minutes I have allotted to myself, on some future occasion I should like to pay my respects and the respects of the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George to at least three of my predecessors—those since 1921. I refer first to the distinguished Sir Herbert Marler, the great brother of a distinguished member of the present cabinet. Then there comes to my mind a name which, when uttered, may cause some of my confreres on this side to shudder—that great and distinguished giant, Charles Cahan who, in the traditions of his party and according to his lights, at his particular time made, as did Sir Herbert Marler, and other predecessors, great contributions in this chamber. Last but not least—because only too recently has he moved from the public scene—the man who in this chamber from the dread days of 1944 on to 1954 administered with relentless devotion not one department but two great departments. You all know his name, because it is a simple one: Brooke Claxton.

In any forum of debate in which human beings congregate we all, perhaps with some rare exceptions—and they may be on the other side, where it may be alleged there is the greater degree of intelligence—make mistakes in our terms. May I at the outset pay my respects to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because, listening to him a good deal, I have concluded that he is a great repository of information. We recall that when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) was making that informative address about a week ago, the hon. member interjected, "Are your figures in constant dollars?"

How frequently in all forms of debate, not only in the House of Commons but throughout Canada, do we fail to compare dollar with dollar when we begin making comparisons in modern life. We also frequently fail to recognize the significance of the terms we use—and nowhere more frequently than in this very chamber. For instance, not always do we recognize what you and I and our fellow citizens mean by the word "government". While in the technical sense we know what a government or a cabinet is, many of us, while we walk on the street, read our newspapers or chat with our friends, fail to realize that when we ask the government to make expenditures it means that somebody somewhere in Canada has to pay a price, and usually vast numbers of us do.

Again, and I shall not go on for long because I want to be well within my limited time, the term "wealth" is used so frequently that people believe one can stretch into the air and pull down currency or gold. But wealth, after all, is a very simple thing to understand. It is human work or productivity, mechanical or other forms of power, applied to natural resources.

In the ambit of just those few terms may I, Mr. Speaker, with some temerity as a freshman in this house, now relate my remarks to four speakers on the opposite side? I refer first of all, with great respect, to a friend and colleague of long standing, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I regret that he is not here at this time. I wish he were so that I could direct my remarks to him, face to face. He said, as reported at page 2947 of Hansard:

> You may be able to do it on budget night and get away with it, but it catches up with you.

Later on he said:

> The press is catching up. It is interesting to note that a loyal, stout-hearted supporter of the government—I think I am describing them correctly—the Toronto Star, ignores the minister's exhilaration and evidently feels, indeed it calls, the outlook uncertain.

Then he quotes the Toronto Star as follows:

> "Mr. Harris' maiden speech will come as a disappointment to the many Canadians who hoped it would stimulate production and reduce unemployment."

I continue to quote, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Greenwood said:

> I continue to read from the Star: "Taken as a whole it is really an unimaginative stand-pat budget that in itself will provide little relief from our present economic problem.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has almost within the confines of his constituency two great papers, perhaps some would say not as great as those which are published in another large metropolitan city of Canada, but they are very good papers. One of them is the Montreal Gazette which has, if I correctly observe Canadian history, never been known to be tremendously enthusiastic over the people who now sit on this side of you, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I rather think, if my political history is right, that the destinies of that great paper for many years were presided over by Mr. Robert Smeaton White, who was a venerable member of another political party in this house.

May I digress for a moment to say that the editor of the Montreal Gazette long adorned our press gallery. I refer to Mr. John Bassett. When I met one of his associates a day or two after the election—Mr. Bassett happens to be one of my neighbours and constituents—he asked me how I liked the editorial that had appeared two or three days before November 8, which made very kind reference to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) and myself. I said: "If my friend, now the Minister of Transport, and the present member for St. Lawrence-St. George, had died and passed to their fathers on November 8, we should have got, I suspect, a much longer obituary in your Montreal Gazette than we did in your editorial, but it was very kind and very helpful."

This is the editorial from the Montreal Gazette of April 6, the heading is:

> Hon. Walter Harris has decided to use falling taxes as a weapon with which to fight falling revenues. It is a courageous course.
> Particularly notable in last night's budget was the decision to cut corporation taxes.
> This is an important decision, for it shows a sound perception of the role of corporations as the foundation of Canada's prosperity.

I now come to the end of the editorial:

> But the important thing is that Mr. Harris has shown a readiness to count upon Canadians, in their business and as persons, to take a hand in improving their own future, and he has made some leeway in government tax demands to enable them to do so. This is a far sounder approach than to try to improve conditions by still more government activity and a still more entangled tax jungle.
> The losses that the government will take in its revenues, as a result of the tax cuts, are regarded by Mr. Harris as a calculated investment in the country's future. The economic lift they will give the economy may, in due course, produce new sources of revenue, by broadening the base.
> This is, surely, the right approach. And surely it comes at the right time.

May I now turn to another section of the chamber. Again I regret that the hon. member is not present, not that he would gain much from my remarks, but I fail to see the leader of the party of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a supporter. I refer to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). As I read the debates of last year I find that he made a mistake in a tax observation, and he repeated, and made doubly bad, this year that very same mistake. May I, with all due deference to a member who has great intelligence, a great heart and great personal integrity, I am sure, say that he failed to tell the whole truth in this chamber when he dealt with this particular subject. I should like to refer to page 2957 of Hansard. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in dealing with the dividend credit said:

> In 1949 the tax credit allowed receivers of dividends from Canadian corporations was first introduced. In 1953 this tax credit was increased to 20 per cent producing, as I pointed out at the time, the fantastic result that a married man with no children who received all his income from clipping coupons could receive up to $9,760 free of personal income tax. That was the position in the 1954 taxation year.

Then he went on to say that as a result of the changes this year the minister will have increased the $9,760 free of income tax to $11,133.33, which the coupon clipper may receive in dividends before paying any personal income tax. I particularly note the use of the word "personal"; but may I suggest that some people throughout Canada, and in fact some members of this house, may be under the impression that from a tax point of view that is the whole story. I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is not. I shall try to demonstrate that in a few sentences.

a table and he assumed that this particular taxpayer to whom he referred had unearned income of approximately $11,000. Now, there is exactly where certain terms that I referred to earlier are misunderstood. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, my fellow colleagues of the bar will join me when I say that a corporation is a legal fiction; it is an artificial creation. But to create the wealth, the goods or the profits which a corporation must produce you must have men and individuals to do so.

Let me make the case extreme. Assume that the company is owned by one individual. Before that individual gets this unearned income, being dividends of approximately $11,000, there must be net profits of the company, and before there are any net profits there must be gross profits. It is relatively simple so far. But the profits, after certain deductions if you like, are shared, as every member of this house should know, by the taxpayers of Canada, sometimes called the government. Up to now all other taxpayers shared in those profits to the extent of 49 per cent, leaving this one individual who owned the company, who gave forth his efforts in establishing the corporation, to get the remainder of the net profits, 51 per cent. So in order to produce approximately $11,000 of dividends this individual had to have his corporation earn profits of $21,830, of which his fellow Canadian taxpayers got $10,696. That is the amount which our friend the shareholder had to pay indirectly, through the corporation, to his fellow taxpayers of Canada.

The example given by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would have been more appropriate if under his heading of coupon clippers instead of "none" as the tax paid by him, the member had shown this $10,696 as a comparable figure. Mind you, no man in this chamber will stand up and say that I am on the side of the coupon clippers only rather than of all those who make the real wealth of the country. The member for St. Lawrence-St. George has justified his own living by good, hard manual work. I do not share in the criticism, and I will stop it in advance, from anyone who says this example is given to protect the coupon clipper.

This coupon clipper pays to his fellow taxpayers, through the government, $10,696, whereas the salaried worker or the wage earner pays, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has well said, $1,817. Our friend who is the shareholder of the corporation pays approximately six times as much after assuming the risk of losses as well as profits, after establishing the company with initiative and pioneering spirit, and engaging the salaried man and other wage earners.

[Mr. Richardson.]

I suggest that when we, the member for St. Lawrence-St. George as well as others, enter into debate here we go a little further in explaining, not only to ourselves—perhaps it will not matter too much if some of us are half-educated or not—but to our fellow Canadians throughout the length and breadth of the country, because without having the accurate facts we can never arrive at correct opinions.

I pass on from that side of the house back again to the coupon clippers, of whom perhaps you may find some over here. I come now to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and I am sorry that he is not in the chamber as I should like to make some observations in respect of his remarks. I turn to page 3393 of Hansard of May 3. First of all the hon. member for Eglinton had a description for the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris); he designated it as a budget of crumbs. Let me answer that immediately.

Look at the tables which were placed upon Hansard on the night the budget was delivered and you will find that the $2,500 taxpayer, after the new tax rates apply, will have for himself $2,474. Hon. members may argue as to whether that is a good remuneration, but that is not the point at the moment. He will have $2,474. Instead of regarding the savings as crumbs, this taxpayer, if he translates his remuneration into loaves of bread at 20 cents a loaf will find that he has no less than 12,370 loaves. I do not suggest that man can live by bread alone, but when one with the intelligence of the person designated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) as a fellow classmate rises in his place among so-called mature men—there are no older ladies in the house—and says that this is a budget of crumbs, I suggest that on budget night the Minister of Finance left with that particular taxpayer nearly 13,000 loaves of bread.

Let me get more serious. The hon. member then dealt with the sales tax at page 3395 of Hansard when he recalled an item which had appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of August 6, 1935, which referred to the sales tax as being a fine for selling and buying. The hon. member for Eglinton then went on in his own inimitable manner to say:

> Yes, a fine for selling and buying; and that was at a time when the sales tax was at less than half its present rate. They—> —have more than doubled it since that time. They have more than doubled the fine on buying and selling.

Meaning us over here.

Let me answer that. I do not want to document this address any more than necessary and I hope hon. members will be patient with me. This will be next to my last documentation. If you will refer to any standard textbook on taxation you will find that while the administration from 1935 to the present day did increase the sales tax rate from 6 per cent to 10 per cent, which is an increase of approximately 66⅔ per cent in a period of about 20 years, the party to which the hon. member for Eglinton owes his allegiance during the last term it was in office, from 1930 to 1935, increased the sales tax from 1 per cent to 6 per cent, an increase of 500 per cent. Who doubled the fine on buying and selling?

One last reference, and I now come to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). As reported on page 3007 of Hansard of April 20 the hon. member, as was his right, went on to criticize the budget. As a matter of fact, in my humble opinion the hon. member for Eglinton, the hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Broadview all made constructive suggestions which we will have an opportunity to say more about when we are dealing with the legislation. Speaking about the reduction in the personal tax the hon. member had this to say:

> That kind of tax reduction is not going to give anybody the incentive to go out and buy a television set, a washing machine, a refrigerator, a stove, a suit of clothes, or any of the things produced by the industries that are hardest hit today.

And again:

> The 2 per cent reduction in corporation tax was welcomed by industry but—

And further on:

> It will also do very little to stimulate plant expansion, because it will merely mean a saving of $10,000 to a company earning a profit of $500,000 before taxes.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member has had 20 minutes. The hon. member asked us to call his attention to the time.

Mr. Richardson: Thank you very much. I shall sit down in just a moment. I know I have had 20 minutes but I will stop in just a minute. The May 5 issue of Financial Counsel published in Toronto and Montreal had this headline:

> T.V. Boom Continues to Roar Ahead.
> The booming industry of manufacturing television sets shows no signs of slowing down despite the hectic pace of expansion in recent years. In the first quarter of 1955, a new sales record of 116,462 sets valued at $51,419,791 was established.

Then on page 3 of the same issue we find an item stating that Canadian International Paper Company is to erect a $2 million plant, and the paragraph continues:

> Another step in the capital expenditure program of Canadian International Paper Company will soon be taken when a start is made in the near future on a $2,000,000 plant at Pointe Aux Trembles, Quebec, just east of Montreal. This new plant will produce special containers and will employ several hundred people when it has reached the final stage, according to latest reports.

And again:

> Present building program involves an increase in pulping capacity and installation of the world's largest machine for making kraft liner board at La Tuque.

Mr. Speaker, I shall finish now if you will allow me just one minute of my remaining 18 minutes' time.

The budget is of course a report to the shareholders of Canada, who are all taxpayers including ourselves. I have two suggestions. One is a relatively simple and inexpensive way to let all of us taxpayers know exactly what we are paying in the way of income tax and for what purpose. On the reverse of the assessment notice which goes out to all of our four million taxpayers in Canada there could, without any great expense in printing, be put the seven major items of expenditure; defence, welfare and pensions program, public debt charges, provincial payments, resources and industrial development, national overhead and miscellaneous. Against those seven descriptions there could be placed the exact amounts that are spent. Another column could show precisely the percentage, for example, about 40 per cent for national defence.

There could be another—the last—column on the right where any taxpayer, even those who are in this chamber, with a pencil, may relate his percentage which is to be paid for national defence. If it is estimated at 40 per cent, the taxpayer will know that out of his total tax bill of $1,000, $400 will be spent on his behalf for defence. That is a relatively cheap price at the moment to pay for security within Canada. Each taxpayer will know precisely what his share of the income tax burden is with regard to national welfare benefits, with regard to the debt charges and other features of our national administration.

Although at first glance this may seem a little strange, many taxpayers in Canada are anxious to have—and certainly need—information of this character. I do not believe we have any interest in prolonging the debate here, but my own view is that we should inform the taxpayers who are our shareholders. I submit that the Minister of Finance and his department might give this suggestion full examination.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Prince Albert this afternoon. I want to say that, as the member representing the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, I think it would be the wish of my constituents that the Minister of Finance give careful and renewed consideration to making the amount of $50,000 totally exempt in respect of all succession duty assessments. I subscribe very largely also to the view of the hon. member for Prince Albert that pension plans for self-employed people should have come long ago in our Canadian legislation.

I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, to fellow members for overlooking my transgression of my self-set period of 20 minutes, and I now resume my seat.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat will realize now that he may have been somewhat rash when he began his speech with the statement that he was only going to take 20 minutes, as he spoke for about double that length of time.

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member for Prince Albert?

Mr. Quelch: In regard to the budget, it is interesting to note that from 1945 to 1953 we had in this country generally a sellers' market, bringing an expansion in both production and income. The job of the Minister of Finance during that period was comparatively easy. The economy was forging ahead, and it was only necessary for the minister to apply the brakes from time to time. Today the economy has slowed down and there is a very definite need to push sales in order to maintain the expansion in both production and income.

I would say that the present period provides the first real test of the government's ability to maintain an expansion of production in the face of somewhat adverse conditions. One might say that today the home market has been very definitely neglected. I think the Minister of Finance will agree that the home market is the best market we have, because it has to absorb an amount of goods equivalent to the total production of the country. I would also say it is the best market, because it is the only market over which we have absolute control. But it has been sorely neglected in the past, and it can be argued that it is being neglected today.

Certainly we have in Canada today a tremendous potential market consisting of the people receiving low incomes. The minister stressed the sustaining force of welfare payments. I think the minister will agree that those payments could be still further expanded without laying themselves open to the charge of extravagance. Expanding those payments would strengthen their sustaining force in so far as the economy is concerned.

I regret that the Minister of Finance did not see fit to reduce the sales tax, which would have helped to expand the purchasing power of those people who are in greatest need of having their purchasing power expanded. It would also have helped to expand sales by reducing the prices of commodities, and that would have been of special value in the international market, because we are constantly being told that our prices are not competitive.

In his address the minister blamed the short wheat crop for the decline in the Canadian economy. Obviously that cannot be the case. By the end of 1954 we had not even sold the 1953 crop. If we should happen to have another crop failure this year I think the government will realize the seriousness of the situation because, having had a crop failure last year, another crop failure this year would bring about a drop in farm income which would be exceptionally serious.

What the minister should have said was that the decline in the Canadian economy was due largely to the drop in the farmers' income. Agriculture today is undoubtedly facing very difficult times, owing to falling prices, the difficulty in selling farm produce, and adverse weather conditions.

The bureau of statistics, in its publication "Farm Net Income, 1954", demonstrates the effect of these conditions. It is important to note that the figures I am quoting are of net income. Whenever you refer to the situation with regard to agriculture you should always use the net income figures rather than gross income, because gross income in itself has little significance. You must take into consideration the cost involved and what is left afterward. That is the income the farmer has left to spend.

In 1951 the net income of the farmers was $2,154 million; in 1952, $1,923·5 million; in 1953, $1,699·6 million; in 1954, $1,125·6 million, a drop of over $1 billion in four years. So we find today that the farmers, representing approximately 16 per cent of the population, are only receiving 6 per cent of the national income. The whole economy is suffering as a result. I think the minister would agree that everything that can possibly be done to halt that downward trend must be done. It is not merely the farmers who will suffer; the whole Canadian economy will suffer as a consequence.

We believe three things are essential in order to strengthen the agricultural situation. We believe the price support program should be strengthened. We believe definite action should be taken to expand markets for agricultural produce both at home and abroad. We believe the government should take the initiative in establishing a crop insurance program in co-operation with the provinces.

I am only going to deal with the question of support prices at this time. I shall be dealing with the other two matters at some other time, probably on the agriculture estimates. However, before going on with this matter I wish to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia when he spoke in this debate. He stated that the C.C.F. was the only party in Canada advocating that support prices should be at full parity, that is parity prices supported rigidly on that basis. I would point out that it is true they are the only political party, so far as I know, advocating that policy; but it is also interesting to note that none of the major farm organizations is advocating that support prices should be maintained at 100 per cent of parity. If there is any doubt on that point, perhaps I should quote from the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

It is also interesting to note that when the hon. member for Assiniboia spoke he referred to the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as a very excellent brief. This is what they have to say regarding the proposal of the C.C.F. to maintain support prices at 100 per cent of parity, as found at page 7 of their brief:

> We do not believe it is sound or practical to look to a price support program to guarantee the farmer prices which represent a full fair or parity relationship for each individual product. The result of such 100 per cent guarantees, if attempted, would inevitably be a high degree of government direction and control over agriculture. We do not believe farmers wish to submit to such extensive government participation in their business, nor do we believe it is reasonable to ask the government to undertake such a commitment. We believe that a parity position for agriculture can be achieved not only through a clearly defined price support program, but through the development of producer orderly marketing programs and the full co-operation of governments in all essential features of sound farm, economic and trade policy.

It is interesting to note that in their brief the Canadian Federation of Agriculture advocates partially flexible support prices being maintained at between 65 and 85 per cent of parity. The hon. member for Assiniboia says their brief is very excellent, so apparently he is in favour of maintaining support prices at not more than 85 per cent of parity. On the other hand, in his own speech he advocated 100 per cent of parity.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): A little confused, that is all.

Mr. Quelch: The hon. member for Assiniboia went out of his way to criticize what the leader of this group had had to say regarding parity prices. If it had not been for that I probably would not have mentioned the subject at all. At page 3459 of Hansard the hon. member had this to say:

> In his opening speech this session the leader of the Social Credit party had some remarks to make about parity prices. He said that his party was in favour of flexible parity prices, in other words, prices that were only a percentage of parity and which did not give the farmer the full equitable treatment he deserves.

Let me say that statement is absolutely false. I am not suggesting it was deliberately made as false; nevertheless it is an absolutely untrue statement. Unfortunately I think the hon. member for Assiniboia has allowed his political astuteness to pervert his mind in this regard. The trouble with the hon. member for Assiniboia is that he apparently does not understand the meaning of the word "flexible". He takes it for granted that the word "flexible" means less, but of course it can mean more or less, above parity or below parity. If it were considered desirable to expand the production of any one commodity and reduce the production of another, then it might be considered desirable to increase the support price above parity on the commodity you wanted to expand and decrease it on the other. There is no indication that by flexible support prices the leader of this group meant price supports below parity. Then the hon. member for Assiniboia went on to say:

> In case the hon. member may think I am misrepresenting what he said—

Let me point out there is no doubt about that.

—I shall quote his exact words as reported on page 47 of Hansard for January 10, 1955:

> "There is a very good case that can be made in favour of the adoption of such a flexible system here in Canada, the percentage of parity that is used of course to depend upon the amount of incentive which ought to be provided to achieve the amount of production that is required to meet the need."

That is the statement on which he bases his contention that we were advocating less than parity and an inequitable treatment of the farmers. If he had gone on a little further he could not possibly have fallen under that delusion. Let me quote from the same page he quoted from as to what the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) stated:

> The problem we face in this country is to adopt some policy and some technique which will guarantee the farmers their fair share of the national income. The figures will bear out what I say. The farmers who make up approximately 20 per cent of the population of Canada, received in 1953 only 9·9 per cent of the national income . . .
> I say the problem to be faced in a country like Canada is to adopt a policy which will guarantee the farmers a fair share of the national income. It would be only just and right if the farmers as a class make up 20 per cent of the total population of our country, they should receive something like 20 per cent of the national income. There has hardly been a time in the history of this country when this has been the case.

To achieve that, we advocate flexible parity prices based upon a two-price system, and I will be dealing with that later in my remarks. I think that is all I need to say to clarify the situation regarding the charge of the member for Assiniboia that we are advocating parity prices of an inequitable nature. He did suggest to me that I should straighten that out when I spoke.

Mr. Argue: I suggested that you should straighten out your leader.

Mr. Quelch: There are a number of points that are generally raised in connection with the subject of parity prices. If you are speaking to people down east about western agriculture they will invariably say, "What right have the farmers of Canada to expect the government to underwrite their prices?" I think it is quite a reasonable question. To answer it you have to go back a number of years. You have to go back to the depression years before the war, when farm prices were at a very low level, far below parity. When the farm organizations protested about the low prices they were told that the cause was the international situation, that prices were low in the world market and the farmers could not very well expect to get more than the prices in the world market. So prices continued at a low level in those pre-war years.

Then the war came and within a couple of years the prices of farm products started to rise, but the government considered it desirable to place a ceiling on those prices. Let me point out that you cannot have it both ways. If you say the farmers should take low prices when world prices are low, then surely the farmers are entitled to high prices when world prices are high. But they were not allowed to have those high world prices. Ceilings were placed on them at the very time when the farmers had an opportunity to make up the losses they suffered when prices were so low in the depression years.

The government of the day apparently realized the situation was not fair so far as agriculture was concerned, and the prime minister of the day, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, had this to say in a radio broadcast on December 4, 1943:

> I wish tonight to thank the farmers of Canada for their magnificent contribution to the battle of production. I wish again to appeal to them to continue to help hold the front line against inflation by continuing to support the price ceiling. If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to ensure them against an agricultural depression after the war. As an essential part of its post-war policy, the government intends to ask parliament at the next session to place a floor under the prices of main farm commodities.

The government lived up to that promise and instituted the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Under that act the principle was established that prices for farm products should be maintained at a level that bears a fair relationship to the prices of other commodities. The question, of course, that is in the minds of many farmers is whether the government today is living up to that principle.

I was interested in that point. I was wondering whether the support prices of farm products today were in line with the principle laid down under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, so I wrote the chairman of the agricultural prices support board. On a former occasion I had written to the bureau of statistics but the Minister of Agriculture told me I had written to the wrong body, and I should have written to the agricultural prices support board. This time, therefore, I wrote to the board. The letter was as follows:

> Dear Mr. Shaw:
> Could you please send me a list of the commodities that are being supported today and the level of the support price.
> In addition, could you also give me what the price of these products would be if the price of farm products today bore the same relationship to the prices of other commodities as existed in the base years 1943-44-45.
> I would like to get that information on cattle, as well as hogs, eggs, cheese and butter.

I received a very courteous reply from the agricultural prices support board, and I will just quote the last three paragraphs. They read as follows:

> In connection with the second paragraph of your letter I am not quite certain as to the interpretation but I assume you are referring to the basis of relationship mentioned in subsection (2) of section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act which states:
> "The board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment . . . and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other producers."

In order to illustrate the relationship on the basis of the five commodities which you mention the following table shows the position of each commodity mentioned as well as indicating the United States prices which, while not exactly comparable may be used as guides to prices in that country. The United States market prices for the last four years have been included as a basis of comparison. You will also be aware that eggs and butter have been under price support continuously for several years.

I might mention that I did not ask for the prices in the United States, but I can quite understand that he was anxious to put in a little plug for the government because the comparison was quite favourable in so far as the government of Canada is concerned. I want to comment briefly on the table so I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, if I could place it on the record and then comment upon it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Quelch: The table is as follows:

Year	Estimated parity using 1943-45 as base period	Average market price	United States market price
Cheese—	(cents per pound Toronto)		Plymouth-Wisconsin
1943-45	21.5	21.5	—
1951	33.4	38.8	39.5
1952	35.4	32.9	37.9
1953	34.9	31.4	35.1
1954	34.3	32.5	31.2
First grade creamery butter—	(cents per pound Montreal)		Butter—grade A Wholesale New York
1943-45	43.0	43.0	—
1951	66.9	65.0	73.6
1952	70.7	62.4	71.5
1953	69.7	61.0	65.5
1954	68.6	59.8	59.0
Good steers—	(up to 1,000 pounds–dollars per cwt. Toronto)		Chicago
1943-45	11.64	11.64	—
1951	18.11	32.60	34.80
1952	19.14	25.15	29.32
1953	18.88	19.97	20.79
1954	18.58	19.53	20.77
Hogs BI dressed—	(dollars per cwt. Toronto)		Barrows and gilts dressed carcass Chicago
1943-45	17.35	17.35	—
1951	27.00	32.85	30.12
1952	28.54	25.70	25.32
1953	28.14	30.82	30.15
1954	27.69	31.10	30.48
Eggs grade A large—	(cents per dozen Montreal)		Midwest mixed fancy heavy weights New York
1943-45	42.9	42.9	—
1951	66.7	66.2	59.2
1952	70.6	54.2	48.1

This table gives the estimated parity price for a number of commodities, using 1943-45 as the base period. Taking cheese, we find that in Toronto in the year 1954 the parity price should have been 34·3 cents per pound and the actual price was 32·5 cents. This would be 95 per cent of parity. The parity price for first grade creamery butter at Montreal should have been 68·6 cents per pound and the actual price was 59·8 cents. This was 87 per cent of parity. The support price for butter was 58 cents, which was only 84·6 per cent of parity.

For good steers up to 1,000 pounds in 1954 at Toronto, parity price would have been $18.58 per hundredweight and the actual price was $19.53. This was 105 per cent of parity. In so far as hogs were concerned in 1954, parity price at Toronto would have been $27.69 and the actual price was $31.10, which was 112 per cent of parity. The support price was $23 per hundredweight, which was 83 per cent of parity.

For grade A large eggs at Montreal in 1954, parity price would have been 68·5 cents per dozen and the actual price was 52·1 cents, which was 76 per cent of parity. The support price was only 38 cents per dozen, which was less than 56 per cent of parity.

I did not include wheat in the list of commodities for which I had asked prices because grains do not come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, but I did get figures from the bureau of statistics. The parity price of wheat in 1954 would have been $2.27 per bushel. The actual price was considerably below that. Today a large number of farmers are actually having to take less than half that price for the wheat they are selling.

I believe that using the period 1943-45 as the base period is satisfactory provided the principles contained in that act are lived up to in the fullest degree, and so long as it is made clear that this is a long-term program and that any change in support prices will be announced well in advance to give the farmers a chance to make any changes in their operations they may wish to make as a result of the change in the support price.

The interprovincial farm union presented a brief to the government this year and they also, I believe, talked to the caucuses of all the political groups. When they appeared before us we asked them to go beyond their brief and explain just exactly how they would apply support prices. They gave us a paper on support prices, and in that paper they suggested a base period of 10 years instead of the three-year period. They suggested the period 1940-49, pointing out that this period took in the low years as well as the high.

Well, actually using 1940-49 as the base period instead of 1943-45 does give the farmers a slightly higher support price. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture in their brief advocated the years 1925-29 as the base period. Personally I think the period used by the government, namely 1943-45, is about as good a base period as we can get. Actually the base period 1943-45 gives the farmers about 1 per cent more than the base period 1925-29. This can be ascertained by referring to appendix A on the last page of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief. You will find there that using 1925-29 as the base period, the period 1943-45 gives 101 per cent instead of 100. I cannot see, therefore, any great argument for changing the base period from 1943-45 to 1925-29 or even to 1940-49.

The next point of importance regarding support prices is the most equitable way of applying them. The interprovincial farm union advocated a two-price system. In this group we have been advocating a two-price system for a number of years; that is, that the domestic market for farm products should be supported at 100 per cent of parity and that farm exports should be sold at the best prices obtainable in the international market, preferably under international agreement but supported by a reasonable support price. In other words they advocated a flexible support price which would be the average of the price obtained in the international market and the domestic market, the domestic market being maintained at 100 per cent of parity.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture advocated that certain products be supported at all times, that they be announced well in advance and at a range of from 65 per cent to 85 per cent of parity, established on the basis of 1925-29. As I say, this is only partially flexible because it has the ceiling of 85 per cent on the support price. It is also interesting to note that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture only advocated the two-price system in regard to wheat, and that is found on page 9 of their brief where they said:

> In respect to the price of wheat charged to domestic consumers, we would recommend that this price be not less than the existing maximum price under the international wheat agreement.

In other words they are advocating that wheat in the domestic market be sold at the maximum price under the international wheat agreement, and the balance sold at contract prices. The farmers would get the average of the two. The two-price system is far more important in regard to other commodities than it is to wheat, for the simple reason that a far larger percentage of other farm commodities is consumed in Canada.

As I say, we have supported the two-price system for some years, and we believe it can be fully justified. The two-price system is in line with the general practice in secondary industries. They set the price for their goods to be consumed in Canada, a price they consider will return them a fair profit, and then their surplus production is exported and sold at the best price they can obtain. In many instances the price in the world market will be substantially below that charged for the same commodities in this country. I have personal knowledge of that fact in connection with farm machinery. I have priced Canadian farm machinery in other countries and have found that it was being sold at substantially lower prices in those countries than it was being sold in Canada.

The situation in regard to agriculture is altogether different. The world price has always been allowed to dominate the domestic price, although only a small percentage of farm products is exported. Apart from wheat, 94 per cent of farm products is consumed in this country. Yet we allow the 6 per cent that is exported to dominate the price of the 94 per cent consumed in this country.

Therefore we in this group advocate that the domestic price should be held at parity, and that the best prices possible should be obtained for goods exported to the world markets. Preferably they should be sold under some form of international agreement, such as the international wheat agreement. Someone might say, "Well, if we adopted a policy of that kind, what would be the reaction of labour?" It is interesting to note that at their conventions labour endorsed the principle of maintaining farm prices at a fair relationship with the prices of other commodities. So apparently there would be no objection from labour in that regard.

I believe the most efficient way to apply the two-price system would be through boards similar to the wheat board. On the other hand I realize that you cannot possibly sell all farm products under compulsory boards, unless the farmers themselves are in favour of the adoption of such a program. And, whether we like it or not, it is quite clear that many farmers are opposed to such procedure.

In Alberta and Saskatchewan they are paying considerable attention to the establishment of a livestock board. In my own province the federation of agriculture has held a number of meetings. Meetings have been held in my constituency regarding the establishment of a marketing board for livestock. In the town of Hanna, one of the important points in my constituency, when they took a vote at the close of a meeting the farmers voted heavily against the establishment of a livestock marketing board. I say therefore that it would be a very great mistake to try to establish a board of that kind against the wishes of the farmers. It would be doomed to failure before it got started. If the farmers can be convinced that it is in their interest to adopt compulsory boards for farm products, then such a procedure should be instituted, but not until that time.

However, I believe there are a number of ways by which the two-price system could be put into operation without the formation of boards. For instance, let the government estimate the percentage of a commodity they believe will be consumed in Canada, and the amount that will be exported abroad. Then let them figure out the total price for the commodity that will be sold in Canada, at parity, and the total price for the commodity that will be exported at the best price that can be obtained. Then guarantee to the farmers a price equal to the weighted average of the two. For example, if it was estimated that 90 per cent of a commodity would be consumed in Canada and 10 per cent exported, with a parity price of $1 per unit and an export price of 70 cents the weighted average would be 97 cents, which would mean that the farmer would receive 97 per cent of parity for the whole commodity.

The main argument that has been used against the parity price is that it might create surpluses. Yet we should always keep in mind that at the present time over 50 per cent of the population of the world is undernourished. Until such time as people in other countries are obtaining all the food they need there should be no suggestion that we are producing too much food. The problem is that of finding ways and means of distributing that food to the people who need it.

Mr. H. H. Hannam, president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, speaking before the annual convention at Edmonton, referred to the conference of the international federation of agricultural producers held at Nairobi. His comments are to be found at page 16 of the booklet containing his speech. In this speech he sets out the main conclusions and recommendations, to some of which I shall refer. He said:

> The answer to the lack of balance between present producing capacity and effective demand does not lie in the restriction of production. The world needs enormous quantities of food and fibre. At the same time it should be recognized that, temporarily, important shifts in production could be made to advantage and should be made.

And again:

> The conference recommended that governments of countries possessing unwieldy surpluses take steps, where practical, to dispose of some surplus stocks in their domestic markets—by improved marketing efficiency, special welfare programs, special feeding programs for certain vulnerable groups, etc.

And again:

The IFAP agreed that, while some sales of products abroad at less than domestic prices may be inevitable for some commodities under present circumstances, every effort should be made to use the consultative machinery referred to above in respect to any new programs in order to avoid damage to the interests of friendly countries.

And again:

It recommended that priority be given to disposal of surpluses in underdeveloped countries, which is particularly important where such disposal programs are linked with programs for general economic development.

And again:

The concluding thought, however, which refers to many of the recommendations already mentioned, is that the best answer will be found on the side of demand—in those programs and program features which aim to widen and improve distribution and raise purchasing power to provide effective demand.

Mr. Speaker, as it is now five o'clock, perhaps I might be permitted to continue my comments after we have disposed of private and public bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday when we were discussing this bill I was interrupted at six o'clock. Since then I have had the opportunity to read the speech made on that occasion by the sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Assiniboia, and in the few minutes left at my disposal I should like to refer briefly to one statement he made.

First of all let me say that I was struck, when reading his speech, by the number of times the word "arbitrary" appears in it. It seems that the hon. member was carried away by his eloquence in the course of the discussion.

I wish to refer more particularly to the statement which appears on page 3412 of Hansard, and to quote the last sentence of the second paragraph and the last sentences of the third paragraph. In referring to the action of the government, the hon. member said the government——has permitted the transport controller to step in and block the farmers' action by cancelling the car order book.

[Mr. Quelch.]

The same thing is repeated in the third paragraph in different words, as follows:

Apparently there is no one in the board of grain commissioners or in the ranks of the cabinet who wishes to restore to the farmers this fundamental right. They would far rather continue this conspiracy to deprive the farmers of a fundamental Canadian right.

The hon. member went as far as he could without being unparliamentary, because there are certainly imputations of improper motives here. The suggestion that the controller or the government deliberately set out to deprive the farmer of a fundamental right is, of course, nonsense in this instance.

This takes us back to the time when the car order book was suspended. It would be well to put on the record the facts of that particular case. Surely the hon. member for Assiniboia knows very well what were the reasons for the suspension of the car order book at the time. They were certainly not the reasons suggested in these two paragraphs. At that time, as we all know, there was a demand for a particular grade of grain, a grade other than the prevailing grade of grain that was produced in that area.

The result was that the Canadian wheat board found themselves in a difficult position because they were unable to obtain, or could not readily get, the particular grade for which they had sales. Therefore they had to issue special shipping orders to get that particular grade wherever it was available. Consequently, under conditions such as these the car order book was very difficult to operate. I believe the controller suspended the car order book at the request of the Canadian wheat board. At any rate, at that time everybody agreed that it was the logical thing to do and it was done by the controller in order to fill the orders the board was getting for the sale of that grade of grain.

Surely everybody still agrees that it was wise for the wheat board to try to sell as much grain as possible. These were the only reasons the car order book was suspended. Last year, as the situation changed, the pools were the most insistent on having the car order book reinstated.

As we all know, the minister suggested last year that the car order book be reinstated, and it was reinstated. I understand that after a year's experience with it the pools are contemplating requesting that it be suspended again. The suggestion that the transport controller, or any other agency, and the cabinet ministers had purposely set out to prevent the farmers from getting box cars through the car order book is simply ridiculous. It is not a fair statement to make.

Again and again in his speech the hon. member referred to the government directly or indirectly denying to the farmer the right to deliver to the elevator of his choice. He even went so far as to suggest that in this instance the government had taken away the right of the farmer. Earlier in his remarks—and this is what I want to refer to before I conclude—he proceeded to give advice to the people of eastern Canada on this question of box car distribution. I think I should reread for the record the remarks of the hon. member, since he is a member of the socialist group. He said, at page 3411 of Hansard:

> The right is that any Canadian, when he decides to sell his produce—whether it be agricultural produce or whether it be his labour—has a right to sell that product to the firm of his own choosing. To say that western farmers today have that freedom would be to deny the truth of the statements by thousands of farmers that have been received by members of parliament and by the government.

We know that other people of whom the hon. member spoke in a derogatory way later on in his speech have been using this very statement in their publicity. Apparently everybody agrees on that, but if the purpose here is to clarify the situation for the eastern members, we might as well state the facts exactly as they are.

As far as the selling of our products is concerned, a few years ago we all agreed and I think we still agree—or at least a very large majority of the farmers of western Canada agreed—that they would forgo the right to sell to any particular firm. By instituting the Canadian wheat board we agreed to let that board be the sole agency to buy our products, and we retained the right to choose the firm to handle our grain. We all have the same right today. It has not been denied to anybody; it has not been taken away by anybody. The situation today is that in some instances we find that the exercise of this right has been curtailed to some degree. It has been curtailed in varying degrees, depending on the area and the place. For quite a few years it has never been possible to exercise that right in full, because no matter what we do, what distribution we make or what scheme we have, in a centre where there is only one elevator the farmers cannot have the right until that situation changes. Therefore, in effect, no matter what anybody does, this right will be curtailed and has been curtailed to some degree.

If there are enough box cars we all have the right to deliver to the elevator of our choice. If there is more than one elevator in a centre we may have that right again. But, I repeat, if there is only one elevator we have not the choice because, under the quota system, it has not been possible to devise a means by which a farmer can deliver to more than one point at a time. Therefore the various suggestions, including the bill introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia, may improve conditions in some ways but the problem will remain with us to some extent as long as there is an acute shortage of box cars.

As I said, we have been circularized and presented with another suggestion by the Saskatchewan wheat pool. It is suggested that this matter go before the agriculture committee. There is no doubt that it will be discussed at some length, but I suggest that if we passed this bill we would preclude consideration of the suggestions of the pool. It would not be timely. I suggest that this be left until we have a chance to hear more of the details of the other suggestions that are being made by the pool.

I am convinced that Bill No. 22 is not workable and cannot be made workable, and there is also some question as to its being constitutional. At any rate, the matter of the distribution of box cars will come up for discussion in due course and some further light will probably be thrown on the subject.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Assiniboia upon bringing this measure before the house again, because it is of vital importance to the grain growers of western Canada, especially so long as the quota system continues. On previous occasions we have always supported similar amendments, and we shall do so at this time because we believe the farmer should have the right to deliver grain to the elevator of his own choice.

The hon. member for Provencher pointed out that the farmer never had that full right, and he gave as an example that there might be only one elevator at a certain point. That might be true in a particular case, but we know there is more than one elevator at the majority of points in western Canada. Simply because there might be only one elevator at one point should not deny the farmer the right to deliver grain to the elevator of his own choice.

Mr. Jutras: I am sure the hon. member does not want to misinterpret what I said. I was not using that as an argument against any of the schemes, but simply to indicate that a full choice was not always available.

Mr. Quelch: I quite understand that the hon. member was not presenting it as an argument, but I assume he was considering it as a factor in the case or he would not have mentioned it. He must have had some reason for doing so.

The principle of this amendment has been endorsed by all the major farm organizations in western Canada such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the interprovincial farm union and the three western pools. We support it on the ground that the farmer should have the right to deliver grain to the elevator of his own choice at the time a quota is established.

Second, this would help to restore competition in the purchase of grain by elevator agents. Many of us who have had experience in the marketing of grain in western Canada know that at times the popular elevator will be plugged and if a farmer wishes to market his grain he must take it to one of the other elevators. I know it will be argued that all farmers will be treated in the same way, but that is not quite the case. We know that all elevators look after their special patrons. If an elevator should be plugged and a car is available, the agent will phone his special patrons and tell them to bring in some wheat. Those farmers will load up two or three trucks and bring them in and by the time the other farmers hear about it the space is gone. I am not blaming the farmers for that situation, nor do I blame the elevator agents; it is just a situation that exists.

The whole problem arises from the fact that cars are allocated on the basis of one car per elevator. I know it has been argued that this is not a fact, and it may not always be true; but so far as I know that is the general practice. I have been told that it is the general practice at a number of points. This practice is not followed as far as manufacturing establishments are concerned. The factory with the large production will get the greater number of cars; but in the case of grain elevators, no matter how much wheat farmers may want to take to a specific elevator they all get the same number of cars. This is the result of a state of congestion. As a result of this practice farmers are forced to take wheat to elevators other than those of their own choice if they desire to market their grain.

This amendment would help to restore competition. At the present time there is little if any competition because an agent knows quite well that the grain will come to him when the other elevators are full. Consequently he is free to undergrade, underweigh and overdock because he knows he is going to get the grain in the long run. Farmers are quite often forced to haul their grain to a particular elevator even though they do not like the way it will be handled.

No doubt this is one reason the overages in country elevators are so large. Some people may say the pool elevators also have overages. This is true, but the farmer knows that if he hauls his wheat to a pool elevator and there are overages he will get the benefit of those through patronage dividends at a later date. That is why so many farmers are anxious to haul their grain to pool elevators. They are not satisfied with the way their grain is being handled by the other elevators. If they haul to a pool elevator they will benefit from any overgrading or underweighing that may take place when the final settlement is made.

If this amendment carries, cars will be allocated to elevators in keeping with the farmers' individual expressed preference. The railways say they are quite willing to do this and are merely waiting for direction from some source. The wheat pools have suggested a somewhat different procedure through an amendment to the wheat board act and the grain act. I am not at all certain in my own mind whether this amendment or the amendments suggested by the wheat pools would be best, but I think we could all agree on the principle of this bill, that the farmer should have the right to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice.

It seems to me the best thing the house could do would be to approve the principle of this bill on second reading and then send it to the agriculture committee, where it could be amended in line with the best interests of the farmers without changing the principle. We would be able to bring down representatives from the pools and other farm organizations and try to whip this amendment into the best possible form.

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support Bill No. 22 I want first to comment upon the fact that the hon. member for Provencher has said repeatedly that we ought to let this matter stand for a little while longer until we see what the committee is going to do about it. I suggest to him that the wrongs and injustices which have existed in this field have been allowed to go on too long. This bill should have been passed three years ago, and the right of the farmer to deliver grain to the elevator of his own choice established.

When you take that right away from him you stir him very deeply, particularly when the elevator which he has built represents years of struggle and sacrifice, education and fight. We do not want to go back to the old days when the Winnipeg grain exchange controlled the price of grain when purchased from the farmer and the price at which it was sold to the ultimate consumer or to other parts of the trade, and then pocketed the difference. As stated in the explanatory note:

> The purpose of this act is to remove discrimination in the allocation of box cars by providing in a new section of the car order book a rule for the fair allocation of box cars among elevator companies at a marketing point where the car order book, as presently constituted, is not in effect.
> By allocating their seeded acreage among the elevator companies at a marketing point, producers themselves will determine the distribution of box cars at that point.

Many people are somewhat at a loss to understand why there should be so much noise about the right of a farmer to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice as, after all, he is selling it to the wheat board, and the wheat board is the sole agency to handle it. But there is more than that involved in this. The farmer, in continuing the fight he has carried on for some 30 or 40 years, has established this elevator system to which he wants to deliver. He has been delivering his grain to his elevator for many years. It is part of his life; it is part of his struggle; it represents years of work. He sees a tremendous injustice when box cars are allocated to the elevators at that particular point, and he finds when he wants to deliver grain to his own elevator that there is no room. Why is there no room? Because somebody, in spotting the cars that came in, spotted the cars in front of the other elevators.

The effects of the situation are shown clearly in the annual figures of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which is the one mostly affected in the past. They found that the annual percentage of business which they have been able to do has gradually fallen off until this year the figure is below 40 per cent. The hon. member for Provencher this afternoon made the point that if you have a siding with only one elevator you have no choice. That is true, but this is what has aggravated the farmer. He finds that if it is a siding with one line elevator that is where he and the farmers in that district deliver their grain. Eight miles further down the line there may be another siding with another elevator, but in this case it is the wheat pool elevator, his own elevator. He finds that the cars are not spotted at the elevators in the right proportions. Sometimes there are two or three times as many cars going to the line elevator company as to the point where there is only the wheat pool elevator.

After they have taken out all the allocated grain which is under quota for that line elevator point, the farmers throughout the country cannot make further delivery. Then suddenly this point is opened up and farmers are allowed to deliver where there is only one elevator, and that is a line elevator. The result is that farmers are unable to sell the grain. They are short of money. They cannot deliver the grain because no box cars have been delivered at their point. They have no cash and they cannot pay their taxes. Finally in desperation the farmers are forced to deliver the grain to the line elevator company.

Figures show that gradually, in the last four or five years, this business has gone from the wheat pool. The percentage going to the line elevator companies is increasing. They are gaining in strength. These companies were the foundation and the basis of the old Winnipeg grain exchange. This stirs up within the farmers the fear that perhaps the wheat board will be thrown out when the big line companies get strong enough again, when they are handling a large enough quantity of grain that they will be able to re-establish the grain exchange.

The farmers are afraid that the wheat board will be done away with and that, after fighting for 50 years, they will be left to the mercy of the line elevator companies and the grain exchange. This is a battle that has been going on for many years, and the farmer will fight desperately to keep himself out of the clutches of the line elevator companies.

When the wheat pool first started, years ago, the line elevator companies tried to meet their competition but were unable to do so. The wheat pool has grown over the years. In the province of Saskatchewan over 1,100 co-operative wheat pool elevators are handling the business for co-operative farmers. Now they find they are unable to deliver their grain there.

Something must have prevented them from doing so, and it was not competition. They beat the line elevator companies in competition every time they met, and they drove the line elevator companies out of business at many points by doing business better and by returning to the farmers the profits of their organization. The farmer got his profits on the grain he delivered there in proportion to the business he did. But somehow, through machinations in the allocation of box cars—this is the weapon which the opposition to the wheat pool has used—the pool elevators find themselves strangled.

We have been trying to find out who was responsible for the allocation of box cars. The transport controller denies that he is responsible. The railway companies say that they do not get any instructions from anybody, and it is simply that freight crews go down and happen to leave a box car at one place or another. They may say all the elevators are filled and so, if there are four cars, they will send one to each elevator. That means that the farmers' co-operative is only getting 25 per cent of the business and that is all it can get. Perhaps 75 or 80 per cent of the farmers have been delivering their grain to that point. They want to deliver their grain to their own elevator but they have to haul it to the line elevator companies.

Those in control of the line elevator companies have exploited the farmers. When the farmer is forced to deliver his grain to the line elevator companies, the agent will say, "We will give you a good grade on this. I think you had better bring your permit book here, so we will handle all your grain." A regular battle has gone on for some time to win over the farmer.

We can easily understand why the Winnipeg grain exchange wants to get back into business. If they can handle the farmers' grain again and manipulate prices to suit themselves the farmer will have to take the price offered him. They will be permitted to manipulate the price and nobody will be interfering with the principle of private enterprise. They say that the law of supply and demand will be operating again. The wheat pools and the wheat board will be out of the way. The statement of the president of the Winnipeg grain exchange in the past year showed very clearly that what he is aiming at is to restore the line elevator companies and bring back the open market set-up that existed before.

The farmer is alive to that. The chief obstacle to the old grain exchange is the co-operative wheat pool and the Canadian wheat board. The farmers see in this serious behind the scenes set up, where nobody seems to understand the basis upon which the allocation of box cars is made, a sinister move to destroy their organization. That is why they are aroused. That is why they are putting in their protests.

I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that thousands of letters of protest have come from the farmers of Saskatchewan. At any rate hundreds have come to the desks of members of parliament, urging them to support a bill which will give the farmer the right to deliver his grain to whatever elevator he wishes. If he wants to deliver his grain to his own elevator he should be allowed to do so, because it can easily be done. It could be based upon the seeded acreage which each farmer has in the district. It could be arranged in such proportions that each permit holder would tell the station agent at that point exactly the acreage he is seeding and how much of that grain he wishes to deliver for the crop year to his own wheat pool, into Pacific, or into Federal Grain or the U.G.G. or whatever company it is.

On that basis, with the cars coming to that point, the local station agent can allocate them to the elevators proportionately. It might not be exact, but at any rate it would give the farmer the right to deliver his grain to the elevator of his own choice as nearly as it is humanly possible to do so. We had difficulty presenting this case in the standing committee on agriculture last year. We had difficulty making people understand that underneath this whole thing was a basic principle for which the farmer was fighting, and which he wanted established because he saw without it great danger to his own organization and his own rights.

The matter was brought before the committee at the meeting of the 20th of May, 1954, I believe. The question of congestion was explained, but it still did not prove to us why, if the wheat pools wanted to do 70 per cent of the business at a particular point, they should not get 70 per cent of the box cars and should be allowed only 40 per cent. The box cars were there. It is the farmer's own business, and surely he should not be compelled to take his business to the opposition. I think the people of Canada doing business would protest most vehemently if they were compelled to do business with other than their choice. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as found at page 517 of the proceedings of the committee:

> I think the problem in the farmers' minds is: how much grain can they market, not with any one particular agency, but how much grain can they market? That is the over-all problem.

That was a problem too. They can still deliver the same amount of grain through the same box cars. The pool elevator agent will get out the box cars just as quickly as the line elevator company if they are spotted in front of his elevator. The minister went on to say:

> We are going to try to solve this problem of car distribution, but if we do not solve it no great principle is going to be violated. No one is going to have any serious loss.

There may be no serious loss in any one year. Perhaps it is only 4 or 5 cents a bushel, but bit by bit it adds up. The minister said no great principle was being violated. I should like to inform the house that we and the farmers feel a very serious and basic principle is being violated. The farmer sees a personal right being taken away. He sees the organization he has established being ruined. I should like the house to understand that the operations of the Winnipeg grain exchange probably represent private industry carrying on business at its worst. If the people who support private enterprise want to know why the western farmers are against private enterprise, the best evidence they can find is the way private enterprise operators on the Winnipeg grain exchange have become millionaires over the years at the farmers' expense.

The only weapon the farmer has with which to fight is the co-operative organization built by himself. That is the means by which he has fought the battle throughout the years. When he sees his organization being destroyed by any means at all, but particularly when it seems to be in an underhanded way and he cannot get at the root of the trouble, then he feels very deeply about it. I have a letter here from a farmer in my constituency. He says that car distribution is terrible at that point, and goes on to say that the local agent has dropped from about 42 per cent last year to 28 per cent. In other words, he used to be getting 42 per cent of the grain at this point and it has dropped to 28 per cent. It used to be one of the best co-operative points in the whole district, but the agent is down to 28 per cent this year.

The rest of the wheat pool farmers in that district have been compelled to deliver what grain they have delivered to the private companies which have been their opposition. What disturbs them is the danger that this situation may become permanent. It is getting worse and worse. Each year the wheat pool reports a smaller and smaller percentage of the grain handled going through their elevators. More and more each year wheat pool farmers are compelled to deliver to the other elevators where there is space. The space is there because of the allocation of box cars. Wheat pool elevator points have found the situation particularly difficult, even in the areas where they are the only elevators at the particular points. They find that box cars are sent to other points and not to them.

The situation looks rather serious to the farmer and the wheat pool because they feel that through the allocation of the box cars their whole business is threatened permanently. They see what the Winnipeg grain exchange and the line companies would like to do. Their attack on the wheat pools is an effort to discredit the wheat pools and the wheat board. You can discredit the Canadian wheat board if you can get the farmers feeling that there is something wrong. You can discredit the wheat pools if the farmers think there is something wrong with the way cars are allocated.

We feel that a serious mistake was made in the past year in that through some machinations the Canadian wheat board undertook to allocate orders to the various grain companies on a particular basis. We have had difficulty in finding out exactly how the board does operate, but I understand that when they sell a certain quantity of grain they allocate the grain orders to the various companies. If they allocate so many hundreds of thousands of bushels to the wheat pool they say, "You are to send us 400 cars of No. 4 wheat".

I understand that the wheat pool, as nearly as I can find out, is then supposed to say where it will get the No. 4 wheat and the different points to which the box cars should be sent. As a result the farmers in one area will say that they are in the wheat pool elevator at that point and cannot get any cars. Apparently the head office has sent the box cars somewhere else. I do not think any better method could be found to make the wheat pool committees and supporters angry at their own head office. If that is the system under which the matter is being handled, then I suggest it is time something was done about it.

Earlier this session I put certain questions on the order paper in an attempt to find out what was the basis under which cars were being allocated to the various companies. These are the three questions I asked:

1. What is the basis for the allocation of grain shipping orders to the various elevator companies, as now used by the Canadian wheat board?

I just asked what the basis was.

2. When was the present system of order allocation put into operation?

3. How were the percentages for shipping orders as between elevator companies arrived at?

Has it been a 10-year basis? Have they taken any one particular year? Have they taken a free delivery year? The farmers would like to know the basis under which the wheat board is operating, because that will determine to a large extent the percentage of the business the wheat pool now is allowed to do. If they are only going to get 48 per cent of the shipping orders then they are only going to do 48 per cent of the business that year. If the wheat board decides under this system that they are only to get 42 per cent, then that is all the business they can possibly do even though 60 per cent of the farmers in the province of Saskatchewan may desire to do their business with the wheat pool.

That is where the danger lies. These are the replies I received:

1. It is not the policy of the Canadian wheat board to disclose details of its current operations nor the competitive position of various elevator companies in their capacity as agents of the board.

The answers to questions 2 and 3 were, "See answer to No. 1." I was not asking them to disclose their current operations. I wanted to try to find out by some means how shipping orders were at present being allocated, on what basis, and how the board determined which elevator company would be chosen. I say that because they can determine permanently whether an elevator company will grow or will be wiped out, through the allocation of these shipping orders and box cars. This is the kind of information we want.

The thing that makes farmers particularly suspicious about this is that in past years the box cars that went to various points were apparently taken there by the elevator company, and apparently the elevator company shipped them out to the particular districts under the orders of the transport controller. The man who was on loan as transport controller was a member of the board of grain commissioners. Now, that member of the board of grain commissioners was previously president of the Winnipeg grain exchange, and as transport controller he had wide powers. We cannot find out today who is responsible for this thing; we can only look at the result. The result has been that the line elevator companies have been increasing in power and the wheat pool co-operative organization has been decreasing in power.

The farmers see in this a threat to their organization built around the establishment of the old co-operative, the only weapon they have with which to fight for justice. It is for this reason we are introducing this bill now for the third time. Under the provisions of the bill the allocation of box cars at delivery points would be made according to the farmers' wishes. It is only a simple, basic right. Surely its administration is not too difficult. If cars were going to be delivered to a point they could be delivered at the elevators in proportion to the farmers' wishes. It does not help to hide the whole thing behind a screen of uncertainty, or to say no one knows whose responsibility it is. It does not help to give answers like this, that it is not our policy to disclose the operations of the board. I was not asking for disclosure of the operations of the board, but surely the allocation of box cars and the allocation of business is the business of the farmer.

The members of the farm co-operative organizations are aroused. For years they have accepted the excuse that the trouble was due to congestion and nothing could be done about it. They were told, "You want to sell grain, and we are doing what we can. We might not get all the cars out to each elevator." The farmers have taken that excuse for five or six years and each year the result has been exactly the same. They have ended up with less and less business and the opposition has had more and more business.

Today the wheat pool is making its protest. In the past year at their annual meeting the members of the wheat pool organization protested loudly and stated they felt there was an injustice to them; their patience was exhausted. They have heard excuses. They have heard people passing the buck and saying, "It is not my responsibility, it is his." Another says the responsibility belongs to the railways, and the railways say it is the transport controller. The transport controller says, "I have nothing to do with it."

I am going to say, Mr. Speaker, that in this fight the farmer is not going to give up easily. There is a basic right here that he feels is being violated. It is a right that should not be denied to any Canadian. It is part of his fight for existence. He has seen years of toil go into the production of wheat which he had to sell at less than half of what it cost him to produce. On the other hand, in the years before the wheat board he has seen the annual crop of millionaires coming out of the Winnipeg grain exchange and he is not going to see the wheat board wiped out. He is going to fight through his co-operative organization.

If this protest is not enough, he will make a more violent one. In this fight I can say this, that we are all very proud to be on the side of the farmer.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Swift Current-Maple Creek): It is somewhat disadvantageous to have only one hour for the discussion of a matter of such great interest to the farmers of western Canada. The hon. member for Provencher took about 10 minutes of this hour, the hon. member for Acadia about 10 minutes and the hon. member for Yorkton between 20 and 25 minutes. Since hon. members on the government side of the house are always invited to express their opinion, it does not leave too many minutes in which we may do that. I can assure you that I shall try to do so in less time than it has taken the hon. member for Yorkton.

Much of the discussion has centred around the wishes of the farmers in western Canada. During the last several weeks many of us have received letters from farmers, not relating so much to this particular bill but merely expressing the opinion of those who wished to deliver to the elevator of their choice. I do not think there has ever been any government that has been more susceptible to the wishes of the western farmer than this government. Unfortunately what we are trying to decide, or at least what I am trying to decide, is how many farmers in western Canada want this bill. Who are the farmers in western Canada who asked the mover of this bill to introduce it in this House of Commons? That is what I want to know, and that is what I am going to find out.

During the course of the last few weeks we have received a great number of letters. The letters are not all in agreement. I think they are mostly from pool members, and some of them are from pool delegates. Some of them are from farmers saying they want the right to deliver not only to the elevator of their choice but to more than one elevator. They happen to be living between two towns, and they want the right to change from one town and elevator to the other. It would seem to me, from the contents of the letters, that the farmers are somewhat fearful of being frozen to one elevator. Unless they choose one elevator and stay with that elevator for a crop year, then I see no advantage whatever in permitting an amendment to the Canada Grain Act that will allow a farmer to stipulate the elevator of his choice.

We want more unanimity of opinion on this matter. I do not know of one Liberal member who has received one letter from any grain grower in Alberta or Manitoba favouring this bill or suggesting that he be allowed to choose an elevator. Now, shall the government enact legislation to suit one area of this country, or shall the government take into consideration the wishes of the farmers of western Canada, or of all Canada for that matter? They are all affected. I would suggest to the farmers of western Canada that they get together and make a decision as to what they want. After they have made that decision they will not find any government that will be more sympathetic to their wishes.

We have heard about the wishes of the farmers of western Canada. We have heard that the farm organizations of western Canada are in favour of what is here proposed. I want to know what farm organization asked the hon. member for Assiniboia to introduce this bill into this House of Commons. Would he kindly stand up and answer? What farm organization in western Canada asked the hon. member for Assiniboia to introduce this measure into this House of Commons; that is what I want to know. I am waiting for an answer. If there is not an answer, then there is only one conclusion, and that is that the farmers of western Canada do not want it. Because if they did want it they would not ask an opposition member who has no responsibility, particularly a socialist member who has absolutely no influence in this House of Commons or anywhere else, to bring a measure of this kind before a responsible government.

If farm organizations did ask him to do that, then why do not those same farm organizations go out into Saskatchewan and ask the Liberal opposition members in the legislature to bring the Rand formula, or any other measure for that matter, before the socialist government in that province? If a Liberal member ever did that, then I say such legislation before the socialist government in Saskatchewan would last about as long as a snowball in hades.

I want the hon. member for Assiniboia to tell us what organization asked him to bring this measure before the House of Commons. And if he was not asked, why has he brought it here? I would ask him what political organization asked him to bring it here. Perhaps he will say it was the farmers' union. The situation that has been described here is one that would lead us to believe that the farmers in western Canada are very mad. Personally I would like to deliver to the elevator of my choice, because I was brought up with farm organizations. I was one of the original signers of the wheat pool agreement, and I have never missed an opportunity to support not only the wheat pools but other co-operative organizations.

If the farmers are mad now, then I would not like to face them two months after this legislation, if it were accepted, was brought into operation. I would not like to see their looks if there was a shortage of box cars, with one elevator full of grain and other elevators empty and the farmers without money. If they were not given the right to move around, then I would like to know how long this legislation would last in western Canada.

So I say the farmers would be a whole lot madder after the passage of legislation of this kind, if severe congestion conditions developed. Such conditions would not be the result of government policy, or government organization, but would be the result of natural conditions that could not be eliminated or helped by anyone. It might be that some would favour those conditions, because we have had some crop during these last years, for which most of us are grateful. But why attempt to compel the government to enact legislation to correct a situation that natural conditions brought about? After those natural conditions have passed I do not think anyone in western Canada would suggest that those same conditions would often be repeated. They have not, up to this time.

The wheat pool organizations have had as high as 53 per cent of the wheat in western Canada, and they are now reduced to about 43 per cent, or a 10 per cent reduction. The farm grain handling organizations in Manitoba and Alberta perhaps would do even better under the present distribution of box cars than they would by an allocation of box cars through designating the elevator of one's choice.

That is why we do not receive letters from pool members in Manitoba and Alberta. That is why we do not receive letters from pool low-point deliveries in Saskatchewan, where the pools have been receiving only 23 per cent of the grain during these past years. Those pool members would like to increase their deliveries at those points. What works in one place works differently in another. But the over-all picture is one of reduced handling by pool elevators.

If there is any member in the house or any member of any organization in western Canada—any grain handling firm, pool organization, farmers' union or anyone else —who is willing to take on the allocation of box cars in this country, let us have his name and we will give that name every consideration, and wish him good luck in his new position. Because immediately he will have to endeavour to satisfy everybody in western Canada. This does not mean that we are indisposed. All we are looking for is something that will work in the interests of all the people of western Canada. We have no guarantee that this will work; and until we do have, then I do not think any socialist or any other government would consider legislation that at least would not have some assurance of success, or that would have to be repealed within a very short time.

If the farmers of western Canada cannot agree on what they want in the matter of deliveries at grain handling points, then do not expect the government to force agreement upon them. The initiative must be left with the farmer. That is the place to apply it, with the farmers themselves. They should decide what they want. It should not be just one group of farmers or a certain number of farmers in any organization. It should be all the farmers, before any responsible government can cater to their needs. I repeat that no government is more willing to give consideration to the matter than this one.

So I say to the hon. member for Assiniboia that his bill does not come here with the authority it should have. I say to the hon. member for Assiniboia that he should withdraw the bill on his own authority, personally, if he has no authority from any farm organization.

An hon. Member: You are afraid to vote on it.

[Mr. Studer.]

Mr. Studer: Name your farm organization, and we will show you what we are afraid to vote on. Get up and name it. Be a gentleman. I hear no one. I take it silence gives consent to what I have been suggesting. Whenever legislation is presented in the interests of the farmers you will find all the Liberal members voting wholeheartedly in favour of it, because we are anxious to satisfy and please the farmers.

The government accepted the wheat board, and it did not accept the wheat board simply because a majority of the people of Canada wanted it to do so. It accepted the wheat board for the welfare and the interests of the farmers of western Canada. With the world organizations we now have in connection with the handling of grain, and the trading in that commodity, the government does much of the business that co-operatives formerly endeavoured to do. All of us will remember that when the co-operatives, such as the wheat pools, endeavoured to find a solution to the problem connected with the disposal of their grain—"From producer to consumer"; that was the slogan in those days—we ran into difficulties. The government came to the rescue of the wheat pools. It was a Conservative government that came to the rescue, a Conservative government in Saskatchewan, by guaranteeing the losses and the continuation of the farmers' own organization in western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Speaker, just before five o'clock I had quoted from a speech by Dr. Hannam regarding the conference of the international federation of agricultural producers held at Nairobi. We in this group agree with the findings of that conference. We feel that surpluses should not be eliminated by a reduction in production but rather by an expansion of markets through distribution of goods to needy people. At home we feel we can expand markets by increasing social services and welfare payments; and to the extent that expanding markets and private enterprise fail to provide jobs, national projects should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the provincial and municipal governments, thereby expanding the purchasing power of the people and still further sustaining demand.

Abroad, when foreign exchange and balance of payments difficulties occur, we should be prepared to accept sterling and in certain cases also currency of other foreign nations. In the United States of America, under the agricultural trade development assistance act, $1 billion is being made available for that purpose. Goods worth $1 billion can be sold for foreign currency. Unfortunately, in the United States they allowed the situation regarding these surpluses to get out of hand before instituting proposals of that kind.

Instead of continually criticizing the United States for making surplus goods available to foreign nations by means outside the ordinary channels of trade, we should do likewise in this country. We should give strong support to the proposals that have been made from time to time by the food and agriculture organization to set up a world food board, or agencies such as the international commodity clearing house. We believe the adoption of a two-price system would help to stabilize farm prices at a fair level; but the only real solution is to provide a total market. That would require a change in our financing so that a deficiency of purchasing power, resulting in a lack of effective demand, could be met by financing through the Bank of Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Legare (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, the budget speech delivered to the house in April by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) opens the door to an innumerable variety of subjects for discussion. The press has had a great deal to say about the budget and comments have been largely favourable. It has even been likened to an election budget, or a convention budget, as the member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) said, among others.

Had the present government not enjoyed the confidence of the people for such a long time, and were not this confidence continuously increasing, I hardly think the budget would be such as to save an administration in distress. It is a practical budget, based on present economic conditions and possibilities for the current year. The new minister, then, deserves the congratulations of the house and of the whole country for this, his first budget. A greater tax reduction would have been quite popular but anyone familiar with the present international situation and mindful of the threat of aggression will admit that, against its will, parliament has still to devote large amounts to national defence which could be used for a number of other purposes if peace were established.

I shall limit myself today to two topics only, immigration and the economic survey, announced in the budget speech.

The present government policy with respect to immigration causes me to wonder somewhat. Should we continue to admit some 150,000 immigrants a year to Canada until such time as the employment situation is more stabilized?

Some economists believe that immigration, even intensive immigration, is the key not only to our expansion but to our economic progress. We are told that our natural resources are plentiful, that our production should be larger and that an increase in population would mean a greater number of consumers. So far so good, and the majority of the people will go along with that equation.

But what price that equation when we read in the newspapers that thousands of immigrants are out of work in western Canada, while hundreds of others are looking for work in the province of Quebec.

It seems that a large proportion of immigrants turn to seasonal jobs, such as farming in western Canada or mining or forestry in the province of Quebec. Consequently thousands of men, with a large proportion of immigrants, are thrown on the labour market during the off seasons.

On the other hand, we cannot contemplate offering permanent jobs to the immigrants while leaving the seasonal jobs for our present population.

Therefore, so long as our climate remains as changeable as it is today, our seasonal industries will keep on disturbing our labour market.

Quebec was once in a much more favourable position than it is today, especially when lumbering operations were conducted in wintertime. Our farmers or their sons, as soon as the crops were in, were then making for the forest to take up lumbering. Many labourers from our urban centres also took advantage of the interruption of public works and house building during the winter to take up wood-cutting. Today, as I already mentioned previously in this house, the procedure is reversed, and lumbering operations often start in the summer, with the result that the number of unemployed is much larger in the winter. There are also the Ungava mines where operations are to be interrupted during the winter on account of the temperature which prevails during that season; thousands of workers, of whom many are immigrants, will become unemployed. And these are only a few examples. The problem, in my opinion, is more complicated than one would imagine and the co-operation of all the industrial leaders and the governments will be required in order to bring it to a solution.

I am in favour of immigration as long as the country benefits from it and its present population does not suffer from it. The immigrant himself, who has been attracted to Canada by the popularity of our country abroad, does not deserve to suffer the hardships of unemployment, particularly if he left a regular and permanent job in his own country.

When too much attention is given to the economic aspect of immigration, the human aspect is often forgotten. Our country needs consumers and is able to absorb millions of them, but these consumers represent an asset for us only as long as they produce and are not unemployed.

This problem which is one of the main causes of concern for the government should be placed on the agenda of the royal commission which is going to examine our economic position and its future. Our economy is linked to our productivity, which in its turn is dependent upon our population and foreign markets. Today, there are two seemingly weak links in the web of our economy: our production cannot find enough consumers and our consumers do not enjoy stable enough employment.

In my humble opinion, the proposed royal commission should more particularly try to find the causes of unemployment, study the effects of seasonal industry on the labour market and suggest the remedies which would help not only to give employment more stability, but to find work for a greater number of immigrants.

Until then, if the hon. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) or the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) can bring evidence before the house to show that our immigration policy does not tend to increase the number of unemployed, I know they will render a great service to many hon. members in this house.

I have listened closely to the brilliant speech of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) in favour of immigration, and, despite his many quotations, he was unable to dispel my doubts.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of increasing the population of this country by all accepted and acceptable means, but only when it can be proved, otherwise than with theories, that the arrival of immigrants, far from increasing unemployment, is creating new jobs.

I am satisfied that the opinion I have just expressed is shared by a number of my fellow citizens. They do not know what to think of our immigration policy, and they are right.

To go in for selective immigration, to attract here foreign skilled labour which is not to be found in this country, that is fine. But that we should admit and attract from overseas unskilled workers, farmers who have never in their lifetime so much as touched a farm implement, jacks of all trades without a trade, as we now have them in this country by the thousands seeking employment, that is what many people cannot understand.

Oh, I know very well that the Progressive Conservatives in this house would like to see the government intensify immigration. We never take in enough immigrants, according to them. Instead of 150,000 we should admit 200,000, 300,000 and 400,000 annually. But who is it, in this house, who have been crying blue ruin because we have thousands of people out of work? Who, among them, could tell the house where the unemployed are capable of finding work at this time and where the thousands of immigrants who are about to disembark will find jobs?

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by expressing the hope that soon the government will be in a position to show the house with figures to prove their contention that immigrants are not responsible for the present employment situation and that the present immigration policy is such that it is truly beneficial to this country.

(Text):

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion is supposed to be the budget. I use that expression because

I think almost everything has been discussed in this debate as well as the budget. This budget does not seem to inspire any particular enthusiasm. I have heard it dissected by those who are opposed to the government; I have heard it praised by those on the government benches, and I still lack enthusiasm for it. It is not an inspired budget. It is a milk and toast budget. It is a wishy-washy budget. It does not get anyone very excited, least of all myself.

I was interested in hearing the comments of my own townspeople in regard to it, and I found the same apathy there I have noticed elsewhere. However, I should like to report one or two of the things some people talked to me about in regard to these financial measures. One was the injustice of the $60 ceiling on the contribution toward old age pensions under the income tax. In my opinion that is unjust, and most of the people with whom I talked agreed with me.

Another thing they talked to me about was the refusal of the government to make medical expenses deductible from the first dollar for purposes of income tax, as has been recommended at various times in measures introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When we talked about the fact that there was a little easement in income tax the question immediately arose as to why the level of exemptions was not raised; why that method was not used rather than the other. To the man with the small income the actual dollar relief is small indeed.

Those are some of the things they talked to me about in connection with the budget. Then I had a visit from some of my friends who are automobile dealers and who indicated to me that they felt they had been treated with some injustice. While they welcomed the remission of 5 of the 15 per cent excise tax on automobiles, they resented the fact that they had some new cars on hand on which they had already paid the tax and there was no means by which they could get back that tax money unless this government was prepared to return it. They approached me as they have other hon. members. I have heard their plea put forward here by members of all political parties, including the government party, that something might be done in that regard.

As one might suspect from my treatment of the budget, I rise tonight to say a word or two about something else, namely the catastrophe that has just occurred in my own province and city. We had entered upon this year of 1955, this fiftieth anniversary, with pride and high hope, and it was a tremendous disappointment to us that we had to suffer at the hands of the weather as we have done during this past week. I am referring to the storm which occurred in Saskatchewan.

My city was in the path of that particular storm, which did a great deal of damage. Hon. members no doubt have been reading the headlines in the papers. I have one here, but I would draw attention to the fact that these headlines refer not to the day after the storm but to the day before the storm, or to the day on which the storm occurred. The storm completed the devastation. The Saskatoon Star-Phœnix of Tuesday, May 3, indicates that there will be a drastic cut in wheat acreage amounting to an estimated one-third to one-half in some areas.

We are told that this was the wettest April on record. The normal precipitation is ·5 inches, but this month we have had 3·38 inches. Anyone who has lived in Saskatchewan as long as I have, which is 45 years, will appreciate that this is a most unusual occurrence in the month of April. Generally all through the spring we look with anxious eyes at any cloud formation and hope we may get a good shower before June, or better still in June after the crop has been seeded. To start out in a welter of water such as there is this year is something so completely unusual that it has created a great deal of astonishment.

In a different column of this paper it is stated that cattle are being drowned in the Meadow Lake district in the overflowing streams, and that most roads in the province are impossible quagmires. These are some of the things that have happened to us this springtime, which we usually think of as being a warm and beneficent time of year. This year it has become something frightful and menacing.

As to the city of Saskatoon itself, there was an immediate disorganization of power, light, telephone and some transportation facilities. When the transportation broke down the mayor of the city declared a state of emergency. All three radio stations were off the air for some 15 or 20 hours. All this makes one think about what might happen in case of a war emergency. We all remember how the city of Montreal and some of the eastern cities were tied up by the great snowstorm of five or six weeks ago. This makes one realize what the danger would be if something more harmful than a snowstorm happened to one of these cities.

The city of North Battleford and some of the towns close to Saskatoon get their power and light from that city. When the power went off in those towns and cities they immediately tried to wire or phone Saskatoon to find out what the trouble was, and of course they discovered they could not get through. All means of communication—and when I say "all means" I mean it—had broken down. There was no way of getting any information as to what had happened. It was the next day before the people in those towns and cities knew what had happened to our city.

This storm is calamitous in more ways than one. If there had not been so much wind, as well as the snow, sleet and rain, we might have escaped comparatively free; but we had a combination of rain with sleet and snow. May I say that sleet, although it is common in this eastern part of the country, is very uncommon in the west. When the sun came out again people got around and tried to assess the damage. In the city communications began to be restored, traffic got under way again, and the temporary isolation was put to an end.

Here one should pay tribute to the people who handled that crisis; the city engineering departments and people who, I am told, worked for as long as 48 or 50 hours without a break, and the citizens who co-operated with these departments by lending their trucks and cars, the men of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation and of the Saskatchewan government telephone company, working unselfishly to establish communications.

How must one assess the damage from this particular storm? The provincial government was probably the public body which suffered most, because the provincial and municipal roads were washed out and in many cases impassable. The Saskatchewan Power Corporation, which supplies power and light to a great part of the province, and the telephone system were crippled. For miles the poles were down on the roads. The high voltage wires were down, which in itself formed a danger to the community. The damage to farms is incalculable and certainly, as yet, uncalculated, particularly in the eastern part of the province where there is water everywhere.

I have seen only one estimate of the damage, and that is by Professor Harrington, who is the head of the field husbandry branch of the University of Saskatchewan. His estimate was $50 million in terms of loss of the potential wheat crop. Notice that I said "wheat crop". We are well aware—in fact, it has been stated here today by one or two members who have spoken—of the important place wheat occupies in our national economy. On the basis of that loss alone one might claim that what has happened in our province might be termed a national disaster.

There are three ways, of course, in which this water will produce loss of wheat. The first is that land flooded in the low places will not be able to be seeded at all this year. Second, although they may dry up later, it will be too late to sow the flooded lands to wheat and they will have to be sown to coarse grains instead. Third, the late seeding of lands will produce a decreased yield and will make the crop a great deal more liable to an epidemic of rust, which hurt the province to such an extent this last year. The same thing, of course, applies to frost. There is no particular date when wheat should be seeded in the province of Saskatchewan, within a week or two, but Dr. Harrington estimates the date that wheat should be seeded is about May 7.

An hon. Member: How would you know when to seed wheat in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knight: Would my hon. friend do me the courtesy to keep quiet? I have listened to his silly drivel often enough, and I have never interrupted him. I may say that I was growing wheat in this country when my hon. friend was coming across from North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I beg your pardon for laughing, but my hon. friend always amuses me.

Mr. Gardiner: He should make you angry.

Mr. Knight: I do not want to get into an argument with the Minister of Agriculture. May I be allowed to continue. The sad part of this storm and the resulting damage is that a great many people who suffered last year are going to suffer again this year. I am thinking of the northeastern part of the province, Carrot River, Kamsack, and Nipawin districts where they suffered greatly last year and where this year the situation is going to be even more difficult. Perhaps this catastrophe will affect a greater number of people over a greater area than any of the Canadian catastrophes of late years.

If there is one good thing about catastrophes it is that they engender in people a spirit of help and co-operation. They bring people together. When a catastrophe happens, one remembers the pioneer days. When a person's barn was burned down or there was a prairie fire, or something of that kind, people came to help. In these catastrophes we may expect some assistance, and we are certainly expecting some assistance, from the dominion government.

I know it is not a popular philosophy, and in this house of practical men I almost hesitate to advance it, but perhaps we do at times emerge from hardships or struggle better and stronger for the suffering we have endured.

As I have said, that is not a popular philosophy and I do not expect my hon. friends to accept it. But we do need help, from our neighbours and friends. I believe that Saskatchewan, after this catastrophe, will once again prove its resilience. It is not the first time we have suffered catastrophes, whether of drought or of hail or of rust or of grasshoppers, and we have won through. In fact we have been able to contribute help to other parts of the country that have suffered the same sort of thing.

To come to the practical angle of this help for which we must ask the dominion government, we have been told in the last day or two that the premier of our province, Mr. Douglas, has been in touch with the Prime Minister in regard to this matter. Let me say that I thought the Prime Minister's attitude was reasonable when he stated that we must have an assessment from the provincial authorities as to what the damage actually is. Then we hope favourable consideration will be given by the dominion government, who might be reasonably expected to contribute a considerable amount in the way of help.

That is my plea and the reason I rise tonight. I have said something about the loss of provincial services, roads, light and power wires, and so on. Losses to individuals will of course be heavy. When I read about people, for instance, who have lost their cattle, I presume there will be property compensation for the loss of cattle, for buildings damaged by water, etc. But actually the great loss will be suffered by those to whom the making of a livelihood by the growing of grain will be denied for this year. We may as well face the fact that these people are going to be in dire straits by next winter, and the government may count on that in planning their assistance.

Someone has suggested an immediate start on a drainage program, and I think that is a good idea. So far as the land in the northeastern part of the province is concerned, I do know that the provincial government instituted a work and wages program in that region to compensate the people for the loss of their incomes last year. I hope that will be continued, but I suggest it will have to be continued on a much larger scale. I think the northeastern part of the province has some of the finest land in the world, certainly the finest land I have seen, but under present conditions it will have to be drained to be used at all.

That is one place where co-operation between governments might result in an immediate start which would have, as well as its ultimate objective, the result of providing some work for people who for this year at least will not be able to make their usual living from their farms. Therefore my plea is that the government should co-operate immediately with the provincial government in starting some such program. That is the immediate necessity. In the long run the government should give generous consideration to whatever claims for assistance may be advanced by the province of Saskatchewan after some assessment of the damage has been made, and should render such assistance as may be judged reasonable in view of the experience with similar disasters in the past.

Mr. P. T. Hellyer (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to say that I for one was very pleased with the budget brought down on April 5 by the Minister of Finance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: I think it was a definite step in the right direction and will provide a very beneficial stimulus to our economy generally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Are they the ones who helped you write your speech?

Mr. Hellyer: The additional purchasing power left in the hands of individual taxpayers will form the basis of increased demand for consumer goods and services. Inventories will be depleted and the tempo of our giant industrial machine will be accelerated.

The reduction in corporation tax will have a beneficial effect too, but only subject to the following conditions. If the increased profits are used for further industrial expansion it will provide jobs, while at the same time increasing our productive potential even further. If, on the other hand, the tax reductions are passed on to the consumers through lower prices for all products where there is an elastic demand, consumption and hence employment will increase.

Helpful as these improvements are, even coupled with the upswing in economic activity which appears to be taking place at the same time, it may still be necessary for something further to be done in order to provide jobs for those unemployed at the present time and those entering the labour force. There are many ways in which economic stimulus can be provided, but some of them are much more effective and more suitable than others. I should like to discuss one of these possibilities.

I think the time has come when the federal government should embark on the construction of a system of federal roadways, and I should like to suggest that $2 billion should be earmarked for this purpose, to be spent over a five-year period. The reason I say a federal system of roadways is that I believe only in this way can a country of ten individual jurisdictions hope to have a consistently adequate arterial road system. It is true that a start has been made in the form of the joint enterprise known as the trans-Canada highway. It is because of the experience associated with this road that I propose that the federal system should be built, financed and maintained by the federal government. Some of the provincial governments have shown considerable ineptitude in getting proper value for money expended on highways, in particular where the money was raised by the federal government and handed over to them. I think we could expect good value if such a project were administered by this government, and there is no one better qualified to direct such a project than our own Minister of Public Works.

What are the implications of such a system? They are material to a number of individual problems, and it is necessary to examine several of them. First let us consider commerce. There is no need of reciting all the developments which inevitably follow new transportation routes. I do not think anyone will deny that along such a system of roads would spring up new towns and cities, new factories and facilities, new enterprises and developments of all kinds. The stimulus to our commerce generally would be so substantial that it is difficult to project. It can be safely stated, however, that it would be sufficient to warrant the expense and in the long run would repay the cost many times over.

A direct and immediate function of such a system of arterial roads would be a tremendous improvement in our civil preparedness. There are those who state that in this day of atom and hydrogen bombs civil defence is merely a myth. I cannot and will not subscribe to such a theory of hopelessness. There is an excellent possibility that we would obtain three or four hours' notice of attack by any prospective enemy. With even such a short notice, provided the necessary highways for egress from our cities had been built and our civil defence organizations had been properly trained, we could hope to evacuate a large proportion of the inhabitants from any or all of our major cities.

Under today's conditions any plan would be very difficult to implement. An attempt to evacuate the city of Toronto at the present time would cause one of the most fantastic traffic jams in history, and it would take hours to untangle it and get the people either out of or back into the city. To be effective and even moderately adequate we would need three or four eight-lane limited access highways leading out of the city in various directions. This would involve a number of arterial collector roads running through the city itself, such as an extension southward of the present highway 401, an eight-lane Don valley expressway from the waterfront right north to the city limits and beyond, the Spadina road extension, and a widening of the Toronto by-pass highway to a minimum of eight lanes.

It is interesting to note that the usual lack of foresight has been shown in respect to this last-mentioned road, which is only four lanes and will be inadequate 48 hours after it has been opened from the Queen Elizabeth highway to the Kingston road. The eight-lane provision would have to extend outward from our major cities at least 200 miles, because otherwise the congestion at the end of the wide road would work backward and destroy its usefulness. By having several such roads leading from each city it would be possible to use all of them, with the exception of the one over which severe radioactive fall-out would be expected, having due regard to the direction of the wind at the time of any imminent attack.

These facilities for egress should be provided for all our major cities, and proportionate facilities for any others which could reasonably be expected to become even secondary targets. This would certainly include Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, etc. Should an attack come and as a result of our lack of foresight the necessary escape routes not be available, it would be a dreadful thing to feel responsibility for such a grievous error.

A third important aspect of a continent-wide highway system would be our tourist trade. It was most disturbing to me to note that in the year 1954 we had an adverse balance with the United States in respect to tourist business. Something must be done to reverse this situation. An examination of the complaints of United States tourists shows that only two are significant, our roads and our accommodation. We have so many wonderful attractions which our United States friends are anxious to enjoy that it seems a shame we are our own worst enemies in making it so difficult for this great luxury loving tourist inflow.

The first half of the problem would be overcome by a really adequate system of transcontinental and defence arterial highways. The system would, of course, have to be joined to the United States system at all important border crossing points such as St. Stephen, New Brunswick; Rouses Point and Stanhope, Quebec; Cornwall, Niagara Falls, Fort Erie and Windsor, Ontario; Emerson, Manitoba; Estevan, Saskatchewan; Coutts, Alberta; and Pacific Highway port in British Columbia. There may be others, new places, which would also be worth while connecting up. It should also, of course, be connected with subsidiary highways into our various playground areas.

The other half of the tourist problem is, of course, to encourage the building along and throughout the system of great new accommodation centres such as our United States friends patronize and enjoy. These centres should be complete with facilities for sleeping, eating, automobile servicing and, where possible, recreation. Naturally such new and modern centres would be appreciated not only by our visitors but by our own citizens as well. Their building and maintenance would provide a great number of new job opportunities. We could, at the same time, further develop the art of service which is so apparent in some countries which specialize in the tourist business. We should also specialize in Canadian foods and fly the Canadian flag as our United States friends come here to enjoy something different and not just to witness an endless repetition of facilities similar to their own.

It is a fair question to ask how we could finance such a system of roadways. I propose that they should be paid for not out of current revenues but rather by having the cost amortized over a period of 20 or 25 years. The mechanics of this method of financing would have a tremendously stimulating effect on our economic set-up and the results, direct and indirect, would be most gratifying.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think it is reasonable to affirm that any project which would have such a beneficial effect on our commerce, provide the foundation of civil defence and safety for millions of our citizens, and in many parts of our country increase our tourist trade three or fourfold, while at the same time providing directly and indirectly tens of thousands of new jobs for our people, is so important and so urgent that it should be proceeded with as quickly as properly engineered plans can be prepared.

Mr. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I propose discussing tonight, Mr. Speaker, the subject of dominion-provincial conferences. This subject is closely related to the Minister of Finance's budget speech, because he devoted several paragraphs to federal-provincial relations. I know that the word "dominion" has become a rather naughty word but it is not yet an unparliamentary expression, so perhaps I shall be able to use it during the course of my remarks. As I have consulted the reports of earlier conferences, I have found that until very recent years they were called dominion-provincial conferences. I find it so much easier to use that term.

I want to talk about what I call Canada's other parliament, that is the dominion-provincial conference which assembled in Ottawa just two or three weeks ago and which will reassemble in October. Canada's other parliament is composed of the Prime Minister and the 10 provincial premiers, assisted by their respective cabinet ministers. At the meeting on April 26 there were in attendance approximately 80 persons, representing all the provinces and the dominion government.

You will recall that meetings were held in the railway committee room. The first meeting was open to the public, with the result that there were more members of the House of Commons sitting in as observers than there were in this chamber. In fact for the two days of the conference the House of Commons could very well have been adjourned. The Prime Minister, and I presume the senior cabinet ministers, were either in constant attendance or very close at hand. I believe we were not able to continue the budget debate on Tuesday because the Minister of Finance wanted to be present at that conference. The press gallery had no other interest except the conference, and the public at large was awaiting with eagerness the reports of the conference because it was recognized that on it hinged much of great importance to Canada as a whole.

The Prime Minister recognized the great interest that was taken in the conference and, thanks to his kindness, I have in my hand a copy of the proceedings at the preliminary meeting. It is the unrevised edition, and the only words I propose to quote from it will be the words of the Prime Minister himself. Since he is present this evening, if there is anything wrong with the quotation he can make a correction. I notice on page 4 that he said:

> Though this is only a preliminary meeting for the 1955 conference, it seems to have attracted a large amount of attention outside as well as inside this chamber.

I certainly agree with that; it attracted a great deal of attention. I propose to examine for a few minutes the history and purpose of dominion-provincial conferences. I will suggest that serious thought must be given to their development and to the long-term effect on the prestige, authority and development of the parliament of Canada, with particular reference to the House of Commons.

My attention was directed to this subject for two reasons, the first of which I have given; that was the intense interest in the conference which assembled here at a time when the House of Commons was in session. The second reason was that at that conference the Prime Minister took the opportunity of making a considered statement with regard to unemployment and set out certain proposals of the government.

Consider the circumstances. Parliament was in session, and had been sitting since early in January. The subject of unemployment had been under debate for a very considerable time on an amendment proposed by Her Majesty's loyal opposition. Eight days of debate had been devoted to that subject and many members on both sides of the house had spoken. Time after time the Prime Minister was asked to make a statement, to disclose government policy, but remained silent. Yet on the opening day of the dominion-provincial conference, in his opening address to the assembled delegates the Prime Minister dealt at some length with the subject of unemployment and presented the government's plan to deal with the emergency.

This to my mind, or in my experience, was one of the most outstanding instances of bypassing parliament. Frequently members of the opposition complain when cabinet ministers make statements of government policy at public meetings, or by means of press releases, when the House of Commons is in session. We think they should inform the House of Commons first. On this occasion the Prime Minister declared his policy first to the dominion-provincial conference.

The question arising, then, is this. Is the dominion-provincial conference a superior governing body in this dominion? Before that question can be answered one should look at the history of dominion-provincial conferences. That is exactly what I have done, and I shall pass on to the house the information I have gained. The subject, of course, is large and all-embracing, and the time at my disposal this evening is limited. I do not propose now to deal with all the aspects of dominion-provincial relations or go into detail to any great extent on some of these conferences; but here is the history I have found.

There were no conferences of this nature during the first 20 years after confederation. Then in 1887 the premier of Quebec invited the premiers of the other provinces to attend an interprovincial conference in the city of Quebec. Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba accepted the invitation. Eight days were spent in deliberations among the premiers who were there, and the subjects they discussed were annual subsidies paid by the dominion to the provinces —which they wanted to have increased—and amendments to the British North America Act.

Fifteen years later, in 1902, at the same place, another interprovincial conference was held. Five premiers and nine cabinet ministers from the provinces were present, and the same topics were discussed.

In 1906 the then prime minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was persuaded to assemble a conference at which the premiers of all nine provinces were present, along with their advisers. The conference, however, was mainly provincial. There were sessions at which members of the dominion cabinet sat in with the provincial premiers. The subjects discussed were subsidies, and a resolution was passed urging that the conference assemble annually.

Then in 1910 and 1913 two further interprovincial conferences were held, at which no representatives of the dominion cabinet were present. Similar subjects were discussed, plus representation in the House of Commons which, at that time, affected Nova Scotia particularly.

Then in 1918 Sir Robert Borden called a dominion-provincial conference. He and nine of his cabinet ministers were present. For the first time the chairman at one of these conferences was a dominion cabinet minister, the then minister of public works, Mr. Carvell. The conference was assembled just one week after the armistice, and the subject of postwar development of Canada was naturally of some importance. The main subjects which came up at that conference were soldier settlement, general land settlement, and the return of the natural resources to the prairie provinces. As nine cabinet ministers were present the opportunity was taken, during the course of the four-day conference, to discuss such matters as demobilization, reconstruction, employment, civil re-establishment, taxation, housing, technical education and highways. At the conclusion of the conference Sir Robert Borden thought it was rather useful, and suggested that similar conferences might be held at 10-year intervals.

In 1926 a three-day conference was held, attended only by the premiers of the provinces and their cabinet ministers. There was no representation from the dominion. Again they discussed subsidies and taxation.

The year 1927, Mr. Speaker, was the turning point or the watershed in so far as dominion-provincial conferences are concerned. The seven preceding conferences I have mentioned, with the exception of the one in 1918, had been interprovincial, and in the matter of agenda and subject matter had been largely under the control of the provincial premiers; and attendance, except for a few dominion cabinet ministers at three sessions in 1906, had been limited to provincial representatives. The year 1918 was the exception.

Since 1927 there have been seven dominion-provincial conferences, if I may count the two in 1950 as one. They have been called together on the initiative of the dominion government, and the conferences have acquired an importance in national affairs greatly exceeding their importance prior to 1927.

It was at the 1927 conference that the dominion government exercised its full weight and influence. Of the 46 persons present at the conference of cabinet rank, and I include premiers in that term, 18 were from the dominion. Similarly, in the conferences of 1935 and 1945 the dominion cabinet as a whole participated. These three conferences, those of 1927, 1935 and 1945, set the pattern of procedure and organization of dominion-provincial conferences. I am omitting reference to the conference of 1934, which was very briefly reported; I could find very little about it. I am omitting reference to the conference of 1941, which lasted two days, and I am omitting reference to the two conferences of 1950, one of which assembled in January to discuss constitutional matters, and the other in December to discuss fiscal arrangements.

These three conferences, of 1927, 1935 and 1945, have established a pattern for dominion-provincial conferences which is well worth examining. For example, in 1927 seven days were taken up in a discussion of a total of 40 subjects. These were grouped under three main headings, constitutional, financial, social and economic. Some of the subheadings selected at random are as follows: Senate reform, regulation of aircraft and flying operations, federal subsidies, taxation, customs and excise duties, agriculture, health, immigration, old age pensions, fisheries and Canadian nationality. In one form or other, all these subjects are under discussion almost every year in the House of Commons.

In 1935 the conference lasted five days. Six committees were set up to consider separately the following subjects: tourist traffic, mining development, agriculture and marketing, constitutional questions, unemployment and relief and financial questions. All of these again are subjects familiar to the House of Commons. The purpose of the committee discussions and reports of 1935 may be discovered in the words of Mr. Dunning, who was then minister of finance. He said, and I quote from page 37 of the 1935 report:

> We are receiving these reports in order that they may be submitted to the appropriate legislative and administrative authorities as a foundation upon which these authorities can base effective policy.

In other words the conference was designed to provide a guide for the development of legislative programs. At the same conference the then prime minister, Mr. King, looked forward to establishing the dominion-provincial conferences on a permanent basis and this is what he said at page 9 of the same report:

> This arrangement of continuity and permanence is necessary because co-operation between the dominion and the provinces is too vital a matter to be left entirely for intermittent conferences, and to correspondence between governments. Our secretarial arrangements and our proposed organization are based upon this desire to have permanence and continuity.

At the conference of 1945 dominion-provincial relations burst into full bloom. It was the twelfth in the series, the largest in attendance, the lengthiest and most impressive in subject matter. Sixty-eight persons of cabinet rank were present, assisted by 140 advisers and officials. Their printed proceedings cover 624 pages. They sat here in the House of Commons part of the time and in the Senate chamber on other occasions. The general topic of that conference was reconstruction, and the dominion proposals were put forward under these headings: financial arrangements, public investment, health, old age pensions, unemployment assistance and tax rental agreements. Once again I point out that these are subjects frequently mentioned in debates in the House of Commons.

The year 1955 has seen the commencement of another dominion-provincial conference which after a two-day session in April to draft and set the subjects for discussion in the fall, is due to reassemble in October. The subjects suggested by the various premiers as proper for the conference to consider cover almost the whole field of House of Commons activities. I have listed them all here, but I have not counted them, they are so numerous. However, there were notable exceptions; for example, external affairs, defence. The conference apparently decided to deal with unemployment, fiscal arrangements or taxation, resources development, health and welfare, and most likely will give consideration to holding more frequent conferences. Ever since 1887 the provincial premiers have been suggesting this, and a permanent secretariat.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this survey raises this question. Why are these dominion-provincial conferences necessary? The answer briefly seems to be that there is something wrong in the confederation that is Canada. These conferences seem very similar to international gatherings such as the United Nations, NATO, or commonwealth conferences. Heads of governments or cabinet ministers representing sovereign states meet together to solve pressing problems. Many of these international gatherings end in frustration. Some people have suggested that a federal union would be better for some of these purposes, for example, among the nations comprising the Atlantic community or among the nations of Europe.

Here in Canada we are reversing the process. We already have a federal union with elected representatives from all the provinces. Why then must the heads of the 11 governments of Canada meet in conference to make plans for the country as a whole? Not content with 11 governments for a population of 15 million, we are now engaged in an attempt to establish a twelfth government superior in functions and importance to the other 11.

The root of the problem seems to be in the field of taxation and administration. And, as I have noted, in all the conferences since 1887 the problem of fiscal arrangements, taxation or subsidies, has come to the fore. In 1945 the present Leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Drew) who was then premier of Ontario, summed it up as follows, and I quote from page 11 of the report of that year:

> There is one fundamental weakness in the British North America Act which lies at the root of many of our difficulties. While the legislative powers of the dominion and provincial governments were defined with reasonable clarity, the division of taxing powers was left in a much less satisfactory position. The provinces were empowered to levy taxes in the field of direct taxation . . . whereas the dominion government was authorized to raise money by any form of taxation. We therefore have the anomaly that, while the powers of the provincial governments have been extended by judicial interpretation of their statutory powers, the dominion government has found it necessary over the years to occupy more and more the only field of taxation which was made available to the provincial governments.

The recurring theme throughout all these conferences from 1887 to the present day has been that these provincial responsibilities have been increasing while the financial resources have not been adequate, hence the conferences, hence the suggestions for more frequent meetings and for a permanent secretariat, hence also the growing importance of the conferences and their overshadowing of parliament.

The problem is clear; the solution has not yet been found. For the last 70 years provincial premiers and prime ministers have been attempting to solve this problem without success. It may yet be done through the medium of a dominion-provincial conference, but in the process we may witness, if these conferences are to continue at short intervals for another 70 years, the decline of the prestige, influence and power of the House of Commons.

The reason I say this, Mr. Speaker, is that the conferences, ever since 1927, are tending to range over the whole field of public interest and endeavour. What purpose is there in debating the subject of unemployment in the House of Commons if the policy in that regard is to be announced first to a dominion-provincial conference and the decision thereon to be dependent, perhaps, on the deliberations of that body? What purpose to debate the development of our resources if that is a subject for the conference in October? Why bother in the House of Commons with the subject of health and welfare if the conference has that on its agenda?

I do not suggest that provincial comments are not necessary and desirable on these and many other matters, but is a full-dress conference the best way to get provincial approval or disapproval? I notice that in his introductory remarks at the conference in April the Prime Minister mentioned that there were other means. He is reported at page 3 of the proceedings as follows:

> Taking place between these main conferences, there have been many meetings of provincial and federal representatives on other and more specialized subjects. I think we may say that there is now more continuing and frequent contact between our government and their officers than ever took place before.

In my judgment there is ample opportunity for the dominion government to get the information it desires. Consider our position here under the federal union. The Canadian federal system is designed to give protection to the provinces through a fixed quota of members in the Senate, and to provide membership in the House of Commons through representation by population. The cabinet by custom and tradition recognizes the provinces in the distribution of portfolios. I doubt if the House of Commons has at any time since confederation been without a number of former premiers and former provincial cabinet ministers in its membership. In the two houses of parliament, if all vacancies are filled, there are 367 persons, each of whom has some knowledge of the problems of the province from which he comes. In every area of Canada there are officials of the dominion government. Between the provincial capitals and Ottawa passes an endless stream of correspondence. The telegraph, telephone and aeroplane have made communication reliable, speedy and convenient.

It would be interesting to determine the results that have come from the twelve conferences which preceded the one called for this year. What new ideas, what new policies have been advanced following these conferences? Has anything happened at them that could not have been accomplished in the House of Commons? It would be interesting also to know the cost to the taxpayer of these conferences.

I am not unaware of the fact that the desire for dominion-provincial conferences originated with the provinces, nor that suggestions for such conferences have been put forward frequently in the House of Commons. Until April 26 I had not considered the implication of these conferences and their probable effect on parliament. I now entertain grave doubts as to their purpose and value if they follow the course of the conferences of 1927, 1935 and 1945, and if they become a permanent feature of our system of government; certainly so if we are to become dependent on them for the forming of policies for this dominion.

The purpose of these conferences, in so far as I can judge from reading the proceedings, particularly those since 1927, has been to set forth matters of policy, to prepare for legislative programs either dominion or provincial; and in this connection I referred to the remarks of Mr. Dunning at an earlier conference. I suggest that the proposals put forward at many of these conferences involved taxation, and taxation is a problem which concerns this House of Commons. Parliament should decide the amount of taxes to be levied on our people, not a dominion-provincial conference which has quite often indirectly set figures and quotas which resulted in taxation.

I am suggesting that by dealing with dominion-provincial conferences the executive here, the cabinet, is not fulfilling its responsibilities to the House of Commons itself. This is a place where government programs should first be put forward, not at conferences.

Mr. Philpott: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: I have just about completed my remarks.

Mr. Philpott: In view of the proposal made at the opening of the recent conference, which involved co-operation among the dominion and provincial governments, would not the hon. member agree that it was a good thing for the dominion to take over part of the responsibility for the unemployed employables, and that this proposal had to be made at the particular kind of conference at which it was made?

Mr. Lennard: That is almost a speech.

Mr. Churchill: That is an easy question to answer, but with due respect to the hon. member I think it is hardly applicable to the suggestions I am putting forward. Certainly the problem of unemployment had to be dealt with, and dealt with quickly, but these suggestions could have been put forward here in the House of Commons. I am directing attention to the general problem of dominion-provincial conferences and their effect upon the House of Commons. An interruption with regard to a detail like that in my opinion is not in keeping with the thoughts which I am attempting to put forward.

I am putting these matters forward seriously, and with the hope that people will examine these suggestions I am making and perhaps be able to destroy them by their arguments. On the other hand, historians may discover later that in 1927, 1935 or 1945 occurred the beginning of the decline of the influence of the House of Commons, which we have heard mentioned on many occasions in the last few years.

However, I am coming rapidly to a conclusion. Throughout the course of these latest conferences mention was made that what was being held was just a conference, that there was nothing partisan about the discussion, that the parties were there to co-operate for the good of Canada as a whole. If they were just conferences, if there was nothing of a party nature about them, why have they been restricted just to government representatives?

I think sometimes we forget that our parliamentary system is dependent upon two forces interacting on each other. There is the government side, and there is the official opposition. I would suggest that conferences of this nature should be attended not only by the heads of the 11 governments of Canada but by the leaders of the official oppositions in the legislative assemblies of this country, along with their advisers.

If you carry this idea of dominion-provincial conferences to a logical conclusion, what happens? You have a government set up over and above the ones we now have, and the result would be a sort of small united nations assembly of Canada. What disturbs me is the effect of all this on the House of Commons.

I will conclude with this statement. Dominion-provincial conferences may continue to be a necessity for Canada. If so, they should be restricted to the core of the problem, the division of administrative responsibility between the dominion and the provinces, and the division of fields of taxation. Unless complete breakdown of the federal system is threatened, such conferences need not be held except at intervals of many years for any necessary review that may be required due to changing conditions. Dominion-provincial conferences established on a permanent basis holding more frequent meetings, conducted after the fashion of the conferences of 1927, 1935 and 1945, will develop into another parliament for Canada, and will result in the decline of the influence of the present House of Commons.

Mr. Jean Boucher (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this budget debate I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance on the presentation of his first budget. This budget was proposed to give us income tax reductions ranging from 2·8 per cent to 13·3 per cent, and gives at least 80 per cent of Canadians reductions ranging from 12·6 to 13 per cent, effective July 1 of this year.

I believe the Minister of Finance realized that business also needed a shot in the arm and consequently reduced corporation taxes, which will encourage manufacturers to expand plants and production, thus offering more jobs to Canadians. Corporations and businesses are like individuals in some respects. If the incentive is taken away because of exorbitant taxation and the shareholders are not getting a fair return on their investment, financial support is withdrawn, followed by loss of sales and loss of production which leads to lay-offs and unemployment.

This is a time to loosen up and encourage business to expand. The tax cuts are needed in Canada at the present time. We have a marvellous country, a marvellous future, and an almost incredible potential wealth. Our foundations are sound. But the government does not create one single item of tangible wealth. It does not grow any of our wheat, nor does it produce any of our steel, nor does it make any of the thousands of items that create what we now call our material standard of living. The government redistributes the people's wealth. It chooses where the taxes will come from and where the proceeds will go. The hon. member for Eglinton said the other day, and I quote, "This is a budget without any pattern. This is a budget that is not founded upon any principle".

Mr. Speaker, a shot of tonic was needed in our economy. We have had balanced budgets for 10 years or so, which is commendable.

But this does not necessarily mean that we always have to have a balanced budget. The hon. members of the opposition in past years have been asking repeatedly for a reduction in income tax. Now, when the time is ripe for such a reduction, they claim it is a rosy budget and that the government is putting too much faith in the ability of the Canadian nation to develop our immense resources.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense! Utter nonsense!

Mr. Boucher: As far as I am concerned I am satisfied that the majority of the people living in the constituency I have the honour of representing in this house approve of this budget. Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie is a typical Canadian constituency where English and French-speaking Canadians live together in peace and harmony. Even if industries are a big factor in the economy of our constituency, agriculture remains its most important one, and the dairy industry its backbone. Forty per cent of the population of Chateauguay and Huntingdon depend directly upon the dairy industry, and a much larger proportion of their population derive their income from it indirectly.

Those farmers are industrious, diligent and are attached to their work. Whenever one travels through their well-kept farms one has the impression that those farmers are prosperous. But we must not forget that last year's crop was very poor, almost to the point of failure. In many cases it will be necessary for my people to buy feed for their cattle and seed to sow this year's crop. For that very reason I wish to thank the Minister of Agriculture for taking positive action in the maintenance of the price of butter at 58 cents a pound. I know my constituents will appreciate this very much.

(Translation):

Because our farmers are progressive, because they are always anxious to add to their farm equipment as a means of increasing crop yields, they sometimes have to borrow. Our government, through the Canadian farm loan board, is trying to help farmers by making it easier for them to secure loans. Loans are granted up to a maximum of $10,000, which seems quite reasonable. The various systems of refunding those loans also seem quite favourable. Still, I wonder whether there is not room for improvement in certain particulars pertaining to the qualifications required for securing such loans.

For example, the Canadian farm loan board will not lend to farmers who hold part-time jobs elsewhere. But, is it not a fact that most farmers who apply to the Canadian farm loan board are precisely those who wish to improve the yield of their lands, so as to make farming their full-time work. Is it not true too that those farmers who take part-time work in this way do so to earn extra cash because, as a result of inadequate equipment, they do not make enough out of farming to live on.

Those farmers have no other purpose than to practise farming exclusively, but not unless and until their lands can support them and their family adequately.

I am therefore of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that these loans should be placed at the disposal of the farmers, even if they have to do part-time work outside the farm. It seems to me too that the farm loan board is far too strict on the score of mortgage guarantees required of applicants. As a notary practising in an agricultural district where lands are highly productive, I have had several opportunities of noticing how stringent were the board's requirements in this connection.

To my knowledge, a number of farmers have tried in vain to get loans from the Canadian farm loan board. After being turned down, they managed to borrow money from private sources, retired people with private means or from businessmen who would certainly have refused the loan if they had thought for a moment that the property to be mortgaged was of insufficient value to cover the amount of the loan.

I hope those remarks will receive favourable consideration so that in future our farmers will be able to obtain such loans without mortgage guarantees in excess of those asked for by private lenders.

A moment ago I was saying that the Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie riding derives its prosperity from the excellence of the work done by our farmers and the diversity of the industries established within its limits.

Therefore, I cannot defer to the arguments put forward by members of the various opposition groups who would have us believe that Canada is in the midst of a depression.

At times we may be faced, as in a few parishes in my county, with seasonal and temporary unemployment. However, I have no doubt that its present policy will enable the government to solve this problem once and for all. Already, in our region, we see a strong economic upswing.

I had the opportunity just recently of visiting a large textile mill in the Huntingdon district. I was pleased indeed to note a feverish activity in that mill. I take this opportunity to ask the government to consider seriously the problems facing that industry.

The leaders of the textile industry in my constituency are animated with the spirit of the pioneers of this country. They took chances with their money and placed at the disposal of their fellow citizens their great experience, so that today in Huntingdon we have mills providing employment to a great proportion of the population. The leaders of the textile industry were criticized for insufficiently modernizing their equipment. That criticism could not be levelled at the owners of the textile industries in my riding, because their equipment compares favourably with that of other manufacturers in this country and abroad. Labour is also excellent. Obviously, and it is all to the credit of the present government, our standard of living is equalled or surpassed only by the standard of living in the United States.

It will be readily admitted that it is not up to the government to come to the rescue of the lords of the textile industry who have failed to run their business efficiently. The others should, however, not suffer from unfair competition by nations less privileged in their standard of living. I submit these few remarks on the textile industry, because I am certain that the government will give them serious consideration.

The name of the other part of my riding, the Laprairie district, is now in everybody's mouth. This county, which, historically speaking, goes back to the seventeenth century, has always enjoyed great prosperity. The completion of the St. Lawrence seaway opens up the prospect of gigantic industrial development and, consequently, a much greater prosperity. Many industries are already paying fabulous prices for property adjacent the St. Lawrence river. Home building is growing apace and creating many jobs. Yet, these changes cannot but raise many problems, and I seize this opportunity to commend the government for having appointed as chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway project a man of such experience and such capacity for work as the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, who has proved his mettle for many years in and outside this house. The appointment of the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) should also be mentioned. His vast knowledge and his long parliamentary experience in the Quebec legislature had marked him for such a post. No doubt that under their leadership all the problems relating to the St. Lawrence seaway project will be solved.

Among those problems there is the price that should be granted to the land owners to be expropriated. Located in one of the most enchanting districts, across from the Lachine rapids and near the metropolis of Canada, these properties have an exceptional market value. And here, Mr. Speaker, allow me to make a special reference to the farms which are being expropriated. Apart from having an excellent market value, due to their privileged location, for housing projects, these farms are also considered to be among the best for market-gardening. Deals concerning market-gardening farms located in the same area are abundant proof of my statement, since the average price arrived at in these deals was about $1,500 per acre, without any buildings. I have no doubt that the St. Lawrence seaway authority will take these facts into consideration and adequately compensate the people who are being expropriated.

Before resuming my seat, I wish also to draw the attention of the seaway authorities to the fact that the very great majority of those expropriated will not yet have been paid when the time comes for them to leave their homes, about the first of June next, if my information is correct. I am told that in the past, in similar circumstances, the government has agreed to pay at once an amount representing 80 per cent of his offer when the parties had failed to come to an understanding. It would be unfair, I feel, to tell those people of whom a sacrifice is being asked in the general interest of the community, those people who did not wish to move elsewhere and change their way of living, who have worked on those farms for many generations since the time when our country was but a colony: "Go away, that is the law; whether you have money or not, you must move elsewhere; it is not our problem, it is up to you to agree to a settlement". Such a stand is not that of a Liberal government; I am convinced that the seaway authorities will understand their duty and thus maintain the confidence that the citizens of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie have had for such a long time in the Liberal party.

[Mr. Boucher.]

(Text):

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): It was not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this debate. I sometimes wonder why some speakers when they are addressing this house, especially of late, go out of their way to make provocative statements, which sometimes they know are not true. I often wondered if it were not the intention of the government purposely to create this impression so the work of the house would drag on. This type of speech only causes members of the house—forces them, in fact—to get up and reply.

As I said the other day, I was well aware of the fact that there was going to be a speech here against the Social Credit party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Studer: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Did I hear the hon. member say that the statements I made in my speech were not true?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You certainly did, without any question.

Mr. Studer: But I was reading from Hansard.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Your hearing has improved.

Mr. Studer: I ask that the hon. member withdraw those remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I was listening to the hon. member for Bow River. I think he did make a remark about members of the house in general which I would have felt, had it been applied to a particular member, would have been the cause of that member rising on a question of privilege. However, I did not hear the hon. member for Bow River refer to any of his colleagues in this chamber by name or by constituency, so I did not interfere.

The hon. member for Bow River knows, without me having to tell him, that stating that any member of the house made statements which he knew were not true is unparliamentary. I did not hear the hon. member for Bow River make that statement with reference to anyone in this chamber. If he is now making it with reference to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) I have no alternative but to insist that he withdraw that remark. I have said that I did not hear him make it, and I did not understand him as making definite accusations against any individual member.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): You are quite right, Mr. Speaker. I did not say the member made a statement that he knew to be wrong, because I will give him credit for not knowing just what he was saying. When I say, though, that a statement was made which was incorrect, I think that is quite within the rules of this house.

Mr. Studer: I was reading from the Hansard record; that is all I was doing.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I shall be reading the record to you in just a few minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The hon. member for Bow River has made it quite clear that he did not accuse the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek of making a statement which he knew to be untrue. Therefore, the hon. member for Bow River should be allowed to continue uninterrupted.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It is necessary at times for some of us in this house to get up and put the record straight. There are occasions, too, when elections seem to be in the offing, when some members get up—I would not say they do it intentionally—and make statements which when the record is read over are not just as true as they might be. It is my purpose this evening to make corrections in some of these statements. I hope when I have done the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek will be gracious enough to get up and acknowledge that the statement he made was made in utter ignorance of the true facts.

I want to refer, Mr. Speaker, to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek as reported on page 3511 of Hansard for May 5, 1955. He said:

> I have heard nothing from the Social Crediters who seem to be feeling more or less happy these days with regard to what their prospects may be in connection with future government here in Canada, the financial ability of the people and of the services that they may be in a position to offer to the people of Canada.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, we are quite well aware of the progress Social Credit is making. We are not alarmed about it. The only ones who seem to be afraid are the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek and possibly some of his colleagues. In his desperation he makes statements to this house which are contrary to the facts, and though he may have made them in ignorance, I think he should realize his inability to recognize the truth when he sees it.

Then he goes on, Mr. Speaker:

> But before you can offer any social service to the people of Canada, there is one thing that you must do about it. You must vote for it.

Mr. Studer: Absolutely right.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I continue:

> No one can obtain a social service in this country unless through this parliament we vote for that social service. If we vote against the social service, certainly none will be applicable.

He has taken very great pains to say that we voted against a social service. In a few minutes I want to show the hon. member where he was so far wrong that he himself need not be ashamed of it. He went on to say this:

> I think the Social Credit party is active throughout the whole country—

He can be assured of that.

> —in connection with advocating family allowances, leaving people with the impression that Social Credit was possibly the originator of these family allowances and—

He can again be assured of that; it is true. I do not know how he got the truth in there, but he did.

> —as they were possibly the originators they should be entrusted with the responsibility of increasing them.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we have always supported the principle of family allowances, and that is only too clearly shown in the record. Before I turn to the record, I want to quote just a little more from the hon. member's speech of the other day. I turn over the page to 3512, at the bottom, where he said:

> —in regard to the adoption of the family allowance measure—

Now, notice that.

> —in regard to the adoption of the family allowance measure—
> Mr. Knowles: It was no such thing.
> Mr. Studer: —the following names are written, and they are written there in indelible ink. There is nothing that any Social Crediter can do that will erase it. They are written there at page 364.

Mr. Studer: Could I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, you have said enough for a while. You can talk all you like afterward.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall produce page 364 in a moment to show that there was no recorded vote on the adoption of the family allowance measure; that is very clear from the record. The hon. member continued:

> The nays are as follows: Blackmore, Bryce, Burton, Castleden, Coldwell, Dorion, Douglas (Weyburn), Fair, Gillis, Hansell, Hlynka—
> Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.
> Mr. Studer: —Johnston (Bow River), Knowles, Kuhl, MacInnis, Marshall, Nicholson, Noseworthy—

Now, Mr. Speaker, we shall refer to the record. If the hon. member had taken the trouble—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Another country heard from.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there not a rule, sir, in the house against tedious repetition?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) may continue.

Mr. Patterson: You put your foot in it again.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): There is no one in this house who should be better acquainted with that practice than the hon. member who has just spoken.

The reason I am taking the time of the house on this occasion is to ensure that these tedious misrepresentations of the facts will not be permitted to continue. Sometimes it is necessary to go to some length in regard to matters of this kind.

Mr. Knowles: Ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne was taking place in 1944 the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) spoke. And may I say, when we are discussing the speech from the throne, that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) is entirely wrong when he makes reference to items which he says are included in that speech; because when the address is given we find quite clearly, as is indicated in this year's speech from the throne, that the hon. member moving the address in reply said, as reported in the translation of his remarks at page 11 of Hansard:

> That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada.
> To His Excellency the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, C.H., Governor General and Commander in chief of Canada:
> May it please Your Excellency:—

And this was what we were voting on.

> We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks—

And so on. We were not voting on any particular item in the speech from the throne. We were simply offering our thanks to the Governor General for having addressed us. It may be that the hon. member does not know this. However, we will come to that a little later on.

Mr. Studer: When the hon. member voted to defeat the government, would there have been family allowances if his vote had defeated the government?

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. The hon. member for Bow River may continue.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When we did vote on that we were voting confidence or non-confidence in the government. I have never, in the 20 years I have been here, voted confidence in this government, and I do not intend to start now.

Mr. Byrne: That is why you voted against family allowances.

An hon. Member: He did not.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The speech from the throne in 1944 said this, in part:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

Mr. Studer: And you voted against it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The Governor General himself has said there was no measure in his speech dealing with family allowances, but that "you will be asked". The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek does not know his grammar sufficiently well to recognize the future tense. But this clearly says, "You will be asked to approve a measure", and of course that statement was true. Again the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek cannot understand English when he sees it.

Now, when we come to speaking on the address in reply, if the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek had taken the trouble to read the record he would have got it straight. The hon. member for Acadia, speaking at that time, said this as reported at page 153 of Hansard for February 3, 1944:

> I very much welcome the government's proposal to pay family allowances. This is a step in the direction we have been advocating for a number of years. We first began to advocate something of this kind in this house in 1936; and I think most hon. members will recall how the suggestion that money should be paid directly to individuals outside the industrial system was scoffed at in this house. We were continually told that we were advocating something for nothing. However, apparently the government now see the light and are proposing to issue money directly to consumers instead of having it paid out through industry.

Mr. Byrne: And you voted against it.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I did not vote against it at all. Apparently you did not know what you were voting for in the speech from the throne, and apparently you do not know even yet. For the edification of some of these individuals who do not understand what the speech from the throne is, I shall refer again to the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, and the reference at page 259 of Hansard for February 8, 1944, to the subject of family allowances.

How people can be so stupid as to be able to read and not understand simple English is quite beyond my comprehension. If the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek had turned to page 259 of Hansard of 1944 he would have read this—and these are my own words:

> That purchasing power can be made up in several ways. A large portion of it can be supplied through industry, which pays the wages and salaries, but there is never enough paid out by industry in wages and salaries to begin to buy back the products of industry, and so there is always a lag. We have advocated the issue of national dividends to make up that lag. Every other party in the house has criticized and ridiculed this principle of national dividends. In view of that, it is amazing now to see in the speech from the throne mention made of family allowances.

It will be noted that I used the proper expression when I said that mention was made of it, but no proposal was ever included in that address; and that is where the hon. member's mind has been wandering.

An hon. Member: His beard got caught in the previous page.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I quote further:

> In view of that, it is amazing now to see in the speech from the throne mention made of family allowances. I have not heard anybody criticize them. Family allowances are in part a national dividend, but only to a very selected portion of our citizens. I am waiting with a great deal of interest to hear what the rank and file of the Liberals supporting the party which proposed these family allowances have to say about that.

This is the part of my speech to which I draw the attention of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek:

> The principle of the family allowance is sound.

We have never taken any other stand.

Then, Mr. Speaker, when we come to page 362 of Hansard for February 10, 1944, we find the vote recorded and, of course, as this was a non-confidence motion we voted non-confidence in the government.

An hon. Member: You voted against family allowances.

An hon. Member: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. It being ten o'clock, perhaps this would be a convenient place for the hon. member to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, because I am now turning my remarks from the address in 1944 to the problem to which it refers, namely the family allowances measure.

On motion of Mr. Johnston (Bow River) the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we are enjoying this so much we shall go on tomorrow.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

QUESTIONS

CUSTOMS TARIFF COLLECTED, 1954

Mr. Yuill:

What was the total amount of customs tariff collected in 1954, by the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. McCann:

Fiscal year 1953-54; Import duties, $441,581,409.68.

TELEPHONE LINES, QUEBEC—SUBSIDIES

Mr. Perron:

1. Since 1952 has the federal government granted any subsidies for the erection of telephone lines in the districts of St. Fabien and Ste. Lucie de Montmagny, in the province of Quebec?
2. If so, what amounts were granted annually during those three years?
3. Were the said telephone lines erected by the federal government? If so, what is the mileage thereof, and at what cost?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Telephone lines were erected in the districts of St. Fabien and Ste. Lucie de Montmagny by the federal government since 1952 at the following costs: 1952-53, nil; 1953-54, $19,926.84; 1954-55, $10,014.89.

During 1953-54 20 miles of poles and 48 miles of wire and in 1954-55 16 miles of poles were constructed.

HOSPITALS—DISASTER READINESS

Mr. Hellyer:

What action has the federal government taken in the province of Ontario toward preparing hospitals to operate under disaster conditions?

Mr. Robertson: As the third in a current series of hospital disaster planning institutes being conducted regionally across Canada, under the sponsorship of the Department of National Health and Welfare in collaboration with the Canadian Hospital Association, an institute was held on December 2 and 3 at the Hamilton General hospital. The Hamilton General hospital and the Oakville Trafalgar Memorial hospital of Oakville, Ontario, presented detailed plans for study. The institute was attended by the administrators, chiefs of surgery and directors of nursing services of 35 hospitals in the west-central section of Ontario.

It is hoped to be able to arrange in the near future for two more similar institutes for the benefit of the remaining areas of the province of Ontario. At their conclusion the chief officers of almost 100 hospitals will have received indoctrination and will be in a position not only to complete disaster plans for their institutions but to give assistance to other similar institutions in their vicinity.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—ENGINEERING SURVEYS

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough):

1. What are the names of individuals or firms engaged by the St. Lawrence seaway commission to make engineering surveys and investigations?
2. What was the amount of the fee paid each individual or firm (a) in 1954; (b) the first five months of 1955?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe):

1. Dominion Bridge Company Limited, Montreal, P.Q.; J. T. Donald & Company, Montreal, P.Q.; Lalonde & Valois, Montreal, P.Q.; Dr. P. L. Pratley, Montreal, P.Q.; Dr. J. Rousseau, Montreal, P.Q.; Surveyer, Nenniger & Chenevert, Montreal, P.Q.

2.

BUTTER

Mr. Argue:

1. Does the Department of Agriculture make butter available to institutions?
2. If so, when was such practice commenced and how much has been made available since that date?
3. How much was made available to each institution and at what price?
4. By what amount, if any, is the selling price below the purchase price?
5. What is the name of each institution, if any, having an unfilled butter purchase agreement with the department?
6. How much butter is still to be delivered in each case?

Mr. McCubbin:

1. The agricultural prices support board has a special arrangement for sale of butter to approved Canadian institutions.

2. February 1, 1955. 932,523·5 pounds were reported as sold up to May 6, 1955, under the arrangement.

3. All requirements of Canada first grade butter purchased and used by each institution are being made available at a discount of 21 cents per pound from regular price.

4. See answer to No. 3.

5. See answer to No. 3.

[Mr. Robertson.]

6. As long as the program is in effect each institution will receive the discount on all requirements purchased for use in the institution.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

P.F.A.A.-P.F.R.A.—FORMER MEMBERS EMPLOYED

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Are any (a) ex-M.P.'s; (b) ex-M.L.A.'s, on the staffs of or employed by P.F.A.A. and P.F.R.A.? If so, how many?
2. What are their names and their respective duties and salaries?

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Castleden:

How many persons were employed in each province by the Department of Agriculture during each of the following years: 1951-52, 1952-53, 1953-54, 1954-55?

AIR TRANSPORTATION COSTS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What was the total amount expended by the government of Canada for air transportation for: (a) civil servants; (b) commissioned officers in the armed forces; (c) officials and personnel of the Department of External Affairs, during each of the years 1953, 1954 and 1955 to date?
2. Of such amounts, how much was paid to (a) T.C.A.; (b) B.O.A.C.; (c) other air transportation?

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman would consent to have this amended to cover fiscal years instead of calendar years, it could be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: As amended, made an order for return.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—THEFTS

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace):

1. Have any thefts of money, postage stamps, or anything of value occurred in Canadian post offices since January 1, 1953?
2. If so, for each such theft, (a) where did it take place; (b) what was the amount involved; (c) what was the date of the theft; (d) has court action been instituted against specific individuals; (e) what was the result of such action, if any?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NO. 11 WORKS CO., R.C.E.

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all reports of findings of dishonesty or malpractice in connection with the irregularities at No 11 works company, R.C.E., made prior to the investigations currently proceeding.

He said: May I ask leave of the house, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw this motion without prejudice to the right to replace it on the order paper at a later date with a motion similar in effect but possibly subject to some rewording?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and/or the Minister of National Revenue since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said corporation.

Mr. McCann: I understand the hon. gentleman is allowing this motion to stand?

Mr. Fulton: If the minister wishes, I will allow it to stand, yes.

ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

Mr. Bryson:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents exchanged between the Department of Trade and Commerce, or any other department of the government and all farm organizations, and between the Department of Trade and Commerce, or any other department of the government and any person or persons, pertaining to the allocation of box cars among elevator companies since October 1, 1953, to date.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member indicated his agreement to amend this motion, Mr. Speaker, to limit its effect to correspondence between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the head offices of farm organizations. Subject to that amendment, I understand there is no objection to its being adopted.

Mr. Speaker: The motion, as amended, carried.

POLIOMYELITIS

SUGGESTED DISTRIBUTION OF SALK VACCINE BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. To ensure that wealth will confer no privilege, is the government prepared to take over all supplies of Salk vaccine available in Canada for distribution amongst the provinces, thus granting equal treatment to all Canadian children?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I was engaged in discussing another matter with the hon. member for Dauphin, Mr. Speaker, and when one is confronted on both sides by members of the same party one has to think carefully. I have already indicated that as a result of action taken some months ago by the federal and provincial governments regarding the distribution of the Salk vaccine purchased from the Connaught laboratories at the University of Toronto, and later from the institute of microbiology at the University of Montreal, there is no disposition on the part of either the federal or the provincial governments to permit within their borders any situation that would deny to the children of this country an equal opportunity to share in the advantages of this important discovery.

Mr. Coldwell: In view of the doubts that have been expressed about the vaccine produced by private companies in the United States, are any steps being taken to prevent Canadian children suffering ill effects from privately manufactured vaccine?

Mr. Martin: As I said yesterday, steps have been taken by the government to make sure that sources of the vaccine from commercial sources outside this country are carefully investigated. A small supply came in from one company about a month ago. There are some supplies in Canada now that are not at this moment being released. I have previously outlined the steps taken to check on production of the vaccine now under way in Canada.

NATURAL GAS

REPORTED CONFERENCE CONCERNING SUPPLY TO ONTARIO AND QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to convene a meeting here in Ottawa shortly with all parties who are interested in the supply of gas to eastern Canadian markets in Ontario and Quebec, in order to arrive at a decision on that question, which is of such importance to the gas producers of the western provinces.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that during the course of the preliminary meetings of the federal-provincial conference I had some conversation with the premier of Alberta who told me he was trying to organize a meeting that would take place here in Ottawa between himself and representatives of gas producers, and representatives of companies interested in providing a pipe line, to examine seriously the situation and try to determine what should be done.

I told him that I would be very glad to participate, but that I would prefer if possible that it would not be before the return to this country of Mr. Howe. He told me that it would not in any event have been convenient to have one before Mr. Howe's expected return, but that shortly after his return he would communicate with me and tell me what progress he had made toward organizing that kind of meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that meeting going to be convened to determine the question once and for all?

Mr. St. Laurent: No, I cannot say that a meeting is going to be convened to determine the question once and for all. It is a meeting that the premier of Alberta had in mind to deal with a natural resource of that province, and I do not think it would be proper for us to convene a meeting for that purpose. The premier of the province is arranging for that kind of a discussion. Whether the discussion will reach a point that can be regarded as final is something that no one can predict before the meeting takes place.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the meeting settle the question once, if not once and for all?

Mr. St. Laurent: Well, it is not a meeting that is being arranged by me. It is a meeting that was suggested by the premier of Alberta. Now, I do not know whether anything will be settled even for once. I do not know just what information will be before those who will be attending the meeting. I am sure that what the premier of Alberta had in mind was to try to have a proper assessment of the present situation made to see what could be done to achieve as rapid progress as possible.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. I would ask him whether Premier Manning's statement in the legislature yesterday has been brought to his attention, to the effect that the Prime Minister had agreed to a meeting in Ottawa to reach final yes or no answers on gas exports. Is that correct?

Mr. St. Laurent: I was not in Edmonton yesterday and I did not see the report of what Premier Manning said—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did it happen?

Mr. St. Laurent: —but I told him that I would be very glad to sit in with the representatives that he mentioned as being those he was going to invite. I told him I was sure we would all try to work out something that would mean real progress in the method of handling the surplus gas that is now available in the province of Alberta. I cannot go beyond that.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RELEASE OF INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) or to the same minister in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada. Will the minister investigate the statement made on Monday by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) regarding his interview with Premier Frost to determine whether or not the strict secrecy provision of the Dominion Succession Duty Act was violated? If it was, will an information or complaint be laid against the Minister of National Revenue?

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Knowles: If the Minister of Justice is not prepared to answer today, will he take the question as notice?

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 10, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the house adjourned I was discussing the question of family allowances, and had been quoting from Hansard for 1944. I was doing that because one hon. member had risen a day or so ago and accused members of this party of voting in 1944 against the family allowances measure which, he said, had appeared in the speech from the throne, and in other places. I had reviewed the part we had played in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne of that year, particularly as it dealt with family allowances, and I had shown from the record that Social Credit members on every occasion had agreed with the government on the principle of family allowances. I had pointed out that the fact we had voted non-confidence in the government in the division on the address in reply did not indicate at that time, nor does it ever indicate when a vote is being taken on the address, that those who voted against were voting against any suggestion made in the address.

I had pointed out that it did deal with thanks being offered the Governor General for making his address to the House of Commons.

I should like now to go one step further in connection with the discussion which took place in the budget debate of 1944. I would ask hon. members to turn to page 4377 of Hansard for June 29, 1944, where they will find recorded a quotation I should like now to place on record. It is as follows:

> I was pleased to see the government do one thing; that is, institute family allowances. May I remind the Minister of Pensions and National Health that the principle of family allowances was first advocated by us; only we called it a national dividend.

I made these remarks when I spoke in the debate, as recorded at page 4377 of Hansard. In the next column I had this to say regarding family allowances on that particular occasion:

> Whenever I have an opportunity to congratulate the government I am only too pleased to do so, but that seldom happens. The government has been accused of bringing in this program of family allowances as election bait, and I should like to say just a word on that point. As I have said already, I believe the principle is sound.

During the debate other hon. members suggested that the Prime Minister had brought in the family allowances as election bait because an election was in the offing. Whether or not that was the case on that occasion, sir, it seems rather a coincidence that a by-election is now taking place in Alberta. That may be the reason why the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) made the allegations he did a day or so ago regarding this question. Perhaps he had the same thought in mind, but if he has, then I am sure the facts I am placing on the record will serve a very useful purpose in acquainting the people of Canada, and particularly the people of that riding, if he intends to send his speeches out there, with the truth of the matter. I continue with the quotation:

> The Prime Minister stated definitely that the measure would not come into operation until July 1, 1945, and therefore he concluded that no one could accuse him of attempting to buy votes. Just let us analyse the position. I say that the most honourable thing the Prime Minister could have done was to bring that legislation into effect right now and give the people their family allowances. As it is, what is he doing? He is holding a club over the heads of the people of Canada, and saying, in effect at least, "If you do not vote Liberal—"

There was an interruption at that point. A little further down I had this to say:

> I quite anticipated a question like that, and I shall deal with it later on. In effect, the Prime Minister is saying, "If you do not vote Liberal you will not get family allowances. If you do vote Liberal we will give them to you." I think that is the worst kind of political intrigue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me apply the words that I used on that occasion to the debate which took place here the other day. If this is being used as political intrigue, then it is the worst type.

I do not intend to refer any more to what I said on that occasion, but I wish to put a quotation on the record which will leave no doubt whatsoever in the mind of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, and I hope he will take this to heart. At page 5412 of Hansard of July 26, 1944, the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) spoke. I have pointed it out many times, Mr. Speaker; I have referred to the votes and I have given the actual quotations of members of this party. But I do not see how it is possible for the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek to make statements such as he did the other day that we had voted against the family allowances measure.

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): No, I do not think so. The hon. member has already talked too much. If he is sorry, he should just keep his big mouth shut. I do not mean that in any offensive way.

Mr. Knowles: It is just a statement of fact.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When the hon. member for Acadia spoke on that occasion he said this:

> Mr. Speaker, we in this group believe that the principle of family allowances paid for in their entirety by the national government is entirely sound, and therefore we will support this bill.

If the hon. member sitting over on the other side of the house can understand English at all that should be clear enough for him.

Mr. Studer: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): To say that we voted against family allowances—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek wishes to ask the hon. member for Bow River a question. Apparently the hon. member for Bow River is not prepared at the moment to receive the question. At the end of the speech of the hon. member for Bow River the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek may ask his question if he cannot have the question put now.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was just reading the remarks of the hon. member for Acadia and I shall continue them:

> However, that does not mean that we are entirely satisfied with all the provisions of the bill, but we will deal with them when we are in committee. Personally I am not very much impressed with most of the criticisms—

I want you to notice that, Mr. Speaker.

I am not very much impressed with most of the criticisms that have been levelled against this measure. For example, it is argued that one of the provinces will benefit to a greater extent than the others.

Of course, that reference was to the province of Quebec. I continue:

The same people charge that this is a form of appeasement to Quebec. I do not think that is a fair criticism. If the principle of the bill is sound, and I believe it is, that these allowances should be paid as a right, then what difference does it make where children may live, whether they live in the east, west or centre? As time goes on, that is a situation which may very well change. After all, it is a situation that is fully under the control of the people residing in the respective provinces. They can change it as they so desire.

I hear somebody behind me say: Page the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

This is the debate that took place on the family allowances measure itself. I want to conclude in a few minutes by referring to further paragraphs of the actual debate on family allowances when the measure came up for second reading. This is the only time throughout that entire debate, in fact throughout the entire session, when there was a vote on the family allowances measure. Of course, as was indicated in the speech from the throne during that year, the governor general indicated that a measure dealing with family allowances would be placed before us. Of course, that measure did appear and it is the one we are talking about now. The debate on second reading appears on page 5538. The vote is recorded, Mr. Speaker, and you will find that everyone in the house supported it. There was not one dissenting vote. The yeas were 139 and the nays, nil. Surely, Mr. Speaker, no one can honestly rise in his place in this house and say that the Social Crediters voted against the family allowances measure, either as it was mentioned in the speech from the throne or when it came before the house.

I have traced the history of family allowances right from the opening day of parliament in 1944 to the present. The bill was reported, read the third time and passed unanimously, as will be found on page 5757 of Hansard for the year 1944. Surely, I cannot make it any plainer than that. I have tried to outline the entire discussion on family allowances; I have traced the discussion through its various stages.

On the speech from the throne, on the budget, on the Family Allowances Act itself; at every one of those stages the Social Credit party supported the principle of family allowances. When the only vote on this motion was recorded the record clearly indicates that Social Credit members voted in favour of the motion. I hope that from now on, since the record has been put straight on this matter, no hon. member will dare rise in his place in this house or outside of this house and say that the Social Credit party ever voted against the family allowance measure.

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question? The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has been talking through his Social Credit hat. The question I would like to ask is this: the proposal for family allowances was contained in the speech from the throne and I should like to ask the hon. member why he voted for the defeat of the government on February 10, 1944, when he voted against the adoption of the speech from the throne which contained the family allowance proposal. If that vote had gone the other way the government would have been defeated and we would have had to depend on Social Credit for family allowances.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The hon. member has asked me a question. It seems to be the mentality of certain people that when they say they want to ask a question it is merely a deception; they have no intention of asking a question, they simply want to make another speech. The hon. member has stated that we voted against the proposal in the speech from the throne.

There was no proposal in the speech from the throne. May I once again read what the governor general said on that occasion. Are some people going to be so stupid as not to understand what the governor general said? Here are his own words:

—you will be asked to approve a measure—

That is clearly an indication that the proposal was never in the speech from the throne. How could it be? It just simply could not be. This is what the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek said in his speech as reported on page 3512 of Hansard of May 5, 1955:

—in regard to the adoption of the family allowance measure, the following names are written, and they are written there in indelible ink. There is nothing that any Social Crediter can do that will erase it. They are written there at page 364.

I say that there is no vote on page 364 of Hansard of 1944 on the family allowance measure. There is just no such vote there. The hon. member wanted me to answer his question and of course I will answer it. We never voted against the family allowance measure. We have voted non-confidence in the government and shall continue to do so as long as they put through such measures, which result in the tremendous unemployment problem we have today.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to join this portion of the debate, but I shall do so briefly. There is not too much that I intend to add to the argument between my genial colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), and my equally genial friend, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Two such genial gentlemen should be able to get along a little better.

However, to make a long story short I should like to quote the opinion of a former hon. member of this house who unfortunately is now deceased. I think that this hon. member was perhaps better thought of by hon. members in every quarter of the house than almost any other member of the House of Commons. I should like to quote the words of the late Gordon Graydon as reported on page 2541 of Hansard of April 25, 1949. Referring to the very vote about which the two hon. members have been talking he had this to say:

> There in Hansard on February 10, 1944, is the answer to all those things that have been said.

And again:

> But you cannot drown out the nays that are recorded on page 364 of Hansard of February 10, 1944. There are the names of those who voted against the speech from the throne which contained the family allowances measure.

I do not think there was any hon. member of this house whose opinions were more highly respected than those of Gordon Graydon and that is what he said on this particular point.

There are a few other matters I should like to deal with. I just returned from a 4,500 mile trip through my riding, pretty well all within its borders, about 3,500 miles by air and about 1,000 miles by car. I think I have obtained a pretty fair cross-section of opinion as to the state of the nation in those parts.

I gathered that the budget presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) was fairly well received. That which was received best was the resistance indicated to the terrific pressure of the past few months, not only in this house but by delegations of various kinds, to raise the tariff on incoming goods. Farmers in western Canada sell their produce on the world market and take what they can get. They do not have too great a quarrel with that, but in return they insist that they be permitted to buy on a market as nearly similar as it is possible to get, particularly that they be able to buy from those people who buy their products.

We have had many speeches, particularly from members of the official opposition, during this session asking for higher tariffs on British woollen goods and other goods. They get up and wrap themselves in the British flag and talk about calling a trade convention of the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Ferguson: That is a pretty good thing to wrap yourself up in.

Mr. Harrison: You will get more of this and you had better learn to take it. That is a horse of another colour. On one occasion they talk about a trade convention of commonwealth countries but the moment old Britain sells a yard of woollen cloth under their noses they want something done about it. People in the west, and particularly the farmers in my area, are very pleased at the stand taken by the Minister of Finance in resisting that type of pressure. We are not particularly interested in buying some ersatz type of thermos bottle at twice the price just because it is made in a Conservative riding near Toronto.

The policies of the Tory party have resulted in the representation they presently have in the west. They have nothing else to thank for it. Indicative of their treatment of people in the west is the treatment recently of their leader in British Columbia. I do not agree with their leader in British Columbia in his conclusions regarding the leader of that party in this house; in fact I disagree with him entirely; but I do not think he was treated any too well. Those are the opinions he holds. After 20 years of hard labour in the province of Saskatchewan they have finally elected a Conservative member to the provincial house. Now, lo and behold, our Social Credit friends come along and are going to steal him from under their noses as their Social Credit leader; so our press is telling us.

Mr. Low: Do you believe the press always? Are you so gullible? I can quote you something that the press has said about you.

Mr. Harrison: I should like to quote to you a great authority on this very subject, none other than our friend the premier of Saskatchewan. I shall show you that he is quite an authority on Social Credit. He is quoted as saying in the Saskatoon Star of March 2, 1955, in respect to this attempt to gather in this gentleman as leader of the proposed Social Credit party for Saskatchewan, that the Social Crediters should run a want ad. He said that the want ad should read:

> Wanted, an unsuccessful political figure willing to take the position of Social Credit leader in Saskatchewan, former political affiliations unimportant. Main qualifications—willingness to do what he's told.

Mr. Hahn: Quote something he said about you.

Mr. Harrison:

This is not the first time the Social Credit party in one province has endeavoured to select the leadership of the Social Credit in another province. One thing is certain: If Mr. Kohaly doesn't accept their lucrative offer he is going to make it very embarrassing for whoever does. One would be able to assume that in the meantime the price has gone up.

Mr. Douglas is a man by whose opinion we should be guided in this respect. I have read a few of Mr. Douglas' posters for the election campaign of 1935. It is interesting to read what these posters have on them. The first says "Fletcher". I thought at first that possibly it was "Thatcher", but I see it is "Fletcher":

Fletcher is not a Social Credit candidate.
Signed—H. W. Arnold, Social Credit provincial organizer, Saskatoon, Sask.
C.P.R. telegram.

Saskatoon, Sask.
Sept. 30, 1935.

Rev. T. C. Douglas,
Weyburn, Sask.

This will confirm endorsation of convention held Weyburn, twenty-eighth, of you as Social Credit candidate.

Signed H. W. Arnold, Social Credit provincial organizer.

Underneath that it says: "Vote Douglas". At the bottom it says "Issued by the C.C.F.—Social Credit, Weyburn Federal Constituency." The next poster he had put out reads as follows: "Douglas has been a student of Social Credit for many years." Then, in large type, "Douglas has endorsed Social Credit. The C.C.F. will make the Social Credit scheme possible." Either the battles we have had between the two groups in this house are just so much window dressing or this poster means what it says. This winds up by saying:

Vote Douglas

Issued by the C.C.F.—Social Credit, Weyburn Federal Constituency.

While he was here recently, Premier Bennett from British Columbia made some bombastic speeches to the effect that this small group was going to take over the federal government in the next election.

An hon. Member: Are you getting worried?

Mr. Harrison: I am not a bit afraid. You can concentrate on my riding if you want to. Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record what has happened to some of these gentlemen in other places. Here I might interject something that I learned from my hon. colleague from Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who is a man of long experience here. He said, "When the balloon is large, you provide the pin." I propose to provide the pin right now. You will find an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of the 15th November, 1954, which gives an indication as to how this party is doing in other places. It refers to the recent election in New Zealand, when they were also of the same opinion as Mr. Bennett, that they were going to take over there. This editorial reads as follows:

The National party, which promised little except a continuation of its moderate policies of free enterprise, won 43 out of the 80 seats in the next parliament. The Labour party, which promised some tax reductions and increases in welfare benefits was successful in the other 37 seats. The Social Credit party, which promised the voters everything but the moon with a fence around it, failed to get a single candidate elected.

An hon. Member: What was the percentage of votes?

Mr. Harrison: I have some personal experience with this party. In my own riding, since Social Credit has been an entity in Canadian politics, it has run there nine times either provincially or federally. We are right next to the Alberta border and might be susceptible to this type of thinking, but it has been indicated that we are not because on the nine occasions their candidates have lost their deposits.

Mr. Nicholson: Would the hon. member permit an interruption?

Mr. Harrison: I have a long speech to make. When I sit down you can use your time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): The hon. member for Meadow Lake cannot be interrupted without his consent unless the person interrupting him is rising on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: On a question of privilege, the hon. member has made a reference to Hansard. I have checked, and certainly he is not quoting from the right page. Before he finishes would he produce Hansard and give the exact quotation?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I do not think that a matter of a misquotation of that sort can be regarded as a question of privilege. If a personal explanation is required, I would suggest to the hon. member who feels aggrieved that he should catch the eye of the chair and make that personal explanation at the end of the speech which is being made by the hon. member who has the floor. I do not think that any personal references have been made by the hon. member for Meadow Lake as yet which in my opinion would justify rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nicholson: Earlier in his speech the hon. member made a reference to those who voted for family allowances in 1944 and referred to a page in Hansard. He made a reference to Mr. Graydon which is not on that page of Hansard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I can understand that certain hon. members who have been attacked as a group may feel aggrieved. I do not think that is a question of privilege. I think that is a question of fact or of argument, which should be met at the end of the speech which is being made and not as a question of privilege. The hon. member for Meadow Lake.

Mr. Harrison: I believe that if the hon. gentleman paid closer attention to what I said he would not be making the interjection he is making. If he has any troubles, he can come around and see me and I shall fix him up. There may be a question by hon. members as to what stopped Social Credit from coming across the border into Saskatchewan over such a long period of years. It is not because it has not tried. Of course, many hon. members are familiar with the iron curtain, and some are familiar with the bamboo curtain. But we have a curtain on the border of Saskatchewan that is known as the pussywillow curtain. It may not be important to you people, but it is important to the people of Saskatchewan. As you know, the Social Credit machine runs on oil, and this pussywillow is a very sticky proposition—

An hon. Member: You should know all about it.

Mr. Harrison: —with the result that the machine ground to a stop immediately it got across the border. Those who have got over temporarily have found themselves tickled to death by it and have suffered an ignominious death shortly after getting there.

Mr. Low: You hope.

Mr. Harrison: That is no hope. It is a matter of history for 25 years.

Mr. Low: You hope.

Mr. Harrison: The result has been that this pussywillow curtain has worked both ways. The socialists have stubbed their toes on the roots of this innocent-looking shrub and have fallen headlong into the province of Alberta also. I do not want to confine my remarks to my hon. friends over here, as we have even worse troubles in Saskatchewan.

In my trip I discovered that our friends of the, shall we say, left and the far left, who are in power in Saskatchewan at the moment, are suffering some falling-off in their prestige. There are reasons for this. This fact has been apparent in the northern part of Saskatchewan and the part that I represent because there they have applied socialism to the resources of the province most rigorously. It has not affected the people farther south so much. Now larger municipal units in that area have been rammed down people's throats without any vote. The hottest political issue I ran into when I was home was the proposed compulsory marketing of livestock. In my riding there is a tremendous resistance to that system, although Mr. Douglas says it is going to come. The downfall of the C.C.F. government is not too far away.

Mr. Ellis: You have been saying that for a long time.

Mr. Harrison: The main reason for that is the high taxation they have imposed on the land in Saskatchewan. Around Meadow Lake it is about four times what it was when they took office, and under present economic conditions out there it amounts to being confiscatory.

Finally, the pro-red tendencies of this party which finally came out in this session, and which have been indicated by actions taken by some of their members recently in this house, also are coming home to roost. Hence the party has slipped considerably in the last little while.

I should now like to take you briefly, Mr. Speaker, on a run around the little riding that I represent and give you some idea of the problems that are presented to you, and the variety of them that can be presented in a 3,500-mile trip by air in a riding that occupies nearly all of the north of the province, an area running 500 miles north and south and 250 miles east and west along the border of the Northwest Territories on one side, Alberta on the other and there is only a 60-mile strip of land in between my eastern border and Manitoba. This riding occupies about 40 per cent of the province of Saskatchewan. Being an area of 500 miles in length, running north and south, there is naturally quite a great deal of difference in the economy at the north end from that at the south end. In the southern end you are in an agricultural area. The agriculture is largely of a mixed-farming variety. In the middle you have timber and other natural resources such as fur and fishing. In the north you get into the great Canadian shield where mineral development has just been commenced but is already on a tremendous scale. Possibly if I took you from one little place to another, and just gave you an idea of what kind of problems you ran into in this area, Mr. Speaker, it would give you some idea of the size of the riding.

My first stop was at Meadow Lake, which is my main market town, about 80 miles north of the southern border. There I attended a meeting of the board of trade and they told me what problems they had. The first problem was an airfield so they could communicate with the large mineral area at lake Athabasca. I was able to assure them that the federal government was going to give them assistance this year in that respect and that work would commence on it this year.

The next problem they had, of course, was the flooding of Meadow lake and this was previous to the storms that have just occurred in Saskatchewan. Meadow lake itself had backed up about 30 miles to South Makwa and much land that previously has been cultivated will not be possible to cultivate this year. The Beaver river, which is usually about 75 yards wide, was some 14 miles or 15 miles wide for distances of 50 miles or 60 miles. I was speaking to one farmer there. I asked him how things were going in that country. This was previous to the recent flooding because they have had three bad storms there since then. He said, "My old man lost about 50 head of whitefaces that went down the river". I said, "Has he got any left?" He said, "Oh yes, he has a few. Some he took off the islands. When it flooded last year he was not able to get them off until December on account of the ice being thin and the fall being mild".

This is an indication of the kind of thinking that you get in that part of the country. These people were pioneers and they still have the pioneering spirit. They do not run to the nearest government with their troubles. They look after a great many of them themselves. It is not that they do not have troubles. But with all this flooding, I have not had one communication from Meadow Lake, and it is just as hard hit as is any other place in Saskatchewan. That is a tribute to the type of thinking in that part of the country. The main thing that they want—particularly from their experience over the last 10 years—is as little interference from government as possible. That has been their trouble.

I was able to charter an aeroplane, I might say, in Meadow Lake, and we took off for Green Lake, 35 miles east. The troubles we ran into there were that the provincial government had talked the metis into relinquishing their land and had given them in return a 33-year lease. Having done that, they proceeded to take the timber off it and they said that now belongs to the provincial government. This left the metis without much means of support because it was on timber and lumber that they had depended in years gone by.

At Beauval, 100 miles north, where there is an Oblate mission which has been there for many years, the problem there was the payment to trappers and fishermen of compensation by the dominion government for loss of their fishing and hunting grounds taken over by the Cold Lake bombing range. Going further to Ile-a-la-Crosse, the problem of the bombing range was about the same. They also required a new wharf as the present one is so dilapidated that it cannot be used at all. Most of their freight comes via water, and this is greatly needed.

Then I come to Buffalo Narrows, which is quite a fishing centre in the middle of Saskatchewan, situated on the Churchill and Peter Pond lakes, two of the large lakes in the Churchill river chain. Buffalo Narrows, I might say, is a fishing point that produces and processes over half the commercial fish caught within the province of Saskatchewan. There I ran into a small problem. Two war veterans wanted their veterans grant to go into the mink raising business. I found that the main topic of conversation there was the new policy with regard to mink raising in that area, which is proposed by the minister of resources in the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Brockelbank.

It might be well for me to quote what the old policy was. The old policy was that the fish allowance was based on political expediency, and in the Churchill lake area and Buffalo Narrows, the mink raisers were limited to a catch of rough fish for their mink of 1½ to 2 million pounds but they were carefully selected, and particularly before an election. Any mink raiser who showed a tendency to vote against the present government in Saskatchewan, although he might have 1,500 mink on hand and naturally required fish with which to feed them, was suddenly cut in his fishing rights to requirements for 300 or 400 mink. He was thus forced, maybe in the summertime, when the mink fur would have no commercial value, either to dispose of them to a party adherent who could get fishing rights, or to let them die. This policy has been changed and when Mr. Brockelbank made the announcement of the change he said that as a result of research in the area it was found that instead of the lakes being able to support mink on a catch of 2 million pounds of rough fish the lake could quite easily sustain a catch of 7 million pounds of fish for the use of mink. This caused considerable amusement amongst the mink raisers because they found that Mr. Brockelbank's policy was mainly contingent on a policy formulated in Newfoundland by one Joseph Smallwood. Now, the mink raising policy in Saskatchewan is being run by remote control from Newfoundland. Mr. Smallwood ran advertisements in the newspapers in Saskatchewan asking the mink raisers there to go to Newfoundland and he would pay all the expenses of moving them and their equipment. There would be no monkey business about licences for fishing, and they would have adequate supplies of fish. Two or three of them did move out of the district and the net result was that Mr. Brockelbank found his department had done a lot of research and ascertained the lake would support many more mink. The mink raisers were happy about this because they know that in the future their licences will not be revoked, leaving them up in the air with a lot of mink that they cannot feed.

The next point from Buffalo Narrows was Cree lake. It is 150 miles northeast of Buffalo Narrows and about 275 miles northeast of Meadow Lake. It is a fisherman's paradise, well known to United States fishermen who come up to catch lake trout, giant muskies, and Arctic grayling which abound in that lake. The problem at that point may seem a little strange to eastern members since it related to the mail service. They asked for a once a month or once every two months service. At the moment the residents have to go to Buffalo Narrows, 150 miles away or 300 miles for the round trip to get their mail. I am therefore sometimes somewhat amused by members complaining to the Post Office Department because their mail is not delivered twice a day instead of once.

At Black lake, which is 130 miles north of Cree lake and just east of the east end of lake Athabasca, a problem was put before me by the Chipewyan Indian band. They wanted a portable sawmill to be used by the mission at Black Lake to make lumber for the erection of buildings for their own use. The power for it would be supplied by the mission tractor, and the resident priest, who is an expert sawyer, assured me they could make very good lumber and I am sure they could. The chief of the tribe, a gentleman by the name of Chicken, was exercised over the fact that the people from the United States were coming into the area in larger numbers every year to fish for grayling and were forcing the Indians from some of their traditional camp and fishing sites. He had no objection to these people coming there to fish, but he would like some legal status for the Indians set up by this government that would entitle them to a small acreage that had been traditionally theirs, and the various sites around the lake which they have always used. It seemed to me this would be a wise provision.

There was a problem, too, with regard to a school for the children. Recently the mission granted the use of their building to start the school in operation, and no doubt a school will be built there.

At Stony lake, just west of Black lake, the problem was an outbreak of flu. I was not able to do anything about that.

At Stony Rapids, which is at the extreme east end of lake Athabasca, there is an air base and a future power site. They had no problems whatever, so that was a good spot for a politician to be.

Fond-du-lac, 100 miles west on the north shore of lake Athabasca, has been a Hudson's Bay Company trading post for about 100 years. The mission has been there nearly as long. A new modern mission and a large four-room school were built there last year. The problem there concerned a dock because the very rugged terrain on the north shore of lake Athabasca makes it nearly impossible to land goods or people there. They wanted a small dock so they could dock planes or barges and embark or debark people and goods.

Now, we come to Uranium City and the Beaverlodge area. This is something I wanted to include in my remarks particularly because some newspaperman who usually writes articles for the Saskatchewan provincial government was in there last winter, and for some reason or other came out with the idea that this area was going backward. He gave it considerable publicity of an adverse nature. I have been going into that area yearly since 1944, and sometimes twice a year. The first organized search for uranium started there in 1949. Since then, in my opinion, there has been a tremendous development. I see it every year. In 1953 when the federal mine came into operation and the $20 million 750 ton a day mill went into operation, there were real signs of the progress that has taken place. I went over this mill thoroughly on a couple of occasions including this trip.

The mill employs about 750 men, and the manager tells me that from his experience, which covers some 40 years in the various provinces of Canada, for every man employed in the mine or mill about four other people will be employed in the district. With other mines coming into production in that area, he tells me the result will be that at least 15,000 people will be working in the area within the next two years. He also told me that there are already 120 million tons of high grade ore proven in the area.

I flew from there about 20 miles south to the new Gunnar mine. This is something that is hard to believe unless you see it. Eighteen months ago, it was nothing but wilderness on a point of land which jutted out into lake Athabasca. A year and a half ago there was nothing there, but now there is a commercial empire consisting mainly of a $25 million plant covering many acres which will be in production by the middle of August. In order to give you some idea of the size of this new plant, I may say that the power for it is produced by a diesel electric plant. This diesel plant will produce more electrical energy than the proposed South Saskatchewan dam. The Gunnar mill works on an acid process because their ore is a little different from that at Eldorado mine about 20 miles north. They have put up their own sulphuric acid plant which occupies about half a city block. The pile of sulphur alongside it is about 80 feet high and half a block long. They have built their own new hospital, and I am told that they poured 10,000 cubic yards of concrete there last fall in a month and a half. This will give you some idea of the magnitude of this undertaking. Gunnar has a mill that will produce 1,250 tons a day in its original form, and is quite easily expandable. Only the chemical process has to be expanded. The rock crushing process is adequate to cover an output of 2,000 tons per day. The federal mine is also so designed, and will likely be extended shortly, to handle 1,500 tons a day. There are many other mines in the area. These are private mines, some of which are in production. These are Lorado, National Explorations, Rix, Nicholson and Nesbitt LaBine. There are 70 or 80 others in various stages of development. I might say that Lorado has run into enough ore that they will put up a $5 million or $6 million mill.

I was given the opportunity to hear the complaints in that district, when I attended a meeting of the board of trade, and also a Kiwanis dinner. These were as follows:

1. That they required a federal custom mill to handle ore of the smaller mines. I asked what it would require, and they said they would need one having a daily capacity of 1,500 tons.

2. The facilities of the army signals at Uranium are not adequate either in personnel or in equipment to handle the heavy air traffic at that point. They say that the private plane radio band is not guarded and tuned in for signals from such planes. I intend to take that matter up with the Department of Transport.

3. They complain of inadequate staff for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to cover a new frontier area of this size. There are two men during the daytime and one man at night. It will be recalled that there have been some outbreaks of lawlessness in the district in the last while, and these people think they should have more adequate police protection from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

4. They ask for immediate over-all planning by the provincial government of the road system, sewers and water system, and other services such as hospitals, schools and communications, to prevent a hodge-podge of small communities at various mine sites. This was exercising them quite a lot. Many of the mine managers thought that Saskatchewan was more backward, as a province, in coming to the aid of mining, than any province in which they had operated. It appeared to them that, the way provincial authorities operated, they did not want mines there at all.

5. They ask for the elimination of the provincial education tax on mine development material, and point out that this is very important. Making a computation of what they contributed to the education tax last year in the province they found that it amounted to about $2 million in that little area, alone. In other words they provided about one-sixth of the education tax moneys being raised in Saskatchewan, and were not getting much in return.

6. They asked for the enactment of new labour laws by the Saskatchewan provincial government to replace those now in effect, which were described by the mine union as the worst in Canada.

7. They asked for the completion of Saskatchewan highway No. 4 from 40 miles north of Meadow Lake to lake Athabasca, to open up further mine territory and provide communication with their own province of Saskatchewan. In this connection I would join the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Hellyer) who spoke last night and suggested a contribution by the federal government—or, even better, operation by the federal government—of a system of federal highways. Unless some foresight is shown, similar to that which was shown when the Canadian Pacific Railway was pushed across western Canada, this area will lag in its development. This is a storehouse of Canada. That area, and the Northwest Territories, comprise a storehouse of minerals, so far as Canada is concerned. Some foresight must be used in developing this area, not only for the advantage of those who live there but for all the people in Canada. That is a place to which our expanding population can go, and where people can reside happily.

One would be surprised to see just how modern some of these northern communities are. It was my privilege to go as far north as the north shore of Great Slave lake, and to visit Yellowknife. I was impressed by the modern buildings in which these people live. The same applies of course to the mines at Beaverlodge. The people there live under modern conditions. The wages, naturally, are high. It is my view that those gentlemen who are concerned about what will happen to the coal miners should look to this area. It is a country where an outlet could be found for the energies of those miners. A north-south highway in the lake Athabasca area would give them connection with their own province. At the present time they cannot get into the ordinary commercial areas of Saskatchewan.

Then, the last suggestion:

8. They ask for the extension of the Canadian National Railways line from Lynn Lake around the north shore of lake Athabasca to the Uranium-Beaverlodge area to open up the richest mineral storehouse in Canada.

This may sound fantastic, but stranger things have been done. It may require a couple of hundred miles of railway line, but it would open areas having tremendous timber and mineral resources.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied the time of the house long enough, and I am pleased to have had this opportunity to place my remarks on record, setting out what these people would like to have done.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is the hon. member aware that the name "Thermos" is a trade name of a vacuum bottle, just the same as the name "Frigidaire" is the trade name of an electric refrigerator?

Mr. Harrison: I am aware of the fact, as I was in business for many years, and I recognize that trade names usually mean something. I know that the word "Thermos" on a thermos bottle indicates to me that it is a better bottle than any other on the market, coming either from Japan or from my hon. friend's riding. That also applies to many other products bearing trade names. People buy those articles because they find that, by and large, they do not get stung when they purchase products having trade names. I believe that answers my hon. friend's question.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in listening to the discourse of the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) when he said that he had travelled 3,500 miles by aeroplane. I do not doubt that he could travel that distance in his constituency. The only comment I would make after listening to him is that possibly he flew too high, and found himself up in a rarefied atmosphere.

Mr. Harrison: At 5,000 feet.

Mr. Bryson: His great knowledge of provincial affairs has led me to the belief that possibly he has his eye on the leadership of the Liberal party in Saskatchewan. Certainly one could draw that conclusion from what he said this afternoon. However, I do not think any C.C.F.'er need worry much in Saskatchewan about any serious opposition from the Liberal party in that province. We have had a pretty good indication this afternoon, from the two speeches of Liberal members from Saskatchewan, as to what chance they have out there. Those speeches certainly just drove another nail in the coffin of the Liberal party in that province.

On two occasions yesterday two hon. members spoke somewhat briefly about conditions as they exist in that province at the present time. For a few moment only, this afternoon I should like to say something on the disaster that has occurred in that province during the past few days. I might say at the outset that the feeling of fear and concern over the possibilities of a crop being sown in Saskatchewan has been growing during the past few weeks. However, the storm of last week has left little speculation as to what the prospects from now on are going to be in respect to harvesting a normal crop in that province. It is a fact that we cannot ignore. Even before there has been any final assessment of the damage, we can take it from the best authorities that it is the worst single disaster that has ever happened there, and, for that matter, the worst single disaster that has ever happened in any province in the Dominion of Canada. We speak of "Hurricane Hazel" and "Hurricane Edna". I would suggest that "Hurricane Hazel" and "Hurricane Edna" combined were by comparison just minor disturbances. The estimates of the damages of those two hurricanes were $21 million. Just a glance at what has happened out in Saskatchewan by people who have made a casual survey leads them to believe that the damage will exceed $50 million. The estimate will be much higher, I am sure, when the final assessment is made.

The night before last I spoke over the telephone to a party in Regina who told me that the Qu'Appelle valley was flowing from bank to bank, something which I am sure had never occurred before in the memories of oldtimers. Preliminary estimates, as was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight), made by Professor Harrington show that the crop damage will be 50 per cent. By that I mean that 50 per cent of the crops that normally would be sown in all probability will not be sown. Except in one or two isolated areas such as Rosetown and Kindersley, the damage is very widespread. The statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he arrived back from his recent trip, that Saskatchewan has never lost a crop in May, was very unfortunate. That is the kind of statement we expect to hear from some hon. members but certainly not from a responsible minister such as the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

One of the most serious aspects is this. All of the crop that will be sown from now on—and incidentally, since the report was made that I mentioned, one inch of rain has fallen in Saskatchewan, adding to the very gloomy and dismal picture out there—will be in coarse grains. The wheat that will be sown will be late. In all probability it will be rusted as it was a year ago. Agricultural scientists tell us now that rust spores survived the winter in the southern states, and in all probability a late crop once again will be affected, with the exception of coarse grains and the very small amount of Selkirk wheat that will be sown.

It is very difficult at this stage—I am the first one to admit it—to estimate what the damage in the final analysis will amount to. To give the house some idea of how terrible it is, in the report that I received from there yesterday municipal officials say that throughout the whole of central and northern Saskatchewan the water is flowing in unheard of directions. It is running in directions that it had never run before. Roads are impassable. That was mentioned yesterday. In many places the water is running eight feet deep over the highways. In the town of Humboldt, in my own constituency, in the past two weeks people have been travelling around by boat and on foot. Not one bushel of grain has been taken to an elevator in the last two weeks. That is a very serious situation. Farmers in the Meadow Lake area, in the area of the hon. member who has just spoken, have been able to travel from Leask to Blaine Lake, a distance of 18 miles across country, in a motorboat, something before unheard of. Losses of livestock are heavy. At Meadow Lake one farmer has already lost over 500 head of cattle. Feed is scarce. Even if feed were available they cannot transport it over the roads, which is a very serious situation indeed. Similar conditions prevail in all but the one or two isolated areas I mentioned a moment ago, particularly the Kindersley area. Certainly such a condition is disastrous, but when we stop to realize that last year we had a crop failure in Saskatchewan and combine that fact with conditions today, we have something that is more than a disaster. We must view it not only from the point of view of the Saskatchewan farmer; we must view this disaster from the effect it will have on the whole economy of Canada.

Only a few weeks ago in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said that three-quarters of the drop in the gross national product was caused by the crop failure in western Canada last year. Think of what it is going to mean this year to the gross national product under the conditions that I have outlined. In view of this, I make this suggestion. For every acre of land that will be taken out of production because of land flooding the dominion government should make a payment of not less than $10. I do not care what they use for the cut-off date. They could say that land that is not sown after the first day of June will qualify. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act officials are now in the field and they could easily make the necessary surveys. I make that suggestion in spite of the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday in reply to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that any consideration that will be given will be given in lieu of the damage to public property in that province. I hope he will reconsider that statement in the light of this very great disaster.

Public damage has been severe. I am not going to speak of it at this time. It was dealt with at length yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon. Power lines, telephone lines, utilities of all kinds, municipal culverts, roads and so forth all need repairs. However, while property damage is a considerable factor and of great concern to those who lost their houses, and so on, the most important factor is the loss of farm income. It is necessary that payments be made in lieu of those losses if farmers are to carry on until another harvest.

Last year, the Saskatchewan crop was cut by 36 per cent. However, by lowering living standards, by extending their credit to the very limit, they were able to carry on. They were able to hang on in the hope that they would secure a normal crop this year and thereby be able to recoup their losses.

As I said a moment ago, the crop that will be sown after a week or so will be coarse grains. I can imagine the Minister of Agriculture saying it can be fed to hogs. I know he will also say that farmers in Saskatchewan are in a preferred position because hog production is up 26 per cent this year over last year. I would point out to hon. members that our farmers are not going to pull themselves out of any financial difficulties by feeding barley to hogs. Barley is sown because it will mature a little earlier, but if it cannot be sold as grain it will have to be used or sold as feed for hogs.

I have here a report which indicates that early in April the hog-barley ratio at Winnipeg was about 16·3. This means that 100 pounds of live B1 hog was only equal in value to 16·3 bushels of No. 1 feed barley. A year ago 100 pounds of the same kind of hog would buy 30·5 bushels of barley. Or to make another calculation, the hog-feed margin, which is the difference in value between 21 bushels of feed value and a 150-pound hog carcass, stood at $10.45 early in April this year while a year ago it was $31.96.

I should like to make two other suggestions. I submit that it is absolutely imperative that the balance of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments be made at this time. To date 10 per cent of the farmers have yet to receive 40 per cent of that payment. I submit it is necessary that this payment be made with the utmost dispatch in order to alleviate the acute distress which is being suffered by Saskatchewan farmers because of recent flood damage. I would suggest also that the Department of Trade and Commerce make the final wheat payment immediately as this would help in this great emergency.

Far and beyond these payments, there is need for further assistance along the lines I have just suggested, with the dominion government paying not less than $10 per acre for land which will be taken out of production because of flooding. I feel that we are justified in asking for this, as in my opinion the request is a fair one. Workers in other industries are eligible for unemployment insurance benefits when they are out of work. These benefits are made available to augment their income when they are not working. The government is also giving consideration to making payments over and above these benefits when the unemployment insurance has been exhausted.

I certainly feel that $10 per acre is fair. It falls far short, and necessarily so if we are going to be fair about it, of the value of even a subnormal crop. As I say, this would be of great help in alleviating the present distress being experienced by farmers in Saskatchewan. I feel that the question of making payments for unseeded crops due to flooding will have to be considered next fall by the P.F.A.A. officials. I do not think the government will be able to put off making these payments, as they did last year. They will have to face up to the problem next fall in any event, but why delay? I realize that there will have to be an amendment to the act, but why delay making these payments? They should be paid now when they are needed most and when they will do the greatest good.

Mr. N. C. Schneider (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I must speak to this house on one part of the problem of unemployment which concerns many of my constituents who have spent the best part of their lives in the manufacture of two commodities, supplying most of Canada's needs in the past and exporting millions of dollars worth to other countries. They have made a great contribution to Canada's prosperity and growth in the past and are now facing an economic situation which, in the one product, has reduced Canadian production of rubber soled canvas footwear from a high of over six million pairs in 1947 to less than two million pairs in 1954. Exports have dropped to a fraction of normal because of competition from other countries with low wage production costs, such as Hong Kong.

The loss of our exports can be expected and understood by our rubber workers, but it is another matter when the low wage cost producers are allowed to ship unlimited quantities into Canada at prices which are a fraction of the Canadian cost. In 1954 these low cost imports supplied 35 per cent of the Canadian requirements in rubber canvas footwear. The records show a steady increase of imports which closely follows the corresponding figures of decline in Canadian production.

The imports from Hong Kong are the most serious, amounting to 717,202 pairs in 1954. We are informed by the assistant Canadian trade commissioner at Hong Kong that rubber footwear factories in that district pay wages ranging from 45 to 75 cents per day, according to the 1952 report, while our Canadian rubber workers received $1.40 per hour. The duty of 27½ per cent charged on such low cost products is of very little assistance, and I am not suggesting any increase in tariff. A pair of rubber canvas shoes made in Canada have a manufacturing cost of from $2 to $2.50, while Hong Kong shoes are being laid down in Canada at 65 cents per pair plus duty of 27½ per cent and 10 per cent sales tax. With a total imported price of 89·4 cents per pair they are being sold in Canada by leading retailers at $1.95 per pair. Defenders of the importation of these low standard of living goods are inclined to quote costs in Hong Kong dollars, and do not mention the fact that a Hong Kong dollar is worth 17 Canadian cents.

Our Canadian workmen are willing to meet any fair competition, but this is not competition; it is sabotage. We can easily imagine the standard of living available to a worker on 45 to 75 cents per day, and we ask you to compare this with $1.40 per hour and the Canadian standard of living of which we are all so proud. Until recently we have heard the argument that these low cost shoes were of poor quality, but I assure you that the samples I have seen appear to be of quite good quality and are plainly marked "Made in Hong Kong".

The loss of employment to the rubber workers is only a part of the loss to Canadian workingmen, as we also lose the production of the canvas fabric, the steel eyelets, chemicals, reclaimed rubber, laces and shoe findings as well as packaging materials. While this alarming invasion of over 700,000 pairs of canvas rubber shoes in one year has already thrown hundreds of Canadians out of work—a loss of half a million hours of work—this probably is only the beginning. Canvas rubber shoes are a sideline in Canadian factories, and are produced in slack periods between the seasonal demands for waterproof footwear such as boots, rubbers, and galoshes. These waterproof lines now enter Canada free of duty under the British preferential tariff, and British footwear is making some headway in our domestic market because of wages much lower than ours. The alarming angle to the Hong Kong problem is the steady growth of their sales in Canada, and the fact that there is nothing to prevent them entering the waterproof lines and eliminating our entire rubber footwear industry.

The other problem of my people is the slow but sure elimination of the button manufacturing industry in Canada. For 85 years the largest of my three factories has served Canada, and at one time had a substantial export business. The export business has been lost to low cost competition. This factory is one of the last to be manufacturing in Canada. Competition from other countries has been serious in our remaining domestic business, but the unkindest cut of all comes in the recent invasion of so-called United States buttons which we find are shipped from New York, but are actually manufactured in Puerto Rico. The wage in this industry in Puerto Rico, I am advised, is 30 cents per hour. There is nothing fair about such competition and the Canadian buyer naturally assumes that the buttons are made by workmen in the United States where wages are higher than ours.

This industry has served Canada well, but the staff in this surviving factory has been reduced to one-third of its former strength. If this cut-rate invasion by Puerto Rico buttons continues the skill and experience of many years will be lost to Canada. If the time should come again when we are forced to depend on our own resources, we will surely be buttonless. We have been told that the Canadian manufacturer should pull up his socks, but if we find ourselves without buttons we may have difficulty keeping our trousers up. Of course there is always the safety pin and the shingle nail.

These two problems do not call for tariff revisions for protection, nor have I ever asked for higher duty on any foreign competition on the domestic market. These two items call for a realistic consideration of standards of living. This is unfair competition between two ways of life. Are we to assume that the importers, the defenders of this unfair competition, favour the Hong Kong way of life with a bowl of rice a day and a bamboo shack, with wages of 45 to 75 cents per day, as compared to Canadian wages of $1.40 per hour? Or do they favour the Puerto Rican 30 cents per hour against the Canadian $1.20 per hour?

I am very proud to quote in this parliament advice which was given by my father, the hard-working founder of our business. He said the one sure thing in this life was change, and the difficulty was to meet these changes and adjust our lives to them. Canada is rapidly changing from a full agricultural economy to an industrial economy. This is the machine age. Are we to become a self-contained country like the United States, which has become the wealthiest country in the world, and so independent that she buys from us only when it suits her?

Anyone finding fault with our system should also find a solution, and I would suggest that we exercise the escape clauses in our GATT agreements, just as the United States and other countries do when serious injury is caused to home industry. We could place quotas on imports which threaten the existence of our producers.

I realize that trade is a two-way street, and that we must export our wheat, paper, minerals and many other products of our vast natural resources. But we must also remember that it would be unpopular to take our thousands of unplaced job applicants and put them to work growing more wheat, making more paper, digging more gold and producing more surpluses. These industrial workers cannot remain unemployed much longer, and on their behalf I appeal for a realistic consideration of this unfair invasion of our domestic markets.

Mr. James A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in this debate I feel there is one phase of industry that seems to have been forgotten. I am referring to the tobacco industry. This industry had an all-time high production in 1954 of 167 million pounds. This production was made possible by the fact that the growers were permitted to grow their full base acreage for the first time in several seasons. Also the yield of 1,400 pounds per acre was the second highest on record, and resulted in some marketing difficulties.

The sharp increase in domestic consumption of cigarettes in 1952-53, due to the reduction in federal excise tax, was not maintained in 1954. In February of this year the taxation committee of the flue-cured tobacco marketing association of Ontario waited upon the Minister of Finance and I understand, after that meeting, were very hopeful that good results would be obtained.

In reviewing the budget of the Minister of Finance I fail to see any mention of a reduction in the tax on tobacco and cigarettes. A tax cut of 3 cents per package of 20 cigarettes was asked at that time by the growers. Cigarettes are the highest taxed commodities in Canada today, the present government taking in taxes 17·7 cents per pack of 20 or 54 per cent of the normal retail price. A tax cut would have meant only a small, temporary drop in revenue, and the government would be getting more than the present tax in three years or less. Figures have been shown which proved that during the years 1952 and 1953, after the tax on tobacco was reduced, the revenue increased.

One of the main reasons put forward by the growers in their presentation to the Minister of Finance asking for a 1955 tax cut was that the consumers would benefit specifically next year by paying out some $32 million less for their cigarettes than these would cost at the current tax rates. Other benefits would be an increase of $44·8 million in the next four years in the gross income of the industry's producers and sellers, and some $58·5 million added to consumers' disposable income in the same period.

The effect on the revenues of the government during that same period would be significantly small. Temporary losses in direct and indirect revenues would be no more than $12·3 million, $6 million and $2 million in the next three fiscal years. It has been stated that this would be recovered by the treasury by 1960 or 1961, and possibly earlier.

Last year this total of 167 million pounds was produced from 117,000 acres. Tobacco producers this year find that it is necessary to make a 30 per cent reduction in their base acreage, which means that in this coming season they will only be permitted to use 70 per cent of the acreage they used last year. In contrast with a year ago when they rated full base acreage, the buying companies strongly advocated sharp decreases because domestic stocks had been replenished from last year's record-breaking production.

The fact that 14 million pounds of the 1954 crop remained unsold at the turn of the year and have moved to market very slowly was the argument used in favour of lower production this year. This 30 per cent reduction is a hard blow for the growers. They had just got back to growing their base acreage which was largely due, as I said before, to the tax cuts of 1952-53. Now once more they are forced to curtail acreage. This industry just cannot continue to carry on under the huge burden of federal taxes.

In a recent report by the R.C.M.P. relating to the smuggling of cigarettes from the United States, it is stated that there has been a decided decline, and this can be credited to the tax cut which was made several years ago, making it less profitable and less attractive to the large-scale smuggler. It has been estimated that current smuggling causes losses ranging from $3½ to $7 million to the growers, $7½ to $15 million to the industry, and $12½ to $25 million to the federal treasury. While a 3-cent tax cut, as requested, would not wipe out smuggling, I know the growers feel that it would cut the actual smuggling operation by an estimated 30 per cent.

During the past months we have read and heard a lot about lung cancer being caused by smoking. Apparently the people in Britain do not take this seriously, for in 1954 the British people smoked more than in any year in history. In this regard, women played their part in increasing this consumption. The consumption of tobacco in Great Britain accounted for by women rose from 17 per cent in 1948 to 22 per cent in 1954. Men also played their part in putting up smoking figures, but to a slightly smaller degree. Cigarette smokers made up 65 per cent of the total male adult population in 1954 as against 64 per cent in 1953.

Possibly the increase in smoking in Great Britain is owing to the fact that, as we all know, the former prime minister who has just retired as leader of the Conservative party in Great Britain is a habitual smoker. Few pictures were ever released in which we did not see Sir Winston with his favourite stogie either in the corner of his mouth or in his hand.

Sir Winston did not smoke steadily until after the death of his father, Lord Randolph Churchill, who died on January 24, 1895 . . . One day his father had said to him, through a haze of cigarette smoke, "Why begin to smoke? If you wish to have an eye that is true and a hand that does not quiver, if you wish never to ask yourself a question as you ride for a fence, don't smoke." Sir Winston adored his father, at a distance, and followed his advice for the time being. Happily he did not continue to do so; if he had, he would never have had a 41st birthday or been prime minister. When he was serving in France with the Scots Greys in 1915 he forgot his matches one day at the front and went back to his dugout for them. A German shell fell where he would have been if he had been a non-smoker.

Exports of tobacco in 1954 to the United Kingdom amounted to 25,184,852 pounds; exports to other countries amounted to 6,585,394 pounds, or total exports of 31,770,246 pounds. If the 3-cent reduction requested had been granted, the growers would have been in a more favourable position to export greater quantities of tobacco.

The production of flue-cured tobacco and its processing into a consumer product is an industry by which a great part of the people in the tobacco-growing districts live. It is also the main support of numerous local industries and services which manufacture, sell or service materials and machines for the tobacco industry. Merchants, garages, service stations, banks, legal firms, insurance, real estate and other businesses have gained much from the tobacco industry. It is also the largest customer of the companion branches of agriculture in these same districts. The tobacco industry may also be found to be the largest single source of tax revenue, if not in the country at least in many municipalities. Tobacco is the hub of a great wheel of local industry may also be found to be the largest sure of dependency, their fortunes rising and falling according to the state of the tobacco industry.

It is, therefore, most necessary that we should direct our thoughts and actions toward maintaining the tobacco industry in as healthy a condition as possible. Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Finance that he has failed to give adequate consideration to the 3-cent reduction on a pack of 20 cigarettes which had been asked by the flue-cured tobacco association of Ontario for the last two or three years.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the house for any great length of time on this occasion, but recent events which have taken place in Saskatchewan and in my constituency of Qu'Appelle make me feel that I would be remiss in my duty if at this time I did not give some picture, so far as I am able to do so, of the latest disaster to hit us. It seems that Canada, in the last few years, has been subject to severe punishment from the weather. In 1948 we had the Fraser river flood which affected so many farmers in British Columbia, as well as towns and villages. Then we had "Hurricane Hazel" and "Hurricane Edna". We have had violent storms in Newfoundland. We in Saskatchewan now are suffering our second severe blow in succession dealt us by the weather.

Mr. Castleden: In some parts four.

Mr. Mang: In some places four and five. It is not my purpose to review the vagaries of the weather but rather to point out that, in this gloomy picture that Saskatchewan has been presenting to the rest of Canada, the constituency of Qu'Appelle has been quite as severely dealt with as have other areas in Saskatchewan. Indeed, on the speech from the throne, when I had occasion to make a few remarks, I pointed out that the eastern third of the area has been suffering now for three years—in some spots for four years—owing to excessive moisture.

As many hon. members here realize, our topography, the lay of the land, is level. When you read about floods in rivers of Saskatchewan, that does not tell the whole story. The greatest disasters are not on the river banks. The disaster extends over the farm lands. The difficulty we have in that level country is that you will find dry spots where seeding could be done, but you simply cannot get on to those dry spots in order to seed them. Some two years ago, southwest of Regina, in those plains east of Wilcox and Tyvan in the southern part of the constituency, when the heavy rains came which flooded a great part of that country, many farmers actually went out, got caught in the rain and hurried home with the tractor, and the seed drill was still in the field in the middle of the summer. The havoc that such storms can cause on the level plains is hardly believable.

In the eastern third of Qu'Appelle constituency—and this applies to the constituencies north and south—we have been suffering for three years. We have made some effort—the provincial department of agriculture has done so as well, and the municipalities have struggled with the problem—to drain that water away. What is happening there is not the immediate result of saturating the ground with water now. What is happening in that part of the area is the deterioration of the topsoil owing to the fact that the water which soaks down into the ground, when evaporation takes place, begins to come up through the land. As that process goes on it is souring the top six to ten inches of soil, bringing up the alkali and other salts. Unless definite moves are made to drain that area properly the productive value of that soil is going to be destroyed, and it will take years to retrieve.

We live in a pioneer area where some of our grandfathers are still living. They took that land over when it was raw prairie, and they built a productive empire out of it. They are still imbued with the pioneering spirit, and they do the best they can as individuals and as municipalities, but the situation has gone beyond that stage. As I said before, I do not want to go into details at this time but merely desire to present a general picture. Actually the full impact of the heavy rains and snows on this saturated soil has not been felt as yet by the people in general. While it is true that you can seed wheat up to the 24th of May and even later, nevertheless with the ground saturated as it is now a mere quarter inch of rain, for example, will stop you from going back on the land for a week or so.

I just want to emphasize this situation, not from the point of view of being an alarmist or adopting a panicky attitude, because we have gone through periods of adversity before. As I say, our pioneers were used to having nothing 60 years ago, and they have built up the economy to the point where it is today. They have a great deal of patience, and they are great gamblers as well. They are willing to make the best of it, but the situation is such that there will have to be some positive and quick action with respect to draining these areas.

I should like to read excerpts from three letters. I am not going to read the entire letters. They are from councillors and reeves in our area. I shall quote one paragraph in this letter from Mr. James G. Duthie of Wolseley, to indicate the general situation. The pictures you saw in the newspapers the other day were of the town of Wolseley. This has to do with the farm land there. He said:

> I will state briefly that there is a great deal of damage by floods within this municipality to roads, bridges and highways. Quite a lot of the farm lands in the municipality will be unfit for cultivation for years or until some drainage scheme is put into action.

There is another letter from a place farther east, and again I am going to quote briefly:

> I can see no hope in trying to make a living here and pay expenses if some of this water is not drained away. There are several hundred acres covered with water. In most cases the prairie that is left isn't sufficient to feed the stock. I have been speaking to several farmers around and unless something can be done to get rid of this surplus water, we will have to dispose of our stock and move out.

Further down he says:

> We have had this area surveyed by the department of agriculture—

That is of Saskatchewan, with the assistance of P.F.R.A., I understand.

> —and they were through surveying before Christmas. They were supposed to give us some decision on the 15th of February, but we had nothing. On the 15th of March they promised and now it is the 26th of April and we had nothing yet. They tell us now that our maps are on print, and that is as far as we know yet.

In this connection I would suggest that here is an area that has already been surveyed for drainage. All that is needed is to move in and get immediate action to drain the land. This letter was from Mr. Oscar Carlson of Beynes, Saskatchewan. He is a councillor in that area.

I am just going to quote one short paragraph from another letter from Clarence B. Hill, reeve of the Martin municipality No. 122, near Moosomin. This area is suffering now for the third year in a row. He suggests something which could be done, and the suggestion could tie in with the letter I have just read from Mr. Carlson. The letter reads:

> I would suggest the dominion government set up units of draining machinery consisting of a dragline, cat and dozer and a cat and scraper, say one unit to each two or three municipalities to be used only for draining work. This would reinstate soured land, bring it back into production and taxes, and help considerable towards building roads, once the sloughs and potholes are drained.

That is a concrete suggestion by Clarence Hill. I quote these letters because they come right from this area and emphasize the seriousness of the position. In addition they offer some concrete suggestions which could be applied immediately. Here is an area south of Moosomin which has been surveyed and is ready to go. All that is needed is to follow the suggestion made by Mr. Hill and get this machinery moved out there to work on drainage ditches.

Again I want to emphasize that we are not alarmists; we are not panicky. If I were able to quote these letters in their entirety you would see the pioneering spirit that these people have. They have been out there with their own tractors constructing drainage facilities. The roads are gone, their municipal funds are exhausted, and this spring people have actually been out there with shovels trying to open up drains because all the work they did last year with their own tractors fell in as a result of these heavy rains. They are trying to save the efforts of a lifetime. I would strongly urge that whatever can be done should be done, as I know it will be, by both the provincial and federal governments.

I want to thank the Prime Minister for the assurance he gave that when all the information is in concerning the situation, an assessment will be made and whatever help it is possible to give will be given. Finally, may I say that I feel rather sorry for the Minister of Finance. He mentioned in that budget that the western wheat crop was one source of revenue, and this condition may interfere with his sincere efforts to balance our economy. I am sure the government will give every sympathetic consideration to the situation I have tried to present.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): I have already participated in this budget debate, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot miss this opportunity of endorsing what has been said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, by my colleagues in this party and by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), who have all expressed the view that the crisis which faces Saskatchewan is certainly the most serious we have had during the lifetime of any of us in this parliament.

The Minister of Finance, bringing down his budget for next year, indicated that he expected we would have a good crop on the prairies. Had that crop materialized it would have made a great difference in our economy. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce is incorrect in his conclusion that you cannot forecast a crop failure in May. When I was home at Easter the outlook was promising. They had had a very good stretch of weather and, had it continued, the land could have been seeded in that area. But as a result of the excessive moisture over a four-year period, the very heavy rainfall last year and the four inches of rain which descended in the last month, it now becomes impossible to seed a large percentage of the land in Mackenzie.

Hon. members have not appreciated the magnitude of this problem. Figures showing farm net income of 1954, which reached us a few days ago, reveal a very sharp drop in net income across Canada, from $2,154 million in 1951 to $1,923 million in 1952, then down to $1,699 million in 1953 and $1,125 million in 1954. This represents a drop of over a billion dollars since 1951. In other words farm net income is cut almost in half.

The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. McBain), who spoke a few moments ago, had something to say about the position of the tobacco farmers. I would point out, however, that no farmers have been hit as hard as the wheat farmers. Farm income is down in all provinces, but in Saskatchewan our income has dropped from $565·5 million in 1952 to $126·5 million in 1954.

It is not easy for us to think in terms of millions, but if one could picture oneself having an income of $565—and that, by the way, is the income some Canadian families have—what would be his position if that income were reduced in three years to $126? Or, to multiply those figures by twenty, to give an income somewhat in line with what a member of parliament considers he should have, it would represent a drop from $11,310 to $2,530. If one has not had some practical experience in reduced incomes over a short period of time, then he has missed something. Our people in Saskatchewan during the years of depression, and again during the last years, have seen prices collapse, and bad weather conditions. Coupled with the excessive rainfall last year we had heavy rust damage, which normally would not have developed had we not had so much wet weather, or had more sunshine.

Those on farms, whose incomes have been reduced from $11,310 to $2,530, are in a position where they cannot pay their store bills, their taxes, or their commitments to the implement dealers. Payments to doctors fall in arrears. We have had a combination of these factors. I find that municipalities in my constituency, which had a very good record during the thirties and where we have always had some crop, reported tax arrears of $853,000 at the end of 1953. By the end of 1954 those arrears had reached $1,362,000.

People in Saskatchewan, as in other provinces, realize that if taxes get out of control they are in danger of losing their equity in their holdings, and no one accepts that position cheerfully. As a result of the fall in farm income, tax arrears have piled up. In addition to the tax arrears of the municipalities, the school districts find the municipalities owe them $1,170,000. The banks have been good enough to give the school units credit. Those school units in my district owed the banks over $844,000. Fortunately the banks have confidence in the province. However, this represents a tremendous waste, which is accepted unwillingly by the taxpayers, when such large amounts are paid out in interest. If they had had their fair share of the national income their taxes would have been paid and the school districts would have received their fair share of moneys.

I realize some hon. members from other parts of Canada are under the impression that those of us who come from the prairies do a good deal of complaining, and that at times we make unreasonable demands on the taxpayers in other parts of Canada. I would remind the house, however, that in years of prosperity we in Saskatchewan are very glad to pay to the Minister of National Revenue a very generous share of our total income, through the income tax. I find that in the last publication of taxation statistics for 1954 a review is made of the year 1952. I was informed by the income tax branch this morning that they will not have information concerning the 1953 position until late in July, although they are speeding up the reporting of those amounts.

However, if one takes the total paid in income tax by the farmers of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta and adds them together, he gets less than the amount paid by Saskatchewan farmers in 1952. Farmers in all provinces of Canada, with the exception of British Columbia and Saskatchewan, paid $13,106,000 in 1952, whereas the farmers of Saskatchewan paid $13,268,000.

As I have said, the Saskatchewan farmers made no complaint about paying over $13 million into the treasury in 1952. Oh, some of them felt that it was hard to justify the fact that the farmers of the rich provinces of Ontario and Quebec paid less than $3 million when more than $13 million had been paid by farmers in Saskatchewan who, unfortunately, had not been able to build up a reserve for an emergency. I submit, therefore, that as a result of the net farm income of Saskatchewan dropping from $566 million in 1952 to $126 million in 1954 we have a matter of national concern, apart altogether from the disastrous weather we have experienced in the last month. When Professor Harrington estimates that this unusual weather will result in a reduction in income of over $50 million I am convinced that he is estimating on the conservative side.

By the end of this year the Minister of Finance will realize that the figures he had before him when he prepared his budget for this year did not take into account the fact that at the present time there is still some 1953 grain in the granaries of Saskatchewan. The minister is not really in a position to know the serious impact on our Canadian economy that last year's crop imposed. Many regions in Saskatchewan are in the position that now, on the 11th day of May, the water level is so high there is not a chance in the world of getting on the land to seed oats, barley, wheat or any of the cereals that have been grown in the prairie provinces.

This crisis is going to affect eastern Canada also. On our farm we spent a considerable sum of money last winter to buy fertilizer. We expected that there would be a short growing season this year on account of the excessive moisture, and that if we were to have any crop we should use fertilizer to make the best use of the growing season. It is extremely doubtful whether we shall decide to lose the money that we have now invested in fertilizer, or hold it over for another year. Certainly it is going to have a very direct effect on the fertilizer industry in British Columbia and on the railway companies that transport fertilizer and other products from the west and the east to the prairie provinces.

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) suggested that in addition to helping to meet the capital costs of the recent flooding, the federal government should somehow or other get into the pockets of the farmers whose fields will not be seeded at least $10 for every such acre. It is estimated that this year we shall have at least 2 million acres unseeded. The sum of $20 million may appear to be a large amount; but on the other hand, when one considers the importance of the wheat economy to the whole of Canada it is pretty obvious that sooner or later we shall have to face some of these problems and view them from the national point of view.

I should like to remind the house that late in the last century and in the beginning of this century, the prairie lands of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta were opened up for settlement on the theory that there would be a market for foodstuffs grown in the prairie provinces and shipped abroad. During my lifetime we have brought increased acreage into cultivation; we have improved our techniques of cultivation; we have brought down our costs of operation so that we are now in a position to produce great quantities of a very desirable commodity. We are compelled to sell in world markets in competition with other countries which, for a variety of reasons, are making it very difficult for Canadian grain to be sold.

Hon. members will perhaps have noted in this morning's Gazette that the United States now buys its own exports. That is to be found on the editorial page. It mentions that on May 2 the export-import bank in the United States made funds available to six manufacturing companies to help them export their products. This makes a total of 66 manufacturing firms which are being assisted by all of the manufacturers in the United States.

The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Schneider) pointed out the very real problem that exists in his area where running shoes that were manufactured to the extent of 6 million in 1947 were manufactured to the extent of 2 million in 1954. That poses a problem not only for the hon. member for Waterloo North but for Canada. If our products have to compete in world markets with such products from other countries; if the Americans are going to use public funds to enable their manufacturers to sell their goods in world markets, it poses a real problem for us.

The editorial also mentions that last month the United States government offered Denmark $7·7 million worth of supplies, provided that Denmark would send industrial products to underdeveloped countries. Apparently Denmark objected to a clause which required the grain to be moved in United States vessels. But the shipment of $7·7 million worth of grain from the United States to Denmark will certainly affect the market in Denmark, and will eventually affect markets which we have had abroad.

I come back to our theories, which I think are fundamental. The 15 million people in Canada should be able somehow or other to organize our economy so we can produce all the food we can use—and we should produce all that we can—but we should be willing to exchange our foodstuffs in the markets of the world for commodities which other people have and which they would prefer to exchange for our foodstuffs. We should also make available, from our surplus supplies, foodstuffs for the two-thirds of the people in the world who never get enough to eat.

Therefore I suggest that the Minister of Finance, along with his colleagues, must give consideration to the request which has come from Saskatchewan that the emergency which has been created by the flooding be regarded as a national emergency, and that sufficient public funds be made available to help repair the property damage. Those who have invested their lives in Saskatchewan to produce food for ourselves and for our overseas markets should be given the assistance necessary over a series of years such as those we have experienced.

During the drought years federal and provincial governments joined with the municipalities in facing that problem. Last fall I met a number of my constituents who went north during the drought years, and they said they never expected to live long enough to be terrified when it started to rain. They had thought if they could only get to a country where they would have rain their troubles would be over; but after the experience they had last year they have come to the conclusion that the hardships involved in connection with a series of flooding are even more difficult than the calamity which befell them during the 1930's, when it failed to rain and they were unable to grow a crop.

There is probably very little difference between a succession of crop failures as a result of drought and a series of crop failures as a result of flooding. However, there is this difference. In the years when you have flooding you have additional expenses that cannot be avoided very well. Last year a great many farmers spent more than the worth of their crop in trying to get on the fields with a combine towed by a caterpillar tractor. Sometimes it was a combine mounted on a stone boat, with a small engine to operate the combine, while the whole equipment was hauled around by a caterpillar tractor. The cost involved exceeded the revenue from the crop. So it makes very little difference whether a serious crop failure results from flooding or from drought.

I think it is obvious that the people of Canada as a whole must be prepared to stand behind the people of Winnipeg, of the Fraser valley, of the Annapolis valley, of Rimouski when disaster hits those areas, and likewise this year behind the people of the prairie provinces who are faced with disastrous floods. I am sure the government will only be fulfilling its duties to Canada in doing everything that is reasonably possible.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to bring to the attention of the government and the house a particular problem with which we are confronted in the Fraser valley. Some repetition may be necessary, but I shall try to present the matter as briefly and as quickly as possible. When participating in the throne speech debate I paid some attention to various fisheries problems, and endeavoured to place on the record not just my own views with respect to these matters but more especially the views of many of those engaged in the industry who are adversely affected by the imposition of certain measures which, these fishermen claim, are ineffective.

No doubt the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Sinclair) works under a long range policy, and rather than just leaving this matter I thought if it were brought to his attention he might somehow or other work it into that long range policy and bring certain benefits to the fishermen in my area.

The annual list of proposals for changes in British Columbia fisheries regulations sent out from the office of Mr. A. J. Whitmore, chief supervisor of fisheries, under date of December 3, 1953, contained a clause having to do with fishing above the New Westminster bridge. This clause No. 5 reads:

To prohibit commercial fishing above New Westminster bridge on and after September 16 each season.

Immediately after that was circulated various fishermen's groups took exception to it and lodged their protests against including this in the list of proposed changes in the fisheries regulations. The united fishermen and allied workers' union lodged a protest, as did the Pacific fishermen and allied trades union, gill net section. Just about that time, on March 16, 1954, I directed a question on the orders of the day to the Minister of Fisheries. The question, reported on page 3029 of Hansard, was as follows:

Will the minister state whether or not a decision has been reached with respect to the closure of the Fraser river above the New Westminster bridge to commercial fishing?

The answer I received from the minister on that occasion was as follows:

The answer to his question is no. I hope to be able to announce a decision before I meet the fishermen's union in convention next week in Vancouver.

Upon his return from Vancouver the minister made a statement with respect to this matter, to be found on page 4510 of Hansard of May 7, 1954, as follows:

I announced to the fishermen at the union meeting in Vancouver that we would stop that fishery on September 16.

And a little further on:

I met the union, I met the gill netters, I met the local mayors and reeves and pointed out that we were interested in quality and conservation.

And again:

Since I came back to Ottawa we have discussed the matter again with our research people and our officers, and it is probably right that we are doing it in a little too big a sweep. Therefore we have changed the closing date this year from September 16 to three weeks later, October 8. They will have the tail end of the sockeye and the first of the pinks and the chums. The hon. member for New Westminster applauds. I want to tell the committee that next year it will be September 30 and the year after it will be September 15 because it is felt that in the interests of quality and conservation we must close this fishery. But because of the reasons put forward by these people for a little more gradual closing off, we have agreed to make that change.

Perhaps with some optimism, but prompted by the minister's co-operative attitude and his encouraging announcement, I ventured to express the hope that progressively earlier closures as threatened would be found unnecessary. However, that has not worked out and we find that the department are intent on continuing with their announced policy.

Further protests have been registered in this connection. I received one dated May 27, 1954, from the united fishermen and allied workers' union, the first part of which reads:

Dear Sir,

We are enclosing with this letter copy of a letter just recently sent to the Hon. James Sinclair, Minister of Fisheries. You will note that we take quite sharp objection to a number of statements which he made in the House of Commons on May 7.

The most immediate issue is that of the closure of the area between Pattullo bridge and Mission bridge on the Fraser river. You will recall that on previous occasions we have written you at some length in respect to this proposed closure. Our members are not at all satisfied with the new revised decision which was announced by the minister. We urge you, as a member representing British Columbia, to do everything in your power to have the entire order rescinded.

That is just the first part of the letter which is signed by Homer Stevens, secretary treasurer of the union. Another communication which I received is in the form of a resolution dealing with fishing in the upper Fraser, adopted at a mass meeting in Fort Langley on Friday, October 8, 1954. It reads:

Whereas the 1954 salmon season is not a pink year as far as the Fraser river is concerned and

Whereas there is no dispute in quality of salmon in the Fraser river for the balance of the 1954 season and

Whereas we are fully aware of the fact that there is too much fishing gear in the water and therefore drastic conservation measures are necessary

Therefore be it resolved that we petition the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Sinclair, to open the Fraser river again from the Pattullo bridge to Mission bridge as in past and that for the balance of the 1954 salmon season the minister is assured that we are escaping any conservation measures that may be necessary other than a complete closure; and

Be it further resolved that as far as the 1955 fishing season is concerned, further meeting be held with the minister in order that we may arrive at an equitable solution to this pertinent problem for the future.

Resolution carried unanimously.

Pete Jenewein acting as secretary.

Those are only two communications in this connection. The Pacific fishermen and allied trades union's brief of December 1 of last year raised a similar protest. A letter dated February 14, from the native sons of British Columbia, post No. 2, submitted a resolution in protest against this measure. I also have another communication from prevost post No. 10 of the native sons of British Columbia, dated January 4, 1955, which deals with the matter very fully and not only protests against the action that has been taken but asks that it be rescinded and proposes some other measures in its place.

Just prior to coming to this session of parliament, Mr. Speaker, we had the opportunity of meeting two delegations of fishermen, and they also registered their protest over the measures proposed by the Minister of Fisheries. They presented statements showing that, as far as the purposes of these proposed measures were concerned, they were not being realized and they therefore felt that in all fairness the minister should rescind his proposed measure and take some more appropriate action in regard to conservation and so on.

There were two main reasons for the introduction of these measures. We find outlined in the British Columbia fishery regulations the suggested regulatory and administrative changes. We find these two are outlined very clearly, but I may say that the fishermen's unions take exception to both counts. In regard to conservation, I should like to read from article No. 5 of the suggested amendments to the British Columbia fishery regulations:

(b) the inability of the slow moving later classes of salmon, principally pinks and chums, to clear through the 50 mile stretch of the Fraser from its mouth to Mission during the protection period provided by the weekly closed times.

In this connection the brief has this to say:

It is represented the proposal would assist in meeting the difficulty and in addition would serve to give badly needed protection to spawning stocks of pinks and chums destined for important streams flowing into the Fraser between New Westminster and Mission, i.e., Coquitlam, Alouette, Whonock, Stave and Silverdale streams on the north side, and Salmon, Beaver, West, and other smaller creeks on the south side.

This was the position set out in this brief. The union's view in this connection is that the closure measures have not resulted in the desired and anticipated results. The brief has this to say:

We note that it is suggested that the closure of this area would help to rehabilitate several streams on the north and south sides of the Fraser river. Several points are not taken into consideration with regard to these streams.

After listing changed conditions on some of these tributaries, the brief goes on to state:

The fact of the matter is that as far as the local streams mentioned are concerned, the salmon have a better opportunity of entering these streams today than they had years ago when there were considerably less restrictions on fishing and it should be quite clear to everyone that the fine escapement of pinks to the upper Fraser river in 1953 passed the mouths of these streams en route.

With regard to the inability of the spawning fish to reach the headwaters of the main stem of the Fraser river, this particular brief contends that the escapement of the Fraser river pink salmon to the spawning ground in the last year was exceptionally good, and at least equal to any pink run in the last 40 years. It goes on to quote from the Department of Fisheries 1953 spawning report dealing with the pinks in the Fraser river area. I should like to give this quotation from the same brief:

In 1951 we had no special closures on pink salmon fishing and the Department of Fisheries spawning report (1953) from which we quote does not bear out the contention that the closing of the fishing area above New Westminster bridge is necessary from a standpoint of conservation.

One of the other reasons given for the application of these earlier closures was the increasing efficiency of gill net operations through the use of nylon gear, etc. But the fishermen in this area maintain that the nylon nets have not proven as effective in this area in question as they have in other areas. They say it is due to the discolouration of the water in the Fraser river.

We also notice that in the minister's statement from which I have read there is reference to the necessity for these closures because of the quality of the fish. Some time ago I placed on record two letters, and I should like to refer to them again today. These letters have to do with the question of the quality of the fish taken in this area. The first one is to the Johnston Fishing and Packing Company, R.R.1, New Westminster, British Columbia. It is signed by Mr. Rolley. It reads as follows:

Gentlemen:

The directors of the gill net section of our union are desirous of obtaining information as to the procedure used in handling salmon caught above New Westminster bridge. As you probably know, there have been a lot of loose statements as to the quality of salmon caught in this area and in order to arrive at the facts of the case we would be very much obliged if your company could answer the questions listed below.

1. In deliveries of salmon from your collectors to your plant are the salmon caught and collected above New Westminster bridge kept entirely separate at all times from salmon caught and collected in other parts of district No. 1.

2. In the process of canning salmon at your plant is a separate code mark used to differentiate between salmon caught above New Westminster bridge and salmon caught in other parts of district No. 1?

3. Does the government laboratory require certification from your company as to the place of origin of any parcel of canned salmon submitted by your company for inspection?

I should like to quote from the answer, or the letter Mr. Rolley received in reply. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

Replying to yours of the 4th instant in which you ask four questions dealing with the Fraser river fishing operations, our answer to the first three is "no".

The fourth question was:

4. What percentage of this year's total pack was of grade B quality which was canned at your plant?

The reply to that fourth question was "none". I just place that information on the record once again, Mr. Speaker, in order to show that the argument that has been used with respect to the quality of the salmon is not very conclusive.

I should like to refer just briefly to the economic effects of this broad measure. We find that the number of fishermen in this area taking out licences in 1953 stood at 639. I should like to emphasize the fact that these are gill net fishing licences. We further note that, in order to secure such a licence, the applicant must be a resident of that area. We therefore see that this is a considerable number who are affected at the present time and who will be affected by the earlier closures on the Fraser river.

As to the estimated loss, it is difficult, of course, to estimate that. We find that these fishermen through the years have adapted their boats and their fishing gear to local conditions. It would, of course, entail a heavy expenditure, estimated from $2,000 to $7,000 per boat, to convert their equipment for operation in other fishing areas. Of course that would be almost impossible for a great number of these fishermen. Then we also realize that if 639 fishermen are adversely affected by these closures, certainly the merchants of the area would suffer loss of income resulting from this measure.

I refer not only to these aspects of the problem, but I should like to remind the house that a considerable number of these people are veterans, I understand. I have here in my hand an article from the Gazette, Maple Ridge-Pitt Meadows, dated March 10, 1955. The article is headed "Canadian Legion Rap Proposed Closure of Fraser to Fishing. Charge Action is Drastic, Deprives Veterans of Jobs", and reads as follows:

> Following a series of meetings between Canadian Legion officers from Haney, Mission and Agassiz, a resolution will be presented to the members of the organization protesting the closing of the Fraser river to commercial fishermen.
> The resolution is expected to be approved by the memberships by a clear majority since it affects an estimated 105 veterans of the last war and first world war, presently engaged in fishing as a livelihood.
> "Most of the equipment owned by the fishermen here is inadequate for fishing in the mouth of the Fraser or at sea", stated secretary-manager Roger Ansell of the Haney Legion branch.
> Following is the resolution to be presented to the memberships of three valley Legion branches and then forwarded to the federal government, Department of Fisheries.
> Whereas the federal Department of Fisheries has decided to close the Fraser river to commercial fishermen on September 16, 1955, from Pattullo bridge, New Westminster to Mission city;
>
> And whereas the Minister of Fisheries has definitely stated this is the first step towards the complete closure of this area to commercial fishing;
> And whereas the chief reason given for this drastic action is to maintain and increase the conservation of salmon, a statement strongly disputed by fishermen;
> And whereas this drastic and unwarranted action will undoubtedly deprive many veterans of world wars I and II who have a large investment in equipment and through age and disability, though able to fish in home waters cannot stand the rigours of going upcoast in open waters to make their livelihood;
> Be it resolved that the B.C. and N.W.S. command of the Canadian Legion register the strongest possible protest directly to the Minister of Fisheries against the closure of the Fraser river to commercial fishing in this area.
> In an effort to evaluate the amount of loss that will occur to the fishermen if the river is closed permanently, the legion are presently circulating questionnaires to the fishermen in each area.
> The questionnaire contains ten pertinent questions such as age, service record, length of fishing activities, home ownership, veterans allowances for purchase of home or equipment, equipment owned, such as boat gear, float or dockage and net shed, value of these and whether the fisherman is capable of supporting himself outside the industry and his physical capabilities.

Then the article concludes with this paragraph:

> It is expected that a compilation of the information so gathered will be presented with the resolution as a brief.

I give that quotation in order to indicate that, as is brought out in that brief, about 105 veterans of the first and second world wars will be adversely affected.

Some of the suggested alternate proposals that we find in these various briefs are the following. The first is a treaty with the United States covering conservation of pink runs and equal catch division. In this connection, on page 7 of a brief dated February 5, 1954, sent to Mr. A. J. Whitmore, chief supervisor of fisheries, Department of Fisheries, Vancouver, we find this statement:

> Certain things stand out like a sore thumb. The Americans are getting 65 per cent of the Fraser pink catch, the Canadian fleet as a whole is getting about 35 per cent. Out of the total run, the fishermen in area 29D are getting about 1 per cent. Out of the Canadian portion, they are only getting about 3 per cent. Even out of the Fraser river area catch they only took about 12 per cent. Yet it is suggested that closure of this area after September 16th would help solve the difficult problem of pink conservation.

The second suggestion I have gleaned from these briefs is the equalization of the week-end closures between the approaches to the Fraser and the Fraser river, combined with a deliberate program of equalizing catches between Canadian seiners and gill netters; third, the extension of weekly closures if advisable; and fourth, reappraisal of the whole situation with respect to closure measures.

Just to sum up this matter, Mr. Speaker, I have intimated first of all that the fishermen still maintain that the measures that have been put into operation are largely ineffective. Second, the efficiency of the new gear is overestimated so far as the Fraser river is concerned. Third, the quality argument used by the Minister of Fisheries is not conclusive. Fourth, the displacement of fishermen from this area is too high a price for any slight possible results. Fifth, the financial loss is not justified. Finally, I would say that more effective and less discriminatory measures are possible in the solution of the problem of conservation.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to delay the house very long, but I do wish to refer briefly to a matter which I believe is of extreme importance. It is important from the point of view of the political conduct of those who are in charge of our affairs, and also from the point of view of administration.

On two occasions during this session I have raised questions in the house in connection with the Department of National Revenue concerning certain tax remissions being made by that department to certain corporations. On the second occasion we were promised an explanation by the minister. May I say incidentally, sir, that I have notified the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that I am raising this matter in the house this afternoon. Unfortunately he is not in his seat, but perhaps he will be in later.

While we are still waiting for the answer to that question, another has come up that has to do with the same department. I believe it is time a statement was made in the house to set out all the facts in order that we can be sure the law of the land is being observed. In order to put the background of this question as fairly as possible, I should like to quote part of an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star today. It deals with the question of Mr. Dempsey and the connection his activities have had with the Minister of National Revenue and others. The editorial reads as follows:

> Mr. Dempsey admits that at least $5,000 in 1951 election funds, contributed to him by the late John Drohan, were not reported to the returning officer as required by the Ontario election act. The act provides penalties for failing to make a detailed statement of campaign fund receipts, and for making a false return. In Mr. Dempsey's case, penalties upon conviction might total more than $13,000.

Then the editorial continues with a reference to a statement made by the attorney general of Ontario, which appeared in the same newspaper. The statement was to the effect that no action would be taken, and the editorial continues as follows:

> But Mr. Dana Porter, attorney general in the Frost government, says he has no intention of laying a charge against Mr. Dempsey. Does this mean that Conservative candidates in Ontario can flout the election act with impunity and feel safe from prosecution in the courts as long as their government is in power?
> The widow of the late Mr. Drohan says he told her he handed over the money to Mr. Dempsey "for favours he would get from the government". Perhaps the attorney general prefers to have Mr. Dempsey escape all penalty rather than have the facts brought out in court.
> It is up to the voters in the June 9 election to judge as to what standard of political morality prevails in Ontario government circles. It is bad enough that highway frauds, irregularities and overpayments totalled many millions in a few years; that thousands of dollars were contributed to a Conservative candidate in advance for concessions expected from the lands and forests department. But it is worse still when the government deliberately does its best to prevent the public getting all the facts.

Up to that point I agree with the Toronto Star that it is a matter for the consideration of the Ontario electors whenever they have to cast their ballots. This is the part to which I wish to address myself particularly, because this goes much farther than Ontario. The last part says:

> The Renfrew South election fund scandal came to light only by accident through receipts in the estate of the donor, who died in 1952. The voters have the right to wonder how many other government candidates benefited in similar fashion through large contributions which will never be revealed. Certain it is that the Ontario Conservative party never seems to lack for funds at election time.

May I add to that my opinion that the Liberal party does not seem to lack for election funds, either in Ontario or elsewhere. The reason this involves the House of Commons is that we are all trustees of the public treasury. It is true that for the time being the Minister of National Revenue is in charge of and responsible for the collection of the taxes imposed by this parliament. Since we are the public representatives it is we, in the last analysis, who are the final trustees of the public purse. Any time there appears to be any irregularity affecting moneys which are the property of the people of Canada, then the representatives of the people have a right to know the full facts and have a full explanation laid before them in order that they may be able to explain to their electors just what is happening.

I believe the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) performed a public service when on May 9 of this year he asked the following question on the orders of the day, which appears at page 3565 of Hansard:

> In view of the speculation raised by an editorial in today's Globe and Mail regarding the minister's previous knowledge of the Dempsey affair, will the minister clarify the situation by making a statement to the house?

That was a very fair question. I think he gave the minister a wonderful opportunity to lay the facts before the house. What did we get at that time? The reply was that the minister was prohibited by section 133 of the Income Tax Act and section 55 of the succession duty act—I believe that section number should have been different—from disclosing the information he had. He did admit in his reply, and I quote:

> I admit that I had a conference with Mr. Frost while he was in Ottawa. He had to leave hurriedly, so that the conference was incomplete. I am not in a position to disclose any information that passed between us at that time.

The question was followed up later by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), when he asked if the minister could point out where, in section 133 of the Income Tax Act, the minister found authority under which he could disclose information to Premier Frost which he could not disclose to parliament. The reply given to that was:

> I quoted section 133 with reference to the Income Tax Act and section 54 of the succession duty act, and it was under section 55 of the succession duty act that Premier Frost, as treasurer of Ontario, was entitled to any information we have.

We go to section 55 of the succession duty act, and what do we find? I shall quote the whole section because it is short, at least the first part of the section which has to do with this matter.

> 55. (1) No person employed in the service of Her Majesty shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this act, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of this act.

Quite obviously the minister is attempting to justify the result on the basis of these words, "any person not legally entitled thereto", and perhaps is prepared to argue that in his opinion the premier of Ontario was so entitled. But is it not a strange situation, where one would expect that the persons entitled to that information would be officials of the department—and one would expect that those officials are sworn to secrecy; because if they are not, then this whole section becomes a farce and means nothing—if one person, who is bound by the secrecy of the act, gives information to somebody else who is not so bound? If that is so, then of course the act has no effect.

I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to state in this house whether he considers Premier Frost in the same category as officials of his own department, and whether Premier Frost is sworn to secrecy under the provisions of the Income Tax Act. If that is not the case; if Premier Frost is not in the same category as officials of the Department of National Revenue and the minister himself, then of course he is not subject to the same restrictions. The minister, then, had no business to disclose information to a person who is not bound by the secrecy provision, when he has refused to give the same information, or similar information, in the House of Commons.

What makes the matter still worse is this, that if what I am now going to quote is correct, then of course the whole thing becomes a sort of midsummer night's dream. I quote now from the report of a speech made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), as it is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of today:

> Revenue Minister McCann was charged today with playing politics with the Dempsey case and of withholding information from Premier Frost of Ontario until he felt it would be of political advantage to have it known.
> George Hees, president of the national Progressive Conservative association and M.P. for Toronto-Broadview told a regional party meeting here the method chosen by Dr. McCann to communicate the information by drawing the premier into a corner at the recent federal-provincial meeting "was just like a Parisian postcard vendor trying to peddle his wares".

Well, I am not going to say that I agree with that description of the way in which this information was given, because I have nothing to base it upon; but certainly it appears as if the Minister of National Revenue were trying to make a sort of cloak and dagger affair out of the whole matter. If the information which came to the notice of the minister as the result of the administration of an estate—and we are given to understand that this happened a few years ago—was in his possession, and if he felt that the law of the land was being broken, or that regulations were not being lived up to, then it was his duty at that time to notify the proper authorities.

If he felt that it was an evasion of the Income Tax Act, and that undisclosed income was involved, then I think it was his duty to lay a proper charge and start action at that time. The fact that he did not do so lends credence to the statement made by the president of the Progressive Conservative association.

The part that really causes me the greatest concern is this. Further on in the same report it is stated that Mr. Dempsey, in speaking to a reporter today, is credited with having said that he had not reported his contribution to the 1951 campaign funds, because—and these are the words in the report—

> —he had received assurances from revenue minister J. J. McCann that income tax authorities would take no action on the matter.

Mr. McCann: Absolutely false.

Mr. Zaplitny: Then there is this further direct quotation:

"Just mind your P's and Q's and the government won't do anything about the contribution," Mr. Dempsey said he was told by Dr. McCann.

I say this, that if those words are correct then the Minister of National Revenue, in fairness to himself and in fairness to this parliament, should forthwith hand in his resignation because any minister—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Zaplitny: If the hon. member disagrees he will have an opportunity to say so.

Mr. McCann: I wish at this time to declare positively that the statement you have just quoted is absolutely false in every particular.

Mr. Zaplitny: I take it that the minister refers to the last quotation I put on the record. He did not identify which one. If that is not correct, then of course the minister and Mr. Dempsey can fight that out between themselves. The fact remains that in my opinion there has been a lack of frankness on the part of the minister. If the minister obtained certain information—and we are given to understand that it was as the result of his being a director of a company which had something to do with the administration of an estate—which he felt was evidence of a law being violated, and if he withheld that information from the appropriate sources for two or three years in order to use it for political purposes, that in itself in my opinion would be enough for the minister to be charged with a great misdemeanour.

It is not the prerogative or the right of a minister of the crown to use his position for political purposes, particularly a position such as that held by the Minister of National Revenue, who has access to information so confidential that even when it affects the public interest he will not disclose it to parliament because, he tells us, the secrecy provisions of the act do not permit him to do so. I say that to use that kind of information for political purposes is in my opinion a dereliction of duty and an abuse of public trust. If the minister has used his position, either as director of a company or as Minister of National Revenue, to obtain information and hold it for a strategic time at which he could do political harm to his opponent, then I say he is performing an act for which he should be censured.

I say that very frankly, because I am not at all satisfied that the Minister of National Revenue has given the house any information so far. The questions that have been put to him and the answers we have received have left much to be desired. It is still not clear, certainly not to me, what the minister means when he tells us that under section 55 of the Dominion Succession Duty Act he is permitted to give information to the premier of Ontario. When he says that, then I think the minister should state in this house how he comes to that conclusion.

Mr. McCann: He is treasurer of Ontario.

Mr. Zaplitny: Is the premier of Ontario an official of the minister's department? Is he sworn to secrecy, so far as this act is concerned? That is what I want to know.

Point 2 is this. Did the minister have this information for the last two or three years as a result of the fact that he was director of a company and, if so, why did he not give that information to the proper authorities and see that appropriate action was taken?

While we are on this subject, may I say that a new method seems to be creeping in. There was a time when the Prime Minister of Canada used to insist that ministers of the crown should divest themselves of directorships in companies. Apparently a change has come about, and we now have the new look in government. They can have one foot in the government and one foot in private business and use both sources to advantage, one for the other.

I hope that process has not gone too far, because it makes one wonder to what extent it could be used if ministers of the crown were to find themselves in the position of obtaining confidential information from private industry, on the one hand and, on the other hand, in the position of being able to obtain private and confidential information in a government position. One can easily imagine the terrific abuses that could creep into the administration of the affairs of this country if that were so.

I think it is time the Minister of National Revenue gave the House of Commons the facts and explained why, if he had information which came to him as the result of a position he holds outside the government and which he felt perfectly willing to give to the premier of Ontario a few weeks ago, he kept that information hidden all this time; and whether there is any truth at all in the statement that he had assured Mr. Dempsey that the government would not take action with regard to the contribution in 1951.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. McCann: I said a moment ago that was absolutely false. The hon. member quoted that before.

Mr. Zaplitny: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will recall that, as the Minister of National Revenue said, he dealt with that point on a question of privilege a few moments ago. Of course the hon. member, and all hon. members, must accept the minister's assurance on that point, and I hope the hon. member who has the floor will not pursue it any further.

Mr. Zaplitny: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, that was the reason I asked the minister to which quotation he was objecting and he said it was the last one I had given. The one I have just mentioned was made previous to that. I understand that the minister now denies everything in connection with what Mr. Dempsey said to the reporter, as recorded in this newspaper. That still leaves many questions unanswered.

Mr. Lennard: He said "no, no, I did not."

Mr. Zaplitny: I will leave it to the minister right now. He can have all the "no, noes" he wants. He can tell the house exactly what has happened and where he finds authority in section 55 of the succession duty act to disclose information to the premier of Ontario which he cannot disclose to this house, and to what extent he is involved in this whole question of the contributions to Mr. Dempsey which came to his knowledge as a result of his being a director of the company.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hahn: Apparently the house is anxious to hear me, so I shall continue.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) told of some of the difficulties his people encounter in trying to carry on fishing in the Fraser river, as the result of certain action the Department of Fisheries has taken to conserve, or so-called conserve, salmon. I have a similar problem in my riding, and I should like to second everything that he has brought to the attention of the house.

I am sure the minister has had many representations, even as I and the hon. member for Fraser Valley have had. We have had many meetings; we have had many letters indicating disapproval of the regulation that was brought in a year ago announcing the date of closure of salmon fishing above the Pattullo bridge. Many cross words have been used and many accusations have been made. The hon. member for Fraser Valley mentioned Peter Jenewein. He is a fisherman; he is connected with the united fishermen and allied workers' union. He is also the reeve of the municipal district of Maple Ridge. As recently as the day before this house opened he indicated to me that things had reached such a state between the Minister of Fisheries and the gill net fishermen that they considered it absolutely futile to talk to such an autocratic minister. Such a condition is most unfortunate. It is most unfortunate that any group of producers in this country should feel it absolutely futile to spend a few moments with a minister of the crown discussing the possibility of rectifying a condition that has been forced upon them. I would say that some fault must lie with the minister.

The history of the fishing industry in British Columbia is long, and I do not intend to elaborate on it at this time. However, last year the minister indicated something of the story of the protection of the sockeye salmon industry in British Columbia, and what it means to that province. I am not too interested in that question at this time, by reason of the fact that the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, which was set up some years ago to protect the sockeye salmon, has done an excellent job on the conservation of sockeye. Last year we had the finest sockeye salmon fishing season in the history of our province. We obtained something in the neighbourhood of 9,500,000 salmon. This commission, which is virtually a partnership between United States and Canadian fishermen, has proven most successful, with the result that an industry that at one time was threatened with extinction is today thriving.

I should like the minister to recognize one fact in this regard. That is that we built up a tremendous fishing industry because we had conservation of fish according to the proposals set forth by the fishermen themselves under the international joint commission which studied the question. Fishing was continued above the Pattullo bridge, the very thing the minister is asking us not to do today. The conservation program that was carried out under the terms of the agreement helped to save our sockeye fishing industry.

The fishermen themselves are most anxious to protect their own industry. They know what will happen to them unless they have conservation in all branches of the fishing industry, so they have done everything possible to study the question. They have tried to meet the minister half way, but it seems that such a thing is quite impracticable and the minister just will not listen.

When the minister spoke in the debate last year he indicated that he had changed his mind to a certain extent, and he set back the time for closure by some six weeks. He mentioned at that time that it would gradually be closed off completely. However, that is not desirable. It did not satisfy the gill netters, who are most affected by this particular action.

The representations that were made to the minister by the united fishermen and allied workers' union, as well as by the gill net section of the Pacific fishermen and allied trades union, were mentioned earlier by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and I am not going to deal with them at this time.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Speaker, will you call it six o'clock?

Mr. Harris: Before that is done, may I say that everyone is aware of the fact that the hon. member is the last speaker on the list in this debate. I wonder whether the house would continue long enough to enable him to complete his remarks and have a vote.

Mr. Fulton: No. Many hon. members have left the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not agreeable?

Mr. Fulton: No.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I do not want any misunderstanding. I am not attempting to put anything over on the house. It has been the agreement all day that when we reached this point we would have a vote. I hope hon. members will find it possible to do so, but if that is not the desire we can only adjourn until tomorrow. On reflection I think hon. members would prefer to get the vote over with now, and if they feel that any absent member has something to say, it is possible for him to say it on the main motion tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is now three minutes after six o'clock. It would be perfectly legitimate if some hon. members have gone home, in which case they would not be here to record their votes if a division were called at the end of the hon. member's speech.

Mr. Hahn: Lest there be any misunderstanding, I want to say that I am quite prepared to talk for the next 30 or 40 minutes. I shall comply with your wishes. The Minister of Finance and I had had a discussion earlier today respecting this debate. This would not have happened if things had taken their normal course. If the house wishes to call it six o'clock I am quite happy to agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would require unanimous consent to proceed. Do I understand that unanimous consent has not been granted?

Some hon. Members: No.

On motion of Mr. Hahn the debate was adjourned.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 12, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

RENFREW MACHINERY COMPANY

Mr. Fleming:

1. What was the price paid by the government for the purchase of the plant of Renfrew Machinery Company in Renfrew, Ontario, and when was it paid?
2. What amounts were spent by the government in alterations and improvements on the plant, and when?
3. When was the plant sold by the government, to whom, and at what price?

Mr. Dickey:

1. The price paid for the plant of the Renfrew Machinery Company, including certain machinery and equipment, was $1,160,000 in September, 1951.

2. The plant, as purchased at the time of the Korean crisis, was used for light commercial manufacturing. Alterations to the extent of $311,708 were made to the existing plant, and additional plant services (power house, electrical, air, water and steam) to the value of $605,572 were provided to service new machinery and equipment valued at $1,956,447.61, which was urgently required for the production of jet engine components.

3. The land and buildings (excluding the above-mentioned machinery and equipment, title to which remains vested in the crown) were sold in April 1955, to Aluminum Castings Limited, 123 Hope Street, Glasgow, Scotland, for a price of $800,000.

A. V. ROE COMPANY—ORENDA ENGINES

Mr. Knowles:

1. Is the total aircraft production of the A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited and Orenda Engines Limited, contracted for by the federal government, or any department or agency thereof? If not, what proportion is?
2. Is Orenda Engines Limited obliged by the federal government to supply engines to other specified aircraft producers in addition to Avro Aircraft Limited? If so, to what producers?
3. Is the A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited, or Orenda Engines Limited, subsidized in any way by the federal government, or by any department or agency thereof? If so, to what extent?
4. Has the federal government any other kind of financial interest in the A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited, or Orenda Engines Limited? If so, what is the nature and extent of such interest?
5. On what basis does the federal government or any department or agency thereof purchase aircraft from A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited, or Orenda Engines Limited? Are such purchases made at a flat price, or on a cost-plus basis?
6. Has the government any information regarding the financial position, including the profit position of the A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited, and Orenda Engines Limited? If so, is such information available to parliament?
7. What proportion of the total aircraft production in Canada is undertaken by the A.V. Roe company, Avro Aircraft Limited, and Orenda Engines Limited?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. Canadair Limited for F-86 Sabre aircraft.

3. No.

4. Yes. Crown-owned capital assets, including plant and equipment valued at $65,057,725 have been provided to these companies for the carrying out of defence contracts. Of this amount, assets valued at $17,388,436 were subsequently purchased by the A. V. Roe Canada Limited, and equipment valued at $1,043,449 and $2,990,474 were transferred to MacDonald Brothers Aircraft Limited and York Gears Limited respectively.

5. Contracts for the production of aircraft by Avro Aircraft Limited and for the production of engines by Orenda Engines Limited are negotiated on the basis of a fixed fee plus incentive bonus on savings under a target price arrangement, with a total profit limitation of 10 per cent of target. The A. V. Roe company is a holding company only and, as such, has no direct contracts with the government.

6. Yes. The Department of Defence Production receives regular financial statements of these companies on a confidential basis, and has not made them available to parliament.

7. During the fiscal year 1954-55, Avro Aircraft Limited and Orenda Engines Limited accounted for some 60 per cent of total expenditures for production of aircraft and engines in Canada. On the basis of empty weight of aircraft including engines and fixed equipment, the two companies produced 37·7 per cent of total Canadian production.

With reference to the foregoing over-all percentage figures, it should be noted that they are inclusive of production carried out by subcontractors which, in the case of the engines, represents approximately 65 per cent of the total, and in the case of aircraft, 20 per cent of the total.

Questions

R.C.A.F.—PILOTS KILLED

Mr. Campbell:

1. How many student pilots have been killed in training during the past five years?
2. How many pilot graduates have been killed in the same period within a year after graduation?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 31 members of the R.C.A.F. and 22 NATO students have been killed in training during the past five years.

2. During the past five years, 59 members of the R.C.A.F. have been killed within a year of graduation.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. Bell:

What is the percentage change in the level of capital expenditures from 1953 to 1954, and the anticipated change from 1954 to 1955 for each province as estimated by the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. Dickey:

CAPITAL EXPENDITURE BY PROVINCES 1953 TO 1955

Province	Value of capital expenditures			Per cent change
	1953	1954(1)	1955(2)	1953 to 1954(1)	1954 to 1955(2)
	$ millions	$ millions	$ millions
Newfoundland	80·0	67·0	83·0	−16·2	+23·9
Prince Edward Island	17·4	18·3	19·4	+5·2	+6·0
Nova Scotia	157·0	160·2	162·3	+2·0	+1·3
New Brunswick	108·5	117·1	149·5	+7·9	+27·7
Quebec	1,374·4	1,299·9	1,393·7	−5·4	+7·2
Ontario	2,105·6	2,065·8	2,186·9	−1·9	+5·9
Manitoba	285·8	267·9	258·5	−6·3	−3·5
Saskatchewan	357·4	352·8	308·9	−1·3	−12·4

Canada	5,841·3	5,495·1	5,806·7	−5·9	+5·7

(1) Preliminary.
(2) Anticipated.
(3) Includes Yukon and Northwest Territories.

*STATISTICAL INFORMATION TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Fulton:

1. In how many government departments is it laid down that officials may not furnish direct to a member of parliament any statistical information requested by him (even though it be not of a nature "classified" on security grounds) but must channel it through the minister's office or some other such intermediary?
2. By whom was this policy laid down, and how long has it been in effect?

Mr. St. Laurent: This is a question which is marked as one which the hon. member wishes to have answered orally. There is not, and I do not know that there has ever been, any general directive of the character described in the question, and applying to all departments. Each minister has the responsibility for the administration of his own department and generally is looked upon as having the responsibility for any information that comes from that department.

Of course there are some matters about which inquiries can be made, that require merely statements of fact, that are not open to any controversy whatsoever. They are actual facts. With respect to statistics, many of these have to be made up involving elements of estimate, and I think it is quite natural that the minister would wish to know what kind of statements involving estimates and opinions are prepared by officials in his department before they are issued as a formal statement on behalf of the department.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

R. F. WELCH CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the R. F. Welch Construction Company (British Columbia) Limited, since April 1, commenced work by extra gangs on the Calgary division of the Canadian National Railways?

2. If so, how many men are employed on each of such extra gangs?

3. Has the said company been requested by the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees to hire sectionmen and B & B men who are for the moment laid off as regular Canadian National Railway employees on said gangs?

4. If so, how many of sectionmen and B & B men laid off by the railroad company have been taken on the strength of the said gangs by the said construction company?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): The Canadian National Railways advise as follows:—

1. On April 1 and 2 two gangs commenced work on the Calgary division, which was completed on April 25.

Since the first of the year R. F. Welch (B.C.) Limited has also had a small gang of 12 to 15 men doing miscellaneous work on the Calgary division. For the purpose of unloading steel rails this gang was later increased to about 22 men of whom 16 were immigrants brought to Canada by R. F. Welch (B.C.) Limited during the early summer of 1954 and are still employed by that company.

2. Gang No. 1, set up on April 1, consisted of 73 men, of whom 61 were labourers employed by R. F. Welch (B.C.) Limited and 12 were Canadian National Railways maintenance of way employees, comprising foremen and machine operators recruited from the regular maintenance of way section forces.

Gang No. 2, set up on April 2, consisted of 70 men, of whom 58 were labourers employed by R. F. Welch (B.C.) Limited and 12 were Canadian National Railways maintenance of way employees, comprising foremen and machine operators recruited from regular section gangs.

3 and 4. So far as the management is aware R. F. Welch (B.C.) Limited has not been requested by the brotherhood of maintenance of way employees to hire sectionmen and B and B men who are for the moment laid off as regular Canadian National Railways employees on said gangs. However, there always has been an understanding with the Welch organization that laid off railway maintenance of way employees will be given preference in employment on Welch gangs. Moreover, roadmasters have been instructed to provide the employment office with names of laid off men wishing to work on Welch gangs, and these men receive preference.

Only a few laid off maintenance of way employees are known to have accepted work on the Welch gangs. During the past month (April) there has been an actual shortage of sectionmen and since April 15 requests have been placed with the Calgary office of the national employment service for extra men to fill the requirements of railway section gangs on the Calgary division. Of the men employed on the three gangs above referred to 125 were recruited through the Edmonton office of the national employment service.

MCCULLOCH PROPERTY, TRURO, N. S.—BUILDINGS

Mr. Purdy:

1. Have the buildings on the McCulloch property at Truro, Nova Scotia, owned by the government, been sold?

2. If so, (a) What steps were taken to secure the best possible price for same; (b) To whom were they sold, and what was the price obtained; (c) What were the conditions, if any, imposed on the successful tenderer?

Mr. Dickey:

1. Three buildings (frame dwelling, double garage and shed) located at 664 Prince street, Truro, N. S., (sometimes referred to as the McCulloch property) have been sold.

2. (a) Advertisements were posted in ten local post offices in the Truro area requesting offers to purchase these buildings for demolition and removal, in June 1954 and in July 1954. In addition approximately 25 requests for offers to purchase were forwarded to individuals.

(b) Mr. Lewis C. Reid, 300 Pictou road, Bible Hill, Truro, Nova Scotia. Price $125.

(c) A restoration deposit of $1,000 was required from the purchaser to guarantee satisfactory removal and demolition within 60 days.

LORNEVILLE, N. B., BREAKWATER

Mr. Bell:

1. What was the amount of the contract for the construction of the Lorneville, Saint John county, New Brunswick, breakwater, when and to whom awarded?

2. Has an investigation been conducted into the collapse of said breakwater in October, 1953, during construction?

3. If so, what was the cause and on whom did the responsibility rest?

4. Is construction to be completed? If so, when, by whom, and on what terms?

5. Have temporary arrangements been made for fishermen and others during this further period of completion?

Mr. Bourget:

1. (a) $196,115; (b) September 9, 1952; (c) Diamond Construction Company, Limited, Fredericton, N. B.

2. Yes.

3. The natural soil forming the foundation for the timber cribwork portion was less capable of sustaining the weight of the work than the borings indicated or than had been anticipated by departmental engineers. As a result, the outer end of the timber portion settled unevenly. The rubble mound approach and the inner end of the timber portion did not settle abnormally.

4. The project has been revised. A contract was awarded for this work, on the basis of public tender calls, to the Diamond Construction Company, Limited.

5. The stone rubble approach and the inner end of the timber portion provide some temporary facilities.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FINGERPRINTING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. Harkness:

1. What government employees are fingerprinted in addition to armed services personnel?
2. Who does the work?
3. What use is made or it?

IDENTIFICATION CARDS

Mr. Harkness:

1. To whom are identification cards issued in addition to the armed services?
2. Where have the blank cards been procured from since 1950?
3. What has been the cost of these blank cards per thousand?
4. Have they been secured on a tender basis?

TRACADIE ARTILLERY RANGE

Mr. Brooks:

1. What has been the cost to date for (a) purchase of land; (b) construction of buildings; (c) improvement made in connection with the Tracadie artillery range and camp at Tracadie?
2. When was this artillery range last used by the Department of National Defence for training purposes?
3. Is it the intention of the department to make further use of this range?

R.C.A.F. STATION, COMOX, B.C.—CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Barnett:

1. Under what job classifications are civilians employed at the Royal Canadian Air Force station, Comox, British Columbia?
2. What are the weekly hours of work and the hourly or monthly rates currently paid under each job classification?
3. What other benefits or indirect compensation do employees in each of the classifications receive?
4. Were the rates and hours of work established as a result of a prevailing rate survey in respect to each of the classifications?
5. If not, on what basis were the various rates and weekly hours of work set?

Mr. Blanchette: Return tabled.

[Mr. Bourget.]

INDIANS

Mr. Michener:

1. What is the number of Indians (under the Indian Act) in Canada today?
2. What is the annual rate of increase?
3. What is the average size of Indian families or the ratio of children to adults?
4. What is the total amount paid to or for the benefit of the Indians by each department of the Canadian government and the total of all such payments (a) in the last fiscal year; (b) as estimated to be paid in the current fiscal year?

FEES TO BARRISTERS, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Mr. MacLean:

What are the names and addresses of barristers, solicitors and advocates in Prince Edward Island to whom fees which total in excess of $200 have been paid by all departments of government, and what was the amount paid to each of them since the 1st of January, 1947?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VALCARTIER CAMP—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT REGARDING EXPLOSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister in a position to make a statement regarding the explosion at Valcartier Camp late last night, and the death of three persons following it?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): I have just received a report on this accident, Mr. Speaker, and I think it covers most of the salient facts.

Last evening a party of four civilians, two men and two women, entered a road leading from the Camp Valcartier-Valcartier village road to the back of Valcartier Camp. They drove their car to a double row of large fence posts which had been placed across the road to prevent entry to the area, which is a rocket range and is out of bounds to all civilians. The telephone poles along the road are clearly marked "out of bounds". At both ends of the road there are signs marking the fact that it is national defence property. The range itself is clearly marked with large signs in both English and French reading, "danger, unexploded projectiles".

Notwithstanding these warnings, this party of four people parked their car at the double row of fence posts and went approximately one-quarter of a mile into the range beyond the fence posts and there began collecting inert rocket bombs on the range. After apparently loading the car with some 40 or 50 of these, it was found that the weight was too great for the vehicle. Accordingly some of the rockets were thrown onto the ground to lighten the weight; at least the lady who was injured so indicated. One rocket exploded when thrown out and three of the occupants of the car, namely Mr. O. P. Daigle, Mr. Adrian Labranche and Miss Marie Clare-Daigle were killed. Mrs. O. P. Daigle was severely injured, but was able to walk to the camp, a distance of some two and a half miles, where she called at the first house where she saw a light shining. It happened to be the home of the medical officer, who immediately arranged for her to be taken to a hospital in Quebec city. The provost corps, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the provincial police were immediately summoned and a full investigation is now under way.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. As the minister said, there are signs both in French and in English.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dufresne: Is it the intention of the department, knowing that people have this habit of picking up shells, to have more sentries on duty following this explosion?

Mr. Campney: In answer to the supplementary question asked by the hon. member, may I say that when the inquiry into this unfortunate accident has been concluded we shall then look at all the facts adduced and decide what, if any, further steps should be taken in the interests of public safety.

POSTAL SERVICE

NORWAY HOUSE, MAN.—REQUEST TO SPEED UP MAIL DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General. Norway House, Manitoba, has received no mail service for over five weeks. What can the department do to speed up this service?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I made some inquiries about this matter one minute before I came into the house. The headquarters of the Post Office Department is not quite sure that the hon. gentleman's statement of fact is accurate, though it may be. It appears that there is a period when mail can no longer be taken in on the surface because of the break-up of ice and before it is possible to land planes. No one seems to have devised any way of getting the mail in during that period. I am told that this usually happens every year for a short period, and I have asked them to investigate at once to see if anything can be done to speed up mail delivery.

Mr. Bryce: I have a supplementary question. I want to assure the minister that my information is accurate. I know the gentleman who wired me, and if he said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bryce: Have I your permission, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has the right to ask a question.

Mr. Bryce: Thanks very much, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure the minister that my information is accurate.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RELEASE OF INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the concern of all of us, will the Prime Minister, on behalf of this house, personally investigate every aspect of the McCann-Drohan-Dempsey-Frost affair to ascertain whether or not the Minister of National Revenue acted in complete accordance with his responsibilities as a minister?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should personally investigate an incident that seems to be of considerable partisan political importance in the course of the election that is taking place in the province of Ontario at this time. I am satisfied that the Minister of National Revenue has discharged his duties in accordance with the practice that has prevailed hitherto. I do not want to get into any controversy about it.

The hon. gentleman asked me whether I was going to make a personal investigation of the facts. I have heard the denial of the rumours that have circulated about the way this incident took place, and having ascertained from the Minister of National Revenue what actually did take place I do not think I need make any further examination of the problem.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. So that any misunderstanding may be avoided, because I might say it is our intention to defer an examination of this subject until the estimates of the minister are before the house and we can discuss it with a freedom that is not possible now, do I understand from the statement of the Prime Minister that he is fully informed in regard to the facts of this case in reaching the decision which he has stated?

Mr. St. Laurent: All I can say is that I am fully informed in respect of the information that has been given to me. I cannot say there is no information other than that which I have received that might be given to me. I have formed my opinion on the information I have received, and I feel satisfied that it fully covered the incident.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Following the examination he made, does he not consider that it is a matter of impropriety, or at least an action that is apt to give rise to serious consequences, when a minister of the crown holding a portfolio is also a director of a company that deals with that department?

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I understand the Minister of National Revenue has been connected with this company, or with one of its predecessors that is being continued by the company under the present name, for some 42 years. He was Minister of National Revenue when I became Prime Minister, and I was very happy to have him continue because I knew of the efficient and painstaking way in which he had handled the responsibilities of that department, and I have never had any occasion to find any clash between his duties as the Minister of National Revenue and whatever connection he might have with this company, which I do not know has relations with the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask a supplementary question. I do not think that answers the situation at all. Is this not the type of case which indicates that no minister should hold a directorship while a member of the government?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is a matter about which I inquired before I became a member of the government, and I was told there was no rule of law or even traditional practice that required anyone who accepted such responsibilities to sever any previous connections he might have had. I was told that was something for each individual to consider in respect of his own position, and he might feel that it was desirable to sever all connections. In fact I felt that it was desirable to sever all such connections to avoid occasions for the kind of criticism—which I feel is not justified—that is being directed against the Minister of National Revenue at the present time.

I felt that I should not accept the invitation which was extended to me to become a member of the government unless I did sever my connections with the commercial and industrial firms with which I had been connected previously, but that is a matter each one has to decide for himself. I am sure that each one when he takes office does his best to fully discharge the responsibilities implied in his oath of office.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the principles being enunciated by the Prime Minister are of importance beyond the case mentioned, would the Prime Minister tell us whom it was that he referred to when he was told about this position?

Mr. St. Laurent: I was invited by the then prime minister, the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, to become a member of his government. In the course of conversation I asked him about this and he told me there was no legal rule nor any traditional rule established by practice that would require me to sever my connections with the companies with which I had been associated; that that was a matter for each one to consider in the light of the position he would be assuming in becoming a member of the government.

I realized that there could be occasions for criticism, because in spite of my resignations it was suggested in this house that I had agreed to become a minister in order to carry out policies which were those of a board of directors with which I had been associated previously. In order to dispel that suggestion I had to assert in the house that the policy referred to in the criticism that was being made had never been mentioned in any way in the deliberations of that board, and that I had in fact severed my connections with that board before taking my oath of office.

In political life one must expect that any circumstance can be seized upon to direct what is frequently unfair criticism against those who hold office, and I wanted to leave as few opportunities as possible for unfair criticism.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question, to have the record complete? In view of the fact that the Prime Minister did resign all his directorships within a week after being sworn in as a member of the privy council, does he not think his colleagues should follow his lead?

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think for the conscience of any others; I respect their concern for their responsibilities and reputations when they become members of the government. Each one has to make his own appraisal of what it is advisable for him to do in order to have his position as honourably regarded as possible.

FLOODS

SASKATCHEWAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can give the house details of the flood conditions which prevail in Saskatchewan, and what action the federal government is taking in connection therewith.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No. All I can tell the house is that I received a telegram yesterday morning from the premier of Saskatchewan informing me that three of his ministers would be here on Monday with drainage plans and surveys or estimates of the damage, and asking if I would meet them with some of my colleagues. I wired back immediately that we would see them in my office on Monday morning at 10.30.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PENITENTIARIES—INQUIRY AS TO INSTITUTION OF 40-HOUR WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he can report to the house that any progress has been made in instituting the 40-hour week for penitentiary employees?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can report that the matter has been considered carefully by the Department of Justice and a memorandum has been prepared for the government as a whole, which is now under consideration.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, May 11, consideration of the motion of Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Macdonnell.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, just previous to my return to the house this afternoon there was an interparty meeting on the steps of the parliament building, and it was suggested by some of my Liberal friends and one of my C.C.F. friends that I would make myself highly popular if I stated that I would not continue my remarks on the budget. However, after discussing it with the members of one of the other groups we decided that as it is so hard to get the Liberals to understand things we should repeat, repeat and repeat them. I had quite a battle with my conscience, as you can understand, but I decided finally that I would do my best to explain what I wanted to bring before them.

In the few minutes at my disposal yesterday I indicated that I supported fully what the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) had said in respect to fisheries in British Columbia. I complimented the international fisheries commission upon the good work it had done. I pointed out also that there was a need for conservation of pink salmon and other fisheries. I mentioned something about the autocratic minister; and while I did not say so at that time, I must say now that I think possibly he is really a good man to send to Russia. One dictator would meet another.

First I should like to discuss the effect of the conservation methods which were formerly employed and what their results have been. On September 17 the fisheries council of Canada issued a bulletin. In that bulletin they referred to the question of whether Hell's Gate paid off. I am not very much interested in how well Hell's Gate paid off, because this is not only the question of a means of promoting a dam, but of a conservation measure that was carried out at that time, the same type of conservation to which I am proposing we return. If Hell's Gate paid off, the conservation measure which was employed at that time necessarily must have played an important part in it. Part of this report says:

> Canadian and American fishermen are expected to take over 10 million fish from the 1954 Adams river run which is now being fished by the gill netters in the Fraser river. This is a quite different picture from the "flop" in 1950, although 1946, the previous cycle year, was very good.
> . . . the results of conservation and regulation are impressive and it is gratifying that the press has devoted so much space to it since it will make it easier in future to secure funds for this type of work.

An hon. Member: Why not bring it up under the fisheries estimates?

Mr. Hahn: An hon. member has suggested taking it up under the fisheries department estimates. I had not decided how long I would speak on this matter, but he has just about made up my mind to spend my full time on it and possibly speak on it under the fisheries estimates and under supply as well, if he wishes.

The question arises as to who conserved these fish that made it possible for us to have in 1954 the biggest fishing season in the history of the Pacific coast. It is apparent that it was the former action on conservation that made this possible. Here we had a group of fishermen who for years, with the assistance of the Department of Fisheries, had helped to conserve the fish in the Fraser river and made this huge catch possible. I say it is rather ironic, and certainly it is not right, that these fishermen, after they have conserved all these fish for all these years, should now be forced to put out to sea, much against their own wishes. The conservation program made it possible to protect the fishing industry and has given us the greatest season for fishermen in recent years.

On November 16 Mr. A. J. Whitmore, the chief supervisor of fisheries, issued a statement regarding Fraser river chum salmon fishing for 1954. At that time he said:

(1) Chum salmon fishing operations, both gill net and purse seine, have been intensive in the outside approaches to the Fraser, particularly the Johnstone strait area.

Section 3 goes on to say:

The main run of chums in the Fraser area normally occurs during the month of November. Surveys of spawning streams in the lower Fraser during the past few days show that they are practically devoid of chum salmon spawners from this main run.

That is a very pertinent statement, especially in view of the fact that we had begun in a modified way to put into practice the closure that was suggested last year by the minister. The escapement was not what the department had hoped for. It goes on to say:

The only chum escapement of significance so far has come from the early run which passed through the fishing area several weeks ago.

That was prior to the closure. Section 5 goes on to say:

To assist in meeting conservation requirements, it is therefore considered necessary that the period of the approaching weekly close season be extended from a three-day period to a five-day period . . . that all net fishing be closed commencing at 8.00 a.m. Thursday, November 18, to 8.00 a.m. Tuesday, November 23.

They have had to change the regulations as a direct result of their policy, which was not doing the job it was intended to do. One week later, on November 24 of last year, another bulletin was issued by the same man. I would direct the minister's attention to sections 1, 2, 4 and 7 of this report. No. 1 says in part:

It had been expected that considerable numbers of chum salmon would have escaped to the spawning grounds during the five-day closure in effect last week end. Further surveys, however, during the past week, do not show this to be the case.

[Mr. Hahn.]

So this additional closure did not help at all. Section 2 states:

The numbers of spawners visible on the grounds at this time are alarmingly few; the smallest for a considerable number of years despite the closure of fishing above the New Westminster bridge for a considerable part of the season.

Here we have a condemnation by the fisheries department's own man of the policy that was set up last year. Despite the closure of fishing above New Westminster bridge for a considerable part of the season there were fewer spawners there than for the past several years. Then section 4 states:

Catches by commercial fishermen in the river below the New Westminster bridge and by Indians in the up-river area have been practically nil, indicating that there are very few spawning fish escaping past the commercial fishery.

We certainly cannot blame the fishermen on the Fraser river for being responsible for that condition at this time. Section 7 states:

It is, therefore, considered essential that all salmon net fishing in district No. 1, including Howe sound and Burrard inlet, be discontinued as from 8.00 a.m. Friday next, November 26, 1954, in the interests of conservation.

It was therefore found necessary to completely close the area to fishing until such time as we could get the fish up on the spawning grounds and provide for future fishing. That is the absolute opposite to what we found was true in former years when, through co-operation between the fishermen themselves and the Department of Fisheries, it was possible to conserve sufficient fish to build up the fisheries industry to the point where we find it today.

Later, on March 16 of this year—just two months ago—Mr. Whitmore issued another bulletin in respect to the salmon spawning report for 1954. On the first page of that he had this to say:

Developments of special interest associated with the 1954 salmon migration and spawning escapement showed continuing improvement in the volume and distribution of sockeye spawning stocks in the Fraser.

Later in section 4 he says:

Fishing efficiency in the Johnstone strait and Discovery passage area is regarded as the major factor responsible for the light escapement of chum spawners to streams on the lower mainland coast, including those of Jervis inlet, Pender harbour, Howe sound, and Fraser river areas.

Just as it says, that would indicate that fishing efficiency is the major factor responsible for the fewer spawning fish going up the river. Then on page 2, there is a paragraph under the heading of spring salmon. This escapement I am speaking of now occurred while the upper Fraser fishing was going on in full swing. That is, in the spring escapement the fishing was being carried on at the time the spring salmon were making their way up the river. It goes on to say this:

> Spawning stocks of this species over the province were well maintained. The escapement of springs to the Fraser watershed was satisfactory; well up to average in the Kamloops, Quesnel and Prince George areas, and above brood year levels in the Chilliwack and Harrison areas.

So you see that when the spring salmon were permitted to escape while the fishing was being done on the Fraser river according to the regulations as set forth by the Department of Fisheries in co-operation with the gill net fishermen on the Fraser, a sufficient number of spring salmon made their escapement. It was only during the time we found the fishing period changed that we ran into trouble.

Then in his statement in respect to chums on page 3, at the time of escapement of chums the fishing season was closed to the fishermen above New Westminster bridge. Let us see what effect it had:

> The over-all catch of chums was above average and with the exception of district No. 1 spawning supplies generally were satisfactory.

District No. 1 is the Fraser river district. With that exception, spawning in that area or in the over-all picture was satisfactory. This fact would indicate again that the argument that the closure of the Fraser river is in any way going to help in the matter of conservation of salmon at this time is not valid.

Let us analyse the reason for the effects of the closure as we now have it before us. The minister closed the fishing, that is above the Pattullo bridge, and after it was closed we lost spawning fish. The reason is quite apparent. If one were to stand on Pattullo bridge and look down the river, one could see the twinkle of many hundreds of lights on boats on the river. Just as we had earlier forecast, the fishermen merely went down river; and where we had a few hundred boats there before we added this huge number that had been up river up to that time. So we just doubled the number of fishermen below Pattullo bridge. I perhaps should not say "doubled", but rather that we increased the number of fishermen below Pattullo bridge. That merely meant the same number or more fish would be caught, for they could not get around the boats so well and the chances of fish escaping through the network of boats and nets were practically nil.

Then of course there was another factor, namely that more intensified fishing was carried on in outside waters, as the minister had suggested in his 1953 address to the fishermen's union. These fishermen were certainly doing an excellent job of netting them as they came around Vancouver island and into the Fraser.

Another reason for this closure not having the effect that it was suggested it should have is that only 1 per cent of the salmon are caught in that region above the bridge as compared with the other area, and it naturally could not have the effect that was hoped for.

What does this closure mean to the people of the area? The hon. member for Fraser Valley indicated something of that in his address yesterday, but I would say this. First, it means that those who were normally catching fish on the Fraser are now obliged to catch the same number, if possible, out at sea. This means that there is added cost to the fishermen. So the cost of fishing to these people is more. It means that a good number of these 600 and more fishermen in the area naturally enough do not have the equipment to go out to sea; therefore they just aggravate the unemployment condition in the area. It also means that community business suffers. The return to the fishermen will be less and therefore they would not have the money to spend in the community. It also means that those fishermen who were set up under the Veterans Land Act and who supplemented their income by getting something from this fisheries industry are being deprived of what had been their right for a good number of years.

There is one pathetic factor involved here, and that is that these same fishermen are not eligible for unemployment insurance. When they are in need and require financial help, they just do not get it.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a letter I received in reply to one I had written to Mr. Fred Rolley, secretary of the Pacific fishermen and allied trades union, gill net section. I think this is quite self-explanatory and needs little comment on my part:

> Dear Sir:
> Replying to your letter of February 8 asking for certain information as to the income of the fishermen of the upper Fraser, we have done our best in the time at our disposal to get you some information in this matter.
> We have taken a cross section that we think would be average, neither the best or the worst of the fishermen and placed them in two categories, the first group containing an average cross section of full time fishermen who fished entirely above New Westminster bridge in both 1953 and 1954. The fishing effort of this group would be over a period of nine months in 1953 and eight months in 1954.

Now let us look at these tables:

	1953	1954
1.	$2,565.42	$1,915.44
2.	3,175.49	1,764.19
3.	2,707.64	1,794.98
4.	2,979.24	1,991.33
5.	4,027.92	1,800.79
6.	4,218.56	1,970.49
7.	5,124.29	2,474.00
8.	2,400.10	1,769.58

The above fishermen would be under an operating expense of very roughly $1,000 for each year.

With respect to these fishermen, their earning power was cut down to half or practically half in every instance. The letter goes on to say:

This second group of fishermen would have been fishing approximately six months in both 1953 and 1954.

	1953	1954
9.	$2,754.81	$1,906.15
10.	1,025.31	801.94
11.	1,078.19	849.75
12.	1,342.33	1,134.51

The story of the fisheries among these people on the Fraser river is sad. They have all had their incomes cut very materially. I know the minister can argue that these fellows are not real fishermen, and that if they went to sea they would get seasick. Possibly they would, but it does not necessarily mean a man is not a fisherman because he cannot go to sea. These men have been fishing on the river for years and making a living. They have conserved the fish over the years, and they see no reason why they should be deprived of that privilege. We might just as well argue that an airplane pilot is not a pilot if he happens to black out in the course of a dive. That does not mean he cannot fly an airplane.

These fishermen can fish. They have proven their ability to fish, as indicated in the letter from which I read. In some instances they have earned up to $5,000; and to be cut down to well below $2,700 because of the fisheries policy is not fair to the men in that area.

Is there a place for both seine and gill net fisheries on the Pacific coast? Certainly there is. The fishermen are agreed there is. All these men, no matter who they are, agree that the fishermen in the seine boats can carry on their fishing at sea and at the same time fish in the Fraser river can be conserved through the method in effect until last year. The answer is progressive closure in the early season to permit the salmon to go on up the river unmolested.

I said a good deal about the quality of fish in my speech on this subject on February 2 of this year. It can be found on page 778 of Hansard. I am not going to repeat what I said at that time, but I would suggest that the minister take note of it. Another question has arisen quite recently in which I think the minister might be interested. It has to do with the problem of the conservation of fish on an international basis. Just prior to the opening of the house after the Easter recess, in fact on the Sunday before, the united fishermen and allied workers' union called a meeting of all interested United States and Canadian fishermen to discuss the problem of conservation.

I think that organization should be given some credit for its foresight in taking action at that time. To indicate who were there and that it was not a meeting of Canadian organizations only, I find in the minutes such names as Dan Assu, vice president, southern district, native brotherhood of British Columbia; H. Steve Stavenes, president of the united fishermen and allied workers' union; John Brown, president of the reef netter owners' association; Floyd Gregor, president of the reef netters' union, local 4 of the international longshoremen's workmen's union; Bob Cummings, secretary of local 3, international longshoremen's workmen's union; Joe Burrows, president of the Puget Sound gill netters' association; Lud Bretvich, vice president of the Puget Sound gill netters' association; and Dick Kink of the Puget Sound vessel owners' association.

I had been invited to the meeting, as was the minister. The minister could not attend, but I do not blame him for not being in attendance because he might have been asked for a policy statement which I do not think could properly have been made there. However, I did note with satisfaction that the minister had representatives at the meeting. For some time now it has been suggested that such a committee should be set up to study the problem of conservation.

I should like to compliment the minister at this point on having the foresight to suggest to the fishermen of British Columbia last year that they go out to sea off Vancouver island, do their fishing there and get their fish before the Americans got theirs. The salmon run through that water, and by doing that the United States fishermen would have their catches cut so much they would come to terms. Apparently they are ready to act, for the fishermen themselves do not want a race to deplete the fisheries industry.

As a result of that meeting a resolution was moved which I should like to put on record at this time. It is to be found on page 7 of the minutes, and reads as follows:

This joint conference recommends to all fishermen's organizations and all other interested fishery organizations on both sides of the international boundary that the proposal of the U.F.A.W.U. for the inclusion of pink salmon into the jurisdiction of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission for conservation, rehabilitation and equal division be given thorough study and support.

Be it further resolved all organizations represented here agree to hold further joint conferences at the request of organizations on either side of the line as soon as possible in order to work out the maximum unity and to agree on steps to implement whatever common program is adopted.

The minutes continue as follows:

The resolution was seconded from the floor and brother Bob Cummings of the I.L.W.U. spoke in favour of the resolution.

It will be noted on page 8 of the minutes that the resolution was put to a vote and carried unanimously. All the people who were there representing these various organizations were unanimous with respect to handling this fisheries problem we have in the Pacific northwest. I would particularly commend to the minister's attention the proposal that the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission should proceed to look after the existing problem. I am not alone in this suggestion. The British Columbian, a newspaper which speaks for the people of that area, had this to say in an editorial headed "Fishermen's Voice" in its issue of April 19, 1955:

Success of the work of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission, which governs the catch and distribution of the sockeye salmon, should be enough to encourage the governments of Canada and the United States to work out a similar treaty on pink salmon.

Need of the treaty, to end a continuing battle between the fishermen of the two nations, is indicated by the strength of the voice of the fishermen at the week end.

American boats have long held the balance of power because of a larger fleet but as Canada's fleet grows the need of a treaty becomes more urgent. Organization and control of the fleets, protection of the runs by a commission established through a treaty will be necessary to maintain this important part of the salmon fishing industry. What the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission achieved for the sockeye—that is, fair distribution of the catches through adequate controls, building up of the runs through control and conservation, and a general elevation of the tasty sockeye itself—can be done for the secondary pink salmon.

The voice of the fishermen meeting at White Rock was loud enough to be heard at Ottawa and Washington, and should produce results.

I ask only that the minister take note of that fact, that this is a desirable thing, and I would ask him to support the fishermen's unions in this request.

Miss Sybil Bennett (Halton): Mr. Speaker, this has been a long debate, and I had not intended to take part in it. However, I shall speak for only a few moments.

In rising to speak may I say that I feel I have some prescriptive right, if I may put it that way, because I would remind the house that for about a year I had asked the minister of finance to reduce the excise tax on automobiles. Of course I was very happy, along with all members in the house and the people of Canada generally, to see a reduction. But may I say, with all due respect to the minister, that I think he should have gone further. I believe there should have been a full reduction of this 15 per cent tax, commonly described as a luxury tax.

One of my reasons for saying this is that not many weeks ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said in the house that the upswing in business and employment in the United States was in no small measure due to the upswing in the automotive industry, and the increased production in that industry. What is true of that country would be equally true of this. I am told further that if the tax were removed entirely we would be able to produce cars in Canada as cheaply as they do in the United States. This would mean a tremendous increase and widening of the market for motor cars.

Singling out this industry in particular, it must be kept in mind that considering it in its primary stage, which is the production of motor cars, and also in its secondary stage, its tertiary stage, and all its other ramifications, the automotive industry is the largest employer of men and women in Canada. That means a great deal. It means that it is the largest producer of homes and of food and all those things required to maintain the population of this country. We must also keep in mind that not only is this a very important industry, but that at least 179 other industries in this nation are entirely dependent upon the production of automobiles. These various industries stretch from coast to coast, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They provide work and homes and all those things the employees require.

When one stops to consider the amount of steel, iron, aluminum, rubber, oil, textiles and products of the farm that are used in the manufacture of motor cars and all their component parts, and thinks at the same time of the farmers who receive additional income, one realizes just how important it is. Just think of the employees in the steel industry, the aluminum industry, the oil industry and the textile industry who need support and assistance at this time. I note the minister has just now entered the chamber, and I trust he will give this matter sound and diligent thought and consideration, to ascertain whether it would not be advisable, right at this time when we have unemployment in somewhat serious proportions, to consider entirely removing the 15 per cent excise tax from automobiles.

I believe the country would benefit from such action. I believe the treasury would benefit by way of additional sales, additional employment and additional taxation. Sometimes I think we lose sight of the fact that 90 per cent of the men and women driving cars in Canada are earning $3,000 a year or less. This means that 90 per cent of the men and women driving cars are on salaries in the lower brackets. They are the men and women who are moving from place to place, maintaining the mobility of labour. It was not so many weeks ago the Minister of Labour mentioned the fact that the mobility of labour in this country meant a great deal in maintaining the level of employment. We would greatly increase the numbers of car buyers if the prices of automobiles could be reduced through a further reduction in the tax.

I know the country must collect taxes; but it may be that we are at the point of diminishing return so far as the automotive industry is concerned. In my view the additional revenue that would come to the minister from other industries by way of income tax would more than compensate him. I venture to say he would be further ahead if the excise tax were removed, and in the meantime it is almost certain that several thousand more people would be given employment. When I say that I think I am speaking very conservatively.

I have said I would be brief, but there are one or two further comments I have to make, the first of which has to do with the royal commission the minister announced. I do hope that when it is appointed careful consideration will be given to processing our raw materials into finished products. I am sure it is correct to say that we are 25 or 50 years behind the times in this respect. We are still directing our economy along the lines we followed when we were a young country, when we had tremendous resources which, it was felt, could never be exploited. In those days we had a small population and it was all right to send out our raw materials and allow some other country to process them.

But what has happened? Our supplies of iron ore are running out, and the same applies to our supplies of aluminum. The same can be said about our nickel and copper. All these are going to the United States to be processed. One outstanding example I would place before the minister for his consideration is that of asbestos fibre. Canada sells $60 million worth of asbestos fibre to the United States each year. In that country our asbestos is processed and turned into finished products for resale. The result is that the $60 million becomes $450 million in the United States.

Think of the homes that sum of money provides. Think of the building it makes possible. Think of the clothes and the food, the extent to which all concerned along the line benefit by this $450 million. I say we have arrived at a stage in this country when we must keep those raw materials within our own borders, and give to our men and women the benefit of the returns that can be obtained from those materials, and the labour opportunities that would be opened up.

Then I have one further point—it seems that I keep on saying I have one more statement to make—and this has to do with immigration. I hope the royal commission will consider immigration so we may have some over-all plan. This is a great and magnificent country. It can be said that in the last 50 years in particular the very foundations of what we have in Canada today, industrially, economically, socially and indeed morally, were laid by the newcomers to this nation, those who went out to our frontiers and opened up our farms, our mines, our forests and our fisheries. We should have some over-all plan under which new people coming to this country would go to our frontiers, would man our new lands, would go to our mines, our fisheries and our forest industry.

What really is happening now, and it is a rather serious thing, is this. We see it down in the older parts of Ontario, particularly in the north of my county where a great deal of farming is carried on. These newcomers come in and they go on the farms. They stay there only a short time. Then what happens? They leave and go into the cities, into the crowded industrial areas, and there they try to find employment. During last year they helped to swell the ranks of the unemployed. The farmers are not really able to depend on their staying during the season when they need them most.

Therefore in this country we should adopt some real over-all plan under which these new people coming in will go out and make themselves worthy citizens, which they want to do, and at the same time further expand, extend and exploit this great land to the extent that it should be exploited.

This is the last point, Mr. Speaker. A great many things have been said in this debate, and they did not always refer to finance. This is becoming a very dangerous country in which to live. The other night the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) more or less raised a battle cry in this house. He said the gentlemen of the house should wear beards to protect themselves, I guess, against the women, to whom he referred in not too complimentary terms, as I recall it. He said we have four women sitting in the house right now.

Well, you know, we have had a great many conflicts in this house, Mr. Speaker, over the years, many historic conflicts, but now we are about to have the greatest conflict of them all. I look across the house, I look to my left and I look to my right and I think of all these great men, such as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) himself and perhaps the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters) who just went out. I can just visualize how they would look with beards. You know, Mr. Speaker, I shudder to think what is going to happen with respect to dislocation of industry. For example, barbers will be out of employment. Then the steel makers will be on short time, too, because they will not be making razors. The soap makers will be on short time because they will not be making soap powder and soap, or whatever these gentlemen use on their faces, to say nothing of the perfumeries. All these gentlemen use perfume and put these lotions on their faces, but sometimes you cannot tell whether it is a shaving lotion or what it is.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a tremendous displacement of industry just because the men of this house want to make themselves into Goliaths; they want to be Samsons. Let me remind them, before they embark on this venture, that for every Goliath there is a David and for every Samson there is a Delilah.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): A few days ago, on the orders of the day, I asked the Minister of National Revenue a very simple question. I asked whether he would make a statement to the house that would clarify his position with regard to the Dempsey affair. The minister made a statement. I think hon. members will agree that the statement by the minister did not contribute much to the clarification of a very confused situation.

I should probably say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that this affair, like the Ontario highways scandal and other such affairs that have developed in Canadian life, is due to a practice that has become fairly prevalent in Ontario. It may also be prevalent elsewhere. I refer to the practice of the government in power, whether provincial or federal, relying upon those who accept government contracts and those who profit from government business to finance their re-election to office.

That practice has become quite prevalent in Ontario, so prevalent, as a matter of fact, that while individual members personally are not concerned or affected or involved in any way, and while cabinet ministers in provincial and federal parliaments are not personally involved, the party machine does become involved and those recipients of government favours, whether federal or provincial, receive what actually amounts to a quota which they are expected to meet when election time comes around. I think that is the practice which is back of much of the trouble we see in this Dempsey affair and in other such affairs.

My point in asking the minister the question—as a matter of fact my whole concern—was to give him an opportunity to clarify that confused situation. It is a matter of interest to the house because it affects every man in public life in Canada. Here is the situation. A member of a provincial legislature of some ten years' standing, apparently a reputable citizen, makes a statement to which he says he is prepared to take an oath. A cabinet minister, also a responsible citizen, categorically denies that statement. In effect, what we have is two men holding responsible positions in public life calling each other a liar.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that is a situation which is not conducive to good government. It serves to undermine public confidence in public men, in both the statements and the actions of those in public life throughout this country. In the interests of government, in the interests of those of us who are in public life, this situation requires more clarification than the minister has yet chosen to give it.

I realize that the minister is in a difficult position; I realize that he has much information on this particular case which he is prevented from giving to the public. I still think there are some things the minister could tell us that would clarify his own position in this matter. It is not good enough for two men in such honourable positions as these two gentlemen occupy just to be content with each saying that the other is making a false statement. Even though it might be so, at least one of them says he is prepared to take an oath regarding the truth of his statement.

This is a matter that should be looked into further. Whether it is the Prime Minister's responsibility, or whoever else's responsibility it is, in the interests of this government and of this parliament we should have some further enlightenment on just exactly what did take place.

For instance there is the statement in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen in which Mr. Dempsey outlined the time and place and circumstances under which the Minister of National Revenue was alleged to have made a certain statement to him in which he indicated that the Department of National Revenue was quite prepared to forget the whole thing. The minister denies that categorically, and Mr. Dempsey comes back and says he is quite prepared to take his oath as to the truth of that statement.

This is all most confusing. While we in this house accept the minister's statement the Canadian public are not in the same position as members of this house, and they must be confused. As I have said already, the situation does not tend to inspire public confidence in men in public life.

There is another phase of this matter which I think needs clarification. I have no doubt the minister can give a satisfactory explanation if he wishes to do so. It is quite obvious from the knowledge we have that the minister was in possession of information that this donation had been made by Mr. Drohan. He came into the possession of that information shortly after Mr. Drohan's estate came up for settlement. The question we are asking is this. If that be so, why did the minister keep that information to himself for two years when the provincial treasurer, in the minister's own words, was legally entitled to it? Just why did he withhold that information from the provincial treasurer until a provincial election was called in Ontario and the person concerned is likely to be a candidate in a provincial riding?

If the minister was passing this information on to the provincial treasurer as Minister of National Revenue because there had been something irregular in relation to the payment of succession duties, there is no reason why that information should have been withheld for two years and then given out in the way the minister himself says it was given to the provincial treasurer when he was here in Ottawa to attend a conference a matter of some weeks ago.

On the other hand, if the minister's concern was that this man had violated the Ontario election act then it becomes more important that we should know why the information was withheld until after the announcement of an Ontario election. I think the minister owes it to the members of this house to tell us why that information was withheld from the provincial treasurer for a couple of years, and then imparted to him under such circumstances and at such time as I have indicated.

Otherwise, rightly or wrongly, the minister is bound to be accused of making use of information which he received as Minister of National Revenue for political purposes. That is the conclusion which is being drawn across this country, that the Minister of National Revenue made use of information which came to him confidentially as Minister of National Revenue for political purposes, in order to defeat a candidate in a provincial election.

Personally I do not think for a moment that is the case, but I suggest once again that while this debate is proceeding the minister give us a statement in this house which will at least give some clarification to this situation.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on two matters which I think are of great importance, though they are widely separated in their content. I follow the hon. member for York South, who has again brought to the attention of this house the Dempsey case. I was most amazed at the incredible and amazing statement made by the Prime Minister this afternoon in connection with this incident.

I do not think since I came to the House of Commons in 1945 there has been a statement made which was so incredible. I say this because of some of the words which I think the Prime Minister used in the answer he gave to the questions which had been asked. One of the phrases he used was that this matter was of considerable partisan importance. It is more than of partisan importance, it is important to the whole parliamentary system we have here, and indeed to our democratic system.

There have been so many statements and counterstatements that I submit this house is entitled to an investigation committee to determine the merits of the case. On the one hand we have the former provincial member, Mr. Dempsey, who states that he spoke to the Minister of National Revenue and had the conversation which is reported in the Ottawa Citizen of May 11. The Minister of National Revenue denies it. Then we have the counterstatement by Mr. Dempsey that he is prepared to swear under oath that he is telling the truth, and that the statement he made to the press and which appears in the Ottawa Citizen is correct. In other words he admits that he committed an indiscretion. In my opinion if what Mr. Dempsey has said is true, then the Minister of National Revenue has committed an indiscretion, and I think we should get to the truth of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps at this point the hon. member should be mindful of the rule that no statement by one outside the house can be introduced to contradict what has been said in the house. What the Minister of National Revenue has said in this house must be accepted by hon. members. That is the position which I think the hon. member should take, and I intervene at this point merely to remind him of that rule so he will have it in mind during the course of his further remarks.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I accept what the minister has said, but I think that the country is entitled to an investigation in order to determine the truth in regard to this situation. I agree with the remarks of my deskmate, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), who stated yesterday that under these conditions the minister should immediately resign. The right hon. Prime Minister, instead of being satisfied with this situation, should be tremendously interested, so much interested that he would be prepared to set up an investigating committee of this house to look into the whole matter. If the minister himself is not prepared to resign, then the Prime Minister should ask for his resignation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other matter with which I wish to deal is one which I want to approach in the national interest. In the past the federal government under certain circumstances has declared national emergencies. During the past week we in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan have experienced one of the worst storms in our history. Indeed, in a report appearing in the Leader-Post the premier of Saskatchewan has stated that the affected area will be over 2 million acres of land, and that between 12,000 and 15,000 people will be affected. In addition there is considerable property damage. Some of the estimates in connection with the flood damage are that as many as 30,000 to 40,000 farmers will be affected, and that between 50 and 80 per cent of the farm land will not be put into crop this year in Saskatchewan.

We have endeavoured to get the Prime Minister to do exactly what he and this government have done on previous occasions, namely to call this situation a national emergency and have the federal government co-operate with the provinces affected in doing a job of reclamation and trying to correct some of the damage which has taken place. I feel that this incident probably points out, as never before in the history of Canada, that we need something done in this connection. I am going to suggest today that what we need in Canada is a national drainage and dike authority, planned on the basis of the Tennessee valley authority, because I am convinced that this problem is going to recur across the country. This is not an isolated case. It is not a case which we can be sure is not going to recur.

In the province of Saskatchewan from whence I come we have, in the past few years, been experiencing more and more precipitation. There are tens of thousands of acres of our best farm land where the water table has been coming up and there is no proper drainage. We need a drainage system, not merely on a provincial basis but on a national basis, working with provincial authorities. I am suggesting that under a national authority a complete survey would be made to correct our drainage and diking problems.

Our present position in Saskatchewan is not something that can be solved by provincial expenditure alone or by any provincial survey, without taking into consideration the general picture in the western provinces. Some of the water that is draining into the province of Saskatchewan comes from the drainage basin of the Rocky mountains and passes through parts of our province into Manitoba. The terrific flood damage we are experiencing in Saskatchewan today is something which can well be declared a national emergency.

In this connection, before I proceed I want to indicate to the house that we in Saskatchewan are not asking something special for our province, but only something which has been done on previous occasions. Every member of the house will recollect that after the Fraser valley flood disaster in 1948 the federal government came into the picture and used federal funds in order to assist the provincial authorities to correct some of the damage. At that time there was an expenditure of provincial and federal moneys to the extent of $11,440,000. The federal government came into the picture and, under the arrangement it made, paid up to 75 per cent; the province came in and paid the other 25 per cent on some of the projects. Altogether as I stated, over $11 million was spent following that flood disaster.

Then of course, we had the greater Winnipeg flood, and set up the diking board with a total expenditure between the federal and provincial governments of $4,559,000. The federal government paid $3,419,000; the government of Manitoba, $1,139,000.

We have those two flood situations, and we have the other instances which were declared national emergencies in the Rimouski and Cabano fires. In addition we had "Hurricane Hazel" and "Hurricane Edna", where again federal funds were made available and federal authorities worked with the provinces in order to correct some of the damage and pay the losses. That is the way it should be in Canada. We are not isolated provinces; we are a family of provinces working as a dominion. When one province suffers a catastrophe it is only right and proper that the federal government should step in and take some responsibility.

In connection with the Saskatchewan situation, we now have in my own constituency a lake 10 miles long and three or four miles wide which was not there two weeks ago. That is a condition which is going to put hundreds of farmers throughout that area in the position that they will not be able to put in their crop this year. It has been suggested by members of this group that some sort of program should be undertaken to alleviate the situation.

These farmers are not going to be able to put in a crop, and they are not going to be able to pay their taxes. In the last few years the municipalities have been in a very bad financial situation resulting from the farmers not being able to pay taxes, because of the increased precipitation over the province. I have had reports from all over the province which have indicated that highways were inundated, bridges were out, telephone lines and other communications and power lines were destroyed, and in Qu'Appelle valley many cottages have been taken away with the flood.

I believe my appeal is on a fair basis, that the federal government take some responsibility in this situation and assist the municipalities and the province to correct this damage. I might say I do not feel that in the past we have had any authority in Canada adequate to meet such situations as we find existing at times in this country. I feel that the time has come for proper utilization of our land and for proper conservation and that we should have, as I indicated at the beginning of my speech, a joint national drainage and diking authority. This should be permanent and take into consideration in its surveys and work projects the watersheds throughout the Dominion of Canada and do the necessary diking, so we may utilize our farm land and make it possible to sow our crops year by year.

During the last by-election, when we were happy to re-elect the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce), I had occasion to be up in the interlake country, which again is very badly flooded. Many farmers in those areas will not be able to put in a crop this year. There is a situation which is isolated from the flood condition due to the storm in Saskatchewan. Nevertheless these are problems that are all tied together, and can be solved only by the co-operation of the provinces and the dominion government.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

In the interlake country we have lake Winnipeg, lake Winnipegosis and lake Manitoba becoming higher and higher and flooding much of the valuable land in that district lying between those lakes. It is my feeling, Mr. Speaker—and I say this without any fear of contradiction—that if this problem were tackled through a proper drainage authority, and if a program were instituted by means of which, throughout Alberta, Manitoba and perhaps British Columbia that country and that watershed were properly drained to the appropriate bodies of water so we could utilize our land, we would not have these recurring flood damages.

If this government would see the problem and take the necessary initiative, I believe that, together with the provinces, they could work out an authority which could undertake this project. In Manitoba, if proper drainage and dredging were done on the Nelson river, as an example, and proper water control put into effect there, I believe that river would perhaps serve to lower the level of the lakes in Manitoba, such as lake Winnipeg and lake Winnipegosis, so we would have proper control and conservation in that area.

I am therefore going to plead with the government and with the Prime Minister. When he meets with the authorities from the provinces—and he has indicated that the meeting will take place on Monday—whether the damage is $50 million as has been estimated by some authorities in Saskatchewan, or whether it is double that amount, I hope the federal government will see fit to co-operate with our provinces so that not only in the province of Saskatchewan but throughout all of Canada we shall have a program to meet these recurring needs of our people.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

VETERANS BENEFIT ACT

CERTAIN BENEFITS CONTINUED TO PERSONS JOINING REGULAR FORCES BEFORE JULY 1, 1955

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 278, to amend the Veterans Benefit Act, 1954.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the minister going to make a statement on this bill?

Mr. Lapointe: The statement has been made. This bill was referred to the veterans affairs committee and was approved without amendment, and reported to the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Limitation.

Mr. Gillis: Mr. Chairman, I have some comments to make on this bill. The minister is quite correct when he says it was before the veterans affairs committee and was approved without amendment. However, I would call to the minister's attention the fact that this bill provides that any person joining the regular services with the intention of making the army, the navy or the air force his vocation in the future will be denied any of the rights contained in the several bills that set out certain benefits for the special force. Anyone entering the regular forces after July 1955 will no longer be eligible for any of these benefits; and particular emphasis is placed on the question of unemployment insurance.

All service personnel, up to July 1 of this year, are entitled to unemployment insurance if and when they leave the service. When this bill was before the veterans affairs committee the secretary of the Canadian Legion proposed that the bill should be amended to provide that in future members of the services should be considered on the same basis as those employed in industry; and if because of any unforeseen circumstances they did not continue in the services the length of time they had intended, they should be brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act in the way members of the special force are at this time. The exception was made that they should be brought in on a contributory basis, exactly the same as other employees in industry who come under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

At that time the committee did not wish to suggest any amendments for the simple reason that at least I felt that before bringing the regular forces under a contributory basis a study should be made to see whether the service personnel wanted to come in on that basis or not. However, there are arguments both ways. I merely wanted to say that our committee will recommend when the report is completed that the Department of National Defence and the Department of Labour, which have to do with the problem, should at least make an interdepartmental study of the matter to see first whether the service personnel want it on a contributory basis, and second whether it is feasible and practical to do the thing in the way suggested by the secretary of the Legion.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

I know that the parliamentary assistant to the minister has that in mind. I hope that both he and the minister will continue to carry out what we have in our minds and what the Legion recommended, and what our report will recommend when it is completed. I merely wanted to put that on the record so that we would not forget it.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South has very well expressed what the attitude of the committee was with reference to this bill. The bill has to do with the special force that served in Korea. Since most of these men have been discharged from the force or are back home, it was thought by the committee that it was not necessary for the situation regarding them to be as it has been.

As the hon. member for Cape Breton South said, we did hear representations from the Canadian Legion. I hold in my hand the recommendation of the Canadian Legion, and it might be well to place it on Hansard. The recommendation made by the Legion is as follows:

> That the Department of National Defence make provision for members of the armed forces to contribute to unemployment insurance so that they may benefit from the Unemployment Insurance Act in the same manner as do industrial employees.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that the recommendation was that the Department of National Defence make provision, not the Department of Veterans Affairs. The recommendation was considered by the committee and was unanimously agreed to in that regard, that the bill as presented by the Department of Veterans Affairs be passed and that, as has been stated, the recommendation be put in our report that the Legion's suggestion be carried out.

I might say that I had already recommended that in the House of Commons when the bill was up for second reading. When we were in committee I was very pleased indeed to learn that the Legion thought along the same lines as I did. The situation has certainly changed, but as the Legion pointed out, many young men will be discharged from the army for various reasons before their time of service is up. Those who are taken on strength up to July 1 of this year will be in an entirely different position from those who are taken in after July 1. As I pointed out before, we shall have two types of men in the army, namely, those who, when they are discharged from the army, will have the benefit of the Unemployment Insurance Act, and those who will not have the benefit of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

In addition to that, a great many young men are leaving insurable employment and are going into the army. When these young men leave the army they will not have the advantage of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Like the hon. member who has already spoken, I do hope that this matter will be given very serious consideration. Frankly, I think there is a great deal of merit in the recommendation of the Canadian Legion. When the hon. member for Hamilton West spoke on the unemployment bill the other day she also mentioned this matter of the soldier. Her suggestion was that the matter should be given careful consideration.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, Mr. Chairman, we are in entire agreement with its contents.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES COMPENSATION ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS AND CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 188, to amend the Government Employees Compensation Act—Mr. Gregg—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—Compensation.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour is not here this afternoon. Members of the committee were given a copy of one amendment which it was intended to put into effect and which, I might say, received the approval of the committee. However, there was another amendment. One of the clauses was supposed to be rewritten, and we have not yet had any notification of that. We have no copy of it; we do not know what is now proposed. Although it is a minor matter, it is a matter of making the clause more intelligible. I do not believe we should be asked to approve this bill until we have seen just what amendments the government proposes to make to it.

Mr. Harris: I was under the impression that the amendment had been prepared and made available. If that is not so, I agree with the hon. member.

The Chairman: Order. Apparently there is a substantial amendment to a later clause in the bill. Would it be agreeable to proceed until we reach that clause?

Mrs. Fairclough: Is that clause 2, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Order. I see a minor amendment to clause 2. It appears to be merely the insertion of a comma.

Mrs. Fairclough: No. That was the first amendment that was proposed by the committee. Subsequently, the minister agreed that the whole wording of the clause was most confusing, and agreed to send it back to the Department of Justice for rewording. In view of the confusion that exists, we should report progress until such time as we can find out just exactly what has taken place.

Mr. Harris: I do not think there is any confusion. Perhaps we can carry clause 1, to which I take it there is no objection, then we shall rise and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. Churchill: It would appear to me that the bill would have to be reprinted in order to put before hon. members the amendments that were discussed during the course of the committee meeting. One amendment dealing particularly with clause 3 was rather involved. Until such time as we see it before us, I do not see much purpose in going ahead with this.

Mr. Harris: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Further than that, we were to have an explanation of one or two phrases contained in the bill which if not interpreted in the form in which we anticipated would affect other sections of the bill. I think it would be fair to let the bill stand until we have full information.

Mr. Harris: Stand.

Clause stands.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING TRADE MARKS, QUALITY MARKS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, April 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Winters (for Mr. Howe, Port Arthur) for the second reading of Bill No. 306, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the Precious Metals Marking Act deals with articles of gold, silver, platinum and palladium, and in addition with articles plated with either gold or silver. Under the Precious Metals Marking Act it is not mandatory that articles of or plated with precious metals be marked as to their content of precious metal. However, the act does provide that, where reference is made to the precious metal content, that content must be shown in a particular manner. For example, a gold ring or a ring containing gold may be sold as a plain ring, but if reference is made to its gold content that gold content must be indicated. If it is represented as being of carat quality, say 10 carat, then it must be 10/24ths gold by weight. In addition, where such quality mark, that is the precious metal content, is placed on an article, the article must also carry a registered trade mark or a trade mark for which application for registration has been made.

The present bill provides for two amendments to the act. The first deals with the method of applying quality marks to gold filled or rolled gold plate bracelets or, as they are sometimes called, wrist watches which have base metal parts. The difference between gold filled and rolled gold plate lies mainly in the thickness of the gold or the other precious metal covering it. In the former, that is in the gold filled, it is 3/1000ths of an inch, and in the latter, that is rolled gold plate, it is 1½/1000ths of an inch of gold which is of at least 10 carat quality.

Under the act as it stands, when all parts of a bracelet watch case have a gold content the quality mark and the trade mark can be applied to any part of the watch, but it is usually applied in the most convenient location, which is the back. Where some parts of the case are plated or filled and others are of base metal the quality marking under the present act must be applied to those parts which are plated and the words "base metal" must be applied to those which are base metal. With the present size of the bracelet or wrist watches, particularly ladies' watches, it is difficult to place marks on the plated parts without damage, and in addition if they are put on they are often so small as to be unreadable. As a result, few wrist watches today carry any quality marks, and any quality declaration governing them is usually shown on a tag attached to the watch.

To provide informative marking on a watch itself, it is proposed in this amendment that the manufacturer be permitted to indicate on the outer side of the base metal back the quality mark of the other parts of the watch with an indication of which parts are base metal. No change is necessary where all the parts are gold plated or gold filled. This is an additional method of marking and it has the approval of the Canadian Jewellers' Association.

The second amendment is of a technical nature and results from the necessity under the existing act of applying to precious metal articles a registered trade mark or one for which application has been made under the Unfair Competition Act. The Trade Marks Act proclaimed on July 1, 1954, repealed the Unfair Competition Act. The new Trade Marks Act provided that registrations under the Unfair Competition Act are retained as such and applications for registration still pending under the old act are to be dealt with under that act.

However, apparently there is nothing in the new Trade Marks Act to provide that the trade mark or application made under the old act, that is the Unfair Competition Act, shall be deemed to have been made under the new act, which is the Trade Marks Act. It is the view of the law officers of the crown that the Precious Metals Marking Act should be amended to refer to trade marks as having been registered and to applications for trade mark as having been made under either act. That is the sole purpose of the technical amendment.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, while we approve of and appreciate the steps which are now being taken to have articles made from precious metals more clearly defined, and while we approve also of the second amendment which is of a technical nature, I feel that a great opportunity has been missed by the government to introduce a Canadian hallmark. For centuries British and French gold and silver articles have had placed upon them a hallmark, but Canada has never adopted this practice.

A hallmark is really nothing more than a stamp placed on an article by some legally appointed officer after a test of that particular article has been made. It is usually referred to as a hallmark. Centuries ago the manufacturers of articles made from gold and silver—gold and silversmiths—used to take these articles to the hall of the guild of the goldsmiths—Goldsmith Hall as it is called—in London. There the test was made and the "touch" was given—that is the term which was then applied—by the appointed officers, who were at first the guild of goldsmiths and afterwards the worshipful company of goldsmiths. They placed their mark attesting to the quality of the metal in the particular article.

The hallmark of Great Britain and the hallmark of France have been of unquestionable integrity for many centuries, guaranteeing the quality of the particular article. One can find, if one looks back into history—and there have been a number of excellent books written on this question—that the guild of goldsmiths was first recognized in Europe in the twelfth century, and that as far back as 1300, in the reign of Edward I, the question of the quantity and test of gold was laid down in accordance with an old statute which defines the "touch of Paris". The "touch of Paris" laid down that gold had to have 19⅓ portions as applied to 4⅔ of the alloy then used, which was an alloy of copper and silver, in order to make the gold firmer.

Following that, in 1327, the charter was given to the worshipful company of goldsmiths in London and they were given the sole right of placing the mark or touch on British gold and silver. Hence comes the description, the "hallmark", as being, as I have already said, the mark or punch which was placed on these articles when they were literally carried to the hall of the goldsmiths. In 1363 in the reign of Edward III, in addition to the mark which was given by the goldsmiths company, a mark was placed on these articles showing the maker's name. All through those centuries, right from the twelfth century, there has been this definite stamp or hallmark placed on articles made from these precious metals.

The modern hallmark consists of four ciphers. Usually each cipher is enclosed in a small shield. The first is known as the maker's mark, which really is the mark of the maker. That mark is registered at the goldsmiths company or at the local assay office. It shows the maker of that particular article. The second is the hall or assay mark which shows the town or assay office which has tested the quality of the metal used in that article. It identifies the office at which the assaying was done and fixes the person responsible for the tests guaranteeing the quality of the metal used. The third imprint is the quality mark which shows in the case of gold whether it is 22, 18 or 14 carat, or whatever it may be. It shows the quantity of gold in relation to the alloys which may have been used. In the case of silver it shows perhaps that it is sterling silver, which indicates the amount of actual silver which is used in each troy pound. Sterling silver, I believe, is 11 ounces 10 pennyweight to each pound troy. Then there is the date mark. The date marks are of a complicated nature, working in cycles and in most cases using the letters of the alphabet. These date marks are of immense value to collectors of old silver and dealers in antiques. A dealer can tell at once whether a piece of old silver is Jacobean or Georgian silver, and he can tell by looking at the hallmark the date on which the article was manufactured, where it was manufactured, the actual quality which has been used, and the name of the maker of the article can be traced.

Precious Metals Marking Act

We have in Canada no legal hallmark. When the French goldsmiths and silversmiths first came to Canada they brought with them the habit of stamping their silver. I quote from a work entitled "The Old Silver of Quebec" by Traquair:

> The French silversmiths who came to Canada brought with them the habit of stamping their work with their mark. This was a personal guarantee that the silver was of standard quality, but as there was no guild or assay office in Canada, they could not obtain the warden's mint or tax marks. They either used a personal mark, or left their work unmarked.
> The English silversmiths who came into the province also continued to use their personal marks, but to these they sometimes added pseudo English marks.
> During the French regime, the silversmiths of Quebec used marks of French provincial types—initials surrounded by a crown or a fleur-de-lis, and sometimes with a small badge. Any piece bearing a maker's mark of this kind, with no other marks, and which is of French character, is possibly the work of a French-Canadian silversmith.

As regards the practice followed by the English silversmiths in the province of Nova Scotia, I should like to quote from the work by Harry Piers and Donald Mackay entitled "Master Goldsmiths and Silversmiths of Nova Scotia":

> We must remember that there have never been in Nova Scotia any legal "hallmarks", or doubtless in Canada generally. In the British Isles there have been strict laws regarding the marking of gold and silver, which had to be of a certain degree of purity, and which had to pay duty, before it could be sold. For this purpose assay offices were therefore established in various towns; each of these offices stamped with its neatly-cut dies, what were known as "hallmarks", or "plate marks" . . .
> In Nova Scotia, on the contrary, we have never had any such statutory regulations; and silversmiths, when they began to operate here, assumed the practice, but without legal authority, of themselves, stamping on their productions, certain pseudo hallmarks which intentionally (more or less), resembled those of the Old Country.

If you examine the articles which are produced by certain Canadian manufacturers today, you will find that imitation hallmarks are placed on the article sold by such well known firms as Henry Birks where they are using a system similar to the recognized system in Great Britain and are stamping their articles so that the articles sold by Henry Birks can be identified, particularly as to the year in which those articles were manufactured. I feel that it would be a great help to the legitimate dealers in articles made from precious metals, and to the goldsmiths and the silversmiths of this country, if Canada adopted an official hallmark. To look far into the future, when undoubtedly there will be collectors of old silver, it would be a great help to the collectors of old Canadian silver if they could identify the year in which the particular articles were manufactured.

In my constituency there are quite a number of dealers in antique silver and other articles of that nature. I have had representations made to me as recently as during the Easter recess—before I knew that this bill was coming before the house at all—asking that some steps be taken to get the government to give consideration to the establishment of a Canadian hallmark as it would give them or their successors in the future an opportunity of comparing the Canadian article, and of identifying the year in which it was made; that hallmark to be along the same lines as the established rules which are now recognized by every dealer and collector of old silver as far as the hallmarking of British articles and French articles is concerned.

While I do not imagine it would be possible for the government to consider an amendment at this time, I repeat that I think the government has lost an opportunity by not bringing in an official Canadian hallmark. I suggest to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production that consideration be given thereto at some future time and that —preferably at the next session of parliament—a bill be introduced to establish what may be described as a Canadian hallmark showing that every article has been tested at some assay office so that the real value of that article, plus the date and manufacturer's name, can be easily established.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Article with quality mark also to have trade mark.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask whether consideration has been given to the introduction of a Canadian hallmark—or what difficulties there may be in the way of so doing—so that we could get a clearer definition of these articles?

Mr. Dickey: I am sure the committee appreciates the remarks made earlier by the hon. member in connection with the question of a Canadian hallmark. As he so properly pointed out, the established hallmarks of England and France are of ancient origin and have been extremely useful in the commercial world of precious metals and of ornamental and useful objects made of precious metals. Actually this particular amending bill deals with a type of article that would not really come within the purview of a hallmark. I am not able to indicate to the committee what if any consideration has been given to the question that has been raised. I know, on occasions in the past, there have been representations with respect to the advisability or not of trying to establish a Canadian hallmark. However, I will assure the hon. member that his remarks in the debate this afternoon will be brought to the attention of the minister and the officials and that the matter will receive consideration.

Clauses 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Harris: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS—CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 258, to amend the Municipal Grants Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is proposed to have this bill go to a committee. In that event there will be no opportunity to make any comments on it except when the Speaker is in the chair. As I should like to make a few comments, I suppose I should make them now.

The thing that strikes me about this bill, Mr. Speaker, is that it is really, as one might say, on the fringe of a substantial problem. It does not pretend to deal with the problem. Indeed, in a way this bill is a rather ridiculous affair, in my opinion, because it is cheese-paring; its effect is trivial and yet it is in the right direction. I want to make one or two comments on the bill, on the way it has been dealt with and also on the rather broader municipal problem.

As I say, it is small. The amounts involved, having regard to our total tax situation, are trivial. I think the expected addition this year is something less than $2 million, bringing up to approximately $6 million the benefits to accrue under the legislation whereas the total real estate taxes collected by our municipalities last year were some $614 million. As I say, it is trivial in the extreme. Actually one would feel that is the way it is regarded because it has been dealt with in a rather haphazard, helter-skelter manner by the government. In the speech from the throne we read:

> A joint committee of both houses will be proposed to examine, in the light of the Municipal Grants Act and possible amendments thereto, the financial and other relationships of the government and the federal district commission with the city of Ottawa and neighbouring municipalities.

In answer to a question on that point from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said on May 6 last, as found at page 3515 of Hansard:

> It is now the feeling of the government that there are so many committees in operation at this time considering matters of great importance that it would not be possible at this stage of the session to have a committee on the scale originally contemplated—

Perhaps partly because of the conference that is to take place in October this bill, in the contemplation of the government, seems to have shrunken greatly in importance. To continue with what the Prime Minister said:

> —that the municipal grants bill now before the house might therefore be referred to the banking and commerce committee as soon as second reading has been completed; and that there might be an opportunity before the close of the session to establish the joint committee with a view to laying the foundation for a wider examination of the work of the federal district commission at the next session.

The federal district commission will have to look after itself, but whether that is satisfactory to them they are best able to indicate. In any event, it seems to me to fall in with the impression I have received that the municipal grants bill is now regarded as mighty small potatoes, as indeed it is. Indeed, the actual amount involved is so small one might almost suggest having a tag day to get the money. It has become so trivial.

The other thing I do object to is that it is a kind of hairsplitting. The government refuses to do what I think is its plain duty, namely, to pay its taxes, and relies on ancient privileges going back, I suppose, to the days of the kings and even disregards the admonition of the Winnipeg Free Press, which suggests they might abandon this privilege altogether.

Having said that as to what I regard as the trivial and rather unworthy character of the bill, I want to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider for a moment what the dimensions of the municipal problem really are. I read now from the Globe and Mail of April 25 a report of a meeting of the Ontario municipalities represented by the association of mayors and reeves, which report has this to say:

> The municipalities contend they are facing a financial crisis because they have been carrying the burden for matters they feel should be the responsibility of other levels of government. The Ontario organization claims that approximately 10 per cent of expenditure by Ontario municipalities are for services that should not be their responsibility. If the municipal position were to be recognized it would relieve the communities of $33 million in costs for health and social welfare payments.

I wish the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) were here to find out that there is actually somebody else who considers they have burdens to bear in this connection. Next I wish to read a report from the Globe and Mail of April 23 datelined Quebec and quoting a statement made by the premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis. It reads:

> For the agenda-fixing which is expected to be the main work of next week's meeting, he indicated he will urge inclusion of two main topics. First by far is the problem of fiscal relationships between the federal and provincial governments. Second is the general problem of municipal finances, and what the Quebec government regards as the necessity of providing municipal corporations with more sources of taxation revenue.

I want to stress that. I might also refer in passing to an interesting remark made by the premier of Manitoba who suggested that the municipalities should actually be present at the October conference. I confess I see difficulties in that, but at any rate it is worth mentioning because it shows that in his mind the problem is a very important one and one in which the position of the municipalities should certainly not be disregarded. I should like to quote very briefly from the submission to the government by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities just because I think it would be worth having a short statement on the record. It reviews the principle that crown property should pay taxes and it has this to say:

> . . . rigid adherence to the principle that crown property cannot be taxed had a threefold implication: 1. It meant that municipal governments had to provide services to properties from which no revenue could be extracted.
> 2. It meant that the extent to which such property did not contribute to the cost of municipal services resulted in a narrowing of the base for municipal property taxation.
>
> 3. It produced a situation wherein the municipal taxpayers in those municipalities where there was considerable concentration of crown property and not the citizens of Canada as a whole, were required to pay the cost of municipal services rendered to such property.

Then there is this further word at page 21a of the report:

> Consequently, the federation strongly recommends that the federal government consider, when the present qualifying formula is being revised, the provision of payment of grants in lieu of full municipal taxation on all federal crown property located within the boundaries of an incorporated municipality.

I do indeed urge the government to stop this hairsplitting and to deal with this matter properly, although it will only be a comparatively small contribution to the larger problem. But why, when these municipalities admittedly are already in difficulty, are they to be denied what I think any fair-minded man would say was a reasonable thing, namely, the payment of their taxes? To suggest that the federal government should not pay full taxes on their properties because they confer benefits on the municipality is an argument that could be made with respect to any private enterprise in a municipality. It likes to be there, it is there for its own reasons, but nevertheless it pays its way.

As I say, when you come down to the facts, we are now dealing with $2 million which is about one two-thousandth of our total expenditure and the matter becomes very small indeed. So far as any argument about ex gratia is concerned, if the legalists want to cling to that position let them at least pay the amount they should pay in taxes if they want to go on saying that it is still ex gratia.

I want to point out in passing the extraordinary relative lowering of the position of the municipalities in the last few years by reminding the house that in 1930 the dominion had 38 per cent of all taxes raised and the municipalities 39 per cent whereas in 1948 the dominion had 67 per cent and the municipalities 12 per cent. We on this side of the house have been attempting to assist the situation. We have been saying for a long time that the conference which is now about to take place should take place, and I want to refer to one or two things in that connection. In 1952 our amendment to the speech from the throne included the following:

> (d) To conduct inquiries in consultation with the provincial governments, so that necessary information may be available for the dominion and provincial governments to consider jointly a national health insurance program;
> (e) To reach agreement with the provincial governments in regard to a clearly defined reallocation of taxing powers so that the provincial governments and municipal councils may have adequate financial resources to carry out their rapidly increasing responsibilities.

Later, although I shall not set it out in detail, we moved several times with regard to the reduction of sales and excise taxes on the municipalities, and although something was done it was not nearly enough. As I have already indicated, the municipalities are keen that that should be carried further.

I would like to say a word about the forthcoming dominion-provincial meeting. There is no question that the position of the municipalities grows increasingly serious. They are called upon to assume burdens which previously they had not assumed. As I pointed out, their share of the taxes raised is merely a fraction of what it used to be. And so, as we approach the conference called for October, we have to hope and believe that a broad view will be taken so that the municipalities may be given a liveable position, where they can discharge their duties properly, and where they do not have to go back constantly to the higher levels of government for what are regarded by those levels of government as virtual handouts.

The provinces have assisted generously in certain cases. The richer provinces have been able to do more along this line. We know that the province of Ontario has given a great deal to the municipalities. But on the other hand there are provinces which do not find that quite so easy; and it is going to call for a very statesmanlike view to deal with this matter in October.

After all, these mayors of municipalities who meet together are responsible people. Perhaps they are much closer to government and its realities than some other people are. I do suggest they should be treated seriously, and their needs seriously dealt with.

I do not think I shall take more of the time of the house. The bill will go to committee, and we shall there deal with the clauses which are amended, and do our best to make what we can of it. But, as I said at the outset, this is only tinkering with a situation which has got far beyond the tinkering stage; and we must all look with hope and expectation to a real grappling with the problem in October.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure no one will vote against this bill. It makes a slight improvement in the formula under which grants are paid to municipalities in lieu of taxes. Even in this place we are grateful for small mercies.

When we get into committee on the bill there are some details concerning which questions will be asked. But even at this point I wish to state that we agree with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) that this legislation is hardly a sufficient attack on the problems faced by the municipalities of this country. We all know of the excuses that are put forward as to why more consideration of the position of the municipalities cannot be given by the federal government. On some occasions it is pointed out that the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces and that, therefore, there cannot be direct dealings between the federal government and the municipalities. There is also the claim that the ancient right of the crown not to be taxed puts the federal government in a favoured position from which it can move only if it wishes to do so.

But, Mr. Speaker, surely the time has come when we should recognize the financial problem of our Canadian municipalities, both urban and rural, as a Canadian problem. Anything that is of concern to the people of this country as Canadians should be the concern of the federal government and the federal parliament. This legislation was a long time in coming, and it has taken still longer to get it improved, but I hope this legislation is an admission that here is a field which should be the proper concern of the federal government.

There are ways in which greater assistance could be rendered to the municipalities. This formula could be enlarged still further. There are other tax arrangements that could be made—for instance in the sales tax field—which could be of assistance to the municipalities.

Then, as has been pointed out many times, there is also the possibility of real assistance to the municipalities being made available by the federal government through the building of roads, highways and bridges. There is also the very important question, still unresolved, of federal aid to education. There is the further fact that real aid could be given to our municipalities and provinces under the general heading of health and welfare services.

Surely we all know—we have all said it in speeches throughout the country—that conditions in Canada have changed greatly since 1867. Our economy has changed. The whole base upon which our life is sustained today is totally different from what it was under the economic conditions of 1867; and it is no longer sensible or just to expect that the kind of services which, by the British North America Act of 1867, were made charges upon real estate taxation, can be carried by that same kind of taxation today. The problem of our municipalities is, I say, a Canadian problem that has to be faced; and I hope the government will give very serious consideration to it, and will realize that it has to go a great deal farther than is envisaged in this legislation.

It is significant that in the discussions which took place a couple of weeks ago in the railway committee room a number of those representing provincial governments dealt with this problem. In some instances municipal officials were in the delegations. I hope this means that at the federal-provincial conference this fall there will be a real examination of this important problem. After all, we should not get into the situation where the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipal governments are treating each other as though they were foreign powers. Rather, these are various spheres, various media, through which we try to organize our economy and our society for the good and welfare, for the health and well-being, and for the best possible standard of living for all our people.

I feel we should not allow these constitutional and procedural barriers to stand in the way of progress toward something better. Let us remember the important part of our Canadian life, the important part of our economy, which comes within the bounds of our various municipalities. We welcome this slight improvement; but it only scratches the surface of a very important problem to which we feel this federal government and the provincial governments in this country should address themselves more vigorously than has yet been the case.

Mr. Roland Michener (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the proposed amendments commend themselves to the house as representing an improvement. My suggestion is that they might go farther. This problem is one aspect of a federal system. We are all familiar with it. In Canada we have three ranges of government, in fact, although only two ranges are sovereign governments. The federal government and the provincial governments are sovereign governments in their taxing powers under the British North America Act. As everyone knows, the municipalities are creatures of the provincial governments; but nevertheless they are forms of government, and very important forms of governments on the local level where they can be and are most effective, as has been recognized in this house in many pieces of legislation.

The larger problem of relationships of the federal government and the provinces is to be dealt with at a conference and I do not propose to discuss those larger problems, although they involve the municipalities very considerably because, as has been said, the municipalities now find themselves charged with greater responsibilities without corresponding means of providing the revenues with which to meet those responsibilities. It is to be hoped that this conference will take the position of the municipalities into account in whatever arrangements are made between the federal government and the provinces.

What I suggest here today, Mr. Speaker, is that one specific relationship of the dominion and the municipalities can be improved by this legislation, and that is the relationship of the dominion as a property owner in the municipalities. Let the federal government accept the responsibility of property ownership as it accepts the benefits of property ownership in the municipalities of Canada. It seems to me that if it goes the full length in accepting its responsibilities, then it is meeting this problem as far as it can be dealt with as a tax problem of the municipalities. This bill does not go that far. It still gives the crown a preferred position as a property owner in the boundaries of every municipality. My suggestion is that in all fairness the crown, where it accepts the benefits of the municipal services which are made available to it, should assume the obligation of a property owner to the full extent.

I am not quarrelling with a reservation that appears in a clause of the bill which says that in assessing the value of crown property the ornamental features are not to be taken into account. I am not sure just what those ornamental features are. Perhaps we shall deal with this more fully when we get into committee. At times, one would be tempted to suggest that the assessment ought to be very substantial on crown property by reason of those ornamental features, because those features sometimes are not ornamental in the view of the citizens of the municipalities in which those properties have been built. However, that basically is I think a fair approach to this problem.

The crown as a property owner should accept the full responsibility of a property owner when it in fact accepts the benefits and privileges of ownership of property. It is a real problem for the municipality to service land which is not taxed. The Canada Year Book gives some interesting figures on the amount of exempt land that exists in the municipalities in the different provinces. It is astonishing how much land is exempt from taxation and from contribution to the services which the occupants of the land enjoy. Most of it is exempt because the exemption serves the purpose of the municipalities. It meets some of the municipal obligations with respect to education and so on to exempt schools and churches and other property from taxation. But the amount of exempt property seems to be on the increase rather than the contrary. In the province of Ontario, which I take as an example, and I quote from a table in the Canada Year Book for 1954 at page 1153, I find that from 1947 to 1951 the total assessable real property rose from $3 billion to $3,800 million, which is quite a substantial rise in four years. During the same period the assessed value of exempt property in Ontario rose from $639 million to $873 million. I cite these figures to indicate the extent of the effect on municipal finance of real property which does not have to pay real property taxes. In the case of Ontario, the house will see from the figures I have given that the assessed value of exempt property is 20 per cent of the assessed value of all taxable property in the province.

When one recalls that the great bulk of municipal revenue comes from real property taxes, the significance of these exemptions becomes apparent. My point simply is that the crown in the right of the dominion should not claim the exemptions which have been claimed in the past and which will still be claimed to some extent if this bill is passed.

If we take the year 1950, for which figures are available in the Canada Year Book, we shall find that the amount of taxes raised by municipalities in the whole of Canada was $574 million. That includes licences, contributions from public utilities, subsidies and other miscellaneous revenues of that kind. Of that amount the real estate tax was $400 million, which indicates the importance of real estate in municipal finance in meeting the problems of municipal government on its limited level. That $400 million on real estate may be compared with the total tax revenue of $478 million, if one excludes other revenues in the municipalities which are not properly called taxes. Taxes on real property amounted to $400 million out of $478 million in the year 1950.

The figures that I have cited for Ontario would apply to most of the other provinces of the dominion. In fact, it is a fair general statement to say that in all of the provinces of Canada the municipalities rely basically on the right to tax real property, although five of the provinces do exercise the right to tax personal property as well. They are the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. But basically, real property bears the burden of municipal services. It is real property we are concerned with in this bill, and real property only. I take it that personal property does not enter into it.

If this measure is good in the direction in which it travels, it seems to me it would be good to go the whole way and have the crown assume the full responsibility on property with respect to municipal taxation.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, as this bill is going to a committee I shall make only a few remarks on something that is not in the bill but which I think should be included. This is an old grievance which in fact goes back over the last 55 years. In order that I may finish by six o'clock I intend to read from a letter addressed to me by the city solicitor of Sydney, Nova Scotia, under date of March 24.

I am glad the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) is in his seat because this has to do with the Canadian National Railways, a crown corporation. The city solicitor has this to say:

> It seems to me that there is one form of municipal taxation which should be given special attention over and above the grants in lieu of general rates and taxes, viz: frontage tax for local improvements. The city of Sydney has been trying without success to obtain payment of frontage tax for sewer, curb and gutter from the C.N.R. from 1901 to the present time. The answer has always been that this is crown property, exempt from taxation in any form.
> The railway's position is probably sound from a legal point of view, but it does seem that an exception should be made in respect to municipal expenditures for local improvements which are of direct benefit to the railway and tends to enhance the use and enjoyment of its properties.

For the benefit of the house and the Minister of Transport I am going to put on the record details of expenditures that have been made:

Sewer Frontage and Curb and Gutter

C.N.R.

Sewer frontage, Dodd st.	Installed	1901	$868.00
" " York st. (Louisa Gardens)	"	1902	422.00
" " Frieght Shed (York st. Walker st.)	"	1902	38.95
Curb and Gutter, Prince St.	"	1931	106.56
" " " " "	"	1931	119.42
Sewer frontage, Intercolonial street	"	1945	90.00
Curb and Gutter, King st.	"	1924	204.00
	"	1930	217.27
			$2,066.20

As the city solicitor points out in his letter, the answer received from the Canadian National Railways every time a tax bill is presented is legally correct because the act previous to these amendments and even with these amendments does not require the Canadian National Railways as a crown corporation to pay taxes of that kind.

The act is being amended and expanded and a new formula arrived at with respect to the payment of grants. I suggest to the minister who is piloting the bill, to the Minister of Transport as representing the Canadian National in the house, and to those hon. members who may be on the committee that consideration be given to a further amendment of subsections 2 and 3 of section 1 of the bill which defines crown property which would be considered in making grants under the bill. I realize that the eligibility for grants runs over into section 5.

If an ordinary citizen in a town or city decides to build a house he must automatically pay for sewers and frontage, and I think this principle should apply also to the Canadian National Railways. This is all I have to say, but I again recommend to those concerned with this bill that they give consideration to including in the bill an amendment which would eliminate this grievance in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and I suppose there are many other cities and towns that could bring forward the same type of grievance. I might add that the city is not asking for interest.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate my group with the remarks which have been made by those who have spoken for the other parties. I would be glad to make more extended remarks but I realize the minister is anxious to get this bill to its next stage.

I shall say no more than to point out, as has been pointed out already, that the costs which are being brought to bear today upon municipalities are increasingly burdensome whereas the means of raising revenue to defray those costs is not increasing. This means that the municipalities simply must have more assistance from the senior governments. The provincial governments have not the financial competence to give this assistance, and consequently it means that this assistance must come from the federal treasury.

I know that the minister has so many demands being made upon him that he is at his wit's end to know what to do, but in all seriousness I suggest to him that if he cannot raise the money under the financial system under which he now operates he had better change that system. The ability of this nation to help cities and towns from Newfoundland to British Columbia and away into the Arctic must depend upon the ability of this country to produce goods and services. The capacity of this country to produce goods and services is almost limitless. Consequently for us to be talking about our municipalities being restricted and burdened with costs in an endeavour to develop facilities like schools, sewers and that sort of thing is to be fantastic in unreality.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister not going to make a statement in closing the debate since he did not make one when it was opened?

Mr. Harris: I did not have an opportunity to make one at the opening of the debate. I would be glad to close the debate but I see it is six o'clock and we had better get the bill through. I will make my remarks if any in the committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister indicate what business we will go on with tonight?

Mr. Harris: We shall take the estimates of the department of northern affairs followed by the estimates of the post office and justice.

Mr. Speaker: Since the house is to go into committee of supply at eight o'clock would it be agreeable if I left the chair now and have the chairman of committees take over?

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Speaker: It is by leave since it is after six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

293. Departmental administration, $509,310.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Applewhaite): We are on item 293. Hon. members will find this item and the following ones on page 50, and the details will be found beginning on page 397 of the blue book.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should make a few very short general remarks at this point. First of all I should like to register a complaint as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned in his capacity as leader of the house, in that we had no notice yesterday of the fact that these estimates were going to be brought on this afternoon. As a matter of fact, I first heard of it at about 20 or 25 minutes past six. I know that a certain number of members of the house who were interested in bringing up certain questions with respect to this department perhaps had no notice that the estimates were to be dealt with at the present time. I think this is unfair to them. As far as I am concerned, I sat on the committee and had an opportunity to ask any question I wished, and so forth. But so far as the general membership of the house is concerned, estimates of any department should not be brought on without some prior notice. I understand that this situation arose because the legislation with which we were dealing this afternoon went through more rapidly than was expected, but I would hope that this sort of situation would not arise again—not that I am complaining about the rapidity with which the legislation went through. As everyone in the house knows, the committee on estimates had a considerable number of meetings dealing with the estimates of this department. There were in the neighbourhood of 11 or 12 meetings of some two hours or more duration each. During that time those of us who were on the committee had a full opportunity to ask any questions they wished. Officials of the department were there in large numbers, and perhaps larger numbers than will be the case with almost any other committee, owing to the fact that this department contains some six or more definite and distinct branches, each dealing with something which really in most cases has very little relationship to the other branches. As a result, the number of officials required to be present to answer questions was perhaps larger than would be the case with most departments.

At this point I should like to pay a tribute to the officials of the department who appeared before the committee. I believe that all of us who are on the committee were impressed with the ability of these officials, with the knowledge they displayed of their subject and with the way in which they gave their answers to the questions that were asked. Our coming into contact with these officials of this department did a good deal, as far as the members of the committee are concerned, to increase, shall I say, our confidence in the way in which the affairs of the department are being carried on by the civil servants whose duty it is to administer this department.

As I indicated previously, those of us who are on the committee had a full opportunity to ask all the questions that they had in mind and to which they wished to secure answers. Of course, the number of members on the committee is limited, and that essentially is the reason why these estimates need to be brought back into the house, so that other members who did not have that opportunity can bring up the subjects which particularly affect them and in which they are interested. Once more I regret that perhaps they have not had as much notice as they should—in fact, they have had no notice—so that they might be in a position to do that. As far as I am concerned, and perhaps also most of the other members of the committee, I have very few questions, if any, left to ask. From the point of view of the hon. members who did serve on that committee, I think that there is no question that sending the estimates to the committee will have served very greatly both to facilitate their passage in the house and to shorten the length of time it may take for discussion. Also, having dealt with these matters in the committee, it means that in most cases they have received more thorough answers than would perhaps have been the case if we had dealt with them only in the house.

There is one other general matter about which I would like to say something. That is the general development of the north country. Perhaps all of us in Canada have been disappointed that our whole northern area—you might say, practically the northern half of this country—which comprises the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory particularly coming within the purview of this department, but also, of course, the northern parts of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and Labrador, all that large area, has developed so slowly and has received so little attention. I do not place the responsibility for that on the present minister or on anyone in particular. It has unfortunately been the case right through our history, no matter what government was in power and no matter what minister was in charge of the northern affairs of this country, that very little attention really was paid to what went on in our north country, and very few real efforts were made to open up and develop that country.

There is no question that we need to bestir ourselves to a much greater extent than has been the case in the past if we are to make any real use of the northern half of this continent for our own people and thus to provide even, shall I say, a reasonable excuse for us as Canadians to continue to hold and administer that area. With the very considerable amount of overcrowding of population which exists in so many parts of the world, it is, without any need of demonstration, an anachronism that approximately one-quarter of this continent under our control and administration should contain at the present time something in the neighbourhood of 25,000 people.

It is an area which could support quite a large population, as evidenced by similar sorts of areas in Europe and Asia, areas which lie in the same degree of latitude and in many cases have much the same type of climatic conditions and so forth. The minister may say that the eastern Arctic is an extremely inhospitable area and is not capable of development in this way, that way or the other way. I agree that that is probably the case as far as many parts of the eastern Arctic are concerned and that the best we can hope for is certain mineral developments and its use as a reindeer pasture or something else of that sort for the providing of meat. But the western Arctic is a very different proposition. There are possibilities for forestry and mining and—I do not think that there is any doubt about it—for oil development, agricultural development and so on in the western Arctic. In order to make that development possible, the essential thing—and I found there was no disagreement on this in the committee—is the provision of better methods of transportation.

In other words, before the country can be opened up, or before it can develop in any way to any great extent, we must have roads up into that country. In the committee I was disappointed to find that the amount of road building which is projected this year is almost negligible. It seems to me that this department should be taking a much more imaginative view of the possibilities of this north country, without counting particularly the cost of putting in a certain number of miles of road—whether it is 5 miles, 10 miles, 20 miles or 100 miles—at the present time and saying, "That is not going to pay for itself in the next year or two", and so forth. I think we must take a much longer term view than that and must begin to provide transportation facilities on a much broader scale than that on which they have been provided so far.

When the estimates of this department come down next year, instead of there being really nothing in the estimates to provide for road construction, except the provision for certain bridges to be built, I would hope that, considering the total amount of the budget we would have a reasonable provision for the building of roads in that area.

Mr. McLeod: Like the hon. member who has just spoken, Mr. Chairman, I also had the privilege of serving on the committee on estimates and I should like to make a few general remarks at this time. When the affairs of this department were before the committee on estimates, I believe the consensus was that the minister was tackling the many problems of the Canadian north with conviction and courage, and we look for better things in the years to come.

In the committee there was an expressed feeling that sufficient emphasis was not being placed on northern development. We are all aware of the great potential wealth that is dormant in this part of our great country. There are huge resources in minerals, petroleum products and forest products. It has been shown quite conclusively to this committee that heavy expenditures will be necessary to develop access roads to the centres of raw materials and to provide railroads to solve the very acute problem of transportation. It is an economic question on which there is argument on both sides. There are those who say that it would be unwise to make the necessary heavy expenditures while more settled parts of Canada are crying for these same services. On the other hand, there are those who say that if we do not develop our great north, there are others who may take a more active role and beat us to it. As I say, this is just a matter of opinion and there is great argument on both sides. It is gratifying to know, however, that the minister is paying more attention to the north, that heavy outlays for survey and study are being made and that definite action will follow this planning.

The department, in co-operation with the Department of National Health and Welfare, is doing a vastly improved job in looking after the Indian and the Eskimo population. This is a great humane problem, and the sensible program to adopt, it seems to me, would be one that would provide facilities to make these people self-supporting. This seems to be the general plan that is being followed.

Efforts are also being made to improve the living conditions of all our people who, by necessity or by choice, live beyond our provincial territories. As proof of this statement, may I say that the federal government makes an annual average expenditure of approximately $1,500 per head of population for our northern Canadians whereas the over-all average expenditure in Canada is about $300.

I should like to say a few words about national parks. We have the Revelstoke and Glacier parks in the part of British Columbia that I represent and I am glad to see that a small expenditure—and it is a very small one—is being made this year. In comparison with the amount provided for other parks across Canada, we are certainly not being treated overgenerously. A larger program should be inaugurated to make these parks of more use to the citizens of the interior of British Columbia and to Canada generally.

I should like to suggest to the minister that the possibility of providing a road—even if it is open only in the summer months—into Glacier park might be studied more carefully. I would also suggest that the two parks could be united into one larger national park. Failing this, a road connecting the Revelstoke and Glacier parks and going on to Golden should be carefully studied. I am sure the government of British Columbia would be interested in this matter. Such a road I believe would be one of the most scenic in Canada, would prove to be a tourist attraction of great interest, and would be of great value to the Revelstoke and Okanagan areas.

I am glad to note that the question of federal-provincial co-operation in conservation and development of natural resources is being carefully studied and that this matter will be discussed at greater length in a conference that is to be held later on this year. I hope this problem will be openly and carefully canvassed so that a program in the best interests of the provinces and of the people of Canada will be laid down for future guidance.

I could say something about the engineering and water resources branch of this department. However, in view of the problem that is being studied in another committee in this house at the present time, I think we shall leave until a later occasion any remarks on this subject.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would make the same plea that I have made on many occasions in this chamber, namely that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and the provinces work together harmoniously for the good of all.

Mr. Thatcher: I have only one or two comments to make on these particular estimates. I contend tonight, as I contended in the estimates committee, that Canada's northern development is lagging far behind that of other Arctic countries including Russia, Norway, Sweden, and Finland. According to the evidence which we were given in the estimates committee, and as emphasized by the hon. member for Calgary North tonight, the whole population of the Northwest Territories today is between 25,000 and 26,000 people. I think that number includes 7,000 Eskimos and about 4,000 Indians. In other words, since 1945 our population has increased very little, despite the expenditures of fairly substantial sums of money.

I think this parliament should realize that today in the north Canada has a real population vacuum. I am told that in Russia there are 50 cities each with a population of 50,000 or more. Whether the minister wants to admit it or not, I think it is fair to say that Russia and the Scandinavian countries are doing a much better job of opening up their north then we are doing. What is the reason for this lack of progress? As I see it the reason is fairly apparent. Both the Scandinavian countries and Russia are consciously and deliberately opening up their north on a planned basis. In Canada we are remaining virtually indifferent to our Arctic areas. This government's policy towards the Northwest Territories and the Yukon is a kind of "laissez-faire" policy, a "leave alone" policy. I think it lacks aggressiveness and imagination.

Let us look for a moment at the money we are proposing to spend on the north, as indicated by these estimates. According to the estimates we are proposing to spend $7 million on northern development. That amount is about ·16 per cent of our total budget. I contend that such a small amount is completely inadequate. I say it compares most unfavourably with what is being spent by other Arctic countries. I have a clipping in my hand from a recent issue of Time magazine which I quoted in the committee on estimates. I should like to read it to the house. It has to do with what Norway spent on her northern areas in the last year, and reads:

> Norway, with less than a quarter of Canada's population, is now spending $40 million on the economic development of the Norwegian Arctic.

In other words, Canada, a far richer country than Norway and with an Arctic of far richer possibilities, is today spending on northern development less than one-fifth of the amount Norway is spending.

In my opinion one of the major weaknesses of the department is that it has no colonization policy. It has no particular plan to get settlers to move into northern Canada. Whether or not we want to admit it, social conditions on our frontiers are still very primitive. In most cases it is a case of the lone settler struggling against raw nature. I say these conditions are not good enough. The hon. member for Calgary North mentioned a highway program. I think it is shocking that in the whole Northwest Territories, Canada has only 130 miles of highway. Moreover I am told that many of these miles of highway are in poor shape. Apart from the Alaska highway, we only have 400 miles of highway in the Yukon. Surely it is time we started to open up that country.

As I said a moment ago, the Scandinavian countries and Russia have an over-all plan. They are opening up the northern parts of their countries on a planned basis. When they proceed to open up new areas they send in bulldozers first to clear the land. Then they send in carpenters to build houses, schools, theatres, stores and the like. Finally they move in the people. The minister said in the estimates committee that much of the Russian development is done by forced labour. I am quite prepared to admit that to a degree his statement may be true, but it is obviously not entirely correct. I do not think parliament should allow the Russian bogey to affect us to such an extent that we are not willing to learn from the progress they have made.

I think Dr. Stefansson is one of the best known explorers of the world's Arctic areas today. Not long ago he addressed the Canadian Club in Toronto and, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail, he had this to say:

> . . . there is no real reason why large communities cannot be developed in Canada's north which are either fully self-sufficient or better integrated into the national economy. Dr. Stefansson, who has spent more than ten years of his life within the Polar circle, said it was a fallacy to suppose that agriculture, cattle and manufacture, could not be undertaken in the far north, though these activities might vary from the accustomed practices. Just this very sort of colonization has been successfully accomplished in the Soviet union . . .

I suggest that we are living in dangerous times. If we do not do something to colonize our north then, as has already been suggested, someone else may come along and do it for us. For purely defensive reasons we should be doing more to get people to go north. Because if Russia or any other country should suddenly decide to attack us from the north, they would go through those territories like a hot knife through butter. I say the time has come for the government to decide to spend more money on northern development, and to adopt a plan for colonizing the north. The time is rapidly approaching when some action must be taken.

Mr. Dinsdale: I want to say a few words on the first item because in considering the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I believe we are dealing with one of the most important departments in the whole gamut of government operations. It was my privilege to be a member of the estimates committee, and for the first time I had the opportunity of really becoming familiar with the possibilities of Canada's north that have been referred to by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre. But in addition to northern affairs the other items we have before us tonight are, in my opinion, of equal importance because under this department we consider lands, water resources and forests. That just about covers everything of significance so far as our natural resources are concerned.

Then we also have to consider the national parks branch, under which come tourist activities which, as most hon. members know, are one of the largest sources of United States dollars. From that standpoint alone it is of tremendous commercial importance. As I said in the committee, I was inclined to agree with the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre that Canada has been somewhat deficient up to the present moment in developing its remote northern regions, particularly in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. I was astounded to discover, for example, that actually there has been an over-all population decline since 1901. In 1901 the total population of the districts of Mackenzie, Keewatin and Franklin, including Eskimo, Indian and white, was 20,129 whereas in 1951 the number had been reduced to 16,004.

The same pattern is evident in the Yukon Territory where in 1901 the population was 27,219 and in 1951 9,096. I was glad to learn from the discussions in the committee that since 1951 there has been an upward trend. That is a hopeful and encouraging sign for the future. Like the hon. member for Calgary North, I was also impressed by the enthusiasm and grasp of affairs displayed by the officials of the department who appeared before the committee. I say this particularly with reference to the deputy minister, who is a comparatively young man. He particularly seems to have an eye to the future so far as the potentials of the north are concerned. Recently he has been making statements in optimistic terms with reference to northern development. One occasion was on March 15, 1955, when he addressed the forest products research society. He foresaw a development of the north not unlike the development of western Canada and said that climate was not likely to be any obstacle. The deputy minister went on to point out that the five-month average temperature from November to March was more than two degrees warmer in Whitehorse, Yukon, than it was in Winnipeg. Those are encouraging words. I had my first opportunity last fall to have a brief glimpse at the community of Whitehorse in the Yukon Territory. I am sorry the hon. member for that district was not in the vicinity at the time because I had looked forward to seeing the area more extensively. However, I can say from firsthand experience on the occasion of my visit that certainly there should be tremendous development in the immediate future. With reference to the deputy minister's statement concerning development of the western prairies the northern territories are not the only regions in Canada that have been very slow in developing. I would suggest that before we can see the results suggested by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre we will first have to fill up the wide open spaces in the mid-continental region of the prairies. I feel certain that before we can leapfrog into the Arctic regions we first have to meet the needs for industrial development and population growth in our three prairie provinces.

It is true that Russia and other European countries have moved ahead very quickly in exploiting the possibilities of their northern regions; but we must remember that, in the first instance, their population resources are much greater than ours and that, too, there are certain climatic differences in that to some extent they are subject to the influence of the gulf stream and are able to approach the development of that area from the ocean rather than from the land area. On the other hand, in our northern region we are pretty well faced with a solid, frozen mass, so far as the ocean area is concerned. I suppose that is what accounts for the comparative coldness of climate in the city of Winnipeg, largely as a result of the indentation of Hudson bay deep into the interior of the Canadian section of the North American continent.

Returning to this problem of the development of the prairie region, in terms of land, forest and water resources, I should like to deal briefly with the continuing necessity for conservation and a co-ordinated and organized program in respect of the conservation of these basic resources to which I have referred. We had a discussion on this subject on February 16, I believe it was. Unfortunately that discussion took place on a Wednesday, which is a half-day in the House of Commons, and we were not able to carry it very far. I believe it is fundamentally important that we take immediate action to have a co-ordinated and organized conservation program that would embrace these three important resources which come under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

We are forcibly reminded of the need for handling the water resources problem by the periodic floods that take place each year on the prairies. During recent days we have been hearing again of flood conditions in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The water control problem has two sides to it. At certain stages in the water cycle we have drought, while at other periods in the cycle we are faced with surplus supplies of water. The two measures that have emerged in solving this problem have come as a result of one crisis or another, either a drought crisis or a flood crisis.

The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, which does not come under the supervision of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources—and I must say there seems to be some confusion as to the respective responsibilities of that department and the Department of Agriculture in this connection—was organized to deal with a condition of drought. On the other hand, during periods of flooding we have certain dam developments to meet critical emergency situations.

I suggest that if we are going to deal with the problem of the control of our water resources we will have to do so, not on an emergency basis, but under a long-term plan, with some over-all national co-ordination. During the discussion last February the usual difficulties connected with jurisdictional responsibility were raised. I am referring to the respective responsibilities of provincial and federal authorities. This seems to suggest that a topic of this kind might well be included in any dominion-provincial conference, such as is contemplated in the immediate future.

Moving to another aspect of this over-all conservation program, we are faced with the necessity of doing something about our forests. The preservation of our forests is basic in any over-all program of conservation. Actually, the history of Canada has been staged against a forest background. Certain progress has been made in connection with programs of reforestation; but, again, these have been on an unco-ordinated and individualistic basis.

I was interested in listening to a radio discussion the other night to note the emphasis placed in certain European countries upon the importance of wood stands in agricultural areas. In fact there are some farms, in countries like Sweden, which are actually forest farms; and in considering the sale value of such farms the wood stands hold a dominant position. Here in Canada, particularly in the western section, we place very little value on our wood stands. In fact the few wood stands we have in the prairie region to a great extent have been the result of man's activity, as he has attempted to deal with the problems of soil erosion and soil blowing that have occurred during the periodic water cycles of drought and flooding conditions.

I suggest the department might well provide leadership by means of educational programs and through the use of the various facilities in the department to encourage an individual approach to the problem of maintaining and preserving our forest reserves. Unless we do maintain a proper balance there can be no hope that we can meet successfully the continuing problem of soil erosion and the loss of our valuable land resources.

I should like to place one or two statistics on record in connection with this problem of the preservation of land resources. Up to the year 1941 western Canada had abandoned 4 million of its arable farm acres as a result of recurring drought. Then, between 1921 and 1940, 267,938 acres of land in Manitoba alone went out of cultivation, largely as a result of soil erosion. This came about as a result of drought, as I have indicated, and it also came about as a result of periodic flooding, because with the periodic recurrence of flooding there is a tendency to destroy the fertility of the soil; a reduction in the organic matter of the soil occurs and when the organic matter in the soil is reduced, then the workshop for the billions of bacteria, which in turn manufacture the elements essential to plant life, disappear.

In other older parts of the world we are made vividly aware of this problem, because of the desiccation of those lands. In some areas the desiccation has advanced to the extent of producing man-made deserts. We, even though we are blessed with limitless natural resources, cannot guarantee that that happy state of affairs will continue unless we take immediate action to have some national planning in regard to this problem.

To wind up this brief discussion, I should like to emphasize that in regard to northern affairs and national resources we must take a long-term view. We cannot overcome the deficiencies of the past in the north in the matter of a brief decade or even two decades. I was impressed with the attitude of the minister and his departmental officials as we considered those problems in committee, but these attitudes must now be carried into action. I should like to suggest once again that the land resources, the forest resources, the water resources, belong to the past; they belong to the present; they belong to future generations yet unborn, and we today have a responsibility as custodians of these God-given opportunities.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I was very happy to hear hon. members of the opposition speak as they did. They are still true to form, especially the hon. member for Calgary North. They all commended the young minister and his officials on the splendid job they are doing. It is music to hear the minister commended. It is not music when they are asking something else from the minister. I said they were true to form. The department was doing a good job but was not spending enough money in opening up roads, in increasing transportation, in making it possible for the natural resources of the whole north country to be developed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Leaving too many unemployed.

Mr. McIvor: Then I thought of the thousands of acres in Ontario where the climate is fine and the soil is productive, and yet we have not a large enough population to develop it. I have a good reason to be interested in the cold north country for my boy was up there for about four months flying. Was he not glad to get back to civilization and to a place where he could freeze without seeing his breath all the time?

I could go on along this line for some time. It just shows how big Canada is from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the north to the south. In the next 20 years, if you and I look that far ahead, we shall see great developments, and if the opposition continues to advise the young minister and his department in the way that they have tonight I am sure it will be a splendid stimulant. It will be something like what was said of the Minister of Finance. It will be a shot in the arm.

What I rose to say, Mr. Chairman, was that we want the minister or some of his officials, when they are passing through Fort William next summer, to visit mount McKay. We think it should be a national park. I have tried to get it as a national park but I have just been beating the wind.

Mr. Rowe: That is what you have been doing most of your life.

Mr. McIvor: The dominion tells me that the province must purchase mount McKay and then hand it over to the dominion government if they want it as a national park. So, between the two, I just fall to the ground. Mount McKay is one of the finest sights in Canada. I have travelled all across the country and I have seen some great scenery, but I have never seen men and women so awe-struck as when they drive up to the top of mount McKay, pass a little bluff and then see that great panorama, that beautiful scenery. It just holds them spell-bound and they cannot get their breath for a minute. It is the greatest scenery in the world.

As I have said before, we have our water system away up there. You common people get your water from down below; we get our water from up above, 800 feet above the level of the city. We have the finest ski jump in Canada, the finest runs for slalom. We put on skiing championships that are second to none in Canada.

I tell the minister that it would bring money to Canada if we developed that area as a national park. Thank you for listening to me.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up much of the time of the committee on this matter, but I should like to bring to the attention of the minister an island in the middle of lake Erie. I did this last year. This island has a lot of snakes and a lot of pine trees on it. I gave a long history of this island last year and I do not intend to repeat it tonight. We are always accused of being repetitious in the house and I shall try to avoid that. However, as I said before, this island is called Long Point island. It consists of approximately 19,000 acres and is situated in the middle of lake Erie and stretches out from the Canadian shore.

At present, this island is owned by a corporation which is composed mostly of stockholders in the United States of America. The corporation operates a clubhouse on the island which the members visit very occasionally, usually in the duck-shooting season of the fall, and they employ a force of gamekeepers to act as a sort of private police to keep people off the island.

When the island was purchased around the year 1866, there was very little population in the southern part of Ontario, and it did not make much difference at that time. There has been a great increase in population in southern Ontario, and it is increasing at such a rate at the present time that summer resort spots are at a premium. People have to travel many miles over the week ends and this causes traffic deaths and traffic jams to get some place where they can enjoy the beauty and other advantages of our Canadian climate in the summertime. This island is readily accessible to the main centres of population in southwestern Ontario, such as Hamilton, London, Brantford, Galt, Kitchener, Woodstock, Tillsonburg, Stratford, and many other places. It is not more than an hour and a half's drive from any one of them.

If this island were to be made into a national park I am sure the summer resort problem would be overcome in that area. Wildlife, which has remained on the island in a virgin state, would be protected. There are trees and shrubs of various kinds and native plants on this island that are not found any place else. They are still in their native state. There are eagles on the island. I mentioned previously that there are more snakes there than are found any place else in the world. There is also as well some of the best bass fishing and duck shooting to be found anywhere in North America. The bass are being greatly depleted every year. In fact, the catch is getting less and the size is getting smaller. If this island were taken over as a national park it would give an opportunity to the people of the country to enjoy these things in the future. Control could be exercised over the take of fish and the number of birds taken every fall.

I mentioned before, but perhaps it is not clear enough, that if this island is taken over as a national park the rights of the Long Point Company need not be completely taken away. They have looked after this valuable piece of property for nearly 100 years and in many ways have done quite well, but I suggest that a handful of people do not need 19,000 acres of land such as this right in the heart of the most thickly populated part of Canada in order to go duck shooting. They could do very well with 1,000 or even 2,000 acres; they certainly do not need 19,000 acres.

There are one or two other clubs which have been there for many years and I think they might well be left alone also.

The government should consider the acquisition of this land as a national park. I know the minister is going to ask "Why the federal government?" He is going to ask why the department of northern affairs should be concerned in this matter. There are other parks operated by the federal government on lake Erie and on some of the other great lakes. As I have mentioned before, this island is about 20 miles long by about a mile or 2 miles wide and it stretches out toward the international boundary from the Canadian shore. The Department of Transport operates a lighthouse and lifesaving station at the end of the island, and I rather hope that in the not too distant future we will have a coast-guard station there. Nothing of that nature exists at the moment but we can always hope.

I know perfectly well that the province of Ontario would have to acquire the land in the first place and then turn it over to the federal government, but there is no reason why the minister should not enter into negotiations with the provincial government with a view to making an agreement to acquire this land.

There is one thing that has come up which I think is worthy of note since I made my remarks in the house last year on this subject. I have mentioned that there are a great many resources on the island. There is a fine stand of timber and there are many native plants. It is true that the proprietors of this island employ private gamekeepers, but they are not able to look after fire protection.

Last summer part of the island was swept by fire which apparently had been set by some people who had landed by boat. The gamekeepers were unable to control the fire and a large part of the end of the island was burned over. Native stands of timber and other material were destroyed.

As the population increases in this part of the country more and more people will find their way to this island. If there is no fire protection what happened this summer may happen again and before we know it these valuable resources will be destroyed. We should take action before it is too late.

I do not think there is anything else I want to say at this time. I wanted to bring this to the attention of the minister in the hope that he will give the matter favourable consideration.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, in the interests of economy I am not going to invite the minister to create a national park in any part of the riding which I represent. We have one or two prospective apartment house sites and if the minister could see his way clear to take them over it would probably settle a problem which is bothering the city council. There are so many beautiful places outside of Toronto that if the minister were to be given a free rein as he travels about the country there would be so much of it nationalized that there would be little left for the rest of us.

We do appreciate that this department deals with some very beautiful resources in the form of scenery, some most interesting resources in the form of historic monuments and sites, and it also has the tourist bureau which helps to bring people to enjoy all these resources. I have two or three brief comments to make and I do not think I will have much to say on these specific items.

As was pointed out in the committee, the tourist balance sheet is rather unfavourable. I am not saying that that is due to any lack of effort on the part of the tourist bureau, because I feel that Mr. Dolan and his staff are doing a good job; but the fact is that Canadians spent $380 million last year in the United States while Americans spent only $300 million in Canada, which leaves us with a debit balance of $80 million, a not inconsiderable item in a balance sheet. There is a lot of work to occupy the department in extending tourist activities and encouraging travel throughout our national parks and perhaps into our northland. It strikes me that there are many people in this crowded world who would enjoy the northland as a vacation ground in the future and perhaps they have not been invited to do that in the past.

A word as to highways. On a visit which I made to Yellowknife I found that they have only 18 miles of highway, but I was astonished to find that with their small population of some 3,000—I am not sure of the exact number—they have 38 taxicabs. There is no point in having any more highways because there is no place to go, but the 18 miles do serve that community well. It gives an opportunity to travel by taxi throughout the length and breadth of that famous gold mining camp.

I should like to say a word about the hydrometric services and flood warning activities of the department. It seems to me that there is much to be done in co-ordinating these activities with the meteorological services in order to give proper warning against such flood conditions as can be foretold. If the amount of rainfall were measured accurately I am sure that much loss of life could be prevented, and in this connection I would refer particularly to the flood which occurred in the Humber river valley.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the co-operation of the hon. member to discuss this matter when the officers of the water resources branch are here.

Mr. Michener: I shall be glad to do that. I concur in what the hon. member for Calgary North has said. In the committee we were given an opportunity to find out about the work of this department and we received the greatest co-operation from the officials who were called there to give an account of their administration. I think the hon. member for Fort William went a little beyond what was implied in the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary North. I am sure that the minister does not expect loud praises from this side of the house, and I am confining my remarks to the officials of the department.

In the committee we were able to review thoroughly the work of this department and therefore it should be possible to approve the estimates in a very short time. We were not satisfied on every point. For example, some of us were concerned that a house for a superintendent should cost $32,000 when it did not seem to be any more substantial than a house costing $18,000 here, but by and large we did get our information and that is what the committee was for.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the minister to the necessity of a park near the largest city in Ontario, possibly the most important city in Canada. No doubt when the St. Lawrence seaway is completed the city of Toronto will be one of the major cities on the great lakes. We have at the present time the best opportunity for placing one of the best parks close to one of the large metropolitan centres that we will ever have. I would ask the minister to see the Minister of National Defence and arrange in some manner or other that the rifle ranges which are situated on the lake shore road running from Hamilton to Toronto be converted into a park. If that vast expanse of unbuilt-up land ever becomes industrialized we will have lost the last opportunity of putting close to the city of Toronto a park that that huge metropolis should have. It would be the only place where there is a beach on Lake Ontario. There are hundreds of acres there which are going to be abandoned, we hope, by the Department of National Defence in the next year. Before anything happens to that land, I would ask the minister to get in touch with the Minister of National Defence to see what could be done to salvage a most valuable piece of land and turn it into a park which would be appreciated by the thousands and thousands of people who live in both Toronto and Hamilton.

As long as Canada is a country, if this is done, this project will be appreciated more than almost anything we could do and certainly by more people. I would call that to the attention of the minister and ask him to use his usual forcefulness to see that this piece of ground is saved before it is built over and lost to the people for all time.

There is another matter which I should like to call to the minister's attention. I suggest that he find out whether something cannot be done to speed up some of the projects that we carry out in conjunction with the province. I should like to speak for a moment on the subject of the Conestogo dam.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the co-operation of the hon. member? Would he defer his remarks on this subject until the officials from the water resources branch are with me? Hon. members will realize that there are so many details in the department that I cannot possibly know what point we have reached on such and such a work unless I have the proper officials of the branch here.

Mr. Hosking: I shall be delighted to acquiesce in the minister's request, and I certainly hope that he will acquiesce in my previous request as willingly.

Mr. Lesage: I shall look into it very carefully.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I was delighted to hear an hon. member from outside the metropolitan Toronto area express such interest in our welfare.

Mr. Hosking: In the national welfare.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am not sure whether it comes from the heart or whether it might have some connection with an election that is in the offing.

Mr. Hosking: We are not all political.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In any case it is unusual that we have two hon. members from Toronto speaking tonight about areas in the far north. I too have had the opportunity over the last five years to visit the Northwest Territories a few times a year, and last summer I got as far as my hon. friend's riding in Yukon. I honestly believe that, before we can see the development of this country on the scale to which it is destined, it probably will be necessary for all of us to see those far-flung areas. Only in that way can we realize the great potential that lies before us in this country's development. No matter what any other speaker has said tonight, the true development of the north can take place only with a sincere and real attempt to provide adequate transportation for those areas. In these remarks I am echoing the words of the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie), whose long experience in transportation matters in that area has led him to make the same type of statement. When we talk about transportation in that area we must talk about air transportation, because, no matter where you go in those areas, the prices of the products which you buy are determined to a great extent by the cost which is tied up in the air transportation charges for getting the products there. In addition, of course, it is not going to be possible to induce the necessary population to go to that area unless there is easy access in and out.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) mentioned his son's anxiety to return to civilization. I would probably frown on that remark in so far as it describes conditions. I think that the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) was closer to the mark when he described some of the realities of Yellowknife and the fact that taxicabs are as numerous there as they are in the most populated cities in the southern areas. But at the same time we must recognize that, even in connection with population, it is necessary to see that easy movement of personnel is possible into and out of the northern areas.

How are we going to accomplish this? There are those who will say that it is probably necessary to subsidize some type of air transportation system. Frankly, I think we have waited so long that that period is now past and that the air operators of this country are in a position without help to provide the transportation which is required. I do not want to spend too much time on this particular phase of my remarks, because I hope to have a great deal more to say about this when we get to another department with which it is more vitally connected. But it seems to me that it is necessary for the government to provide at least a lead to the private air operators so that we will go ahead with the development which should take place. In other words, I do not think that transportation should lag behind; it should be in the forefront; and it is absolutely necessary that it should exist in order that proper development may take place. In connection with the policy which might be pursued, I should like to read a paragraph from "Civil Air Policy" as enunciated in the United States in a report by the air co-ordinating committee by direction of the President. Here are the words which are used in that report:

> In determining policies appropriate to air transportation, it must be kept in mind that this is an industry affected with a public interest. The responsibility of the government, however, is not to carve out some predetermined role for air transportation and then attempt to force the industry into such development. Rather, the government must provide a general background of sound regulatory and promotional policies within which the industry itself will have the greatest possible opportunity for finding its own proper mission in competition with all other forms of transportation.

What has been the policy of our own government in this connection? It has carved out the fields and has told people more or less just what they will do with them. It is not possible to provide the expanding services on the basis of a policy which provides some type of monopoly east and west for a government-owned system and which has all aspects of the same type of monopolistic system north and south for one large operator. We should expect more than that. In reference to what we might expect, I should like to quote from an address by the Hon. Lionel Chevrier, then minister of transport, on November 10, 1952, to the Air Industries and Transport Association, in which he said this:

> . . . with the substantial growth of traffic within Canada it is no longer necessary to insist on monopoly conditions with regard to regional scheduled services and government policy will not forbid the gradual development on a regional basis of a reasonable amount of competition between scheduled air services. Any such development must be based upon findings of public convenience and necessity as required by the Aeronautics Act and any changes made by the air transport board in this direction will be very gradual and related to maintenance of conditions which will establish a sound economic position for the operators while ensuring the services that the public require.

Yet since that date there has been no indication that any other policy is being pursued in connection with transportation in the north than a straight monopolistic policy.

There is now an opportunity that is being given to the north, and I hope that hon. members of the House of Commons will continually remind the government of it and will make sure that the north will have both the benefit and the advantage from it. In connection with the construction of the distant early warning line we are now engaged in probably the largest mass type of air transportation that has taken place anywhere in the world. It has involved the use of every available transport aircraft in Canada. It has involved the use of aircraft imported from other countries and it is involving the use of the aircraft of the air forces of both this country and the United States of America. Within the next two years there will be available in this country a mass of multi-engined aircraft, freed from that large job and written off to the extent of at least 66⅔ per cent of their original cost. There is going to be a wonderful opportunity to put them to work if the government will see that a lead is given to air transportation and that it is not allowed to follow development instead of preceding it. Here is an opportunity that we must not miss. Here is an opportunity for us to take advantage of the policy laid down by the ex-minister of transport and to see that those areas are brought as close as possible to the highly industrialized areas of the rest of Canada, to the benefit of both.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, here is a third Toronto member making an excursion into the north, as far north as Fort William, anyway.

Mr. Lesage: That is not very far.

Mr. Macdonnell: We have had an interesting speech tonight from the hon. member for Fort William. The hon. member for Fort William might fairly claim—and I doubt that there would be many competitors—that he has administered more genuine adulation to members of the government than has anyone else in the short time I have been in the House of Commons. The hon. member not only praises ministers, but he praises anyone who looks like a minister, anyone who looks as though he might become a minister, anyone who has been a minister or anyone who is related to a minister. Tonight, however, I think he almost outdid himself.

In so far as the requirements of his calling would permit, he launched out into a criticism of us here in the opposition. The criticism was interesting. As far as I can make out, what he was criticizing us for is that we had ventured to suggest that rough people—people who could take it—should go north and live there. He described his own son—to whom I hope he did an injustice; I am sure he did so—as having gone to the north and come back, not able to take it but wanting to be snug in Fort William.

That raises an extremely serious question about the minister himself. I am sure he will not mind my being personal. I was interested in an article on the north last summer which depicted the minister. I regret to say that, not following the advice of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, the minister did not have a beard; he did not wear a hunting shirt; he did not have a knife stuck in his belt; and he did not have leggings. Indeed, he was just a dapper city slicker.

That is all very well. I must say that the writer of the article praised the minister for being up in the north country, as I do. But I think that if he could only adopt the costume that I have suggested and the tonsorial arrangements which the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has suggested, he would be even more convincing to those of us who follow with interest his excursions to the north.

I now want to say a word or two about a discussion which I find in the minutes of the estimates committee. I was one of the people who were accused of not being too enthusiastic about the estimates committee, but I find here an extremely interesting discussion and I wish to quote from it. It is to be found at page 438 and one of the new independent members who is not here at the moment was cross-examining the minister in a way which made me feel that he perhaps was fairly independent still. That was something that was very nice to think. As reported at page 438, we find this discussion:

> Mr. Thatcher: Yes. Mr. Minister, can you tell me roughly what the population in the Northwest Territories was at the end of the war and roughly what it is today? . . .
> Hon. Mr. Lesage: As to the population of the north, there are about 16,000 in the Northwest Territories and about 10,000 in the Yukon.
> Mr. Thatcher: Then, what plans has the government got to encourage northern settlement? Obviously it is not having much success in getting people to go up there. Have you got any definite plan?

The answer of the minister is one that I find to be extremely interesting, and there are one or two more like it.

> Hon. Mr. Lesage: People will go up there when there are jobs and opportunities available.

To me that seems to be like saying that you will go in the water when you can swim; or it seems to be like saying that the hen comes before the egg or the egg comes before the hen, I am never quite sure which, but you never get anywhere. I read on:

> Mr. Thatcher: But in Russia and these other places they are making jobs available.
> Hon. Mr. Lesage: They are making jobs available mainly for forced labour.

That strikes me as a very interesting comment. I submit to the minister in all friendliness that that is a defeatist argument. Surely we would not like to admit that in a free country, where I am sure there are any number of people with the same kind of adventurous spirit they showed in other circumstances 12 or 15 years ago, these things cannot be done. It is not possible for me to believe that these things which are being done in Russia under forced conditions or under slavery conditions, cannot be done here if the conditions are made right. I read on, and this is the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre again; I am all in favour of this independent member. I think he is very good so far:

Mr. Thatcher: Well, Mr. Minister, is there any fixed policy which the government has to bring people to the north or try and get it settled?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: It is not a definite policy necessarily to bring people to the north, but it is a general policy of encouraging economic development in the north which will bring up people.

Also, which is very important, it is a policy of using manpower possibilities that we have already in the north. I am thinking especially of the natives at the present time.

The minister nods his head, and I understand why. In a way, that is an unexceptionable statement, but on the other hand, when I go back to what the minister says about Russia, namely that we in Canada can do this thing when we force people to do it, it seems to me that there is a great contradiction between that and what he says later. First of all, he suggests that the reason we have not been able to get people to go there is that you have got to force them into it—

Mr. Lesage: What is that?

Mr. Macdonnell: With regard to the minister's remarks about Russia, I say that a fair implication of that first answer that I read is that we do not get people to go to the north because, in order to get them to go to the north, you have got to force them to go.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am drawing my inference.

Mr. Lesage: It is yours, and you can keep it. I do not agree with it.

Mr. Macdonnell: The minister can argue against it if he wishes to do so. I am just saying that, in answer to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre when he speaks about people going north as in Russia, the minister says "They are making jobs available mainly for forced labour". Now I come back to the second point. This is to be found at page 439:

Mr. Thatcher: Well, would it, Mr. Minister, be fair to describe the policy of the government at the moment as a kind of laissez-faire policy?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: It is definitely not a laissez-faire policy, it is an active and vigorous policy of bringing education to the north, and doing everything possible to reduce freight rates in order that the cost of living will be brought down and in order that further economic development may be stimulated by various measures.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Minister, there is no policy for colonizing the north at the moment?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: Well, if colonization means settling people on farms, there is no possibility of colonizing except in the Mackenzie valley . . .

I am not going to read all that. I continue, later:

Mr. Thatcher: But we have a population vacuum in the north; are you doing anything to try and rectify it?

I am not going to detain the committee while I read at length. The minister makes answers which he will defend and which I think I understand, but I do suggest that as one reads this one comes away with the feeling that there is a great negation, and all the more because later on at page 440 the minister becomes rather mysterious and indicates there are certain things "cooking". That is my word, not his. I will read one sentence in the middle of the page. The minister is being questioned by the member for Calgary North. The passage reads:

Mr. Harkness: Well, in that case then you have no definite plans or even proposals at the present time for a railway from Grimshaw up into that northern area?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: No, it depends on quite a number of factors which are being discussed at the present time.

I am not going to pursue that now. I was interested in that conversation. We are on the first item, and I take it we will have a chance to ask further questions when we come to the relevant item. Am I correct, or is this the relevant item?

Mr. Lesage: The relevant item would be item No. 312. That is where the development of the north was discussed at length in the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: What item are we on now?

Mr. Lesage: The first item of the department. We are on departmental administration.

Mr. Macdonnell: What number?

Mr. Lesage: The one I suggest is the first item under northern administration. In the meantime the hon. member will find a full statement of our policy respecting northland development and dealing with the problems of the north at page 535 and following of the report of the proceedings of the committee. At that time in the committee we were dealing with northern administration. The discussion the hon. member just referred to, from which he quoted a few extracts, was a discussion on the first item of the department. As a matter of fact, a full discussion of northland development took place when we reached northern administration, and it is reported on page 535 and the following pages of the proceedings of the committee.

While I am on my feet, I wish to thank all hon. members who have spoken for their suggestions and the appreciation they have expressed of the work of the department. I will be very careful to exclude myself, to please the hon. member for Greenwood. As I said, northland development was discussed to quite an extent by various members, and I do not believe I could add anything to what I said in the statement I made in the committee, to which I have just referred, in the answers I gave in the committee, and the answers that were also given by the officials of the department. There is this exception that at that time I said we could expect there would be a reduction in the rates for air transportation in the north. This reduction has been announced by Canadian Pacific Air Lines. I also said I was expecting a reduction in freight rates for water transportation. Since that time the Northern Transportation Company has announced certain substantial reductions in their rates.

Mr. Simmons: My remarks are going to be very brief inasmuch as I also had the privilege of serving on the estimates committee where all items of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources were discussed at length. It has been most gratifying to listen to the interesting remarks of the previous speakers. They go to prove beyond doubt that it is the considered opinion of hon. members, regardless of party affiliation, that every effort should be made to populate and industrialize the north country wherever possible.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I have not decided yet whether or not I will take much time.

An hon. Member: Do you need some help?

Mr. Hahn: No, I do not need much help. I have had the pleasure on several occasions of drawing to the minister's attention the desirability of establishing a park in the region around the monument at Point Roberts. Recently the minister gave me to understand, and rightly so, that the monument itself comes under the department of northern affairs and technical surveys.

Mr. Lesage: No, not the department of northern affairs. The monument to which the hon. member refers comes under the jurisdiction of the international boundary commission, and the international boundary commission is under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. This department has nothing to do with the monument my hon. friend has mentioned. I thought I had explained to the hon. member that we had nothing to do with that monument.

Mr. Hahn: I used the wrong term. I was going to refer to the minister later with respect to the desirability of creating a park in the area surrounding the monument. It would appear that the United States government has seen fit to take some 7 or 8 acres on their side of the monument for the purpose of creating a national park. We on the Canadian side are being told—at least, I was so informed as recently as three o'clock this afternoon—that the international commission is going to look after the monument because it is on the international boundary, which is quite understandable. They are going to clean up the brush around it and so on. However, it is going to be quite unsightly resting as it does on the boundary in view of the fact that the Americans are going to have a park in that particular area.

I strongly urge the minister to discuss this question with his colleague—there is not too much land involved—to see whether or not there is a possibility of creating a small park comparable in size with that on the United States side so that our part of the grounds will not look too shoddy compared with theirs. On the international boundary at Douglas the provincial government has a peace monument, and I must say it is certainly an outstanding piece of work. The minister has probably seen it. I am satisfied there is one of the finest parks there in the northwestern part of the continent. I would not expect anything quite so grandiose in the region surrounding the monument at Point Roberts. However, the monument is of such a historic nature, as the minister will realize and as his colleague realizes, that I feel if they could get together possibly something could be worked out whereby the people in the community could be satisfied and it could be made a part of the general tourist attractions on the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Mr. Thatcher: I am not entirely satisfied with the statement the minister gave us as to the policy of the department to populate northern Canada. As I said a moment ago, our population has been stationary since 1945. All the minister has said is that they have got Canadian Pacific Air Lines to lower transportation rates, and the Northern Transportation Company to lower freight rates.

Surely the department is not so bankrupt of ideas that they have not some kind of plan. Are we going on for another ten years without getting more people into our north country? I certainly think the minister should give the house a little more satisfaction before this first item is passed.

Mr. Lesage: I refer the committee and the hon. member to pages 535 and following of the committee on estimates.

Mr. Thatcher: Oh, I was on the committee.

Mr. Lesage: I gave full answers to all questions.

Mr. Thatcher: But surely that is not satisfactory. Just because we put the estimates before a committee is no reason why the minister should come to the house and refuse to answer questions. The minister simply has not answered the questions which have been asked tonight, and before this item carries I think he should do so.

Mr. Lesage: I do not believe I should use the time of the house in reading the reports of the committee on estimates.

Mr. Thatcher: Just tell us what your policy is.

Mr. Lesage: It is in the report, sir.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take much time—although we do not owe it to the house leader to push things through tonight, because he caught us by surprise when he brought forward this department, without notice.

So far as the minister is concerned, I think he will find that things will go reasonably well, in view of the fact that the department has already been before the committee on estimates. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Greenwood administer a rebuke to the hon. member for Fort William, who offers praise on all occasions and to everyone who happens to come within the orbit of his views. I would draw to the attention of the house the remarks of Mr. Adlai Stevenson who said that flattery is fine, if you don't inhale. Cabinet ministers opposite seem to acquire very early in life the bad habit of inhaling; so I think we should be careful about offering too much flattery.

Consequently I am not here to praise the minister. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Lesage: I never expected that from you, especially.

Mr. Churchill: I was interested to note that the minister was somewhat disturbed when the hon. member for Greenwood drew an inference from his statement in the committee, because the minister is so ready to draw inferences from statements I made. I was glad to see the tables turned.

However, I was going to say that the committee on estimates was very interesting for this reason, that it shows how ridiculously easy it is to be a minister. You have, as this minister has, very competent and efficient staff officers who support you. And with such competent and efficient staff work in his department, so far as the minister is concerned his task must be extremely easy. It is more difficult for us, who have to dig up our own information. Sometimes, if he is wise, he just keeps quiet and lets the officer of his department who knows the information give it.

However, as I have said, the staff of his department is very active and very competent. I do make this suggestion to the minister, that his is one of the very interesting departments of government. The minister recognizes that, as we all do. If on another occasion the estimates of this department are sent to the committee on estimates the minister should arrange for at least one or two meetings in a large committee room, such as the railway committee room, and there have on the wall one or two maps of the northern territory. Those maps should be large, so that we would have the picture completely before us while the committee was sitting. I grant that there is a very useful map published in the annual report of the department, but I am thinking of something of a good size, such as we now see in the railway committee room where there is a map of Canada showing thereon the railway lines. Of course it is only 30 years out of date; but, still, it is there, and it gives a picture of the country.

With the growing interest in the north country, I think something along these lines might very well be done. We could then follow on such a map the important things up for discussion when the estimates are before the committee. I have in mind questions of waterways, highways, air routes, mining developments, areas of population and things of that nature.

Similarly, so long as the department deals with the national parks, a map would be very useful in any discussion of that subject. It would take just a little imagination to offer a display that would attract attention to the work of this department, and I think it would be essential if our north country is to receive the attention it deserves.

I will conclude my remarks by repeating in part the criticism I offered when we were discussing the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, when I referred to the report that comes from the committee on estimates. I repeat this, because we find that unless we say things two or three times, no one pays any attention. My suggestion, again, is that if the committee on estimates meets another year and publishes a report, something in the nature of an index should be provided in connection with the report so that members of the house could find readily the information they require, and so that the minister, in his turn, could readily draw the attention of members to that information.

Mr. Thatcher: All I wish the minister to do is to take about ten seconds to answer the question I asked him. I would like to know what the government's policy is in connection with populating our northern country. I would like to know, if we spend the amount of money for which the minister is asking, if we will have any more people up there a year from now than we have today. I, for one, am not satisfied with the growth of our northern country since 1945. I would like to see something done that would encourage a lot more people to move up there.

I do not think I have asked a difficult question. What is the policy? What does the minister propose to do about it? If the department does not propose to do anything, then let him say so. But I do think the minister should answer the question.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I believe the only way we will get more people in the north, as I said in committee—and I was quoted by the hon. member for Greenwood—is to create an economic climate up in the north which will attract people to that area.

Let us not forget that, contrary to the situation in Norway, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, our southern areas are not completely settled. In Norway, for instance, most of the timber resources are situated above the 60th parallel. A good part of the fishing in Norway is done above the 60th parallel. There is a pressure of population below that parallel that creates a necessity for the expanding population to go north.

But, as yet, we do not have that in Canada. It is only 50 years ago that real settlement began in our great western territory. The northern parts of the provinces are far from being exploited to their full capacity. It is only natural that the people of Canada, before moving farther to the north, will in that process of going north stop first at those places south of the 60th parallel where they can find some better possible economic advantage. Again, we do not have the pressure that they have in other countries. It is only by creating economic conditions that will attract people that we might expect a great increase in the population of the north. Unless we have a much greater pressure in the south we cannot expect a very large population in the north in the immediate years to come.

We have a population of about 15 million people in one of the largest countries of the world. A few years ago what was Canada but a thin red line of population along the United States border? It is only in very recent years that great thrusts have been made up north in the development of our country. We have had iron ore development in northern Quebec.

Mr. Pickersgill: And in Labrador.

Mr. Lesage: And in Labrador; I am sorry. We have had the development of the Kirkland Lake and Abitibi regions in the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec; we have had the Lynn Lake development; we have had developments on lake Athabasca; we have had the Kitimat development. Well, these are in the provinces. I do not believe that between the 55th and the 60th parallel in the provinces there are proportionately very many more people than there are north of the 60th parallel. It is natural that the population should go up north as the necessity warrants it.

What we have had as developments in the north up to now that have attracted people other than the natives have been the mining developments only. That is where they are. As to other activities, I explained in the committee in very great detail the program of education and vocational training that we have for the natives in order to try to provide them with occupations in the north. I have said that we have prepared plans and we are studying the possibilities especially of improving transportation in the north, because transportation is the key to economic development, as the hon. member for Calgary North and others have said; not only air transportation, but land transportation which is very important for economic development and for the exploitation of the resources of the north. That is the key. But you do not accomplish that in a moment; it takes a certain time.

We started the settlement of the west 50 years ago, and it is far from being completed. That cannot be done in a few months; but I say that we have to see to it that there is transportation to the north at reasonable cost. When I was in the committee I said that we have intervened vis-à-vis the air lines and vis-à-vis the Northern Transportation Company.

Mr. Dinsdale: Not very effective.

Mr. Lesage: A 20 per cent reduction and the freight rates diminished. That has been done since.

I said that we were studying and surveying road construction.

Mr. Thatcher: Before the minister goes on, may I ask one question. The minister said that we have been 50 years developing the Northwest Territories. He mentioned that 130 miles of highways had been built which is less than three miles a year. Would he consider that that is the kind of development the people of Canada have the right to expect from the government?

Mr. Lesage: I do not know where the hon. member gets the 50 years. Fifty years ago I was not born.

Mr. Thatcher: The minister said we have been developing the Northwest Territories for 50 years.

Mr. Lesage: No. I said we started the great development of the west 50 years ago but it was far from being fully settled yet. I was referring to the western provinces.

Mr. Thatcher: There are still only 130 miles of highways in the whole of the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lesage: I did not say the Northwest Territories; I said western provinces. Moreover there are much more than 130 miles of highways north of the 60th parallel. There are a thousand miles in the Yukon, sir.

Mr. Thatcher: I am talking about the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lesage: In the Northwest Territories there is a highway running from Grimshaw to Great Slave lake.

Normally, the means of transportation are those which are the most economic and suit the region best. Up to now the main economic means of transportation in the Northwest Territories have been the waterways, and they are still used to a great extent for heavy freight. As far as other transportation is concerned, it is the airways that are used. But there is a highway from Grimshaw to Great Slave lake, and we are now studying the possibility, following the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Mackenzie River, of starting a highway from Hay River or somewhere on the Mackenzie highway to Mills lake farther down on the Mackenzie river.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Will the minister not admit that the promised reduction in air freight rates came only after the threat of competition to the companies in question? Is that not true?

Mr. Lesage: No, I do not know about that.

Mr. Leboe: I am interested in transportation in the northern part of British Columbia. Would the minister be prepared to use his influence with his colleagues in respect to railway development leading to the north?

Mr. Simmons: The minister just mentioned a proposed road from Hay River to Mills lake. Can he tell the committee what difference that road would make in the length of the navigation season on the Mackenzie river? I believe it would mean a difference of six weeks or longer, would it not?

Mr. Lesage: Approximately one month's difference, we hope.

Mr. Leboe: Has the minister an answer to the question I asked him?

Mr. Lesage: The department does not build railways in northern British Columbia.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Thatcher: I thank the minister for answering my question. I do not think it was a very good answer.

Mr. Lesage: I do not agree with that.

Mr. Thatcher: Regarding highways, I find that on page 445 of the evidence the minister was asked what highway construction had taken place in the Northwest Territories. I quote from the record. He answered:

> About 130 miles in the Northwest Territories; and in the Yukon—the Yukon is more advanced as you know—over 400 miles, not including the Alaska highway.

The other point I want to make is this: 130 miles after years of development in the Northwest Territories is not a very good record for this government. It is time that they adopted a more aggressive policy on highway construction and other developments in the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Macdonnell: I feel that this matter of populating the country is of vast importance, and I do not feel that the answers that have been given here tonight are adequate. I am sorry to say I have not had the chance to read through all the evidence given before the committee, but I want to say very firmly my understanding is that we are not inhibited in any way from asking questions in this committee of the whole house merely because it has been before the committee on estimates. Our rights are absolutely unimpaired in any way. We should resent it here very much if we are told to be good boys because a special committee has looked at it first.

I want to read from page 538 of the evidence. The minister referred me to page 535, where the report begins. I want to read from the top of page 538, which deals briefly with an aspect of immigration, stimulating of industries:

> Economic development and increased defence activities is already bringing, and will continue to bring, opportunities for employment. At the same time, plans are proceeding for the stimulation of small industries, such as boat building, etc., which I mentioned a few moments ago. The natives will not, however, be able to take advantage of these and other opportunities unless they have some schooling. Primary schooling is the minimum requirement and vocational training is needed by many. Given the necessary education and training there is no reason why Eskimos and Indians cannot satisfactorily fill many of the jobs in northern Canada which would otherwise have to be undertaken by people brought in from the south, often at high cost.

That seems to me to be a self-destructive paragraph. First of all you say that you are stimulating industry, that the time will come when local people can man these industries. Then you go on to say that it takes a lot of time to do that. Does that mean that you are stimulating industry solely for the purpose of employing people there? Further back, if I remember rightly, you said that people would not go in until the going in was good, until the economic climate was good. It seems to me that there is kind of an impasse there. Are you going to stimulate industry solely for the local inhabitants and hope that what they do will be the means of bringing in other people? That does not seem to me to be very adequate.

I do not want to underestimate the difficulties but it seems to me, with all the unemployment we have, that for us to have people banging their heels down here if there is work to be done up there is most unsatisfactory.

Mr. Lesage: It is too bad the hon. member for Greenwood was not a member of the committee.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am not so sure.

Mr. Lesage: I made a trip to the north last summer and when I came back my deputy, my assistant deputy and I examined the situation closely. Contrary to what an hon. member of your party said, that I know nothing, I really learned quite a bit.

I came back with the conviction that there were two problems in the north. The one is economic, the problem of developing the north so that we can take advantage of the vast natural resources that exist there. I think the way to develop the north economically is to try to create an economic climate which is favourable to the development and exploitation of those resources. The key to that development is transportation.

There is a second problem, a human problem which faces the population up there. This is a most difficult problem. What the hon. member quoted a few moments ago was from the second part of my statement before the committee when I was dealing with the human problem which faces the natives. I dealt more specifically with the economic problem on pages 535, 536 and 537. On page 538, from which my hon. friend quoted, I was dealing with the human problem which faces the natives.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

I was saying that we have to try to interest the natives in small industries. My expression may not have been the best, but I was referring to small industries and trades, teaching them to be carpenters, for instance. Then if we had to build a school in a community we would not have to import carpenters from Edmonton at great cost.

There was a separation of the two problems in my treatment and at that particular time I was dealing only with the human problem facing the natives.

Mr. Macdonnell: I appreciate what the minister says. No one has anything but the most complete concurrence in the idea of doing everything possible for the natives, but that still leaves the question of whether there is a broader plan for development which can be brought about more quickly than the natives can do it, a plan which would have to be carried out by others.

My leader knows more about this than I do, but my understanding is that the development of northern Ontario was hastened by the operations of the geological survey. That survey did not go out prospecting to discover mines; what they did was to cover the geology of the country and indicate where prospecting might be good. I am not as familiar with that part of the country as the minister, but I assume that there must be huge undiscovered resources up there. I mention this only as an instance of the most fruitful co-operation between a government department and the most private and individual kind of private enterprise.

I do not want to see this item carried tonight, and the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre may still have other questions to ask. As I read the questions and answers earlier in the summary I felt that it was still worth while to discuss that all-important point.

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member was dealing with prospecting and geological surveys—

Mr. Macdonnell: I gave that only as an example.

Mr. Lesage: Geological surveys are being carried on in the north in a very substantial way. These surveys come under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. They will be carried on this year in the Queen Elizabeth islands. This is called the Franklin operation and was announced by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Last year there were a number of survey parties around Baker lake, and also considerable survey work was carried out in the Yukon.

This work is going on all the time. My department is not the only department concerned with the north. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys sends out its geological survey parties; the Department of Transport has establishments in the north, and of course the Department of National Defence.

What we try to do in my department is to create an economic climate under reasonable terms of expenditure. I am sure the hon. member for Greenwood will agree that we should not go to the extent of creating an artificial development which would be more costly than sound economics would warrant. In order to create a favourable economic climate I said, and I repeat, that the first thing to do is to bring down the cost of operation and reduce the cost of living. We have attacked the problem of transportation costs and plans are under way to provide better means of transportation.

Other possibilities are being looked into, such as the allowance of longer time for depreciating the cost of power plants in the north. There is also one thing that is often thought of, but to which we have not yet been able to give a practical answer: would it be possible to adjust taxes on a basis which would have any relation to the parallel of latitude on which an industry is situated or where an individual lives? My hon. friend could answer that question much better than I could, in view of his experience, but I am afraid that he would not dare to go into that.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this tomorrow and take post office and agriculture.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 13, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Rene N. Jutras (Provencher) presented the first report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADOPTION OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORT

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Hon. members will recall that Mr. Speaker presented to the house two days ago a report of the civil service commission with respect to four members of the staff. I now beg leave to move that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICE

ALLEGED SMUGGLING FROM FAR EAST THROUGH ARMY MAILS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I have sent him. Has the minister's attention been called to an article in the Vancouver Sun, alleging that goods are being smuggled into Canada from the Far East through the army mails? Can the minister also say what exemptions from customs duties are granted to service personnel?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) also gave me notice of a similar question. I have seen a copy of the rather, to me at least, astonishing article to which the hon. member has referred.

In reply, I would like to say that it has been our policy to investigate immediately and thoroughly any report of alleged irregularities of whatever kind, and from whatever source, even though, as I indicated to the house in the answer which I made to a question on April 18, many of these reports are later found to be either without foundation or greatly exaggerated.

With regard to the specific matter to which my hon. friend has referred, I may say that the report of rumoured abuses in the army postal service in Vancouver came to my attention early this week. While I was not given any actual evidence of the truth of these rumours, I nevertheless immediately ordered an investigation, which is at present in progress. So far nothing has come to light to indicate that there is any truth in these rumours.

As hon. members well know, postal investigations are most effectively carried through when the parties involved are unaware of the inquiry, and I can only hope that the effectiveness of this particular inquiry will not be prejudiced by what appears to be a particularly highly coloured and as yet unsubstantiated newspaper story.

With regard to the hon. member's second question, I understand that if a soldier has served abroad less than a year he may bring back $100 worth of goods free of duty. If he has served for a year or longer there is no limit on the amount he can bring back, but it must have been purchased at least six months prior to his returning to Canada. This applies no matter where the service abroad has been, whether in the United States, the Far East or Germany. I think it is covered by items 703(b) and (c) of the tariff act.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Has he any information as to the nature of the goods alleged to have been smuggled and do they include narcotics and things of that sort?

Mr. Campney: I have no detailed knowledge as to what goods are alleged to be involved.

The article to which reference has been made contains the only reference to narcotics which I have seen.

[Later:]

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Acting Postmaster General, notice of which I have not sent him. In view of the reply made a few moments ago by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) with regard to tampering with the mails, is the Acting Postmaster General prepared to indicate that the Post Office Department will carry on an investigation?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Postmaster General): I think I will let my colleague carry on his investigation.

NATIONAL REVENUE

ALLEGED RELEASE OF INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance in his capacity as house leader? Will the minister arrange for the estimates of the Department of National Revenue to be referred to the special committee on estimates or to be brought before the house at an early date so that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) may be able to make a full statement and answer any questions about a certain affair?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): The business of the house will be organized in such a manner that I hope we will be able to get out of here before July 1.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SUGGESTED ACCEPTANCE OF OTHER CURRENCIES IN PAYMENT FOR EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am sorry I did not give him prior notice. In view of the serious drop in export sales of Canadian wheat, will the government consider accepting soft currencies in payment therefor from countries willing to buy Canadian wheat under that condition?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is no drop from last year in the sales of Canadian wheat; as a matter of fact we are well ahead of last year. We believe that our policy of selling for dollars is the proper policy for Canada. I know of no reason why we should sacrifice wheat which is the property of the producers of western Canada for the sake of the odd few sales we might get if we accepted a different currency.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO ASSIST INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of the closing of a coal mine in the town of Inverness, Cape Breton, in April, and the now imminent closure of 1-B colliery in Glace Bay, can the minister tell the house whether any steps are contemplated by the government to halt this deterioration in the coal industry of Cape Breton island?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the dominion-provincial meeting Premier Hicks of Nova Scotia and other officials of his government met in my office on two different occasions to discuss the problems of the coal industry. At one of those meetings my colleagues, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Winters), were present. There were no conclusions reached at either of those meetings but the whole problem of the industry was discussed, more particularly the problem of 1-B colliery.

There was a subsequent meeting between officials of the dominion coal board and the Dominion Coal Company to review the market prospects for this year. Premier Hicks of Nova Scotia has called another meeting for May 20 in Halifax to which I have been invited, and I believe also that my colleagues the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Public Works have been asked to attend as well as the chairman of the dominion coal board and other officials. I do not know what the agenda of that meeting will be but I expect that the problems of the industry will be discussed.

AVAILABILITY OF REPORT OF DR. A. G. CHRISTIE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys if he will make available to members of the house the report of Dr. A. G. Christie to the dominion coal board which was made last September and released to the press in May.

Mr. Prudham: I was not aware that the report had been released to the press. It was made available to the provincial governments concerned and at their request we were withholding publication until they had had a chance to study it.

Mr. Gillis: Is it possible for a member of the house to get a copy if he requests it? It was given to the press.

Mr. Prudham: I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend a copy.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS ALLOWANCE—REGULATION PASSED UNDER SECTION 4

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, notice of which I have sent him. Have regulations under section 4 of the War Veterans Allowance Act been issued recently whereby the payment of the allowance at 1/25 per day has been cancelled and payment for days not worked on an income basis substituted?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is referring to one of the regulations passed in 1952 after the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended to bring in section 4. This regulation was based on the formula used by the unemployment insurance commission, but in the course of administration of cases coming under this regulation it was found that this formula could create overpayments under the War Veterans Allowance Act inasmuch as it could cause a veteran to be paid an allowance in excess of the permissible income in any month under section 4. When this was realized the formula was amended to meet the situation.

Mr. Pearkes: When was the amendment made?

Mr. Lapointe: I believe it became effective April 4, 1955.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

A.V. ROE PLANT—INQUIRY AS TO PLANS TO MAINTAIN EMPLOYMENT LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Can the minister give the house any indication as to whether his department has any new plans for government orders for the A.V. Roe company which will help to maintain the employment level at that plant?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to understand what my hon. friend means by further orders. My recollection is that we have orders with the A.V. Roe plant running into more than $300 million. Employment at the plant depends upon the management and the rapidity with which they are able to get into new production. There is no lack of orders at the A.V. Roe plant.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I ask a supplementary question. Does the minister have any knowledge of any step-up in production which will help to maintain employment?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is a very difficult question for me to answer. I think production at the A.V. Roe plant is handled efficiently by the management. This is a privately owned plant and I do not think I am in position to answer further.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

ASSINIBOINE RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO RESPONSIBILITY FOR DIKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if he is in a position to state to what extent the prairie farm rehabilitation division is responsible for the maintenance and repairs to dikes along the Assiniboine river in Manitoba.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the position has always been—ever since confederation, I think—that the federal government has been responsible through some department for the handling of streams which are navigable. The Assiniboine river has been classed as one of those streams. Until two or three years ago that was handled by the Department of Public Works. Two or three years ago it was transferred to P.F.R.A. under the Department of Agriculture. As I said the other day, the lands are largely privately owned. They are in municipalities, and our people co-operate with the local people in handling the situation which exists.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

293. Departmental administration, $509,310.

The Deputy Chairman: I might remind the committee that this heading is to be found on page 50 of the blue book, and the details begin on page 397.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the items that we are dealing with under this heading relate to the most challenging prospect that Canadians have before them today. While all of the area known as the north may not be under the administration of the minister of this department, we must always be conscious of the fact that well over two-thirds of the land mass of Canada is in an area that we may freely describe as "the north". The phrase "the north" is a variable term. For a long time North Bay has been regarded as the gateway to the north in Ontario; and yet North Bay is far south of Edmonton, is only about the same distance north as the city of Quebec, and by the standards of those who live in the prairie provinces could hardly be regarded as a northern city by any accurate description. While it may not be easy to define the actual area that we would describe as the north, I believe that we may generally regard it as the area above the substantially settled communities across Canada. The north stretches from Labrador across to the Yukon and embraces all that great territory up to the Arctic ocean.

There has been evidence that the minister has shown considerable interest in the activities of his department, but certainly I was not only disturbed, but amazed to hear the attitude of the minister summed up in the words that there must be jobs in the north before the people will go there. It is that statement, and the fact that the minister apparently continues to accept that as a definition of his opinion, that impel me to make these remarks which I now propose to make while we are in committee, in regard to the affairs of this department.

The north in Canada now represents the great challenging area of development. It seems to me that the approach to the development of the north must be the same kind of approach as that which inspired our forefathers to extend railway lines across Canada, and build canals at a time when there was apparently no shipping to justify that immense expenditure for those days. Think of the imagination and the faith in the future that was represented by those who constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway. Think of the courage and the willingness to pledge the credit of Canada for the future of Canada that was represented by the decision of the government of Sir John Macdonald in 1881 to make the necessary arrangements with the company which was to build that great line across this country. Just let us recall—and particularly let our youth today recall—the vision of the men and women of those days.

The western territories were largely populated by roaming Indian tribes and by great herds of buffalo. As the Canadian Pacific lines were driven west, the builders were confronted with attacks by Indian tribes, and they were also, I might say, confronted by very severe attacks from some of the people who did not like to see their land used for that purpose, people who expressed their feelings with some vigour. But this line was driven across Canada, not because there were jobs there but because it was felt that with the resources across that great territory this railway development would create the possibility of jobs. Then it was left up to the initiative, courage and vigour of men and women with adventurous spirit to go out and make the jobs in the area, that vast area where transportation had been made available in that way.

Let us come to a later period, the thirties, when the expansion of northwestern Canada was taking place. Surely one of the most romantic chapters of Canadian history is the opening of the mineral and fur-bearing areas of northwestern Canada by air transport. It happens that I had the privilege, first, of visiting many of those far northern areas as a youngster. But later, some 20 years ago, I flew through most of that great territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific in those single-engined machines which were at that time carrying the largest freight load carried by any country in the world—surely something of which Canadians have reason to be proud today. It stirs the blood when you look back at those bush pilots who were carrying in those comparatively light Fairchilds, Fokkers and Junkers this immense load, greater in total than the total air freight load of the United States or of any other country in the world. That opened up the mining areas of Slave lake and Great Bear lake. It opened up the territories along the Mackenzie river, over to the Yukon, across to Hudson bay, and on, eastward, right over through the whole of northern Quebec and Labrador. What a challenging picture to the youth of today! Those men did not have jobs waiting for them there; they made the jobs. They reached out to the new territories and they created the possibilities of jobs with the transportation they themselves were supplying. It seems to me that this is the spirit in which we must approach this immense opportunity, this almost unlimited opportunity, which has opened out before us across this whole northland of ours. We are not speaking about some vague and uncertain thing. Across that whole area are resources such as are hardly equalled either elsewhere in Canada or elsewhere in the world. Sometimes I find that people who actually were not born and brought up here seem to see some of these things more clearly than we ourselves do.

I recall that it is more than 25 years ago—yes, nearly 30 years ago—when in a speech in Toronto the Right Hon. L. M. S. Amery made a statement which at that time seemed to me to be almost beyond the realm of reality, namely that in the great Pre-Cambrian shield and the northland generally of Canada there was mineral wealth yet to be discovered beyond anything discovered in any other country in the world today.

The time came when I saw some of that reality. I remember flying into the uranium discovery at Great Bear lake in the early stages, just after it had been opened up. That discovery had much to do with the ending of the Japanese war and, perhaps some of us might say, with all the terrible consequences that have flowed from the discovery made possible by the use of Canadian uranium at that time. But also in that area, as is known by everyone who has been there, there are fantastic deposits of silver, copper and other metals waiting to be developed. Yes, and throughout the whole north, there is iron in quantities equalled nowhere else in the world today. There is oil as well and gas in that far northland, as distinguished from the gas and oil of the southern areas. There is coal and above all there is waterpower. Every one of the great sources of industrial energy is there in that vast northland starting with the huge falls on the Hamilton river on the east coast of Labrador, right across to the mighty waterways of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories. The possibilities for development are simply staggering. One of the rather remarkable affinities of nature is the fact that almost invariably the minerals are found in proximity to waterpower which can be turned into electric energy. There is lead and there is zinc as well in those areas.

To show that this is by no manner of means some vague and uncertain thing, may I say that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company have 1,200 claims in the Pine Point area and are actually going ahead with underground work as soon as it is practical. Throughout the whole of that broad northland the challenge is there to all Canadians and to the young people from other parts of the world as well as to the people not so young but who are young in spirit. I know my hon. friend will share that view because he is indeed young in spirit himself.

One could go on to deal with these great opportunities. I have not mentioned nickel or some of the other metals that are found in such great quantities there. On the Mackenzie river, near Fort Good Hope there is a vast power potential. On the south Nahanni river there is Virginia falls, a waterfall twice as large as Niagara. On the Lockhart river at the east end of Great Slave lake there are enormous power resources. At Dead Man's rapids on the Slave river near Fort Smith there is a drop of 110 feet in ten miles, with a huge power potential. Power is also being developed in great quantities at Yellowknife for the operation of the mines there.

This is not without its accompanying resources as well because there are agricultural resources in those areas. Actually, the Mackenzie river plain is an extension of the prairie land of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Also there is wood in marketable quantities throughout that area. Along the Slave river, the Mackenzie river and the Liard river areas there are wonderful possibilities for agriculture. Things grow there rapidly in the long days of sunlight. Those who have been through that area also recognize the fact that, apart from the magnificent growth of food and vegetables, nowhere else in Canada are there flowers of such great brilliance and increasing in brilliance right up to the Arctic, from Aklavik right across to Coppermine, which is to the northeast, and to Hudson bay.

All this calls for unlimited optimism. All this calls for basing our plans upon the practical foundation of demonstrated hope that these things can become a reality in the years ahead. If we had waited until we saw the jobs or, shall I say, if our forefathers had waited until the jobs were there, the prairies would not have developed nor would the areas farther north to which branch lines from the Canadian Pacific railway have been extended. In Ontario, if the Ontario Northland Railway in the earlier part of this century had not been built up to James bay through an area which was still wild and where there was no real development at all at that time, the rich part of northern Ontario perhaps would still be in a primitive state today. But transportation was provided which made it possible for men and women of spirit and initiative to go there and to make jobs.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is not something to be left to reckless or haphazard development. We all know that mineral resources are wasting resources. We know that if there is inferior or inadequate transportation, only the richest ores will be highgraded and that promising mines will be left in a condition that may hardly make it economic for years to come to resume development. It is therefore important that under a free economy—and certainly under no shackles of socialism—we provide sensible plans, recognizing these vast potentialities, which will integrate the development with the resources and will provide the transportation into the areas where, by one means or another, these vast power potentials are going to be developed.

Without embarking on any acrimonious reference to an earlier discussion about what was known as the public investment program may I suggest that, to the extent that the government still feels that the credit of Canada should be pledged to a national development program, there is no place where this can better be done than throughout that northland where millions of horsepower of electric energy are waiting to be harnessed for the advantage of new generations if we place the credit of Canada behind that development.

I have heard it said that we must not be reckless in expenditures. As a Conservative, I trust that we shall be conservative in our approach to the handling of our finances in this respect. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a difference between spending money on capital development and spending money, on which there is no return, on some passing phase of our activities. This is capital development of the most valuable kind from which the returns will be not tenfold but one hundredfold in the years ahead in the communities that will grow there in that great northern area. That is a place in which to try out plans for development.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is another aspect to this matter that I think we have perhaps overlooked, namely national defence. We have two-thirds of the land mass of our country with a sparse and limited population. It is of vital importance to the defence of Canada that communities be established near these power resources under an integrated plan right through the whole of northern Canada. Let no young person shudder with the thought of cold and worry about the prospect of going into the northland. About ten days ago a number of members of the house visited the military establishment at Churchill. Every one of them came back enthusiastic about the conditions under which the people were living at Churchill. I am confident that the minister, in giving the population of the northern areas, has not included the military establishments.

Mr. Lesage: Churchill is below the 60th parallel. It is in Manitoba.

Mr. Drew: I realize that, and I indicated that I realized that. Quite apart from the arbitrary definition, I am talking about the great northland and not only the Northwest Territories.

Mr. Lesage: I am not quarrelling with you about it.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: I realize that the area under the immediate administration of the department and the Northwest Territories council, whose jurisdiction has been greatly expanded within the period that the minister has been the head of the department, starts at the 60th parallel. In the same way that North Bay is not really north, as I pointed out, there is also a lot of land south of the 60th parallel that most of us would regard as very far north indeed, and most of us definitely regard Churchill, halfway up the coast of Hudson bay, as very far north by ordinary standards. That was what I meant when I said that the word "north" is a broad, embracing term which includes within it the defined areas beginning at the 60th parallel. What I really wanted to point out with regard to Churchill was that in an area that is cold by any standards and in fact, I understand, is inclined to be a little colder than even the Arctic coast, those who live there find it healthy and invigorating, and I have had reports from young men there who believe they are in the very best military establishment in the whole of Canada. It is always a good thing for people, wherever they are, to believe they are in the best military establishment.

I mention that because it is only indicative of what is happening. Right across the whole northern part of Canada, without going into details that should not be placed on the record, there are air bases and radar bases which today embrace a substantial population. There is already a population there living perhaps not with all the amenities of the deep south of Canada but nevertheless living a vigorous, healthy and, to them, an invigorating and rewarding life. I mention that because if military bases can be agreeable places to live in, then civilian bases organized on a similar plan, such as would surround great hydroelectric developments producing 500,000, 1 million horsepower, and so on, would be similarly attractive places for people to live. After all, there were many people who found the Yukon and Dawson City a very pleasant place in the early days and not entirely as primitive as described by Robert W. Service in his wonderful poems. There are many members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of other Canadian services who have found service life pleasant throughout the northland. But it would be very wise for us to make sure that with the development of these natural resources we have communities spotted across the north, because the real threat to Canada might come from parachute troops dropped over that northern area. Airports should be developed all across the area farther south of the northern air and radar bases where appropriate steps could be taken to deal with a situation of that kind.

This is a reality if the danger of war is a reality at all. If we are spending over $2 billion with the recognition of the real danger of the possibility of war, then we must recognize the existence of the possibility of war and we must remember that the closest nation to Canada with the exception of the United States is Russia. We must remember that Russia is separated from the North American continent only by the Bering strait, 55 miles wide, and that northeastern China along the Yalu river is not many hours flying time from northern Canada in modern transport machines. While all of us hope and pray that war may not come, we cannot disregard the promise made yesterday by Chou En-lai that in the event of war China would stand side by side with Russia. We therefore see on the other side of the Pacific over 700 million people from whom units can be drawn that might be moved by air into that area.

This is a part of the problem of national defence. I mention it because it was said: You are not going to spend money on a large scale in the north. Money spent there should be regarded first of all as long-term self-liquidating returnable capital and, second, it should be regarded in the light of its value to national defence. I do not intend to enlarge upon these remarks beyond repeating my conviction as one who has seen that area grow from the most primitive stage, when on the north coast there were only Eskimos, the R.C.M.P. and the wireless stations, to the point where it has become integrated fairly well into our society through air development.

Let us look ahead. I would not suggest railway facilities, but there are roads. There is also the fantastic development in air transport. Last September at Farnborough I saw one of the new Blackburn transports take on board and carry away a huge truck. I saw two complete 25-pounder units with ammunition wagons go into one of these Blackburn transports, and saw them flown away. I mention that because we have reached the point now where nearly anything that can be moved by rail can be moved by the huge air transports now being produced. This development has revolutionized the whole prospects of the north. We should have no limit to our optimism and our hopes for that area. I trust that the plans of the government will be consonant with the spirit of the people of Canada and that when we say "go north, young man, go north" we will not tell him there is going to be a comfortable job ready and waiting for him but that we will take steps that will assure that his vigour, initiative and courage can be rewarded by opportunity.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Leader of the Opposition. He has made the kind of speech I should like to make and have made on occasion about the development of the north, a challenge and necessity in our day. The Leader of the Opposition has made a comparison that has been made in the past, and which I have used, between the west of 50 years and more ago and the north today. It is true that when the Canadian Pacific Railway was built through the west it meant for the people of that day the meeting of a great challenge. It was constructed at a time when there was a population of about 4 million in Canada and the national income was very low compared with what it is today. Our forefathers, even our fathers, certainly took risks at the time, met the challenge, and the west was opened because transportation was furnished.

I said yesterday that the key to the economic development and opening up of the north is cheaper transportation. That is what brought about the development of the west. But there is a difference between the opening up of the west and the opening up of the north in this sense, that our forefathers, our grandfathers, could go to the west with this new means of transportation, open up the country and settle on farms with no more than their bare hands. This is not the kind of development that we can expect north of the 60th parallel. It will be mainly mineral development. Mineral development requires capital investment in huge quantities. It requires also, and I repeat it, cheaper transportation.

As I said yesterday, we should first create an economic climate that will be attractive to capital. In order to help do that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is conducting intensive geological surveys. We are studying now the possibility of improving transportation facilities in the north and of making it cheaper. We believe that we have to provide cheaper transportation, as was done in the west, in order that the north may be developed and populated. The populating of the north is not a primary aim in itself; it is, in point of time, secondary. Really, it comes after the necessary provision for the development of the immense natural resources to which the Leader of the Opposition so eloquently referred.

Well, making provision for that development is what we are doing, and I pray to God that this generation will have the same spirit of adventure, the same pioneering spirit that our fathers and forefathers had. With that spirit we can develop these northern parts that have to be developed. The day is near when the resources of northern Canada will be badly needed in the world, especially the mineral resources. But so far as transportation is concerned, although I have great confidence in aviation I cannot foresee the day—although it may come sooner than I think—when the huge air transports to which the Leader of the Opposition was referring could be used economically for the transportation of mineral concentrates from the north to the smelters. Of course, one could say that we should build smelters up there; that we have the power. It is true that we have the power but these are very costly operations.

For instance, in the case of the Pine Point discoveries on the south shore of Great Slave lake, there lies there what we believe to be the greatest known ore body of lead and zinc. We hope that the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company will soon see fit to have definite plans for the development and exploitation of this vast ore body. We hope that it will be possible to work out with them some kind of arrangement under which transportation facilities will be available to take out the ore. I have said, both outside the house and in the committee, that we hope it will be possible in days not too far off to have what is still the cheapest kind of transportation for distances of 300 or 400 miles or more, and that is a railway line from Grimshaw to Pine Point. We have been discussing, and still are discussing, the economic implications of such a project.

We look at the north, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition has said, and I thank him for his intervention, as something that has to be developed, not in a haphazard way but with plans. The plans must be directed not so much towards putting people there for the sake of putting people there, but towards exploiting the resources. We should first have capital which will go there because the economic climate will have been created by cheaper transportation. Then, these natural resources will be developed and manpower will go there because the capital investment which is necessary will have been made. Then, the population will go there, and I am sure that the population will be happy because in Whitehorse, Yellowknife and even far north in Aklavik I have met and talked to people who were very happy with their lot in life. The north presents a great challenge to all Canadians, and I hope that all hon. members in this house will help the government, will help me and the officials of my department, to meet that challenge in the national interests.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, we have just heard two interesting speeches, to which I, for one, have listened most attentively. I wish to congratulate my leader, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), as well as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Lesage) on their eloquent pleas on behalf of northern Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the Quebec battlefields commission, about which I would like to offer a few remarks, comes under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Last year, while we were discussing these estimates, the minister asked the house to increase from $100,000 to $125,000 the annual amount which the commission uses in its operations. The house unanimously agreed to this request from the minister.

This year, according to the estimates, the same amount seems to be required. A year ago I appealed to the minister to see to it, if it were at all possible, that this $25,000 increase be used to increase the salaries of the employees of this commission, who, as far as I can see, do not receive what they possibly could earn elsewhere, in trade or industry. The minister told me he would pay particular attention to this request. Now, I would not like to be accused of narrow-mindedness, and I do wish to render unto Caesar what is Caesar's, but following that, I received other requests. It was pointed out to me among other things that one employee in particular, who had been working for the commission for 16 years, was only being paid 99 cents an hour, whereas others doing the same work were earning considerably more. I took up the matter with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It was he who spoke for me, and indirectly, for the employee in question. I am happy to tell the house that in this one case which I took up with the minister, we received full and complete satisfaction. I do want to thank the minister for doing what he had resolved to do, and I hope that other such increases may be granted during the 1955-56 fiscal year.

I am sure the minister will agree with me when I say that certain employees, whether employed on a temporary basis, for the summer season only, or on a permanent basis, are not getting salaries consistent with the work they perform. Here again I trust that the minister's sense of fair play will induce him to get for these employees the salary they deserve.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Quebec national battlefields are to undergo a certain restoration again this year. These battlefields are an historical site unequalled, I think, in North America, if not in the world. We have there a page of history which our people like to relive now and then and which other people want to see.

The Quebec national battlefields represent also a substantial source of revenue for our city. As a matter of fact, these battlefields alone constitute an industry, a tourist industry, if you like, but which is bringing us visitors from everywhere. In Quebec City, we often say, referring to tourist advertising, that they come to our city in order to see what is not to be seen anywhere else. This is very true. City people are not interested in visiting big cities. They are looking for something new, and that is what we have to offer; the Quebec national battlefields are most interesting for those who are visiting the city of Quebec.

All tourists from overseas land in Wolfe's cove—a magnificent harbour built by a Conservative government at the request of one of my distinguished predecessors, the Hon. Maurice Dupré—and head straight for the battlefields.

The hon. minister was so kind as to tell me the other day that repair work will be done on Gilmour Hill road, which leads to the battlefields, and has regrettably suffered during our hard winter.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the funds we are going to vote for this commission will be reasonably spent and, again, I hope that the hon. Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will speak to the members of the commission on behalf of the workers who are paid low salaries and obtain for them decent wages, which will enable them to face their family obligations.

Mr. Chairman, a moment ago, the Leader of the Opposition, the head of the party to which I belong, made a most interesting statement about our northern regions and more particularly about the region where one of the most important of our military camps is established, i.e., Fort Churchill. I had the privilege recently of visiting that northern establishment as well as several settlements in Manitoba. I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to thank the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney) for the chance he gave many members of the house to visit that part of our Canadian north. I would be remiss if I did not also thank the member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) who at all times did all he could to make that trip a memorable one.

Apart from the military, we met, in The Pas area, various people engaged in public life. The mayor of The Pas, the president of the board of trade, people belonging to various social organizations asked us to support their representative in the House of Commons in his requests to the government that the northern regions be given particular consideration since they hold untold riches which constitute a source of immense wealth for the entire country. We saw for ourselves the mineral resources of the area, which constitute a major asset in the development of the whole country.

I consider it a duty to acquaint the minister with the result of my observations. It would be wise to pave the way for future generations through the development of the untold riches Providence has given us.

Mr. Chairman, those were the remarks I wished to make and I hope the minister will consider them favourably. I am sure—and I stress this point—that he will champion the rights of the present employees of the national battlefields commission in order to obtain for them a noticeable increase in pay so as to enable them to face their family obligations and remain excellent and honest servants of the entire country.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) and he can be assured that I shall call the attention of the chairman and the other members of the national battlefields commission to his remarks pertaining to the wages paid to their employees.

I am glad that he had a wonderful trip to northern Manitoba, but I must point out to him that the development of mineral resources in northern Manitoba obviously comes under the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities of Manitoba. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has no jurisdiction whatever in the matter, since its authority does not go beyond the natural resources of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Now, as I pointed out to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) a few moments ago—

Mr. Fulton: What about British Columbia—

Mr. Lesage: The Northwest Territories start at latitude 60°, and Churchill is south of that latitude.

Mr. Dufresne: During my trip I learned that Churchill is at about latitude 58°. Will the hon. minister permit a question? Does the federal government not directly or indirectly subsidize the government of Manitoba with regard to the development of resources in that province?

Mr. Lesage: We have a financial agreement with the province of Manitoba. Moreover, there are gold mines that are being subsidized under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, which is administered by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the members of this group have always been particularly interested in the conservation and development of our natural resources and on that account we are very interested in the estimates of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I have read with great care the minutes of the proceedings of the committee on estimates for the period when it was dealing with the minister's department, and I found there a lot of valuable information. I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in asking questions which were answered as a result of the discussions in the committee.

The visit which the minister made to British Columbia was greatly appreciated by the persons he met. It indicated an interest on the part of the minister and a desire to see things at first hand and discuss them with his officials on the spot. I think that is to be commended. I have been asked by a number of organizations in Kootenay West to extend an invitation to the minister to visit our district and endeavour to address at least a few meetings. There are many problems in my constituency about which the people are greatly interested. I hope he will find time during the coming recess of parliament to visit the constituency and see the many things we have to show and listen to what my constituents will have to tell him. I am sure that as a result of contact with my constituents he will have even a greater understanding of the problems they face and the difficulties they encounter.

[Mr. Lesage.]

In my opinion the minister through his department holds the key to the promotion and conservation and development of our natural resources. He is in a strategic position in my opinion to give a lead by this understanding of these problems and the necessity for the proper development of our resources, finally resulting in a national policy of soil, water and forest conservation.

The minister's activities to date have clearly indicated his interest in the conservation of our natural resources and their proper development, particularly the water resources of the Columbia. I have had a number of letters from constituents who had noted with interest the minister's attention to that problem which is so important to many people in Kootenay West.

Under this first item I want to make a few suggestions to the minister which I believe come within the ambit of administration. I do not intend to speak at length. In my opinion a satisfactory development of a conservation policy in this country demands public understanding, public appreciation, public interest and public support. I think in this field of government activity knowledge on the part of the public is essential. It has come to my attention from time to time that many Canadians are unaware of the work being done by the various branches of the minister's department and the relationship of that work to the development of our natural resources and their conservation.

I suppose it would be correct to say that the national parks branch of the minister's department is the best known. A great number of Canadians know about our national parks, but even that best known branch is not known to many Canadians.

The engineering and water resources branch is doing a work of immense value but few Canadians realize the value of this work and the extent of the investigations being carried on on the Columbia and other river systems and in other places in Canada. Large-scale investigations have been going on in my constituency for some ten years but still there are many people who are uninformed as to this work and its value and place in the final development of the water resources of our area.

I have had this matter in mind for some time because I see the great need for doing something along the lines that I am about to suggest. In my opinion there is a necessity, particularly in the minister's department, for greater public relations activity so that the public may be fully informed of the work of the department and its various branches. I suggest that this could be done by means of frequent press releases to the newspapers and national magazines and through other publicity media.

It could be done also by the minister and his senior officials making occasional addresses. I would not suggest that the Minister of Finance would get a hearty welcome if he were to go around addressing farmers on taxation, as that is not a popular subject. But this is one case where I think there is an opportunity for the minister to address public bodies, because the work of this department is quite popular and I am sure people would appreciate hearing from the minister and his officials.

The northern affairs branch has greatly increased its activities in recent years. I listened with interest to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. There is a growing interest in the development of the northern parts of Canada. I do not think it is quite fair to suggest that there has been little done in the development of the north. I have been perusing the estimates for the last five or six years and, if my calculations are correct, since the hon. member for the Yukon came to this house—I see him in his seat—expenditures in the Yukon have increased about fifteenfold.

Mr. Simmons: I would remind the hon. member that the member for the Yukon looks after his constituents and takes good care of them.

Mr. Herridge: I am pleased to hear the hon. member take some credit for the great increase in expenditures in the Yukon. Other hon. members take great care of their constituents, but quite often not with such satisfactory financial results. But I do mention the fact that there has been a large increase in expenditures in the Yukon which I think indicates an increasing interest on the part of the government and the minister's department in the development of that and other northern areas.

Here again there is a great lack of understanding and knowledge with respect to northern affairs by the great majority of Canadians. I suggest that this is another opportunity for the public relations branch of the minister's department to do something to inform Canadians to a greater extent about this important part of his administration.

I have been a lumberjack for a good many years. I made my living from a combination of farming and logging. Therefore I am particularly interested in the work of the forestry branch of the minister's department. The behind-the-scenes work of the men in the forestry branch of the minister's department goes almost unrecognized by the majority of Canadians, and I have always rather resented that. It is recognized by those who are particularly concerned with what they are doing or particularly wish to follow it; that is, some of the people in the universities, some of those in the larger lumber companies, and a few other people who are particularly interested in the development of conservation policies and matters of that sort. But the work of that branch goes largely unrecognized by the majority of Canadians. The research work conducted by the forest products laboratories in Vancouver and Ottawa and the other activities of the branch are almost unknown to the Canadian people generally.

I suggest again, Mr. Chairman, that this excellent scientific work and investigation and its results should be publicized to a greater extent through the press, through national magazines and through any other media that the minister saw fit. I suggest that, if we are going to obtain an understanding of the development of our natural resources and an appreciation of what they mean to Canada at the present time and in the days to come, we have to disseminate more information. We have to get the cooperation of a much wider group of Canadians. I suggest that the minister would be well advised to keep agricultural organizations, labour organizations, women's institutes and women's national organizations informed, and also to keep all the universities informed and find some means of bringing this information to the attention of the schools across Canada. I have great faith in getting this sort of concrete, definite information regarding government policies and actions with respect to natural resources brought to the attention of the children. I believe that the question of the conservation and development of natural resources should be brought to their attention beginning just after the primary grades in the public schools of this country.

An informed public opinion will develop increasing support for larger expenditures on policies designed to conserve our natural resources. Therefore I suggest that the minister will be well advised to explore all suitable avenues through which he can properly inform the public of the important work of his department and what that work means to this country. There is no real protection for our natural resources except that protection which is based on the strength of an informed public opinion and an aroused public conscience. In that connection, I should like to bring to the minister's attention and to the attention of members of this house a most interesting article which I recently read in the May 14 issue of Saturday Night. This article was written by Mr. Roderick Haig-Brown, who has been a great advocate of conservation policies in British Columbia for many years. The minister may know this gentleman. He has been a great defender of our provincial parks, our forest resources and our natural resources against the continuing intrusion of industrialism into our province. This article is entitled "The Vanishing Parklands and Public Conscience". I am going to read only the concluding paragraph of the article, because I thought he put in excellent language and in brief form a sentiment that should be supported by all members in this house. This is what Mr. Roderick Haig-Brown has to say in concluding this article:

> But there is, ultimately, no real protection for parks except in the strength of public feeling. So long as the public turns and bows three times in the direction of the nearest stock exchange at every mention of "progress" or "industrial development", provincial legislatures can be depended upon to make mad decisions about parks,—

I should like to bring to the attention of the house, and I am very happy to say this, that the public of Kootenay West did not bow three times in front of the stock exchange at the mention of a prospective industrial development. Then he goes on to say:

> —and even the federal government will bear watching. There will be hope of a comprehensive and secure parks system in Canada the first time a labour union votes to down tools because a project threatens a park, or the first time an aroused citizenry mans a picket line in defence of a park. Sooner or later both these things will happen. But in the meantime the parks are disappearing.

He is referring to our provincial parks in British Columbia. Those remarks can apply equally well to the conservation of our natural resources in general. Therefore, because of my belief that knowledge is essential for widespread public support in defence of our natural resources, I bring these suggestions to the minister and trust he will find some ways and means of informing to a much greater extent the public of this country and the school children of this country of the value of the work of his department as a part of a national conservation policy in Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, if I had asked the minister whether he really wanted me to speak again, I doubt whether he would have said yes, but I will comfort him as far as I can by saying that I shall be very brief.

I should like to add a word to what my leader said about the development of nearly 80 years ago. I should like to say that I believe that development was easier then because life was different. People were much more self-reliant then than they are now; they had to look after themselves because they knew that nobody else would look after them. I think that the atmosphere was different then. I like often to recall—and my leader this afternoon has reminded us of it—the days of the building of the C.P.R., because it was, after all, a business epic; it was a business romance. I suggest that anyone who has not read it should look up a narrative poem by Professor Pratt, I believe, of Victoria University, called "Toward the Last Spike". There he will find courage of the highest type in two quarters. First of all among the builders of the road. I like to think of Sir William Van Horne, an office man who could walk across a chasm on a plank where the workmen would only go on their hands and knees. That is the kind of man he was. I like to think also of this house when, in answer to many doubting hearts, Sir Charles Tupper, who was being jeered at—those were the days when it was said the railroad would never pay for the axle grease—made the heroic answer, "I can bear the jeers of hon. gentlemen opposite; I await the plaudits of posterity". He awaited them and he got them.

I should like to make a slight reference to one aspect of this matter. I believe we have this on a better basis this afternoon than last night. I think that we are again realizing and believing that in this country there are plenty of men of courage and initiative, and it is in that respect that I wish to raise a question with the minister. I quite realize that the minister has other people to whom he has to pay some deference, such as a hard-hearted Minister of Finance and so on. It is not a very usual role for me to be advocating the spending of money, but I would say that there is some danger, since the minister, not because of his own temperament, I am sure, but because of an atmosphere that has been created, is not doing exactly what he himself might like. I am going to read a paragraph in which I think the word "possible" or "possibility" is terribly overstressed. I am going to suggest to the minister that the men of those days, as my leader said earlier, did not wait for things to become possible; they made them possible. It is with that in mind that I am going to read to the minister a paragraph from page 443 of the proceedings of the special committee on estimates. I know he will heartily agree with what I am saying whether he feels that this is an opportune moment to admit it or not.

Mr. Lesage: Is that page 543?

Mr. Macdonnell: No, page 443. I am not reading from the report; I am reading from the evidence:

Mr. Thatcher: But you could have an over-all policy.

Hon. Mr. Lesage: We have an over-all policy. I believe I have mentioned it, but you have to be sure before you spend thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to build roads to one given spot that there is going to be some mining production there.

Nobody can complain about that. It is the whole atmosphere of the thing that rather gets me down. I read on:

. . . for instance, we are presently studying, we have surveyed last year at a cost of about $50,000 the possibility of building a road between Carmacks on the Yukon river and Ross River Crossing—

And so on. He continues:

We have surveyed the possibility of opening up a road there because there have been some surveys, geological surveys, and some prospecting that has shown that there are possibilities of development.

We are going to get from the owners of the companies who are prospecting there definite word about the possibilities of the area, and also from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys in about a year or so, then we will come to a decision on the economic opportunity of building this road.

All I want to say, Mr. Chairman, is that the atmosphere of that is not right. That is not the atmosphere in which the Canadian Pacific Railway was built. That is not the atmosphere in which this country was developed. I will just say to the minister that if he could make a raid on some of the other departments, I could offer him some useful suggestions as to where he could make those raids. For instance, I would suggest that those large amounts which are spent in publicity could be much better spent in turning some of these possibilities into actualities. I told the minister that I would be brief, but I still feel that the atmosphere that was referred to in the speech of my leader in which he sought to recapture the atmosphere of the pioneer days of this country is what we need again. I do not doubt for a minute that the minister has it himself. I think all he has to do is to make it possible.

Mr. Hahn: I do not desire to go any further into the problems of the north but rather to go back to the banana belt of Canada, namely the southern part of British Columbia. Yesterday I asked the minister about the possibility of making a national park in the Point Roberts area, in the location of the monument in that area, more particularly in view of the fact that the United States government is apparently going to put a national park on their side of the monument. I want to be very brief. I only want some assurance that he and the departmental representatives will examine into what the Americans are doing with respect to determining whether or not a park will be made; that is, that the possibilities of building a park will be looked into. We in that area feel that we should just like to have that assurance. Possibly the minister could give it at this time.

Mr. Lesage: I will look into the matter with the greatest pleasure and I will write to the hon. member.

Mr. Hahn: Thank you.

Mr. Simmons: While we are on this item, I should like to say that I was interested last evening in the remarks made by my friend the hon. member for York West who has visited both the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. He said that before one can see the development of our northwest on the scale to which it is destined, it will be necessary for all to see those far-flung areas. I agree with him. He also said that only in that way can we realize the great potential that lies before us in this country's development. I most certainly agree with him that the true development of the north can take place only with a sincere and real attempt to provide adequate transportation and communications for those areas and that it is not possible to provide expanding transportation services on the basis of a policy which provides some type of monopoly. The government should most certainly follow, as quickly as possible, a policy of free enterprise in connection with our northern transportation problems.

A good illustration of this is the intolerable position in which the Northern Transportation Company, a crown corporation, is placing private water carrier companies who are their competitors along the Mackenzie river. The Northern Transportation Company have now reduced their rates into the Northwest Territories, something which should have been done many years ago. The reason given for this reduction, I understand, was the increased tonnage of freight and the increased efficiency of handling. On breaking down these rate reductions, I find that the only points that have been reduced are those at which the Northern Transportation Company is in competition—

Mr. Lesage: May I be pardoned for interrupting but I must point out that the Northern Transportation Company is a crown corporation which reports to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It seems to me that I should not be starting at this point on a detailed examination of the rates from one point to another or any such thing. I have no jurisdiction over the Northern Transportation Company.

Mr. Simmons: This is something that has a great deal to do with the cost of living in the territories, Mr. Minister, and I am only going to take a minute or two on it. As I said, on breaking down these rate reductions—

Mr. Lesage: They do not operate in the Yukon.

Mr. Simmons: They operate on the Mackenzie river. I find that the only points at which they have reduced the rates are those at which the Northern Transportation Company is in competition with the Yellowknife Transportation Company and the Hudson's Bay Company. At no other points are the rates reduced.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, no. I just must come in again because this is not correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Simmons: I find that the rate reduction as put in effect starts at Fort Providence and goes down the Mackenzie river—

Mr. Lesage: Starts where?

Mr. Simmons: Starts at Fort Providence.

Mr. Lesage: No. It does not start there. It applies to lake Athabasca.

Mr. Simmons: That is where it starts, according to the figures I have here. The reductions in rates that have been put into effect by the Northern Transportation Company are not for the benefit of the general public of the Northwest Territories but purely for the purpose of trying to cripple competitive carriers.

Mr. Lesage: I just cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged. Of course the reductions that have been agreed to by the Northern Transportation Company lately are for the advantage of the people of the Northwest Territories. They were granted after we had asked the Northern Transportation Company and also their competitors to see whether they could not reduce their rates. The reductions by Northern Transportation Company have been granted on a much larger scale than that mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Simmons: I do not think it is much larger, Mr. Chairman. I have the reductions in rates right here. If any hon. member would like to see them, he is certainly at liberty to do so.

Mr. Lesage: I am sure that the hon. member will see from his list—if the list is correct—that these reductions apply to lake Athabasca.

Mr. Simmons: They apply from Waterways to Fort Providence, Fort Simpson, Fort Wrigley, Fort Norman, Norman Wells, Fort Good Hope, Arctic Red River, Fort McPherson, Aklavik, Reindeer station, Tuktoyaktuk, Yellowknife, Bushell and Gunnar Dock.

Mr. Lesage: Where is Bushell? Where is Gunnar Dock? They are on lake Athabasca.

Mr. Simmons: They are on lake Athabasca.

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Simmons: The last two are on lake Athabasca.

Mr. Lesage: Yellowknife Transportation Company is not a competitor of Northern Transportation Company on lake Athabasca; not that I know of.

Mr. Simmons: No; but they are at other points.

Mr. Lesage: Oh, yes.

Mr. Hardie: As a member of the estimates committee I had the opportunity, as did other members, to discuss the estimates of this department in detail and anything that I have to say would be repeating what I have said on other occasions and what others have said on other occasions. As I have said before, I feel that the development of the north is primarily dependent on transportation, whether it be by water, land or air. I think the minister told the committee that the department had studied the problem of transportation particularly with regard to the construction of a railroad from Grimshaw, Alberta, to Pine Point. But as I understood him today, the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, which controls the large lead-zinc deposit at Pine Point, has not submitted definite plans with respect to how or when they intend to develop this property. Is that not true?

Mr. Lesage: Is that a question?

Mr. Hardie: Yes.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, that is true. I have not had any communication lately from the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company about their plans for the development of the ore body at Pine Point.

Mr. Hardie: I am confident when the company does announce its intention of going ahead with the development at Pine Point the government will have the unanimous support of members on both sides of the house when it asks for an expenditure to build a railroad from Grimshaw to Pine Point. Anything I could say now about the vast potential of the north I have already said time and again. However, I should like to concur in the tribute paid yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary North to the officials of the northern affairs branch who appeared before the committee. I should also like to add an additional tribute to all members of the estimates committee because in my opinion, and I think the hon. member for the Yukon will agree with me, it is very gratifying to know that members of all parties in the house are becoming conscious of the great potential of the north and favour greater government expenditures for the development of that area. It must also be gratifying to the minister to know that he has the support of all sections of the house. I feel he will now receive a very sympathetic hearing from his colleagues on the treasury benches when, I hope, he presents to them greatly increased expenditures for the years to come.

Mr. Harkness: Just before the first item carries, may I say that there has been quite a bit of talk about transportation in the north and therefore I think this is perhaps the best time for me to ask the minister one or two questions. I noted he said yesterday that water rates and air rates to the north had been reduced by 20 per cent in both cases, I understand.

Mr. Lesage: It varies.

Mr. Harkness: I thought the minister said 20 per cent, but I now understand it varies.

Mr. Lesage: It is roughly 20 per cent.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether the minister can tell us what the water and air rates are per pound at the present time to a few points in the north. Let us take Fort Smith, Hay River, Yellowknife, Fort Norman and Aklavik.

Mr. Lesage: Would the hon. member mind if I tried to obtain that information for eight o'clock tonight? Even if we have passed to another item, I can table the figures.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps the minister will have that by the time we reach the northern administration and lands branch.

Mr. Lesage: Maybe I will have it. In any event, my officials are in the gallery listening to us and I ask them through you, Mr. Chairman, to get that information.

Item agreed to.

National parks branch—

295. Branch administration, $86,425.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, having listened to statements as to the amount of money being spent in the north, may I say that the minister should be congratulated on getting that amount of money from the treasury board, but I am envious because there are so many places in my constituency still undeveloped where that money could be spent which the minister passes by on his way north. However, I do not begrudge the money spent on this development. I feel quite sure that when we are able to transport power longer distances and at greater voltages the northern part of my constituency will come into its own because we have there the Nelson river, Grand rapids and other places that are future power sites. I have no intention of making a speech but I want to ask the minister a few questions.

One matter about which I am approached both at home and by letter concerns what is going to happen to Lower Fort Garry. Is the federal department going to hand it over to the provincial government to run or is it going to remain on the same basis? Lower Fort Garry is associated with the Selkirk settlers and the people who made the Red river valley famous. I do not need to recall the history of those hardy pioneers. Some of their descendants are still there and they are anxious to know what is going to happen to Lower Fort Garry. I understand it is now rented to a company.

Mr. Lesage: A club.

Mr. Bryce: A golf club. That is all right if that is what the department wants to do, but I understand it has only been rented for a year at a time. Personally I would not like to rent a house or a farm a year at a time because people do not take any interest in properties if they only have the use of them for a year. If it is going to be handed over to the provincial government so that it can become a place where the people of Winnipeg can go on a Saturday afternoon that will be ideal. There could be a nice tearoom there and I am sure there would be many visitors. But if the department decides against that and is going to rent it to a country club or golf club, then I think the department should at least give them a three-year lease so that the place will not deteriorate. This landmark is very important to the people of Selkirk, the descendants of the pioneers in the Red river valley. I should like the minister to tell me something about that. I may be out of place in drawing to the minister's attention the fact that there is still a lot of federal and provincial crown land north of the interlake country that would be suitable for a park and would not require the expenditure of very much money. The land belongs to the provincial and dominion governments now and could be set aside for future development. Everybody agrees that Canada is growing by leaps and bounds, and while we have Riding Mountain park we should be making provision for another park in the interlake country or north of the interlake country.

Mr. Lesage: I am very pleased to answer the queries of the hon. member for Selkirk. Lower Fort Garry has been rented for a number of years to the Motor Country Club of Winnipeg. When I went to Winnipeg last year on my trip west and north with my deputy minister we stopped at Lower Fort Garry and had conversations with the executive officers of the Motor Country Club. We also discussed the matter with the provincial member of the historic sites and monuments board. After we came back to Ottawa we had correspondence with ministers of the provincial government. After consulting all these people we came to the conclusion, which was in accord with their advice, that we should continue to rent the premises to the Motor Country Club but that the lease should include a condition which did not exist previously to the effect that the public should be admitted to the grounds and to the buildings. This has been agreed to now, and this morning I signed a submission to council to be authorized to sign a five-year lease with the Motor Country Club. This lease will contain conditions which will facilitate the general public in visiting the fort, the surrounding grounds and buildings including the main building on request.

Moreover, this year the department is going to spend $12,639 to make alterations to what is called the fur storage building on the fort premises. I believe I can assure the hon. member, through you, Mr. Chairman, that everything is being done to keep that fort in the best possible condition. One of the conditions of the lease is that the Motor Country Club shall maintain the main building and grounds. They are in a beautiful state from what I could see last year. It seems to me that this great historic place will be preserved to be seen by the general public of Manitoba and all visitors to that wonderful province.

Mr. Bryce: I want to thank the minister for his reply. Needless to say he understands my main concern that the common people of Manitoba will have every opportunity to visit that historic spot.

Mr. Lesage: That is the condition that we have attached to the new lease. We consented to the lease under that specific condition, that the people could go into that fort every day of the week.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. McIvor: I was going to ask a question on this.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River.

[Mr. Bryce.]

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am not going to take too much time on this occasion. One of my main concerns so far as national parks are concerned has to do with Banff national park and the inauguration of the dollar-a-day hospitalization plan. This subject has been debated at some length, and I believe the minister is now familiar with all the aspects of it. I am sure he is going to give the matter every consideration. He is in touch now with the provincial authorities and the people of Banff. I feel quite sure that before very long we are going to have the dollar-a-day hospitalization plan out there, so I am not going to dwell on that.

There are one or two other points, possibly minor, yet they do have some concern for the people of Banff, to which I want to refer. Banff, as you know, Mr. Chairman, and I think the minister will agree without any question whatever, is the outstanding summer tourist resort in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): There is no question about it. There are more visitors to Banff national park from all parts of this country and the United States than any other tourist attraction in Canada. Certainly, Banff does not take second place in its magnificence to any spot in Canada or the United States. I have visited nearly all the national parks in the United States, and I say that without fear of contradiction.

This brings me to my point, Mr. Chairman. The other day I saw an article in the newspaper, and I want to read it to you. It pertains to our Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I know the minister will say immediately that that is not his department, but it is so far as it affects Banff, and that is what I am concerned about. Let me read it to you, Mr. Chairman. This article appeared in the Ottawa Journal of May 6, 1955. The heading is, "Only in Ottawa may you see R.C.M.P. in scarlet". It reads:

> A press release by the city tourist and information bureau pointing out that Canada's "Mounties" are to be seen regularly in their scarlet dress uniforms only in Ottawa has been reprinted by dozens of American newspapers, Gerald Geldert, bureau director, reported today.
> He felt this would bring U.S. tourists to Ottawa. In other Canadian cities the R.C.M.P. wears dress uniform only on special occasions.

May I repeat one sentence to you?

> He felt this would bring U.S. tourists to Ottawa.

This morning I took the trouble of communicating with the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. to find out whether or not that statement was true. I was well aware that it was not before I communicated with him, but I am informed by his officials that it is not true. I wanted to make sure. I am informed by the officials concerned that you will find the R.C.M.P. in their red serge uniforms just as often in Banff as you do in Ottawa. When we have the tourist bureau in this city trying to create discrimination of that sort against some of our outstanding tourist resorts, I think the city of Ottawa should be a little more careful that they are correct in the information they give.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to turn to one or two other important facts concerning Banff. In Banff there has been some question as to whether or not the new post office building, which is being erected, should provide office space for the Banff advisory council. As the minister knows so well, this advisory council is the elected body in Banff which acts as a sort of liaison officer between the people, the superintendent of parks and the department here in Ottawa. The council has no office space, and they have no money. It would seem to me that perhaps the minister could intercede with the Minister of Public Works to see if it is not possible to have the Banff advisory council accommodated in one small room. On one occasion I saw the Minister of Public Works, but I did not have very great success, so I hope the minister has more success.

I want to go on to another point which is causing some concern in Banff, and that is the change in rates which is being applied to licence fees. I have indicated to the minister that generally speaking, where increases have been carried out this year, there is not too much room for complaint. There are some points, however, to which the minister's attention should be drawn. I have not bothered referring these to him, but I want to draw one or two instances to his attention. First of all, I think it is unreasonable to suppose or expect that we should be able or even try to increase the licence fees in any national park in Canada, and particularly in Banff, with the thought in mind that the citizens of those areas should be expected to assist materially in the upkeep of the park. Now, that would be ridiculous in the extreme because there are only about 2,500 or 3,000 citizens living in Banff. While they contribute to the upkeep, they contribute also to the accommodation and well-being of the tourists who go there. They could not be expected to contribute to any great extent to the upkeep of the parks generally.

Having that in mind, Mr. Chairman, the advisory council has drawn to my attention one or two instances where the increase in the licence fees seems to be out of line with the ordinary increases in other parts of the province. I want to refer to one particular instance:

> Rooms. Rental of two rooms or less in private house, with or without meals, each room $2.

In this instance there has been an increase of 100 per cent. Previously we were charging $1 for the season or for the year. This year it has been increased to $2. I am conscious of the fact that it is an increase of $1. That may not sound so much as a 100 per cent increase, but the fact is, Mr. Chairman, the people who are renting rooms in their homes are rendering a service to the tourists who come there.

Mr. Lesage: It is only $2 a year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, that is right.

Mr. Lesage: Well—

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): When you put it that way—and I put it that way before the minister did—it does not sound like a tremendous increase, but it is in fact an increase of 100 per cent. That sounds better from my point of view.

Mr. Lesage: Yes. If you were speaking of a reduction in federal taxes, you would talk in a different way.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The people who rent those rooms are doing it as a service to tourists who come to Banff. Last year I pointed out that many hundreds of people who come to Banff as tourists have to sleep in the station or in places other than cabins, motels and rooms. In order to visit there at all they must sleep in those places or they cannot come. The people of Banff have gone out of their way to make their homes available. I do not think we should penalize them by doubling the licence fee. It may be only $1, but some people are very sensitive in that regard. I have had people write to me since the increase was made, and they have told me they are not going to rent their rooms if they have to pay an increased licence fee. Of course they could do it, nevertheless it is an inconvenience to have strangers in your home. The minister himself says it is only $1. He would be well advised to cut it out and leave it at the original fee of $1.

The other matter I wish to deal with has to do with rooming houses. I read from the item:

> Containing more than 2 rooms for rent but no meals served, each room, $2.

It used to be $1; it has been raised to $2. The advisory board which represents the people of Banff think it should be left at $1 for the very reason I have already pointed out. The people who rent rooms in their private residences do so in a spirit of co-operation. It is true they get paid for it. I am not minimizing that for a moment, but it is an inconvenience. I know of people in Banff who have their families sleeping in the kitchens and the dining rooms in order to make their bedrooms available to tourists. If that were not done those tourists would have no place to sleep. They would have to sleep in the railway station or in the bus station or some place else. The people are willing and anxious to make their homes available.

Mr. Ferguson: He has me in tears over that $2 a year. He will have to stop.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): If the hon. member who just interjected that remark went to Banff expecting to have a pleasant holiday and do some fishing, and found himself sleeping on a chair in the station it would bring him to tears.

Mr. Ferguson: I would not go if I had to sleep in the station. I am not going to go without three meals a day, nor am I going to sleep in a station.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is what I am trying to point out. If the tourists of Canada and the United States know that when they come to Banff they will have to sleep in the railway station, they will not come. Therefore the people of Banff, out of the generosity of their hearts, have made their rooms available. And because they have done so the government doubles the fee.

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, $2 a year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is not very good recognition of the service rendered. That is one of the things I am concerned about.

There is another aspect that I wish to bring to the minister's attention. I refer to motels. I am not thinking of the increase in rates, though there has been an increase in motel rates. I know quite well that most motels in Canada, and particularly in Banff, are making pretty good money. Therefore I am not so concerned about those who have raised their rates by $1, $2, $3, or $4. What I want to bring to the minister's attention is this. It is a matter of principle.

There are people in Banff and in other national parks of Canada who wish to start motels, and applications have been made to the department for permits. The policy of the government has been along this line. Unless a motel can be constructed that will be an asset to the national park, a permit should not be granted. I would go so far as to agree with that. We should not have a motel constructed in any national park that will be a disgrace to that park. However, it should not be necessary for the prospective owner of a motel in Banff, or in any other national park, to put up $100,000, $150,000 or $200,000 before a permit is granted.

I say to the minister that some of the best motels we have in Banff, such as Brewster's and Becker's—and there are others—started out with one or two camps. They never had $150,000 or $100,000 when they started. They have built up the business. Some of these motels now are just as modern as any to be found anywhere in the country, and they are an asset to the town of Banff and to the national park. But the point is that they started at the bottom and built worth-while additions to their motels.

It seems to me that is the only fair and proper way to operate. We should not establish the principle that we are not going to grant permits for the construction of motels in the national parks unless people can put up $100,000, $150,000 or $200,000. If we grant permits it would be perfectly in order to say, "We are not going to allow you to build any shack in Banff national park. If you want to put up a small unit to accommodate two persons or four persons, that will be all right. You put it up, and you comply with the regulations, and it has to be an asset to the national park." That would be proper, and I would back it 100 per cent. It might take only $15,000 the first year, and the next year they might be able to add to it. In a matter of four or five years they could have a motel that would be capable of accommodating 40 to 50 persons. It would be a real asset to the park, and the people would make some money out of it.

That would be the principle to establish to assist in that type of construction. In Banff, and I suppose in most of the other national parks, we need more motel accommodation; we need more cabin accommodation to take care of the ever-increasing numbers who come as tourists to visit those outstanding spots. I hope the minister will give this consideration.

I could discuss other things, but as I told the committee on another occasion I do not intend to carry on the debate at any great length. I thought I should bring these particular things to the minister's attention, because they have been brought to mine by the advisory council in Banff. Since the minister has been so considerate in other matters, I hope he will go a little further and cut down some of these licence fees that have been at $1; and when he comes to Banff again and visits some of these outlying places, he may be able to get some good fish.

Mr. Byrne: I note the minister has with him the very capable director of national parks. It is for that reason I wish to take a few moments to bring some matters to his attention at this time.

First I want to say that perhaps the hon. member for Bow River may be a little too enthusiastic when he describes the wonders of Banff national park, because he should remember that bordering on Banff national park are the Kootenay national park and the Yoho national park. When the trans-Canada highway is completed through the Yoho national park, undoubtedly streams of tourists will enter that park, because that area contains scenery which cannot be equalled anywhere else in Canada or on the North American continent.

At one time the mounted police stationed in Yoho and Kootenay national parks wore their scarlet tunics quite frequently, but it was found that those tunics actually were drab compared with the general scenery in and about those parks, so now they wear them only on special occasions.

The matter in which I am particularly interested at this time is the hours of work for employees in the national parks. I have discussed this matter with the minister and the officials of the department, and they feel that because it is national policy nothing can be done to bring parks employees in line with working conditions established in British Columbia. I am referring specifically to the employees in the Kootenay and Yoho national parks.

At the present time we are dealing with an amendment to the compensation act which will provide for the payment of compensation to all civil servants on the basis of regulations existing in the province in which they are usually employed. I think we should go a step further and provide that federal employees should be entitled to the other amenities provided by legislation of the province in which they are employed. In British Columbia the 44-hour week is law, but for the most part employees of the provincial government and certainly of industry are working a 40-hour week. The employees in the national parks should be on a similar basis, and not be treated as second-class citizens.

I realize that there are difficulties in the way of instituting a 40-hour week because it is necessary that certain services be provided on Saturday and Sunday; but I have faced this argument from time to time in negotiations with industry, and a way has always been found to work out schedules providing for the 40-hour week or whatever it may be.

I note that the civil service association in Ottawa are asking that the hours of work of the civil servants be reduced from 38 to 36½ hours a week. If they feel they are entitled to a 36½-hour week, all well and good; but I submit that other civil servants should be granted the amenities that prevail in the areas in which they are employed. I hope the minister will consider this request seriously.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Chairman, I have just one or two observations to make in connection with the accommodation at Prince Albert national park. My understanding of the purpose of our national park system is that facilities are made available to Canadians as a whole. I submit that everything should be done to make it possible for Canadians, irrespective of income to visit our parks.

Complaints have been brought to my attention in connection with the accommodation at Prince Albert national park. I understand that shack tents in the park are not to be made available to other than the owners. The situation is that many wage earners can get only two or three weeks' holidays in the summer, and they find themselves in the position when they open a shack tent that they are not permitted to make it available to relatives or friends. Will the minister advise me if that statement is correct.

Mr. Lesage: No. May I say right now that they can make it available to their friends at any time provided it is free, but what they cannot do is to rent a shack tent to different people every week or two weeks.

Mr. Ellis: I understand that is the regulation. I realize also that there was a time when a number of shack tents were owned by one individual, but that situation has not existed for some time. One of my constituents informs me that after his shack tent was opened up he made it available to one of his neighbours, and he then received a letter from the superintendent of the park suggesting that he was renting it. I submit that any person owning a shack tent in the park should be permitted to make it available to friends without any suggestion of renting it. There have been complaints brought to my attention of persons owning shack tents in the park and making them available to friends being told that they were renting them.

Mr. Lesage: Being asked if they were renting them.

Mr. Ellis: The suggestion was made that they were renting them when in fact they were simply lending or making the shack tent available to friends.

Mr. Lesage: How much?

Mr. Ellis: I should like to have the assurance of the minister that the owners of shack tents in Prince Albert national park will be able to make those available to their relatives or friends without the inference being made that they are renting them. It is not a question of running a business, or putting ads in the paper that shack tents are available for rent.

I repeat that many of these people are wage earners who get only two or three weeks' holiday. It costs a good deal to set up a shack tent at the start of the season, and I see no reason why it should have to remain idle for most of the season. I cannot understand why these people should not be permitted to rent them. However, the instance I am citing is that of a person who was not renting it, but the claim was made that he was doing so simply because other people were living in it.

I suggest to the minister that when a person wants to make an arrangement on his own responsibility with another party and make his shack tent available, he should be permitted to do so. It is an expensive proposition for a wage earner on a low income to maintain facilities of that kind in the park, and anything that can lighten that load should be done.

The facilities of the national parks should be made available to persons on low incomes. There are many people who are not in a position to go into the parks and pay the rates asked for accommodation. I ask the minister to consider making it possible for the owner of a shack tent to make a private arrangement with regard to the use of that tent in the national park. After all, he would not be indulging in the real estate business or anything like that.

Mr. Ferguson: Surely to goodness Canada has not reached the stage that the people have to live in shacks. I have not been in that park, but have we sunk so low that we have to designate buildings for people to live in, irrespective of their financial standing, as shack tents. There is a plea that they should be rented for nothing, because someone wants to go into a venture building shacks. Let us get away from that. Stop building shacks in Canada. Let us get down to earth. If we cannot do better than that there is something wrong. We have listened to an appeal for 30 minutes—at a cost to the country of about $1,500 an hour—that people may continue to live in shacks. How nonsensical to make such an appeal, that Canadians may start living in shacks. What a ridiculous appeal.

Mr. Studer: That is socialism.

An hon. Member: Don't be asinine.

Mr. Ferguson: If that is asinine, I would sooner be asinine than make your appeal.

Mr. Barnett: Recent remarks by the hon. member for Bow River have prompted me to participate briefly in this debate. As you will recall, the hon. member was at some pains to set the record straight. I thought perhaps I might follow his good example for a few moments. The hon. member went into considerable detail as to the glories of Banff national park. While I would not argue with him seriously in regard to his claim that it is an outstanding tourist attraction, nevertheless I would remind him that there is a park somewhat to the north of that, known as Jasper national park, which has within its borders, or close to them, the highest peak in the Canadian Rockies. I am referring to mount Robson. Considerable publicity comes to the Jasper park region because of the fact that we have there, as I say, the highest peak in the Canadian Rockies.

Coming to this matter of putting the record straight, Mr. Chairman, I felt that I should like to remind hon. members who come from these flat lands of the east that after all they should not allow the Canadian Rockies to so overawe them that they overlook the fact that in reality the Canadian Rockies are merely the foothills of our mighty Coast range of mountains in British Columbia. Some indication that this is the prevailing attitude in the east is found in an article that I recall noticing about a year ago in the Toronto Star Weekly, which went to considerable pains to describe mount Robson, referring to it as the highest mountain in Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether you observed that article, but I am quite sure you will agree with me that that was not a correct statement of fact, and that it is something which perhaps could be put straight in the minds of those who dwell in the more easterly parts of Canada.

As you are undoubtedly well aware, within the present boundaries of the constituency of Comox-Alberni, in a part of our country which, I believe, at one time was within the constituency which you represent, Mr. Chairman, does lie the highest mountain in Canada, namely mighty mount Waddington, at the head of Knight inlet in the Klinaklini river area, the only mountain as far as I know which rises above 13,000 feet.

I felt that I should like to put the record straight, and in view of the discussion that has taken place about the biggest and best national parks in Canada, draw to the attention of the minister that when he is looking around for bigger and better national parks in Canada, there in the western part of British Columbia does in fact lie Canada's mightiest mountain, rising to something over 13,200 feet.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, whilst some hon. members may have been a little jealous about the attractions of Banff as a national park, there is really no doubt in anybody's mind that Banff is the greatest tourist attraction in Canada today. However, many of the people who come to Banff are very much disappointed at the very poor fishing they find. They read the "Anglers' Guide" and are told that some of the lakes and streams are teeming with fish. Then after having fished there for a week and having caught one fish, or none at all, they begin to wonder where these teeming lakes are.

I was very much interested in an article that appeared in the "Voice of Motordom" the official organ of the A.M.A., by Fred Turnbull, president of the Edmonton trout fishing club. I should like to quote briefly from that article. He was first of all referring to the great improvement in fishing in the province of Alberta as a result of the recent conservation program. Then he had this to say:

> What has been the effect of this great local improvement on the tourist influx to our national parks? We all like to go to the mountains to fish and at the same time enjoy the wonderful scenery, but place before the fisherman two choices, one, to visit the national park and to enjoy the scenery but along with that obtain only mediocre fishing, and on the other hand drive out 30 miles or so from the city after lunch and return home with an excellent catch of trout up to four pounds in weight. It is left to the reader to say which choice the fisherman will take.
> There is no doubt that those responsible for the very mediocre fishing in our national parks are beginning to realize that the tourist expects something more than pictures of used fish displayed in travel and sporting magazines with the caption "Come to Canada and get the big ones". What does the average tourist fisherman expect? It is generally conceded that the average fisherman is satisfied with a reasonable catch of say four or five trout about a half a pound to two pounds each with the occasional big one as an added incentive. He wants these fish in lakes and streams fairly close to the highway, not so far away that he has to hire an expensive outfit to reach them.

I have heard many reasons for the poor fishing in the national parks in the Rockies.

The Deputy Chairman: Before the hon. member develops his argument, now that he has read his extract I must draw the attention of the committee to the fact that it is five o'clock, and we must proceed to the consideration of public and private bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There being several divorce bills on the order paper, is it agreed that they all be taken in the one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak a few moments in support of Bill No. 22, which was introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and on which debate was continued last Tuesday. I should like to make one or two rather critical remarks about the speech delivered by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) on Tuesday, May 3, when he spoke on this bill. It seemed to me that the hon. member indulged in about 40 minutes of mental gymnastics in an effort to defend and justify the government's position in opposing the recommendations contained in this bill. Following that speech, another 20 minutes spent by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer)—

Mr. Studer: Twelve minutes.

Mr. Bryson: It sounded like 20 minutes. As I say, another 20 minutes were spent by him in another kind of gymnastics.

The hon. member for Provencher suggested that the government is not ignoring the wishes of the western farm organizations in not implementing the principle laid down in this bill, namely that every farmer should have the right to deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice. I should like to recall that the hon. member was chairman of the standing committee on agriculture last year when this question was dealt with at great length. Certainly he can hear as well as anyone else, and certainly he heard that the Saskatchewan pool spoke favourably of this proposition. Likewise support was given to it by the interprovincial farm union council.

Since then, as was indicated on Tuesday last by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the three western pools have shown support for the bill, as well as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Certainly the Saskatchewan wheat pool have only recently indicated that, because of the unfairness of box car allocations, they lost what they consider to be $750,000, because they feel the government has ignored their wishes as well as those of other farm organizations in this respect.

I do not intend to deal with the car order book. That matter was dealt with thoroughly by both the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Provencher. The hon. member for Provencher feels that the car order book will not work either in times of congestion or in times of non-congestion.

Mr. Jutras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Ever since the hon. member started to speak he has been attributing to me words which I did not use and drawing inferences that could not be drawn from the context of my speech. I suggest that the hon. member make his own speech.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite).]

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question? May I ask what authority his party has, or what authority he has, to bring this bill before the House of Commons when no farm organization asked them to do so? Perhaps his political organization did, but certainly no farm organization.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Speaker, I should just like to tell the hon. member that we are not obliged to have authority from anybody to bring anything before this House of Commons. We accept responsibility for what we do in this house. Let us not hear any more of this nonsense.

In answer to the hon. member for Provencher may I say this. In Hansard it is recorded what was said. I read Hansard, and possibly my interpretation is not what he meant. This is the way I read it. At page 3414 we find these words:

> I did say that I doubted very much whether you could make the car order book function in a condition of congestion such as we have at the moment.

That is one thing. He does not believe the car order book would work in times of congestion. Then further down on the page we find this:

> . . . but personally I think the time has probably come when it should be suspended, because it cannot be made to work efficiently and equitably in a condition of acute shortage such as we have at the moment.

That is my interpretation of it. If that is not what he meant, he is at liberty to make his own statement.

Mr. Jutras: The hon. member said I made the statement that I believed the car order book could not function even in a period of non-congestion. I never said that, and that is certainly not what I said in the last statement quoted.

Mr. Bryson: That is a technical point. However, that is the way I read it. Anyway, I do not think it is worth while to argue about whether the car order book is or is not going to do a job. As a matter of fact the car order book can be suspended—as it has been suspended—at the pleasure of the transport controller.

I know the excuse that was made. The excuse was that the car order book had to be suspended in order that the wheat board could fill certain commitments for grain according to grade. But I should like to remind the house that there are over 5,350 grain elevators in the three western provinces.

When the car order book was suspended for the reasons I have outlined, only 200 points were using the car order book, as nearly as I can ascertain. I could not find out in the committee last year, but from the best estimates I can get only 200 of those points were using the car order book. Under those conditions I contend that it is an extremely flimsy argument to say you have to suspend the car order book because, out of over 5,350 elevators, 200 were using the car order book.

The argument that if you sign in your permit book that you are going to deliver your grain to any one elevator, that fact binds you unconditionally and irrevocably to making delivery to that elevator, is nothing but sheer nonsense.

Mr. Studer: Then why sign?

Mr. Bryson: Let those people haul where they want to haul their grain. If you have any quarrel with an elevator man you are free to go elsewhere, as you are now, and take your chances.

Mr. Studer: Then why sign?

Mr. Bryson: Let us not penalize the people who want the right to haul where they wish. I say that argument does not hold water. I think possibly there are a great many people who question the proposition of being able to haul their grain here or there, where there is a difference. The other day in this house an hon. member said he would not want to bind himself unconditionally to any one line elevator company at the present time.

I just cannot see any point in that argument. As far as I am concerned every line elevator in western Canada is exactly the same. You will get just as good a deal from the line elevator companies, as far as grade, dockage and weight are concerned, as you will from the pool elevators. They are good. They have to be good because of the fact that the pool elevators are handling a great quantity of the farmers' grain. That has not always been the history of the line elevator companies, and therein lies the crux of the whole situation.

Too many of us remember what happened before the pool elevator system started to handle a great deal of the farmers' grain. You would go to the line elevator, and you had to take No. 4 grade for No. 2 wheat. It was a case of take it or leave it. You were overdocked, underweighed and undergraded. These were the conditions that made the farmers decide to shift for themselves and form the pool elevator system, in order to get away from the discrimination that was being practised.

I say that is the crux of the whole situation. With the formation of the pool elevator system of grain handling those practices came to an end. You will get just as good a deal now from the line elevator companies as you will from the pools. You will continue to get that kind of deal just as long as the pool elevators are in business. But just as soon as the pools go out of business you are going to get the same kind of deal you got before they came into existence.

The line companies are trying to woo customers from the pools by promises of a better deal. Their efforts in this direction are being aided by the government, when pool members are not afforded the opportunity of delivering grain to their own elevators, which they themselves built in order that they might participate in the savings made through handling their own grain, amounting to millions of dollars annually. That is what we object to. It is often said that one picture is worth a thousand words. Sometimes a story is equally useful for the purpose of emphasizing a point. I am not going to say any more on the subject, but I should like to tell a little story to emphasize the point I am trying to make.

The present efforts of the line companies, abetted by the government, to restore their monopoly position so far as the grain trade is concerned, are reminiscent of a story I heard many years ago about an old farmer who had nieces and nephews. They placed a herd of cattle in the old farmer's care in trust, and he was to look after the cattle for them. Bands of marauding wolves throughout the countryside were taking a heavy toll of the herd so the old farmer, true to his trust, built a stout corral and hired range riders who guarded the herd by day. Oh, once in a while a wily wolf crashed the corral at night and grabbed a calf, but the system worked pretty well. All the wolves could do was stay out in the hills, hold indignation meetings and wonder what they could do about it.

Mr. Studer: They must have been socialists.

Mr. Bryson: The nieces and nephews, like a great many people, fell prey to propaganda. As a result they went to the old farmer and said they thought they should be getting a greater return from the herd. Under pressure the old farmer hired another manager, with specific instructions to cut down on the costs. The operation had to be made more efficient. The new manager thought about the matter for a long time and came up with an idea. He reasoned that wolves, because of their long experience and wide knowledge, knew more about cattle than anybody else. So he summoned the wolves to a big conference, and they really co-operated. Hearings were held and committees appointed, all at the expense of the old farmer, of course.

Finally all the wolves were unanimous in their opinion. They said tear down the corral, it is unproductive; fire all the range riders, they are nothing but arbitrary bureaucrats. When all the reports had been made the old farmer questioned the new manager as to whether or not this was the right thing to do. The manager said it must be right, because the committees he had set up knew more about cattle than anybody else.

It is the same with those who speak against the measure before us today. Why should they not accede to the wishes and advice of the line elevator companies? After all, they have had 50 years' experience, and they certainly know more about the grain business than the farmers themselves.

Regardless of the outcome of the vote, which may be taken today, we are going to continue to fight for this fundamental principle, so that the farmers may be able to deliver their grain to elevators of their own choosing.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this bill represents the third attempt by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) to have legislation of this type enacted. As Bill No. 186 it was introduced into the previous parliament on February 23, 1953. Subsequently as Bill No. 3 it was introduced on November 16, 1953, at the first session of this parliament. It was defeated on January 15, 1954, by 111 votes to 29.

The hon. member persists in spite of the adverse opinion which this house has already recorded on his proposal. He persists in spite of the fact that his plan is completely unworkable, as he could have ascertained by application to any company operating elevators in western Canada. He persists in spite of the fact that during sessions of the agriculture committee last May there was extensive discussion about car allocation, during which the hon. member and his colleagues were unable to elicit one word of approval from witnesses who apeared before that body.

The house will wish not to be wearied by unnecessary repetition of what was said in the debate last year. For example, at page 937 of Hansard for December 15, 1953, an extensive statement was placed on record in connection with the car order book and its history. That need not be repeated. But it must be repeated that the car order book already provides all that is necessary to enable a grain producer to have placed at the elevator of his choice a car for the loading of his own grain.

[Mr. Bryson.]

The car order book provisions are an invaluable safeguard of a farmer's rights, whether he chooses to order cars, as he sometimes does, or refrains from doing so. The latter is the case at most times, in most places with most farmers. The effect of this bill would be to force the car order book into constant use at those points where farmers now elect not to use it. It would provide a certain arbitrary distribution of box cars at such a point, a distribution which, presumably advantageous to one elevator or another, might be objectionable to some other elevator or to some producer. The operation of such a scheme would at once be brought to naught by the first person, whether elevator agent or farmer, who chose to put his name on the car order book. That is one reason why the scheme is unworkable.

Observe next that the proposed legislation would be completely unenforceable. It seeks to place a duty upon the railway agent, at any given moment, to act in a prescribed way. But who would ascertain his duty at such a moment? Who could say whether or not he had acted correctly? Who could say that he was not planning to remedy any apparent defect in his procedure at some date, sooner or later, in the future? Or think of the task of the railway agent at one of the larger shipping points where there may be from 300 to 1,300 permit books, covering perhaps 100,000 seeded acres or more, and where there are perhaps seven or eight elevators. At Dawson Creek over 1,300 permit books are issued annually, with an acreage of 260,000. He would have a highly involved arithmetical calculation to make before he could arrive at a basis for car distribution. There would be room for a multiplicity of errors, with perhaps no answer possible that would be both acceptable and practicable. And to add to his confusion would be the knowledge that error would put him in peril of the penalties prescribed for violations of the Canada Grain Act.

The bill provides for a sort of election, with votes weighted according to acreage. Such a scheme is loaded with difficulties. An acre which has been intended to produce fodder in the shape of green feed will have equal voting rights with one which has actually produced 30 bushels of wheat. An acre on which the crop has been destroyed by hail, by rust or by frost will have equal rights with a nearby acre which has had a good crop. An acre producing five bushels of flax will have equal rights with an acre which has produced 100 bushels of oats.

Observe next that the farmer who is willing to take the trouble can vote twice, to the disadvantage of his neighbour who does not want to be put to this trouble. He can first vote his full acreage in favour of one elevator. Then, having done so, he can put his name on the car order book for successive cars to accommodate all the marketable grain he has produced, for shipment from that elevator. Or, having voted his acreage in favour of one elevator, he may actually deliver to another.

The hon. member last year seemed willing to admit that there were in his bill certain weaknesses, as had been pointed out. He went on to say on January 15, 1954, Hansard, at page 1169:

> I submit that is no reason for defeating this bill. Rather the subject matter of the bill should be referred to the agriculture committee of this house for discussion and consideration.

But the difficulties and defects to be found in the bill are not simple matters of wording or of drafting which can be ironed out by revision. Instead, defects are inherent in the very concept of the scheme. Moreover, the bill cannot be referred to the committee without prior endorsation of the principle which it involves. On principle, quite apart from defects in detail, it is unsound and should be defeated.

Several points of principle may be noted as follows:

1. The bill would attempt to freeze, as of October 1, the percentage of shipments to be made by different elevators during the following year, and consequently the percentage of grain that each elevator at a given shipping point might expect to receive. That is to destroy competition in service. Nothing could be more contrary to the spirit of the Canada Grain Act, which endeavours to promote competition. Nothing could be more contrary to the basic philosophy which has animated parliament in the past and the major parties represented herein. At least it is contrary to the philosophy of the Liberal party. It may be that the C.C.F. party has adopted a philosophy to the effect that competition is undesirable and should be restrained.

2. The proposal would discourage and even prevent elevator construction. There would be no incentive to build additional space if car allocation is frozen according to a predetermined cycle. This is in contrast with the present policy of the government, which is to encourage elevator construction by allowing accelerated write-off of capital costs.

3. The proposal is in direct conflict with the Canadian Wheat Board Act, section 20(k), which gives the Canadian wheat board jurisdiction over allocation of box cars which are not placed pursuant to a car order book. Surely parliament cannot be expected to deprive the Canadian wheat board of powers which have previously been considered necessary for the purposes of that body.

4. The proposal would hamper railway operation by introducing inefficiencies. It would frequently force cars to be placed at elevators in no position to make immediate use of them. The elevator may not contain grain of the type currently authorized for shipment by the Canadian wheat board. Or shipments from that particular elevator may be precluded because the operating company has elsewhere exhausted its current quota of authorized shipments.

5. This and similar proposals have been based upon two misconceptions. One is to the effect that under present conditions each elevator in western Canada is afforded the same opportunity as its competitors to ship grain, because of an equal division of box cars, depending upon the will of the railway company. This idea is completely wrong. Take at random 50 points in Saskatchewan with two or more elevators, and you will probably find 50 elevators which have handled and shipped more grain than their competitors. Naturally so, for those with greater patronage or larger facilities are likely to have more grain of the types which the Canadian wheat board authorizes for shipment. Or again you may find that an elevator company has deliberately chosen to ship less of its authorized quota from one point in order, for some reason or other, to be able to ship more of its authorized quota from some other point.

6. The other misconception is that there is a scarcity of box cars for grain shipment. On the contrary, the railways could supply many more cars to be loaded if there were any place to unload them. It is not the supply of box cars to country elevators which needs regulation. It is the unloading of grain into terminal elevators, something the Canadian wheat board is now regulating according to its best judgment. It strives to make the best possible use of terminal space; to keep flowing the kinds and grades of grain in current demand; to keep the pipe lines of supply from being clogged by grain of grades currently unsaleable. To do its work properly it must have freedom of action; it must not be hampered by any such rigid scheme of car allocation as this bill proposes.

7. The Canadian wheat board, in authorizing shipments from the country, does so very largely on the basis of giving a quota to each elevator company. Each such company is then left as free as prevailing conditions permit to choose the point of origin of its shipments, with due regard to types of grain required and to areas most in need of relief. When the whole elevator system is congested with more grain than can be promptly disposed of, no system of controlling shipments can give perfect satisfaction at all times, to everyone and in every place. But certainly the flexible system now operated by the Canadian wheat board holds greater possibilities of fairness, of satisfaction and of efficiency than any scheme that has been proposed for interfering with the handling machinery along the lines of this bill.

8. If this bill had any desirable features it would become necessary to consider another problem, whether or not it would be constitutional and within the competence of parliament. The government has been advised to the contrary, not indeed with respect to this particular bill but with respect to other proposals for allocation of box cars which would govern competition between elevator companies. But there is no need for legal argument in this connection, or of any reference to the supreme court, since the bill is undesirable of itself, quite apart from any question of constitutional validity.

This question has been discussed with the grain companies, and particularly with the farmer-owned companies. There is, in fact, a very sharp division among farmer-owned grain companies as to whether or not any plan of the kind suggested by the bill is desirable. I may say there has been no division of opinion about the merits of this bill, because it is the unanimous view of all grain companies, including all farmer-owned grain companies, that this bill is unworkable. However, the idea of farmers' preference has been to the fore recently, and a number of discussions have been held by myself and my officials with grain companies, particularly with farmer-owned grain companies.

The farmer-owned grain companies have themselves not been able to produce a bill which they would be prepared to support. I have never received a draft of such a bill, and my officers have been told by the solicitor of one of the companies that he had been unable to draft such a bill.

The whole idea of fixing a method of distribution of box cars for all time is completely mistaken, because conditions change from time to time. It was only two years ago that the transport controller received a letter signed jointly by the Alberta wheat pool, Mr. A. T. Baker, manager; North-West Line Elevators' Association, Alberta division, Mr. E. I. Ward, chairman; and the United Grain Growers Limited, Mr. W. J. Garland, superintendent of elevators, which in effect asked that the principle of one car per elevator be reinstated. Perhaps I should read the letter; it might be interesting.

Mr. Argue: Is that their policy today?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, I do know their policy of today, but what is going to be their policy two years from now? This letter is less than two years old.

Mr. Argue: Read recent correspondence.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have read recent correspondence, and I recognize an organized drive just as well as you do or anyone else does. We have had more of that from the province of Saskatchewan and no letters from anywhere else. If you think or anyone else thinks these letters are spontaneously written, perhaps you should give it another thought.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the minister a question? Does the Alberta wheat pool not support the Saskatchewan wheat pool in the ideas that have been presented about box car allocation?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We know that ideas have been presented jointly, but as I say no wheat pool has submitted a bill for the consideration of the government which meets the approval of any one of the three wheat pools. I have not received such a bill up to this time.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister consider it if he received it?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, that is not your privilege to ask. We have your bill before us. You have wasted a great deal of the time of parliament over it. If you would desist from your efforts in that direction there might be some possibility of drafting an amendment to the grain act that would satisfy at least some of the farmers, but with your bill before us there can be no such possibility. I rather think you have been told that by responsible leaders of farm organizations.

Mr. Argue: No, that statement is not correct.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Either that statement is correct or—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Perhaps the time has come when I should remind hon. members that during a debate remarks should be made to and through the Chair.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The key paragraph in this letter is:

> Whereas the operation of car order books is not feasible under existing conditions and in any case is likely to favour the larger producer to the disadvantage of the small producer, it has been mutually agreed by all Alberta operators that, during the 1953-54 crop year, temporary inequalities of distribution resulting from preferenced shipments shall be evened up at the earliest opportunity.

That was the situation that seemed desirable in Alberta for the crop of 1953-54, by unanimous consent of all the grain companies operating in that province. It may very well be the situation that the grain companies in that province would prefer in 1957-58.

The acute congestion seems to be passing; at least there is less congestion now than there has been for some years. Why, during a period of temporary congestion, attempt to freeze a system that may be wholly inapplicable for a period when no such congestion exists? That, I think, will appeal to every hon. member as not desirable, in the long-run interests of the producer in western Canada.

I do not think I need say more. I am perfectly sure that this bill, if enacted, would disorganize grain handling in western Canada to an extent that would tend to frustrate the efforts of all those who are attempting to do an efficient job of marketing the western producers grain.

We must have flexibility in the operation of country elevators and in the handling of stocks of grain contained in those elevators. It is true that when great quantities of grain were being handled the percentage of the Saskatchewan pool dropped several points from the percentage handled before congestion occurred. An effort is being made to reverse that trend, and I think the results of the current year will indicate that considerable progress has been made in that direction.

On the other hand, the percentage handled by the pool in Manitoba has not changed materially during the period of congestion. That is more or less true in Alberta, though I believe there has been some dropping off there.

Grain marketing in western Canada has been carried on under great difficulties. We have tried to handle five normal crops in a period of three years. The fact that there has not been greater dislocation is, I think, a credit to everyone concerned with the marketing of the western crop. I assure you that the efforts of all concerned are to give the greatest equality of marketing opportunity possible to producers in all parts of western Canada. I suggest that until some more perfect system is evolved than that provided for in this bill, parliament will be well advised to take no action in the matter.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): The Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated that the bill we have before us is tending to become a hardy perennial. I well remember the discussions on previous occasions when we had the bill before us, and I must say that only gradually has the significance of the problem impressed itself upon me.

The bill attempts to deal with the problem of grain distribution that has resulted from the congestion of the past three years. That problem has been concentrated largely in the province of Saskatchewan, with the result that Manitoba farmers have not been too concerned with the difficulties. For example, when we were discussing this matter of box car allocation in the agriculture committee last year I recall that the Manitoba representative of the pool elevator system disagreed with the representatives from Saskatchewan and Alberta. The position he took at that time arose from the fact that in Manitoba we were not faced to nearly the same extent with this problem of congestion. Since the meeting of the agriculture committee there has been a slight change in the attitude of the Manitoba farmers, particularly those doing business with the pool elevator system.

Just a few weeks ago I received a pamphlet dealing with this problem of box car allocation which puts forward in strong terms the necessity for a more equitable distribution. I note that this is endorsed by the three systems, the Manitoba pool elevators, the Saskatchewan wheat pool and the Alberta wheat pool which suggests to me that there is a change in thinking on this important subject.

For the first time I have been receiving letters on this matter. There was no ripple of concern at all in my constituency in the southwestern corner of Manitoba until the present year. I am interested to note that the aspect of the difficulty which is being protested against more than any other is in relation to those instances where you have the one for one distribution of box cars, that is, the formula where you have box cars spotted on the basis of one per elevator regardless of the normal pattern of grain business at any particular elevator point.

During the Easter recess I took the trouble to do some personal investigating in connection with this matter. Certain letters had come to me, and I went out to interview the farmers who had submitted those letters. I found that they had not any clear-cut thinking on a possible solution, but they certainly were unhappy because they could not do business with the elevator of their own choice. I discussed the bill which we have before us, but they were not personally acquainted with its provisions. If they were familiar with its contents these would be more or less incomprehensible to them, as are the contents of most bills that come before this house, which are drawn up in legal terminology. The result is that they generally remain an obscure issue with the layman.

I can say frankly that there does not seem to be any general support for the solution of the box car allocation problem presented in Bill No. 22. The reason I rose to take part in this discussion was to indicate dissatisfaction over the present state of affairs. I am inclined to agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there is no simple solution to the problem, nor will there be so long as the present congestion continues. We discussed this matter last year in the agriculture committee and there is to be another meeting of this committee within the next few days. I recommend strongly that we be given an opportunity to discuss this matter thoroughly in the committee.

The pool organizations have worked out an outline of a possible solution to the problem, and have placed this in the hands of certain hon. members. I received this outline with a covering letter from the Saskatchewan wheat pool over the signature of Mr. Robertson, the secretary. In this letter he stated:

> The three pool organizations have been working together on this matter for some time. An interprovincial committee, composed of the vice presidents of the three pool organizations, has on various occasions been in touch with a member of the government in an effort to secure adequate amending legislation to meet the situation.

Mr. Robertson goes on to state that the representative of the interprovincial pool committee from the Manitoba pool is Mr. George McConnell, vice president of that organization. They have made some suggestions as to possible solutions of this box car allocation problem which are much more comprehensive than the provisions of the bill before us. I would like to indicate what those suggestions are.

In order to establish a workable basis for individual farmers to deliver grain to elevators of their own choice, certain amendments would be required to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and also to the Canada Grain Act. It is suggested, first, that a provision be inserted in the wheat board act whereby the wheat board would furnish yearly to the board of grain commissioners a list of growers who had delivered grain the previous year, together with their address and seeded acreage.

Second, that a provision be inserted in the Canada Grain Act to authorize the board of grain commissioners to send yearly to every such grower a form to be completed and returned stating his delivery preference; with this information the board of grain commissioners to determine a cycle of car distribution for each point, and to inform the appropriate elevator companies and the railways of such cycle.

Third, cars ordered within the period by the wheat board to be treated as part of the cycle.

Fourth, cars spotted but not loaded by the elevator company to be treated as part of its cycle.

Fifth, all grain in store in country elevators at the time the cycle comes into operation to come under its jurisdiction.

Sixth, the board of grain commissioners should also be authorized to make whatever regulations are required to enable any cycle to operate successfully.

That is a much more comprehensive treatment of the matter than we have in the bill before us. Certain local elevator operators have indicated to me that the ideal solution would be to have the local railway agent allocate cars according to his understanding of the local delivery situation. But it has also been indicated to me that the local railway agents are unwilling to take such responsibility, and I have a reply from the local agent at Fairfax, Manitoba, substantiating this. It was indicated to me that the agent answered that he could do nothing about it at all and quoted the grain act, the transport controller, the car order book regulations, etc. This letter from the secretary of the Fairfax co-operative elevator goes on to state:

> If he is correct, which we doubt, then why are laws not altered or clarified to bring this business up to date with the situations of today.

The local railway agent did not want to assume this responsibility because of the difficulties he would encounter in relation to the transport controller, the Canada Grain Act, etc.

Now, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I cannot agree that this bill would solve the problem, because it introduces further rigidity into a system that is already too rigid under circumstances of congestion. The sponsor of the bill made a moving plea in his initial statement for greater flexibility in handling the movement of grain. He made a stirring plea that the processes of free competition and free enterprise might be allowed to operate among our farming community. That immediately put me on my guard, coming from that particular source; and I am afraid that if he is sincere in his advocacy of that particular viewpoint, I must conclude that this bill would not solve the problem.

I would repeat in closing that there is a growing demand from the farming community that something be done so the individual farmer is placed in a position where he may deliver his grain to the elevator of his choice. That demand will continue so long as the prevailing congestion is with us, and I would very strongly recommend that we take an opportunity to discuss this matter again in the agriculture committee. The pamphlet that has been sponsored by the pool elevator associations of the three prairie provinces would indicate that there is a change in the thinking of the Manitoba pool organization on this matter. I would certainly appreciate having the opportunity to consider this matter in broad perspective, and not confined as it is here to the relatively restricted terms of this Bill No. 22.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the hon. member would be prepared to say whether or not he would support a bill along the lines suggested by the wheat pool organizations.

Mr. Fulton: You draw up the bill and let us see it first.

Mr. Dinsdale: In reply to that question, I would have to see the bill before I would commit myself. Certainly the suggestions they have outlined would constitute a much more comprehensive approach to the problem than the bill at present before us.

Mr. Argue: Do you support the demands of the wheat pool organization at this moment?

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I would support the demand for a fair distribution of box cars, and I would certainly agree that the one for one formula is not adequate to deal with the situation.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): The principle of this bill is set out very clearly in the explanatory notes. I think it would be well to have it on the record again because of some of the things that have been said this afternoon and on the last occasion it was before the house. In the explanatory notes the principle is set out in these words:

> The purpose of this act is to remove discrimination in the allocation of box cars by providing in a new section of the car order book a rule for the fair allocation of box cars among elevator companies at a marketing point where the car order book, as presently constituted, is not in effect. By allocating their seeded acreage among the elevator companies at a marketing point, producers themselves will determine the distribution of box cars at that point.

I fail to see how anyone representing agriculture in this house could deny the value of that principle. Certainly, if the producers themselves wish to express a preference as to the elevator company with whom they want to do business, then they should be allowed to do so. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has opposed the bill, and strangely enough the basis of his opposition to the bill seemed to be that the philosophy behind it and behind the arguments used by members of this group has run counter to the philosophy of the Liberal party, which he states is competition. I am sure that statement will be examined with great interest by co-operators right across Canada, because now the minister has placed the Liberal party squarely on the side of competition and of course, by doing so, squarely against co-operation.

An hon. Member: That is nonsense.

Mr. Zaplitny: You cannot have it both ways, my friend. Mr. Speaker, I say that is a strange basis on which to oppose this legislation, because I have so often heard members of the Liberal party, from the prairies at least, attempt to take a great deal of credit for the setting up of the Canadian wheat board. What was the reason for the setting up of the Canadian wheat board in the first instance? It was exactly the same reasoning as was behind the setting up of the wheat pools and the co-operative handling of grain. It was a method of doing the marketing for the farmer in a co-operative manner rather than in a competitive manner.

Certainly if this philosophy expressed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce today on behalf of the Liberal party were followed to its logical conclusion it would mean the end of the wheat board entirely and a return to the old competitive system of the Winnipeg grain exchange. There is no other conclusion to which one may come. I would be very much surprised if the minister could persuade the grain producers of western Canada that it is a good thing for them to go back to a competitive position in the marketing of their grain.

Let us take, for example, a thousand farmers in a community. I am sure if the minister told them the best way they could market their grain was for each farmer to be always in competition with the 999 other farmers, we would hear some very interesting comments from the grain producers. We cannot get away from it. The line is very clearly drawn now. This group is trying to bring justice to the grain producers. We are squarely behind the co-operative principle, and we have no hesitation in saying so. I support the co-operative philosophy right down the line. The minister takes his party down the line of competition. Of course it will be up to the people to choose.

Mr. Speaker, I see it is six o'clock. May I move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Zaplitny the debate was adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): At eight o'clock the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National parks branch—
295. Branch administration, $86,425.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, just before five o'clock I had been quoting from an article by Mr. Turnbull, president of the Edmonton trout fishing club, and printed in "The Voice of Motordom", regarding what he considered the poor fishing facilities in the national parks of Banff and Jasper.

I have heard many reasons advanced why the fishing in those parks is of a somewhat poor character. I have been told by officials in the parks that it is largely owing to the fact that the water is too cold and greatly retards the growth of the fish. I have also been told that there is too much silt and that the silt affects the spawning. I have also been told that there is a lack of feed in many of the lakes. On the other hand many men who have had a great deal of experience in this matter in other national parks in other parts of the country feel that with a good program, with sufficient backing, it would be possible to greatly improve the situation.

In that same article Mr. Turnbull makes this comment:

> If your provincial government can do this wonderful work of restocking with such success, others can do the same. General conditions are the same, invested facilities in the park such as hatcheries, etc., are possibly better; the only thing that seems to be wrong is lack of management and experience.

Then he goes on to give the names of a number of men living in Jasper who he feels could give the government valuable assistance in helping to improve the situation. But personally I do not doubt for one minute that the department has men who are just as good and who know just as much about the question of improving fishing conditions as anyone else. Provided they were given sufficient backing, they could no doubt take care of the situation.

It is interesting to note the program that has been carried on of recent years in Alberta. There was a time when it was practically impossible to get trout fishing on the prairies, but today we find that there is great trout fishing in many parts of Alberta as a result of the new program, and that is so in spots similar in character to the park because they are in the mountains alongside the park.

I just want to read one or two quotations from "Within Our Borders" dealing with this question. The heading is "Large Trout Await Anglers in Small Alberta Lakes" and the article goes on to say:

> Small lakes in Alberta are providing an overabundance of trout fishing to such a point that the fisheries branch of the lands and forests department has had to appeal to anglers to fish the small lakes heavily.

I hope the day will come when the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will also have to give that advice to people in the national parks. The article continues:

> Alberta fishery officers, looking for new places to plant trout where they would provide more and better fishing for the average fisherman, tried stocking prairie potholes which had no fish at all.

I would suggest to the minister that he might suggest to the provincial government of Alberta that if they have any surplus fish they might put them in some of the lakes in the national parks. The article continues:

> Because the lakes offer no facilities for spawning, regular restocking is necessary but before new fish can be planted, they must be fished out. The reason for this is that after the third summer the original fish stocked have grown so large that they dominate the lakes and their food supply, leaving no room for young fish.
> Alberta fishery officials have found that lakes with surface areas of between 80 and 200 acres are ideal for rainbow stocking. They can be stocked economically and are small enough to be fished out in time to allow a second planting of trout.
> If subsequent fish planted in the lakes are to survive, the previous fish must be all caught by the fourth summer from the time of stocking. If some of the originals remain, they have to be removed before new stock can be introduced to the lakes.

It is extremely interesting to note what has been done in that regard, and as a result we have this peculiar situation. We find that a number of the people living in Banff, which is looked upon by many people as a fisherman's paradise, when they want to go fishing go outside the park, either into Alberta or British Columbia, in order to get fishing. I think it should be possible to improve the fishing in a number of the lakes by a greater program of restocking.

It is interesting to note that a few years ago certain parties in Banff asked permission to start a trout farm in the park. The former minister was greatly interested in that offer and he said he knew of a similar program in Nova Scotia which had been quite a success. At that time he seemed quite keen on the idea of allowing a trout farm to be instituted in Banff. But unfortunately his officials apparently had an entirely different view. They frowned upon the suggestion and drew up a number of requirements that had to be met before permission would be granted. All those requirements were fulfilled, yet in spite of that fact the plan was stalled and I suppose today the whole thing has been given up. I have not heard any more about it lately.

I quite agree that the type of fishing that would be provided by a trout farm would not be in the same class as that provided in the natural form. I think we would all much prefer to do our fishing in a natural stream or a natural lake rather than go to a trout farm for our fishing. On the other hand many families who go into Banff park are not in a position to wander up the streams for many miles. They have their children with them. To them it would be a great thing if they could go to a trout farm, fish and catch a few trout.

As I say, I do not think anything can compare with the joy of going up into the mountains, amongst the fine scenery, in the fine mountain air, to do some fishing. There is only one thing lacking in so far as Banff is concerned, namely fish. And after all, if you are going fishing you need some fish.

I am not suggesting there are no fish in Banff. We all know there are many places in Banff where there is very good fishing; but those points are a number of miles from the highway and, as I say, it is not possible for many people to enjoy that type of fishing. It generally requires equipment which is beyond the means of certain people, or maybe they have not the time to wander 15 miles or so off the beaten track. I therefore hope the minister will give careful consideration to a program of improving the fishing in the natural lakes.

I have met a number of Americans in Banff who have just been boiling mad. They received certain circulars about our wonderful fishing, and how our streams are teeming with fish. I met an American in the store one day. I was in there buying black gnats. He said, "There is no use buying those. I have over $1,000 worth of fishing gear, and I have not caught a fish yet."

Mr. Martin: You do not think he is alone, do you?

Mr. Quelch: No, he is not alone by any means. There are many of them. Again I will frankly admit that there are spots in Banff where there is good fishing, provided you have the time and the inclination to walk far enough to reach them. But in the lakes that are easily accessible the fishing, generally speaking, is very poor.

Mr. Knowles: Probably you would do better with a bent pin on the end of a string.

Mr. Quelch: That is true in a way. I have seen little boys, fishing in the Bow river with a worm and small hook, pull out fish; but they are generally small fish. A grown-up would probably throw the fish back because it would be below legal size. But being little boys they pop them in their pockets and go off home with them.

I have fished with practically everything you can think of, including dry flies, wet flies, nymphs, spinners, gentles, and anything else you like. I have even resorted to worms when I have been desperate; but even so, I found it rather hard to catch fish. I think I am what you might call an average fisherman. I do not claim to be a good one. I have caught plenty of trout in Banff, but the hours I spent in doing so were quite numerous. I have averaged about three hours for every fish I caught. I kept track of them, because in Banff they are very keen about having you fill in creel cards.

When you go fishing they tell you to fill in a creel card. First of all, I found that if I went to the repository for a creel card, as a rule there would be no cards there. Then by the time I got home I would forget to note down all the information. I notice in the creel card reports the time spent catching fish is tabulated, and the average would appear to be three-quarters of an hour or one hour per fish depending on the location. That information is not very accurate because people who go there and fish for hours and do not catch any fish do not bother as a rule to fill out a card. Consequently the reports do not give a very accurate picture of the situation.

There is one other suggestion I should like to make to the minister. The department should bring the "Anglers' Guide" up to date. I notice in that guide there is quite a bit of information that is very much out of date. For instance, they talk about crossing Massive bridge. Massive bridge went out several years ago. There is no bridge there; yet the most recent issue still tells you to cross Massive bridge. There is no bridge to cross unless you can jump across a space of about 30 feet where two spans are missing.

That is all I have to say. I hope the minister will give the matter careful consideration. I know it is not the first time he has been approached about it.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the hon. member for Acadia, and all I can say is that the people in his part of the country had better come to New Brunswick national park, where they will really get some fishing. They will not have to fish for a week without any success, because we have some very good trout in our national park, both in the lake and in the different streams.

I do not intend to discuss that phase of our national park tonight. Ours is one of the newest national parks in Canada, if not the newest, and we are very proud of it. It was a very large undertaking and has been most successful. There were many roads and camps to be built. So far as recreation is concerned, there is a fine golf course and there are large picnic grounds. Every year the number of people visiting Fundy national park in New Brunswick is increasing.

We in New Brunswick feel that the man who was largely responsible for the excellent job that has been done there was the superintendent, Mr. Saunders, who was appointed a few years ago on the recommendation of Mr. McNair, I believe, who was then premier of New Brunswick. At the present time the people of New Brunswick, particularly those who are interested in the national park—and we all are—are quite concerned because they understand the superintendent is either to be retired or transferred to some other national park. I should like to ask the minister tonight what is the policy of the department with reference to the transferring of superintendents from one national park to another, why they feel it is necessary to make these transfers, and also what the policy is with reference to the retirement of superintendents of national parks.

I understand our superintendent was advised nearly a year ago that he was going to be transferred to a national park in Manitoba. He is a man about 59 years of age, and has given splendid service in the province of New Brunswick. He understands our situation there as no other man does, and there must be enormous expense involved in transferring a man with all his household effects from New Brunswick to Manitoba and transferring the Manitoba superintendent to the national park in New Brunswick. It seems to me a poor policy, and one which does not mean any betterment as far as the superintendents are concerned.

I hope the minister will be able to explain this matter satisfactorily because, as I say, the people of New Brunswick are quite concerned. Up until a little over a year ago there was no suggestion whatever of transferring the superintendent of the national park in New Brunswick to any other place, nor any suggestion of his retirement. Mr. Saunders has taken a very active part in the public life of his community. He has been active on practically all committees having anything to do with the betterment of the community, and a little over a year ago he was asked if he would run for the position of councillor in the parish of Alma in the county of Albert, where the park is located.

It may have been and probably was indiscreet on the part of the superintendent to take part in any kind of election, even a council election which is not supposed to be political in any sense of the word. Mr. Saunders allowed himself to be persuaded to run for councillor. He ran against a man who had been in office for a number of years and gave him a trimming. Shortly after Mr. Saunders was notified that he would be transferred to another park. The man he defeated in the election was chairman of the government organization in that particular part of Albert county, and is also a great friend of the former member for Saint John-Albert. The minister shakes his head. I am simply stating what the people in that section of the county and in New Brunswick generally feel. It is their opinion that this man was told he would be transferred to another national park simply because he ran for a council seat in this particular parish.

I hope the minister has a satisfactory explanation tonight, because we are concerned. Here we have had an excellent superintendent for our national park, a man who has given us one of the finest national parks in Canada, and at the age of 59 he is notified that he is to be transferred to Manitoba, that he and his family must take up their roots and go to another part of Canada. He has refused to be transferred to Manitoba, and now he is being retired at the age of 59. I understand his pension is going to be much less than it would be if he had been able to serve his full time.

I have met Mr. Saunders once, but he has never communicated with me in any way. I am simply giving expression tonight to the opinion of many people in my own town of Sussex, which is near the national park, people in the county of Albert and throughout New Brunswick who feel that a great injustice has been done to a very fine public servant, a man who has given to this national park the very best he had to give. I hope the minister will be able to give a satisfactory explanation and will be able to say to me tonight that no injustice will be done to this man who, I believe, is being asked to retire before he has earned and can be paid the full amount of his retirement allowance.

Mr. Lesage: I have never asked Mr. Saunders to retire and I am sure nobody in my department has ever done so. He is retiring by his own choice, of his own will.

Mr. Brooks: Is it not because he does not wish to be transferred?

Mr. Lesage: Oh, yes; but it is the policy of the department to move superintendents around in Canada.

Mr. Brooks: At the age of 59?

Mr. Lesage: It is the policy at any age. I will read what I said in the committee with respect to the moving around of departmental personnel, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Calgary North; and may I point out that at the time Mr. Saunders was not being considered. First of all we were discussing wardens, then the hon. member for Calgary North asked me about park superintendents. Here is my answer.

Mr. Brooks: Just a minute. Is it not a fact he has only about six months to serve before he will receive the full amount of his pension?

Mr. Lesage: He is not retiring before 60. He is retiring at 60, but he takes his six months' leave before he reaches the age of 60. He will have his pension.

Mr. Brooks: What is the normal age of retirement?

Mr. Lesage: At the age of 60 a civil servant might wish, of his own volition, to retire. That is what he has done.

Mr. Brooks: I want to state this, Mr. Chairman. He was asked to move to Manitoba, and I think the minister will agree with that.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, he was asked to move.

Mr. Brooks: Because he did not wish to do so—and I do not think it was fair to ask a man of that age to do so—now he has to retire from the national park in New Brunswick. He did not wish to move his family to Manitoba.

Mr. Lesage: May I give my explanation, Mr. Chairman? I believe I have let the hon. member for Royal make his statement without interruption. May I say again that this department is not retiring Mr. Saunders. Mr. Saunders chose to offer his resignation when he was told that he would be transferred. Rather than be transferred he answered that he wished to retire at the age of 60, and his resignation was accepted. He will get his civil service pension.

May I quote the policy of the department as set out in the committee proceedings, and as I explained it when there was no question about Mr. Saunders. I am reading from page 638 of the estimates committee report:

> I believe it is a good thing to move superintendents around every five years or so for the following reasons: First, the superintendents will have gathered experience and they will go to a park with new ideas for that park. Secondly, psychologically when a man comes into a new post he will be wanting to make a good job of it. But after five, six, seven or eight years he might settle down and we are afraid he will lack imagination . . .
> Mr. Harkness: When you stay five years—
>
> Hon. Mr. Lesage: Five years or more.
> Mr. Harkness: I would be inclined to agree because I would not look on five years as being a frequent move.

When Mr. Saunders was told that he would be transferred in accordance with the policy of the department—it had been the policy before I became minister—he decided to retire. My predecessor in office, who is behind me now, is telling me that was his policy.

Mr. Brooks: How many have been transferred, may I ask?

Mr. Lesage: Since 1953 there have been five transferred, out of a total of 16 park superintendents.

Mr. Brooks: What were their ages?

Mr. Lesage: Age has nothing to do with it. We transfer them every five or six years. A man of 59 still has six years left, and the intention was to move superintendent Bryant from Kootenay park to Fundy and to move superintendent Saunders to Kootenay park.

Mr. Brooks: What was the date of that?

Mr. Lesage: The decision was in March, 1954. My predecessor just tells me—I came into the department in the fall of 1953—that there had been a question about moving Mr. Saunders before I came into the department, so it was not new. That was in accordance with departmental policy. No wrong has been done to Mr. Saunders. On the contrary, rather than be transferred he decided on his own to offer his resignation and take his pension. There is no injustice to Mr. Saunders.

Mr. Blackmore: I have no desire to detain the committee for very long. I wish to tell the minister that the Lethbridge federal riding thinks he is doing an exceedingly good job. They greatly appreciated having him come out and visit them last year. They were delighted with the impression he made, and with the fact that he seemed to have learned everything there was to be known about Waterton Lakes park in the short time he was there. He seemed to fit right into the scheme of things. We bid him welcome any time he chooses to visit us.

We believe also that the progress that has been made during the last two or three years in connection with the park is satisfactory. I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the present Minister of Public Works, who was the predecessor of the present minister of northern affairs, for appointing to Waterton Lakes park as superintendent Mr. J. H. Atkinson. I think Mr. Atkinson's coming was the greatest blessing that ever happened to the park. I would be pleased to have the present minister forget to transfer Mr. Atkinson when his five or so years are up. Just let him stay on there, because he seems to fit into that park almost as well as the Waterton lakes do.

We feel that the amount of money that has been expended on the park this year is quite satisfactory. Indeed, we can understand that in a year in which the government has felt it necessary to save a little bit more money than they have in times past, they appropriated as much as seemed fitting under the circumstances.

We would like, however, to have more money next year, and for this reason. We feel that one of the essentials in making Waterton Lakes park the dream park which we all, including the minister, wish it to be, would be a fine swimming pool in the park. This should not be a swimming pool alone, but a building in which people could take refuge in case of stormy, windy, cold or wet weather which sometimes comes to that part for two or three days. We believe that a fine building, erected as an attraction both winter and summer to house a swimming pool, would be so great an asset to that park that the necessary money, probably $300,000 or $400,000, would be money exceedingly well spent. We would ask the minister to do all he possibly can to impress the treasury board with the idea that they should extend themselves a little for a year or two while they build that swimming pool.

I think nothing more needs to be said, except to report to the minister that, so far as I know, everything in Waterton Lakes park is going along as well as could be expected. We are just waiting for the days to come and go while we grow in Waterton Lakes park. While I do not propose to contest what the hon. member for Bow River and several others have said about their respective parks being the very best, I would probably question the standard by which they judge parks.

In closing I would point out that Waterton Lakes park is of exceptional importance because it is the front window of Canada in that particular area. It is right down against Glacier national park, being located at the extreme southwest corner of Alberta. It is the park to which United States tourists come to get an impression of Canada, which impression will cause them either to go far into the interior, away into the northland, or turn around and go back. We all want them to go far into the interior, away into the northland. We say, therefore, let us pay particular attention to making Waterton Lakes the very finest park in Canada, whether or not it is so now.

Mr. Regier: I should like to once again raise a matter I mentioned in this house a year ago. I noticed that after the last session the minister spent some time in making a number of visits to some of our national parks. I should like to recommend that the next time he comes to British Columbia he pay a call on the minister of fisheries there and ask that minister to take him on a tour of a provincial park. He will probably have to go by saddle horse. I am referring, of course, to Garibaldi provincial park, which I feel is a park that, once developed, would be Canada's leading national park.

Last year I asked the minister about this, and he expressed the interest of his department in taking over from the provincial government the responsibility for the development of Garibaldi park. The minister stated some conditions that would have to be met before his department could consider taking it over. One condition was that a first-class highway be constructed to the entrance of the park. We have a first-class highway, the Lougheed highway, that runs to within two or three miles of the southern entrance to Garibaldi. I think the minister had in mind at that time a first-class highway that would give access to the northern entrance. I understand that the government of British Columbia is now proceeding with the Howe Sound highway, and this highway, when completed, will give access to the northern entrance of the park. Therefore that condition is being met.

The other condition mentioned was that the provincial government be prepared to hand over all interest in the park, and this would include all interest in the mineral resources. I understand that former governments of British Columbia—not the present government—when considering this matter always hesitated to hand over the mineral rights to the federal government. There was the feeling that possibly they were handing over to a higher level of government untold millions of dollars by way of future mineral royalties.

As one of the daily newspapers pointed out only some six months ago, this would be a very shortsighted policy for the government of British Columbia to adopt. While 50 years from now they might obtain $10 million, $15 million, or even $20 million in royalties from minerals that might be found at that time, in the meantime the provincial coffers were annually losing untold millions of dollars from tourists who would visit this park if the development were begun now. I hope that attitude of former governments of British Columbia is not being adopted by the government we now have in British Columbia. I hope the minister will be able to report some progress in the negotiations, or at least be able to report that over the past year he has commenced negotiations.

I would not like him to think he has to leave the initiation of such negotiations to the provincial government. The development of Garibaldi park is beyond the resources of the government of British Columbia. We cannot begin to develop Garibaldi park for less than $30 million, and the government of British Columbia simply is not in a position to begin spending that kind of money on one item. It would be in the national interest to develop this park. I say this, and I have endorsation of it in statements made on other occasions in other places by the Minister of Fisheries. Garibaldi park has the potential to become one of the most famous parks not only of Canada but of the whole world. I believe the Minister of Fisheries is responsible for saying that while he had looked at practically all of the world's famous ski resorts, not one of them, even those in the Alps mountains, would be able to hold up against this park in British Columbia if it were developed.

One of the first things necessary for that development, of course, would be a highway from the southern end right through the park to the northern end, and that is where many millions of dollars enter the picture. It is possible that a bridge would also have to be constructed across the Fraser river at Haney to handle the tourist traffic we would be sure to have from the south.

I would also very much like to see Garibaldi park developed as a national park soon. I am not opposed to, and I endorse, the development of the national parks we now have in Canada, and I would like to see even more developed, but in the lower mainland most of our people live within a hundred miles of the city of Vancouver. Out of a population of 1,250,000 people in the province, some 750,000 live within a hundred miles of Vancouver. These people have only limited park facilities available to them. On Sunday about the only place they can go is to Stanley park; and if you visit Stanley park on a Sunday afternoon you find the place is literally crowded with people. It has reached the stage that if you want to relax in Stanley park you have to go there on a Monday or a Tuesday, when most people are at work. It is urgent that we have park facilities available offering fairly easy access to the 750,000 people.

It is all very well to say that British Columbia has national parks. The national parks in British Columbia are hundreds of miles removed from where most of the people live. In our lower mainland area we have tens of thousands of people who have no means of transportation available. These people receive absolutely no advantage from the development of our national parks that are away off in the Rocky mountains. It is on behalf of those people in the lower mainland who need the park, who have not the wherewithal to spend several weeks hundreds of miles away from home, who would be glad to make use of public transportation facilities at a cost of 75 cents or a dollar, that I speak. It could become one of the most wonderful playgrounds of the Dominion of Canada.

On behalf of these three-quarters of a million taxpayers of Canada, I urge that further negotiations should take place. If the negotiations have not yet begun I hope they definitely will begin, and that this government will not wait for the government of British Columbia to take the initiative in this matter.

300. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $10,000.

Mr. Dinsdale: I hear groans coming from the backbenchers, but I assure the groaners that I shall not carry on at any great length with this subject. I mentioned this topic during the discussion in the committee on estimates. The only reason I raise it now is that I know the minister would be disappointed if I did not make some reference to it, and I know that at least the chairman also would be disappointed, because he is one of those fortunate men who had the opportunity during the past summer to visit the international peace garden on the Manitoba-North Dakota boundary.

I want to express appreciation to the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources for continuing this $10,000 grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden, which began as a voluntary effort on the part of the peoples of Canada and the United States to symbolize the universal desire for peace. The cairn marking the spot, which was dedicated in 1932, is inscribed as follows:

To God in His Glory

We two nations dedicate this garden and pledge ourselves that as long as men shall live, we will not take up arms against one another.

I should point out that the garden which began as a symbol of the universal desire for peace has now developed into one of the outstanding tourist attractions in the mid-continental area of North America. I have often heard travellers in Canada say they like to visit the scenic spots in the Rocky mountain district or that they enjoy travelling in Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, but they indicate they are not too inspired with our flat, level prairies in the centre part of the country.

Here is a development which has offset that vacuum in tourist attractions which has existed in the centre of our country. Not only from the standpoint of its own scenic beauty but also from the standpoint of its symbolic appeal is it drawing increasingly large numbers of tourists. Although this is not a part of our system of national parks it certainly can be regarded as an extension.

I would venture to say that the fact Riding Mountain national park attracted 500,000 visitors last year was due in large part to the visitors who were interested in the international peace garden and then continued on some hundred miles further north to the Riding Mountain national park.

In reality the international peace garden is an international park and today it is creating world-wide interest. It is because of this growing interest that I venture to say a few words tonight so the matter may be kept before hon. members of this house and the people of Canada as a whole.

As I have indicated, this is a co-operative effort by the peoples of Canada and the United States. I should like to compare the support we are giving this garden to that given by the United States. Their grant amounts to $100,000 for a period of three years, which means that they are providing $33,000 per annum as against our $10,000. As indicative of the significance of this international peace garden I might say that the state of North Dakota is adding to its automobile licence plates the phrase "the peace garden state". That form of publicity will go a long way in popularizing the development among the peoples of North Dakota and the United States as a whole.

One further comment on this item. I notice that the grant for the national battlefields commission is being increased from $100,000 to $125,000 and also that the grant to provide for special work at national battlefields park, Quebec, is being increased from $6,000 to $8,000. Just in case they have forgotten, I should like to remind hon. members of the committee that up until three years ago the annual grant to the international peace garden was $15,000. Then it disappeared for a year and was restored at the reduced rate of $10,000 per annum. As an investment in the cause of peace I believe this development is unparalleled. Moreover, I should like to emphasize that every dollar expended in the development of the garden will be returned in manifold ways because of its powerful attraction as a tourist centre.

It is my belief that in the not too far distant future we shall see the United States establishing a suitable building as a museum on their side of the garden area. The question of making the international peace garden a national arboretum is under consideration, and inevitably Canada will be forced to think along the same lines if this development continues to capture the imagination of people on both sides of the border as well as people throughout the world.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I want to back up what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has said. I lived in Souris for six years, and those with whom I was associated were intensely interested in this park. The latest report I have had is that the superintendent of the park treats the tourists so well that they want to come back again.

Mr. Pommer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words in support of what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has said. This is one time when I can support a proposal of my hon. friend, and I do it with a great deal of pleasure. The hon. member has covered the history and background of this worthy project, and I would like to ask the minister to consider increasing the grant. As has been pointed out, the United States grant is $100,000 for three years, whereas ours is $10,000 a year. I believe the grant should be doubled, not only from the tourist attraction standpoint but because of the great work that has been done in this international peace garden.

I am not going to repeat what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has said, but I should like to quote the last paragraph of this pamphlet giving the history and progress of the international peace garden, this being the revised edition for 1953. It reads:

> Perhaps the most encouraging aspect of the year has been the realization of internationalism in the garden. Not only has there been over three times the number of visitors of the previous year, but they have come from 48 states and 10 provinces on this continent, and nine countries of the world beyond. In June, there was a pilgrimage of the National Council of Women of Canada, during their convention, to the garden; and in the fall, the Associated Countrywomen of the World sent delegates from many countries to the garden. An international relations conference of students from the Minot state college of North Dakota and the students of Brandon college, Brandon, Manitoba, added further significance to the garden; while the annual meeting of the garden itself in early September forms the focal point of the year's work. Through the international addresses of prominent people of both countries at this time the citizens get the "timeless vision that peace is something to cherish, that it is something one has to work for, and that here people are working to erect not statues and memorials to commemorate victory in war or valor in combat, but instead a lovely garden to honor and laud peace itself."

For that reason alone, if for no other, we should make a little greater contribution than in the past.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, just to make it unanimous may I join with my friends from the province of Manitoba in supporting the expressions of appreciation and the appeals they have made. I am very glad this grant was restored a year or two ago. In my view those who preceded me are perfectly right in their suggestion that we might well increase the amount of the grant to the international peace garden.

303. Canadian wildlife service—wildlife resources conservation and development, including administration of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, $455,703.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to make a few observations on this item. Before going on to the particular matter which I rose to mention, I wish to say that I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Acadia, and after listening to him I can fully appreciate now why he is called the Izaak Walton of the Social Credit party. I suggest to the member that it would be much less expensive to visit Kootenay West if he wants to catch some fish, rather than to spend all that money in the area the hon. member mentioned.

However, the hon. member for The Battlefords was called away unexpectedly this afternoon and he asked me to bring to the minister's attention something of particular interest to some of his constituents as well as persons in other parts of Canada. He has received representations from various people protesting the use of steel traps in the Northwest Territories. The argument in favour of these representations by these people is that, while we live in a Christian civilization, we still promote primitive and cruel methods of trapping, particularly the use of steel traps in the Northwest Territories.

I am informed that, owing to the length of the trap lines, the traps are frequently not emptied for a month at a time. Naturally this causes days of suffering and a great deal of misery to the fur-bearing animals. They slowly die from their injuries or from starvation in the cold. The hon. member has asked me to bring to the minister's attention the fact that the law in the United States at the present time requires that every trap in a registered trap line must be visited at least once every 24 hours.

Anyone who understands anything about trapping—and I had a 15-mile trap line myself at one time—will realize that that is impossible. I am informed that in Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Germany steel traps for the trapping of fur-bearing animals are completely prohibited by law. They have replaced the system of steel traps. A more humane form of trap has been found quite satisfactory by the trappers in those countries.

The hon. member for The Battlefords brought to my attention, before he left this afternoon, that last year the Prime Minister of Canada sent a special message of best wishes to the Ottawa organization of the "Be Kind to Animals" week, and expressed his interest in the efforts of the organization to promote the humane treatment of animals. That is a clear indication that the Prime Minister of this country is very much interested in that question. I think you can relate the catching of fur-bearing animals with steel traps to that sort of approach to the question of the humane treatment of animals.

I realize all the difficulties connected with this problem. As I said before, I have done some trapping myself, and it is not so easy to find a replacement as one might imagine if one has had no experience in that line. But those making representations to the hon. member for The Battlefords suggest that the department would be well advised to investigate the methods used in other countries, particularly the countries I have mentioned, where they have completely abolished the use of steel traps for the catching of fur-bearing animals and now have a humane form of trap. The department could investigate the possibilities of replacing steel traps in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon and, as they were gradually replaced, assisting the trappers to purchase the new form of humane trap by means of a subsidy after the fashion of the subsidy given to Quebec farmers to purchase aluminum pails for the gathering of sap.

I bring these matters to the attention of the minister at the request of the hon. member for The Battlefords. I suggest that the minister go into the whole question and have it investigated, and possibly set a target date for the elimination of the use of steel traps for the catching of fur-bearing animals, because of the cruelty involved therein.

Engineering and water resources branch—
305. Branch administration, $54,283.

Mr. Harkness: I believe this is the point at which the hon. member for St. Paul's was told previously by the minister that he should bring up the matter about which he had begun to speak in connection with flood warnings. As he was unable to be here tonight he asked me to raise this matter.

The hon. member for St. Paul's is of the opinion that the great loss of life which occurred owing to "Hurricane Hazel" in and around the vicinity of Toronto could very well have been prevented if the people in those low-lying valleys had had a few hours' warning of what the height of water was likely to be as a result of the very heavy rains which had occurred. He was also of the opinion that this rainfall was known to the meteorological officers, and that warning could have been given. He asked me to take up the question with the minister as to whether any arrangements exist or have been put into effect since that time to give people warning of what height of flood water may be expected following a heavy storm.

We all know, of course, that once the water has fallen it takes a considerable length of time for the run-off to go down and reach an area such as that around Toronto where all this flooding took place. That provides sufficient time, as long as warning is given, for the people to evacuate any low-lying areas; or, if they are not willing to evacuate them, it gives sufficient time for the police to forcibly take them out of those areas, thus avoiding tragedies such as those which took place in the Toronto area.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the responsibilities and duties of the water resources division were explained at length in the committee, but I do not recall that that question of flood warning was raised there.

Mr. Harkness: No.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Lesage: What was mentioned in the committee was that this department, through its water resources division, was co-operating with the provinces in collecting the readings and gauging the levels of the streams all the year round. We communicate to the provincial authorities the readings of the levels of the rivers at regular intervals and, when the water rises, communications are more frequent. As a matter of fact this is done regularly for the Columbia river, the Bow river, the Fraser river, the Assiniboine river and the Red river, among others, but in the case of the Humber river I would have to look into it to ascertain if we have gauging stations on that river. We have some gauging stations on the Humber, but there have never been any flood warning arrangements there.

Mr. Harkness: Might I ask the minister this question. In all those areas where they have these gauging stations and where there are low-lying river bottoms where possibly serious damage, serious loss of life and so forth could take place in the event of a flood, cannot a warning system be instituted in order to prevent this sort of thing in the future? I refer not just to Toronto but any place else in the country.

Mr. Lesage: I was just discussing that matter with my officials. We will look into the matter and will co-operate fully with the provinces so they may be advised constantly of the water levels, especially when they rise suddenly.

Mr. Trainor: I should like to call the attention of the minister to the serious condition that exists in Saskatchewan and Manitoba as a result of the flooding of the Assiniboine river. The drainage basin of that river covers a large area, namely some 60,000 square miles. Owing to the fact that the river runs through a country with alluvial soil, it is subject to silting. As a consequence the river bottom has been rising and the river has been subjected to flooding almost yearly, of late years, with a great deal of damage to farm lands—

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources has no responsibility at all for flood damage. As I explained in the committee, the only responsibilities of the water resources branch, as far as rivers across the country are concerned and the levels of the rivers, are to study those levels by engineering surveys for development of the rivers and also, in co-operation with the provinces, to establish some gauging stations and to read the levels. The responsibility for flood prevention and flood damage does not come under this department at all. There is no item which covers that matter.

Mr. Trainor: Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that the department assume any responsibility for flood damage. However, I am assuming that the department have a certain responsibility for flood control. The minister himself has indicated that they have some responsibility for surveys in co-operation with the provinces. I suggest that in these estimates there is an item indicating an expenditure for damage on the Conestogo river. How would the minister classify that expenditure?

Mr. Lesage: This was for water conservation, under a special agreement that was made with the government of Ontario under which we provided 37½ per cent of the cost. There is a special item for that expenditure in the estimates. This was not especially for flood control but for water conservation.

Mr. Trainor: The item referred to by the minister is item 310. I shall read it for his benefit:

To provide for a contribution to the cost of constructing a dam on the Conestogo river near Glen Allan, Ontario, for the purposes of flood control and water conservation, in accordance with the terms of an agreement entered into between Canada and the province of Ontario.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but flood control is still a provincial responsibility. Unless we have a request from a provincial government for participation under the Canada Water Conservation Assistance Act there is no responsibility on the part of this department for flood control. The present situation on the Assiniboine river has nothing to do with this department, or I should say this department has nothing to do with the present situation on the Assiniboine river. That is better.

Mr. Trainor: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, there is a possibility that the provincial government might seek the assistance of the minister's department in the same way the government of Ontario sought it in connection with the Conestogo river.

Mr. Lesage: All right. When we have it we will consider it.

Mr. Trainor: Perhaps it would not be amiss if one might briefly state what P.F.R.A. have recommended.

Mr. Lesage: That is the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Trainor: One does not know whether the Department of Agriculture will do anything. They have made engineering surveys and a recommendation. But the Department of Agriculture are not doing anything. As a consequence, year by year the farmers in the Assiniboine river area are obliged to suffer this flood damage. This is costing them millions of dollars year by year.

I could, of course, take this matter up under the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, but I suggest that possibly the minister's department might collaborate with the Department of Agriculture or with the provincial government in some way, as was done in Ontario, so this condition could be ameliorated. However, if the minister does not want to hear such a recommendation I do not suppose I have any alternative but to desist.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the government at this time. I have reason to assume that it fits into this particular part of the debate. However, if I am out of order I am sure I shall soon be reminded about it.

The matter has to do with a situation existing on the Vedder river in British Columbia. In this connection I had submitted to me a brief containing letters starting at May 15, 1952 and bringing the matter right up to a very recent date. These communications are between Mr. Mulford, the clerk of the corporation of the township of Chilliwack and Mr. Cruickshank, a former member of parliament, and also between other officials of different departments.

Just to bring the matter to the attention of the committee I should like to read a brief section from a letter written by Mr. Mulford, the clerk of the corporation of the township of Chilliwack, to Mr. Cruickshank, dated May 15, 1952. It is as follows:

I understand you are aware of the proposed scheme to define and construct a permanent channel for the Vedder river, between the Vedder canal and the Vedder crossing bridge. The interested parties to this scheme at the present time are the provincial government, district of Sumas and the township of Chilliwack.

In the past, the river between these points has been allowed to wander, eating away at the banks and causing periodic flooding. Also there is always the danger of the river jumping its banks and flooding that area between Sardis and the canal in the township, thereby severing the trans-Canada highway, or moving through Yarrow and thereby flooding Sumas municipality.

That is just part of that letter. As I have intimated, I have other communications under various dates with reference to this matter. On August 2 there is a letter signed by Mr. Cruickshank and directed to Mr. Mulford. It reads as follows:

Re: Vedder river project.

The latest that I have from the Minister of Public Works re the above is as follows:—

This correspondence has been carried on with various departments.

—"In view of the interest as represented by other dominion government departments, I am not in a position to make any statement at present but am referring this matter to the other departments concerned to learn if they have any responsibility in contributing to the cost of the project if the latter can be shown to be the responsibility of this federal government."

On October 29, 1952, there was a letter from K. W. Morton, district engineer of the Department of Public Works, to Mr. E. S. Jones, deputy minister of the department of public works of the province of British Columbia. This letter sets out the attitude of the various departments of the government of Canada with respect to this project. I am not going to take time to read it all, but with respect to the military establishment, the Royal Canadian School of Military Engineering at Chilliwack, it states:

This area also was not affected by the 1948 flood. Indeed during the period of this flood the Vedder river did not rise beyond the existing dike at this spot and the camp was at no time threatened.

It also refers to a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare in which it was stated that without having information from officers on the spot it was difficult to make a comment, but if his memory served him well the hospital—referring to the Coqualeetza Indian hospital—was not involved in the severe flood of recent years.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am going to ask the hon. member's co-operation. The Chair in these cases finds itself in a rather difficult position, because sometimes we do not have detailed knowledge of what are the duties and responsibilities of the departments. I would draw to the attention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley that it is the estimates of the engineering and water resources branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources that we are considering at the moment, and that the responsibility, if any, of the federal government for river bank protection and flood control as such does not, I believe, come under this department. Engineering studies for the purpose of making provision against such calamities do.

Not more than a few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre agreed with the minister that the matter of flood control on certain Manitoba rivers and the liability, if any, of the federal government in connection with floods should not be discussed under this department. I realize the hon. member for Fraser Valley will most likely point out to me that three or four items further on there is a specific item dealing with surveys and investigations in the Fraser river basin, and I think the river he is now discussing comes within the Fraser river basin.

However, I take it the committee will not mind if I put the matter this way. There are a great many rivers in Canada which may flood, and I do not believe it is within the duties of the committee to discuss flood damage, and certainly not flood consequences, on these items. I am not ruling the hon. member out of order. I am asking him to bear in mind the remarks I have made, and I would ask that if he and other members who have rivers within their jurisdictions consider it necessary to bring to the attention of the minister of the department the necessity for surveys or investigations in connection with possible flood control, they do so as briefly as possible.

The consequent results to the trans-Canada highway or any other installation do not, I think, come within the ambit of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. The Department of Public Works might be given the duty of building protective works, but certainly it is not the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources which can accept liability for the federal authority, as has been done in previous cases in the Fraser valley and other places, as the result of calamity. I think hon. members will realize the difficulty in which both the minister and myself find ourselves, and will co-operate.

An hon. Member: He will be as brief as possible.

Mr. Patterson: The reason I raise this matter under these estimates is that there has been correspondence with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in this connection, and personal representations have also been made to him. However, if that is the ruling of the Chair I shall abide by it.

Perhaps I might conclude the matter very briefly. As I have intimated, I have had these different communications with reference to the various installations in that area. The matter has been brought to the attention of the department on a number of occasions, but apparently up to the present time the minister has not seen his way clear to accept any responsibility in connection with the situation on the Vedder river. We have presented different plans, and I am going to request the minister to reconsider the submissions that have been made asking for assistance with respect to this project. It is of considerable magnitude, and certainly the municipalities are not able to handle it. A great deal of inconvenience and damage can result to the surrounding areas, and on behalf of the people there I ask the minister to consider the whole situation again.

Mr. Lesage: I shall with pleasure, and I will certainly write the hon. member to let him know of my decision after reconsideration.

Mr. Monteith: Could the minister tell me what stage has been reached in the consideration of the brief presented by the upper Thames valley conservation authority?

Mr. Lesage: The government is considering the matter.

Mr. Monteith: That was the reply the minister gave me in the committee. I presume some further consideration has been given since that time, has it?

Mr. Lesage: Further consideration has been given in the department. I just said that the government was considering the matter.

308. To provide for studies and surveys of the Columbia river watershed in Canada, $641,360.

Mr. Hahn: I do not think this expenditure is completely justifiable. My reason for saying so is the evidence that was submitted to the estimates committee on March 24. I should like to read certain extracts from that evidence to substantiate my statement, and also a newspaper report of a statement attributed to a member of the international joint commission on fisheries. At page 493 there is the following:

Mr. Thatcher: I see, and the item above—topographical services—shows a substantial increase. Would that be for the same reason?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: I mentioned that there was an increase of $250,000 in respect of the study of the feasibility of the diversion—$100,000 for topographical services, $50,000 in drilling investigation, and $100,000 for other professional and special services. We are pretty sure we shall have to go outside our department to have a good part of this work done under contract, for the reason which I have explained, namely, the lack of technical staff.

Mr. Thatcher: Will this increase be likely to do this work?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: We believe it is a beginning. We do not know exactly when it will be possible to give the answer.

Mr. Harkness: It is likely to continue for more than one year?

Mr. Patterson: I think with regard to the diversion study, this year's investigation could show that it was not feasible. In other words we could get information in the first year, in a negative way, to see that there would be no point in going any further.

I am not going to misconstrue that into saying the department thinks at the outset that the project is not feasible.

But if the information which we obtained this year were promising, and particularly if it were a border-line case, we would have to conduct further studies before we could actually determine whether this project was feasible or not, and then it would be quite likely we should need to continue for another year, or maybe for two years.

Mr. Thatcher: Is the reason you wish to divert this river—

Hon. Mr. Lesage: We do not at this time "want" to divert this river. It is not our responsibility for the present to do more than find out whether it would be economically feasible.

Mr. Thatcher: Do you want to divert it so you can use water which the Americans would otherwise use?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: In order to regulate the flow of the Fraser river and have some power sites on the Fraser river which are impossible now.

That is the important part of the question so far as I am concerned. The suggestion is that we might have power sites on the Fraser river. Lest there be any mistake as to interpretation, later the hon. member for Calgary North asked this question:

Mr. Harkness: And your dam sites would be on the Fraser?

Hon. Mr. Lesage: The possibility would be that there would be a series of sites on the river.

On Saturday, April 23, the Vancouver Herald had this to say about power sites, and I quote the heading, "Reid Warns Dams Will Kill Salmon Industry; Fish Must Be Protected Against Obstacle Course." The article reads:

Individual dams or series of dams in the Fraser river would kill the multi-million-dollar sockeye salmon fishery, as long as no method of protecting the fish is found, Senator Tom Reid told the Herald Friday.

Mr. Lesage: Could I ask the hon. member to say who signed this article, and to describe what his knowledge is as to the effect of possible dams on the Fraser river on the salmon fisheries? I should like to know what importance we have to attach to the article from which the hon. member is reading.

Mr. Hahn: If you will just let me continue to read it, you will discover.

Mr. Lesage: I have a right to know who signed that article—

Mr. Hahn: Senator Reid.

Mr. Lesage: —and what his qualifications are.

Mr. Hahn: Senator Tom Reid.

The senator was commenting on a recent proposal of General A. G. L. McNaughton, that water be carried from Columbia river to the Fraser by means of a series of dams, for hydroelectric power purposes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hahn: I see the minister is highly amused at the statement that it could be Senator Reid. Senator Reid is chairman of the international Pacific sockeye commission. I think possibly it might be highly amusing to the minister to discover that the chairman of an international commission for the protection of sockeye salmon is somewhat disturbed about the possibility that there might be a series of dams on the Fraser river. I feel that the senator has had considerably more to do with the fishing industry than any other member in this house. He had a considerable amount to do with the installation of the method of getting these fish up the Fraser river past Hell's Gate at an earlier time when there was considerable difficulty in protecting the salmon.

I wonder just exactly what investigation has been made at this time to ensure that there will be protection for the fishery on the Fraser river.

Mr. Lesage: That is what the whole study is for, and that is why I was asking who the expert was who could say in advance what the result of the surveys will be. The surveys are for the purpose of indicating, among other things, if it is possible to divert the waters of the Columbia river into the Fraser river without endangering the fisheries of the Fraser river. They will indicate also if it is economically feasible and advantageous, but the first condition is that it does not harm the fisheries. That is exactly why these studies are going to be made, and that is why I was surprised to hear that somebody already had the answer before the surveys were made.

Mr. Hahn: Are you planning to discover whether you can divert the river before you discover whether or not the fish can make the grade up half a dozen dams on the Fraser river?

Mr. Lesage: It is all part of the study, because the effect on the fish depends on the height and character of the dams and on the volume of water that might be diverted. The whole study is integrated. You cannot give an answer to one part of the question without giving an answer to the whole question.

Mr. Hahn: That is why I am objecting to this particular expenditure, because you are now proposing to take water from the Columbia river to a particular spot up on the mountainside, and then divert it down into the Fraser, without knowing first whether or not the fish will live.

Mr. Lesage: I have to interrupt the hon. member because I did not say we were proposing to divert the waters of the Columbia to the Fraser. I said we would ask parliament to provide the money to study the possibility of that diversion, to see if it would be possible to divert these waters to the economic advantage of Canada without endangering the salmon fishery of the Fraser. It seems to me that is pretty clear.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Mr. Hahn: It is quite clear that you do not want to divert the river at this time, you just want to spend money to find out if it is feasible.

Mr. Lesage: Without endangering the fisheries.

Mr. Hahn: Before wondering if the diversion is feasible, why not find out if the salmon will make it?

Mr. Lesage: We know the diversion is physically possible, but what we are looking for is the answer—

Mr. Harkness: What is physically possible is financially possible.

Mr. Lesage: I do not want to get into an argument about economic theories tonight. We want to know if it is economically feasible, without endangering the fishery; we know it is physically possible.

Mr. Hahn: You know it is physically possible, then why have you put in here that you want to discover if it is feasible?

Mr. Lesage: Economically feasible.

Mr. Hahn: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that before looking into the economics of it we should discover whether or not—apparently the minister meant economically possible, though he did not say so in his answer—the salmon industry is going to be destroyed. This fact could be discovered through the international commission without spending this sum of $641,360. If the fish cannot make the grade, as I said earlier, we are just throwing this $641,360 down the drain.

Mr. Green: My question concerning this item, Mr. Chairman, is a little different from that of the hon. member for New Westminster. As the minister knows, a lot of impatience has been developing with regard to this Columbia river basin. The provincial government is in a great hurry to get projects moving in that area, and the United States interests seem to be in a great hurry as well. I am wondering whether the amount of this vote is such that there can be some speeding up of the investigations into the Columbia river basin in Canada. We have understood from General McNaughton that it will be some years before this survey is completed. I do notice that the vote this year is considerably higher than the vote last year. Is there any way in which the investigations can be brought to a conclusion at an earlier date than had been expected?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, may I say we hope that by next year we shall know definitely whether a diversion is economically feasible under the conditions I just mentioned.

Suppose that diversion is not feasible. Then we shall know right there that, whatever the total plans for the Columbia are, a dam at Mica creek could be built. That is what I am informed by General McNaughton.

Mr. Green: You know that now, do you not?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, we know that now; but of course it would make a difference at Mica if there is to be a diversion. By next year we shall know definitely about the kind of dam that can be built at Mica.

I do not want to enter into the work of another committee, Mr. Chairman, but this is linked up with what is going on in that committee. It is a sure thing that it will take some time before we can hope to have an understanding with the United States authorities on downstream benefits, and I believe that is the first thing we should do. We should ask the international joint commission, which is the body best prepared for that, to try to work out a formula of some kind for downstream benefits adaptable to all cases; or if such formula cannot be found the international joint commission could agree on a list of principles in order of priority from which a formula could be worked out in each case for downstream benefits.

But again, Mr. Chairman, I am myself out of order, and I shall ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra to allow me next Wednesday, when I come before the committee as a witness, to explain the whole question as regards the implications of downstream benefits, and the full studies on the Columbia and the possibility of a diversion.

Mr. Green: Does this vote provide also for a study of the possibility of diverting the upper waters of the Kootenay river into the headquarters of the Columbia river?

Mr. Lesage: Yes, it deals with the Columbia reference as a whole, I am informed.

Mr. Green: Is that survey to be concluded during the present fiscal year?

Mr. Lesage: Yes.

Mr. Herridge: I listened to the hon. member for New Westminster who quoted Senator Reid. In the other place, and in other places, he has expressed the opinion that this proposed investigation of the Columbia is a most feasible and reasonable project. He is fully in favour of the investigation, and has expressed every confidence in General McNaughton as one who will consider all aspects of the situation.

Mr. Hahn: I am very pleased to get that information from the hon. member who has just taken his seat. But I wish to say this. As I said before, I do not think this expenditure is fully justified in view of what the senator had to say later. I quote from the same article, and these remarks are in quotation marks:

> "After 20 years of study, no one yet has found a way of getting the little fingerling salmon safely over a dam or through a turbine," Senator Reid said.
> The fingerling is the year to year and a half old salmon on its way from the spawning ground out to sea.

The last statement is not in quotation marks. I think we might save the expense of this examination. The senator seems to speak with authority. He says:

> "In three years of research, our commission has found that at a 250-foot dam, the mortality rate for fingerlings is 65 per cent," the senator said.

There have been three years of research already. I continue with the quotation:

> "Everyone has been talking about this mortality rate, but we were the first body in North America to find out the exact facts about it."

This gentleman has a very responsible position, and he certainly seems to be speaking with authority. I do not see the need for an expenditure of $641,360 if we already have the facts of the matter. If he is incapable of acting on the commission, I suggest he be asked to resign.

Mr. Barnett: Since this matter has come up, I should like to make one or two remarks. I should like to make it clear that I certainly do not agree with the hon. member for New Westminster in regard to the inadvisability of the amount included in this vote. I am much more inclined to agree with the point of view expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, that if by virtue of an increase in this grant the progress of this survey can be speeded up, I would be quite willing to support it.

Since the relationship between the possible development of the Fraser river system for power purposes and the sockeye salmon fishery has been mentioned, it would be useful to this committee and to those who are particularly concerned with the problem, if the minister could give us some indication of the form of liaison that has been set up or is contemplated between the work being done by the international joint commission, Canadian section, and the officers and personnel of his department who will be under their direction, and the Pacific salmon fisheries commission, the fisheries research board and the federal Department of Fisheries. There is no question but that this matter is vital to the people of British Columbia, and they will want to be satisfied about any developments that take place on the Fraser.

Mr. Lesage: There is the Fraser river board. A member of the Fraser river board is the chief officer of the federal Department of Fisheries in Vancouver. The Fraser river board is being reconstituted. I am not at liberty at this time to divulge the new terms of reference, nor the number or the identity of the members of the new board, because I have just reached an agreement with the government of British Columbia. It is a joint board. When I was in Victoria on Tuesday I talked to Mr. Sommers, and he asked me to wait until he wired me before making a press release about the new terms of reference and the names of the members of the board. But I can assure hon. members that the fisheries interests will be fully and entirely protected.

Mr. Hahn: In view of what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said, I think I should let it be known now that last year I spoke on the need for adequate research in every industry. I am satisfied that there is need for research if—and I put a condition into this—the work has not been done before.

I shall just refer to what I quoted a short time ago. My understanding was that the senator was speaking with absolute authority; that they had carried on work for three years and were convinced in their own minds that salmon could not swim over these dams. For that reason I suggest we should be careful to get the facts with respect to this before we go ahead and discuss the economic feasibility of spending several million dollars on a project that possibly will never be built because we were told beforehand by someone in authority that we would be destroying another industry by doing just that thing.

309. Fraser river—federal expenditures in connection with investigations to be carried out by "dominion-provincial board Fraser river basin", $127,750.

Mr. Leboe: Is some of this money going to be spent on the north fork of the Fraser or the McGregor river?

Mr. Lesage: I am informed that this covers that part of the Fraser river basin.

Mr. Leboe: Is there a possibility of co-operative action between the provincial government, through the board which has been set up, and the federal government to have on-site power and flood control at the same point on the McGregor river?

Mr. Lesage: The Fraser river board is charged with the responsibility of making engineering studies and surveys; it is not charged with the responsibility of building dams or installing on-site power. I cannot say anything more about the new terms of reference because I have an undertaking with Mr. Sommers, the minister of lands and forests, not to make them public before he does the same in Victoria. I have not received, since I talked to him the other day, the telegram which I have been expecting and which would fix the date.

Mr. Leboe: I was not thinking about the actual construction; I was thinking about the engineering possibilities and investigations to determine whether or not a dam built at that particular place could be used for both flood control and on-site power.

Mr. Lesage: That is correct.

Mr. Leboe: I notice there is a decrease of $37,250 in this item. Because of the urgency in respect to flood control I would have thought that this item would be larger.

Mr. Lesage: This is a matching contribution on the part of the federal government. The British Columbia government really sets the level of expenditure.

Northern administration division—

314. Administration, $306,037.

Mr. Harkness: Is this the point where the minister was going to give me information as to the reduction in freight rates to certain points in the north?

Mr. Lesage: Is the hon. member interested in water transportation rates, and to what point?

Mr. Harkness: I was interested in water and air rates to the points I mentioned, which were Fort Norman, Norman Wells, Yellowknife, Hay River and Fort Smith.

Mr. Lesage: There has been no reduction in freight rates by air from Edmonton; the reductions have been in passenger rates.

Mr. Harkness: None at all?

Mr. Lesage: Not to my knowledge. The reduction in passenger fares has been quite substantial, ranging from 17 per cent to as high as 60 per cent in the fare from Edmonton to Aklavik. I have here a table which gives a comparison of air rates, rail rates, water rates and rail plus water rates from Edmonton to different points in the north. With the consent of the committee I would place this table on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lesage: The table is as follows:

Rates from Edmonton

	Air Freight	Cents per pound Rail to Waterways	Water	Rail plus Water
Fort Smith	11.00	.88	1.15	2.03
Hay River	14.97	.88	2.40	3.28
Yellowknife	14.97	.88	1.90	2.78
Fort Norman ..	39.86	.88	2.84	3.72
Aklavik	60.00	.88	3.84	4.72

Mr. Harkness: I must say I am disappointed to learn that there have been no reductions in freight rates, because I understood the minister to say there had.

Mr. Lesage: I am sorry; the hon. member must have misunderstood me.

Mr. Harkness: I understood the minister to say there had been a 20 per cent reduction in these rates to the north. I am sorry to learn there has been no reduction in air freight rates. I would express a personal opinion that the reason there has been no reduction is the difficulty of providing effective competition in the carrying of air freight into that country.

In the interests of opening up this north country and enabling freight to get there more readily than at present, the minister should exert some influence on the Minister of Transport and the government generally in an effort to remove some of the blocks which exist at the present time against the movement of freight. This may not be the place to discuss this, as it has more concern with the Department of Transport, but I think the minister might profitably exert influence in order to remove some of the blocks which prevent effective competition in the movement of freight by air into the north. This is most necessary if the extremely high rates which now prevail are to be brought down. In the case of air freight from Edmonton to Fort Smith, which is approximately 400 miles, the rate is $11 per hundredweight, which is very high.

I am glad to hear of the reductions that have taken place in the water rates. The whole system has now been modernized, the old wooden barges have been replaced with modern steel barges, and the old tugboats have also, I think, been replaced with new diesel-powered equipment. I should think it would be possible to reduce these rates further. If as a result of that reduction there were an increase in the amount of traffic—which would no doubt be the case—then once again the rates could be reduced. In other words this is the sort of thing that snowballs and mounts up. I would hope that when we discuss these estimates next year there will have been a reduction in air rates and a further reduction in these water rates.

Mr. Churchill: With regard to item 314, dealing with the Northwest Territories and Eskimo problems, I should like to say this. I do not want to go into the whole matter of the Eskimo population. We had a good discussion of that in the estimates committee. In the information that was brought out, which is scattered over about 30 pages of the reports of that committee, we discovered the total number of Eskimos in the country. Seven thousand are in the Northwest Territories, and 2,000 are under the administration of this department in northern Quebec. They are dependent for subsistence very largely on caribou.

One of the things that was left incomplete in the committee was this. I was asking questions concerning the 2,000 Eskimos in the northern part of Quebec who at one time, according to Mr. Cunningham, who gave us most of the information on this problem, were in a relatively happy state as a hunting population because caribou were extensive. In recent years, however, the caribou have entirely disappeared, and further evidence brought out the fact that these particular Eskimos are being trained to become water hunters, which they were not before, and to hunt the seal and walrus.

It was mentioned that they do not have immediate adaptability and it is not easy to retrain them. I asked if that area of northern Quebec could be restocked with caribou. It was pointed out that this had been considered, but it was thought an extraordinarily slow process and that therefore other methods of providing for the livelihood of these people were being considered.

That is the point which I think was left incomplete. I wonder if the minister would take into consideration again the restocking of that area with caribou, even if it does take a long time. There has been considerable experience in Canada in, for example, the preservation of buffalo and elk. They are living in restricted areas, and as they multiply they keep up their numbers. There has also been considerable experience in developing reindeer herds. We were informed that the 800,000-odd caribou to the west of Hudson bay are sufficient to support the Eskimo population in that area who are dependent as hunters on caribou.

For the northern Quebec area, using the estimate we have been given, it would take perhaps 200,000 caribou to support the Eskimo families there, who require, we are told, between 70 and 100 caribou a year to give them sustenance. As I say, we have had experience in saving other types of wildlife, and in restocking. I read an article in a newspaper the other day, which may or may not be accurate, stating that moose had been non-existent in Newfoundland until they were taken there 55 years ago, but now, even with the hunting, the moose population has increased to 50,000.

Would it not be wise to reconsider introducing caribou into that particular area? The seal and walrus might fail; then we are left with the problem of simply providing subsistence for the native population. The reason the native population has been placed in these dire circumstances was brought out in the committee and I shall not go into it again now, but I simply ask the minister to reconsider this matter. Next year we shall put two or three questions to him and see what the answers are.

Mr. Lesage: I shall, with pleasure.

Item agreed to.

Forest conservation and wildlife management including Wood Buffalo park—
318. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $134,639.

Mr. Herridge: I am acting as a sort of chore boy tonight. I have been asked to bring up a matter concerning the Yukon. I do not know whether this is the right item, but this concerns the Yukon so I suppose I can fire in all directions. I have been asked to bring to the minister's attention certain motor vehicle regulations—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit us to pass item 318, which deals with wildlife, and go on to item 319.

Mr. Harkness: There is nothing wilder than a motorcycle.

Item agreed to.

Yukon Territory, including forest conservation—
319. Operation and maintenance, $624,629.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased that you put me in order. I have been asked to bring to the minister's attention certain motor vehicle ordinances that have been given effect in the Yukon.

Mr. Lesage: On a point of order; I am sorry, but this involves a territorial ordinance and I have nothing to say about it. There is autonomy in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. There are local councils, and the motor vehicle ordinances come under the jurisdiction of the elected members of the Yukon council.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Green: But you always follow their recommendations.

Mr. Herridge: The point is that there are residents of northern British Columbia who think the tariffs for trucks entering the Yukon are excessive.

Mr. Lesage: I shall bring to the attention of the commissioner and through him the elected representatives of the Yukon council the representations of the hon. member, but I cannot force them to do anything. This is really a provincial matter.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, someone over there is calling "carried". I have listened to him long enough—

Mr. Knowles: It is the specialist on inane remarks on the other side who is calling "carried".

Mr. Herridge: This concerns certain truckers in northern British Columbia. I am glad the minister explained that this matter comes under the jurisdiction of the territorial council, and I am glad he has said he will bring these complaints to its notice. I thank him for that.

Item agreed to.

Forestry branch—
Forest research division—
322. Operation and maintenance, $1,030,604.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether the forest research division of his department has made any further headway in the matter of research into the extent of fire damage caused in this country by tailor-made cigarettes, and whether or not anything is going to be done about it?

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, the last news I had was that it had not been possible to find a kind of cigarette that would not light fires in forests if thrown around while still lighted.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, quite seriously there are a number of people and organizations that are concerned about this matter.

Mr. Lesage: I know.

Mr. Knowles: Some of those most directly concerned with forestry operations have regulations prohibiting the use of tailor-made cigarettes in those areas. As a matter of fact, while it was not exactly in the minister's department, I was reading an item in the newspaper again this evening about a fire not very far from here believed to be caused by a cigarette. This is a matter that deserves intense research, in the hope that something might be done to minimize the fires that take place and the loss of life which is the result of many of these fires.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, you went over item 327 so fast that I did not notice it. I wonder whether the minister would tell me why the contribution to New Brunswick in connection with combating the budworm is being reduced.

Mr. Lesage: As the hon. member for Royal is aware, this is a contribution to a three-way operation. The amounts we vote each year are determined by the program, which is the responsibility of Forest Protection Limited, which is one of the three parties to the agreement.

Mr. Brooks: Is that an indication that the situation is fairly well under control?

Mr. Lesage: I might tell the hon. member that the government agreed this week to extend the program for a further three years, to continue on the same basis, because only $1,585,000 will have been spent on March 31, 1956. The program will therefore be extended to March 31, 1959, the ceiling remaining at the original $3 million as far as we are concerned.

331. Grant to pulp and paper research institute of Canada, $130,000.

Mr. Lesage: The increase in this vote was occasioned by a preliminary arrangement with the institute to provide additional assistance in order to permit that organization to build a new laboratory to take care of increased research accommodation.

Since the printing of the estimates an alternative to this preliminary arrangement has been tentatively agreed on, through which the laboratory will be built by the government and made available to the institute on the condition that the present annual grant of $100,000 will cease at the end of the present fiscal year, and that no further government financial assistance will be forthcoming.

Under those circumstances the amount of $130,000 should be reduced to the original grant of $100,000 as provided under the existing agreement. I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Finance—because I want to please him—if he will move that the item be reduced from $130,000 to $100,000.

Mr. Harris: With pleasure.

The Deputy Chairman: On item 331, it is moved by the Minister of Finance that the item of $130,000 be reduced to $100,000. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I may still discuss item 331, may I not?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I was wondering what is the amount of the investment we are going to make in this laboratory.

Mr. Lesage: I cannot hear the hon. member.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): How much are we going to spend on this new laboratory that we are building? Have you any figure on that?

Mr. Lesage: It is not certain yet, but I believe it is about $2 million. The annual contribution of $100,000 in these last years amounted to about one-tenth or a little less of the total expenditure. The research institute is spending about $1 million. This expenditure will increase with the increased facilities which will be provided by this new laboratory to be built with money provided in the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Barnett: There is one point I should like to raise on this matter. Apparently we are spending public moneys in connection with research. I wonder whether the minister could give us a word or two as to the nature of the research work which is being conducted by this institute?

Mr. Lesage: It is research in the processing and manufacture of pulp and paper. As members of the committee are aware, this pulp and paper accounts for the highest figure of our exports. We are all the time trying to improve the processing and manufacture of this commodity which is vital to the economy of Canada.

Mr. Barnett: I have just one further question. The particular point of my question was this. I am glad to see that the Minister of Justice is sitting behind the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. One of the problems which concern many people who have some close association with the pulp and paper industry—I refer to those who reside in areas near at hand—is the rather unpleasant odour that is produced. My particular point in raising this question is whether any portion of these funds which are being provided in this estimate are to be devoted to research looking to the elimination of what some of us consider to be quite a serious public nuisance; and whether or not, because of the fact that parliament is being asked to provide this vote, the government and the minister might have any authority to direct the investigations in that particular direction.

I might say that I know some research has been done into such matters, but there are many people in Canada—and some of them live in my own constituency—who would be quite interested in seeing an accelerated program of research into that particular aspect of the pulp and paper industry. Can the minister give us any indication as to how the situation stands in that connection?

Mr. Lesage: Oh, yes. I will certainly direct the attention of the pulp and paper research institute of Canada to the representations made by my hon. friend.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item as amended carry?

Item as amended agreed to.

Canadian government travel bureau—

333. To assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, $1,561,367.

Mr. Herridge: Strangely enough, Mr. Chairman, this evening I was talking to an old-time resident of Kootenay West who was actually born in the district. We were discussing the function and purpose of the Canadian travel bureau. He thought it would be a good idea for me to bring to the attention of the committee the summer bonspiel that is conducted annually at Nelson. It is a most unusual event, which attracts people from all parts of Canada.

In discussing this matter, this gentleman said he thought in the past the Canadian travel bureau, in its publications, had not given sufficient notice to this event. He suggested that I should suggest to the minister that, in view of the almost nationally-known nature of this event and its importance to the Kootenays, he should bring to the attention of the Canadian travel bureau the advantage it would be to Canadians generally to advertise it in their publications.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions and ask leave to sit again?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: On Monday we shall move to go into supply and when the motion is carried will call four departments and have them stand. We shall then take Bill No. 259, to amend the Railway Act, the resolution with respect to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, the resolution with respect to the Canada Elections Act, second reading of Bill No. 351, respecting Canadian National Railways, second reading of Bill No. 350, to amend the Blind Persons Act, second reading of Bill No. 352, respecting meat and meat products.

The above will be the order of business for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. Should the debate on the supply motion carry over into these days and these items be completed before Wednesday adjournment, we shall move to go into supply again on the understanding that if there is no debate we shall not call any additional departments but will proceed with the estimates of post office, labour, veterans affairs and agriculture, and continue throughout Thursday and Friday.

It being fourteen minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

293. Departmental administration, $509,310.

294. Northern research co-ordination centre, including a grant of $5,000 to the Arctic Institute of North America; and an amount of $10,000 for grants in aid of northern research subject to allocation by the treasury board, $60,595.

National parks branch—

295. Branch administration, $86,425.

National parks and historic sites services—

296. Administration, operation and maintenance, $4,560,496.

297. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and new equipment, $4,609,032.

298. Grant to Jack Miner migratory bird foundation, $5,000.

299. Special grant to the antiquarian and numismatic society to help defray costs of urgent work for the restoration and preservation of the Chateau de Ramezay, Montreal, $15,000.

300. Grant in aid of the development of the international peace garden in Manitoba, $10,000.

WHEAT—REPORT ON 1953-54 POOL OPERATIONS

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am now in a position to make a statement about the results of the 1953-54 wheat pool. This pool was closed as at April 29. I had suggested an earlier date but in the opinion of the Canadian wheat board a more satisfactory accounting could be made if the closing of the pool were delayed until after the opening of navigation on the great lakes and on the St. Lawrence. Therefore, the government agreed to the closing date recommended by the wheat board, namely, April 29, 1955.

From the standpoint of a marketing operation, the 1953-54 pool was the most difficult in the post-war history of the wheat board.

In the first place, as hon. members will recall, the 1953 wheat crop was the third in a succession of three bumper crops produced in the prairie provinces. In spite of a very high level of exports and domestic demand in 1951-52 and 1952-53, substantial stocks of wheat remained in elevators on July 31, 1953. Sales from the 1953-54 pool could not begin until these carryover stocks from the previous pool had been reduced to reasonable proportions. Actually, sales from the 1953-54 pool did not begin until February 1, 1954. To put the matter briefly, stocks of wheat were carried in the 1953-54 pool from August 1, 1953 to April 29, 1955—a period of 21 months. Sales operations were carried on over a period of 15 months. It is not surprising, therefore, that carrying charges applicable to the 1953-54 pool were substantially higher than in any previous pooling period administered by the wheat board.

Now, let me describe briefly the marketing situation faced by the wheat board during the life of the pool. Following the unprecedented export demand for cereals in 1952-53, world demand for wheat fell away sharply in the crop year 1953-54. As the house knows, our exports of wheat and flour in that crop year were 255 million bushels as compared with 385 million bushels in the preceding crop year. This decline in world demand affected particularly Canada, the United States and Australia.

While world demand improved during the first nine months of the present crop year, competition has been extremely keen and during this period the United States surplus disposal program has emerged as one of the chief factors in the international wheat position. Canadian export sales have improved, but not to the extent that would achieve the rapid movement of wheat hoped for earlier in the crop year.

The United States has a triple-barrelled surplus disposal program in effect. Wheat may be bartered for strategic materials, may be distributed to importing countries for local currencies which are usually left in the recipient country for development or other purposes, or may be given away as a relief measure. So far the cost of procurement of wheat in the United States for surplus disposal abroad has amounted to over $200 million. In addition to this surplus disposal program, which cannot be regarded in any way as ordinary commercial transactions, the United States have during the present crop year increased their export subsidies in order to effect sales. As at the end of March, the United States had increased their exports of wheat and flour by over 60 million bushels as compared with the previous crop year, and the increase will undoubtedly be larger by the end of the crop year.

The wheat board and the government expect, and are fully prepared, to deal with competition in world wheat markets. The record shows that we have met this competition most effectively. Canada has retained a high proportion of commercial markets throughout the world. In recent months, however, the surplus disposal programs of the United States are being pressed to the point where, in our opinion, they are having a disturbing effect upon commercial markets.

1953-54 Wheat Pool Operations

The purpose behind the surplus disposal efforts of the United States is to increase consumption in areas that cannot afford to buy wheat. Canada has no quarrel with that principle. It is doubtful, however, whether anything is gained, and certainly much is lost, if surplus disposal programs are pushed to the point where they disturb normal trading relationships.

I should add that during the period of the 1953-54 pool, wheat prices declined substantially and this, of course, has lowered the return which the wheat board have been able to secure from their sales. With these general observations in mind, let me deal now with the financial results of the 1953-54 wheat pool.

Producers' deliveries of wheat to the pool were 398 million bushels. A total of 148·7 million bushels, including 21·4 million bushels of priced open sales contracts, were transferred to the 1953-54 pool from the 1952-53 pool as at January 30, 1954. Deliveries from others than producers were 1·4 million bushels, bringing the total volume of wheat in the pool to 548·1 million bushels. Completed sales to the close of business on April 29 amounted to 384 million bushels. Therefore there remained as at April 29 a balance of 164·1 million bushels. These stocks included 42·9 million bushels covered by priced open sales contracts and unsold stocks of 121·2 million bushels.

In closing out the 1953-54 pool the open sales contracts were transferred to the 1954-55 pool at contract prices and unsold stocks were transferred on the basis of board selling prices for April 29 less an allowance for carrying charges subsequent to the date of transfer and an allowance for market risk in the case of certain slow-moving grades.

The final operating surplus in the pool is $64,725,147.55 from which must be deducted the 10 cents per bushel interim payment made last fall. This payment amounted to $38,638,704.15. After providing for P.F.A.A. levy on the interim and final payments and after allowing for final payment expenses, the surplus for distribution to producers as a final payment is $25,411,407.89.

On producers' deliveries of 398 million bushels the average final payment is 6·384 cents per bushel.

The final net payments to producers on the principal grades of wheat are as follows:

No. 1 northern	6·262¢	per bushel
No. 2 northern	4·771	"
No. 3 northern	5·333	"
No. 4 northern	8·382	"
No. 5 wheat	10·715	"
No. 6 wheat	13·303	"
Feed wheat	16·459	"

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Prior to the deduction of the P.F.A.A. levy, the net price realized by producers for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver will be $1·56426 per bushel.

The Durum wheat position continued very strong in 1953-54 and again in the present crop year. The final payments on Durum grades are as follows:

No. 1 Amber Durum	51·987 cents per bushel
No. 2 Amber Durum	52·307 cents per bushel
No. 3 Amber Durum	56·427 cents per bushel
No. 4 Amber Durum	55·063 cents per bushel
No. 5 Amber Durum	19·159 cents per bushel
No. 6 Amber Durum	21·139 cents per bushel

Prior to the deduction of the P.F.A.A. levy, the net price realized by producers for No. 1 Amber Durum will be $2·12613 per bushel.

There will be final payments on grades of wheat which did not participate in the interim payment last fall. For example, the final net payment on No. 2 Garnet is 5·105 cents per bushel; on No. 2 Alberta Winters, 3·002 cents per bushel; and on No. 2 C.W. Soft White Springs, 13·798 cents per bushel.

To complete the story, here are representative board selling prices applicable to the 1953-54 pool. The average selling price for No. 1 northern wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver was in round figures $1·73 per bushel. The corresponding result in the case of the 1952-53 pool was $1·90 per bushel. Therefore, by reason of the decline in wheat prices the board in 1953-54 received 17 cents per bushel less than in the preceding pool, measured, of course, by the return for No. 1 northern wheat. The lower level of board selling prices is reflected in the prices which producers realized on their deliveries to the 1953-54 pool. I have already referred to the relatively high carrying charges in this pool; the actual increase as compared with the 1952-53 pool was approximately 8½ cents per bushel. In these two factors, lower selling prices and increased carrying charges, we have the difference between prices realized by producers. The distribution of final payment cheques will commence before the end of this month.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Would the minister allow an observation on the statement he has made and a couple of questions?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will allow questions but no observations.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is for the Speaker to say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The farmers will be disappointed as a result of what has happened.

Is it a fact that the United States is engaged in a policy of disposal of surplus wheat by way of relief and also through currency deals to a degree that has interfered with the world market for wheat? Will the minister give figures as to the total amount paid during the pool year for storage, and will he also give some indication why it is that Canada's share of an expanding world wheat market declined so substantially during the first eight months of this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Well, the disposal program of the United States has affected us seriously in our minor markets such as Israel and Norway, smaller countries that usually buy substantially from Canada. This year they are taking wheat from the United States either as relief or on currency deals. I do not think the world price of wheat is affected particularly except as we find it necessary to lower our price to meet the premiums paid on United States wheat. Our price has remained stable now for several months. I think that answers the first question. As to the second question—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The total amount of storage charges.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): —I cannot of course give the figures offhand. I think my hon. friend might put that question on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister mentioned that it was very high this year, 8½ cents a bushel higher than the year before. How much was the total?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do not carry the total figure in my mind. That is a matter that will have to be referred to the wheat board and the easiest way for my hon. friend and for me is for him to put it on the order paper. Then it will go to the wheat board automatically.

The third question was what?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why was it that Canada's share of the world market fell away in the first eight months of this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is difficult to assess Canada's share of the world wheat market at this time. Various wheat comes on the market at various periods. As my hon. friend knows, for the first four months of the eight months' period we can only ship out of Atlantic or Pacific ports. I do not believe you can assess Canada's share of the world market until the end of the crop year. We are more than holding our own in our principal markets. Our over-all share may be down due to the fact we are being hurt in the smaller markets. I doubt if any great light can be shed on our share of world markets at this particular time.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask a question of the minister. Is the government of Canada considering adopting any policy in order to increase our share of the world wheat market or to recover our share of the world wheat market, such as accepting local currencies or following a policy of making wheat available whenever there is a famine?

There is another question I should like to ask arising out of the statement the minister has made. It concerns the very low and disappointing final payment. I am wondering if the government and the minister would consider making available immediately an interim payment on the 1954 crop in order to at least alleviate the very serious financial catastrophe in western Canada?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The government is always considering every means of increasing Canada's share of the world markets. If we decide on any different procedure than that being followed at the moment, I shall announce it immediately in the house.

So far as the second question is concerned, I think the producers in western Canada believe that, in a period of congestion, the present price of wheat has been holding up very well. I might say that Canada is largely responsible for the fact that the price of wheat has not collapsed. We have refused to be panicked. I believe that, considering the situation of world supplies which are dropping, it would be very unwise for Canada to enter into a give-away program simply for the purpose of reducing our wheat surplus.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say whether an interim payment is being considered, because the payment he has announced today amounts to only about $150 per western farmer, and that will not go very far.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I point out that this follows a prairie farm assistance payment of about $28 million. It is, of course, quite impossible to consider an interim payment on the wheat of the last crop year, since very little of that wheat has been sold.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I direct a question to the minister consequent upon his statement? The minister said that the wheat board and the government expect and are fully prepared to deal with competition in the world wheat markets. What steps has the government or the wheat board taken to meet this competition in world wheat markets of which he speaks?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Very aggressive selling in every world market; we have agents in every world market. I believe that considering the fact we are selling our wheat for cash and others are giving it away, our position has been very well maintained.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the minister say a word in explanation of the statement which I understood him to make that the surplus disposal plans of the United States, which he outlined in considerable detail, have not affected the price? Would he explain that a little further?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The price is established by the principal exporters and by the principal importers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Including the United States.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The United States program has not affected, for instance, the market in the United Kingdom or the market in certain other principal countries. Such markets establish the world price. Nevertheless, as part of their program, the United States has disposed of $200 million worth of wheat in smaller markets under the three programs I mentioned, and have by so doing curtailed the government's ability to sell wheat in those markets.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY OF CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 379, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend the independence of parliament provisions of the Senate and House of Commons Act so as to make it uniform that no person shall be at one and the same time a federal cabinet minister and a director of a company incorporated under any act of parliament.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AUSTRIAN PEACE TREATY—EFFECT ON STATUS OF DISPLACED PERSONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the signature of the Austrian state treaty, I requested our minister in Vienna to transmit to Chancellor Raab a message of congratulations on behalf of the Canadian government. The message was delivered to the Austrian chancellor yesterday, Sunday, May 15.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that on Monday, May 9, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) made a reference to article 16 of the draft Austrian treaty which was then being reviewed in Vienna by the ambassadors of the four powers in collaboration with the Austrian government. As members of the house are aware, article 16 of the draft treaty dealt with displaced persons and refugees in terms which might have meant requiring Austria to facilitate the return of refugees to their countries of origin against their will. The house will be glad to learn that the four powers and Austria agreed to delete this article from the draft treaty and that the text of the treaty signed in Vienna yesterday does not contain any provision under which displaced persons and refugees now residing in Austria could be forced to return to their country of origin.

[Later:]

BIG FOUR MEETING—EXCHANGE OF PARLIAMENTARIANS WITH RUSSIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is he in a position to say anything regarding the "summit" meeting which has been arranged for among the big four powers, and what stand Canada has taken with reference to that matter? Second, has he anything further to report respecting the tentative invitation by the U.S.S.R. to parliamentarians of various countries outside the iron curtain to visit that country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since my hon. friend spoke to me about the last part of his question this morning I have had an opportunity of seeing what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said about this aspect of the question and what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said in this house on April 1. I am afraid that at the present time there is nothing useful that can be added to what has been said already, both by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Prime Minister. The matter which my hon. friend raises is now being noted and will be followed through by the officials of the department and brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs when he returns from Europe some time this week.

With regard to the first part of the question, as my hon. friend and other members know, there have been important developments during the past week. The German federal republic has entered NATO and into the full political and defence association with the western nations which we have hoped to achieve for so long. A state treaty for Austria has been signed and 10 years of occupation ended. The leading western powers have invited the Soviet union to a meeting, both of heads of governments and of foreign ministers, and the Soviet union has accepted the invitation.

The Soviet union has tabled a series of proposals at the disarmament talks in London which contain significant changes of policy on some points relating to disarmament and which may point to some of the subjects to be discussed at a four power meeting. At a conference in Warsaw, the Soviet union has set up a unified command for its forces and the forces of its satellites in eastern Europe. We learn that Marshal Bulganin and Mr. Khrushchev will visit Yugoslavia.

So we may ask, what do all these rapid developments imply so far as relaxation of tension and a European and even world settlement are concerned? So far as the western nations are concerned, the various steps in their policies have been intended to lead eventually to peaceful negotiation of outstanding differences between east and west to remove the risk of world war. The invitation extended to the Soviet union to participate in discussions both between heads of governments and foreign ministers establishes this intention on the part of the western powers. It underlines the fervent desire of western nations to find any possible way of arriving at a peaceful settlement of outstanding issues based on recognition of the legitimate security interests and national freedom of the nations most directly concerned.

We may well ask, what are the Soviet intentions? The final signing of the Austrian state treaty and the apparent concessions on disarmament do lead one to hope for a greater willingness to discuss other problems. The extent of Soviet diplomatic activity does suggest that various far-reaching changes may be planned.

The Canadian government naturally welcomes the fact that high level talks between the leading western powers and the Soviet union will take place. We think that considerable progress can be made at these talks and that there are compelling reasons of national interest on both sides for representatives of these nations to examine the fundamental differences between them in the immediate future. We have noted the expressed desires of some Soviet leaders to negotiate with the west in spite of the basic ideological differences. We have noted the concessions made on specific points. We hope that the Soviet government will continue to respond to the deep desire of people in all countries for peaceful solutions of international problems.

QUESTIONS

"WILLIAM CARSON"

Mr. Buchanan:

When will the William Carson start regular runs between North Sydney, Nova Scotia and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland?

Mr. Langlois (Gaspe): It has not yet been found possible to fix a date for the commencement of regular service by the William Carson.

CHILD GUIDANCE CENTRE, BURNABY, B.C.—GRANTS

Mr. Goode:

1. What is the amount of grants already offered to the government of British Columbia for the child guidance centre and day hospital, Burnaby, British Columbia?
2. What further grants are contemplated?

Mr. Martin:

1. $15,000.

2. If requests for further assistance are received from the province on behalf of this centre, they will be considered within the terms of the national health program.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. Argue:

1. Have any organizations asked, since July 1, 1954, that family allowances be (a) increased; (b) decreased?
2. If so, how many in each category, and what are their names?
3. How many persons, if any, by letter or by signing a petition have asked, since July 1, 1954, that family allowances be (a) increased; (b) decreased?

WHEAT STORAGE

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of wheat were in elevator and terminal storage in Canada as of the 30th July, 1954?
2. What was the total amount paid for elevator and terminal storage for all wheat in storage between the 1st July, 1953 and the 30th July, 1954?
3. Were any terminal elevators or other crop storage facilities owned by the government leased to private companies or agencies during each of the crop years of 1952, 1953 and 1954?
4. If so, where were each of them located and what companies were the lessees?

GRAIN IN STORAGE

Mr. Argue:

1. Does the Department of Trade and Commerce issue statistics showing quantities of grain on hand in Canada?
2. If so, what is the date of the most recent issue of such statistics?
3. What was the quantity of each type of grain on hand?
4. How much in each case was held (a) on farms in each province; (b) in country elevators in each province; (c) in terminals; (d) any other position?
5. How are such statistics obtained?

6. How many persons make such reports and what is the occupation of the majority?
7. Has the department been informed by any farm organization that such reports are not accurate?
8. If so, what are the names of such farm organizations and in what way is it alleged that such reports are inaccurate?
9. On what type of grain was this difference claimed, and to what extent?
10. What is the difference, if any, between the quantity estimated by the department and that estimated by any farm organization?

Mr. Dickey: Return tabled.

PAYMENTS TO DOCTORS AND DENTISTS, SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How much has been paid to medical doctors and dental surgeons in Saskatchewan by all departments of government in each of the years, 1953, 1954 and 1955?
2. What are the names of each and every one of said medical doctors and dental surgeons, their respective addresses and the total amounts paid to each of them during the said periods?

COMPANY DIRECTORS—CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. Are any cabinet ministers directors of corporations?
2. If so, what cabinet ministers hold directorships?
3. In what companies are these directorships held?

FEDERAL BRIDGES

Mr. Johnston (Bow River):

1. What bridges used by motor vehicles are owned by the federal government, federal corporations or commissions, or federally-owned transportation systems?
2. Which of the bridges are free of tolls for motor vehicle use?
3. What are the gross revenues, operating expenses and net operating income of Jacques Cartier and Victoria bridges from the year in which collection of tolls was begun for motor vehicles on each of these bridges?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION ACCOUNTS

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., exchanged between the office of the Auditor General and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and/or the Minister of National Revenue, since January 1, 1950, relating to the accounts of the said corporation.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Speaker, in connection with this motion may I say that I have been trying to get in touch with the Auditor General who returned to town over the week end. I shall not raise further objection at this time than I did on a previous occasion, and the motion will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Motion stands.

[Mr. Argue.]

DAUPHIN, MAN., INDIAN SCHOOL

Mr. Zaplitny:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and other documents, exchanged between the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or his department and any person or organization, relating to the construction of an Indian residential school at Dauphin, Manitoba, from January 1, 1954 to date.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now tabled.

SUCCESSION DUTY ACT—INFORMATION

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of any order in council, agreement, or other document authorizing the communication, to a person or persons not in the service of the government of Canada, of any information obtained under the provisions of the Dominion Succession Duty Act, or establishing the legal entitlement of such person or persons to receive such information or to inspect or have access to any written statement furnished under the provisions of that act.

Mr. McCann: In connection with this motion may I say that the officials of the department were to get in touch with the mover to see whether or not he would be satisfied with the documents that have to do with the province of Ontario, which I think are the ones he is most interested in.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think it is quite that way. One of the deputy ministers telephoned me this morning and asked whether I would be satisfied to have produced a sample copy. That would be quite satisfactory.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion to be dropped?

Mr. McCann: Stands.

Mr. Fulton: The motion calls for documents having a bearing on this matter and my understanding is that the department is suggesting that they produce only a sample document rather than the whole series which might be available, on the understanding that if we felt that the inquiry which we have in mind was not satisfied by the production of the sample document I might ask for others. For the purposes of the present motion I would be quite content to have produced a sample of the agreement. Perhaps the motion should be adopted and satisfied by the production of only one sample copy.

Mr. McCann: That is quite agreeable, subject to the reservations which the mover has made.

Motion agreed to.

GUARANTY TRUST CO.—CAPITAL TRUST CO.—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda and other documents exchanged between any department of government and (a) Guaranty Trust Company of Canada; (b) Capital Trust Company, since January 1, 1945.

Mr. St. Laurent: There is no objection to this motion but of course it would not apply to anything that by statute is made privileged.

Mr. Speaker: Motion agreed to with the reservation indicated by the right hon. Prime Minister.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO SUPER CONTINENTAL SERVICE STOPPING AT BRANDON NORTH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a question some time ago by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and in response to personal inquiries by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Weir), I informed the house that it was not the intention to make Brandon North a stop for the Super Continental.

The Canadian National Railways now advise that in the light of actual experience of two weeks' operation of the new train the management are satisfied that the Super Continental can make a conditional stop at Brandon North without interfering with schedules. Accordingly, it has been decided that a conditional stop will be made at Brandon North for passengers to or from Nakina and east, or to or from Edmonton and west.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

INQUIRY RESPECTING REINTRODUCTION OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of citation 348 in Beauchesne, second edition, may I ask the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) if he intends to reintroduce at this session of parliament his bill to amend the Canada Elections Act with respect to election expenses?

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member answers the question, I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred the Chair to citation 348.

Mr. Knowles: Citation 348 in the second edition, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I have always understood that a question to be asked of a member had to do with affairs of the house with which he was connected, and was not asking him if he was about to introduce a bill in the future.

I think the hon. member under the circumstances should not ask the question of the hon. member for Quebec South. He can telephone him tomorrow.

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I know the hon. member is always willing to answer, but if we were to follow this course I am afraid it would lead to breaking the rules, and I do not think we should allow that.

Mr. Knowles: Then maybe the hon. member will introduce his bill at the earliest opportunity.

SUPPLY

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

IRRIGATION—SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): In rising to take advantage of the opportunity that the making of this motion permits, I wish to refer to the statement that has been made by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture, or rather the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is sometimes difficult to know which department looks after which, with the distribution of marketing as between these two departments.

Mr. Gardiner: It has never been anywhere else but there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a statement that will be received with deep regret on the part of the farming population generally that depends for its livelihood upon the marketing of wheat. Indeed, by the action of this government, on the basis of purchasing power during the period 1935 to 1939, farmers will be receiving on the farm a price of about 58 cents a bushel. When agriculture is not prosperous the Canadian people cannot be prosperous, for one-seventh of the population is directly dependent on agriculture and a further large segment of our population engaged in industry, transportation, etc., is directly affected. It has been estimated that farmers purchase for the average family four times more than does the urban family. I know that there will be a profound sense of disappointment on the part of western farmers when they are advised that the amount that they are to receive in the cut-off of the pool will be slightly over 6 cents a bushel. What is happening follows in consequence of what we of the opposition had warned against for several years—loss of markets arising through the failure of this government to act, when the portents and indications demanded effective action.

The wheat producer is receiving a disappointing final payment, one of the reasons being that failure to act. Since 1950 we of the opposition have been endeavouring to interest the government in the convening of a British commonwealth trade conference. The answer on every occasion has been that such a course was unnecessary. In the 1953 election the optimistic ministers of the government contended that there was nothing to be concerned about regarding the loss of markets and that Canada had so many markets she could scarcely produce enough to meet their demands.

We find ourselves now in a position dangerous to the economy of this country. The minister's attitude today was far removed from that ultra-optimism he exuded in the past. Today his attitude was one of realism based on experience. The failure to take the initiative during the last several years, based upon danger signals which indicated the threat and the peril to the Canadian wheat farmer directly and indirectly to the people of Canada, is now bringing its reward. I asked the minister how much were the carrying charges on the wheat in storage last year, and he said that was a question for the order paper. It is extremely hard to get answers to that question, Mr. Speaker. For a considerable length of time we have tried to ascertain what those carrying charges are. If I took him down correctly, the minister said that the increase in the carrying charges in the last year now being wound up was 8½ cents per bushel. What those carrying charges are, we do not know. Three or four years ago they amounted to $17 million a year.

Two years or two and one-half years ago my recollection is that, on the basis of computation although not on information received from the responsible minister or the department, they amounted to some $25 million. That is a tremendous amount. On the basis of information that one is able to secure, I believe it is safe to say that the Canadian farmer in the last year has had taken from him in storage charges the amount of at least $65,000 a day. Whether or not those figures be correct, I do not know; but the amount has been tremendous and there are still in the elevators of this country large quantities of wheat which, to all intents and purposes, may be unmarketable. For the last year or so members on this side of the house have been endeavouring to get the minister to place before the house and the country a picture of the so-called aggressive policy for the marketing of the farmers' wheat, but we have not been able to secure any information.

On May 12 the Canadian Press reported the situation. It is one dangerous in its import, one that challenges the Canadian economy. The report reads:

> Canada's share of an expanding world wheat market has declined while that of the United States has increased. Thus the United States has recaptured the lead from Canada as the world's top exporter.

That is all within the last few years. What is this government's policy? You cannot blame the wheat board because the wheat board acts under the express direction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the ministers of this government. What is that policy? What has been done? What active measures are being taken? My friend the hon. member for Assiniboia asked this afternoon and he received the usual illusory, uncertain, indefinite answer which indicated that the question might be answered in a general way by saying that no one need concern himself; for after all, this government knows best and things will turn out all right in the end. The Canadian Press report continues:

> In the first eight months of the current crop year which began last August, total exports from the four major shippers—Canada, the U.S., Australia and Argentina—increased by 102,700,000 bushels to 517,500,000 from 414,800,000 a year ago, the bureau of statistics reported today.

Canada's shipments increased by 1,800,000 bushels out of an increase of 102,700,000 bushels during the course of the year. What of this government, that should have acted to provide markets for Canadian wheat, particularly when it enjoys a reputation for being the best wheat in the world? The report goes on to say this:

> However, Canada's shipments increased only by 1,800,000 bushels to 172,700,000—
> —while those of the U.S. jumped by 64,200,000 to 189,900,000. The U.S. has led the world in wheat exports in most post-war years but in the first eight months of last year was far behind Canada—

The United States is trying to find markets. The Canadian government is hoping to find markets.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We are looking for cash markets.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My right hon. friend makes an interruption but he did not answer the question today as to what the government is doing. The farmers of Canada want to know that.

> This year the United States has been putting on a big export drive . . .

I ask the minister to tell the people of this country what kind of drive the wheat board and this government have been putting on.

Mr. Fraser (Peterborough): None.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it has been a drive, it has been a pedestrian one. Then the report goes on to mention that the United States has been giving some wheat away. I have asked the minister several times during the last year the question whether the United States was undermining the wheat market of the world by such action. I think in every case—and I have the quotations available—the minister's attitude was that there was nothing to worry about with regard to United States give-away policy, that it was of no serious importance. The United States has been selling some of its wheat under defence and local currency deals. As far as defence deals are concerned, I realize that Canada cannot participate. But I ask the minister to tell the people of Canada why something cannot be done to provide for the exchange of our wheat by local currency deals such as those that are being made by the United States. What is the reason? Certainly the results revealed today indicate a lamentable failure on the part of this government to preserve our markets and to assure to Canadian farmers engaged in the production of wheat their fair and proper share of the world market.

More than that I will not say at this time for there is not available to members of this house information which permits of an extended analysis of the course being followed. On May 5 I asked this question:

> How many bushels of wheat were in elevator and terminal storage in Canada as of the 30th July, 1954?

That was not a difficult question to answer. That information is available. But parliament waits at the convenience of the department. The next question was:

> What was the total amount paid for elevator and terminal storage for all wheat in storage between the 1st July, 1953 and the 30th July, 1954?

We wait for that information now embalmed in the form of an order for return passed today.

The next question had to do with terminal elevators being rented to private companies. I have no objection to some delay in that connection. But as far as the others are concerned the minister has the answers, or he would not have been able to report that carrying charges increased last year by 8½ cents per bushel.

Mr. Speaker, what has happened in the last two or three years in the marketing of Canadian wheat indicates that this government has lost its way and that Canada's share of the world market, proportionately to that of other exporting countries, has been frittered away not only by the failure of this government to act but by its refusal to admit that the problem even existed. Whenever the matter was raised in the house the government has answered in an offhand attitude of bravado, "After all, time will tell" or in effect saying, "All is well".

Today's revelation makes this a black Monday in the history of the wheat farmers of Canada. No one expects the government to do everything, but surely in the face of a world situation such as has prevailed in the last two or three years we should have had some action of an effective nature, something of an intensive sales campaign by the Department of Trade and Commerce, in place of optimistic statements made from time to time.

Having said that, sir, what I intend to refer to today is in general the development of our resources in order not only to meet the present unemployment situation but also to provide for development so as to assure all parts of Canada something approaching equality in national development to the end that our provinces may advance together reasonably equal in the opportunities that are afforded. In the last two or three days I have been privileged to be in the maritimes and to see something of the resources of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and the fact that that part of Canada is not receiving—

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member at this point to inquire from him if he intends to leave the subject of wheat and enter upon another subject? He has introduced the question of wheat as a grievance and he cannot leave it to go into another subject unless he allows other members to terminate the discussion on the subject of wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I give you a preview and tell you what I intend to say? I intend to deal in general with the development of our resources to the end that markets will be provided within our country and opportunities given to a greater degree for the marketing of our farm products here by a development policy designed to bring about equality of expansion in all parts of our country. That is what I am concerned with at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is about to cover too much territory. The subject of wheat was introduced, and other hon. members may wish to continue with that subject. We might as well initiate another budget debate if the hon. member is to be permitted to go over the entire picture of the natural resources of the country and deal with the finding of markets for all these products. The question of wheat is one which in itself is substantial and has very often been made the subject of a grievance before going into supply. For instance, I would refer the hon. member to the fact that on February 18 the question of the final wheat payment for 1953 was raised in a similar motion by the hon. member for Assiniboia and we dealt with nothing else but wheat at that particular time. I am afraid the hon. member is perhaps embarking upon too large a territory, and that might create difficulties.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not know the minister was going to give his report, but I base my argument this afternoon on a Regina Leader-Post editorial of January 17 headed, "Income Drop Shows Need for Dam". I am going to deal with the fall in agricultural income. I wish to refer particularly to the situation in the province of Saskatchewan and the need of something being done to assure equality of income as well as assurance and security of income.

When Your Honour says that I may not deal with the situation otherwise than with respect to wheat, I have no objection to that restriction. What I want to do is deal with the fall in farm income as revealed in the said editorial comment. Then in particular, I wish to deal with the failure of the government to provide for an assurance of a continuing source of income in the western provinces through the provision of such projects as the one to which I wish to refer particularly.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I might make a comment on the point of order. I have no objection whatever to the hon. member for Prince Albert proceeding in whatever way he wishes, but I also have some comments to make about wheat and some other matters and I am quite prepared to do it. I do not mind waiting until my turn comes, whenever that may be, but I think whatever latitude is given to the first speaker should also be given to the others.

Mr. Speaker: What I am concerned about is that we should not deviate from what has been the practice with respect to the raising of grievances. It must be a specific grievance. According to the remarks the hon. member for Prince Albert has just made in explanation of what he intends to bring forward, he wants to deal with markets generally and the loss of markets for farm products and then, although he has already dealt with wheat, he wants to deal with the South Saskatchewan dam. He has just indicated he wants to deal with that point because that is the point to which the editorial in the Regina Leader-Post has reference. Furthermore, he wants to deal with the low incomes with which the farmers are now being faced. Maybe the hon. member is going to conclude his remarks with an amendment to the motion to go into supply. That would certainly specify the grievance he has in mind.

If he is not going to terminate his remarks with such an amendment, then I am afraid I must say he can always deal with these various other subjects when other motions to go into supply are presented. At this moment, however, it would not be proper to initiate another budget debate, and it is certainly contrary to our practice not to have a specific grievance raised at this point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, your suggestion will deprive the amendment of the argument that would have been used in its support which, if I may conclude with a few words, would be based upon the editorial in the Regina Leader-Post headed, "Income Drop Shows Need for Dam", and which points out that the bureau of statistics has reported a steep drop in Saskatchewan's income in 1954 and that the statistics on farm earnings contain the seeds of an irrefutable argument in support of the contention that action should be taken immediately to provide for the construction of the dam.

I shall move the amendment without any further argument, because all the arguments have been advanced. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Pearkes):

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should give consideration to the immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project."

Mr. Speaker: How can I accept an amendment to the motion to go into supply with respect to the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam when the hon. member has made a speech on wheat? I want to be quite reasonable, and I want to understand the position of the hon. gentleman exactly as he indicated it. I do not want to do any injustice to him. It may be that my knowledge of affairs with respect to the construction of dams, and the problems relating to them, leaves much to be desired. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can help me in the dilemma in which I find myself at the moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As you stated, Mr. Speaker, I may not develop my argument in support of the amendment. Farmers' income has fallen, and therefore I wished to contend that the dam was needed at this time, first to secure permanent production and, second, to assist unemployment at this time and provide a means whereby security for the farmers may be maintained in the future. Your Honour has taken the view that I may not argue the reasons, and therefore I cannot develop the argument. I have to restrict myself to generalization.

Mr. Speaker: I am not the only one who is puzzled because the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), thinking the grievance raised at this time concerned wheat, remained in the house until he found out at the last moment that the hon. member was turning to the South Saskatchewan dam and irrigation project. Now we have the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) interested in the problem.

It may be that other members will have arguments to introduce concerning the dam which will not bear so much on the wheat problem. I see that the house is in a good mood, and therefore I will consider the point. I am not allowed, of course, to assume things but I believe I would not be too far wrong if I were to say that the hon. gentleman, having heard the statement from the minister on wheat, decided to discuss the matter of wheat while at the same time having the intention of discussing the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project.

This puts us in a predicament. What are members going to talk about now? Here we have arguments introduced concerning the statement on wheat made by the minister before the orders of the day, and the hon. member ends up with an amendment to the effect that the government should give immediate consideration to the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. If I were to be strict, I certainly would not accept this amendment. I will say this immediately, that I hope this will not be taken as a precedent. We are now dealing with the South Saskatchewan river dam, and apparently considering wheat only in so far as it relates to the dam.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I must confess that I was not sure whether I was going to be able to talk about wheat or the South Saskatchewan dam. But since the South Saskatchewan dam may, in itself, according to statements that have already been made by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and by Your Honour, in some way be connected perhaps I may be able to continue to keep some connection between the South Saskatchewan dam and the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon. The statement the minister made to this house is certainly a severe economic blow to Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe all members realize that at this moment it is quite difficult to keep decorum in the debate if we are going to have, on the one hand, members discussing wheat in relation to the statement made by the minister today, and on the other hand speak to an amendment indicating that the grievance is the consideration of the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam. Surely, there must be a way of arriving at a solution to this dilemma. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was the first one to take the floor, and therefore had the initiative in moving an amendment. Having discussed the statement made by the minister on wheat, and then at the end moved this amendment which deals with another subject, he has left me in this position: if I accept the amendment, how can I refuse permission to hon. members to deal with wheat? Are we going to have a general discussion on wheat on the amendment which is now before the Chair and which deals with the South Saskatchewan dam?

By unanimous consent could we not—I am trying to find a solution and the more I think about it the more difficult it becomes. At this moment we should either discuss wheat and leave the South Saskatchewan dam until later or we should take the amendment now and leave wheat until later. That is the situation. I would be quite prepared, if hon. members would agree, to have a discussion on the South Saskatchewan dam now and allow the question of wheat to be reintroduced later as a second grievance. I believe that might be a solution. We cannot discuss both at the same time. If that is agreeable, that seems to be a reasonable solution. Let us leave in abeyance the subject of wheat, and let us say that the hon. member for Prince Albert has dealt with it prematurely. Let us deal now with the subject matter of the amendment, and talk about the immediate construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. Later, when this question is disposed of, we can deal with the question of wheat.

Mr. Argue: On the question of the South Saskatchewan river dam, I think that we have already—

Mr. Thatcher: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With all deference to your ruling, sir, if the rules have not been obeyed I think they should be. The matter of wheat has been introduced, and it is a matter which should be discussed this afternoon. I, for one, would like to object, if I may be permitted to do so. I think you should enforce the rules, and I believe the house would go along more expeditiously if the matter were handled that way.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) will understand that I did not make a ruling. I thought it was the general consensus that, in order to solve the dilemma in which we found ourselves, the members would discuss the subject matter of the amendment. Then, once this amendment has been disposed of, the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, along with others, may come back to the question of wheat.

Mr. Argue: I, for one, certainly think your ruling is fair and that the wheat question, important as it is and close as it is to my heart, could wait for another day.

I said we have already done too much talking about the South Saskatchewan dam. All we have had from the government opposite is talk and more talk; promise and repromise. Now, after 20 years of successive and continuous promises to the people of Saskatchewan that something would be done, we get from the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) of this country a continuing and definite "no". What is the Prime Minister's answer? It is the most amazing answer that anyone could possibly imagine. He says he cannot be convinced that it is in the national interest. How does one find out whether or not something is in the national interest? Surely the opinions of members of parliament should have some bearing on any conclusion as to whether or not this project is in the national interest. And so far as the three opposition parties are concerned let me say this, that any time I have heard members in the C.C.F., the Social Credit or the Conservative parties make statements on this question of the South Saskatchewan dam, I have heard them give their willing support to it. And even though the C.C.F. party, of which I am a member, has usually obtained its chief strength in Saskatchewan, and as a result the Conservative and Social Credit parties have not had the same strength in that province, the members of those parties have been broadminded enough to look at this project as one in the national interest. And, because of this, the Conservative and the Social Credit parties have supported the South Saskatchewan project.

Oh, the Liberal party has supported it, too—that is, some remnants of the Liberal party, some splinter members of the Liberal party and of the cabinet. But the cabinet does not support the building of the South Saskatchewan dam. One might expect some support from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), because if there is one thing he is good at it is the process of making political speeches. While I do not have reports of his speeches before me, I do recall press reports of speeches he made in by-elections, particularly the one in Rosthern in 1948, in which he said that the returning of a Liberal member to parliament was very important, if the people of Saskatchewan wanted to have the dam built. He implied that all the people of Rosthern had to do was to elect a Liberal candidate to parliament, that that would be the green light to the cabinet, and that the people of Saskatchewan could look toward the building of that project.

Well, that was just another promise that meant nothing. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has campaigned in every election, provincially and federally, since 1935, and usually quite successfully. One of his main planks and one of his chief promises has been that the Liberal party would build the South Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Gardiner: Some day.

Mr. Argue: "Some day"—and there is more truth in that interjection than in all the speeches the Minister of Agriculture has been making on the subject in the last 20 years.

Mr. Gardiner: They have all been to the same effect.

Mr. Argue: I am afraid if we wait for the Liberal party to build the South Saskatchewan dam, and if we wait for the present Prime Minister to build the South Saskatchewan dam, then, at the rate they are going, the dam will never be built. No, it will never be built because apparently the Prime Minister has a very narrow idea of what is in the national interest. His idea is so narrow, when considering what is in the national interest, that the farther a project gets away from Ottawa apparently, in his view, the less importance it has.

The Minister of Agriculture should be attempting to persuade the Prime Minister to build the dam, instead of coming out with more talk and more propositions, most if not all of which are fictitious, and pretending to the government of Saskatchewan that the dam is just around the corner.

The C.C.F. party believes that any project, no matter where it may be built, if it is in the national interest and is so considered by a majority of members in the house, should be built. Even though the St. Lawrence seaway development may not help Saskatchewan particularly, we are prepared to support it, although that development in the main may benefit certain sections of the Canadian people more than some other sections. Nevertheless Canadians from Newfoundland to British Columbia support the St. Lawrence seaway.

I believe the only real obstacle in the way of the South Saskatchewan dam at the present time is the Prime Minister himself. If he would stand in his place in the House of Commons and announce to the house and country that the government intended to proceed with the building of this dam, I am convinced his announcement would receive the unanimous approval of all members of parliament. But one man—only one—stands in the way. And I am afraid that, as the days go by, more and more is one man going to stand in the way of other progressive measures the people of this country want. I could name them—national health insurance, full employment measures—all these things, and only one man cannot be convinced. The great Uncle Louie has become the chief barrier to progress in this country along the lines I have just mentioned.

An hon. Member: How ridiculous can you get?

Mr. Argue: We will be very glad to have speeches from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, and from any others who may wish to speak.

I have never been one who would take away credit where it was due, even if it concerned a Liberal member in the House of Commons. I have never refused him credit if he supported those things that are right and in the interests of the people he represents. I remember a debate not so many years ago in the house on the subject of making a larger final payment on the five-year wheat pool. I recall that two members on the Liberal side of the house—I believe the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) and the former member for Springfield—voted in favour of that motion. I have never hesitated on any platform to give them credit for voting in that way.

Mr. Studer: How did you vote?

Mr. Argue: If Saskatchewan Liberal members would vote for the amendment now before the house they would show by their votes that they really want the South Saskatchewan dam, and would be doing something to help the province they represent.

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: The answer is no.

Mr. Studer: How did he vote on the bill for $65 million? He was not even in the house at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek asked the hon. member for Assiniboia if he would permit a question, and the answer was no. Therefore the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek must resume his seat.

Mr. Argue: If the hon. member who is interrupting would take time out to talk to the Prime Minister on this subject, and show when the vote is taken how he stands on it by voting in favour of it, and in the interests of the people of Saskatchewan, he would be making a far greater contribution than by interrupting when other members are speaking. And if the Minister of Agriculture ever hopes to have the South Saskatchewan dam approved by the cabinet and by the Prime Minister, then as the cabinet minister from Saskatchewan the Minister of Agriculture should ask his colleagues in the Liberal party from Saskatchewan to vote for this amendment.

The people of that province have waited far too long. They are indignant that continuous Liberal promises have not been kept. The South Saskatchewan river dam is important to the economy of the province and of the rest of western Canada. Though at the present time we face a problem of too much rather than one of too little moisture, nevertheless the history of western Canada proves that great portions of it, particularly the Palliser triangle, go through recurring periods in which there is lack of rainfall.

The government says it would take 10 years to build the South Saskatchewan dam, and probably this would be one of the best years to start the project. We have had a series of years when there has been higher than average rainfall; it could easily happen that by the time the dam is built, if not before, Saskatchewan would be back to a period of low rainfall, when the vast quantities of water the dam would store could be utilized for irrigation purposes, to provide water for 500,000 acres of land.

Surely that is the kind of planning and the kind of leadership the people of Saskatchewan and of Canada should expect from their government. Surely the government should look ahead to protect the people of the nation against catastrophes that we all know will recur at some time in the future.

Probably there has never been a year since the beginning of the war when the dam could be better built, more easily built, and more easily afforded by the people of Canada than right now in 1955. I say that the building of the South Saskatchewan dam and the great irrigation projects connected therewith is not mainly a matter of financing, and the cost should not constitute any difficulty for the federal government. Why? You should not look at the amount of money it takes, you should look at the resources of Canada to see if Canada can produce such a project within the next ten years. During the war we were told by Mr. Ilsley, a former minister of finance, that cost would not be allowed to stand in the way of a maximum war effort, so the financial cost of the dam and other important projects should not be allowed to stand in the way.

I say that we have the resources. We also have people idle in Canada, the latest figure being over 600,000. I may not have seen as many freight trains go by on the main lines of the railroads as have other hon. members in this house and therefore I was perhaps more surprised than other hon. members would be had they seen what I saw yesterday. Just outside of Sudbury I saw a train going west on the main line of the C.P.R. with dozens of men back riding the rods. I have not seen that myself for some fifteen years. There were dozens of them on flat cars which I saw yesterday just west of Sudbury.

I am sure that those men and countless thousands of men in Canada like them who are unemployed would be pleased to accept a job building the South Saskatchewan dam. I contend that when you put your unemployed to work it does not cost the country anything. The manpower is available, and we know we can get the resources as far as machinery is concerned. The main implement and machinery producing factories in Canada are working today at half capacity or less. There is no industry which faces a greater current unemployment than the Canadian farm implement industry.

We hope that there will not be a crop catastrophe in western Canada again this year, but there may be and certainly the purchasing power available today in western Canada is only a fraction of what it was a few years ago. The demand for farm machinery likely to prevail in Canada within the next twelve months is bound to be a whole lot less than was the demand for machinery in 1951 and 1952 and even in 1953.

So let us use our idle machinery industry to produce the large scale construction equipment necessary to build this dam. Let us put hundreds of Canadians who are now unemployed to work building this valuable project. Let us do something in the next few years which will protect this large section of Canada from something which we know is bound to happen in the future, namely, further periods of widespread crop failure.

[Mr. Argue.]

There is another reason why this dam should be built. Saskatchewan is short of electrical energy. Experts tell us that the building of the South Saskatchewan dam would provide 400 million kilowatt hours of electricity a year, a huge amount of electricity. This is something the people of Saskatchewan need as quickly as they can get it, not just for those years in which there might be bad crops but for each and every year of the years that lie ahead.

For all of these reasons I expect that opposition members will give unanimous support to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I hope that some of our western Liberal members of parliament, in particular Saskatchewan Liberal members, will stand by the interests of the people who sent them here and support this reasonable and worth-while amendment.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in view of the appeal which has been made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), in view of the fact that I am a member from Saskatchewan, I feel I should say a few words at this stage. In the first place, the hon. member in waving his arms and getting very excited about the South Saskatchewan dam managed to get a little away from the actual facts.

An hon. Member: He never was close to them.

Mr. Gardiner: The South Saskatchewan river dam was not known as such to any person either inside or outside this house until 1946, which is not 20 years ago. The Minister of Agriculture was responsible for trying to find a place where the dam could be built and this had to be done before talking about building a dam. No one else in this house was responsible for those activities; the responsibility was that of the Department of Agriculture and it was assumed by the Department of Agriculture.

Under its activities in connection with the P.F.R.A. it endeavoured to find out whether there was some place on the South Saskatchewan where a dam could be built, if it could be built, and just what the effects would be. That was found out by 1946 and since 1946 we have been discussing the possibility of building it. At no time have I taken any other position than that it should be built. I have not said it is going to be built. I think every hon. member on all sides of the house will agree with that. I have constantly advocated the building of the dam and I still advocate the building of the dam.

As I said a few moments ago when interrupting, I am still convinced that some time the government of Canada is going to build the South Saskatchewan river dam and I expect that the government of Canada that does build it will be a Liberal government. I have no hesitation in saying that.

Mr. Knowles: You had better get started soon.

Mr. Gardiner: That may be the opinion of some people, but there are others who have a different opinion. I know the reason why this resolution is brought forward at this time. I know too why an association between the official opposition and the C.C.F. comes to light in the proposal which is made.

There are some people who think that there is going to be an election in Saskatchewan before very long. The fact that one has been brought about on a few hours' notice in the province of Alberta has given some people reason to think that maybe the same thing will happen in Saskatchewan. So an effort is being made to make issues out of everything of which an issue can be made.

At the moment the question before this house is not the South Saskatchewan river dam; the question before this house at the present time is whether or not the house has confidence in this government. Everyone who knows anything about the rules of the house knows that when a motion is made to go into committee of supply and an amendment is moved, that amendment is nothing more or less than a motion of want of confidence in the government.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Page the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer).

Mr. Gardiner: That may be all right. Page the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek or anybody else, but I have been in this house as long as most hon. members and I have been in other legislatures much longer than any other hon. member of the house and I know what the rules mean.

I know that when an opposition—it does not make any difference whether it is an official opposition or whether it is the C.C.F. or whether it is the Social Credit or what opposition it is—get up, on an occasion when a motion is made in this house to go into committee of supply, and make some other kind of motion, some other amendment, or even simply oppose that motion there is only one thing in their minds and that is that they do not have confidence in the government of this country. So the only thing upon which members are going to be voting, the only thing upon which I am going to be voting, if this amendment is voted upon, is whether I have confidence in them.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Have you?

Mr. Gardiner: I certainly have and I would not have any confidence whatever in a Social Credit policy, no matter where they set it up. The fact is that there is an election campaign on at the present time in Ontario which involves the Conservative party and there is one on in Alberta, which concerns the Social Credit party. Some of our friends hope that there may be one on soon that affects the C.C.F. party.

An hon. Member: Are you worried?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I am not a bit worried. As a matter of fact, I would not be at all worried, if I lived in the province of Alberta, with the issue that is involved out there at the present time. Being a Liberal, I would not be in any way worried.

An hon. Member: Who made the issue?

Mr. Gardiner: It does not make any difference who made the issue. The people who are in the government and have done the things they have done may make a possible issue. If I were living in Alberta I would make the issue based on what the government has been doing during the period they were in office.

Mr. Argue: When are you going out to campaign?

Mr. Gardiner: I may be out there long before you think.

Mr. Harkness: I think it would be a good idea.

Mr. Gardiner: What I am going to say here this afternoon is that a member who votes for the amendment before the house at the present time—it does not matter whether he is a member from Saskatchewan or anywhere else—is voting on what amounts to a vote of want of confidence in this government and is not voting on any other issue. They are bringing up the question of the South Saskatchewan river dam as a means of trying to win over the votes of a few people, or if you do not win them over you can go out into the constituencies and say that so and so voted against the dam. Nobody is going to tell anyone in Saskatchewan that I am against the dam. Nobody is going to be able to tell anyone in Saskatchewan that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek is against the dam. Nobody is going to be able to tell anyone in Saskatchewan that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle or the hon. member for Rosthern or the hon. member for Meadow Lake is against the dam. They are all for the dam.

Mr. Knowles: Nobody can say that the Prime Minister is for it.

Mr. Gardiner: The fact of the matter is that they are not going to vote against this government because they do not build the dam tomorrow. There are times for doing everything.

An hon. Member: Tomorrow never comes.

Mr. Gardiner: That is what this motion says, to build it immediately. The only issue that is clear when you read the amendment is the question as to whether or not the government should proceed to build the dam immediately, and the only thing that is in the minds of those who are moving it and of those who were going to support it is the question as to whether or not they can work up some political issues that might be used in Ontario and in Alberta and possibly in the province of Saskatchewan. There is nothing else in their minds. Resolutions of this kind before this house do not help to build the Saskatchewan dam. The fact that the majority of necessity will vote against the words does not help. They do not help to do anything except to create political attitudes and political sentiments of one kind or another that can be utilized for the purpose of trying to gain votes or lose votes for some person. So I want to make it perfectly plain that I am going to vote against the amendment. I want to make it plain at the same time that I am in favour of the South Saskatchewan river dam. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre knows that if it were an issue that involved the people sitting in his group he would be speaking and voting as I am speaking and voting.

Mr. Knowles: I also know that there have been occasions when amendments to go into supply have been carried in this house.

Mr. Gardiner: Ask my friends who come from the province of Saskatchewan how many times similar motions made in the Saskatchewan provincial legislature by opposition members, perhaps for the same purpose as this amendment is being moved, were voted for by the C.C.F. members on those occasions. Not at all, of course. In making this amendment, they have no idea at all of assisting in building the South Saskatchewan dam. I have made it plain that I am both in favour of the government and in favour of the dam. When I vote I am going to vote in favour of the government, believing that if the dam is ever built it will be built by a Liberal government.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the minister has spoken just before me on this important matter. I am glad that he said some of the things he did say, although on more sober reflection he may wish that he had left some of those things unsaid. As he gets a little older and more mellowed, he is getting more careless.

To begin with, as I listened to the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) introducing the subject for discussion this afternoon, I was a little puzzled when I heard him talk briefly about wheat and then bring the matter around to the question of the South Saskatchewan dam. I wondered if he was going to propose that he take the surplus wheat out there and build the dam with it. That would be one good connection between the subjects that were being discussed. Then it occurred to me that perhaps he really did want to have before the house the question of the building of the South Saskatchewan dam as a means of improving the farm situation. I was pleased, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that you did suggest that we discuss first the building of the South Saskatchewan river dam and leave the wheat question until later.

Now I should like to deal briefly with some of the things the Minister of Agriculture said. I want to assure him that I am not talking about this matter this afternoon for any political purpose whatsoever. If he thinks that everybody in this house plays politics every time he gets up to say something about a matter, I think he should reflect a little on some of the things that have happened in the past, and I am going to remind him particularly of one. I believe it was in 1946 when a certain resolution was brought into this house asking the house to give its approval to the discontinuance of milk subsidies that had been in effect during the war, subsidies that had proved to be very effective.

Mr. Gardiner: In answer to that, I might say that I do not remember it personally because, I believe, I was over in England at the time.

Mr. Low: That may be so, but at any rate the resolution was brought in. Members from several sides of the house, the Liberal side as well as the opposition side, spoke very vigorously against the removal of those subsidies. I recall very distinctly how, after every person in the debate had expressed himself strongly opposed to it, and it looked as if, when the matter came to a vote, the resolution would be defeated, the Prime Minister came into the house, stood in his place, looked around and said to his followers, "This is not a free vote". All of the good boys on the Liberal side of the house who had spoken actively and vigorously against the removal of the milk subsidies, when the vote came, voted solidly for the resolution and against their convictions. It looked to me as if the minister today is a little afraid that some of the Liberal members from Saskatchewan might perhaps get up in this debate and express their keen desire to see the South Saskatchewan dam built, and for that reason wants to get a word of warning to them.

Mr. Gardiner: I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) twice in his speech challenged me to get up and say how I was going to vote on this issue—it had nothing to do with what the other men were going to do but how I was going to vote—and I answered him.

Mr. Low: You went further than that. Before you told anybody how you were going to vote, you made it abundantly clear to your supporters on the other side of the house that if they voted or even spoke in favour of this thing they would be playing on the basis of politics and would be voting want of confidence in your government. That is what you did.

Mr. Gardiner: I still recall that, when my friend was a member of the government in Alberta, that is exactly the position he took.

Mr. Low: No, that is not the position he took under any circumstances. I challenge the minister, now that he has made the statement, to bring forth one bit of evidence to that effect. I will just challenge him to go through the record and bring forward one bit of evidence to support what he has now said. He cannot do so.

Mr. Gardiner: I have never known of a session of any parliament anywhere in the British Empire where somebody in the opposition did not move the kind of resolution that is now before us; and I know that every member of every government, no matter what the party, has always voted as I am suggesting that they ought to vote.

Mr. Hodgson: Who is making this speech?

Mr. Low: Yes; one begins to wonder about that. But I want to assure the minister that I am not speaking this afternoon for any particular political reason at all. If it is politics to express one's opinion or his deep conviction about a matter, then I am guilty. But I did not raise the subject because I wanted to make an issue in Saskatchewan, Ontario, Alberta or anywhere else. I may say quite frankly that my opinion with respect to this matter that is being discussed would not get me any votes in Alberta; that is a cinch. Under present circumstances I certainly would not try to inject an issue into the Saskatchewan situation.

When the minister talks about issues, let me say this. Believe me, his party in the province of Alberta have been so utterly bankrupt of ideas that they had to seize upon some things on which they thought they could make an issue, and they got caught with their political pants down. The only thing in the world that Mr. Manning could do was simply to say, "All right, boys; if that's the way you want it, that's the way you're going to get it". That is the way they will have it. But there has been nothing but obstruction. There has been nothing but silly charges, unsupported by anything but the flimsiest of technicalities. I think it would have been better if my hon. friend had stayed off that subject because before the next month or six weeks are over he will have reason to give the matter very serious reflection and wish he had not done so.

I want to make it abundantly clear, Mr. Speaker, that I am not trying to create an issue. The issue has been created, and I will tell you when it was created. It was created a number of years ago when, for what I think were purely political purposes, the question of building the South Saskatchewan dam was introduced into Canadian politics by the Liberal party when I do not think they had the slightest intention whatsoever of building that dam within the foreseeable future. I am satisfied—just as satisfied as I am of the fact that I stand here—that they were nothing but idle promises designed for one purpose only, namely to get votes, to lead the people to believe that they were going to do it. As my friend the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, the South Saskatchewan river dam, over a period of a great many years, has been made a political football. That is something that should not have been done.

However, it is because I wanted to express my point of view that I got into the discussion here this afternoon. In times like these, in days when there are nothing but floods in a country, I think it is hard to appreciate how important irrigation can be. Many people out there say, "Let us get the water out of the country and never talk about it again". I understand how the people feel down in the Qu'Appelle country and in the other areas recently flooded by the terrible storms in Saskatchewan. We all understand that when you have a surfeit of things you are not too greatly interested in them. If you get a good meal of potatoes, you do not want any more potatoes for a little while.

It is the same with water. But in the cycles of drought that occur in the western country there comes a time when irrigation water is just like lifeblood. I am sure the time will come when the people of Saskatchewan will want that water badly. As a matter of fact, over many decades they have needed the water that can be supplied from the South Saskatchewan river through the building of a dam to water these parched acres and to ensure something like stability in agriculture out in that country.

I think that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) wanted to say something about the serious decline in farm income and perhaps to use that fact as one of his arguments for the building of this dam. During the past several weeks, in the course of the budget debate and others, a number of things have been said about the serious decline in farm cash income. My colleague the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) the other day, I think, mentioned the fact that since 1951 there has been a decline of $1,025 million or some such figure in the net income of the farmers of this country. That is an extremely serious decline in farm income.

I understand that in this past year farm income made up only about 6 per cent of the total national income, although the farmers as a class make up about 16 per cent of the total population of Canada. That is far below the fair share of farming people as a whole. Some means will simply have to be found to bring that farm income up so that farmers generally have their fair share. If they make up 16 per cent of the population, then they are entitled to something like 16 per cent of the national income in Canada. That is the position that we take.

What has that matter to do with the question in point? The serious decline in farm income during the past few years has occurred largely as the result of the problems associated with the production and the marketing of wheat. Everybody knows that with the three bumper crops in a row there were created problems which made it exceedingly difficult to keep farm cash income at a level that would make it possible for the farmers to enjoy prosperity and to buy the goods that are flowing from the factories. The failure of this government to establish markets and to take advantage of market situations that were available throughout the world has materially complicated the farm income situation.

I remember when the Minister of Trade and Commerce scorned the idea of accepting soft currency to a limited extent in return for wheat. I remember when he said, "No; no country would be prepared to deal on a basis of that kind". Many foolish things were said at that time also about Britain being unprepared to buy our wheat and to pay for it to a certain degree in pounds sterling.

The fact now is that Japan, Israel, Sweden and a number of other countries have already accepted substantial amounts of wheat from the United States and have been able to pay for it in their own currencies, which currencies were left in their countries to be invested to help them to bring up production of those things which the people in the United States would want to buy.

It has been admitted in this house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that our wheat marketing situation in Canada has been complicated to a large degree by the methods that are being used by the United States. That is one of them. There is no reason in the world why Canada should not have been preserving her position as the outstanding wheat country in the world by accepting to a degree those soft currencies. There is also no reason why we should not have been leaving those currencies on deposit in those countries from which we are prepared to accept it in order to help those countries to bring up production of the things which Canada would want to buy, and there are plenty of them. But we sit still and say no, we are only going to accept one thing, cash or hard currency, United States dollars under the Bretton Woods agreement. As a consequence we find ourselves taking a back seat to some of these other countries because we are not courageous in our trade outlook. We seem to be frightened to death about trying something new, something other countries are perfectly willing to try and make succeed. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that has complicated our situation in this country to a very great degree, and has accounted to some extent for the decline in our farm income.

One could easily say, of course, that we are raising too much wheat. I suppose under present policies of marketing maybe, but if we are, and if the government at the same time is not going to use any vision and imagination in its marketing policies and in devising new means to get our wheat into the hands of people who need it and want to use it, then it seems to me the next best thing would be for us to encourage our people in the diversification of farming operations. One means of encouraging them to diversify their farming operations would be to have them use irrigation water, and that is exactly the kind of thing envisioned in the protest now before the house.

Saskatchewan has had a very difficult time for many years. Without question Saskatchewan is the greatest wheat province in Canada, but there are years when Saskatchewan has a most difficult time when the lands become parched because of drought. When the lands of the wheat area are parched the farmers suffer and production is practically nil.

One way to help that situation is to make use of our water resources, and the building of the South Saskatchewan dam would make it possible to water thousands of fertile acres in that province that are capable of producing some of the finest foodstuffs in the world. I draw your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that years ago the Lethbridge area in southern Alberta was about the same as the southern Saskatchewan area. It was subject to these frequent drought cycles, and when they came that part of the country was very hard hit and the people felt it. But years ago we took advantage of the possibilities that were available to us to develop our water resources in that province. We developed large irrigation areas surrounding the city of Lethbridge; and for the past several years now, as a consequence of what has been done in the development of irrigation, the per capita income tax payment of the people of the city of Lethbridge to the government has topped that of every other city in Canada. Why? Simply because Lethbridge is in the very centre of a large irrigated area, and the irrigation farming that goes on in that area contributes dollars year in and year out.

There is very little, if any, failure, because of the stabilizing influence of the water on the soil. If one cares to look into the record he can find recent reports in such magazines as Western Business indicating how important that area has become in the production of foods, especially garden crops. It is expected that within the next few years a $70 million a year frozen vegetable industry will be centred in the city of Lethbridge and its immediate vicinity. There are now several fairly large plants that are processing garden vegetables like peas, beans, carrots, broccoli and that sort of thing. Experts say that the long hours of sunshine, the quality of the soil and the abundance of water in that area make it possible to produce the finest peas in the world.

The same thing could be said of southern Saskatchewan. The soil is not different. It has the long hours of sunshine, and I often wish we could get some of it while we are here in Ottawa. There is an abundance of water in the South Saskatchewan river which, if scientifically applied to the soil, would make it possible for the farmers there to develop the diversified farming activities that would transform the whole country out of all semblance to its present state.

Having experienced that sort of thing in Alberta, having seen what can be done, that is one of the reasons I have constantly supported the expenditures necessary to build the South Saskatchewan irrigation project. I must say right here I have not been too vocal in supporting the idea of power development. I am not certain in my own mind whether the government of Canada should make contributions to the provinces for the development of power. I am still open to conviction, but I certainly have no doubt about my stand and the stand of my group in the house so far as support of the irrigation project itself is concerned.

One could talk for three or four hours about the evidence available to show how important it would be from the national point of view to build the dam and develop the diversified farming activities that are possible in that whole area of southern Saskatchewan. If we are going to get away from the disabilities attached to a wheat economy we have to give consideration to the production of other crops that can be sold in this country. If that area were under irrigation certainly the production of coarse grains would make it possible to finish more beef. The production of garden crops for processing and freezing to replace the millions of dollars worth we now bring in from the United States every year would be enough justification for the government to lay out the money necessary to build the dam.

I am satisfied in my own mind, too, that the government of Saskatchewan is ready to provide its share of the necessary expenditures. I think the premier of that province has indicated on several occasions lately that he is prepared to accept his share of the cost if the federal government will move and adopt something like the formula adopted in the development of such projects in the province of Alberta. Not to multiply words, may I say that I am surprised, in fact I am disgusted, at the stand the Minister of Agriculture took this afternoon. I think it was childish in the extreme. It was a stand we did not expect from a first-line minister, one who has "right honourable" attached to his name. It seems to me he should have made a statesmanlike speech on the whole matter, indicating how important the project is. Instead he gets up and says to his supporters: Now look, boys, remember this is not the South Saskatchewan dam; this is a vote of want of confidence in the government because the opposition is trying to make political capital out of it.

I am not afraid of that sort of thing at all. You can say what you like about it. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) can go out and say what he likes about how people voted, but let me tell him and everybody else that I am going to vote for the amendment because I believe in the South Saskatchewan dam. I believe it should be developed and I will vote for it in exactly the same way as I would have voted with my colleagues on the question of family allowances if I had been in the house in 1944. He cannot go out and tell the people that we did not vote for them or that we voted against them. The minister told his colleagues not to give these fellows a chance to go out in the country and say that they voted against the South Saskatchewan dam, but I am going to support the amendment.

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Studer: Did he not vote to defeat the government that brought in the proposal to establish family allowances in 1944—or rather the members of the Social Credit party?

Mr. Low: No, Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house at that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This amendment deals with the South Saskatchewan dam. The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): In reference to what the hon. member for Peace River has said about the intention of the Minister of Agriculture when he spoke in this house, I would suggest that perhaps a fairer interpretation to put upon those remarks would not be that it was necessary for the minister to tell the members of this house just what would be the effect of carrying an amendment like this, but that it was to indicate to the people of the country exactly what is the situation. It is not a surprising thing that he should have done so, in view of the use that has been made by the C.C.F. party in Saskatchewan over the past 10 years of similar votes in this house.

Everyone who has followed things in Saskatchewan knows that motions like this are made repeatedly, and if the program of the government is to be carried on they have to be voted down, because they indicate lack of confidence in the whole program of the government. The members of the C.C.F. move motions like this and then go out and misrepresent them in Saskatchewan, indicating that members who have expressed confidence in the government voted against the subject matter of such amendments. Over and over again it has been suggested that such members were betraying the people who elected them. I think that was the reason the Minister of Agriculture said what he did, to indicate that the carrying of this motion would necessitate the resignation of the government or a general election, and would not promote the building of the dam.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he remember how he voted on the milk subsidy amendment in 1946?

Mr. Tucker: I was in the house, and it was indicated that hon. members should vote as they saw fit. It was not regarded as a vote of confidence in the government.

Mr. Knowles: Then it is possible to have a free vote on that kind of a motion.

Mr. Tucker: If the government sees fit to so announce. The government has taken a definite position on this motion, and if it were carried it would mean that the government's announced policy had been defeated. If the government does not see fit to take that attitude—

Mr. Nicholson: Why not?

Mr. Tucker: It is a matter of policy for the government to decide. We operate under a system of responsible government. The government of the day announces a certain policy, and no group in the house can pick and choose in connection with that policy. This is one reason our system works so satisfactorily. The government adopts a policy which it considers fair to all parts of the country. If each part of the country in turn were given the right to pick and choose in connection with that policy, government under our system would become utterly impossible. Any student of constitutional government knows that quite well.

The government has taken the attitude that the South Saskatchewan dam project has not been demonstrated to the government's satisfaction to be something on which the government at present could recommend the spending of the necessary money. The government has taken that position alongside many other matters which it has decided and about which we in the west are very satisfied. Under our system of government, members have to decide whether or not they are going to support the government and take the policy as a whole, including perhaps some things they would like to have changed, or whether they are going to vote against the government and throw out that policy.

I sat as leader of the opposition in the Saskatchewan legislature, and no C.C.F. member here can tell me that C.C.F. members act any differently in carrying on under our system of responsible government than members do in this parliament. Over and over again I have seen amendments moved which had the effect of indicating lack of confidence in the government. Repeatedly I saw C.C.F. members vote against those amendments because they wanted to keep the government in office; they believed in the government's policy as a whole. They believed that when the time came, if those things embodied in the amendments were good things the government would introduce them, and they were not going to throw out the government and its whole program on a motion of the opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? I was wondering whether he thought the government would be greatly endangered if Liberal members from Saskatchewan were to vote as they liked?

Mr. Tucker: I am going to deal with that. I did not interrupt the hon. member, and I was going to come to that in a moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right; that is fine.

Mr. Tucker: I was dealing with the attitude taken by the C.C.F. party. There is no use in the members of that party trying to pretend that there is anything out of the way in Liberal members saying they are ready to support the government, as they are, on a motion like this which expresses a feeling that something should be done right away that the government has indicated it is not ready to do. The C.C.F. know very well that at different times in Saskatchewan their members of the legislature could have been accused of being against increasing old age pensions; against increasing supplementary allowances for old age pensions; against giving bigger grants to school districts to help keep down taxes; against doing away with public revenue taxes, and against many measures that practically all their members indicated they favoured. In order that confidence in the government be continued, they voted against motions like this.

I believe that we should have a certain amount of honesty in connection with these matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tucker: What in the world is the use of the C.C.F. pretending that when we vote on a motion like this, which involves the existence of the government, that vote indicates we have done something that shows we are not favourable to the building of this dam. There is no use in them saying that. One of the things I do say to them is that the misuse of votes like this in their propaganda throughout the country may have gotten them votes in the past, but basically people are not so easily fooled. In the long run, people are not as easily fooled as hon. members opposite may think. As I see it, people in Saskatchewan are turning against the C.C.F. party—

Mr. Ellis: You have been saying that since 1944.

Mr. Tucker: They have been gradually turning since 1944. The time will come when the C.C.F. will be turned out. One of the reasons the people are turning against them today is this dishonest attitude which exists even in this house.

It was very interesting when the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek indicated that by voting against the amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which at that time embodied family allowances, they were voting against government policy. Had that vote carried the government would have been defeated, and that measure could not have been enacted at that time.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): You had better tell us about your stand on the Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Tucker: That is a logical attitude. The suggestion has been put forward by the C.C.F. that when people vote to support government policy they are voting for something else altogether. I do not think there is any doubt that if this motion carried, the government having taken the position it had, there would be an immediate demand that the government resign and go to the country. By long established constitutional practice there would be nothing else for the government to do. I ask you, would that further the building of the South Saskatchewan dam? It certainly would no further it, not one little bit. And that would be the effect of carrying this amendment; there is no question about it.

The hon. member for Prince Albert asked a perfectly reasonable question. The suggestion was that if we from Saskatchewan were to vote for this amendment it would not in any way endanger the government, because it was suggested the government has a sufficient majority to carry the main motion without the votes from Saskatchewan. The hon. member asked a perfectly logical question, one that is asked by many people in the country from time to time.

I do not propose to try to answer it to the satisfaction of everybody; but I do want to speak about my own attitude toward a proposition of that kind. I believe in our system of responsible government. I believe that in a country as widespread as Canada you must have a government from a party that is national in its appeal, and people in all parts of the country must be prepared to get behind the policies adopted by that government so long as it is trying to do what it thinks is right and fair to all parts of the country. If members of the House of Commons begin to vote in regional blocs and by provinces, according to the wishes and desires of particular blocs, and if the House of Commons were thus to break into regional parties then government, as we understand it today, government functioning on a basis of doing what is best for the country as a whole, would be utterly impossible.

Believing in that as I do; believing in our system of government; believing that the Liberal party has on the whole the right policies for Canada; believing that the government is doing a good job with those policies, I am not going to be diverted for a single minute in expressing my support. Why do I say this? Because a part of the country, such as western Canada from which we come, and which sends to parliament only a minority of members, would be the first to suffer by the kind of policy hon. members opposite suggest.

An hon. Member: Is that responsible government?

Mr. Tucker: If each member is going to vote only to suit his own individual area, or only to further an idea he may have at heart, and without regard for the over-all consideration, how can we in Saskatchewan ever hope to get anything? We have to go along with our fellow members from the rest of Canada in supporting things they believe are right, so long as what they ask is within reason, if in turn we ask them to support the things we think are right for us. And if we are not ready to go along with them and work together as a team, how can we expect them to vote for various items which, while helpful to us, would lose them votes in their own constituencies?

For example, I have no doubt that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, under which this year $28 million is to be paid out to western Canada, might stand in that position, because there is no measure of that kind for any other part of Canada. It affects only the prairie provinces.

Mr. Nicholson: What about helping the gold mines?

Mr. Tucker: I did not interrupt you when you were speaking. I do not mind a reasonable question, but this mumbling and muttering from your seat is not proper.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Tucker: You can tell him that. Perhaps you should tell him, if you wish. If we are to have orderly debate, and are to have an opportunity to listen to what is being said, then an hon. member should not be mumbling from his seat, as the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) has done.

Mr. Nicholson: I would like to ask the hon. member this question: What about the assistance to gold mines?

Mr. Tucker: What has the assistance to gold mines got to do with this subject?

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member said there was no other area receiving support of this kind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I should point out that we are discussing the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Tucker: In what I have said I believe I have shown justification for the attitude I take in a matter of this kind. If one belongs to a national party, then one must accept the policy of the party and support it, and try to have that policy implemented from time to time, so as to deal fairly with all parts of the country, or it would be impossible to have a national policy or a national program. It might be necessary under a national policy to do something for certain parts of the country, even though other parts might consider such expenditures of money unwarranted.

We think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is a good measure; we think it is justified. I have no doubt that in certain parts of Canada some might ask; why is the federal government spending so much money on this project? Perhaps the deficit after this year will be about $80 million, and someone might say, "Why should we spend so much money to help the farmers on the prairies in western Canada, in the event of crop failure, when we do not spend sums of money like that for farmers in other parts of Canada?"

An hon. Member: Or the fishermen.

Mr. Tucker: The answer is that, bearing in mind what is being done for other parts of Canada, this has been considered fair for the prairie section of western Canada. We are building a great nation, and this can be done only by all parts being willing to support those things they believe are good for the country as a whole. This cannot be done by listening to sectional appeals, and to those who say, "We are against this, because it does not put anything in the pockets of our people; however, we are prepared to do this other thing because it does put money in the pockets of our people." Do that, if you wish, but do not go out and misrepresent your vote in the country.

Mr. Ellis: People in glass houses.

Mr. Tucker: The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) has referred to people in glass houses. I absolutely defy him to show any time in my political life that I have misrepresented a vote either in the House of Commons or in the legislature.

Mr. Nicholson: What about family allowances?

Mr. Tucker: If we cannot sit in the House of Commons as members who have been elected as honourable and honest men, then I for one would rather stay at home.

I make no apology for voting against this amendment. I do not blame the hon. member for Prince Albert for having moved it, because that is his job as a member of the opposition. It is one of his duties to focus attention on such matters. But, having had some part in the formation of Liberal policy, having played some part at national conventions and council meetings to have things written into the program of that party, I am convinced that I have a duty to perform if I believe that certain things we have decided on should be done. If I can convince my fellow Liberal members that something further should be done, well and good. It can be done most quickly in that way, for then I believe that as a party we will proceed to do it, instead of acting as splinter groups. I realize one could be elected more easily in his own constituency by taking some other course.

However, I believe one has to work in co-operation with others to make any headway in this world. Surely in Canada we must be prepared to work with our fellow citizens from other parts of Canada.

An attack was made upon the Prime Minister. I would like to say just a word about that.

Mr. Ellis: A pretty touchy subject.

Mr. Tucker: It is not touchy at all, I may tell the hon. member for Regina City, for the Prime Minister is a man who has been endorsed by the people of Canada by overwhelming majorities both in 1949 and 1953, and he needs no apology from me.

Mr. Ellis: But he is getting it.

Mr. Tucker: No, he is getting no apology. I am just dealing with the silly attack made by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) against that great man, the Prime Minister. I believe the Prime Minister received that great endorsation because the people of Canada know he is a great and broad-minded Canadian who will treat all parts of Canada fairly, whether they be the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the prairies or British Columbia. That is why he was so endorsed.

The Prime Minister's attitude in regard to this question concerning which the amendment is moved was that he is not yet convinced that the time has come to recommend immediately going ahead with the project.

I am satisfied that if we in the Liberal party intend to regard ourselves as a great national party we should be ready to support things which concern other parts of the country, and which perhaps are of no particular concern to us personally. Then if we have a good case we can go to the Prime Minister and his advisers with it. If we are to be a national party with a national policy we must be fair to all, and on this basis the time will come when a proposition such as this will be accepted.

I think the results would be much better and quicker; I think there is more hope in a policy like that than to take the attitude that we believe in the Liberal party, that we believe in the Liberal program, but should something come up which does not go at once every inch as far as we would like it to go, then we will vote against it. For example, there was the recent great disaster in western Canada, in Saskatchewan in particular, from flooding. Our provincial representatives are here today asking for help because they consider they are part of Canada. In all these matters there should be a national approach, not a narrow provincial approach.

It is on that basis that we can hope to appeal to our fellow Canadians to give us a fair deal in all things. One of the reasons I am happy at all times to support the Prime Minister is that I have implicit faith in his sincere desire as a fair-minded and great Canadian to be fair to all parts of Canada.

I am ready to show that I have faith in him, and I am not ready to withdraw that faith in connection with any individual item as long as he gives the leadership he has given to our country in the last seven years, when it has gone ahead by leaps and bounds. We have prospered and other parts of the country have prospered. A policy has been followed in some cases of opposing things which Ontario and Quebec would have liked, but in the interests of Canada as a whole it was felt the steps should not be taken.

The defeat of the government at this time would endanger the budget, with its reduction in taxes. It would endanger the governmental attitude toward tariffs. There is pressure for tariff protection from different parts of the country to help the unemployment situation in those areas, but that pressure has been resisted for the good of all Canada. What kind of a westerner would I be if I turned against a government which has taken a stand on things like that?

Then there are the fiscal agreements. I wonder what Saskatchewan would do without those fiscal agreements, if they were not maintained in force. There are people in Canada today who take a narrow regional attitude, and who would be ready to do away with these fiscal agreements under which we as a province get, without collecting a bit of taxation ourselves, a total of $26 million. To raise that amount of money we would have to put oppressive taxation on our people. Am I to vote on a regional basis and endanger such things as these? Tomorrow someone might ask why they should pay taxes for the people in Saskatchewan, and where would we in Saskatchewan be without these agreements? I have no compunction in saying that under our system of government I support the government. I am proud to support the government which has stood against pressures to increase tariffs and do away with these fiscal agreements.

The hon. member who made this attack on the Prime Minister has indicated that the Prime Minister placed obstacles in the way of progress. What did he mention? He mentioned health insurance and unemployment. As to unemployment, the Liberal party has put forward in its budget and its expanding trade policy measures which have brought about less unemployment than there would be under any other system. Then the Prime Minister has taken the attitude—

Mr. Harkness: How about getting back to the dam?

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the question involved in this amendment which is a lack of confidence in the government.

Mr. Harkness: No, it is the dam; we want to hear about the dam.

Mr. Tucker: Apparently the hon. member has not been listening to my remarks. I am showing why I do not propose to support this amendment, and for the moment I am dealing with unemployment. I was about to go on to say that the proposition put forward by the Prime Minister was a definite step forward in dealing with this problem. He said that you cannot separate the unemployables from the employables and begin to batter these people back and forth. He made the suggestion that they should all be dealt with in a proper way, with Canadians sharing the burden on a fair basis as among the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities. In my opinion that is a definite and humanitarian step forward.

That is what the Prime Minister suggested, and then the hon. member for Assiniboia actually had the colossal nerve to say that a forward and humanitarian step like this indicates that the Prime Minister is not in favour of progress.

Then there is the question of health insurance. What is the attitude there? It is that the provinces must agree in this matter because it is under provincial jurisdiction. My hon. friends opposite get very impatient with that argument but the fact that they are impatient with that argument is the reason they will never get into power in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tucker: I have more proof of the decline of the C.C.F. than my hon. friends have. If you take the attitude that the provinces are to be overridden, that their voices are not to be listened to in any way in connection with matters within their jurisdiction, then that is bound to happen. Most people in this country believe in our federal system of government. They believe in the basis upon which we were established as a nation, so much so that they will not support a party that is ready to ignore the provinces in that way. The only way we will make progress is by persuading people in all parts of Canada that progress is necessary and desirable.

I well remember the attitude of our former leader in regard to old age pensions. He took the attitude—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I hesitate to interrupt any hon. member. In my opinion the hon. member who has the floor is perfectly within his rights in listing what he regards as the possible consequences of the passage of this amendment, and using those as reasons for voting against the amendment. But I do not think the hon. member is keeping within the spirit of the rule dealing with discussion before the house goes into committee of supply if he develops in detail the various consequences which he thinks will follow upon the passage of this motion of non-confidence. I am not suggesting that the hon. member has been out of order up to the present in listing the possible consequences of the passage of this amendment, but I do suggest that he is coming dangerously near being out of order in going into these points at length.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. There are just two other points I wish to make. I said something about being satisfied and proud to support the Liberal party. I took some part in the convention of 1948. I was on the resolutions committee, and we spent four days working out the resolutions. If anyone will examine what this government has done in carrying out the resolutions passed at that convention, they will find that the government has carried out substantially every one of them.

So far as I am concerned, this is the only party that does make this national appeal. I had some part in getting some of those resolutions adopted. I feel that if anyone who belongs to the Liberal party can get a resolution adopted by the Liberal party they are really accomplishing something worth while, because the Liberal party is a national party and they are getting those things adopted as part of the program of the governing party. So I have no hesitation in saying on this particular matter that I feel it my duty, as a person who believes that the Liberal policy has been good for Canada as a whole, certainly good as a whole for western Canada, to vote to maintain the government in office. In regard to the dam, I would say this.

Mr. Harkness: You are back to that.

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. Harkness: Good.

Mr. Tucker: I was going to say with regard to the question of the dam that I am very much in favour of it, and I hope that in the not too distant future the government will decide to go ahead with the dam. But I do point out to my hon. friend opposite, in the first place, that if the C.C.F. government had not got a report from Professor Cass-Beggs which threw doubt upon the feasibility of the dam on the ground that electricity could be generated more cheaply from the use of natural gas and perhaps later from atomic energy; if they had not sent forward that report to the federal government and left it with them without any suggestion that they disagreed with it, I doubt very much that a royal commission would ever have been appointed, and I think the dam would have been under construction at the present time. The C.C.F. government employed Cass-Beggs and then sent forward that report without any comments whatever, certainly not indicating that they disagreed with it until months later.

It ill behooves the members of that party, the ones who really threw the monkey wrench into this proposition, to make as much fuss about it as they have. I was asked on the floor of the legislature whether I objected to Cass-Beggs expressing these honest opinions of his about the dam, if it were true that this was worth only as much from the standpoint of development as he thought it was; whether it was the right thing that they should send it forward. I admit that it was the right thing to send it forward. But they are the authors of that step. That is one of the things that must be borne in mind by every member from Saskatchewan.

The provincial government is proposing to spend over $70 million on the project. Personally I hope the day will come when a dam will be built without any such colossal expenditure like that by the provincial government. If the provincial government were to use that money in draining northern areas, building roads into that great mineral-bearing part of the province, and otherwise opening up that area, $70 million would enable a considerable amount of work to be done in generally opening up our province. When the time comes to go ahead with this project I hope some sort of arrangement can be worked out whereby the province of Saskatchewan, with its limited financial resources, will not have to pay $70 million odd into it, that it will be a national project in much larger measure than is suggested today by the premier of Saskatchewan.

I am looking at this question as a member from Saskatchewan; thinking what a load of debt such an expenditure could put on the people of our province—less than a million people—and what must be done in regard to building roads and opening up our great north country. We have the same type of north country as have northern Quebec and northern Ontario. We cannot afford to overspend a single dollar. My hope is that when the time comes to build this proposed dam it will be done as a national proposition, without the province of Saskatchewan being asked to invest any more than half of the amount proposed at the present time.

So, Mr. Speaker, without any hesitation I say I am very pleased to show that I have confidence in the government by voting against this motion, the carrying of which would defeat the government and necessitate its resignation or a general election, which I do not think my constituents want, which I do not think Saskatchewan wants, and which I am sure Canada as a whole does not want.

South Saskatchewan River Project

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment very briefly on this motion. I intend to support the motion of the hon. member for Prince Albert. I intend to do so, first, because I think the dam would be beneficial to my constituency; second, because I think it would be good for my province; and third, because I think it would be good for the whole dominion of Canada.

I listened with a good deal of interest this afternoon to the arguments of the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Rosthern. I must admit that the hon. member for Rosthern had considerable courage in saying what he did this afternoon, because in Saskatchewan it does take courage to vote against a motion of this kind. Nevertheless, I simply could not follow his reasoning. If this dam is good for the people of Saskatchewan and of Canada—and I think the member would agree that it is—I do not see how he can speak in favour of it on the one hand, and then the next moment vote against it.

Perhaps an argument can be made that the party system requires such a vote. But, as the hon. member for Prince Albert pointed out, even if our Saskatchewan Liberal members did vote for this project, the government would still have a majority of more than 100. So I cannot see that there would be any danger of the government being upset simply because those members supported the amendment. In Saskatchewan today this issue is not a political one. Everyone, whether he is a Liberal, a Conservative, a C.C.F.'er or a Social Crediter, favours the South Saskatchewan dam. I know the Minister of Agriculture favours it. I know that for years he has tried to sell the project to the government. I wish he had been a little more successful.

In the western United States today there is a very serious drought. In Colorado, Wyoming, Oklahoma and other states the dust is blowing daily. Every year for the last three years the drought area has crept further north. It is quite true that on the prairies today it is fairly wet, but we know that dry years may return.

Many members of this house are inclined to feel that the Saskatchewan river dam is just another handout for our province. I should like to impress on them that in my opinion it is not. The Prime Minister is doubtful as to whether or not it is economically feasible. I am absolutely convinced that this dam is economically feasible. It is a self-liquidating project that would pay for itself over a number of years.

An hon. Member: Time and time again.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Thatcher: During the depression we paid out millions of dollars in relief funds. Much of this expenditure could be avoided, if another depression came, by having this dam in the middle of the dust area. It would provide a basis for new industries, canneries and the like. It would provide hydroelectric power. The dam would enable many more people to live in Saskatchewan. It would provide new crops and give stability to the livestock industry. I repeat that this irrigation project is not a handout to Saskatchewan. It is a scheme which is sensible, feasible and desirable.

I am sometimes surprised when I realize that countries like Israel, Egypt, India and some of the so-called backward nations in this world can do so much in the way of irrigation, yet a modern prosperous country like Canada lets huge quantities of water run right through the dust bowl into Hudson bay. Over a period of years I suppose this project might cost the people of Canada about $10 million annually, or even about $12 million a year. But the return would be fabulous as compared with the original investment.

To you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house I suggest that this dam could be the making of Saskatchewan. I hope that all members, regardless of their party, will give it the consideration it deserves.

Mr. Claude Ellis (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we have heard a number of speeches which I thought were quite interesting, to say the least. The Minister of Agriculture spent some time in lecturing hon. members about playing politics with the South Saskatchewan river dam. I wondered just who started this political football. After all, the manner in which this subject has been treated by the government would indicate that that is what they consider it to be. It was started by the Minister of Agriculture himself. He has stated on more than one occasion that he was the first even to mention the project. Certainly from a political standpoint the Minister of Agriculture has used the South Saskatchewan river dam in every election since 1945. He mentioned the year 1946, but I can recall references to the dam being made in the 1945 election campaign.

Mr. Knight: And in 1944.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member for Saskatoon informs me that they were talking about the dam in 1944.

Mr. Knight: Provincially.

Mr. Ellis: Suffice it to say that this matter has been brought to the attention of this country for a great number of years. With respect to the original proposition, may I say that it was to be a federal undertaking. I was quite interested this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Rosthern make the rounds and complete the circle. He is now back to the position where he says the project should be a federal matter.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I said that under the present proposal we were going to spend over $70 million in the province of Saskatchewan. I said it seemed to me that we should not be expected to spend, as the provincial share, more than half that amount.

Mr. Ellis: Taking the statement just made by the hon. member for Rosthern, Mr. Speaker, might I remind him that it was the federal government that first insisted on the province of Saskatchewan paying anything. Here is the amazing situation. The people of Saskatchewan had been led to believe that the federal government was going to undertake the construction of a dam on the South Saskatchewan river. No one in Saskatchewan had any idea whatsoever that the provincial government was going to be asked to play a part in the construction of the dam.

A few years later, after the federal officials had been pressed by various organizations in the province of Saskatchewan to do something about the dam, they turned around and said, "We are all set to go ahead on the dam, but we are waiting on the provincial government of Saskatchewan to tell us how much they are going to pay as their share of the cost".

If the hon. member for Rosthern is worried about the amount of money the people of Saskatchewan are going to have to pay in connection with the construction of this dam, I suggest that it was his own party and the Minister of Agriculture who first threw on the shoulders of the provincial government any financial responsibility whatever. The year 1949 was the first time the province of Saskatchewan were informed by the federal authorities that they were going to be called upon to pay a share of the cost of the dam.

The hon. member for Rosthern also made a number of other extremely interesting statements. At the outset he said he was not going to apologize for the way he was going to vote. He then proceeded to spend the rest of his time doing just that. However, we heard a speech which many of us have heard a good many times in the past. It was a speech on the grand old Liberal party and the great contribution it is making toward Canadian unity. Of course we in Saskatchewan have heard that type of address so many times that one can perhaps attribute some of the lack of success of Liberal candidates in that province to the playing of this record over and over again ad nauseam.

I noticed that the hon. member, until his closing remarks, made no statement in support of the dam. I should have thought he, as a member from Saskatchewan, would have availed himself of the time at his disposal in this debate to try to persuade hon. members of the importance of an immediate start on the construction of this dam.

Instead of doing that he indulged in something which I think is quite common among Liberals from our province. They rise in their places and rather intimidate members of the opposition. They make this suggestion: "You people should not say much about your own province because, after all, you have certain concessions"—as they would put it—"that you are in danger of losing unless you go along the line and accept our offer, whatever it might be". Mention was made of the P.F.A.A. and the suggestion was "You people from Saskatchewan should not say very much about this dam because you are getting some special privilege".

I want to remind the hon. member for Rosthern of the fact that we are Canadians, whether we come from Saskatchewan, Nova Scotia, British Columbia or any other province; and it is a little bit annoying at times to hear Saskatchewan Liberals get to their feet and suggest that we in Saskatchewan are a separate group and that we are existing by leave of the other provinces of Canada.

I suggest that we must consider the South Saskatchewan irrigation project as a national project. Because it happens to be located in the province of Saskatchewan is one reason we from Saskatchewan are more familiar with it than are others. In all sincerity I suggest to the members of this house that naturally members coming from a particular province are better acquainted than are others with particular projects in their own province. Hence it is only natural that when these matters are raised in the House of Commons it is going to be local people who draw them to the attention of other members of the house. Just because we do that is not to suggest that we consider the South Saskatchewan river dam project as something that is going to affect the province of Saskatchewan only.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, we must think as Canadians. We must get over the provincialism displayed here this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosthern. He did not call it provincialism; oh, no. He portrayed himself as the great champion of national unity. But by implication and in the very remarks he made he revealed himself as a provincially-minded member because, in effect, what he said was this: "This project affects the people of Saskatchewan only; therefore if you do not mind your p's and q's we are not going to get it; the rest of Canada is not going to give it to us".

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia, we have supported worthwhile projects in all parts of Canada. We have given our full support to the building of the St. Lawrence seaway. No member of this group has failed to give complete support to the building of the Canso causeway. All these projects are in the national interest, and as Canadians we support them. By the same token I suggest that the South Saskatchewan river dam project, although it is being built in the province of Saskatchewan, is of national importance. After all, the economic well-being of one province—and it does not matter which province it is—affects the economic life of the entire country.

The hon. member for Peace River mentioned some of the advantages that accrued to the southern part of Alberta as the result of irrigation projects. We in Saskatchewan are only too well aware of the fact that we are essentially a one-crop economy. That does not make for economic stability. Certainly the objective all of us should seek is to put the agricultural economy of the province on a sounder basis, and through diversification of agriculture make not only the economic lot of those farming in that area better but add to the economic well-being of people in all parts of Canada.

A number of other comments were made this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosthern, and I should like to make passing reference to one or two of them. He mentioned something about the Prime Minister, and said we in the house should not have the temerity to challenge his wisdom or logic. I suggest that no member is beyond criticism. Because a member happens to belong to the cabinet or be the prime minister I do not think he should therefore be absolved of all blame or free from all criticism.

I suggest that in recent years the Prime Minister has indicated on a number of occasions that he is a thoroughgoing conservative, with a small "c". I believe history will bear that out. Certainly in his attitude of late on a great number of questions he has revealed himself so conservative as to be termed reactionary. I am not going to go into that matter this afternoon, but I do suggest that the Prime Minister as leader of the government must accept the greater responsibility for government action or inaction, and in this case it is inaction.

The Liberals of Saskatchewan talk about their support for the dam, but they support a party, they support a government, they support a prime minister, all of whom have said "No" to the dam. Now they say they have to hew to the line and vote against the amendment because it involves want of confidence. Another hon. member has already mentioned that with the top-heavy majority enjoyed by the government, defections on the part of hon. members opposite certainly are not going to jeopardize the government. What is more, I suggest the Prime Minister has stated repeatedly that he is anxious to be convinced that this project is in the national interest.

How is he going to come to that conclusion? I suggest hon. members should be in a position where they could reveal to him what they think. Consequently I suggest to hon. members on the government side that this is their opportunity to say to the Prime Minister of Canada that they believe the dam should be built, and no amount of alibiing in advance on the part of Saskatchewan Liberals is going to cover up the fact that in this instance they are placing their party ahead of the South Saskatchewan river dam project.

I mentioned a few moments ago the strange twist of events that has taken place recently. In the initial instance the dam was to be a federal undertaking. Then, in order to get off the hook, the Minister of Agriculture suddenly confronted the province of Saskatchewan with the ultimatum that if they wished to see the dam built they would have to pay part of the cost. Now we have the spectacle of a supporter of the government suggesting that the province has agreed to pay too much. You cannot satisfy these people. In the first instance they complained because the province was not going to pay anything toward the project, and now they turn around and argue that the province has agreed to pay too much. I suggest if the province is offering to pay too much it is up to the hon. member for Rosthern and his colleagues to have a heart to heart talk with the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister and convince them of that fact, if the building of the dam is in the realm of immediate possibility.

We have heard vague assurances that the dam is going to be built some time; that it is going to be built tomorrow. The old, trite saying that tomorrow never comes is applicable in this case. I suggest the government has had ample time to reveal whether or not it ever intends to proceed with the construction of the dam. Being removed from the provincial scene, one misses some of the politicking that is going on in the province. But I can recall that a few years ago the hon. member for Rosthern was leader of the opposition in the legislature, and he made a great to-do about the Cass-Beggs report. He said they were all set to build the dam, and the Saskatchewan government had a report on power made by David Cass-Beggs which frightened the government into appointing a royal commission.

The royal commission was appointed in 1952, and it held hearings and made a report. Just to make absolutely certain that the commission's report would be what the government wanted, the government appointed as members of the commission Dr. T. H. Hogg of Toronto, a power man, Mr. G. A. Gaherty of Calgary, a power man, and the late Dr. John Widtsoe of Salt Lake City, the only irrigation expert on the royal commission, and the government got precisely what it asked for. It got a report confirming the fears expressed by the Prime Minister that perhaps the project was not in the national interest. Nevertheless the report, in the light of present-day conditions, is quite interesting. At page 29 there is a discussion of the immediate effects upon the economy, and I find there the following:

> With relatively full employment, no new physical assets can be created without diverting labour and other resources from their current employment. Society must then do without the production that is lost by this transfer and this represents the real cost to it of the project. When labour and other resources have no employment opportunities they can be utilized for the production of goods and services which thereby are secured without any real cost to the community. This is one aspect of the argument that the best time for heavy investment of public money is during a period of business recession.

Of course I am quite well aware that the government does not consider we are having a business recession. In spite of the efforts of members on the opposition side to convince them that over 600,000 unemployed in Canada represent a serious condition, they have tended to minimize at every turn the economic situation facing the people of the country at the present time. But I do want to refer to a suggestion put forward by one of the government supporters a few moments ago. He said we should not be too impatient, that we should be prepared to wait for this beneficent Liberal government, which has the interests of all Canada at heart—I should put that in quotation marks—to build the dam, and that if we wait long enough some day it will do so.

The suggestion is made that we should not complain because, after all, if federal funds were to be used in building the dam this would be a special concession or favour bestowed on us by a beneficent federal government. I want to suggest at the outset that the greater part of the money to be spent in the building of the dam will not be spent in the province of Saskatchewan at all. In the building of a dam of this magnitude a great portion of the cost will be represented by the buying of heavy machinery, and that machinery is going to be purchased in eastern Canada. It is going to be purchased in places other than the province of Saskatchewan.

As a matter of fact, estimates of as high as 75 per cent have been made of the leakage in projects of this kind. Only a quarter or perhaps less than a quarter of the money actually to be spent on the dam will be spent in the province of Saskatchewan. The bulk of the money will be spent in other parts of Canada, particularly in eastern Canada.

This brings out my point that the project is in the national interest. It will be built, if it ever is built under existing conditions of sharing the cost, largely by the provincial government. The hon. member for Rosthern has suggested that the provincial government has committed itself to spending $70 million toward the completion of the project. It is actually $78 million. According to the latest information the federal government would be called upon to spend about $62 million. This $62 million would be spread over a great number of years to create economic stability in a province that has long known crop failures and drought.

In spite of the fact that there is a great deal of water on the plains today, let us remember that the building of a dam is also a measure of flood control. Let us remember that within the past 10 years there have been times when feed has been imported into the province from Manitoba. We are faced with the problem of building up a measure of economic stability in a part of Canada which, after all, has a great effect on the entire dominion.

Perhaps I should say a word about the role of the Minister of Agriculture in this whole affair. The minister has told us he is in favour of the dam. He has been telling us that for a great number of years, and he still persists in telling us it is going to be built. I have no doubt the dam will be built, but I have serious doubts whether the Minister of Agriculture or any of his colleagues will be on the government benches when that is done. Certainly if we have waited this long to get any evidence of willingness to proceed with this project, then I think we are going to look in vain for any leadership from the Liberal party in this connection.

I do want to suggest that one or two conditions obtain in so far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned. In the first instance, if the minister did decide to really build the dam, or to look upon the promise to build the dam as more than just an election promise, then he has been guilty of deceiving the people of Saskatchewan over the past 10 or 11 years. If he really believed this dam would be proceeded with by this government, or had any reason to believe the government would listen to his suggestions, then I suggest his influence with the government is almost negligible. I suggest that, as a matter of protest if nothing else, he should have taken issue with his colleagues, realizing his status as a member of the cabinet.

We find a different situation obtains with respect to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) and the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison). They are not ministers of this government, and certainly when this vote is taken there is nothing whatever to stop them from voting for this amendment. They say they would be voting non-confidence in the government. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out that on a previous occasion in this house the hon. member for Rosthern voted for an amendment of this kind. The adoption of that amendment did not involve the defeat of the government. If these members feel that way, then I suggest the Prime Minister should say to the supporters of the government that on this issue there shall be a free vote; that he wants an expression of opinion on whether or not this project should be proceeded with. I believe that should be done; then the Liberals from Saskatchewan would have no valid ground for saying they must go along with the government on this particular issue.

Mr. Studer: Balderdash.

Mr. Ellis: The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek is muttering in his beard again. I would prefer that he be intelligent, but he insists upon being asinine.

Mr. Studer: I do not want to follow your example.

Mr. Ellis: It is true that I and others have injected an element of politics into the discussion this afternoon. I suggest, however, this project has been made a political football by none other than the members who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker. From the outset the South Saskatchewan dam was promised to the people of Saskatchewan by the Liberal party. Now they find themselves in a position where many people are asking for some results. Just saying over and over again that you are in favour of doing something is a poor substitute for action.

[Mr. Ellis.]

I do want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the role of the Minister of Agriculture could be briefly summed up in this way. In the negotiations that have been carried on among the federal officials, the P.F.R.A. and the officials of the provincial government to bring about some measure of agreement which would facilitate the commencement of this project, the provincial negotiations have always been at a distinct disadvantage. While they were negotiating in good faith they never knew whether, as a result of all their negotiation, the federal government would pay any attention to them. It seems to me that if you are going to have negotiations you must have equity; you must have fairness, and you must have two parties willing to sit down and say if we can arrive at some mutually acceptable agreement we are honour bound to proceed under that agreement.

The situation has been that while Mr. Douglas and the members of his cabinet have been carrying on negotiations with the federal government, they were always aware of the fact that even if they were able to come to an agreement on every particular with the federal officials it still did not mean that the dam was going to be built. The provincial government stated in advance that they wanted this dam built. They wanted to meet with federal officials to bring about a solution satisfactory to both sides, and then they wanted an immediate start on the dam. The federal officials would come along and say, "Well, we will talk it over, but that does not mean we are going to build it if we do come to an agreement." Every time an agreement was reached the Minister of Agriculture would pop up with some new condition.

I am not going over the whole story, but at the outset there was some reference to the subsidization of power. Earlier there was a reference to the Cass-Beggs report, and there was a report which had to do with the power aspect of the project. No one can argue any longer that the question of power is an obstacle, under any circumstances, to an agreement between the federal and provincial government. I believe that matter has been taken care of. The statement was made, "We are not going to permit the subsidization of power in any province by the use of federal funds." In order to avoid that the provincial government agreed to pay the full cost of building a power station at the dam.

After that agreement had been reached we had every reason to believe that we were making some progress, but up popped the Minister of Agriculture with another condition. He said the province would have to pay the cost of moving that water from the reservoir to the users of the water. The province agreed to that. They were going to bend over backward to do everything they possibly could to bring about an agreement which would be acceptable to the federal officials.

Then we were told we had to pay part of the cost of building the reservoir itself. When the hon. member for Rosthern complains that the province is paying too much, I ask him this. Who forced the province into the position of paying too much? I say it was his colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture, the Prime Minister and the Liberal government who forced the province into that position.

There is no use turning around and trying to blame the province, or suggesting they are being unwise and too extravagant in spending that much money, when the fact is that by progressive steps the Liberal government have forced the provincial government in Saskatchewan to commit itself to greater expenditures.

Well, we agreed to pay for part of the reservoir. We thought then we were going to make headway. Along came the Minister of Agriculture, reaching into his pocket and pulling out another document. "Now", he says, "what about the treasury bills?" There had been an agreement that the province might be permitted to pay part of its cost of construction in treasury bills, payable over a term of 20 years. The Minister of Agriculture came along and said, " We think we can sell this idea to the cabinet only if the province agrees to pay it all in cash every year". I am certain they felt virtually certain that the province would be unable to meet that exacting requirement.

Then—the latest—the Minister of Agriculture comes along and says, "What about penstocks?" Well, you cannot but wonder about it; every time you reach the point where the province may get something from the agreement, you find a new and exacting condition put forward. I suggest in all sincerity that these conditions have been put forward as part of deliberate policy on the part of this government, trying to force the government of Saskatchewan into a position where it would refuse to go further. And, if that had happened, the Liberal party would then go up and down the province saying, "Oh, we wanted to build this dam, but the provincial government stood in our way". In my judgment that is precisely the policy pursued by the Minister of Agriculture in the country and in the House of Commons.

Mr. Knight: And where does he stand in Saskatchewan today?

Mr. Ellis: The question has been asked as to where he stands in Saskatchewan today. Well, I do not wish to deal with that at length, but there are brandished knives in Saskatchewan among the Liberals who are fighting over a corpse.

I repeat that this whole matter of negotiation between the federal and provincial governments has been on the basis of leading the provincial government along to the point where, it was hoped, that government would go no farther. But, despite all these obstacles and roadblocks thrown in the way of the provincial government, it had been determined to go ahead with the dam. The premier of Saskatchewan repeatedly wrote to Ottawa requesting interviews with the Prime Minister, and saying that something should be done.

Last fall the premier of the province was very anxious to come to Ottawa to meet with the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet. The Prime Minister showed the letter to the Minister of Agriculture, which was the most unfortunate thing that could have happened, because the Minister of Agriculture said, in effect, "Well, I will take care of that. That is all right. I am going out to Saskatchewan next week, and I will take care of it".

So he went out to Saskatchewan, and once again another of these obstacles was thrown before the provincial government which, by this time, was getting a little frustrated and annoyed. They insisted upon coming to terms, and finding out what was the score. Finally the premier of the province had the temerity to inform the Minister of Agriculture that the province of Saskatchewan wanted the Liberal government in Ottawa to say yes or no. Then the Minister of Agriculture turned around and said, "If that is the way you are going to do business, all right. Only last July you insisted upon our committing ourselves when we were not prepared to negotiate. You must know that the only way we can negotiate with you is to have you lay all your cards on the table, and then we will decide whether or not we are playing for keeps."

Well, we know that finally a meeting was held following the preliminary dominion-provincial conference. While I do not know for sure, I believe the Minister of Agriculture was present at that meeting. In any event the sum total of the meeting was a flat no, on the part of the Prime Minister. So, after all these years of promises, and after all this time, here is the situation. Liberal members have been going up and down the province of Saskatchewan making all sorts of promises. Finally, when the chips are down and the premier of Saskatchewan is face to face with the Prime Minister of Canada, the Prime Minister said what I am certain Liberals must have know many years ago, that this government had no intention whatsoever of building that dam.

I just wish to conclude by reminding hon. members once again that this is not a provincial issue. The building of the South Saskatchewan dam is a national issue, just as is the building of the Canso causeway or the building of the St. Lawrence seaway project. It is something which will have great benefits for the people of Canada as a whole. It is time to build this country up; and when I think that in the province of Saskatchewan, where we have less than a million population, our province has enough faith in the future, enough faith in the building of the dam, that we are willing to put up $78 million, then I certainly think the government of Canada which, at this juncture, would have to put up $62 million, should come through and fulfil its promises, and commence construction of that dam.

I suggest that in voting on this amendment Liberals from Saskatchewan will be able to show their true colours. They will have their opportunity when the vote is taken to let the country know and to let their constituents know whether they are in favour of the dam to the point where they are prepared to put themselves on record to that effect. I challenge Liberal members from Saskatchewan to vote for this amendment.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, shortly before six o'clock the hon. member for Rosthern spent a good deal of time explaining that a vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert would mean a vote against the government, and if the motion should carry the government would be defeated. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interjected and asked the hon. member for Rosthern about his vote on August 27, 1946, when the milk subsidy was before parliament.

I would remind the house that on that occasion the hon. member for Rosthern voted for a similar amendment. The motion was carried but the government was not defeated, and the business of the house went on. I might mention that on that date I had the pleasure of presenting an amendment on the motion to go into supply, as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be left out and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house desires to record its opinion that consideration should be given to the continuance of the milk subsidy so as to ensure adequate return to milk producers and make possible the consumption of milk for the nutrition of the Canadian people without any further increase in the price thereof to the consumers."

The present Prime Minister was the acting prime minister on that occasion and he suggested after our case had been presented that I should withdraw the motion. However, my colleagues and I did not agree, and later the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) asked that hon. members of the house have a free vote. He went on to say, as reported on page 5431 of Hansard:

> Therefore I should like to serve notice that if this vote carries the government will immediately move that the house go into committee of supply this day. I believe that that procedure is consistent with the rules, and if there can be general agreement on that point the work of the house can be facilitated and the objective of hon. members attained.

I appreciate the fact that on a number of occasions the Prime Minister has expressed the opinion that public funds for the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam should not be voted by parliament at this particular time. However, I am sure the Prime Minister could not have any objection to testing the opinion of parliament. I am of the opinion at the moment that a majority of the members of the house might agree with the Prime Minister. I think it was a pity this afternoon that the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Rosthern did not take more time to point out the advantages to all Canada of having a project such as this proceeded with.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall do that on my estimates.

Mr. Nicholson: There is going to be a vote shortly, and I think it would have been desirable that hon. members of all parties have a chance to indicate whether they think the proposal of the hon. member for Prince Albert should be supported. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture would be in a much stronger position if he had a favourable vote, as we had when the milk subsidy was before this parliament.

I do not wish to become involved this evening in a political discussion with members across the way, but I do want to present some arguments in an effort to convince the house that this proposal is a desirable step in connection with the development of all Canada. We should not lose sight of the fact that during the past 25 years we have had two problems which have become national in character, the problem of drought and the present problem of flooding.

I have here the telegraphic crop report for May 11, which is published by the Department of Trade and Commerce. This points out that the average rainfall in Manitoba for the period from April 1 was 2·07 inches as compared with the long-term average of 1·48. That indicates that this is not a serious problem in Manitoba as a whole, although there are a few sections where there has been a sharp increase.

In the case of Alberta the long-term average is 1·4 inches, whereas this year it has been 2·41. Again there is no serious problem, although a few isolated places in Alberta have rainfalls for this year two or three times the average for the rest of the province.

In the case of Saskatchewan the long-term average is 1·21 inches, compared with this year's amount of 3·86 inches. I have picked out a few communities in the northeastern section of the province which I have the honour to represent, and these figures will indicate the problem we have on our doorstep. These are the figures:

	Long-term average	This year
Leross	1·30	6·06
Yorkton	1·07	4·15
Dafoe	·89	6·08
Buchanan	1·10	4·03
Hudson Bay	1·16	3·86
Porcupine Plain	1·12	5·26
Melfort	1·10	5·79

I am sure that hon. members, regardless of where they sit, will not blame any government for the drought experience in the thirties or for the flooding we have had in northeastern Saskatchewan during the past several years. The secretary of a municipality in my constituency writes that the last good crop they had was in 1949, and since that time they have had a succession of floods or frosts or both. He states that as a result, the arrears of taxes which stood at $38,000 in 1949 increased to $51,000 in 1950, to $62,000 in 1951, to $68,000 in 1952, to $80,000 in 1953 and to $116,000 in 1954. This is a municipality with quite a small assessment. It is in an area where they have had a succession of very wet years. This has posed a most difficult problem for the people in that municipality.

I realize that the building of the South Saskatchewan dam is not going to solve the problem for all people in Saskatchewan, but I think the government must decide that a project similar to the Tennessee valley authority should be established in Saskatchewan so we can conserve the excessive moisture we have some years to make it available in the years of drought.

Experts in the various departments of government here do not wish to take responsibility for the sort of weather we have been having. I had a letter from one of my constituents who has been keeping careful weather records for over 50 years, and it is his considered opinion that the atomic and hydrogen bomb tests have been a factor in the most unusual weather we have been having. I might mention that such a well known authority as Dr. Ritchie Calder wrote in the New Statesman, and Nation a few months ago that up until a year ago the best experts laughed at the idea of these experiments having any effect on the weather. But now the best authorities are not so dogmatic. They concede that there might be some connection. My friend writes:

> Last year, marked atomic conditions were ameliorated after September 20. The conditions passed to drought (as they had in 1952) as the weeks went by. Winter did not close down at Sub Rosa, 2,000 feet above the sea level, until November 26, a month later than normal, and drought continued all winter and onwards.
> . . . the drought continued on into spring (which came at the abnormally early date, for the hills, of April 3.

Mr. Philpott: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; this seems a long way from the South Saskatchewan dam.

Mr. Nicholson: It is not so very far, Mr. Speaker. My constituent has expressed the opinion—and it is not an isolated opinion—that the atomic and hydrogen bomb tests have had an effect on the weather. If the hon. member for Vancouver South, who is an authority on a great many subjects, will say definitely that they have not, I am sure some of the other well known scientists in the world will be glad to have his considered opinion.

Mr. Knowles: Put that in your column and smoke it.

Mr. Nicholson: A very serious problem is developing as a result of the excessive rainfall which I have mentioned, as recorded by the Department of Trade and Commerce in this bulletin on weather conditions in the prairie provinces. This publication suggests that there are areas which are having very heavy rainfalls each year. This poses a problem which is too great for the municipalities to deal with, and it is becoming a problem that is too great for the province.

I appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister and his cabinet are negotiating with cabinet ministers from Saskatchewan to review this whole problem, but I believe we could not start too soon appropriating funds for a project such as the South Saskatchewan dam. The cost that has been mentioned probably sounds a good deal as compared with the projects we had a few years ago. But as compared with some of the projects we undertook during the war it seems a very modest amount. The Minister of Trade and Commerce embarked on the construction of the Polymer project at Sarnia when we lost our supplies of natural rubber. This project required an investment of over $50 million, with no guarantee that the completed project would meet our requirement. The Shipshaw project was also undertaken. These did not place any great strain on the Canadian economy.

I submit that the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam, as a beginning to conserve moisture and make water available in areas where they have had recurring droughts, is a step that must be taken. Consider the large expenditures we are able to make in the field of defence. The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Weaver) was good enough to take about 40 of his colleagues to the north of his constituency a short time ago, and they were greatly impressed by the achievements in that north country.

These expenditures are made in the public interest. We were all greatly impressed by those large planes that were being used to transport heavy equipment to the north. We were told that the heavy Caterpillars could travel under their own power into the bowels of one of these big machines. They told us that the machines weighed 50 tons empty, and could take off with a load of 50 tons without any trouble. The machine empty represented an investment of a little less than $3 million. I realize that the Canadian government has not made the investment, but we are participating in the use of these very large machines.

When one considers the importance of the dam to our whole economy, and particularly to people in the area that would be served by it, I think it is only reasonable that we should test public opinion in this parliament tonight. I think the Prime Minister will agree tonight, as he did in 1946, that members regardless of where they sit, should stand up and indicate whether or not they think the building of this dam would be serving the best interests of Canada. We should not lose sight of the fact that if we are not prepared to conserve our land and water resources and use them in the best interests of all the people of Canada and all the people of the world, we cannot forever look forward to holding this vast territory.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I would remind the house that the Euphrates valley at one time supported a population of over 20 million people. Now only 2¼ million people live there, illiterate, ill-clothed, ill-fed, diseased peasants, who eke out a wretched existence. They did not have the advantage of all the information that we have available. As the hon. member for Prince Albert has suggested, I believe we should immediately start on the construction of this one project in an area in Canada which has produced great quantities of food for the country, an area that is vital to the continued prosperity of Canada as a whole.

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I think the discussion of this particular subject is very timely when we consider the state of affairs in western Canada. People are certainly frustrated by the apathy of this government in not going ahead with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam. I do not believe I could think of one other proposal that has been used to greater advantage as a political football by the Liberals, with the possible exception of the Hudson Bay railway, than this proposal of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

At present the situation in western Canada is the result of a combination of factors. I do not believe we are going to find a solution to this problem unless we are prepared to undertake some kind of flood control. I do not believe the topography of the land in Saskatchewan is able to handle such severe conditions of flooding as we have had during the past few years. I do not believe the river channels and watercourses are able to cope with that flooding. I believe we have to undertake as a dominion project some sort of over-all water conservation policy in this region.

I should like to go even further. I suggest that possibly we should give some consideration to a scheme of diverting acreage. If a farmer had a few acres of land on his farm that was eroding very badly the government should make some concession for that land if he took it out of production and planted it to grass, for instance, or if he did a little drainage work, and took those acres out of production. I think it would go a long way toward the over-all water conservation program we must have in this country if we are going to solve the problem with which we will be confronted in the future.

So I say the problem with which we are faced is a climax to a condition which has come about over the past few years. Certainly the leader of the Social Credit party this afternoon expressed what a great many of us feel, I suppose, that we have so much water we do not know what to do with it, and we do not like to hear the word mentioned. That is true. But when we examine this proposition of water control, I think that in itself will help to remedy this flooding condition with which we are confronted. I believe the dam would be one of the keys to this over-all water conservation program of which I spoke.

I will not say I was annoyed, but I was a little bit concerned this afternoon when the Minister of Agriculture stated that the dam had not been known as such prior to 1946, or words to that effect. Since I have been in this house I have been amazed, on every occasion this subject has been discussed, to hear members of the government and other hon. members opposite go out of their way to try to convince not only other members of the Liberal party but Canadians in general that we in Saskatchewan, because we are clamouring for this dam, have some selfish motive, or some motive that is not in the interests of the rest of Canada.

I am sure we must all agree that if we could build the dam it would not only be of the greatest assistance in controlling water in Saskatchewan, but would help immeasurably in controlling the flow of water in the province of Manitoba. When we take these factors into consideration, to say nothing of the proposal that was put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Regina City and by other members on this side of the house at various times, as to the public investment program that such a proposition would initiate, I think it is something that should be given the greatest consideration when we are speaking about building the dam as being in the national interest.

I should like to place on record one or two statements that have been made. As I said a moment ago, it is not only the Minister of Agriculture who has used this issue. He said this afternoon that he wanted to see the dam built. May I say that I am in complete agreement with that statement. It seems to me that not only the minister but every other Liberal from the province of Saskatchewan has used this issue whenever he felt it was politically advantageous to do so. I should like to place on record one or two quotations which I believe justify that assertion.

First of all, even back in 1945 the Minister of Agriculture, while speaking to a meeting at Southey, had this to say:

> Southey, Sask. Agriculture minister Gardiner told an election meeting last night that plans are ready for starting prairie farm rehabilitation projects costing $30 million.
> This work for irrigation could be started as soon as the need for employment arose after the war. In addition the minister told of a large program for which the plans were only partly drawn, costing $110 million in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It would involve a dam on the Saskatchewan river near Outlook, Saskatchewan.

That was one of the statements made. I am sure all the provocative statements have been made by Liberals themselves. Those of us in Saskatchewan cannot be accused of going out and making the only provocative statements that have been made in this connection.

Again I should like to quote Mr. Charles Henderson, then Liberal member of parliament, speaking at Kindersley on May 18, 1945. Among other things he stated as follows:

> . . . that he had secured assurances that $111 million would be available for the proposed scheme.

He was speaking of the South Saskatchewan river dam.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Neither one of those statements was with regard to the South Saskatchewan river dam alone. They were with regard to all the large projects. More than half of the projects are already completed.

Mr. Bryson: This quotation of which I am speaking definitely had reference to the South Saskatchewan river dam.

Mr. Gardiner: I was speaking about the $110 million proposal which, as was pointed out in the previous quotation, was for all the projects.

Mr. Bryson: That is true, but the dam was to be included in that expenditure. Then Mr. J. Gordon Ross, then member for Moose Jaw, speaking at Chaplin on May 23, 1946, in preparation for the Morse by-election, had this to say, speaking of this expenditure:

> . . . and a start will be made as soon as men and equipment are available.

He was referring to the South Saskatchewan irrigation scheme. Then on October 20, 1948, the Minister of Agriculture, speaking about the dam at Allan, Saskatchewan, and this to say:

> Most of the money would be provided by the federal government because it could not be expected that Saskatchewan, subject to drought, could carry the load of such a capital expenditure.

Then we have the statement made by the hon. member for Rosthern in support of Mr. Boucher. He advocated the election of Mr. Boucher if the people of Saskatchewan wanted to get the dam built.

> He added, "You certainly won't get anywhere by sending C.C.F'ers to Ottawa—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bryson: That is all right. But where are these great champions of the dam today?

An hon. Member: Right here.

Mr. Bryson: Then there are other statements by the Minister of Agriculture. They go on and on. I am not going to read from them any further, but I wanted to put on the record some of the very provocative statements that have been made from time to time, as I say, whenever the Liberals thought it was politically advantageous to do so.

Besides the value of the dam as a water conservation measure, and besides its importance as a power and irrigation project, I think one of the things we must bear in mind is that in the Carrot river triangle there is in the neighbourhood of—and I shall be conservative—750,000 acres of land which could be utilized provided it was drained; and it will never be settled until complete drainage is carried out. That situation can come about only when we have on the South Saskatchewan river the control that would be provided if we had the dam there. I therefore say that power and irrigation are only part of the great advantages that would be gained from that proposition.

I think there are a great many aspects of this matter of flooding in Saskatchewan that should be brought to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture as well as to other members of the house. Over the last few days I have had a great many letters from farmers who have grain stored in bins out in the field. Because of the flooding, great loss is going to take place in connection with that grain. These farmers are not able to haul their grain. They cannot get it out. To start with, there is no room in the elevators. The roads are impassable. That grain is going to be a complete loss in many cases. I think that is a deplorable situation.

As was pointed out this afternoon in connection with the unemployment question, the money spent in building this dam would be of the greatest importance to the over-all economy of this country. The fact that 75 per cent of the money spent on the turbines and all other materials that would be used in the construction would accrue to other parts of Canada should be given some weight when this question is being considered in the light of how it is going to affect the over-all economy of the country.

This afternoon somebody asked, what has this to do with the over-all economy? How would this be beneficial in the national interest? I should like to point out, as I have on previous occasions, that we in western Canada have supported the seaway, though I do not think too many of our farmers are completely taken in by the promises of what is going to accrue to them when the seaway is completed. I think it has been overexaggerated. In my opinion a great many people believe that in all probability freight rates in western Canada will increase when the seaway is completed. They are going to increase for the very simple reason that in all likelihood freight revenues in eastern Canada are going to decline. The railways will have to be subsidized, and the only place that is going to be done is at the expense of the western farmers. Nevertheless I believe there are very few farmers who are not in complete agreement with the seaway project.

Therefore I think we should look at these things in the light of the national interest. This afternoon reference was made to the proposition made years ago. I am not going to elaborate further, because the matter was well covered this afternoon by one or two other speakers. I should merely like to say that first of all the dam was to be built as a wholly federal project. Then Saskatchewan agreed to pay $33 million toward the project. Then we were asked and agreed to pay as high as $45 million. The next figure was $65 million and now it is $78 million, but we are no closer to getting the dam now than we were before. As a matter of fact the people of Saskatchewan feel they have been betrayed and led down the "Gardiner" path.

Mr. Gardiner: Since my hon. friend has brought my name into it, as a matter of privilege I wish to say that we have never asked the Saskatchewan government to pay $78 million toward the South Saskatchewan river dam at any time.

An hon. Member: That is because you will not agree to build it.

Mr. Bryson: The minister said this afternoon the Liberals would build the dam, so we are back now exactly where we were when the proposition was first talked about. I should like to emphasize that I believe now is the time we should give the greatest consideration to an over-all national policy of water conservation. I think the South Saskatchewan dam is the key to that over-all policy. There are other projects which I am sure would be just as important, but I think it is important that we get away from this narrowness, this provincialism, when we are speaking about the South Saskatchewan river dam. In my opinion it should be part and parcel of an over-all program if we are to have any degree of flood control in western Canada.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time particularly to point out that the position this party has taken on the numerous occasions we have raised this question has emphasized the fact that this is not something exclusively of concern to the province of Saskatchewan. This is not merely a matter of debate between the Minister of Agriculture on the one hand and those from Saskatchewan in different parties on the other. The remark by the previous speaker with regard to provincialism would certainly not apply, and I am not suggesting he intended it to apply, to the position we have taken with respect to the matter since it has been first discussed. There is just a little tendency to carry on the debate as though this were something Saskatchewan was seeking to obtain from the government through the kind offices of the Minister of Agriculture, who happens to come from that province.

I am not going to repeat in detail the speeches I have made previously on this very subject. It happens to be a subject with which I have had certain personal acquaintance over many years. I can recall that for a great many years it has been one of the projects that has arrested the attention of those who believe that by the combined action of the governments of this country we should develop these great undeveloped resources, particularly where there is a strong humanitarian demand. I doubt if, from the humanitarian point of view, there is a single project now awaiting development in Canada that compares in importance with the development of the South Saskatchewan dam.

I am convinced this is a practical project. Certainly the evidence is there from engineers whose skill, competence and judgment would not be questioned by the Minister of Agriculture, because they are holding their offices as the result of his approval. Engineers of his own department have examined the project, have reported that it is practical, and have stated that it should proceed.

To those who are not acquainted with this matter the question might naturally arise as to why, with that recommendation before them, the government do not see fit to act. It may be well for those who may not have followed the matter to recall the rather strange arguments put forward by the government from time to time with regard to royal commissions. When we have asked that the government do what any big business would do and appoint a royal commission to examine the over-all organization of government and the efficiency of government administration from the ordinary departmental administrative point of view, we have been told that this would be a denial of the responsibility of government. But we have seen just recently that the government proposes to set up a commission on the general economy of Canada. They have already named the chairman of the commission.

In the present case, because it is convenient to them, it is not a denial of responsibility. In the particular case under discussion they had the recommendation of qualified engineers who worked on the spot, carried out their tests right near the Coteau creek site, and after careful examination and research found that the project could be developed economically and in a practical way. But then the government, which is so very anxious about royal commissions which might impinge upon their responsibility, decided that it had a way out, and so it would not have to act on the advice of the engineers under the Minister of Agriculture, who obviously have his approval because they are still employed, the government appointed a royal commission to act as a burial squad. That is what it has been, nothing else.

They did not appoint a royal commission at the time they proceeded with the St. Lawrence seaway development and joined in that great co-ordinated enterprise which involves many times the expenditure that would be involved in the South Saskatchewan dam. They relied on their own engineers, men who were similarly responsible to a department of government, men who also carried out their duties, just as the engineers answerable to the Minister of Agriculture did. Why did they need a royal commission for a much smaller enterprise, though it is an enterprise of immense importance to the people of Saskatchewan? They did so for no other reason than to find an excuse for delay; that was the only reason. They had the engineers' report, just as they had the reports on the St. Lawrence development.

In this case we should not become too much involved in the details as between the power and irrigation. We know there is an estimate of the development of a minimum of 150,000 horsepower. We know part of that power will be required for the pumping machines which will be necessary to carry out the great irrigation project which will make one of the most arable areas in Saskatchewan in the neighbourhood of Outlook. There is no uncertainty as to what the soil is going to be like once the irrigation goes through. Those who have visited the experimental development near Outlook have seen some of the richest soil anywhere in the prairie provinces, through the simple device of irrigation carried out for the one purpose of determining what the result would be of going ahead with this development. There is, therefore, no uncertainty.

As a matter of fact there was no uncertainty in the mind of the minister last year, because on June 10 the Minister of Agriculture was reported in the Regina Leader-Post as saying this. I ask hon. members on the other side as well as on this—perhaps on the other side more than on this, because we know we must convince them if there is any chance of a favourable vote on this important motion—to listen to what the minister said last year:

> We have been doing all right at clearing obstruction out of the way. There were four when we started discussions and there is now only the one left—the question of power development costs—

Well, that simplifies it. All they need to know is the question of power development costs. They have the engineers. They have the reports. They know what can be done. I am convinced that the people in the rest of Canada want this project carried out and are prepared to provide from the common funds of the Dominion of Canada whatever is appropriately required under agreement with Saskatchewan to carry out this vitally important project.

This is not a provincial matter. This is one of those developments that will have its impact upon the whole of Canada. It is not only the people of Saskatchewan who have reason for great concern that today, in this country which has seen such remarkable developments within the last few years, there is within that part of the Palliser triangle near the area that would be served by the water and the power produced in this way as desolate a scene as we are likely to see anywhere in Canada.

Not long ago in New York I saw a collection of photographs that I would commend to anyone who happens to find his way there. It is a collection from all over the world, and can be seen in the new art gallery in New York. One of the pictures that struck me very forcibly was a picture of three dejected looking children leaning on a fence. There was a scene of dust, dryness and desolation behind them, and up on a hill in the central background was a none too attractive house. As I looked at the picture I was under the impression that it was probably a picture from the dust bowl in the United States. I then saw it was from Canada, from this very area that would be served by this development. Churches have been abandoned; schools have been abandoned; homes have been abandoned in an area with soil that would produce crops as good as could be found anywhere on the prairies if this project were undertaken.

I am not suggesting that the government make capital expenditures recklessly. Nevertheless the human equation is an important factor in this matter. The simple decision to proceed with this, not just repeated assurances that we are getting further along the road toward removing the obstructions, would have a tremendous effect on people who see little opportunity of return for their early work, if they are still on the farm, and who see little prospect for their children on that land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the evidence is there that this can be done. The evidence is there that the project would have a profound effect upon that whole area. The 150,000 horsepower is not by any manner of means the figure that should be in the minds of the members of this house in asking for a decision on this subject, a subject which has been bandied back and forth for years, which has been one of continuing promise by the minister and of continuing evasion by the government.

If we believe in the system of government responsibility, then it is time the minister did not suggest he could go out and make one statement independently of the government without being in the position that he should resign if the government fails to back him up on any undertaking on which his promise had been based. It is one or the other. Either he has been making statements recklessly, without due regard to his responsibility to the government, or he had some reason to believe the government would back him up. It is one or the other. It is time he took appropriate action to indicate whether he talked without responsibility or whether the government failed in their responsibility to him. This would clear the air and let us know exactly where the responsibility does lie.

Let us realize when we are talking about this subject that we would have here not merely the 150,000 horsepower—part of which would be needed for the irrigation but a substantial part of which would be available for homes in the area and for agricultural machinery—but we would also have the core of a great grid system which could be multiplied several times. Each of us knows that if you have a sure source of constant power you can multiply that immensely by supplementary steam power or diesel power and still keep an economic level of power costs.

The time has come when the minister should clear the air. May I repeat that on June 10 last the minister had this to say:

> We have been doing all right at clearing obstruction out of the way. There were four when we started discussions and there is now only the one left—the question of power development costs—

Mr. Speaker, as a member of this house from another part of Canada, and as one who believes this is not merely something of concern to Saskatchewan but something by which every Canadian wants to see Saskatchewan given the opportunity it should have to restore this great heartland to the province, I urge the government to act.

May I point out to hon. members opposite that a motion has been brought forward which gives them an opportunity to say to the government what they want done. If any member believes this project should proceed, then he has no right to vote against this amendment. If they believe it should be done, then let them vote for this amendment. I would suggest that the Minister of Agriculture, with the consent of the Prime Minister who sits beside him, might indicate something that can be done. That is that there be a free vote; that this be not regarded as a test of confidence, if that in any way could embarrass the government, but that he seek the support which he surely should ask in view of the unqualified promises he has made in the past. This would give everybody on his own side who wishes to see this project proceed a chance to vote without injury to his future relationship to the government.

We have been told by the Prime Minister on other occasions that ministers, and presumably members, can act according to their conscience. Let them act according to their conscience on this occasion. Let everybody here provide an encouraging and striking demonstration that there is no provincialism in this, but that members throughout this house from the Atlantic to the Pacific want something done in Saskatchewan which will be of immense value to that province and to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise not only to join with my colleagues in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Prince Albert, but also to support the appeal just made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) that the government permit a free vote on this question.

I have been rereading Hansard this afternoon to confirm my memory on the point that two years ago we had an amendment similar to this, moved by the same hon. gentleman who now represents the constituency of Prince Albert. That amendment was moved in February and was debated for several days, finally being voted upon on February 10, 1953, as recorded at pages 1813 and 1814 of Hansard.

During the discussion of that amendment which, though in slightly different language, was the same as the one now before us in that it called for the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project, one of the chief arguments put forward by the Minister of Agriculture and by others on the Liberal side of the house against voting for the amendment was that it was a motion of non-confidence. The Minister of Agriculture used almost the same language as he used this afternoon, when he looked in my direction and said I should know that an amendment of this kind is a motion of non-confidence, and that therefore those who support the government have to vote against it.

Now, I am sure those who were here at that time will not ask me to read the record to substantiate what I am now saying took place in February of 1953, because the Minister of Agriculture, the Prime Minister, and others who were here at that time will remember what happened then as well as I do. As I say, the result was that the amendment of the then member for Lake Centre, the present member for Prince Albert, was defeated. That, as I say, was on February 10, 1953, and is recorded in volume II of Hansard for that session.

I now turn to volume V of Hansard for that same session, and I would remind hon. members who were here that there was another motion to go into supply moved on May 6 of that year. On that occasion another member of the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), moved an amendment, one of those supposed amendments of non-confidence. Again it was moved as an amendment to the motion to go into supply. While on a different subject, procedurally it was exactly the same kind of amendment as the one moved in February concerning the dam.

Perhaps I should put the text of the second amendment on record so we will know what we are talking about. It is found at page 4850 of Hansard for May 6, and is as follows:

> That all the words after "That" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> in view of the impending departure of the Prime Minister for Washington this house desires to record its opinion that further and more vigorous efforts should be made by the government to bring about the removal of the restrictions imposed by the United States on the importation of Canadian agricultural products, in violation of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Following the speech of the hon. member for Eglinton there were speeches by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) and then a speech by the Prime Minister. In the course of his speech the Prime Minister indicated that if it was understood that this amendment was not to be regarded as a motion of non-confidence in the government, he was willing that the house might pass the amendment, whereupon another motion could be moved to go into committee of supply and we could carry on with the day's business.

I am sure many of those present will recall that. But I ask the government and hon. members in the house generally to note that that happened in May, 1953, just a couple of months after we had been told by the Minister of Agriculture, "No, you cannot do that sort of thing". It looks as if it all depends upon the government's attitude toward the subject matter of the amendment. In the case of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton, apparently the government was not unwilling that the house should record itself in favour of the subject matter thereof; but in the case of the amendment moved in February, 1953, by the hon. member who is now the hon. member for Prince Albert, apparently the government felt differently.

So, Mr. Speaker, is it not pretty clear that what we are confronted with on these amendments to go into supply is not an iron-clad and absolute rule that can be found somewhere in a book on procedure; rather that we are confronted with what the government tells us is the case each and every time. Sometimes the government says "This is a motion of non-confidence, and all Liberals must vote against it". And most Liberals, if not all, do vote against it. On the other hand, if the government decides it is a perfectly acceptable proposition and wants it to pass, then all Liberals vote for it, and it passes unanimously.

The occasion to which I refer, of May 6, 1953, is not the only one of recent date. I have here as well Hansard for 1951, and I would remind hon. members that on June 12 of that year there was an amendment to the motion to go into supply which, on that occasion, was moved by the Leader of the Opposition. Again the motion made by the government was a motion to go into supply. The amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition was, in the words of the Minister of Agriculture today, and those of the hon. member for Rosthern, what is sometimes called a motion of non-confidence. According to them such a motion could not be carried without meaning the defeat of the government.

It so happens that on that occasion, as Your Honour will recall because of your interest in previous parliaments as well as in this one with respect to this matter, it dealt with a proposal to set up a special committee on procedure. That could lead into a discussion in which I shall not indulge at this time.

What was the attitude of the government on that occasion? Did the government say, "We will not let the Liberal party vote for this, because it would mean the defeat of the government"? No; the Prime Minister said that on the understanding that this was not to be regarded as a vote of non-confidence, he had no objection to the acceptance of the amendment. Therefore on that occasion of June 12, 1951, the amendment to the motion to go into supply was adopted.

The government was not defeated, any more than it was on May 6, 1953. On each of those occasions, immediately after an opposition amendment to the motion to go into supply had been carried by the house —and in both cases this was done unanimously—a minister of the crown rose and moved again that the house do now go into committee of supply. I do not wish to endanger the chances of this procedure being followed again by emphasizing the fact that on at least one of those occasions the next motion to go into supply was subjected to an amendment as well, but that is just to make the record complete.

In addition to these two occasions I have mentioned, namely May 6, 1953, and June 12, 1951, there was the occasion on August 27, 1946, to which my colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie referred earlier, when there was before this house an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply. That amendment suggested that consideration should be given to the continuation of the milk subsidy.

After a number of hon. members had spoken, including a number of Liberal members who spoke in favour of the subject matter of the amendment, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) suggested that it might be regarded not as a vote of confidence or non-confidence in the government but that there should be a free vote. On that occasion, unlike the ones in 1951 and 1953 to which I have referred, there was a recorded vote, a division of the house. Even so, enough Liberals voted with those of us on the opposition side of the house for the amendment to carry, but the government was not defeated and no election was brought on.

The reason nothing of that nature happened was that the government had said in advance it was not to be regarded as a vote of non-confidence in the government. Accordingly, as soon as the milk subsidy amendment had been carried a minister of the crown moved that the house go into committee of supply. That second motion carried, we went into committee of supply and the business of the house went on.

I submit that the picture is becoming very clear as a result of these incidents. The hon. member for Rosthern made quite a speech this afternoon during which he gave us a few pointers on procedure and on the constitutional nature of our democracy. He made it clear that he felt it was his responsibility to try to keep the present government in office. The logical conclusion to be drawn from the position he takes, in the light of these various instances to which I have referred, is that when there is an amendment to the motion to go into committee of supply, if the government says it is a motion of non-confidence and all Liberals must vote against it, they do vote against it; if the government says it is not a motion of non-confidence, that they like it, that they think it should pass, then Liberals vote for it; but if the government says it is not a motion of confidence or non-confidence, that they have no opinion, that they are prepared to let the members of the house have a free vote, then on an occasion such as that the hon. member for Rosthern and other Liberals vote as they feel they should on that particular issue.

I suggest that the picture has become somewhat confused, but at any rate surely this much is clear from what has come out of these debates on amendments to motions to go into committee of supply. We have had a clear indication as to where the government stands. Having been willing on some occasions to accept the opinion of the house, at least for its own guidance, and still feel it was not defeated; having been willing on other occasions to accept the subject matter of the amendment as satisfactory to the government, does it not follow that when the government says "No", when it says "This is a motion of non-confidence", when it says to the Liberal members of the house, "You must vote against it", that means the government is opposed to the subject matter of that amendment?

I suggest that if the government does not want to be left in the position of being unalterably opposed to proceeding with the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and the irrigation project, it should on this occasion do as the Leader of the Opposition has suggested and permit a free vote of the members of this house.

We know where the Minister of Agriculture stands. As far as the project of the dam is concerned we know of all the documents he has pulled out of his pockets and the different statements he has made. But let it be said in all fairness to the minister that he is in favour of the construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. We know also from his forthright statements, both inside and outside the house, that the Prime Minister is not yet in favour of recommending to parliament the appropriation of the necessary money to go ahead with this project.

But what we do not know on any free basis is where all the hon. members of this house stand. We have had votes in the past that make it pretty clear that members of the opposition groups in this house favour proceeding with this project. But we do not really know where Liberal members stand. I suggest that it might be to the advantage of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture and other members of the government to find out where Liberal members stand. They will not find out simply by saying that this is a motion of non-confidence and therefore they must vote it down. If they will say, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said on August 27, 1946, that this is a free vote, or if they will accept it on the terms on which the Prime Minister accepted the motions in 1951 and 1953, we would have a chance to find out where the Liberal members of this house stand. I think that would be of value to the Prime Minister.

Of course if he wants to get advice from the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek who is trying to interrupt me, I am sure he is ready to give it to him at any time.

It is obvious from what I have been saying that I feel strongly about this project. I believe it is good for Canada as a whole. I feel that it should be proceeded with as soon as possible, but it is obvious that the hurdle we must get over first is the question of what the government is going to do. I suggest that the government would be well advised to find out where we all stand in this House of Commons, and the best way to do that is to permit a free vote on the amendment now before the house.

Mr. H. P. Mang (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, since members from Saskatchewan who sit on this side of the house have been referred to on several occasions, I think I should take just a moment or two before the vote to state my position. There have been volumes of discussion on this topic. There have been royal commissions and investigations, and I think probably every angle of the construction of the South Saskatchewan dam has been thoroughly explored.

I stated my position last year, as can be found in Hansard, as being in favour of the project for three main reasons. First, as an irrigation project it would be an undertaking in the national interest. Second, as a power project it would justify itself. I emphasized last year that assuring as it would a constant water supply for the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina it would be a project of value, not only to Saskatchewan, but because these are two of the larger cities of Saskatchewan it would be in the national interest.

I indicated at that time that it would make a considerable change in the geography of Saskatchewan. After all, Saskatchewan is in Canada, and the project can be tied in for that reason. I pointed out that the construction of this dam would create a lake about two-thirds the size of lake Erie. To have such a body of water in the Palliser triangle would certainly, from every way you look at it, be in the national interest. I just want to restate those three points, without going into detail at this time.

There is no body of opinion in Saskatchewan opposed to the building of this dam. I remember well when the Prime Minister spoke in Regina during the last election. He dealt with this very question right in the heart of Saskatchewan, and he told us in his forthright manner that at this time the Saskatchewan dam would not be constructed. That is not saying no to the project, any more than it is saying no to a national health plan in Canada; but at the moment, in the judgment of the government, this does not seem to be the time to do it.

After all, this side of the house is responsible to the nation as a whole and must use its judgment in that way. Here perhaps I should not be too positive, because this is only my second year here; but it is all very well for the opposition to bring up resolutions or amendments that cover a very large field. As a matter of fact there is no limit to the field of resolutions that may be placed on the order paper by the opposition side. We on this side are saddled with the responsibility not only of promoting ideas, but this side of the house has the definite responsibility of doing the work. The opposition does the talking, but this part of the house does the work. It has the responsibility of finding the money for it.

Mr. Gillis: You are not losing any weight.

[Mr. Mang.]

Mr. Mang: I have the fullest confidence that the national business, which is the concern and responsibility of this government, is being conducted in a way that will redound to the national interest from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

I do not like to mention politics or political angles, but it has been stressed by several that in Saskatchewan this matter has been a political football. I want to tell this house that I have been in politics in Saskatchewan, if you wish to know, since 1925, when I attended my first nominating convention. That goes back quite a way. If anyone talks about playing political football, I think I know at least a little about it. I do not know what our C.C.F. friends in Saskatchewan would do with respect to digging up election issues if they did not have this issue to bring up.

If anyone in Saskatchewan has made the Saskatchewan dam a political football it has been our socialist friends in that province. Perhaps they would be in a sense economically happy, but I am telling this house they would be extremely unhappy if the Saskatchewan dam were built, because they bring that out from time to time and, along with the general socialist story of the broken promises the Liberal party has been strewing throughout Saskatchewan, this is always one of the promises that is dragged out of the basket at election time. If anyone has made this issue a political football, it is our socialist friends in the province of Saskatchewan, and everyone in Saskatchewan knows that.

I am not afraid. I have no hesitation in voting against this amendment, because most of the people in my area, and I believe most of the people in Saskatchewan, are beginning to see the political angle of this issue and who are using it as a political football. If I cast my vote, and I am recorded in Hansard as voting against the amendment, I can project myself two or three years hence, should I again be a candidate. I can see someone planted in the back of the hall when I happen to be getting right down to the core of things with regard to the splendid record of this government; I can see him pop up and say, "What about the Saskatchewan dam?"

That has been played over and over again, and they are not going to get by with it this time; that is certain. I have no qualms of conscience whatsoever in casting my vote as a vote of confidence in favour of the government. I am not going to vote against the construction of the dam, but I am going to vote against this amendment.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being caught in a nutcracker, the Saskatchewan members on opposite sides of the house, I am going to say a few words on this subject. I have listened to discussion of the Saskatchewan dam in this house for a long time. As I understand it, at the present time practically everyone in Saskatchewan, including the Minister of Agriculture, wants to build that dam. The drawback seems to have been that the Prime Minister is still doubtful whether the project is in the national interest. I assume he is wondering whether he can justify such an expenditure by the federal government in one province for the purpose for which it is intended. I am going to try to help him out a little.

We have already had an expression of opinion from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. I am going to say something now on behalf of the province from which I come. I think he is quite justified in concluding at this time that he is quite safe in making the expenditure, on the grounds he himself sets out, but he is afraid he may be accused in other parts of Canada of subsidizing power in the province of Saskatchewan. Now, he can disabuse his mind of that charge, because he is on safe ground when he is able to tell the rest of the people of Canada that Saskatchewan has a legitimate reason to ask the federal government to make an expenditure of some $62 million in that province, even if it is to some extent going to help the development of power. In the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, as far as the province of Ontario is concerned, one of the greatest advantages this province is going to get is the power development at Niagara falls. So indirectly the province of Ontario is going to be heavily subsidized in the provision of power for the future through the St. Lawrence seaway. The people of Saskatchewan are going to pay their proportionate share in helping to develop that power as a sideline of the St. Lawrence seaway project.

If anyone is still doubtful on that point all he has to do is say we have been looking at the future of power in Canada, and we have decided that not far away is the possibility of atomic energy; so in searching around for a place to set up a pilot plant, which is going to cost the federal government some money, we have decided that we are going to establish in this province of Ontario an atomic energy reactor in co-operation with the province, in order that we may be in that field of power in the future. So we are assisting the province of Ontario on two counts in the development of power.

On that score the Prime Minister is legitimately entitled now, after canvassing the situation for a long time, to say to his supporters that the time has come for the people of Canada as a whole to look upon this project in Saskatchewan as a national project.

In the second place, in view of the fact that, according to what I heard this afternoon in debate, the province is prepared to spend some $78 million in this development, the federal government's share to be about $62 million, I think the province is carrying a fair share. We are going to develop Canada for the future. As we build up our country through immigration and other means I hope we are not going to confine our thinking just to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and consider them as the great centres, with the rest of the country as the hewers of wood and drawers of water. I assume that we are going to do something to expand the economy in every province so we may be able to accommodate more people.

From listening to discussions of the matter and reading something about it, I understand that with the development of power through this project there is a possibility of getting some kind of a diversified economy. At the present time it is a wheat economy, a one-crop economy. This economy is subject to the whims of the elements. If it could be diversified by some industrial expansion on the prairies, through this power development, the chances are that over the long pull it may be possible to save in wheat subsidies more than the amount of money that is being asked should be put into this particular project. In any case, I think members in all parts of the house should take the question out of the realm of politics.

Someone mentioned the Canso causeway. We know that matter was the subject of long argument; 10 years, in fact. We had a commission on it. However, it was not until we sold the people in our end of the country on the idea that this was not a political issue, formed a committee in that province representative of all parties, and took the project completely out of the realm of politics, that we got some sanity into the thinking of all concerned. Everybody wanted it but nobody wanted the other fellow to get any advantage from it. Once we neutralized the question we went ahead and got something done.

I think that is the attitude that must be taken with respect to this project. I do not think there is anyone in the maritime provinces, at least, who would object to the federal government throwing in the amount of money that is asked here. We realize that Saskatchewan is in much the same position as the maritime provinces. There are many things they would like to do. There are many things they know should be done. If they had the finances with which to do it provincially they would undertake this project themselves. But they have not the finances provincially, and I think they are legitimately entitled to ask the rest of Canada to throw in something in order to help them do something that, in my opinion, will mean a great deal to that province in the future.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

ROBERT ALEXANDER HOODLEY

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a grievance at this time. My grievance is that there is a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on the question of capital punishment whose report has not yet been made; and at 12.05 tonight Pacific time, or 3.05 a.m. our time, a young man will be hanged in Vancouver. I maintain he should not be hanged.

I raise this grievance as a matter of emergency because this is the only opportunity I shall have to save a man's life. I want to say this, sir, that in accordance with all the rules and the laws of parliament the matter has gone through the courts and has been considered by the cabinet.

I may say, sir, that I submitted a presentation to the only one who has the power to receive or consider any presentation on behalf of this man, Robert Alexander Hoodley. May I just read a part of my communication, because it states the grievance rather briefly. It is, as I have said, an emergency grievance because this man is to hang tonight, and only this parliament can save his life.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to indicate to him that I believe this parliament cannot do anything about that. The prerogative of mercy is one which is within the power of the crown. I may say that I am not too sure of my ground at the moment, but I intervene now because I do not want this incident to go without any comment on my part. It seems to me that not very long ago I read somewhere that matters pertaining to pardon are one of the very few prerogatives which remain within the realm of the crown. It is one of those residual powers which, of course, are vested in the cabinet but which the cabinet administers with the representative of Her Majesty. I hold in my hand May's eleventh edition.

All I am trying to do is indicate that what I may be saying now has a certain foundation of truth. At page 461 of May's eleventh edition I find this, for instance:

> A bill for a general pardon, or act of grace, as it is commonly termed, originates with the crown, and is read once only in each house, all the member being uncovered, after which it receives the royal assent in the ordinary form. Such a bill cannot be amended by either house of parliament, but must be accepted in the form in which it is received from the crown, or rejected.

If May, at page 461 in his eleventh edition, writes in this fashion about a bill relating to a general pardon, that it must be either accepted or rejected as it originates from the crown, it certainly indicates our limitations in regard to the prerogative of mercy as exercised by the crown upon the advice of the members of the council.

Having issued a caveat, I am not going any farther. I am going to let the hon. member proceed, but I should like to mention this because there may be other such instances. I promise the hon. member and the house I shall look into the point further in order to make sure that I am not erring in my contention at the moment. It seems to me that this is not the type of subject matter which can be raised as a grievance on a motion to go into supply. See "Government and Parliament" by Herbert Morrison, p. 81; Keith's "British Cabinet System", second edition by N. H. Gibbs, pp. 352-3; see also House of Commons debates, vol. VI, February 11, 1875, pp. 83-88; Todd's "Parliamentary Government in England", as revised by Spencer Walpole, vol. I, pp. 205-210.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate your remarks very much, Mr. Speaker. I think you understand that I am not discussing anything which has to do with the prerogative of a general expression of mercy, but this grievance deals with only one case. As you have said I may proceed, I should like to do so because it must be done tonight. I am raising this question in order to ask the members of the House of Commons to request the cabinet to exercise their prerogative of mercy and revise a decision they have made. I refer to the case of Robert Alexander Hoodley, who has been sentenced to hang tonight.

Since my time is short I am going to present the case very briefly. This young man, Robert Alexander Hoodley, was born in Shanghai in December, 1934, and because of an unfortunate family situation developed a serious abnormal behaviourism. The experience of going through the war years as a very young child also had a detrimental effect. I believe his record amply demonstrates a very unstable nature, and discloses that he was subject to violent and inexplicable reactions.

He was examined by Dr. R. A. E. Richmond of the child guidance clinic in 1950 and found to be in a mental condition. Since the date of the homicide he has been examined by Dr. Richmond and Dr. Whitman, who are both very highly regarded psychiatrists, and I am given to understand that he has been classified as an aggressive psychopath, and in the opinion of the examining doctors is given to violent, impulsive behaviour that can explode almost spontaneously because he appears to be motivated by a hairtrigger stimulus.

The person killed by Mr. Hoodley was the stepfather of his fiancee. It is a matter of record that Miss Patricia Walsh, the fiancee, told Mr. Hoodley that her stepfather had forced sexual relations upon her. This being the case, I think it can be understood why on the spur of the moment young Hoodley took the impulsive action which resulted in the committing of homicide. One cannot condone this young man's action, and without any question of doubt he must be placed in an institution where society would be protected from his impulsive neuroticism.

However, in view of all the circumstances I do feel that the death penalty, which is mandatory by law, should be commuted by the governor general in council to a term of life imprisonment. This matter went before the cabinet last Friday. Because I understand I cannot be given information before it becomes public, I was not notified until 2.45 this afternoon—though I asked for the information last Saturday—that the cabinet had turned down this plea for clemency.

In view of the fact there is now a committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on capital punishment; in view of the fact it is hoped by the joint chairmen of the committee and all the members that we can have a report on capital punishment this session; in view of the fact that here we have a case where all the evidence shows that the man is an aggressive neurotic and that he shot his fiancee's stepfather because of the rape of his fiancee, I say there is only one power now that can save this boy's life and put him under guard in an institution, and that is this House of Commons. I recognize that the House of Commons can only advise the Prime Minister and the cabinet. The House of Commons can only ask the Prime Minister and the cabinet to meet—to meet tonight—and give at least a stay of execution, but with the hope of commutation of sentence to life imprisonment.

Sir, it is not very often I ask anything of this nature, but I feel strongly about it. I wish to thank the Prime Minister for having given me the opportunity to speak to him today. I know I am not alone in thinking as I do. Other members of all parties feel the same way, and have spoken to the Prime Minister.

Sir, because it is now approaching ten o'clock, and because I do not want this application wiped out by Your Honour calling it ten o'clock, I shall conclude by asking the House of Commons—the only group who can now do it—to request the Prime Minister and the cabinet to meet tonight and commute this sentence which, if they do not intervene, will be fulfilled by a boy being hanged, a boy who is neurotic, aggressive, hairtrigger, and who shot a man because his fiancee was raped by her stepfather. If they do not intervene the sentence will be carried out at 3.05 E.D.T.

Sir, I thank you for the opportunity given to me to speak on this matter. I shall not move any amendment, but shall rest in the hope that the House of Commons will express its opinion that this sentence should not be carried out.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a discussion of this kind is quite irregular, and has been refused by Mr. Speaker at Westminster on more than one occasion. I appreciate the hon. member's intense feeling about this matter, but I can assure him that he is misinformed about certain of the facts, or certain of the things he has mentioned as facts in connection with this case.

The case was very carefully considered by those who had the constitutional responsibility to consider it, and it is not a responsibility that anyone enjoys having to exercise. It was very carefully considered on two occasions. On the first occasion it was considered because the time at which it had to be considered had arrived, and a conclusion was reached after a very serious study of the record of the facts that were proved, and that are not in accord with the information the hon. member has and in which I am sure the hon. member honestly believes.

The facts that were before us were the facts that had been proved before the court. There are very eminent psychologists who believe that our law is not as it should be, but we have to apply it as it exists. There was a serious and honest endeavour to reach a proper conclusion. A recommendation for His Excellency was prepared and was signed; but before it reached His Excellency news arrived that a court in British Columbia had granted a reprieve to allow special application to be made for an appeal to the supreme court. That application was made, for special leave to appeal to the supreme court. It was denied.

After it was denied the case was reconsidered, and we had all the facts before us. The hon. member, in his approach to me, told me quite frankly that he had no new facts, but felt that we had not made a proper appreciation of those that were before us. Well, we had the constitutional responsibility of making that appreciation and to us it appeared, as it appeared to the jury and to the court of appeal, to be a cold-blooded murder, committed under circumstances which, in accordance with practice that has been followed in recommendations to the crown, would not justify a recommendation for interference with the course of the law.

We had to come to that conclusion, and we came to that conclusion. There has never been any occasion when there was an attempt by any House of Commons, either here or in the United Kingdom, to go behind the exercise of that terrible responsibility we have to discharge.

On motion of Mr. Argue the debate was adjourned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lapointe for committee of supply.

WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT, 1953-54

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to express grave concern over the extremely small final payment for wheat announced yesterday and grave concern for the whole future of the wheat-producing area of western Canada. Ever since 1945 the price of wheat has been relatively stable. The wheat board has paid the western wheat producers a final price for each crop year since 1945 of something in excess of $1.80 a bushel, and usually about $1.83 a bushel. But with the final payment announced yesterday, for the first time since 1945 the price of wheat to the producer has fallen far below $1.80 a bushel for No. 1 northern basis Fort William.

With the final payment announced yesterday the total price for wheat amounts to only $1.56 a bushel. This more than 25 cents per bushel drop in the price of wheat to the wheat producer is causing grave hardship in western Canada, is meaning a tremendous loss in purchasing power by western farmers and, as we all can see, is reflected in widespread unemployment and in a recession in many of the industrial areas of Canada.

Since 1945 the policy of the wheat board and the government in reference to wheat has been approximately as follows. In the beginning of each crop year an initial price of $1.40 per bushel was paid; the following February an interim payment of 20 cents per bushel was made; and in December of the same crop year a final payment was made, usually between 20 cents and 25 cents a bushel. Now not only have the payments fallen off drastically but the payment is made at a later and later date. In the 1953-54 crop year there was a delay in the making of the interim payment from February, the usual time, until December and a delay in the making of the final payment from December until May or June of this year when the farmers are likely to receive their cheques. The interim payment for the 1953 crop was reduced from 20 cents a bushel to 10 cents a bushel and, as I have said, the final payment was reduced from an average of 20 to 25 cents a bushel to an effective final payment of 6·2 cents per bushel.

This same thing can be illustrated in another way. When the 1950-51 wheat pool was wound up and the final payment was made there was a surplus on hand of $106 million. For the 1951 crop there was a surplus of $115 million, and for the 1952 crop there was a surplus of $123 million. This time the surplus, which has always averaged more than $100 million in the period I have referred to, is reduced to just over $25 million. The reduction of $80 to $100 million in the surplus representing money that cannot be made available to farmers as a final payment is not only very serious as far as the prairie provinces are concerned but is very serious indeed as far as the whole Canadian economy is concerned.

The drop in the price of wheat is reflected in a drop in farm net income. I have in my hand the latest figures for farm net income. They show that during the period from 1951 to 1954 there was a drop in farm net income of 48 per cent or from $2,154 million in 1951 to $1,125 million in 1954. A very substantial part of the 48 per cent drop in farm net income is directly attributable to the falling off in the price of wheat and the reduction of wheat board payments. Let no one go away with the impression that I am opposed to or critical of the wheat board method of marketing grain. We continue as always to support the wheat board method of marketing grain, and even though the price of wheat should fall even lower the wheat board method will remain the best possible method because it gives to each producer of wheat in the prairie provinces exactly the same price as his neighbour receives for the one-year period. The wheat board cannot guard against all severe fluctuations in the price of wheat but it can and does give to the farmers within a 12-month period the same price for wheat, and that in itself is a very important and worthwhile accomplishment.

I believe the Canadian government should establish a sound price for wheat based on the principles of parity. I have mentioned in the past how the government is behind other nations of the world in so many fields, and I regret that I am able to point out this afternoon that the farmers of Canada are guaranteed the lowest price for wheat of wheat producers in any wheat producing country in the free world. I hold in my hand a table of guaranteed prices for the various countries taken from the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget of March 25, 1955. Here is how the prices go:

Country	Guaranteed price per bushel of wheat
Turkey	$3.21
France	3.04
Tunisia	3.03
Germany	2.83
Spain	2.81
Argentina	2.80
Japan	2.61
Greece	2.40
Belgium	2.29
United Kingdom	2.20
Sweden	2.10
United States	2.06
Australia	1.57
Syria	1.54
Canada	1.44

These prices are expressed in terms of United States currency. The Canadian wheat producers get from their government the worst treatment, in the way of a guaranteed floor price, of the wheat producers in any important wheat producing country in the free world. It is for that reason I say our farm organizations are justified in asking for an adequate support price for wheat, and in asking that parity prices be established.

From time to time we have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) what was happening to the Canadian export market for wheat. Time and time again the minister has replied that all was well, that our markets were holding up well. As recently as last Friday the minister, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) as to the drop in Canadian export sales of wheat, had this to say, as reported at page 3732 of Hansard for May 13, 1955:

> We believe that our policy of selling for dollars is the proper policy for Canada. I know of no reason why we should sacrifice wheat which is the property of the producers of western Canada for the sake of the odd few sales we might get if we accepted a different currency.

On March 28 the minister, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), had this to say, as reported at page 2429 of Hansard for that date:

> I think it is encouraging to find that, in spite of the offers of wheat made by the United States, Canada is selling more wheat than the United States has succeeded in disposing of by the various methods it has adopted.

Apparently not until yesterday did the minister realize what was happening in the world wheat export picture. What has been happening has been this. Canada's percentage of the sales of export wheat has been dropping every year since 1952-1953, from 43·2 per cent until now when it is running currently at 33·4 per cent. Even though there has been a substantial increase in the world trade in wheat, Canada has obtained practically none of that increase. The United States has obtained an increase of 64 million bushels to date in the current period; the Argentine, 14 million bushels; Australia, 12 million bushels, and Canada the very small increase of 2 million bushels.

It is clear from those figures that our government is going to have to adopt a different technique in the exporting of Canadian wheat if we are to hold our position in the export markets of the world. I suggest that position can be held only if the government moves away from its present position of demanding dollars and cash in return for the sale of every single bushel of wheat. Instead of criticizing the United States government for having made wheat available to countries that are short of cash, and short of hard currency I suggest the Canadian government should be adopting a similar policy which would result in the underdeveloped countries obtaining increased quantities of wheat, and which would obtain for Canada its traditional share of the world market for wheat. The government may not realize the very serious condition of agriculture in Canada, particularly in western Canada at the moment.

The Western Producer, published by the wheat pool organization, came to my desk yesterday. It is dated Thursday, May 12, and in an editorial entitled, "Are Farmer Organizations on Their Toes?" in speaking about the dominion-provincial conference, I read the following:

> In the circumstances, is it not highly significant that the dominion-provincial conference should be seized by the problem of unemployment which, bad though it may be, is no more than a symptom of the real disease, the core of which is the decline in agriculture.

And nothing is being proposed by the government today which will bring agriculture out of the deep depression it is now in, in western Canada, and which in turn would help to bring Canada out of the current recession.

Speaking about the disposal of agricultural surpluses, the Western Producer in the same issue, in an article entitled "The Surplus Problem", has this to say:

> Agriculture today in Canada and elsewhere is confronted with many grave problems. Among the most serious, we suggest, is that posed by the inability to distribute surpluses and give farmers the green light to produce to the optimum in the knowledge that they will be assured of ready markets at fair prices. At a time when everybody admits that the food is needed and that a prosperous agriculture is the foundation for general prosperity this is not an unreasonable objective. On the contrary, to permit agriculture to slide into a depression might easily drag the whole economy down and thus gravely imperil the position of the whole non-communist world.
> It is time that a concentrated effort by organized agriculture should be made to urge our own government to give top billing to consideration of ways and means for surplus food disposal.

I suggest to the government that instead of criticizing the action taken by the United States to get rid of their surplus agricultural products, the Canadian government should be co-operating with the government of that country, and should have similar policies to get rid of current agricultural surpluses in Canada.

Yesterday in his statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out how successful the United States has been in its current drive to make wheat available to soft currency countries. He pointed out that the government of the United States under this policy has made available 60 million bushels of wheat at a cost of about $200 million. Then, as reported at page 3782 of Hansard, he went on to say:

> The purpose behind the surplus disposal efforts of the United States is to increase consumption in areas that cannot afford to buy wheat. Canada has no quarrel with that principle.

In other words, according to that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, American policy does not affect our commercial markets for wheat but, in the words of the minister, increases consumption in areas that cannot afford to buy wheat.

That is what the C.C.F. has been advocating for many years, that our surplus agricultural products should be used to feed the hungry of the world, and that the government should not follow a policy of attempting to restrict production by enforcing stop-loss floor prices which ruin the farmers, or a policy of saying, "We will sell for cash, and for cash only, even if we lose a very substantial share of the international market for wheat".

The group of which I am a member believe in the principle of parity prices. We do not believe that parity prices are something that can be described as pie in the sky. We do not think that parity prices are something that is impossible of accomplishment. We think that parity prices, in the interests of all Canada, must be accomplished and must be provided. Until agriculture is assured of reasonable treatment, reasonable prices and a continuing steady share of the national income it will face recurring periods of drops in income. Farm income has dropped 48 per cent in three years.

In order to overcome this recurring recession in agriculture, with its evil effects on the whole Canadian economy, the C.C.F. stand four-square behind the principle of parity prices. Parity to us is equity and justice. We do not support, as some other parties in this house do, notably the Social Credit party, a certain percentage of parity for any commodity which is less than 100 per cent, no matter by what formula it may be arrived at.

Mr. Low: Prove that.

Mr. Argue: I shall prove that to you in one moment.

Mr. Low: You cannot.

Mr. Argue: I will prove it right now by quoting the hon. member for Acadia who gave the Social Credit position on agriculture in the budget debate, as reported at page 3626 of Hansard, as follows:

> In this group we have been advocating a two-price system for a number of years; that is, that the domestic market for farm products should be supported at 100 per cent of parity and that farm exports should be sold at the best prices obtainable in the international market, preferably under international agreement but supported by a reasonable support price.

That is the policy.

Mr. Quelch: Agreed.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Acadia says "agreed"; that the return to agriculture on a given commodity shall be the return which is derived from selling a part of the production on the domestic market at parity prices.

Mr. Quelch: All the production on the domestic market.

Mr. Argue: Yes, on the domestic market but where the domestic market cannot use all the production, then the remainder is sold on the international market at the market price, and the farmer gets the amount that is obtained at the market price. For example, on wheat today it would mean a fair support price but still not parity. With parity for wheat today at perhaps $2.05, and as the hon. member says, if wheat sold outside Canada at $1.75 today the farmer would take the average and he would get less than a parity price.

Just as we believe that people are entitled to 100 per cent of justice in the courts and should not settle for anything less, therefore we believe that agriculture in Canada is entitled to full equity and full parity prices. We do not support anything less than full equity for agriculture.

I can point out that one of the first organizations that appeared before the cabinet asking for full parity prices and full equity for agriculture was not a farm organization but a labour organization. I hold in my hand a program for full employment as outlined by the national U.A.W.-C.I.O.-C.C.L. conference to fight for full employment, dated at Ottawa, February 24, 1954. In this program they have point eight, which is entitled "full equity for working farmers". It reads in part:

> The impressive and productive efforts of Canadian farmers to assure Canada abundance of food and fibre should not be rewarded by depressing the living standards of the people who work the land.
> We propose the establishment of a federal farm program that will provide full equity to working farmers, help meet their credit problems at low interest rates which only the dominion government can provide, improve markets, and include other measures necessary to permit farm families to enjoy higher living standards, consistent with a program of full employment and full production.

That is not the view of an agriculture organization; it is the view of very large trade union organizations. I know what the press will say. I know what the Sifton press in western Canada will say. It will claim that parity prices make for agricultural surpluses. That is a fallacious contention. As a matter of fact, the way you get agricultural surpluses is to reduce the general level of agricultural prices; and farmers, in an endeavour to protect their income, milk more cows, seed more acres to wheat and attempt to increase the volume of production in order to protect their standard of living. There is not an agricultural economist that I have read who says that the answer to surpluses in Canada or in the United States is to reduce prices, because if prices are reduced surpluses will be increased.

The United States farmer this year is going to have to make a very difficult choice. He is going to be asked to choose between obtaining a support price for wheat at only 70 per cent of parity, which works out to about $1.70 a bushel, if he agrees to a 30 per cent reduction in wheat acreage; and, if he says no to that, production will be unrestricted and the support price will be $1.19 a bushel. There is a very great danger to the whole international price for wheat that the United States farmer, asked to accept an acreage reduction of 30 per cent in order to obtain 70 per cent of parity, will say, "I will take a gamble with full production, and take whatever the market will bring". That is the kind of policy with lower support prices that does not reduce surpluses; it adds to the surpluses, and that huge surplus then is available to depress the market further. So I say that anyone who claims that parity prices by themselves result in creating surpluses is wrong. Surpluses can be created, and surpluses have to be dealt with; but there is another way to get rid of surpluses than trying to lower prices to the point where you wreck the agricultural economy and by wrecking the economy hope that farmers will decrease their production.

The way to handle surpluses of food products is to increase demand. I am sure that there are many thousands of Canadians who are undernourished and who need more food. I am certain that no old age pensioner in Canada today receiving $40 a month has sufficient to buy the kind of food to give him an adequate diet and a reasonable nutritional standard. The government should adopt a policy which will give more purchasing power to our low income groups and to those on the old age pension. The government should provide a school-lunch program to take care of further agricultural surpluses. In other words, the government should adopt policies to ensure that every Canadian has an adequate diet. If that were done it would take care of a substantial part of any agricultural surplus that may appear. The government also should follow a policy of accepting soft currencies in exchange for wheat. The government should follow a policy of making wheat available for famine prevention and for a school-lunch program in the underdeveloped countries of the world. The government also, I suggest, should make advance payments for farm-stored grain in order that farmers can obtain purchasing power when they produce a crop and are unable to market that crop through congestion.

The government should encourage the storage of any temporary surpluses of wheat on farms as a method of saving storage costs. The minister has told us that the costs of storage have gone up in the past year very substantially—8½ cents a bushel higher than the previous year. The farmer pays that 8½ cents a bushel. The storage costs that are paid today are paid only to the elevator systems in this country and not paid to farmers, and that encourages the elevator companies, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce well knows, to expand their storage facilities in order to make greater revenues and greater profits. All of the time the farmer is paying the total shot. The farmer knows no reason why he should have to build his own storage on his own farm and then have to pay for the duplication of that storage by elevator companies. So I suggest to the government that, in addition to paying storage to elevator companies, which is part of the cost of marketing grain, they should adopt a policy of making storage payments on temporary surpluses of wheat available to farmers when they store their grain on the farm.

These are the points I suggest the government should now adopt to meet this very grave situation. There should be full parity prices for wheat. The government should immediately announce the interim payment on 1954 wheat and not wait till next December. The government should accept soft currencies and make wheat available for famine prevention and a school-lunch program. The government should make advance payments for farm-stored grain and encourage farmers by paying for storage of any temporary surpluses of wheat on the farm.

If this kind of six-point agricultural program for the wheat producers were put into effect, we would restore the purchasing power to this huge area of Canada. We would restore in a large measure the purchasing power to 200,000 farm families in the three prairie provinces. By so doing we would reduce the amount of unemployment in Canada, and, if we made available, as we should, our surplus food to hungry people and to underdeveloped countries, we would be making a very important contribution to peace far exceeding, I suggest, the contribution that is made even by our present defence program.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any doubt that the farmers of Canada will be disappointed at the announced price payment, especially when it is realized that the total payment they will have received is $1.56. I will admit right away that the farmers will be better off with that price than they would have been if we had been under the open market system and if there had been no wheat board. If there had been no wheat board in operation in the past four or five years, with the three very large crops we have had, the price of wheat would have gone to a very low level, because whenever there is a large surplus the grain trade always uses that as an excuse to depress prices.

On the other hand, in the light of history and the government's wheat marketing policy since 1945, and in the light of the world situation, I would say that today the farmers are entitled to a higher price than $1.56. It is interesting to note that under the formula that is used under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, section 9(2), using 1943-44-45 as the base year, the parity price of wheat today would be $2.27. I obtained that price from the dominion bureau of statistics; $1.56 is a long way below the parity price as formulated under the Agricultural Prices Support Act as $2.27. But, of course, grain does not come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

I should like to review very briefly the history of the government's wheat policy since 1945. Remember that after the war it was government policy to allow our allies to have wheat at a lower price than the actual world market price. The minister of trade and commerce of that day, Mr. MacKinnon, pointed out that it would not be fair to our allies to soak them for every cent we could get in selling our wheat to them. That was the policy of the government when the British wheat agreement was formulated under which we allowed them to have wheat at a price quite a bit less than the price for class II wheat. I know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on different occasions has said that every member of the House of Commons supported the British wheat agreement as being a good agreement for the farmers. I should therefore like to quote what I said at the time when we were discussing that agreement in this house in 1947, when the agreement came before us in the amendment of the wheat board act. I then had this to say as reported at page 745 of Hansard of that year:

> If in the next two or three years there is a wheat shortage, if crops are poor, the price of wheat will be maintained at probably a high level and will remain there. Then the guarantee becomes absolutely useless. If that should be the situation over the next two or three years the farmers of this country, as a result of this agreement, are going to lose several hundred million dollars . . .
> I believe that the wheat agreement with Britain was fully justified but it does entail in its early stages a considerable sacrifice on the part of our farmers. We feel that the sacrifice should be borne by the people of Canada as a whole, . . .

We did not oppose the British wheat agreement. We felt that Britain should be allowed to have that wheat at a figure lower than the world market price, but we felt that that was a sacrifice that should be borne by the people of Canada as a whole instead of being placed fully upon the farmers. In other words, the farmers should have been paid the world market price, the price of class II wheat, and then the wheat could have been sold to Britain for whatever price the government saw fit to sell it. Why should the farmers have been the one body at that time to be called upon to make that sacrifice?

It is interesting to note that as a result of that policy, taking the difference between the price the farmers received under the British wheat agreement and the price of class II wheat, we find that the farmers lost in the neighbourhood of $375 million under the British wheat agreement, and on account of the fact that Canadian consumers were able to buy wheat at the price at which we sold to Britain instead of the price paid for class II wheat, the farmers lost another $136½ million, making a total of $512 million. Subtracting the $65 million with which the government saw fit to compensate them, we have a net loss to the farmers, as a result of the British wheat agreement and subsidizing Canadian consumers at the same price as that paid by Britain, of $447 million. These are figures that were obtained from the wheat board and sessional papers. I will admit that as to whether or not an actual loss occurred to the amount shown as between the British wheat agreement and class II wheat, those are my own figures. But the figures for the amount of wheat sold as class II wheat and under the British wheat agreement were figures that I obtained from the wheat board.

When we look at the world situation today, we find that approximately half the people of the world are undernourished; and we are having that point driven home to us time and again by the various international organizations, the ancillary organizations of the United Nations. We realize that many of those nations which have hungry people are not able to buy the goods they require because they lack the dollars with which to buy them. We have repeatedly urged that we should be willing to sell our goods to these nations for their own currencies instead of demanding payment in dollars.

The interesting point is that that question has come to a vote in this house on two occasions. It came up under the Bretton Woods agreement and it came up under an amendment we moved last year urging that we should sell a certain proportion of our production to Britain for sterling. When those votes were taken every member in the house apart from our party, with the exception of a number of the Progressive Conservatives, voted against it. So far as the Bretton Woods agreement is concerned, every other party in the house, including the C.C.F., by supporting the agreement opposed the acceptance of sterling. When the motion last year with regard to the acceptance of sterling came to a vote, every member of the C.C.F. voted against it as well as most of the Conservatives. It therefore seems strange to me that we are now continually hearing the C.C.F. advocating that we should sell some of our surpluses for soft currency. Yet when they had the chance to vote in favour of that procedure, every one of them voted against it.

Mr. Low: They are opportunists. There is an election on.

Mr. Quelch: What is the true purpose of international trade? What is the real justification for insisting that a certain proportion of our production should be sold for the currency of the importing nation? The justification for that insistence is that the true purpose of international trade is the exchange of goods and services between nations on the basis of mutual advantage. Would anybody deny that that is the real principle or the elementary purpose of international trade? If you accept that as the real purpose of international trade, then surely when you sell your goods to another nation, the only currency you need is the currency of that nation, because it is the currency of that nation that you will have to use to buy its goods. You therefore do not need dollars. Yet strangely enough, as I say, every time that question has been raised in the house and a vote has been taken on it, members of other parties have voted against it.

Last year I referred the Minister of Trade and Commerce to what was happening in the United States. I quoted from the U.S. News and World Report, showing that they were going to introduce a policy under which approximately $1 billion of United States produce could be disposed of in foreign nations either in exchange for their currency or in the form of gifts. At that time, as reported at page 5997 of Hansard of June 15, 1954, the Minister of Trade and Commerce interjected these words:

That program was adopted some months ago. So far as I know, India has not taken any wheat for rupees and very few other countries have taken wheat for local currencies.

I then went on to point out that the minister was confusing two programs. I was referring to a program that was going to be brought down. When he said it had been in operation for two or three months, he was referring to another program which was called the mutual security act, under which $250 million worth of United States produce could be exchanged for foreign currency and the foreign currency used mainly for defence purposes. But under the new act, the agricultural adjustment act, over $1 billion of United States farm products can be either exchanged for foreign currency or given in the form of a gift. It was strange to me that at that time the government seemed to show so little concern about the program of the United States in regard to being willing to accept foreign currency in exchange for their produce. Even up until a few days ago the minister seemed to think that a program of that kind could not amount to anything because, as reported at page 3732 of Hansard, he stated:

> I know of no reason why we should sacrifice wheat which is the property of the producers of western Canada for the sake of the odd few sales we might get if we accepted a different currency.

I cannot understand why he should use that word "sacrifice". There would be no sacrifice entailed in accepting sterling. The sterling area covers a large percentage of the world. It includes many countries. If we accepted sterling, we would be able to use that sterling for the purchase of goods in any part of the sterling area. Where would be the sacrifice?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I have yet to know of a case where that kind of sterling is not frozen sterling. In other words, I know of no case where the United Kingdom has offered sterling that can be used in any part of the sterling area in return for purchases here. I am extremely doubtful if that offer would ever be made.

Mr. Quelch: I will give the minister an example pretty soon. What we were advocating was that Canada should do it. We were not suggesting that the United States should do it. They are already doing it to a certain extent, but maybe in a slightly different way from the way we are advocating. We advocate that Canada should be willing to take sterling. The minister suggested some time ago that Britain might be hesitant to pay us sterling for our produce and keep that as blocked sterling. The only reason Britain might hesitate would be if we were to insist that that sterling be made convertible. Of course if you are going to advocate a policy whereby you accept the foreign currency of another nation you certainly would not advocate convertibility of currency because you cannot have convertibility of currency until such time as you introduce a policy under which trade can be balanced. Until such time as we have a policy under which trade between the sterling area and the dollar area can reach a fairly high degree of balance, it is just useless to talk about convertibility of currency. It would break down just as it did in 1947.

We have heard a lot of talk about convertibility being just around the corner, but we are always finding there is another corner when we get to that corner, and I think we will continue to find there are more and more corners until such time as the creditor nations are willing to accept goods in return by way of payment. Just as long as a nation like the United States insists upon maintaining a heavy favourable balance of trade they make it impossible for other nations to make their currency convertible into American dollars because the only way those nations can get American dollars is by selling goods, and just as long as the United States makes it impossible for them to sell their goods or services to America, just so long does the United States make it impossible for there to be convertibility of currency.

As I say, the minister seemed to belittle the effect that acceptance of foreign currency would have upon the Canadian economy, and yet I noticed that in his speech yesterday he blamed the United States policy of trading their goods for foreign currency or giving their goods away as being the reason why our sales are down. He will not admit it had any effect upon price but he admitted it had had some effect upon our sales. He mentioned that the United States had sold somewhere in the neighbourhood of $200 million of wheat. Of course there were many other commodities they sold as well.

Perhaps I should give a few examples of deals the United States has made, and I just pick these at random. In the most recent issue of Foreign Trade there is a very interesting article, which I shall be using on another occasion, dealing with United States policy. I think it would be better to deal with that question when we are on the estimates of the minister. But I will take the Wall Street Journal of April 21, 1954, which contains an article dealing with certain operations under the mutual security act. It reads:

> The foreign operations administration allotted $10 million to Yugoslavia and $235,000 to Norway to buy surplus United States agricultural products under section 550 of the mutual security act. The countries will pay in their own currency, which the United States will use for foreign aid purposes. The United States in turn will supply dollars to exporters.

Wheat

Then in the Montreal Gazette of May 11, 1955, I find the following in an editorial:

> On May 5 an announcement was made in Washington of a "package agreement". Under this agreement $73·9 million worth of United States surplus agricultural commodities will be sold to the United Kingdom, with payment in sterling being accepted by the United States government agency, the foreign operations administration.

They are accepting that sterling and with the sterling they will probably be able to buy goods in other countries. The minister shakes his head, but even so there is a very large variety of goods we could buy from Britain which we are at the present time buying from the United States. We could just as well buy them from Britain. I agree with the minister that there may be some difficulty in educating the Canadian people with respect to the desirability of buying less from the United States and more from Britain, but I believe that with an educational campaign that could be taken care of if the people realized the effect upon the Canadian economy when we have an unfavourable balance of trade with the United States and a favourable balance of trade with Great Britain.

As I say, last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) brushed aside the importance of the acceptance of foreign currency, and I was somewhat surprised that the minister of finance also brushed it aside. I quoted to him from the U.S. News and World Report the forecast of the legislation the United States was going to introduce and the minister of finance said that they were wrong, that the United States was not going to do that. But they have done it. It is being done now, and we are faced with a situation which the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself admits is affecting our sales of wheat.

It seems to me that the great problem we face today is that of getting surpluses to the people who need them. I think the United States has given a great deal of leadership on that question. First of all, they gave it under the Marshall plan. We did not criticize the United States when they brought down the Marshall plan. Why did we not criticize them then? Because at that time the United States was making dollars available and Canada was getting some of those dollars. But today the United States is not making dollars available but goods. In other words, the United States is going to make sure that the program they now have to dispose of surpluses does not enable Canada to make use of it to dispose of its surpluses as the Marshall plan did. The United States has now instituted a plan making it possible for that country to dispose of its surpluses, and the United States is saying to Canada: You look after your own job; we are not going to do it for you this time.

It is about time we woke up to that fact. If the United States can do it there is absolutely no reason why Canada could not also dispose of a large percentage of her surplus agricultural products in return for sterling. It is time for the government to quit sitting on the surpluses waiting for a policy to hatch. It is interesting to remember that when we were discussing the international commodity clearing house, a subject in which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is much interested, a subject in which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the international federation of agricultural producers are very much interested, it was turned down. I am going to be very careful in what I say this time. I am not going to blame anybody. In any event, it was turned down.

But the policy of Canada then was that Canada would look after her own surpluses, that we could create a reserve of certain foods which would take care of crop failures. If it is the policy to maintain a reserve of agricultural produce in order to take care of a short crop year and in order that we may play our part in helping to feed the hungry people of the world, undoubtedly that policy is in the interests not only of the people of Canada but also of the people of the world. If that program is being maintained in the interests of the Canadian people and in the interests of the people of the world why should the farmers be the ones to have to pay all the storage charges? Surely the cost of storing these reserves should be borne by the people of Canada as a whole and not by the farmers alone.

The minister pointed out that we had excess storage charges over 1952-53 of 8½ cents per bushel of wheat. I say that 8½ cents should be paid by the government. If that amount were added to the $1.56 it would mean that the farmers would at least be receiving $1.64⅓ which, while not good, is certainly better than $1.56. I think there is every justification for insisting that the 8½ cents for storage charges should be paid from the federal treasury instead of by the farmers.

Last year we moved a motion urging advances against grain on the farms. I realize fully there are certain difficulties involved in that proposal, but on the other hand it would have been a tremendous blessing to the farmers last fall if they had been able to get advances against grain in the bin in exactly the same way as is done in the United States. Again I say if the United States can do it there is no reason why we cannot do it. Certainly there is a problem and it is not an easy problem, but surely we are not always going to pick the easy thing to do. Is it not time, in order to solve some of these problems, that we do it even if it has to be done the hard way? We are not trying to solve them in Canada today.

Last week I spoke on support prices. I pointed out that the farmers had paid for every bit of support they are getting today. They paid for it during the latter part of the war when they accepted a ceiling on the prices of their farm products, and when they accepted less than the world market price for wheat at that time. You might say they paid a premium on the insurance that they hoped to get in the future.

Now, it is true that grains are not under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. If grains were included under the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the support price would be in the neighbourhood of $2.27 per bushel if the base year 1943-45 were used. The interprovincial farm union asked that grain be placed under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The interprovincial farm union council asks for the adoption of the two-price system. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture also asked that the sales of wheat be placed under the two-price system, that is the domestic price should be the maximum price under the international wheat agreement and the export price should be the contract price or whatever price may be reached. We feel that the two-price system would give the farmers a good deal of security. We have supported that idea.

As a matter of fact we were supporting the two-price system for a number of years before the interprovincial farm union ever mentioned it in their brief. Every time representatives of that organization came to Ottawa we asked what they thought of the two-price system. Now, they have it in their program. I believe the idea is absolutely sound. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) does not like the idea. He says that his group insists upon 100 per cent parity. If the hon. member for Assiniboia is so insistent that you have to have 100 per cent parity, I cannot understand why he called the brief of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture an excellent brief because the Canadian Federation of Agriculture insisted that parity prices should not be above 85 per cent of parity. They condemned the idea of 100 per cent parity, yet the hon. member says that is an excellent brief. In one breath, therefore, he says we must not have 100 per cent parity, it is a wrong idea, and then in the next breath he says we stand for 100 per cent parity. I should like to know how he reconciles the two statements.

Mr. Argue: May I answer the hon. member's question now?

Mr. Quelch: Yes.

Mr. Argue: As I said, I believe in a policy of full parity prices, and anything that is a step towards that objective is good. It was for that reason I referred to the federation of agriculture brief as being excellent, because it constituted a very long step forward towards the objective of parity.

Mr. Quelch: The hon. member certainly did not think that answer out very well. I want to make it clear that the federation of agriculture is not making this suggestion as a step towards what the hon. member advocates. Let me repeat what the brief says, and it is to be found on page 10:

> We recommend further that the board—

No, that is not the page.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member did not think that one out very well.

Mr. Quelch: I find this on page 7 of the brief:

> We do not believe it is sound or practical to look to a price support program to guarantee the farmer prices which represent a full fair (or parity) relationship for each individual product. The result of such 100 per cent guarantees, if attempted, would inevitably be a high degree of government direction and control over agriculture. We do not believe—

This is probably the reason the C.C.F. would like to support it.

> —farmers wish to submit to such extensive government participation in their business, nor do we believe it is reasonable to ask the government to undertake such a commitment.

I think another reason the federation feel that way is that, after all, whatever program you establish you have to get public support behind it. If you try to get too high prices you will turn the public against you and there will be little chance of success. On the other hand, the two-price support program can be justified whatever way you look at it. The labour unions of this country have already endorsed the idea of agricultural prices in this country being tied to the price of other products. I believe we would have the support of labour behind the idea that the price of farm products be set at parity with the price of other products. Why would labour expect to buy farm products at lower prices than the price of their own labour?

The parity price in the domestic market could be justified without any difficulty at all. When you take into consideration that apart from wheat only about 6 per cent of our agricultural products are exported abroad, then by guaranteeing parity prices for the 94 per cent consumed in Canada you would give the farmers a very large percentage of parity. Wheat, of course, is different. I know that it varies, but suppose we take the figure of 20 per cent of our wheat being used in Canada and 80 per cent exported abroad. The 20 per cent consumed in Canada would be sold then at parity, that is $2.27 per bushel. In so far as the 80 per cent exported abroad is concerned, we have stressed the fact that there should be a reasonable support price. What would be a reasonable support price? I believe a reasonable support price for the exported grain would be the average between the floor and the ceiling in the international wheat agreement, which would be approximately $1.70 per bushel. If you sold 80 per cent at $1.70 and 20 per cent at a parity price of $2.27, you would have a support price of $1.81 per bushel. That is certainly what we consider to be fair, and I think it would meet with the approval of the various farm organizations.

We believe that this price policy, coupled with advances to farmers against grain held in farm storage, would not only help the farmers of this country considerably but would also help to maintain the Canadian economy at a high level.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): Yesterday certainly will always be remembered as blue Monday so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker. First of all the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) announced the final disposition of the wheat board stocks and the final net payment to farmers ranging from 6·26 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern up to 16·45 cents per bushel for feed wheat. While hon. members from the west were aware that the sales had not been going as well as had been expected, it was not realized that farmers were to receive such a very small payment.

Then, for the first time, the minister admitted the very serious problem that we now have, and which he had ignored for far too long. He mentioned that during this period the United States surplus disposal program had emerged as one of the chief factors in the international wheat position. Canadian export sales have improved but not to the extent that would achieve the rapid movement we hoped for earlier in the crop season. Then the minister mentioned the triple-barrelled surplus disposal program in effect in the United States, and stated that wheat may be bartered for strategic materials; may be distributed to importing countries for local currencies which are usually left in the recipient country for development or other purposes; or may be given away as a relief measure.

I have noticed that in the publication "Agriculture Abroad" this point that the minister made is mentioned. The issue for April, 1955, in the section dealing with the United States, states that the commodity credit corporation in the United States disposed of commodities valued at $1·4 billion in 1954 and that in 1955 it is expected they will dispose of $2·1 billion and in 1956 $2·4 billion. If we have had trouble in 1954 as a result of the United States policy, it is quite obvious that in 1955 and 1956 we really have trouble ahead.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) made reference to the treatment extended to wheat producers in other countries of the world, and pointed out that although Canada is one of the main wheat producers our farmers are receiving the lowest amount paid anywhere in the world. He referred to some figures prepared by the Alberta wheat pool. I have in my hand the United States foreign agricultural circular, F.G. 1355, published on April 8, which sets out figures very similar to those given by the hon. member for Assiniboia. But as these figures are more up to date I should like to take a few moments to give some information concerning the problem with which Canadian farmers are confronted, and to show the prices they receive as compared with those received by farmers in other countries. I shall give, in this table, the name of the country, the price per bushel in United States dollars, and the size of the wheat crop in each country. The information is as follows:

Country	Equivalent price per bushel in dollars	1954-1955 wheat crop, in bushels
Algeria	2.64	44,830,000
Argentina	2.72	275,000,000
Australia	1.41	166,610,000
Austria	2.63	16,700,000
Belgium	2.56	20,800,000
Canada	1.40	293,909,000
Chile	4.50	38,270,000
Egypt	2.18	60,000,000
Finland	3.95	10,000,000
France	2.64	386,500,000
West Germany	2.72-2.83	105,600,000
Greece	2.40	45,000,000
India	1.52	290,900,000
Iran	0.97	77,000,000
Ireland	2.39	15,900,000
Italy	3.05	264,000,000
Japan	2.61	55,700,000
Luxembourg	3.02	1,500,000
Mexico	1.99	30,300,000
Morocco	2.64	45,560,000
Netherlands	1.86	14,590,000
New Zealand	1.59	4,600,000
Norway	3.43	1,480,000
Peru	1.83	6,100,000
Portugal	2.85	27,470,000
Spain	2.73	180,000,000
Sweden	2.35	37,870,000
Switzerland	4.19	9,370,000
Syria	1.54	31,200,000
Tunisia	2.64	22,410,000

Turkey	2.49	180,000,000
Union of South Africa	2.25	19,760,000
United Kingdom	2.30	104,160,000
United States	2.24	969,781,000
Uruguay	2.96	26,310,000
Yugoslavia	2.16	—

It will be noted that while the price for Yugoslavia is indicated as $2.16, there is no figure given for the amount of the wheat crop. The total number of bushels for all these countries I have mentioned is 6,825 million. I would also point out that of all these countries Iran, with a price of 97 cents per bushel, is the only one that pays a price lower than Canada. It produces 77 million bushels.

This interesting publication points out that 96 per cent of the world's wheat is marketed under some type of government control or government support policy. It outlines these different types as:

1. Fixed prices;
2. Government purchase;
3. Guaranteed minimum prices;
4. Directional prices;
5. Deficiency payments;
6. Guaranteed price ranges;
7. Indirect price supports;
8. Pre-contracting prices;
9. Communist state planning.

I admit frankly that the Canadian government cannot be accused of not doing something. I think the mere fact that we have a wheat board is a factor that all members from wheat producing areas appreciate. If we did not have the wheat board I am convinced all cereal prices would be a great deal lower than they are. However, I do not think we are unreasonable in asking that Canada should view the problem of wheat production and wheat marketing as have the other countries I have mentioned.

There is an interesting section in the document I have before me concerning the policy in France. That country is now in a position where its imports of wheat from now on are to be eliminated. They are paying a very large amount each year to compensate their home producers in order to increase their production of wheat.

I suggest the Canadian wheat producer should not be held responsible for the fact that in the year immediately following the war, particularly in Europe, there has been a mad race to increase the production of cereals so that, in the event of war, they would not be dependent to any great extent upon shipments from across the Atlantic. It so happens that Canada feels the impact of this policy to an extent greater than any other country.

In deciding that those who produce wheat should have something like parity price, I think the United States authorities are acting in the best interests of the American people. I have been interested in the argument which has been taking place between the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). The hon. member for Acadia has just finished saying that parity price for Canada would be something like $2.27. That is, if we take into account the cost of farm machinery, fuel and all other factors entering into production, and balance them with the costs of medical services, legal services and all the other services in Canada, those who produce wheat should be getting something like $2.27. Then he went on to say that the world market at the moment will not stand that sort of price.

I think we must admit frankly that our standard of living in Canada is a good deal higher than that in many other countries to which we have been exporting foodstuffs, and we cannot expect our customers to buy wheat from us at a price higher than that at which they can buy it in other countries, particularly when they are in a position of being able to remind us that our standard of living is a great deal higher than theirs.

They want to buy wheat in other markets; so we will say for the sake of argument that the price in the world market is $1.70. The hon. member for Acadia said the farmer should not be satisfied with $1.70, but that he should have something more, that in fact he should have $1.81. It does not make sense to me to argue that a price of $2.27 is a fair one, and that Canadians should pay that price for wheat used in the local market, but that we should sell the balance in the world market for $1.70, plus 11 cents, and that the farmer should be satisfied with $1.81.

If it cost the farmer $2.27 and he had to sell 80 per cent of his production for $1.81, then inevitably only one result can follow, and that is that he will go bankrupt. Of course he would not go bankrupt as quickly as he would if the price were somewhat less than $1.81. That would drag out the process a little longer. But if you are going to cut the tail off the dog, it does not matter very much whether you cut it off in short pieces, an inch at a time, or whether you do it in one operation.

Mr. Castleden: It is tougher on the dog.

Mr. Nicholson: This business of deciding that the farmer should have a price less than what would give him a fair share of the national income does not really make any appeal to me. I realize that we cannot fix an arbitrary price and decide that we shall produce unlimited quantities of cereals at that particular price regardless of our ability to consume them or to sell them. But that again becomes a national problem. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris), in appointing his commission to review the problems of the Canadian economy, should include such a person as Professor Baker of the University of Saskatchewan, who has recently completed a study in Saskatchewan dealing with some of our fundamental problems. Certainly, there should be someone on this commission who will approach the problem from the point of view of agriculture.

As I said previously, we have opened up large tracts of country in Canada on the assumption that we would be able to sell food in the world's markets. If, through no fault of ours, we are unable to sell the products there, it becomes a national problem, and it is not unreasonable to ask the federal treasury to use funds to see that, as long as we continue in the business of producing cereals, those who produce them will have a parity price or a fair price for wheat, oats, or barley that can be worked out mathematically as a fair price in comparison with the price of fertilizer, gasoline, or implement repairs.

I might say that as long as I can remember we have had as part of our Canadian policy the maintenance of tariff barriers which protected an important sector of our Canadian economy. The last careful study that was made on the impact of the tariffs was made by the late Norman Rogers some years ago. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be familiar with the brief which was presented by the government of Saskatchewan to the Rowell-Sirois commission outlining what the tariff policy has meant in terms of revenue and expenditure in the different provinces. For example, Prince Edward Island benefited to the tune of $5.32, but they paid out $23.20 per person per year because of tariffs, so they have a net loss of $17.88. Nova Scotia had a gain of $18.50, but a cost of $30.78, or a net loss of $12.28; New Brunswick benefited to the extent of $19.91, but the cost was $31.58, or a net loss of $11.67; Quebec had a gain of $46.23, a loss of $35.20, or a net gain of $11.03; Ontario had a gain of $64.32, a cost of $49.17, or a net gain of $15.15; Manitoba had a gain of $28.44, a loss of $41.69, or a net loss of $13.25; Saskatchewan had a gain of $3.55, a loss of $31.71, or a net loss of $28.16; Alberta had a gain of $11.22, a loss of $38.15, or a net loss of $26.93; and British Columbia had a gain of $32.03, a loss of $54.36, or a net loss of $22.33. It is pretty obvious that only two provinces of Canada are in a better net financial position because of tariffs. But the people of the ten provinces have accepted tariffs as the price they pay for the development of Canadian industry with a view to providing employment for the maximum number of Canadian people.

If during the past 50 years it was decided that all the people of the country should support the manufacturing industry by tariff devices, until we decide that there is no future for grain exports in Canada, public funds should be used to see that those who are engaged in this necessary industry have a fair share of the national income.

I should like to remind the house again of the farm net income report, 1954, published by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), which shows that the net farm income has dropped from $2,154 million in 1951 to $1,125 million in 1954, a drop of $1 billion. This is one major factor that has caused such widespread unemployment in Canada, and when one narrows down the impact of those figures to the province of Saskatchewan, where we had a drop from $566·5 million to $126 million, one finds out what happened before we had the disastrous damage from rust last year. This is the direct result of Canada being unable to sell in the world markets the amount of grain that we would have been selling if the other governments that I have mentioned had not been embarking on policies which paid their wheat producers in some instances two or three times as much as they would have paid for a better sample of wheat shipped from Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in concluding these remarks I should like to make the following suggestions. First, Canada should embark on a school lunch program with a view to using some of our surplus cereals and milk. I am sure there cannot be any argument about it that a school lunch of bread, butter and milk would result in a few years' time in Canadian children enjoying a good deal better health than they have now. The second proposal is that we must maintain maximum consumption of our foodstuffs in Canada. That is something that the Canadian government can do, apart altogether from the world markets. There is no problem whatsoever in getting into the stomachs of hungry Canadian people the maximum amount of cereals and dairy products that I have mentioned.

We have a very large number of people on old age pensions, on blind pensions, and on mothers' allowances in Canada who cannot possibly, out of the small cheques they receive, buy an ample quantity of many of these foodstuffs. In dealing with the problem the government must find ways and means of making available maximum quantities of foodstuffs.

My third point is this. We must also participate in feeding hungry people all over the world. We cannot find fault with the United States, which has large surpluses on hand, making available to hungry people food from this source.

In the fourth place, there must be no reduction in production so long as there are hungry people in our own country and in other countries. The United States should even carry on a greater campaign in helping to feed the hungry people of the world. I might remind the house that during the first war and the second war the United States sat on the sidelines for a long time, while the people of this country, of Great Britain and of other parts of Europe, used up large quantities of their assets. At the end of both wars, the United States finished in a very strong financial position. I remember that during this war I happened to be returning from the north at one time when some 50 Americans were returning from a construction assignment in northern Canada. The lowest paid man in the party had been drawing $400 a month and his board and heavy winter clothing. They all had been working on a construction project which was completed on a cost-plus basis. Since the war, Canada has taken over all these establishments and we paid our United States friends on the basis of what these establishments cost them. When I consider that those who went north during those years spent very large sums of United States funds, which were recently reimbursed, I think there should be no trouble whatever in seeing that those who are engaged in the production of food, which in wartime or in peacetime is a weapon which should have high priority, receive their fair share. But unfortunately in world war I and in world war II the farmers, whether they lived in the maritimes, in central Canada or in the west, received a great deal less than their fair share. In both wars, controls were imposed as soon as there was a possibility of our running short of food and, before the farmers were able to cash in and take advantage of the fact that now they might be able to pay off their debts, we had controls which made it very difficult for farmers to take their fair share of our country's production. So I suggest that the government of this country must keep step with the other countries I have mentioned which are seeing that those who are producing cereals in those countries have a much better break than their Canadian cousins are getting.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a brief word. I know a little about wheat; in fact, I passed my examination on testing wheat. I have worked on a farm in Saskatchewan and have been around there a good deal, and now I am living in a place that is called the bread basket of the world. I was just wondering what good all of these speeches would do towards raising the price of wheat. According to some people on the other side the government is doing nothing—

Mr. Harkness: That is right.

Mr. McIvor: —the government is doing nothing and is just sitting indolently by. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said that the government had its trading agents in a great many places throughout the world and they were on the job trying to sell the wheat. The only reason why I get up is to ask a question. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will tell me, is there anything that has been said or will be said that could not be said on the estimates?

Mr. Elmore Philpott (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I was tempted to enter the debate yesterday when the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was justifying the building of the South Saskatchewan dam on the ground that the Americans were letting off too many atom bombs, and I could not quite see the connection. After I heard some of the weird and wonderful arguments that were advanced today for parity wheat prices, although I am not a wheat farmer, I have the temerity to put in a few words. I have never in my life heard so much undiluted bunk as I have heard about wheat since I came to this house a few years ago, mostly from the so-called wheat experts from Saskatchewan. It seems to me that the great trouble in the world today is that the United States has caused this terrible wheat headache by her foolish parity price policy which has resulted in this vast accumulation of unsold wheat. This is the direct cause of our own Canadian problem. Some of our friends opposite are wanting us to follow in the same footsteps as the United States, so that we can confound the confusion which now exists in the world and double the pain of the headache.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) was talking about his plan for paying the farmers of Canada $2.27 for each and every bushel of wheat that is produced and then selling that wheat on the world market at world prices, he forgot to put in one detail. He forgot to put in the detail of what he was really advocating, that is a subsidy by the treasury of Canada to the wheat farmers of Saskatchewan, a subsidy which, according to my calculation, would amount to between $300 million and $400 million a year. I am not so sure that even some of the gentlemen who sit opposite me and who have those large wheat farms in Saskatchewan would be so enthusiastic about paying that subsidy of $300 million or $400 million, because I heard them complaining just a few weeks ago that income taxes were already too high.

I must say that, as between the plans I have heard here today, the one suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia and the one suggested by the hon. member for Acadia—while I do not very often agree with Social Credit—I certainly think that the one of the hon. member for Acadia at least makes some sense, while the one of the hon. member for Assiniboia makes no sense whatever; it makes complete and utter nonsense. However, when I hear my Social Credit friends chiding some of us for not having voted last year for their want of confidence motion in the government I am a little confused, because only a week or so ago in this house we heard most indignant protests from exactly the same quarter of the house explaining why they had voted against family allowances in 1944. They said they had voted against family allowances because otherwise they would have been voting confidence in the government and according to them that would have been an unforgivable crime.

However, I should like to dwell for a minute on this matter of accepting soft currencies. I believe that to sell our wheat we have to take the price for our wheat that the world is willing and able to pay. The longer we shrink from that basic fact the worse the problem is going to get. The sooner we face it, the better for all concerned. But when I hear some of my hon. friends in the right-hand corner talking about taking soft currencies, in payment for our wheat, I think they had better take a good long look at what they are talking about. I for one have been an advocate for many years of accepting payment for our wheat and other products in sterling and other currencies of our customer countries, but only on one condition: provided that those currencies are not blocked currencies, as they have been up until the recent past in almost all of the countries concerned; and provided also that we do not simply take those soft currencies to have them pile up in the back yard, but rather use those soft currencies to buy goods or properties which the customer countries have for sale.

Mr. Quelch: That is what I advocated.

Mr. Philpott: In this connection I cannot refrain from putting in a word for my very good friend the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) who, I know, is the recognized money authority in the party opposite. I studied his plan last year with great care as to how he would provide an unlimited amount of currency so that our customers could buy our wheat. The plan, as I understood it, was that anybody in a foreign country who wanted to buy Canadian wheat would be provided with the proper amount of Canadian currency so that he could buy the Canadian wheat, and the net result of the transaction would be that the foreign customer would have the wheat and Canada would have the currency which she herself had printed in the beginning. According to my way of thinking, even for a Social Credit monetary theory, that is really going a pretty long distance indeed. I have heard also from directly opposite today pleas for feeding the hungry of the world. That is all very well. If my hon. friends are really anxious to help feed the hungry of the world, as they represent a large area of the wheat-growing district of Saskatchewan, let them hop to it. There is a large surplus of wheat there. Let them get busy and give Dr. Lotta Hitschmanova of the Unitarian Service Committee of Canada some of this grain surplus they have on their farms. I am sure she will be glad to see that it is distributed in foreign countries.

Mr. Speaker, I am sometimes sorry that we ever had in this country the government-run wheat board. I sometimes think that it would have been better if this country had not had the government wheat board with its members appointed directly by the government, but had had some kind of wheat marketing system similar to the fruit and vegetable marketing system in British Columbia where the machinery is under the direct control of the farmers themselves. It seems to me that the very fact that we have a government-run wheat board leads to some of the glaring fallacies in the thinking of members sitting in the benches directly opposite me. The members directly opposite me seem to think that there is some unlimited fund of public money and that all we have to do is to dip into this public barrel and dish it out to the wheat farmers of Saskatchewan or anyone else that one can think about. But let us be under no illusion. The government of Canada has no money of its own. The government of Canada has only the money that it takes from the taxpayers of Canada. If we are being honest about this scheme for the total distribution of wheat on a parity price system, let us come right out and say that what we are asking for is a subsidy of some $300 million or $400 million a year taken from all of the taxpayers of Canada for the benefit of some of the taxpayers of Canada.

I think that is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker, except to say that I for one believe that the farmers of Canada are entitled to a fair share of the national income. However, I do not believe that the farmers of Canada will ever get very far toward getting a fair share of the national income of Canada if they go on such ridiculous and impossible paths as are pointed out to them by the false prophets from some quarters in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Nicholson: I wonder if my hon. friend would permit a question, Mr. Speaker? I wonder if he would recommend that Canadian farmers be permitted to buy all their goods in the cheapest markets? If they are going to be obliged to sell their products in the world market without protection, would he recommend that they be permitted to buy everything they want on the open market?

Mr. Philpott: I shall be extremely glad to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. If you boys ever become really successful missionaries like Billy Graham, and if you ever convert the big manufacturers of Toronto and Montreal to get in on your plan of parity prices, we are going to have parity prices for Ford automobiles, reapers, combines, vacuum cleaners and everything else. You boys have an idea which is 1,000 per cent more false and more offensive protection than the most ultra high-tariff Tory ever thought of in his whole life.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to speak on a different matter, and I should like to know whether there are any other hon. members who want to follow up on this subject.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a word on this whole question today, not for the purpose of launching into a long dissertation but more for the purpose of correcting certain errors into which some people have fallen in their thinking. I am also going to have to make an admission today, Mr. Speaker, but it is an admission that does not pain me at all. Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) drew to my attention the fact that when election campaigns are being fought in the provinces, repercussions of them can be felt in this house. I bow in humble acknowledgment of his rightness in that assertion.

It seems that the most political group in the house today are the members immediately to my right. I do not know whether they feel that they are fighting for their lives or that they have their backs to the wall, or what it is, but they seem to feel that they must put on a political scrap here every time anything is mentioned. If they would put on their political fights on the basis of fact, then of course we would not mind. But when they stretch the truth in these matters and try to make them appear as something that they are not, we are obliged to take issue with them. I agree with much of what my friend the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) said yesterday. I could not help realizing that he too was speaking the truth.

In speaking this afternoon my friend the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) made certain remarks. I think he did so honestly because I give him credit for being honest and sincere in what he says. I do not believe that he would try to mislead anybody. But this afternoon, in the course of his address, he asked how anyone can justify saying that if $2.27 a bushel represents the internal parity price of wheat, the farmers should be asked to take $1.81 which my colleague the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) calculated might be a probable resultant of a two-price system under present circumstances. Perhaps the very best answer to my friend the hon. member for Mackenzie is that the interprovincial farm union council have advocated just that because they feel that it is something reasonable and sound, the kind of reasonableness about which my friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) was just speaking. Certainly in our approach to all of these things we must be reasonable. We must know that the people of Canada are the ones who will have to foot the bills in all these things. We must be prepared to accept pretty much what the farmers themselves are prepared to accept as reasonable and sound.

I point out to my hon. friend that that is exactly what they have done. All he has to do is to refer to the submission to the government of Canada by the interprovincial farm union council of January, 1955, and he will find that two-price system—as my friend the hon. member for Acadia outlined it—is advocated by them; and the resultant would be, under present circumstances, exactly what the hon. member for Acadia has outlined here this afternoon.

Another thing the hon. member for Mackenzie asked is this. He asked how long farmers could stay in business if they were asked to accept $1.81 a bushel for their wheat if it cost them $2.27 to produce it. Maybe that was a slip of the tongue. Certainly no one here has suggested that the cost of production is or has been $2.27 a bushel. I would ask who has said that it cost the farmers $2.27 a bushel to produce wheat.

Mr. Nicholson: The hon. member for Acadia said that is the parity price.

Mr. Low: That is the parity selling price. It is not their cost of production. If you consider the heavy crop yields that we have had in western Canada during the past three years, I think that anybody who took the trouble to do a little bit of figuring would see that the cost of production per bushel to the farmers would be considerably below $1.81, which my hon. friend says would be the resultant of a two-price system today. Of course there would be a profit. My hon. friends in the C.C.F. do not like us to call that a profit. They want us to call it income. I do not wish to quibble about it. To me it is a profit. Any time anybody produces something at a certain cost and sells it at something above that cost, he is making a profit. It does not matter what quibbling goes on about it from other people. I merely wanted to point out these things, together with this. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), who has become the ultra politico of his party, takes delight, I think, in going quite a long way, and certainly not in a restrained way, in attacking everybody in the house because they do not agree with him. Evidently he has set himself up as the authority on wheat and farming in the house. At least, that is the impression one gets in listening to him. I was quite disappointed at the intemperate attack he made on the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: —an attack which I think any of us should hesitate to make on the Prime Minister of this country.

An hon. Member: Uncalled for.

Mr. Low: I am afraid the hon. member is getting a wee bit beyond reason in some of the things he is saying. Perhaps he is puffed up with pride over some of his accomplishments. I do not know. At any rate, he has tried to place interpretations on other people's proposals that are unjustified, and I am going to try to set him right on something he has been saying in connection with our proposal of years gone by with respect to acceptance of some soft currencies in payment for surpluses of Canadian foods. Last year we moved an amendment to the speech from the throne which called for the acceptance of sterling in return for surplus food products shipped to Britain. My hon. friend takes the stand that we moved a trick motion and that is the reason why the C.C.F. voted against it.

I know he takes that position. He does not sit very far from me and it is easy to hear what he says. In fact, he tried to get one of his colleagues to get up and say it this afternoon, but his colleague was not quite prepared for it and of course he did not do so. I am just putting a spoke in his wheel before it is said by some other irresponsible person. The fact is that he has said he believes the only reason the C.C.F. voted against our amendment was that it was a trick motion. I want to read from Hansard what his leader said, not about a trick motion at all but about the acceptance of sterling.

Mr. Castleden: I know the hon. member wants to be fair. Will he read the amendment in full?

Mr. Low: Yes, indeed; certainly. The amendment was quoted at page 594 of Hansard of December, 1953, by the leader of the C.C.F. party, and it reads:

> We respectfully represent to Your Excellency that the welfare of Canada is dependent upon private enterprise; and that the prosperity and security of all Canadians will be advanced by government policies which will restore markets for primary products and generally promote a high volume of international trade by the acceptance of sterling in payment therefor.

When the leader of the C.C.F. party spoke and repeated the whole amendment he referred first to private enterprise and indicated he could not vote for the amendment.

Mr. Ellis: That is the most important part of the amendment.

Mr. Low: Perhaps so, but if my hon. friend would just restrain himself for a moment I will make my explanation.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Your explanation.

Mr. Low: He explained in the first part of his speech that he could not support our amendment because the phrase "private enterprise" is even more objectionable to the C.C.F. than the phrase "free competition". He went on to say that therefore he could not support the amendment, and at page 595 continued with these words:

> The second reason concerns the question of the acceptance of sterling without limitation.

I pause there for a moment. I want the members of the house to note those words—"the acceptance of sterling without limitation." At no time have we suggested acceptance of sterling without limitation. From the very proposal itself it must be obvious to hon. members who think it through that what we were proposing was the acceptance from Britain of their own currency in payment of their unfavourable balance of trade with us.

Mr. Castleden: That was not in your amendment.

Mr. Low: That is what anybody thinking the matter through or even giving it the most cursory examination would say. In trade with any country you are exchanging a certain amount of goods and services with them on what you hope will be a mutually satisfactory basis. At the end of a cycle or period of time when it comes to settlement one or the other is going to have a balance, and it is the settlement of the balance that is referred to in the acceptance of soft currency or sterling. That was made abundantly clear in the speeches we made supporting the amendment.

Mr. Macdonnell: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Low: Indeed.

Mr. Macdonnell: Was it not also in order to stimulate and increase our trade with England? Was that not represented as a means whereby it could be increased?

Mr. Low: Yes indeed.

An hon. Member: The new coalition.

Mr. Low: But the settlement would certainly be at the end of a year or cycle, and between the two countries the acceptance of sterling would simply involve the amount of the unbalance of trade. Certainly, as the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has said, it was proposed to the house as a means to help to stimulate trade with Great Britain and to restore Canada's place as a great natural market of Great Britain. Therefore anybody who tries to interpret what we propose as the acceptance of sterling without limitation simply shows he has not thought the matter through and is trying to place some sort of interpretation on it which might make it possible, in a strained manner, for the C.C.F. to say that the reason we could not accept it was it was proposed without limitation.

Let me set the hon. member straight. If the matter has not been set straight thus far, let me make it clear that what we have proposed with relation to the acceptance of soft currencies in settlement of our balances is not without limitation. In the first place, it is limited to the amount which we would be prepared to accept in return for our surpluses. Second, it would be limited, without our doing anything about it, by the amount of the balance that would be due us from the other country after we had balanced off the exchange of goods and services. That is the story and it should be perfectly clear. So far as some explanation of the reason why they voted against the acceptance of sterling is concerned, the leader of the C.C.F. has made it clear that they did not even accept the second suggestion because, on the occasion to which I have referred, he went on to say:

> I quite agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he says he does not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain would accept a proposition of this description.

If you read what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) said, he explained that Great Britain would not be prepared to accept a proposition of that kind because, he said, they had had some experiences in India and other countries that were unfavourable. Shortly after that time I had a chance to have a chat with the private secretary to then Prime Minister Churchill, his own son-in-law, here in the city of Ottawa. He said to me then that he saw no reason whatsoever why that policy could not be adopted if acceptance of sterling was to be limited within the amount of the unfavourable balance that Britain had with Canada. He said he saw no reason why we could not adopt that policy, and that they were interested in it. That was the position he took.

It seems to me we have missed a very valuable chance to stimulate the kind of trade we ought to be having with a number of countries, such as I suggested yesterday, for instance, with Israel, Sweden, Japan and the other countries with whom we have to do business or want to do business. It could be financed internally, without any tremendous expansion of currency, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) suggested. We do not advocate an unlimited or uncontrolled expansion of currency at all. We want it strictly limited to what we can absorb internally. I thought I should make that clear, Mr. Speaker, and I hope I have succeeded.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should say a word about selling wheat abroad for local currencies. It has been assumed by several speakers that we could sell wheat to Britain for sterling and use that sterling to buy goods for Canada or use it to pay our debts in other parts of the sterling area; that is not the situation. If we buy goods for sterling, we buy it under a program that has to be worked out with the chancellor, which limits the use of that sterling. Sterling is not freely interchangeable. It can only be used for certain purposes. If it were true that we could sell for sterling and use that sterling as we liked and anywhere we liked, we would have no objection.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): May I ask the minister a question? Could not such credits be used in the sterling areas?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, not under exchange control rules in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fulton: Even their use in the United Kingdom is restricted?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, even their use in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Macdonnell: If it were accepted in the way the minister says, if it were possible to use that sterling anywhere, then it would not be really acceptance of sterling but would be the acceptance of convertible currency and, in effect, getting our own dollar money.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is true. It has been assumed that sterling is convertible anywhere in the sterling area, but that is not the case. When we buy goods in Britain we convert dollars into sterling to pay for those goods. If we had sterling in Britain which we had accepted for wheat which could be used for that purpose, we would be very glad to have that sterling. The United States is selling for foreign currency with this proviso, that they leave the foreign currency in the country and use it for certain programs which are usually give-away programs. That is what the United States means by selling for local currencies.

The United States is a powerful country with tremendous revenues, and it is able to do that. In Canada, we feel we have done a good deal in assisting our customers abroad, since the war ended, but we believe we have gone about as far as we can in that direction.

Mr. Quelch: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Just a minute; let me explain this. I did not interrupt you. Selling for local currencies means to us the lending of money to the country without interest and without a due date; that is the real effect of accepting soft currency for Canadian dollars. Now, we have made loans to countries to help them restore their equilibrium. We have made loans to Britain, France, Belgium, and a number of European countries. I do not remember all of them. We did that, but we had a due date on the loan, and we had a rate of interest fixed. If Britain came to us and said she required help in that direction, we would certainly sit down with them and look at the problems. Britain has never asked us to send exports over there in exchange for sterling, the purpose being to freeze the sterling and create a liability against Britain with no due date and no interest charged. I doubt if the British chancellor of the exchequer would welcome a transaction of that kind.

[Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain).]

It has been suggested that it is Canada's duty to balance her accounts with the United Kingdom. I doubt if any country that is shipping raw materials in great quantities, and is the principal supplier of certain raw materials, can ever hope to balance her account by purchasing manufactured goods. I doubt if that is possible. Nevertheless Britain, by trading with Canada, by trading with the United States and by trading for dollars in various parts of the world, has been able to accumulate dollars. The dollar and gold balances of the United Kingdom have risen very considerably in the last two years; that is world trading. It is a sort of fantastic theory to suggest that Canada balance her accounts with other countries by accepting sterling. I do not believe it would be acceptable either to Canada or the recipient countries, at least not to many of them.

It has been suggested that Canada was sending out a cry of despair when I made my announcement; that is not the case. We are selling our share of wheat, I believe. Hon. members are apt to look at statistics on exports and refer to them as statistics on sales. We never disclose our sales position, but I may tell you that the sales position is considerably better than the sales position of a year ago. Last year was referred to as a very poor year for wheat. In the early days of the wheat agreement we were reluctant to take a commitment to deliver any more than 210 million bushels. Other countries entered into the agreement, and in order to help out we raised our commitment to 233 million bushels. At the time we were very doubtful whether, year in and year out, we could export that much wheat.

How much wheat did we export last year? We exported 255 million bushels, which is 22 million bushels more than the commitment we were willing to take under the international wheat agreement. The export figures for April, May and June will emerge, and by the end of July we will have a fair picture of Canada's position for the year. I can say it will be a better year than last year. It depends on sales between now and the end of the crop year to determine just how much better the picture will be, but still I am not at all discouraged about the prospects for this year as an export year in wheat.

Of course it has been a good export year for coarse grains. We have been able to dispose of our coarse grains as they have been received, and we do not regard them as a selling problem at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister a question? Am I correct in my understanding of his remarks earlier this afternoon, that if we sold wheat to the value of £100 million sterling and wanted to use that sterling to purchase commodities in the United Kingdom, there would be restrictions on the commodities we might purchase with that sterling?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, that would be the case if we undertook to accept sterling.

Mr. Macdonnell: In the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: We could not use it in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Not if it were a sterling transaction. If we made it a dollar transaction, we could. That is what we do, as a matter of fact. We sell wheat for dollars and we can convert the dollars into sterling and buy what we like.

Mr. Fulton: But if we accept sterling, then it is restricted sterling?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes, it is restricted sterling.

Mr. Quelch: Does that not depend upon the agreement? The United States are spending the soft currency they accept in the countries from which they accept that currency.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): But for certain agreed purposes. The program must be a relief program, or a program that has been agreed upon as being beneficial to the recipient country. There is no market, except where currencies are convertible, on which the United States can accept local currencies and then buy what they like with those local currencies and ship it where they like. It is not that kind of world.

Mr. Quelch: Congress laid down wide terms under which that currency can be used. They are very wide, far beyond what the minister has said.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Only for relief, or some other purpose previously approved by prior agreement with the recipient country.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to become involved in the argument concerning the acceptance of sterling, nor shall I discuss any of the intricacies of the parity price system about which we have heard so much in the last hour.

On April 28 I made a speech lasting about 30 or 40 minutes during the debate on the budget, and at that time I dealt with the wheat situation. I do not propose today to repeat the argument I offered then in connection with our deplorable wheat marketing situation today.

I believe everyone in the house realizes that the situation of the western farmers is rapidly becoming serious. Their cash returns last year from the sale of grains were down to the extent of $350 or $400 million from what they were the year before, and it is inevitable that they will be down still further in the receipts from the last crop year. The reason is clear. Last year's crop in the western provinces was estimated at only 274 million bushels, and most of the wheat was of low quality. The price is down, and the net result of all this is that the amount of money the farmers will receive from marketing that crop—that is, the money they will receive this year—will be less than they got last year.

Therefore their cash position will be bad indeed. Combined with this is the flood situation in Saskatchewan, as well as the very wet conditions in Alberta and in parts of Manitoba. The result probably will be that a large acreage normally seeded to wheat and coarse grains will not be planted at all.

All these facts are known by the farmers in western Canada, and they are greatly worried. They are not greatly concerned with whether we can exchange wheat for sterling or for anything else. Their concern is with the wheat on hand, the surplus that has been piling up and which must be disposed of. Their concern is that this wheat must be sold so there will be room in the elevators for the crops they will produce in the coming growing season; that is, those who are going to be fortunate enough to produce crops.

They are far from satisfied with the statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the disposal of our wheat. I am sure the statement he made yesterday will cause great consternation, particularly with respect to the final payment the farmers will receive and the further point that his statement offered them no hope. He did not indicate that the situation will be any better this year than it was last year.

The minister did say that the sales position is better this year than it was a year ago, but he did not say how much better. Let me point out that it would need to be a great deal better if it is to make any appreciable improvement in the situation now existing. In his statement of yesterday the minister said:

> The wheat board and the government expect, and are fully prepared, to deal with competition in world wheat markets. The record shows that we have met this competition most effectively. Canada has retained a high proportion of commercial markets throughout the world.

But I submit that statement does not give comfort to the farmers in western Canada. The minister can say as often as he likes that he thinks we have maintained our position in commercial markets; but what the farmer wants is to be able to take the grain to the elevators and get cash for it to pay his ordinary living expenses. He is not going to be able to do that unless a great deal of the grain now in the elevators is cleared out.

I asked the minister this question yesterday:

> What steps has the government or the wheat board taken to meet this competition in world wheat markets of which he speaks?

The minister replied:

> Very aggressive selling in every world market; we have agents in every world market. I believe that considering the fact we are selling our wheat for cash and others are giving it away, our position has been very well maintained.

What does it tell any farmer in western Canada, what does it tell any member in the House of Commons, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce says, "Very aggressive selling in every world market; we have agents in every world market." So long as the wheat is not being moved in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of the farmers in western Canada, then I say the minister's answer is no answer at all. It seems to me that at this time he should go into more detail in telling the house what measures the government is taking or proposes to take to dispose of the wheat we have on hand. The general statement that we are conducting very aggressive selling methods means nothing at all, and it does no good.

It seems to me the minister and the government owe it to the farmers and the people of western Canada generally to take them into their confidence to a greater extent, and give something definite by stating what they are doing and what they think they can do to sell this grain.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Lethbridge proceeds to speak, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask the minister a further question. I should like to come back to the question of selling goods for sterling in England. It comes to me as a tremendous surprise to be told that if one sells goods for sterling in England, the use of that sterling in England—that is, in Great Britain—can be restricted. That comes to me as an entire surprise, and I am wondering if I understood the minister correctly.

I can understand that sterling might be restricted so far as its use anywhere else in Europe was concerned. But with sterling received in transactions for goods bought in England, on deposit in English banks, to say the use of that is restricted in purchasing goods in England comes as a surprise to me. Did I understand the minister to say that?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Yes. If a Canadian living in the dollar area wishes to sell goods for sterling, unless there is an arrangement with the exchequer changing the position, he can use that sterling only as the chancellor of the exchequer may from time to time permit.

Perhaps I might be permitted to relate a small example concerning a friend of mine. This person was visiting in England and had a sort of windfall in the form of sterling. He tried to deposit that sterling in a Canadian bank, but the Canadian bank would not have it at all. Finally he gave it to his lawyer, and his lawyer instructed him that he could use it to pay his personal expenses, such as hotel bills and the like. But he was told that if he bought a necktie or a suit of clothes with it he would be subject to heavy penalty.

The use of sterling by people living outside the sterling area is very closely regulated; and to say that we can sell our wheat for sterling and do what we like with the sterling —well, unless there is a prior arrangement to that effect, it just is not workable.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does the minister mean that if I have an account in an English bank I cannot write a cheque on it here to purchase something in England, and have it cashed? I cannot believe that, surely.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It all depends upon where the money came from. If you have an account in a Canadian bank that account would be established by a deposit of dollars. If you wish to trade in England and make a profit, and put that in your bank, you cannot spend that as you like, I assure you.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am talking now about a situation where a Canadian, an individual or a company, has an account in an English bank. How can that be policed?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It will be policed by the bank, for one.

Mr. Macdonnell: There again the case the minister has made seems slightly different. This is a case which may have some special aspects. The money may have been received for some special purpose. I am talking of the ordinary business transaction. A sale is made in England; a citizen outside of England acquires sterling in England and has it in an English bank. The minister says he cannot use that because of certain restrictions. I am not going to pursue the matter further. I am still surprised.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should like to ask the minister a further question.

Mr. Sinclair: Are we in committee?

Mr. Weir: We are not in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I took it for granted that the house was submitting to these questions by unanimous consent.

Mr. Weir: The answer is no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent we must proceed with the discussion of the motion.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this discussion. It was my intention to say what I have to say on the agriculture estimates, but it seems to me that some things have been said that merit a certain amount of attention.

It must be recognized, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers, the ordinary rank and file farmers on the western plains of Canada, are in open competition with farmers in the United States and in other areas of the world. While this government puts handicaps upon our farmers, the governments of other countries support their farmers with advantages. Therefore it must be obvious that Canadian farmers are on their way to destruction unless something miraculous occurs.

I have several little excerpts which I think I will read for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Philpott) and the others who think that the farmers are asking for something unusually outrageous, and some seem to think that. I hold in my hand the Wheat Pool Budget for April 29, 1955. I am going to read one or two little passages which will show the people of Canada just what is what in the world today in respect of wheat. I quote:

> Wheat Supports
> Over 96 per cent of the world's wheat crop is produced and marketed under price supports or other forms of official incentive and planning, according to a survey made by the United States department of agriculture.

We seem to think that when the farmers here ask for any kind of assistance they are out of bounds. I continue:

> Such measures are in effect in countries producing 6·5 billion of the world's 6·8 billion bushels of wheat last year, and cover virtually all of the wheat moving into international trade.

That is the wheat with which our wheat must compete, with no assistance at all from our government or from anyone else, with handicaps in every direction in the way of shortage of box cars, marketing quotas and all sorts of things. The farmers in the west, in my constituency and in other constituencies, are trying to keep alive under all these handicaps in these terrible times, with the prices of everything they buy up, with machinery prices going up and with credit restrictions placed on them. I do not see why the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot visualize this sort of thing. Would to goodness he could be out there on a farm for 15 years so he could learn something about the realities of farming, instead of sitting idly here and listening to other people's comments. I do not want to be too hard on him, but I do not want him to be too hard on the farmers, either.

Let me give another quotation farther down the page:

> In most cases, including France, the United States and Argentina, this involves an export subsidy.

That refers to the assistance. The comment is made:

> It should be noted that in Canada no such subsidy is paid on exports.

Let the minister face that set of circumstances as a businessman. He makes beautiful, plausible speeches here that are just as false as falsehood itself when applied to actual reality.

Let me read another quotation from the Alberta Wheat Pool Budget of April 22, 1955:

> United States Exports Subsidies
> Selling American surpluses is an expensive business, reports the international federation of agricultural producers. A study of the cost to the American government and the price it gets in the world market for wheat indicates a heavy loss is sustained on each deal under the United States surplus disposal program.
> In the case of wheat sold to Yugoslavia recently, the United States got a little more than $1.80 a bushel in terms of Yugoslav currency. For that same bushel, the cost to the Commodity Credit Corporation amounted to $3.20. That includes the support price it gave for the wheat and storage costs. Consequently on each bushel of wheat sent to Yugoslavia, the United States lost $1.40. This does not count the cost of ocean transportation paid by Commodity Credit Corporation, or the difference involved in accepting local currency instead of dollars.

I sympathize with the minister when he says we in Canada do not feel that we can go any further in all these supports, but what does he think the farmer is doing? He imagines that the western farmer is performing all sorts of miracles, and at the same time he must pay his income tax, all his bills, raise his family, and do every other thing that needs to be done. I absolutely marvel at the unreality of the attitude adopted by the cabinet ministers.

Before I go on with another subject I want to point out this. I have urged now for two years, Mr. Speaker, that the government adopt a policy under which assistance would be given to the farmers to enable them to build approved storage on their farms, and that when their wheat was stored in that approved storage the government would pay the farmers, or advance a liberal loan of so much a bushel on such wheat. The government said, "We cannot afford it". Well, what about the farmer? I suppose he can afford everything. They take the most preposterous attitude that you can conceive of, these ministers.

Last year I suggested to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that he might take the money out of the Bank of Canada with which to build the storage for the farmers and pay an advance on the wheat. The minister simply replied that the Bank of Canada, poor little thing, could not stand the strain. But the individual farmer can stand it. How do members of the government get sense out of their position? If they would adopt this method of farm storage—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

WESTSPUR PIPE LINE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 283, to incorporate Westspur Pipe Line Company, —Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the house on second reading, and again when it was before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, the point was raised as to the propriety of passing an act to incorporate a company with a clause or provision in the act permitting the construction of pipe lines for the transmission of gas outside of Canada. That point was discussed at some length in the committee. I am now instructed by the persons seeking incorporation to consent to a provision going into the bill which would have the effect of limiting the right to construct the main gas pipe lines to Canada. I accordingly propose, when we come to clause 6 of the bill, to ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment that will accomplish this purpose.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—Power to construct and operate pipe lines.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I think the purpose I outlined when we were dealing with clause 1 can most appropriately be dealt with by an amendment to clause 6(a) of the bill. The following words appear in line 29 of page 2 of the bill: "gaseous hydrocarbons". The insertion of the following words—> provided that the main pipe line or main pipe lines for the transmission of gaseous hydrocarbons shall be located entirely within Canada.

—at that point would accomplish the purpose. Perhaps the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) would move accordingly.

Mr. Jutras: I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: The amendment is:

> That clause 6(a) of the bill be amended by adding after the words "gaseous hydrocarbons", in line 29 thereof, the following words:
> provided that the main pipe line or main pipe lines for the transmission of gaseous hydrocarbons shall be located entirely within Canada.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support this amendment. We could have saved a good deal of time in the committee last week if the hon. member who is piloting this bill through the house and his colleagues had been as reasonable as they are now. I think the amendment is supporting a well-established principle which certainly should have been taken for granted without any long discussion in the committee. I am very glad to support it at this stage.

Mr. McIlraith: I think perhaps I ought to explain to the committee that in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines the proposed amendments were on somewhat wider lines. The amendments proposed did interfere with the pipe lines use for the transportation of oil. That is the significance of the attitude taken in that committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR FAIR ALLOCATION OF BOX CARS

The house resumed, from Friday, May 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Argue for the second reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock last Friday I was discussing the portion of the bill having to do with the principle of giving the farmers the opportunity of delivering to the elevators of their choice. I had drawn attention to the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce appeared to have taken the attitude that because this bill was contrary to what he termed Liberal philosophy, he would ask members on his side of the house to oppose it. I am wondering if that does not indicate the pattern of opposition to the idea of co-operative selling of the farmers' products. I drew attention to the fact that the wheat board itself could be termed a co-operative effort, as opposed to the competitive method of disposing of the farmers' grain.

In this bill, even though, as I said, I personally favour the co-operative method of disposing of farm products, as I am sure a great many other members do, we are not asking that the farmer-owned elevators be given any priority or any advantage. All the bill is asking is that they be given an opportunity to do business with their patrons on an equal basis with other elevator companies. Under the present circumstances there is discrimination against the farmer-owned elevators because of the fact that they are not able to obtain the box cars necessary to accommodate all the farmers who wish to do business with them.

I should like to point out that they should be given that opportunity not only as a matter of equity, but also because the wheat pools have performed a distinct service to the wheat producers of western Canada over the years. Those who are familiar with the wheat pool system will realize that they have actually saved many millions of dollars by the co-operative handling of the grain for the producers.

I am deeply concerned about the attitude which the government from time to time takes in the matter of co-operatives. I should like to draw attention to several statements that were made by Mr. Staples, who is president of the Co-operative Union of Canada, when he spoke at the forty-sixth annual convention in Saskatoon recently. In referring to the attitude of the government to co-operatives generally he termed it as "no more than half-hearted support". Later on he stated that the government has a tendency——to minimize the differences between co-operatives and profit-seeking businesses to a point where co-operatives are forced to fit themselves into a mold which they cannot fit and hold to their true pattern.

Furthermore, he pointed out that this indifference and half-hearted support that the government shows——could very easily become outright opposition as it has on occasion in the past.

This gentleman speaks on behalf of the Co-operative Union of Canada, which embraces a membership of over three-quarters of a million persons. His words should be given the weight they deserve. If he is concerned that the tendency or the trend of the government towards the co-operative movement generally is one which may become outright opposition, as it has been in the past—

Mr. Studer: Don't be ridiculous. If it were not for this government you would have no co-operative movement.

Mr. Zaplitny: We have to take into consideration some of the things that have been said by Liberal members in this house on this bill. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) has just made the statement that if it were not for this government there would not be any co-operatives. That is the kind of statement, of course, we have come to expect from the hon. member.

Mr. Studer: It is true.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: But the hon. member was not in this house in 1946 or 1947.

Mr. Studer: They were here long before that.

Mr. Zaplitny: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Studer: They were here before the socialists were.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was simply trying to enlighten the hon. member, if he will allow me to do so. In 1946 or 1947—I forget the exact year—the minister of finance of that day introduced an income tax act which, if it had passed in that form, would have been instrumental in practically wiping out the co-operatives in this country. If the hon. member had been here at that time he would have seen that it was the C.C.F. members who fought those provisions and who were successful in having them removed from the act, and he would not be making the statements he is now making.

We had to do that, Mr. Speaker, without any assistance at all from the Liberal members from the province from which the hon. member comes. I would therefore advise him to read the debates of the house and inform himself on these matters before making the kind of statement he has made.

That brings me to the point where the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, in discussing this bill the other day, challenged the mover of this resolution to state who asked him to introduce it. In fact he tried to make quite a big issue out of it, and implied that the hon. member had no right to introduce a bill unless he was specifically asked to do so by some organization.

If we were to accept that philosophy in this house it certainly would mean tying the hands of parliament completely. All the hon. member needs to do is go through Votes and Proceedings and see the large number of motions on the order paper in the name of the government. I doubt if 5 per cent of those motions come as a result of the request of any farm organization or of any organization. The government introduce what they believe should be put on the statute books. Whether he be a cabinet minister or a private member, every hon. member of this house has not only the same privilege but the same responsibility, namely that of introducing in this house what he believes is good for the nation and what is just and equitable. Therefore the hon. member for Assiniboia needs make no apology or explanation to anyone, least of all to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, for having introduced this bill which has met with the approval of farm organizations.

Mr. Studer: Have they asked him to present it?

Mr. Zaplitny: Since the hon. member is so anxious to know whether the wheat pools are in favour of it—

Mr. Studer: No—

An hon. Member: Oh, keep quiet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind interruptions a bit if the hon. member would just make them at a time when I am not speaking, when I am taking a breath. He could get his words in at that time, and then I could hear him. I have no objection to interruptions, but I should like to hear what the hon. member is saying.

I drew attention to the fact that the hon. member wanted to know if farm organizations approved of this bill, and another hon. member across the way—I believe it was the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras)—wanted to know if the farmers in Manitoba are interested in this bill. For the information of these hon. members I should like to put on record some of the letters I have received.

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Certainly.

Mr. Studer: What farm organization asked him or the mover of this bill to present this bill to the House of Commons? I do not want to know what farmers are in favour of it. I want to know what farm organizations did that. They say the farm organizations represent the farmers of this country. If those farm organizations speak for the farmers of this country, then which of them asked the hon. member to present this bill?

Mr. Ellis: Which organization told you to oppose it?

Mr. Studer: Let the hon. member answer first; then I will answer.

Mr. Ellis: Who told you to oppose it?

Mr. Studer: I was not elected to vote for socialism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I think perhaps the time has come when I should mention to hon. members that while these spontaneous interruptions are more or less part of our parliamentary practice, they can be carried to excess. I think the hon. member who has the floor should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure you that I have no objection to questions, provided they are asked in an orderly fashion. The hon. member has repeated his question. I think the interjection made by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Ellis) is very much in order.

Mr. Studer: I shall answer the question.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Studer: I wish to answer the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. I do not think it really matters how strong our feeling is; the fact is that neither the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek nor the hon. member for Regina City has the floor and they cannot be permitted, at this stage, to ask and answer questions of each other. I would ask the hon. member for Dauphin to proceed.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am trying extremely hard to oblige the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, but he does not give me an opportunity to do so. I think the question asked by the hon. member for Regina City is a more important one, namely who asked the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek or the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the hon. member for Provencher to oppose this bill.

Mr. Studer: May I answer that question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Ellis: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order. Let us clarify this matter right now. Let me make it clear that if during the course of his remarks the hon. member for Dauphin says something which it is considered by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek or others requires a personal explanation, the Chair will see that an opportunity to make that personal explanation is given at the conclusion of the hon. member's speech. In the meantime the hon. member for Dauphin should be allowed to continue without interruption.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that ruling is very fair. I was going to place on record some of the replies I have received from co-operative associations or wheat pool associations in my constituency in Manitoba who have read the bill. I sent a copy of the bill to them and asked for their opinions on it. I think it would be perfectly fair to all those who are interested in the matter to know what the attitude was.

For example, I have received one letter signed by Mr. F. C. McBurney, manager of the Dauphin co-operative elevator association. May I point out that this is one of the large co-operative associations in Manitoba. As a matter of fact, in our part of Manitoba we have, I believe, the greatest concentration of pool elevators per mile in any other part of the province. Therefore they speak with a certain amount of authority on behalf of the farmers. The letter is in these terms:

Dear Sir:

I have been instructed by the president and directors of the Dauphin co-operative elevator association to reply to your recent letter on Bill 22 re the allocation of box cars.

The directors of the above association are very pleased that you and your colleagues are taking such a stand in introducing this bill before parliament.

I think that is an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek. The letter continues, and I think this part will answer some of the other questions:

The Dauphin co-operative elevator association feel that during the past eight or ten years they have lost many thousands of bushels of grain business due to congestion and lack of a fair share of box cars in proportion to the number of customers they have or could have if elevator space would permit. Also we are quite sure that Bill 22 is a step in the right direction for western farmers as a whole.

May I thank you for interest in this matter on behalf of the board of directors.

That shows the attitude of the Dauphin co-operative elevator association, one of the largest and most successful ones in the province of Manitoba. Then I have another letter. It is from the Grand View co-operative elevator association. It is signed by Alex Morran and reads as follows:

In regards to the distribution of box cars, at a meeting of the board of directors of Grand View co-operative elevator association I was instructed to write you that a resolution was passed and the board is in full support of Bill 22.

I have other letters from associations at Oak River, Manitoba; Fork River, Manitoba, and other points in my constituency with which I shall not burden Hansard.

I think that is a perfectly good reply to the question of who wants the bill presented in the house. The wheat pool associations themselves, which after all handle the farmers' grain, which are on the ground floor and know the situation, have stated their full support for the bill. They have stated they have lost a considerable amount of business because they are not able to obtain their fair share of box cars which they need in order to accommodate all the farmers who wish to do business with them. In a situation of that kind I think it is a little impertinent for the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek to jump up half a dozen times and ask the mover of the bill who asked him to present it.

That is not the question. The question is whether this is a proper provision so far as the distribution of box cars is concerned. Is this something which will assist the farmer-owned elevators and others to accommodate customers? Is it fair and just? If it is, there is no reason whatsoever for any member of the house representing a rural constituency to try to wriggle his way out of supporting the bill by bringing up phony issues and making phony excuses such as have been put forward by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

I do not think that kind of thing will do, because we have just about reached the limit in that regard. If it is the South Saskatchewan dam there is one excuse. If it is distribution of box cars there is another excuse. There are always excuses why they cannot vote for these things. I think the time has come when each private member of the house has to take full responsibility for his actions. I believe the farmers and the people of Canada generally are getting a little fed up with the government telling its supporters that they must oppose this or oppose that because it is a matter of a vote of confidence or something of that nature.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ellis: It hurts, doesn't it?

Mr. Tucker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ellis: You cannot take it.

Mr. Sinclair: Keep that foghorn quiet.

Mr. Tucker: —the hon. member has suggested that the government has been telling members on this side of the house they have to vote in a certain way. That is absolutely untrue. I have been a member of the house for 15 years, and on no occasion has the government ever indicated to me that I was to vote in a certain way. Therefore what the hon. member has said is completely and utterly untrue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I made a statement from the chair some time last week that a question of personal privilege could not arise because any one group of members felt they had been attacked in a debate. I am still of the opinion that the question is a matter of debate. The hon. member may feel very strongly upon the subject and may feel the statement should be answered, but in my opinion it is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Dickey: He is used to regimentation in his own party.

Mr. Zaplitny: In reply to the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) may I say that if what he says is true, and of course I accept his statement that he has not been instructed by the government to oppose the bill, he has even less excuse for doing so and therefore should support it.

Mr. Dickey: His excuse is good judgment.

Mr. Zaplitny: If he had been instructed to oppose it on the basis of it being against government policy he would at least have that excuse, but now he has not even that excuse.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the hon. member is undertaking to represent my position in this matter, and now he has certainly touched on a question of personal privilege with which I surely have a right to deal. He is suggesting that if I have not been instructed by the government the only thing I can do is accept the position he has taken. I suggest there is a difference between my voting confidence in the government according to my judgment and being told that I must do so. I should like to point out to the hon. member that when members on this side of the house, in the exercise of their conscientious judgment, differ with their party, they are not expelled from the party.

Mr. Fulton: How would we know? You have never disagreed.

An hon. Member: Oh, yes, he did.

Mr. Zaplitny: I see no reason at all for the hon. member's great agitation. I simply said that if the hon. member was not instructed to oppose the bill—

Mr. Jutras: Why not speak for yourself?

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Zaplitny: I am doing that at the moment.

An hon. Member: Let us get down to wheat.

Mr. Zaplitny: I want to be perfectly fair. I was proceeding to make my point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Zaplitny: I was proceeding to present my argument in a mild way when hon. members began to pop up on questions of privilege and interrupt my speech. They are the ones who started the argument, and if they will bear themselves with patience I think we can finish it. The hon. member for Rosthern objects to the fact that I asked him to take a stand on the bill. He again dragged in the question of a vote of confidence.

Mr. Tucker: Again on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tucker: —the hon. member has misrepresented my position. I do not object to his suggesting that I should vote on the bill as I think right. I objected to his suggestion that the government has dictated to members on this side of the house how they should vote. The hon. member should not misrepresent what I said.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, after the kind of speech the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made yesterday on another question—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Order.

Mr. Zaplitny: —I leave it to the judgment of the house who was being instructed to do what. As to the hon. member's attitude with respect to this bill, may I point out that it does not involve a vote of confidence. It is an amendment of the Canada Grain Act, and certainly the government has not stated that it will stand or fall on this bill. Therefore I think on this occasion all members of all parties, including Liberal members from the prairies, are perfectly free to vote as they feel the merits of the bill require. If they are opposed to the distribution of box cars on the basis of the producers' choice, if they are opposed to the co-operative principle in the marketing of grain, then of course they will vote against the bill. Then we shall know where they stand. We shall know they are out for the competitive system which was condemned by the farmers when the wheat board was established. We shall know who are on the side of the grain producers and who are on the side of the grain trade.

The issue will be clear. Let them not make any phony excuses. It is not a vote of confidence, and they say they have not been instructed to oppose the bill, though it sounded so to me when the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke. Apparently they are not taking instructions from him and are free to vote for the bill or oppose it.

But let the matter be clear. The bill is being supported by the farmer-owned elevators which understand the trade and have a duty toward the producers, who are the actual owners of the handling facilities. If the members who support the government feel the farmers should not receive this consideration, then they will oppose the bill; but of course they will have to answer for their actions when they are asked by the farmers why they felt the bill should not be passed and why they opposed the fair distribution of box cars in order to give the farmer-owned elevator companies an opportunity to provide facilities for their customers.

Mr. Studer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes.

Mr. Studer: Which farm organization asked the hon. member for Assiniboia to present this bill on behalf of the farmers of western Canada? I should like to add the statement that of the 25,000 voters in my constituency, not one has ever asked me at any time to vote for a socialist bill.

Mr. Zaplitny: In reply to the hon. member may I say the hon. member for Assiniboia is perfectly within his rights and responsibilities as a member of parliament—

Mr. Studer: Name the farm organization.

Mr. Zaplitny: —in introducing a bill which is in the public interest. With respect to the hon. member not being asked to vote for what he calls a socialist bill, I imagine his constituents know by now that there is no use asking him because he would not do it.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): My job has been made quite easy, Mr. Speaker, because my colleagues have pretty well expressed my sentiments. However, if I do not get up and say something somebody might say I was not in favour of this bill. I am in favour of this bill and I think some hon. members will recall that a number of years ago I took up this same subject with Mr. McIvor when he attended the agriculture committee. I feel that I, as a co-operator, should not be compelled to sell my grain to another elevator. I should be able to go to the elevator of my choice, just as the man who is against the co-operative movement and wants to sell to a private elevator should have that right.

Mr. Studer: How many bushels did you sell last year?

Mr. Bryce: I cannot answer the hon. gentleman just now because I have reached the stage where I can hear only on one side.

I do not want to take up much more time. Everything has been said that can be said. I have had letters from people who expressed views in favour of this bill. There may be little drawbacks to it, but the main thing is that where there are five or six elevators at one point the local train might leave a box car at each elevator. We might have a situation where one of the elevators would be doing 50 per cent of the business. I think it is reasonable to expect that that elevator should get 50 per cent of the box cars, irrespective of what type of elevator it is. Being a Scotsman it goes against the grain for me to sell wheat to a private elevator, because I receive no dividend. I want to sell my grain to an elevator from which I receive dividends.

Mr. A. M. Campbell (The Battlefords): There are a few figures I want to put on the record. First I want to say that the farmers have built up their own elevator system over the years, and they have put a lot of money and a lot of effort into it. They are seeing the results of those efforts being gradually whittled away.

In order to give the house an idea of the value of this elevator system owned by the farmers I want to put a few figures on the record. These figures relate to the distribution of earnings by the wheat pool in Saskatchewan during the years 1924 to 1954. A total of $61,888,280 in net earnings has been distributed since the organization was formed. Of this, $36,216,719 has been paid out in cash and $6,026,983 has been retained as a loan and credited to members. Then $19,644,578 was used to pay off the 1929-30 pool overpayment liability. In short, in the past 30 years wheat pool members have invested a total of $24,924,010 in their organization, but during the same period they have received back from earnings $36,216,719 in cash. They own assets which have been purchased by the pool at a cost of $51,042,712.

Now, to give the house a little idea of what has been taking place during recent years because pool elevators were not able to get enough box cars, I want to give a few more figures. Before doing so, I want to say that this bill will not harm the line elevator agent who has built up a business over the years, partly because of his popularity and partly because of the different methods he has used to get a share of the business.

Here is an illustration of what has happened to deliveries to pool elevators. I am going to take a few points in Saskatchewan. Over the five-year period from 1945 to 1950 the pool elevator at Sedley received 39 per cent of the grain. In 1953-54 it only received 19 per cent. At Hardy, Saskatchewan, in the same period, 1945-50, the pool elevator received 85 per cent of the deliveries. Last year it only received 35 per cent.

I could go on and on giving more illustrations all over our province. I believe the same thing is happening in Manitoba and Alberta. I am supporting this bill because I have received probably hundreds of letters from farmers in my constituency who have asked me to raise this question on the floor of the house.

Mr. A. M. Nicholson (Mackenzie): No subject has brought as many letters to my office, Mr. Speaker, as the question of the allocation of box cars. I understand that the minister has been obliged to take on additional stenographic help to handle the very large volume of mail he has received on this subject. I shall be very brief. One letter expresses the problem. This letter is from Fred Lowndes, of Kelvington, Saskatchewan. It is dated March 29, and reads as follows:

> I wish most vigorously to protest against the present method of car allocation. As a member of the Saskatchewan wheat pool I feel that at present we are definitely being discriminated against. In early fall our elevator fills up within a few days while the line elevators still have lots of room. When they also become full it is back to the one car one elevator system. Economic pressure then forces loyal pool members to deliver to line elevators.
> If the line elevators cannot stand on their own feet, they should be honest enough to ask for a federal subsidy, and not be spoon fed under our so-called car distribution system.

I feel that the members of the wheat pool are being quite reasonable when they ask that box cars be allocated in such a manner as to enable producers to deliver grain to the elevator of their choice. As my colleague the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Campbell) pointed out, if over the years a line elevator agent has built up support in a community to the point where he is handling 50 per cent of the grain in that community, then he should have 50 per cent of the box cars. If, however, he has been able to get only 25 per cent of the grain that normally comes into the community, he is not in any position to ask for 50 per cent of the box cars.

The members of the wheat pool are quite reasonable in asking that they should have the privilege of delivering their own grain to their own elevator so they can receive the dividends which will come to them as a result of that volume of business. I hope the majority of members in all sections of the house will support this motion.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): If the hon. member speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I have been very surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who introduced this bill, has not seen fit to answer the question directed to him by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. Argue: Would the hon. member like me to answer that question now?

Mr. Tucker: You can answer when I get through. You had many opportunities to answer it. The hon. member gave you three or four opportunities to answer it.

Mr. Argue: I will answer it now if you wish me to do so.

Mr. Tucker: You will have a chance to answer when I get through. If the hon. member had the support of any farm organization which asked him to introduce the measure, he should have so stated when he spoke.

It is a most astonishing thing, when farm organizations have indicated they are making submissions in this matter, when they have indicated that they intend to make submissions before the committee on agriculture, and when we are expecting to hear those representations, to have the hon. member for Assiniboia rush in with a bill which he admits, in at least one substantial particular, is quite different from what the wheat pools would like to have. He wants the house to vote on the matter before we have a chance to hear from the wheat pools and the other farm organizations.

Well, that may be the way members of the C.C.F. party think business should be done, but it seems to me the proper attitude would be that members should not be expected to vote on this matter until they have had a chance to hear what the various farm organizations think about this bill. The hon. member knows very well that the wheat pools intend to make representations on this matter before the committee on agriculture. Knowing that, why is he so anxious to have a vote on this bill before representatives of the wheat pools have had a chance to make their representations? Why is he so anxious to have the principle of the bill decided by the house before the farm organizations can be heard?

It seems to me the hon. member is taking a most surprising attitude toward those farm organizations. He admits that his bill differs from what the wheat pools would like to have, but he brushes that aside as a matter of no consequence. Let me read to the house what the hon. member for Assiniboia had to say about the difference between his bill and what the wheat pools would like to have. As reported at page 3410 of Hansard he said:

> The only real difference I can see between the bill that is now before the house and the proposition advanced by the western wheat pools is that by my bill the farmers would vote by open ballot, whereas the wheat pools are suggesting that the choice be made by secret ballot.

Here is the hon. member for Assiniboia getting up in the House of Commons and admitting that the wheat pools want to have something different from what is contained in the bill he is offering.

Mr. Argue: Read the next sentence.

Mr. Tucker: I have read what you said.

Mr. Argue: Read the next sentence.

Mr. Tucker:

> If the government is prepared to adopt the suggestion of the wheat pool organization, I for one shall be pleased to support it.

What the hon. member is asking the house to do is endorse the principle of his bill, knowing that once the principle had been decided the matter could not be reconsidered at this session.

Mr. Argue: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Tucker: I did not interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking. However, I can understand that he would be very uneasy when it is being made very clear that he is bringing in a bill that is substantially different from what the great pool organizations in western Canada would like to have.

Mr. Argue: The principle is identical.

Mr. Tucker: Had he not been so anxious to rush into this matter and pose as the great defender of the farmers in western Canada; had he been content to wait until the farm organizations appeared before the committee on agriculture and indicated the kind of bill they would like to have, it would have been different. But he has the temerity to come into this House of Commons with a bill of his own, which he admits is different from what the wheat pools want. He admits that; but then he says, "Vote for my bill anyway; because if later on the government wants something different, then I would be willing to accept that, too."

What sort of way is that to approach parliament? He suggests that hon. members should vote for something the pools do not favour, and adds that later on they may take a different position. Surely that is not the way we in this parliament should be asked to transact our business. Surely the right way to do business is to hear first from the wheat pools, as to whether they think the hon. member's bill offers the proper way to proceed, and whether it is workable. Then it will be time enough to say whether the bill merits support, or whether a measure such as is indicated by the wheat pools and other farm organizations should be introduced.

Personally I would feel much safer supporting a bill brought in by the farm organizations than I would in supporting one brought in by a C.C.F. member, who is content to rush in with a bill so he will be ahead of the pool organizations, who will be appearing before the committee on agriculture. The hon. member rushes in and tries to get his bill before the House of Commons before those representatives have had a chance to be heard by the committee.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): You know what the farmers did to you out in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Tucker: I know this, that I have been elected a greater number of times, by far, than the hon. member who has just spoken.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Possibly; but you were also thrown out of the leadership in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Tucker: I had no difficulty in being elected to either the federal house or the provincial legislature, in spite of all the misrepresentations bandied around the province of Saskatchewan by members of the C.C.F. party. And let me tell the hon. member that they came so close to being beaten in 1948 that they have been nervous ever since.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Is that why you left?

Mr. Tucker: And I can well appreciate what was said this afternoon by the leader of the Social Credit party, when he referred to members of the C.C.F. posing as the great defenders of the farmers and the great defenders of labour, as indicating that they are uneasy and feel that they are slipping, that they are on their way out as a major political factor in this country.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Go back to Saskatchewan and tell them that.

Mr. Tucker: I was going to deal with this question, which the hon. member for Assiniboia brushes off as having no importance, when he said:

> The only real difference I can see between the bill that is now before the house and the proposition advanced by the western wheat pools is that by my bill the farmers would vote by open ballot, whereas the wheat pools are suggesting that the choice be made by secret ballot.

In other words the hon. member is saying, in effect, "Here is my bill; this is the one I want to have adopted". And he says we should vote for it although the wheat pools say they would like to have this matter decided by secret ballot. Under the hon. member's bill they would not have that right of secret ballot at all.

I am not surprised when I see the great leaders of the wheat pools in western Canada taking a democratic attitude, and pointing out that in a question of this kind decisions should be made by secret ballot. Neither am I surprised to see the hon. member for Assiniboia, speaking for the C.C.F. party, brush that suggestion aside as one of no importance whatever. By saying, "By my bill they are not permitted to decide by secret ballot," he asks the House of Commons to endorse the view that the secret ballot should not be used.

So far as I am concerned I would rather stand with the wheat pools, when they say the decision should be made by secret ballot, than with the hon. member for Assiniboia and his C.C.F. colleagues who say the right of secret ballot should not be allowed.

Mr. Campbell: How could you vote secretly?

Mr. Tucker: The wheat pools have asked for that, and the hon. member for The Battlefords now asks how it could be done. I presume when the wheat pools made this request they must have had some idea how it could be done. They are not the kind of people who make suggestions that are not feasible, or that would be considered foolish. I have no doubt in the world that it can be done by secret ballot, perhaps by the farmers sending in their ballots by mail, if necessary, indicating where they want to deliver their grain. That ballot could be secret, just as the votes for delegates to the wheat pools are secret and by mail.

Mr. Campbell: They could not be secret if they went through the mail.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am wondering whether I should not rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Tucker: I do not know why it could not be secret if it went through the mails. We have what is supposed to be a secret ballot in Saskatchewan, where people vote in provincial elections by sending their ballots through the mails. They insist that it is a secret ballot. I am very interested in the hon. member's suggestion that after all it is not a secret ballot in the province of Saskatchewan because these ballots must go through the mail. If it is all right to conduct voting for members of the legislature by mail ballot, surely it is all right to do as the pool suggests in this matter.

Mr. Campbell: This ballot would have to have a signature on it. It would not be secret.

Mr. Tucker: I will explain to the hon. member just how it could be a secret ballot. The ballot could be put in an envelope without any identifying marks on it at all, and that envelope could be placed within another envelope which could be absolutely identified as having been cast by a person entitled to vote. When the outer envelope was opened, it could be checked to see that the person who sent in the vote had a right to vote, and then they could take the inner envelope and without opening it put it in a ballot box.

If it were done in that way it would be entirely secret. In balloting for members of the legislature in Saskatchewan they do not even have that. Still I think it is pretty well a secret ballot. The ballot is contained in an envelope, and scrutineers are there when the envelope is opened. The ballot is then taken out without being looked at and put in the ballot box and counted afterward. In that way it is a secret ballot. When the pools ask for something along that line I presume they think it is the sort of thing that is workable.

Mr. Ellis: Why does the government not bring in a bill along the lines of the recommendation of the wheat pool?

Mr. Tucker: On that question my attitude is this, Mr. Speaker. After the matter has been thoroughly threshed out before the agriculture committee the government, the committee and all concerned will have had a chance to thoroughly discuss the matter and decide on any scheme that seems to be satisfactory to everybody and workable. After all, the government is the author of the Canada Grain Act, which is regarded by the farmers of western Canada as a real charter of their liberties in grain marketing matters. At the last agriculture committee meeting representatives of farm organizations said the Canada Grain Act is so satisfactory they did not wish to suggest any major amendments to it. The government can be relied upon, if some good program that meets the situation can be brought forward, with the assistance of the farm organizations to bring in a better bill than this one, which seeks to rush in ahead of the representatives of the farm organizations.

Mr. Campbell: We shall hold you to that.

An hon. Member: Just excuses.

Mr. Tucker: I am used to the attitude of the C.C.F. party. If I had not been fairly well able to put up with a great deal of misrepresentation and unfair abuse I would not be here today.

Mr. Ellis: Cry-baby tactics.

Mr. Tucker: I tell my hon. friends opposite that what they can do here with a little group in this house is nothing compared to what they can do in the legislature with a large majority behind them. I had no difficulty in saying what I thought was right, and upholding what I thought was right, in the legislature, and I think I can do it in this house where they have not a majority and they cannot adopt the attitude that was adopted in that legislature.

The members of the C.C.F. party do not need to think they are bothering me in any way, and they are not going to prevent me from saying what I think is right. I tell them that. I am enjoying the interruptions. I hope they keep it up. If there are any other questions to be asked, let them ask them.

Mr. Campbell: Why did you not stay in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Argue: May I ask my question now?

Mr. Tucker: Yes.

Mr. Argue: Is the hon. member for Rosthern prepared to support a bill if it should be suggested by the wheat pool organization?

Mr. Tucker: I have already stated my position in that regard. I do not wish to take time to go over it again.

Mr. Argue: No commitment.

Mr. Tucker: Let the hon. member read Hansard tomorrow if he did not hear what I said.

Mr. Argue: You did not answer the question.

Mr. Tucker: I certainly stated my position.

Mr. Ellis: Face the facts.

Mr. Tucker: I am tempted to state it again, but there are certain other points I want to deal with.

Mr. Argue: You are not supporting anybody.

Mr. Tucker: I wonder whether the C.C.F. actually would ask hon. members to go against the representations of the pool, which asked for a secret ballot, and vote for a bill that does not provide one. I wonder whether they are really serious in that attitude.

Mr. Ellis: Stick to the main issue.

Mr. Tucker: That is the main issue; it is one of the important parts of the bill.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Did the pool ask you to oppose this?

Mr. Tucker: So far as I am concerned the pool took the attitude that they intend to make representations before the agriculture committee. My answer was that I would do all I could to see to it that the agriculture committee heard their representations, and that is my position. I should like to see the situation kept in such a position that when they come before the agriculture committee it will still be open to them to make representations and the matter will not already have been decided by a vote in this house.

There is another matter which may be affected by this bill, and on which I should like to have the opinion and advice of the farm organizations before I undertake to vote on it.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Tucker: I refer to the car order book system. We all know it is something that was fought for by our great pioneers, who farmed in western Canada over the years, to break the control of the elevator companies over the farmers so they could have the right to order cars and ship either through the elevator of their choice or over the platform, if they so wished.

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Tucker: This particular bill may very well infringe that basic right laid down in the grain act in respect of the car order book, because if you provide that cars must be allotted according to the system laid down in this bill, how then can you obey the act which lays down obligations in regard to the car order book?

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. McIvor: On a point of order, six o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Tucker the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will revert to consideration of the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

Decision of Mr. Speaker

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Lethbridge will be kind enough to allow me, I should like to make some observations with respect to a point which was raised last night in the course of this debate when the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) raised as a grievance the subject matter of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy in the case of Robert Alexander Hoodley.

I indicated at that time that I was not too sure the hon. member could intervene in the debate in this manner, and promised hon. members that I would look into the question further. I left the chair shortly thereafter, and in the few minutes at my disposal before ten o'clock looked up some authorities, which I have indicated at the end of my remarks and which appear in Hansard at page 3825.

These authorities do indicate that the responsibility for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy is that which belongs to the executive when it tenders advice to the representative of the sovereign, but that the sovereign does take part in the deliberations pertaining to such exercise, and indicate also what care one must exercise when it comes to approaching such delicate matters.

This morning I read in Hansard the remarks of the right hon. Prime Minister, who followed the hon. member for Vancouver East. As reported on page 3826 of Hansard the Prime Minister said in his opening remarks:

> Mr. Speaker, a discussion of this kind is quite irregular, and has been refused by Mr. Speaker at Westminster on more than one occasion.

The Prime Minister concluded his remarks by saying:

> There has never been any occasion when there was an attempt by any house of commons, either here or in the United Kingdom, to go behind the exercise of that terrible responsibility we have to discharge.

That suggested to me that I should travel overseas in order to find out what decisions had been made on this very point by Speakers in the United Kingdom House of Commons. I find a decision of recent date by Mr. Speaker Morrison, which appears in volume 510 of parliamentary debates, fifth series, at column 845. The point is debated at great length and Mr. Speaker gives his ruling, and the discussion on that point of the exercise of the royal prerogative is included in columns 845 to 864. Mr. Silverman, a member of the United Kingdom house, had given notice of a motion to go on the order paper which read as follows:

> "That this house respectfully dissents from the opinion of the Home Secretary that there were no sufficient reasons for advising the exercise of the royal clemency in the case of Derek Bentley; and urges him to reconsider the matter so as to give effect to the recommendation of the jury and to the expressed view of the lord chief justice"—who was the trial judge—"that Bentley's guilt was less than that of his co-defendant, Christopher Craig."

Mr. Speaker Morrison did not allow this notice of motion to go on the order paper. Therefore the next day Mr. Silverman raised the matter and questioned the authority of the Speaker in having done so. This matter was fully dealt with by Mr. Speaker Morrison and his action was found to be fully justified, but we will leave aside that particular point. In explaining why he had done that, Mr. Speaker Morrison gave his reason as follows. After having listened to the remarks of Mr. Silverman, who had questioned the authority of the Speaker to have removed his notice of motion bearing on the exercise of the royal prerogative, as I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, as reported in column 849 of the same volume, said:

> I have listened to what the hon. member said, and I fully appreciate the deep feeling that exists in many parts of the country on this matter. I should like to state what my conception of my authority was for taking the action I took. The order paper is a document published by the authority of the house, and the Speaker is charged, among other duties, with doing his best to see that nothing out of order or irregular appears upon it.
> Frequently the Speaker has had to intervene—I have myself—when motions are offered. I have convinced an hon. member that a motion was out of order or taken some action myself.
>
> In this case, the motion of the hon. member, which I saw late last night, dealt with the case of a capital sentence which is still pending, and there is a long line of authorities of all my predecessors saying that, while a capital sentence is pending, the matter should not be discussed in the house.
>
> The hon. member for Nelson and Colne (Mr. S. Silverman) did refer to the general doctrine that any action of a minister, and any responsibility which he exercises departmentally, is one for which he is answerable to the house, but in this particular case of a sentence of a capital character which has not been executed, there is the strongest possible precedent for saying that the house should not discuss it, either by questions, on the motion for the adjournment of the house—

Which here is not debatable; therefore no debate could take place on such a motion here.

> —or by any other means whatsoever. On that there is no doubt at all in my mind; it has been upheld by successive Speakers for a great number of years and I have the precedents here, if the house would like me to refer to them.
> The most recent one is that of Mr. Speaker Clifton Brown. Many hon. members will remember the case of the executions taking place in the Gold Coast, which was not so very long ago—in 1947—and on which Mr. Speaker Clifton Brown then ruled. He was asked for a definite ruling, and he used these words:

"I would point out that, in my ruling of 10th March, I was dealing with the particular case of persons under sentence of death on the Gold Coast. My remarks were, therefore, directed to the question of the prerogative of mercy in the case of persons under sentence of death. It was the sentence of death that I had in mind when I said, by way of supplement to my ruling, that the Home Secretary could not be challenged on the advice he had given to His Majesty until after the sentence had been executed. This rule is, of course, not applicable to sentences of imprisonment. The practice of the house makes a complete distinction between capital sentences and other forms of punishment, so far as the prerogative of mercy is concerned. Whereas the remission of a sentence of imprisonment, for example, can be urged upon a minister at any time after its imposition, a capital sentence cannot be raised in question or debate while the sentence is pending. After it has been executed the minister responsible may be criticized on a relevant vote in supply or on the adjournment. I have stated that that is the practice of the house, and I cannot alter the practice of the house . . ."

Mr. Speaker Morrison was quoting from the official report of 1st May, 1947, volume 436, columns 2180 and 2181. He concludes his ruling as follows:

Neither can I.

He means "alter the practice of the house".

The notice of motion, as it was submitted to me last night, was notice of a debate which would be wholly out of order and a debate which could not take place. It was therefore my view, in the circumstances, and acting under my duty, that this notice should not appear on the order paper because it was one which could not be debated in the House of Commons.

Now I come back to a part of this ruling which I think is very important to bear in mind. It was when Mr. Speaker Morrison said:

. . . but in this particular case of a sentence of a capital character which has not been executed, there is the strongest possible precedent for saying that the house should not discuss it, either by questions on the motion for the adjournment of the house or by any other means whatsoever.

I urge hon. members to read the whole debate which took place on that occasion in the House of Commons in the United Kingdom and which, as I said, appears in this volume 510 of debates on January 27, 1953, at columns 845 to 864. The case involved in this ruling is similar to that which was raised last night by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). Considering that we do not have any precise rules on the point by our house, by virtue of our standing order 1 we can always refer to rulings which are tendered in the House of Commons in the United Kingdom. I am placing this on the record for future guidance in these cases.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether Your Honour would permit just one question. It is one that you could perhaps answer outside the house rather than tonight. Has Your Honour found any Canadian decision comparable to the one you have given us from the British house?

Mr. Speaker: I have found no cases where the matter of the exercise of the royal prerogative was criticized or debated in the house in the manner in which that was done last night by the hon. member for Vancouver East. There were questions addressed to the ministry, and perhaps in certain cases notices of motions for the production of papers, which have always been refused because all correspondence pertaining to these matters are of a privileged and confidential character. There was a notice of motion, including such a case, proposed in 1917 and which is to be found at page 1018, May 2, 1917, debates volume I. Mr. Speaker Rhodes ruled it out of order on the ground suggested by the then minister of justice and also on the ground of anticipation. The debate appears at pages 1018 to 1023 of volume I, debates 1917. See also May's fifteenth edition, page 437.

WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT, 1953-54

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was dealing briefly with certain matters which had been mentioned in the debate on wheat this afternoon. I had referred to certain remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, and had indicated that I proposed to deal with what he had said. May I now keep that promise for a few minutes.

The hon. member for Vancouver South had done me the honour of noticing that in previous years I had said that it would be feasible and sound, in certain circumstances, for the Dominion of Canada to advance money to Britain, or to other countries, with which Britain or those other countries might buy Canadian wheat. This appeared to the hon. member for Vancouver South rather extreme use of the credit of Canada.

I will not enter into the matter to any great extent at the present time. I merely choose to refer to the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933, dealing with the work done under the Finance Act of 1914 by Sir Thomas White. I think the hon. member for Vancouver South will find there all the evidence he needs upon which to exercise his mind. From page 22 of that report, paragraph 47, I read as follows:

In the war session of August, 1914, parliament raised the partially covered issue to $50 million.

Now note these words particularly.

Subsequently an issue of $16 million was made against a deposit of railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government, as well as an uncovered issue of $10 million for governmental purposes.

And then note these words:

> In 1917 an emergency issue of $50 million of dominion notes was made to finance war purchases in Canada, by the British government. The notes were secured by imperial treasury bills.

If I may, I should like to stop and discuss that matter for a moment. It is quite obvious that, in effect, the treasury of the Dominion of Canada created $50 million of bills and just as good as sent them to Great Britain, with which Great Britain could buy agricultural products in Canada. It was done.

I would now say this. If the Bank of Canada today cannot be used just as effectively, in such a situation, as was the Finance Act of 1914, it is time we re-enacted the Finance Act of 1914. For anyone to tell us that this financial transaction was in any way unsound would be for him to indicate a great deal less understanding of finance than a member of this house ought to have. When we remember that in those days the over-all production of Canada would not be any more than perhaps $4 billion a year, and that the gross national production of Canada this year is expected to be $26 billion —when we bear those facts in mind we shall readily realize that a great amount of money could now be created by Canada and advanced to any country to which she chose to advance it, to be used in purchasing Canadian goods.

People may say that is just the same as though we issued money in Canada and bought the goods ourselves. I will grant that. Why not? If the goods and services in the market in Canada are adequate and would absorb this money, the money can do no possible harm whatsoever.

Let me draw attention to one more aspect of this question. Suppose we were selling $100 million worth of wheat to France and were taking in exchange $100 million worth of French wine, silks and other products of France. Suppose France was not going to be able to deliver those goods to us for, let us say, some two months or three months. Would our people in Canada be obliged to wait those two or three months until the French goods reached Canada before they could receive payment for their wheat or other goods? Obviously not. What would be the technical financial operation under the circumstances? In effect, some financial agency representing the Dominion of Canada or some organization empowered by that body would create the money, buy the wheat or the other goods, and send it over to France. Then when the French goods got to Canada the money would be cancelled and the whole transaction would be completed. This may sound a little strange, but in these dangerous years I think it is time we recalled this kind of transaction and reflected upon the advisability of using it.

May I now turn to page 85 of the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, published in 1933, and read a passage from the memorandum of dissent by Sir Thomas White, who was the finance minister of Canada all during world war I and who consequently knew as much about Canadian finance as probably any man who was ever in Canadian public life. I am going to read just a sentence or two. He says:

> In respect of these advances to the British government—

He is there referring to advances other than that $50 million advance to which I referred.

> —aggregating more than twelve hundred million dollars it is to be observed that conversely that government made advances in sterling in London to the Canadian government to meet the expenditures of the latter in maintaining the Canadian forces abroad.

I think no comment is necessary with respect to that statement. It indicates that, during world war I, over $1,200 million was issued by the Canadian government and advanced to Great Britain so that Britain might buy Canadian goods. I see no reason why this kind of procedure cannot now be followed in connection with marketing our wheat where we need to market it, in Britain or in any one of several other nations. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver South is not in his seat. I trust that at some future time he will raise this matter again if it is not clear in his mind.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak on a different matter from that which has been the topic of discussion so far today. I wish it were within my parliamentary right to answer some of the things the hon. member for Vancouver South said this afternoon. We have been discussing the wheat situation, and I want to refer to another matter of serious concern to the people of western Canada, the flood conditions in that area and particularly in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Speaker: May I interrupt the hon. member to ask him if he has not already spoken on this question during the budget debate? If not, I apologize for interrupting him, but I know several speeches were made on the flood situation in Saskatchewan during the budget debate. My recollection is that the hon. member took part in that debate and touched upon this subject matter. If that is not so, I apologize for interrupting him.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I mentioned the flood situation in Saskatchewan during the budget debate, but I take it I now have the right to bring up as a grievance the condition now existing in Saskatchewan. On that basis I want to say that Saskatchewan has had a double-barrelled disaster. First we are faced—

Mr. Byrne: The first was electing the C.C.F.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): —with falling farm prices. In addition, we have been hit by an unprecedented storm which has resulted in widespread chaos in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the remarks of the hon. member which are to be found at page 3699 of Hansard of May 12. He spoke at some length on flood conditions in Saskatchewan, the same subject on which he has now indicated it is his intention to speak.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, unless you are going to rule me out of order I intend to put certain facts on record regarding this most serious situation. In 1953 and 1954 Saskatchewan was faced with precipitation in the form of snow and rain 150 per cent above normal. I have here a graph indicating the seriousness of the condition. It shows the normal median stream flow in one of the important Saskatchewan rivers, the Assiniboine, and indicates that the river has had a flow 900 per cent above normal. In addition the natural drainage basins in Saskatchewan are full, and the present situation is not normal.

The Saskatchewan government is prepared to take care of normal drainage in the province. In 1949 an act was passed in the province known as the conservation and development act, under which a conservation and development board was established. To date the province has expended through the board $2,424,000. As I stated at the beginning, the situation resulting from the recent storm is one which is unprecedented in any part of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member again, but I have looked at his remarks which appear at pages 3699 and 3700 of Hansard, and I find that at that time he did explain to the house how in his view the situation now obtaining in Saskatchewan was unprecedented and discussed very fully the condition in Saskatchewan that had resulted from the flood. I do not know how the hon. member can now touch on the question of the floods in Saskatchewan and avoid violating standing order 40, paragraph 2, which says that a member must not repeat himself. I must point out to him that means repeating not only his own arguments but arguments used by others.

Several hon. members spoke on the flood situation in the budget debate. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West was one, though I may be wrong.

Mr. Herridge: I do not think so.

Mr. Speaker: If I am, I withdraw. It was the hon. member for Saskatoon I had in mind, and there were also other members from the province of Saskatchewan who spoke on the flood situation. How can the hon. member for Moose Mountain now initiate a debate on the flood situation on the motion to go into supply without repeating himself, and even the arguments used by others with respect to the same situation?

I do not want to enter into a long debate or interfere with the right of the hon. member for Moose Mountain to express himself on a subject to which he has a right to allude at this time, but I ask hon. members if it is not reasonable on the part of the Chair to warn members that they should not do that which the rules prohibit. The hon. member knows what he was about to do with respect to this subject matter, and I am quite confident that if he was about to violate the rule he will not continue his remarks but will remain in his seat.

I am confronted with this problem. While we were discussing the budget, on the motion to go into ways and means, at which time great latitude is allowed, certain specific speeches were made on the flood situation in Saskatchewan. Now the hon. member has raised the subject again as a grievance on the motion to go into supply. If I allow the hon. member to do so when he has already spoken on this matter, how can I restrict other members who have already spoken in the budget debate on the same question, and prevent them from repeating their speeches?

Hon. members know it is very difficult for the Chair to administer standing order 40, paragraph 2, which has to do with repetition. It is so difficult that perhaps too much repetition is taking place in our debates on many subjects. Therefore I insist upon strict adherence to the rule. I invite the hon. member to deal with another subject if he so desires, but if he wishes to deal with this one his remarks will have to be very limited in scope.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I intend to change my subject completely and, if I am permitted, will speak on the announcement which was made yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the final payment on wheat. Saskatchewan farmers, as I say, are faced with a double-barrelled disaster.

Mr. Byrne: The first was electing the C.C.F.

Wheat

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The first one facing us this year is the fact that tens of thousands of acres in the province will not be seeded as a result of the flood conditions. The second is the fall in farm income in the province. I have here, Mr. Speaker, a report on net farm income for 1954, which indicates the latest figures available. Farm income dropped from a high of $565·5 million in 1952 to $126·5 million in 1953, or a drop of 73 per cent. When we in the C.C.F. party talk about parity prices for farmers, equity for farmers, we mean that the farmers should get a fair share of the national income.

I was amazed this afternoon when the hon. member for Vancouver South got up to belabour the point that the C.C.F. were asking for a program that was not possible, and then went on to say that he believed the farmers were entitled to a fair share of the national income. I want to ask any member in this house how you can have any sector of our Canadian economy receiving either equity or justice and still not obtaining a fair share of the national income. When we in the C.C.F. ask for parity prices for our farmers we do so because we believe it is in the interests of the whole economy. Unless farm people are going to have a fair share of the national income and be guaranteed parity prices, then of course we are going to have other segments of our economy going on the rocks.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Mackenzie stated, unless this government is prepared to give our farm people guaranteed prices, then farmers are going to suffer first and other segments of our economy are going to suffer later. It is not long since we were debating the unemployment situation in this house, but to date the government has not done a single thing to put our people to work. They have not even suggested a program. If the government insists upon doing nothing about finding markets for our wheat or guaranteeing parity prices to our farmers, then of course the government will never find work for our unemployed.

In this connection I might say that not only has the drop in farm income been severe, but farm production has fallen in Canada. While total farm production of Canada dropped 41·9 points in 1954, the fall in the province of Saskatchewan has been from 230·2 down to 94·7. In the face of those figures I do not feel it is wrong for members from Saskatchewan to get up in this house and ask that justice be done to our farm people. We are not acting in a partisan manner. We are not asking for something we do not want for all the people in Canada. The same is true in regard to the flood conditions. When we demand that it be called a national emergency we are asking for the same treatment accorded other places in Canada under similar circumstances.

There are no people in Canada who responded in a more generous manner than the people of Saskatchewan when the Manitoba flood occurred. There are no people in Canada who were more generous or more willing that the Rimouski and Cabano fires be declared national emergencies, so the federal government could step into the picture, than the people of Saskatchewan. We feel the time has come when this whole situation should be appraised. The first thing that should be done is to restore that 73 per cent fall in farm production. This government should have a plan to not only guarantee parity to farmers but to guarantee the full utilization of the land in order to get production. It may well be that this country will be scraping its bins again in order to meet possible wheat sales abroad.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, according to his statement, has been well pleased with the amount of wheat Canada has been able to ship in the past few years. But he knows, the farmers know, and this house knows that had we had another large crop in western Canada this government would have had no program to cope with it. In other words, this government has left the farmer to bear the brunt of the responsibility. Now we are getting an interim payment and the farmer is bearing all the carrying charges. In addition to that, the price of wheat is lower. Then, too, the government has failed to make the necessary agreements that would enable us to get rid of our wheat, as we in this group have insisted we should. There has been no program that would enable a farmer to know what he was going to get. We are facing the future with no decision as to what we are going to get for wheat next year. There is no guaranteed parity price for livestock, and so the future of the farmer is left up in the air.

I believe that is the crux of the situation, Mr. Speaker. All we in this group are asking is that this government get busy and develop a program for Canada, institute a storage program under the ever-normal granary policy. Then the farmer would not be carrying the storage costs of the unsold grain, and when we made our commitments this government would be assured of having grain to ship to our potential customers. That is the situation facing us today.

I am sorry I have not an opportunity of enlarging upon the critical situation facing our municipalities. This drastic fall in farm prices has put our municipalities in a position where they are not going to be able to finance the cost of maintaining municipal services. As a result of the policies of this government since 1945 there has been an increase in the cost of maintaining municipal services. The lowering of farm prices, coupled with the flood conditions, have put our western municipalities in a position they have not experienced since the thirties.

I quite realize that Saskatchewan officials have come down here and placed their brief before this government, outlining the conditions facing Saskatchewan this year as a result of the storms we have had out there. It is my hope that this government will view this matter in the same responsible way it viewed some of the other situations in other parts of Canada.

I am sure every member in this house, and indeed taxpayers all across this country, would support this government if the Prime Minister were convinced that this disaster facing Saskatchewan were such that it should be called a national emergency and receive federal assistance. One of the things which I feel sure will build national unity is for this government to realize that the 10 provinces are a family within a nation, and wherever tragedy strikes this government should be prepared to come in and play its part.

I could reiterate some of the things we in the west have done to help people in other parts of this dominion. I am really ashamed that some hon. members across the floor of this house should try to intimidate any member when he attempts to put before this house a situation existing in his province, and insinuate that he is being provincial or partisan.

What we are trying to do is build this nation from coast to coast so we shall have the kind of Canada of which we can all be proud. We have the best country in the world; we have the resources; we have the people. All we need is a government policy under which we can have unity from coast to coast. We do not want any of these partisan policies.

As I said before, it is our view that when tragedy strikes the government should be prepared to use the taxpayers' money to step in and help our people. What did the producers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta do during the war? We were quite willing to help subsidize every single taxpayer in Canada to the extent of 78 cents on every bushel of wheat that went into the manufacture of flour in Canada. Every bread eater in this country was subsidized by the farmers of western Canada during the war years.

We got $1.55 for our wheat under the contract known as the British wheat agreement. The western farmers did not kick about that. I spoke to Sir John Strachey, who was minister of food in Great Britain, and questioned him as to what the British people were prepared to pay for Canadian wheat during the war years. His answer was, "We would pay $15 per bushel or any price, because we have to have wheat." Well, the farmers of western Canada did not hesitate to help the British people during the war. Strachey said this, however: "If we paid that, Canadian wheat would be coming into Great Britain at the price of sawdust after the war."

The western farmers have never asked for anything unfair. We are only asking for justice. When our people are going to the wall, when we cannot pay our taxes, when we cannot keep our schools open, we are asking this government to be generous enough and sympathetic enough to come into the picture and do something about it.

FLOODS—SITUATION IN WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, the disaster which struck the province of Saskatchewan and western Manitoba earlier this month—perhaps the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek will allow me to say a few words; he may speak afterwards if he wishes—was reported as being of major proportions, so far as its effect on the farmers of that area is concerned.

It has required about a week and a half or two weeks to make a survey of the situation. The recent survey shows that although the western part of the province is not badly hit, the eastern part is suffering seriously, so seriously in fact that the farmers' union in that area wired most members of the House of Commons as follows:

> Many thousands Saskatchewan farmers unable to seed crop this spring. Conditions desperate in widespread areas due to adverse weather and flooding. Saskatchewan farmers union stresses urgent need for program to alleviate distress. Situation demands immediate action. Union pledges full co-operation to implement adequate assistance program.

The constituency I represent in the eastern part of the province is traversed by the Assiniboine river. The farmers, particularly those in the valley of the Assiniboine, and with special reference to the area of Kamsack, for the last three years have suffered from flooding. The result is that about 10,000 acres in that area will produce absolutely nothing. But their disaster is small when compared with what is happening in the rest of the province.

I have before me the official report made by government officials, in which they say, in part:

> That a most serious situation exists was confirmed by supplementary reports from agricultural representatives, received on Thursday and Friday of last week. Their preliminary reports estimated a total of 4,760,000 acres of cultivated land flooded, and 14,810 farmers seriously affected by flooding.

Mr. Gardiner: I rise on a point of order, to point out that the hon. member is proceeding to discuss just what Your Honour has said is out of order. You so indicated when the hon. member for Moose Mountain was speaking. I suggest the hon. member for Yorkton is also out of order to discuss the same matter.

Mr. Castleden: I do not believe I have spoken on this subject.

Mr. Speaker: When I interrupted the hon. member for Moose Mountain my remarks were based on the provisions of standing order 40 (2), which deals with the subject of repetition either of one's own arguments or of the arguments used by others in a debate.

While at the moment the hon. member for Yorkton may be using some arguments used during the budget debate by other hon. members, at least he has not spoken on the matter of the flood. I have been looking at his remarks in Hansard for May 5 and, on glancing through them quickly, I can find no place where he discussed the flood. As a matter of fact I do not think it had taken place at that time.

On the other hand the hon. member for Moose Mountain had spoken on the subject of the flood, and when he intimated that he was about to do so again I referred to standing order 40 (2), as a result of which he was good enough not to further pursue his observations on this subject matter. I shall listen very carefully to the hon. member for Yorkton, and if he does cover ground which has already been covered by his colleagues from the same province I shall have to remind him of the same rule.

Mr. Castleden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. When I was speaking on May 5 I was referring to the fact that the explosion of atomic bombs in a desert region in the country to the south of us might have had some effect on the weather. I might add that since the last explosion of bombs in the Nevada desert we have had another three days of rain in eastern Saskatchewan, and some may think there is weight in my contention of that time.

I assure the house the figures I am now going to place on Hansard have not been given before. These are some of the facts and figures required by the government before it can assess properly whether or not it has the right to declare the flooding in western Canada a national disaster.

Mr. Gardiner: The government has them already. The government has read that statement you are now going to read.

Mr. Castleden: And thus far it has not made any declaration as to whether it considers the flooding a matter of sufficient importance to declare the area affected a disaster area. However, the government did ask for figures, and for an opportunity to assess the damage.

We are here tonight to present the case before the House of Commons in the hope that it might influence the government to make some decision as to whether the area affected can be declared a disaster area. The type of disaster involved in this instance perhaps is not as spectacular as was the case at Rimouski or the Fraser valley, where smaller areas were affected. This affects a sector as widespread as has ever been affected by disaster in Canada, and I believe it affects as many as if not more than were affected by the Winnipeg flood or the flood in the Fraser valley.

I suggest that in making its decision as to whether or not a disaster area shall be declared, the government should use these facts and figures, and that such figures should be available to members of the House of Commons when they are asked to make up their minds whether they should support the government in the request for assistance that has been made.

The eastern portion of the province is settled to a great extent by farmers who operate on a small scale, in most cases involving half or quarter sections of land. The largest proportion of the thickly settled part of Saskatchewan is in the eastern area. There are over 50,000 farmers in that province whose farmlands consist of one or two quarters. The census returns show that in those areas their net income was less than $2,500 a year per family. This area produced a badly frozen crop in 1952, a good average crop in 1953 with the exception of some parts which experienced flooding, and in 1954 rust and frost and floods and wet weather were involved. In their efforts to relieve the situation the provincial government has spent over $3,225,000.

The provincial department of highways has estimated that $1,208,000 worth of damage has been done to the provincial highway system alone. The damage done in municipal areas has not yet been properly estimated. It will take some time to get complete figures from the municipalities. The difficulties of communication have added to the difficulty of getting the estimate together. The main point is that the disaster is of such an unusual character that it is beyond the financial ability of either the province or the municipalities to bear, and they are making their plea for special consideration in the circumstances on the ground that it is an abnormal situation.

For instance, when the municipalities and the government make their surveys of the water flow through valleys and coulees, they construct their bridges on the basis of the engineering figures which show the average flow. They build their bridges a little above the average flow. When a disaster such as this occurs many millions of dollars worth of valuable and expensive construction is wiped out. Under these conditions we suggest that it is at least equal to the disasters which occurred in British Columbia and in Manitoba, and therefore we request that this be declared a disaster area.

The first essential is that some assistance be given toward flood control and the management of the areas where the flooding exists. The importance of the situation can be understood when it is appreciated that unless the flood waters now covering millions of acres of land are removed this year, it will be impossible for those farmers to sow any crop next year. The situation is not only important this year; it is a matter of concern to them even next year. It is on that basis that we think assistance should be given. Surely the federal government can see that it is in the national interest that those areas should be allowed to produce.

The people of the west are celebrating their golden jubilee this year. The people who inhabit the western provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta overcame tremendous difficulties. They went in there 50 years ago as pioneers, not knowing the difficulties and the problems they were to face in breaking new land. They knew nothing of the hard winters and the blizzards they were going to face, and the difficulties of establishing themselves. There were no records of what the country would produce. Any records there were indicated that no one would ever produce wheat in that area, anyway.

However, they went there and they pioneered. They faced difficulties. They are the kind of people who can face difficulties. In fact, I think one of the things that has established the fine character of the people out there is that they learned to work together, they learned to help one another in adversity. By helping one another they have overcome their difficulties, and they have built the country that is there. It will take more than a flood to defeat those people. They merely ask that, in co-operation with their fellow Canadians, some assistance be given. They believe assistance should be made available to take care of unusual and abnormal expenditures that will be required as a result of this flood.

Reports coming to my desk already indicate that many farmers have been unable to go to town, to the shopping centres. Hundreds of bridges have been wiped out. Many of these people are going to be isolated on their farms unless they can get to town on horseback, or by some other means of transportation. With such a situation existing, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it is Canada's responsibility to recognize its seriousness not only immediately but also with respect to the crop for next year.

They will find the government of that province willing to co-operate in every way to assist them in assessing the situation. The provincial government has undertaken surveys which will cover most of the areas affected, but it is utterly impossible for the provincial government or the municipal government to stand the costs of flood control and the drainage problems that face them at this time. I think it is only fair and just that assistance should be given. I feel sure the Canadian people would give their support to assistance to their fellow Canadians in a situation such as this.

Reports that have come to me in the last three days indicate that the situation started to ease somewhat in that area, but rains have begun to fall and the situation at this time is particularly grim. I point out to hon. members who are not familiar with the situation that the seeding of the wheat crop in that country in the good years usually starts around April and is completed around the middle of May. In the average seeding area of the province they like to have their crop in around May 15. Good crops have been put in as late as the beginning of June. These are usually coarse grain crops. Some parts of the western provinces have already seeded, but for about 40 per cent of the wheat farmers of that province there will be no wheat crop this year. They will be very fortunate if they are able to seed a coarse grain crop after the first week in June and harvest it this year; but for many thousands—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask a question? Did I understand the hon. member to say that only 60 per cent of the wheat crop will be seeded this year? I believe he said 40 per cent of the crop will not be seeded.

Mr. Castleden: It is estimated that 40 per cent of the wheat acreage in the eastern part of Saskatchewan will not be seeded this year.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): What does the hon. member consider to be the eastern part?

Mr. Castleden: The eastern half of the province.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That means 20 per cent of the acreage will not be seeded?

Mr. Castleden: I said that 40 per cent would not be sown to wheat.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Twenty per cent of the whole province?

Mr. Castleden: Well, that would be approximately it, but there are larger areas in the west.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member is really speaking only of the area north of Moose Mountain.

Mr. Castleden: If the minister looks at the map which he says he has he will see that the area south of the main line of the C.P.R., even down in the Moose Mountain area, clean through to the Tisdale area and the Hudson Bay area in the north, is affected.

Mr. Gardiner: The map presented to the government yesterday showed the area as north of Moose Mountain.

Mr. Castleden: I shall be glad to have the minister's remarks on it, because I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle will inform him that those large areas south of the Qu'Appelle river are very seriously affected, and certainly the Moose Mountain area as well. I cannot hear what the minister is saying. I shall be pleased to hear more from him on the matter.

I point out to the house that the next two weeks will be the critical period for the people in that area. The problem that exists, and the matter with which they are particularly concerned at the moment, is that of draining the excessive moisture off the land so that with the weather's co-operation next year they will be able to put in a crop. I am pleading with the government at this time to look at the situation in a sympathetic way. I presume they have already had their representatives out to assist the provincial government in a proper assessment of the situation, and that action will be taken equivalent to the needs of the people of that province.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I have another subject which I wish to raise. If the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) is continuing with the same subject matter, I have no objection to his proceeding.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Dauphin going to speak about the flood?

Mr. Zaplitny: Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I shall make the same plea to the hon. member, because as I was listening to the hon. member for Yorkton I noticed that, although he did not speak on the Saskatchewan flood at the page I indicated earlier, on other pages, 3504 and 3505, he had spoken about the flood. I realize that his remarks on that occasion were brief, and that today he was enlarging upon them. Now I hope the hon. member for Dauphin will limit himself to the bare necessities in introducing new matters with respect to the conditions existing in Saskatchewan, because we have already had several speeches concerning the disaster which occurred there.

An hon. Member: The flood of words has been worse than the flood itself.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): I wish to take only a brief time, and the matter I wish to raise is a definite grievance so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned. Whilst the situation in Manitoba is not nearly as serious as that in Saskatchewan, nevertheless there are large areas in the northwestern part of the province which have now been subject to flood waters for the third year running. The reason I wish to raise this matter now is that I should like to hear from the Minister of Agriculture as to his plans with regard to extension of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Gardiner: Let me get along to my estimates and I shall tell you all about it.

Mr. Zaplitny: I should be very glad to wait until then if the minister would indicate at this time that it is his intention to bring in legislation, if necessary, or to extend the regulations so as to make the act applicable to all parts of Manitoba. We have had a very serious flooding condition in our part of the province, as I have said, for three years now. A number of representations have been made, not only by the municipalities, by individuals and organizations in that area but, as a matter of fact, by the provincial government of Manitoba through its minister of agriculture, who has joined forces with the three other ministers of agriculture in recommending to the federal government that the act be extended so as to include all agricultural areas in the four prairie provinces. Until this time we have had no indication whatever as to the opinion of the government in that respect, and I think a statement at this time—

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to answer my hon. friend at once, I may say that I have just answered a letter today from the minister of agriculture of Manitoba on that point, a letter in which he tells me that the question has been referred to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I do not know just what the matter was that was referred to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Gardiner: The very question you have just recited to the house; the question as to whether or not P.F.R.A. should be extended to all parts of the three prairie provinces.

An hon. Member: And British Columbia.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear at this time that the question was discussed between the province and the federal government. May I point out that the reason we consider this matter a grievance in Manitoba is that over the period of time the act has been in effect, since 1935 up to 1954, while the total expenditures under the act came to some $89 million, in round figures, only $5,860,000 was spent in the province of Manitoba, which represents a little less than 7 per cent of the total. With respect to Saskatchewan about $40 million was spent, which represents about 47 per cent; in Alberta a little over 46 per cent, for a total of $39 million, and a little over 3 per cent in British Columbia.

At various times when the provincial government of Manitoba has been approached for assistance for these areas that are subject to flooding, such as the constituency which I represent, parts of the constituency of Churchill and parts of Portage-Neepawa, the reply has been that as soon as the federal government makes up its mind whether it is going to extend the provisions of the act in order to include all parts of Manitoba, the province would be in a position to say what they are going to do.

There are several large projects which I have no doubt are beyond the capacity of the province, and which are very necessary. There is the recommendation that a dam or a reservoir be built on the Assiniboine river. There is the question of lowering the levels of lakes such as lake Manitoba, lake Winnipegosis and probably even lake Winnipeg. Projects of that nature are beyond the capacity of the province, quite obviously. Members of the provincial legislature—and I refer to members who support the government there—have stated in the provincial house that the federal government is discriminating against Manitoba. I am not going to say I agree with them, but that is their opinion.

If the minister would recommend to this government that the operations of that act be made equally applicable in Manitoba along with the other two prairie provinces, a great deal of that dissatisfaction and discontent might disappear. But on the face of it, from the figures I have just quoted, it certainly appears that in Manitoba we are not getting our fair share of the flood control work and other types of work that can be done under the act in order to prevent soil erosion and to hold back flood waters in the areas that have suffered.

I am going to leave it at that, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister has stated that the matter is to be discussed at the dominion-provincial conference, I hope that as soon as that conference is over the minister will come to this house with some legislation, if necessary, or will announce a change in the regulations to extend the act to cover all parts of Manitoba.

Mr. Gardiner: To get this correctly on the record, what I have said is that I answered a letter today from the minister of agriculture in Manitoba in which he states that the Manitoba government have submitted the question to the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I have had a good deal of correspondence in connection with the problem on which the hon. member for Dauphin rose to speak. Before I begin, I wish to assure you that I have not spoken previously on the Saskatchewan flood. I wish to talk about my own constituency and the interlake country. I am the only member from there, so nobody else has talked about it. I was hoping that if I had the opportunity to speak on the motion to go into supply the minister would be able to answer my questions when the estimates come up. I still hope he will. He has now stated that he has had correspondence with the provincial government, and that they are going to bring up the matter and discuss it at the dominion-provincial conference.

I have a resolution from Gypsumville, which I am going to read into the record. There are people there who cannot get on their land to sow their crops or anything now. Some had practically no crops in 1954, and they have nothing in 1955. Those who had a little crop last year were brought under the P.F.A.A., but the man who never sowed a crop received nothing, and we do not have

P.F.R.A. in the interlake country yet. I am hoping we will get it. Some of these farms have been cultivated for 40 or 50 years. Yet today people are going across them in motorboats. There is no hope whatever that these fellows will be able to put in any crop. It is not as though it was new land that had just been broken, or anything like that. This land has been in cultivation for a long time.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that your ruling a while ago rules out me and everybody else. I therefore want to get this matter straight. The hon. member who is speaking and I had a heated discussion over this matter during the debate on the address in this house. The whole matter was up for discussion at that time. As a matter of fact I went over to the hon. member's seat and discussed the matter with him afterward.

Mr. Speaker: I recall that the hon. member has asked several questions on the orders of the day relating to the problem with regard to which the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) has entertained us, and the discussion of which is now being continued by the hon. member for Selkirk. As the minister recalls, the matter was debated on the address. There is no purpose in having repetition.

The hon. member must keep in mind the fact that when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are before the committee he can speak as often as he wishes, and he can pursue the matter at that time. I would urge hon. members to realize that at this moment we are debating a motion to go into supply with the Speaker in the chair, and we are supposed to raise genuine grievances, not to repeat points which have been raised time and again since the beginning of the session.

Mr. Bryce: I am going to try to obey your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but believe me, if ever any man had a grievance, I have one speaking in behalf of these poor people in the interlake country who are being flooded out.

As far as the minister is concerned, I may say that he came over and spoke to me. I appreciated him doing so. But if he thought he was talking about my problem may I say that I do not think so. We were talking about P.F.A.A. down in the lower part of the interlake country.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend was talking about P.F.A.A. being paid because the lands were flooded.

Mr. Bryce: Yes, but we were not flooded in the way we are now. I hope you are going to let me continue, Mr. Speaker, because I have waited for this opportunity. I have nursed this grievance until I could get this opportunity on the motion to go into supply.

The situation on the east side of lake Manitoba, where we do not have much arable land and not much cultivation goes on, is this. We have there the ranches and the people who raise cattle for a living. What is happening there is that these people have no place to graze their cattle. Some of them have already left. Some of them have sold their chattels and moved to town, thus helping to augment the 600,000 people who are unemployed. That is a bad situation. We want to keep as many people on the farms as we can.

Then let us look at the situation on the west side of lake Winnipeg. I have here letters I could read—but I shall not do so, Mr. Speaker—indicating that the water is taking away some of the land every day. The situation is worse this year than it has ever been. One fellow says that the water is high but the taxes are still higher, and we are paying the same taxes for less land every year.

The problem there is this. When these fellows go to the federal government they are told that they had better see the provincial fellows. Then when they go to the provincial fellows they are told that this is a navigable lake and they must see the federal government. It is a matter of passing the buck. It just keeps people running around trying to get something done. Now we are told that it is going to be taken up at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Gardiner: No, I did not tell you that.

Mr. Bryce: You said the minister of agriculture, I think, in the provincial government has it on the agenda. How long are these people going to suffer in that way? I want to cut short these remarks. However, I want to read this resolution. It was passed at a meeting at Gypsumville at which there were 75 people in attendance, 22 of whom were directly or seriously affected:

> Whereas many of us have been totally deprived of the means of making a living at farming and ranching, while others have been very seriously affected by the lake waters flooding our lands—a condition that was prevalent in 1954 and is even more disastrous at the present time—and,
> Whereas under the best of circumstances it will be two more years before the waters can recede enough to allow us to use our land again, and
>
> Whereas those of us who have been growing grain on the flooded land have been left with no means to even grow feed for our livestock,
> Therefore be it resolved that we urge most strongly on the government responsible that measures be taken to allay the possibility of total bankruptcy for some of us and grievous hardship for others—these measures to consist of compensation for the loss of use of the land in the form of cash payments to tide us over the critical period.

I have many more letters I could read, but I know that people are going to be angry with me if I take too long. I think it was the Minister of Agriculture who told me that between the dominion government and provincial governments they are spending $300,000 a year in order to alleviate the conditions brought about by this catastrophe. But it is a matter of "Live, old horse, and you will get corn". Something must be done now. Don't wait until the people are all dead and another generation comes along. I have brought this matter to the attention of the minister previously. I know he has replied that it was receiving attention.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker will not allow me to do so, or I would answer the hon. member now.

Mr. Bryce: Yes, but your answers are so vague that I no longer have any faith in them. I am sorry to say that. I think the minister should take this matter seriously. It is no laughing matter. There are hundreds of farmers out there. I do not know whether or not they will ever recover from this catastrophe. I hope the federal and provincial governments will get together at the earliest possible opportunity in order to ascertain how the people in these distressed communities can be helped. I want to appeal to the Prime Minister and to the members of the cabinet for immediate action to help these people in their terrible plight at this time.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of pursuing the matter of flooding which has been raised by some of the hon. members who have spoken previously, even though I recognize that it is a most serious topic. The matter I wish to raise is one which quite conceivably could either augment or completely eliminate the flooding problem to which recent reference has been made.

The matter I wish to raise, Mr. Speaker, is that of rain-makers. I think this is a new topic as far as the current session of parliament is concerned. In raising it at this time I feel that I shall not be guilty of any undue repetition. Spotted at various points on Vancouver island are a number of rain-making machines. Some hon. members who know something of Vancouver island may wonder what we are doing with rain-making machines there. I know, for example, that one community in my constituency was recently described in a newspaper headline as having had 12 feet of rain in 12 months, and that was a fairly accurate statement.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member if he will be kind enough to tell the house how he relates the matter of rain-making machines to the jurisdiction of the federal parliament? The hon. member must speak about matters which relate to our jurisdiction. It must be a matter concerning which we may be able to do something. If we cannot do anything about rain-making machines, the hon. member may not speak about them now. We have already had a speech on the weather this session, and perhaps we could be relieved now.

An hon. Member: Change the subject.

Mr. Barnett: In all seriousness I am raising this question, in part at least, because I believe it is one with respect to which the question of jurisdiction, constitutionally or otherwise, may well have to be dealt with. In view of the recent discussion I realize that my remarks may appear to Your Honour to be related to a certain flood situation, but I can assure you that at the time I decided in my own mind I would raise this subject as a grievance I was completely unaware that the other matter which has been discussed was going to be raised. In all seriousness, the situation is that on Vancouver island a number of rain-making machines have been set up. I took the trouble to go and view one of these installations which, if I understand correctly, operates on the principle of having silver iodide crystals released into a mechanism in which they are ignited.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the hon. member to tell the house immediately how he relates the jurisdiction of this parliament to the conditions he is about to describe to us.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I assume this matter would come within the jurisdiction of the federal department, having to do with meteorological services; or would come within the purview of the activities of the national research council, and it is also a matter which could very well involve interprovincial relations. As I stated somewhat facetiously, I admit, in conversation with some of my colleagues, if this situation were permitted to develop it is conceivable that we in British Columbia would have the power to turn the entire prairie provinces into a desert by taking all the water out of the clouds coming in from the Pacific. Inasmuch as there does not seem to be any governmental jurisdiction at the present time, a serious question arises as to the right of certain private concerns to establish these installations.

Floods in Western Canada

Mr. Speaker: I want to be very generous toward the hon. member. I know what the situation is. Members have the right to raise grievances on the motion to go into supply, but I think the hon. member is finding it too difficult to relate his rain-making machines to the jurisdiction of this parliament. He has not said very much to establish that point; in reply to the question I felt it was my duty to ask him, he has not been very specific. If the matter the hon. member wishes to raise now is linked at some point or other with one of our federal departments, could the hon. member not wait and raise the matter when the estimates of the proper department are before the house? If he thinks it relates to agriculture he may deal with it on the estimates of that department. If he thinks it concerns the national research council he may discuss it on the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the minister of that department being responsible for national research council activities.

But not being quite sure at this time how or in what way it is related to the jurisdiction that we have here as the House of Commons, I think he should delay his remarks until he is more positive, and then use the machinery provided for him to raise these points as often as he wishes when the estimates of the respective departments concerned are before the committee of supply. If the hon. member does not feel he is being unfairly treated at this point I would urge him to consider very seriously leaving this matter in abeyance until a further opportunity is afforded to him.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, it was precisely because of the fact that as far as I am concerned I did not know under which departmental estimates I might raise the matter that I felt this would be the appropriate occasion to raise it as a grievance.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member, in trying to find out to what department the matter belongs, makes a 40 minute speech and then finds out when the estimates are up that he should not have raised it at all because it does not come within the ambit of any department, he will have caused the House of Commons to lose 40 minutes of its time. This is a very serious matter. I think the hon. member should make sure that it lies within the jurisdiction of this parliament to do something about the matter before he proceeds to bring it up. In Beauchesne's third edition, pages 699 to 702, he will find a ruling which might give him comfort, but, with great respect, I am not in agreement with Mr. Speaker Sevigny's ruling on that occasion.

[Mr. Barnett.]

Mr. Barnett: Would I be in order to say that in the first place I had no intention of making a 40 minute speech? My purpose in rising was to put forward a grievance on behalf of some of the people in my district, and request that the government take under consideration the advisability of introducing some form of legislation to cover the situation. As far as I am aware no legislation exists at the present time, and it is on that point I wish to raise my grievance, the necessity for the consideration of the establishment of legislation to cover a situation which I feel to be a matter of general responsibility that can only be looked after properly by the government.

Mr. Fulton: Put it on the agenda for the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Barnett: Dr. Gordon Shrum of the University of British Columbia expressed the opinion some little time ago that the question of whether or not legislation should be introduced to control the installation of such machines could very well be taken under advisement. I assume it would come within the jurisdiction of the federal government under the Department of Transport or—

An hon. Member: External affairs.

Mr. Barnett: —some other department. As it is a matter of growing concern to the residents of my area I wished to raise it as a grievance on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: The point the hon. member has in mind is so hypothetical that before he raises it as a grievance now I believe he should ascertain whether or not it is within the jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with the matter he has in mind. If we were to take his line of argument as being sound there are many things we would be trying to bring up in debate here, asking ourselves whether or not some day they would not fall within the jurisdiction of this parliament. The hon. member is reasonable and I do not think he will be prejudicing himself or the people he represents if this matter is delayed until the estimates of the proper department are before the committee of supply. In the meantime I feel it would be wise on his part not to press the point, and I am asking his co-operation at this time.

Mr. Barnett: I am quite agreeable to cooperate in the matter, Mr. Speaker. I believe perhaps the purpose I had in drawing the attention of the government and the house to the matter has been served well enough for the moment.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether or not you will consider the remarks I am about to make strictly in order. It is true that they could properly be made during the consideration of the estimates of some department, probably the Department of Agriculture, but my good friend the hon. member for Selkirk has prompted me to say a word or two with respect to the flood condition in Saskatchewan and Manitoba at the present time. If I should not continue with these remarks I shall abide by your ruling.

However, I would say this at the outset. While hon. members from Saskatchewan are complaining bitterly, and properly so, about the catastrophe that has occurred in their province as the result of abnormal rainfall and flooding, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this house, that much of that same water is finding its way down through the province of Manitoba and causing us some very serious problems there. I can imagine that right tonight on the Assiniboine river there are dozens and dozens of men out manning the dikes in an attempt to prevent that river from overflowing its banks. This river is taking much of the overflow that is coming from the province of Saskatchewan.

We cannot do anything about keeping that water out. It is an abnormal flow, it is true, but I assure you that the hon. member for Selkirk did not exaggerate the condition in Manitoba at the present time. I think he will agree with me that if any attack of a fundamental and practical character upon the situation were to be undertaken the cost would shock this house. I may say that lake Manitoba is over three and a half feet above normal, and this is causing considerable damage to the adjacent farmlands and to a very fashionable summer resort on that lake.

This lake flows into a lake in my hon. friend's constituency. The people on my side of the lake would like to open a channel and pour more water into lake Winnipeg, but we are faced with very violent protests at such a plan. I would suggest to this house that any plan of effective control would have to be carried right through to the Nelson river flowing into Hudson bay. I am only making this statement to give you some idea of the magnitude of the problem that is facing Manitoba.

At this time the Assiniboine river is carrying the bulk of this run-off water. It is threatening not only the low lands in the city of Brandon but many farm areas along the way. There has been a recommendation that the Assiniboine river might be dammed in the neighbourhood of Russell, a proposition which the engineers have estimated would cost in the neighbourhood of $6 to $10 million. There has been another suggestion that the Assiniboine river might be diverted into lake Manitoba, the lake which I have stated is already about three and a half feet above normal. This is another proposition that would cost from $6 to $10 million, to say nothing of the cost of a diversion to run the water from lake Manitoba into lake Winnipeg and then carry the whole thing out to the Nelson river.

We have another side of the problem which is not quite so serious with respect to the Assiniboine river. It is true these conditions are abnormal. We have had too much rainfall and too much snow for the ordinary streams to carry the run-off. In my opinion there is still another problem that has played some part, to a limited degree, in creating this situation. During the last 10 or perhaps 15 years we have had great advances in machinery, particularly bulldozers run by caterpillar tractors. They have been very useful and convenient in clearing scrub land. Much of the land that used to be bush or scrub has been cleared and put into production. In addition, the same machines have been found very satisfactory in making ditches and helping to build drains. The result of this has been to speed up the flow of water, so the ordinary facilities have not been able to take care of this very quick run-off.

I am sure anyone from Manitoba fully recognizes that Manitoba has a problem of considerable magnitude at the present time. If attacked in a practical and effective manner it is going to be extremely costly. It is a problem which I admit is beyond the resources of the municipalities and the province to cope with. At the same time, I do not think there is any disposition on the part of the federal government not to lend some measure of co-operation to Manitoba, just as the government has elsewhere in attacking these problems.

In saying that, I should like to be very specific and say that I do not think anyone is going to suggest at any time or any place that the jurisdiction or responsibility for attacking this problem in our province rests with the federal government alone. I do not think our people in Manitoba would welcome the end result which that sort of policy would mean. I do not believe Manitoba, while welcoming financial support, would say that sole jurisdiction for meeting the situation that has been created in our province should be turned over to the federal government.

I leave that with you. But I point out that we still have the recollection of other floods in our province which have had very serious consequences, and the remedy for which has not as yet been provided or attacked. Because of the particular topography of our province cost requirements are presented to which no one has yet been prepared to face up.

These people along lakes Manitoba and Winnipeg and in the St. Martin area, and along the Assiniboine river are deeply concerned. Many of them have been seriously affected, and many are suffering heavy losses. Many of them, as in Saskatchewan, will find it difficult to seed a crop.

I might add, too, that we had one other serious misfortune this spring on that same Assiniboine river, something which no one could foresee, which no one could foretell, and against which no protection could be guaranteed. I refer to the ice jam which occurred on the river when it was almost at full flow. It caused considerable damage by flooding the lower reaches and necessitating the moving of several hundred families from Portage la Prairie. This in turn brought the problem of the river overflowing its banks and flooding an extensive area.

So I would not like it to be thought that the problem of flood conditions and excess water applies only to Saskatchewan. It may apply to Saskatchewan in a very serious manner, but it also applies to Manitoba, and at the present time largely because of water coming from Saskatchewan.

I have had discussions with several people including flood control committees, members of the provincial legislature, our own Minister of Agriculture and federal members from Manitoba, in an effort to see what approach would be considered the soundest and most logical to meet these abnormal conditions. The irony is, as the hon. member for Selkirk knows, that it was only a matter of 12 or 15 years ago that the Fairford river, which presents one of the problems in this picture, was dammed up in order to keep up the level in lake Manitoba. I offer this only as an indication of how abnormal conditions develop, and just how difficult they are to cope with.

It is one of those times when we have to sit down with those who are most affected and try to work out a solution that will be of value, whether through the building of dams, the building of further cut-offs, the placing of diversion channels or the buying up of lands of those who are affected. Some approach of that kind must be recognized. I believe it will be faced up to, and I would hope in the not too distant future.

VETERANS PREFERENCE FOR CIVIL SERVICE POSITIONS

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, since this is an open field day for complaints I wish to use seven or eight of the remaining ten minutes this evening to register another complaint that has come to me from veterans in my riding. I would hope the complaint or grievance is ill-founded.

I find that as we get further from the war years there is a growing suspicion among veterans' bodies that less and less attention is being paid to that clause in the veterans' charter which gives them some initial preference in the matter of seeking employment in the civil service. Coupled with that is the growing feeling or suspicion that the employment of veterans particularly is gradually passing out of the hands of the civil service commission and being taken over by the heads of government departments.

I have received a number of letters from veterans stressing both these points. Then only a few days ago there came to my desk, as I presume it did to others, a series of resolutions adopted by the dominion civil service war veterans' association. This document contains some 18 resolutions calling attention to the grievances of members of that association, and I find that some of these grievances are in line with those I have received from individual veterans who live in my riding. It is to one or two of those grievances I wish to call the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Pinard) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Lapointe).

Among these resolutions is one asking that a representative of veterans' organizations be required to sit in as an observer at all civil service examinations. Officers of the Canadian Legion tell me that the practice is fairly generally followed, but I have had instances brought to my attention where veterans have left examinations after being assured by the small group of examiners or interviewers that they were qualified in every respect, only to find perhaps six weeks later that for some reason or another they had failed to pass the test.

Another resolution is to the effect that heads of all departments should be required to adhere to the principle of veterans' preference. The comment made, which is in line with individual grievances I have received, is to the effect that many heads of government departments when making appointments bypass entirely the principle of veterans' preference. Veterans tell me that even where positions are advertised stating that a preference will be given to veterans, upon application for such positions they have found that the positions have been already filled by persons on the government patronage list.

Then here is another resolution and comment. Here is a reputable veterans' organization which claims that veterans with pensionable disabilities lying in hospital are actually informed by letter that unless they maintain better attendance on the job they will be fired. I say that is no way to treat veterans. I suggest that a check-up be made, particularly with this association, to see what evidence there is for this charge.

Here is another charge. It is said that in many instances orders in council are superseded by departmental orders. There is a resolution to the effect that departmental orders be no longer permitted to revoke or change orders in council unless a new order in council has been passed. I say those charges, Mr. Speaker, are very much in line with some of the complaints I have heard and received in letters from veterans in my riding. They show that the further we get away from war the greater the tendency is to forget the debt we owe to veterans, and the greater the tendency to overlook them in favour of those who have not seen service.

I bring this matter to the attention of the government at the request of individual veterans in my riding and in support of the resolutions presented by the dominion civil service war veterans' association.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall follow the order of business I indicated on Friday night. However, I am not sure whether the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, or someone on his behalf, will be able to take the Yukon quartz mining resolution.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 9.57 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 18, 1955

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

T-33 AIRCRAFT CRASHES

Mr. Pearkes:

1. How many T-33 aircraft have crashed in Canada, since they were put into service as training planes?
2. How many inquiries have there been into the cause of crashes?
3. What has been the principal reason for crashes?
4. How much do these aircraft cost?
5. What is their average life span?
6. How many pilots have been killed in Canada in T-33 crashes?
7. How many were NATO students, and how many Canadians?
8. How many pilots have survived a training period in the T-33?
9. How many pilots have been rejected as not suitable for further training, as pilots, after starting training in these aircraft?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. 39, of which 30 were in training command.
2. In every case.
3. Error in judgment on the part of the pilot.
4. $200,000.
5. The T-33 has been employed in training command as an advanced trainer for air crew candidates since the fall of 1953 and has not been in service long enough to determine an average life span.
6. 33 pilots, including two who are missing. Of these, 25 were in training command.
7. 13 were NATO students.
8. More than 1,000 pilots have successfully completed their T-33 training period or are in process of doing so.
9. 86.

INTRAVENOUS OR MUSCULAR INJECTIONS

Mr. Balcom:

Are preparations intended for intravenous or muscular administration analysed by the food and drug branch of the national health and welfare department before being released for sale to the public?

Mr. Robertson:

Section 13 of the Food and Drugs Act requires that samples of all batches of organic arsenicals (arsphenamine, dichlorarsphenamine hydrochloride, neoarsphenamine, oxophenarsine hydrochloride and sulpharsphenamine) be not distributed until the Minister of National Health and Welfare has indicated that each batch is not unsafe for use. Each batch is analysed or biologically tested before being released for sale.

In addition, parenteral products controlled under section 12 of the act may not be sold until the minister is satisfied that the premises, in which the drugs mentioned in schedules C and D of the act are manufactured, are suitable and that the processes and conditions of manufacture are satisfactory to produce drugs that are safe when properly used. Schedules C and D include insulin, vaccines, sera and antibiotics.

Factories manufacturing these products are carefully inspected and samples are tested from time to time. Several batches of any new products added to any manufacturer's list are tested before being released for sale to make sure they are safe and samples are taken at intervals thereafter for test.

All other parenteral drugs are spot checked for safety and identity. Conditions under which these drugs are manufactured are also being checked by the food and drug inspectors.

TEESWATER, ONT.—POST OFFICE BUILDING

Mr. Robinson (Bruce):

1. Has any work been done on the site purchased for a new post office building in Teeswater, Ontario?
2. If so, what type of work?
3. Have plans been made for erecting a post office on the above mentioned site?
4. If so, what size and type of building do such plans call for?
5. When do such plans call for completion of the building?
6. Will there be living quarters in the post office building for the postmaster?

Mr. Bourget:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
